REFLECTIONS ON THE 53RD
ANNIVERSARY OF V-J DAY

• Mr. GRAMS. Mr. President, I rise today to honor, thank, and remember the men and women who fought so bravely to protect our freedoms during World War II. As my colleagues know, it was 53 years ago today that Japan officially surrendered to the Allies, prompting President Truman's declaration of September 2nd as Victory-Over-Japan Day, or V-J Day.

That monumental declaration marked the end of the most immense and devastating war the world has ever seen—a war that shaped not only the course of history but also the lives of the many brave Americans who, through their service in the U.S. military, fought to restore freedom to lands halfway around the world.

These young Americans were thrust into a situation best described by General William Sherman when he said, quite simply, that war is hell. It is safe to say they experienced horrors and fear most of us cannot begin to comprehend.

To gain some understanding of the realities of war and of the heroism exhibited during World War II, let me take you back to December 7, 1941. The place was Pearl Harbor. George Albert Enloe, a young Navy flyer from Anoka, Minnesota, had just two days earlier turned 26 years old. Before that day he had never really known the realities of war. Here is part of the diary entry he made on that Sunday describing the surprise Japanese attack:

I can, and will always, remember the bullets that sprayed past me as I ducked into the hanger. Ensign Fox and Ensign Willis were right behind me. Fox was killed; Willis got through with a bullet through his head. The bullets came through the hanger as though it was made of paper . . . I understood then what it means to be "under fire." Before, these were just words. But I found myself actually there. I was scared. I forced myself to stay. We kept shooting.

Enloe survived that day and went on to serve for five more years in the military. In that short period, he became one of the most decorated combat pilots in the entire Navy and just last month, the City of Anoka dedicated a park in his honor.

Unfortunately, as years pass and our nation enjoys one of its greatest periods of prosperity, too many Americans, especially young Americans, are unaware of the sacrifices made and the lessons taught to us by the likes of George Enloe.

In Winona, Minnesota, for example, a young man was recently found guilty of vandalizing flagpoles at a veterans park. What makes this act even more disheartening is that, according to the corrections agent who handled the case, the teen "did not really know what a veteran was."

Thankfully, the judge understood the importance of educating this young man on the sacrifices made by those who have served our nation's military. The sentence handed down by the judge required the teen to see and then write a report on the movie "Saving Private Ryan."

At a time when the movies and TV are saturated with senseless violence, this film exposes Americans to a bleakly realistic portrait of war—a war in which large numbers of Americans fought heroically in the worst conditions imaginable and often died horrible deaths in a battle against oppression. "Saving Private Ryan" is a violent film, just as war is violent. It is a disturbing film, as it ought to be.

I hope that young vandal walked out of the theater with some sense of what a veteran truly is. I hope "Saving Private Ryan" will help to raise that awareness in all Americans. During this time of relative peace, we cannot turn a blind eye to the sacrifices of the past. We must remember that our ability to speak freely, choose a place of worship, and pursue the American dream were protected by every man, every woman who served in World War II. Above all, we must never take for granted what our veterans have taught us, the lesson that is chiseled into the stone of the Korean War Veterans Memorial in Washington, DC—"Freedom Is Not Free."

On the anniversary of the official end of World War II, I encourage Americans to take time today to thank and remember our veterans. Whether they are a neighbor, a friend, or a grandparent, ask about their experiences during that turbulent time. Through their sacrifices, freedom and prosperity have flourished. Tell them they are appreciated.

Mr. President, I have taken a few moments to try to put into perspective the magnitude of the sacrifices made by our young soldiers during World War II. I know that my words are wholly inadequate in reflecting the experiences of those brave men and women. Perhaps understanding ultimately lies not in words, but in actions—the actions of every veteran who swore an oath to defend our sacred freedom from "all enemies, foreign and domestic."

We are duty-bound to pass on those experiences to future generations of Americans, to ensure they know the stories, sacrifices, pain, and ultimate triumph of World War II. For their sake and for the sake of this nation, we must never let another young American forget what a veteran is. •

TRUTH IN BUDGETING

• Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, there has been quite a bit of discussion in Washington recently about the need to tell the truth. Well, I have always believed people should tell the truth—in private and in public. That is why I have long opposed the biggest lie, the biggest fraud in this town—the so-called federal budget surplus. The truth is there is no surplus. We continue to borrow money from federal trust funds—mainly Social Security—to mask the budget deficit. Meanwhile, the national debt skyrockets.

I rise today, Mr. President, to draw the Senate's attention to an editorial which appeared in the Sunday, August 30, 1998 edition of the Spartanburg Herald-Journal, published in Spartanburg, SC. This editorial points out the fraudulent nature of the budget surplus and criticizes Congress and the President for failing to tell the American people the truth about the budget. I quote the Herald-Journal: "The truth can be seen in the national debt. That debt is continuing to grow and will keep growing over the next few years. Your budget is not balanced if you continue to go deeper and deeper into debt each year."

The editorial goes on to argue that our priority should be to balance the budget honestly and begin to reduce our national debt, rather than give in to the near-term appeal of further tax cuts—no matter how much merit the individual cuts may have. Mr. President, I have been beating this drum for years now. For the past two years, for example, I have offered budget resolutions to urge we stay the course to balance the budget and begin to reduce the debt.

In fact, I support many of the proposed tax cuts. I have consistently supported making health insurance costs for the self-employed 100 percent deductible, and I have voted to eliminate the marriage penalty three times in this year alone. But each time I have also voted to pay for these tax cuts, so that we stay on course to balance the budget. This should be our top priority. Only by reducing the national debt will we be able to whittle away at our whopping $363 billion in annual interest costs.

I have been trying for years to get the media to expose this fraud Washington perpetrates on the American people. Yet many in the media—people entrusted to report the truth—continue to report a surplus. I am glad to see that at least one newspaper in my home state of South Carolina has seen through this smoke screen. Mr. President, I ask that the entire editorial be printed in the RECORD.

The editorial follows:

RIGHT CUTS, WRONG TIME

SOME LAWMAKERS ARE PROPOSING A SET OF WORTHY TAX CUTS AT THE WRONG TIME

Some Republicans in the U.S. House have devised a worthy package of $78 billion in tax cuts. But this year is not the time to cut taxes.

Despite the rhetoric coming from Washington, there is no budget surplus to spend—not on tax cuts, not on education, not even on Social Security.

Leaders of both parties in Congress and at the White House are claiming that they have balanced the budget. But they make their claim by not counting the money they are borrowing from federal trust funds, including Social Security.

The truth can be seen in the national debt. That debt is continuing to grow and will
