MINORITY VIEWS

We vehemently oppose the majority's allocations. The Ryan budget, which endorses sequestration levels for discretionary spending, is unrealistic, unworkable, and economically misguided. It guarantees deadlock in the process; neither the Democratic minority in the House, nor the Senate majority, nor the White House will accept sequestration levels. It is unworkable for the House majority to pass a few bills at roughly the President's requested levels with inadequate funds left to get bipartisan support for the remaining bills that support critical investments in education, medical research, infrastructure and a host of other important matters. Finally, starting with a top line of $966.9 billion, instead of $1.058 trillion as the Budget Control Act assumes in the absence of sequestration, will continue the slow drag on economic growth and job creation. Even the Europeans have seen the limits of austerity as a fiscal policy in the midst of a fragile economic recovery.

Democrats on the Committee fought these allocations.

I offered a motion to postpone consideration of the 302(b) suballocations to provide sufficient time for the Budget Committees to appoint conferees and agree on a reasonable alternative to sequestration. The motion was defeated on a party-line vote.

Next, I offered an alternative 302(b) suballocation to replace the Chairman's proposal. The amendment allocated a total of $1.058 trillion and reflected the President's budget request with a few exceptions:

- For Transportation HUD, the alternative rejected the President's underfunding of project-based Section 8 housing and his request to move Amtrak from discretionary to the mandatory side of the budget.

- Under the alternative, the Legislative Branch bill would have been frozen at last year's enacted level.

- The amendment would also have increased the Interior and Environment allocation to restore the Environmental Protection Agency to last year's enacted level, rejecting cuts to EPA's Clean and Safe Drinking Water programs.

- And the President's request for defense would have been reduced, with cuts in core funding and in Overseas Contingency Operations.

This amendment was also defeated on a party-line vote.

Finally, as the Committee considered the Military Construction and Veterans Administration and the Homeland Security bills, Representatives DeLauro and Kaptur offered amendments. Their amendments would have replaced sequestration with a balanced approach of spending cuts and provisions ending tax breaks for big oil and imposing the Buffet rule so that taxpayers in the highest tax bracket don't pay a lower effective tax rate than middle-income workers. Those were also defeated on party-line votes.

6

We stand adamantly opposed to the misguided sequester embodied in these allocations.

NITA M. LOWEY.
