

we agree with Nissan that it is highly unlikely that a driver would actually leave the ignition in this position.

The only situations in which the noncompliance would affect the vehicle operator would be if the operator turns the ignition switch to the "OFF" or "ACCESSORY" position without the transmission being placed in the "PARK" position. In this situation, the operator would not be able to remove the key from the ignition due to the transmission shift interlock. We agree with Nissan that, if this situation occurs, only two scenarios are possible. The operator will exit the vehicle without the key or the operator will remain in the vehicle.

In the first situation, if the operator attempts to exit the vehicle without the key, an audible warning, as required in FMVSS No. 114, will sound, alerting the operator that the key is in the ignition. We believe that the audible warning signal requirement of FMVSS No. 114 should reduce the possibility of the operator leaving the vehicle without the key.

In the second situation, if the driver remains in the vehicle, he or she will attempt to restart the vehicle. However, the engine cannot be started if the vehicle's transmission is not in the "PARK" position. But, since turning the ignition forward to the "ON" position will activate the PRNDL display, the operator will be alerted that the transmission is not in the "PARK" position.

Further, as Nissan points out, we granted a similar application from General Motors Corporation (GM) in 1993 (58 FR 33296). In this case, certain GM vehicles were found to be out of compliance with the display requirements of FMVSS No. 102, namely, the PRNDL displays on the subject GM vehicles would not be illuminated if the transmission was left in a position other than "PARK" when the ignition was in the "OFF" position. We did conclude that, because the noncompliance did not occur during times of operation, "the noncompliance presents no discernible threat to safety."

In view of the arguments offered by Nissan, we do not deem this noncompliance to be a serious safety problem warranting notification and remedy. Accordingly, we have decided that the applicant has met its burden of persuasion that the noncompliance it described above is inconsequential to motor vehicle safety. Therefore, its application is granted and the applicant is exempted from providing the notification of the noncompliance that is required by 49 U.S.C. 30118 and from remediating the noncompliance as required by 49 U.S.C. 30120.
