

Craig Freeman, a 12-year Navy veteran who suffered multiple injuries, is from Moultrie in my area of southwest Georgia. Thankfully, he will soon be well enough to visit his family on leave. But some of his shipmates remain hospitalized, and 17 of them will never see their loved ones again. These brave young Americans willingly went into harm's way, and, like others who have paid the price for our freedom, they shall forever remain in our hearts.

We extend our sympathy to the families. We also express our rage. But that is not enough, Mr. Speaker.

We must resolve to fight back against these insane acts by committing the country's full resources in an aggressive effort to determine who is responsible, to see that justice is done, and to do everything possible to deter such acts in the future. As Navy Secretary Richard Danzig pointed out, our memory is long and our reach is longer. As a member of the House Select Committee on Intelligence, I will continue working to ensure that the country is fully prepared to strike back against these forces of evil.

TRIBUTE TO DOUGLAS SIMMONS

HON. JOHN T. DOOLITTLE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 19, 2000

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Speaker, today I recognize and honor the contributions my good friend, R. Douglas Simmons, has made to one of America's most respected service institutions, the Boy Scouts of America (BSA). On October 27 of this year, Doug will mark 50 years of continuous registration in the Boy Scouts organization. This lengthy record of service both as a youth participant and as an adult leader merits the recognition and commendation of this distinguished body.

First of all, I wish to say a few words about the Boy Scouts of America itself. Few other organizations have as admirable a record of doing good as does the BSA. For ninety years, Boy Scouts have been symbols of everything that is right with America's youth. In fact, in the eyes of many, the faithful Boy Scout has come to embody the virtues of personal integrity and community service.

Scouting is a program that educates young men in countless fields of study, trains them to master practical skills, instills in them a sense of civic duty, encourages them to develop commitment to their faith and country, and teaches them to lead a life of service to others. Boy Scouts learn and practice the principles of cooperation and teamwork. They take an active role in setting goals, making decisions, and executing plans for themselves and for the group. Whether it be in today's businesses, government institutions, schools, or families, these leadership skills are clearly in demand.

Perhaps the BSA's most valuable role in today's society is that it provides boys with positive male role models. In our increasingly fatherless society, it is now more important than ever for young men to have honorable mentors that they can look to for example, instruction, counsel, and companionship.

Mr. Speaker, I am glad to say that my friend, Doug Simmons, has been a part of BSA's sterling legacy for the past 50 years. His scouting career began when he registered as an eight-year-old Cub Scout on October 27, 1950. He remained active in Scouting throughout his youth, eventually advancing to the rank of Eagle Scout and participating in the Order of the Arrow. In each of his Scout troops and Explorer posts, Doug held leadership positions. Perhaps the culmination of his experience as a Boy Scout was when he attended the National Scout Jamboree.

To his credit, Doug has continued his involvement in Scouting as an adult leader. His ongoing leadership training includes Bear Paw and Wood Badge courses and time at Philmont Scout Ranch. He has held numerous positions at almost every level of Scouting. Among the troop level positions he has filled are scoutmaster, troop committee chairman, unit commissioner, and institutional representative. At the district level, Doug Simmons has been Camporee chairman, and he has served on the camping committee. At the council level, he has been a member of the Explorer Advisory Council and the Bear Paw training staff. Furthermore, he has served in Order of the Arrow leadership and as a merit badge counselor.

For his dedication to Scouting, Doug Simmons has received numerous awards, including the Scouters Key, the Scouters Training Award, the Silver Bear, and the Silver Beaver.

In addition to his direct involvement in Scouting, Doug has worked with the young men in his church while serving in various ecclesiastical offices. Among these positions have been bishop, bishop's counselor and deacon quorum advisor.

Mr. Speaker, our nation needs more citizens who are willing to stand up for the values that have made America great. We need more individuals who are dedicated to improving the lives and circumstances of the people around them. We need more of our young people to participate in character-building and community-building activities. We need more responsible adults to take an active role in caring for and guiding the youth of this country. In short, we need more people like Doug Simmons.

I salute both Doug and the institution he loves so dearly, The Boy Scouts of America. As he now commemorates his 50 years of involvement with the Boy Scouts of America, let us honor all Doug Simmons' contributions to advancing the ideals of that great organization.
