Our Nation and this city has lost an outstanding leader, Washingtonian, and friend, one with demonstrated intellect and compassion. I am proud to give these remarks today about a truly outstanding woman and African American.

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, it is with sadness that I address the House today to bring to my colleagues' attention the tragic death of Carmen E. Turner, Under Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution and former general manager of the Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Authority. Mrs. Turner, who was 61 years old, passed away today at Washington Hospital Center after a battle with cancer.

I had the privilege of working with Carmen Turner while she was at Metro and also most recently in her new position at the Smithsonian. She was a dedicated public servant and a truly wonderful person. Under her guidance and indomitable spirit, Washington's Metro System came of age, so to speak. It was under her leadership that Metro expanded by 40 percent to serve a wider area of the Nation's Capital region. It was also Carmen Turner's persuasive professionalism which convinced the Congress to fund the completion of the full 103-mile metro system. It was nearly impossible to say no to Carmen Turner.

After her distinguished career at the helm at Metro, she moved in late 1990 to the Smithsonian, where she was the chief operating officer and to where she brought that same successful leadership style that had served her so well in the transit industry.

The Nation and the Washington metropolitan region have lost a true leader and friend. I offer our sympathy to her husband and family.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to share the following news release from the Smithsonian about the death of Mrs. Turner:

CARMEN E. TURNER, SMITHSONIAN UNDER SECRETARY, DIES

Carmen E. Turner, under secretary of the Smithsonian since mid-December 1990, died today (April 9) of cancer. She was 61 years old. Mrs. Turner died in Washington Hospital Center.

As under secretary of the Smithsonian, Turner was the Chief Operating Officer and second ranking official at the Smithsonian and was responsible for the day-to-day operations of the world's largest museum and research complex. The Smithsonian operate 15 museums and galleries, the National Zoological Park and research facilities in eight states and the Republic of Panama. Its total net budget in fiscal year 1992 is $429.2 million, including federal and trust funds. The institution has approximately 6,500 employees.

"We have lost a wise, compassionate, wonderfully dedicated and far-seeing leader, friend and colleague," Robert McC. Adams, Secretary of the Smithsonian said. "In the all-too-brief period of service to the Smithsonian that was allowed to her, she humanized and transformed our ideas of management itself. It is given to very, very few among us to make the permanent improvements she did in diverse institutions whose purpose is to serve and reach out to people. Her spirit and example will live on in our work."

Mrs. Turner had previously served as general manager of the Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Authority, chief executive officer of Metro, the second largest rail-transit and forth largest bus-transit system in the United States, since July 1983. In that capacity, she developed and managed a $615 million annual operating budget and a $100 million annual capital budget for an organization with approximately 9,000 employees.

Under her leadership, the Metrorail system grew from 42.37 miles and 47 stations to 73 miles and 63 stations, expanding by 40 percent. In the fall of 1990, Mrs. Turner secured a firm commitment from Congress to fund the completion of the full 103-mile Metrorail system.

Turner, a native of New Jersey, grew up in Washington, D.C. She received a bachelor's degree in government from Howard University in 1968 and a master's degree in public administration from the American University in 1972. She joined Metro in 1977 as assistant general manager for administration.

Prior to joining Metro, she worked from 1970 to 1977 in the U.S. Department of Transportation in civil rights and equal employment opportunity programs in a variety of positions, including acting director for civil rights (1976 to 1977).

Turner had received many honors and awards for her work at Metro and her service to the community, including an honorary doctor of humane letters from the University of the District of Columbia (1990) and from Southeastern University (1987). She received an honorary doctor of laws degree from Youngstown State University in 1986.

In October 1988, the American Public Transit Association chose WMATA to receive its Public Transit Agency Outstanding Achievement Award, given annually to the top transit agency in North America. This was followed in 1989 with APTA presenting Mrs. Turner with the Jesse L. Haugh award, given annually to the transit manager of the year "who has done the most to advance the urban transit industry in the United States and Canada."

She was named Washingtonian of the Year by Washingtonian magazine in 1987, Distinguished Citizen of the Region by the Greater Washington Research Center (1986), Distinguished Black Woman of the Year by the Black Women in Sisterhood Action (1986) and Woman of the Year by the YWCA National Capital Region (1985).

She received alumni recognition awards from American University in 1986 and from Howard University in 1984.

A dedicated volunteer, Mrs. Turner was a past and present member of many community groups. She has been serving as a member of the boards of trustees of Howard University, George Washington University and WETA-TV. In 1988, she was appointed co-chair of the D.C. Committee on Public Education, a committee established by the Federal City Council to conduct an independent assessment of the public schools in the District of Columbia and to develop a long-range plan to improve them. The plan was presented in June 1989. Mrs. Turner was also the cofounder of the Conference of Minority Transit Officials.

Mrs. Turner was a resident of Washington, D.C. She is survived by her husband, Frederick Turner Jr.; two grown sons—Frederick B. Turner III, of Canoga Park, Calif.; and Douglas P. Turner of Washington, D.C.—two granddaughters, Morgan and Lindsey; her mother, Carmen Pawley, and a Sister, Dolores Dickerson, both the Silver Spring Md.

A viewing will be held at McGuire Funeral Home, 7400 Georgia Ave., Washington, D.C., at 6 p.m., Sunday April 12. A memorial service will be held Monday, April 13, at 11 a.m., in Washington National Cathedral. Plans for a memorial service at the Smithsonian Institution will be announced.

Ms. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to commemorate the life of Carmen E. Turner, Under Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, who died this morning after a life of service to the District of Columbia, the metropolitan region, and our country. Carmen was a great and unforgettable friend, a uniquely accomplished professional, and an instinctive public servant.

Carmen Turner's work as general manager at the Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Authority is admired by many Members of Congress and millions of tourists. She had a special way with Congress, which respected her skill so much that she won funds for an unprecedented expansion of the system and a commitment to complete it. Carmen left the WMATA the second largest rail and fourth largest bus transit system in the country. Carmen Turner's Metro was honored as the Nation's best transit agency, and she was named the transit manager "who has done the most to advance the urban transit industry in the United States."

Carmen Turner's excellence as an administrator led another great institution to call her to service, and after 7 years of excellence at Metro, Carmen brought her skills to the Smithsonian as its second highest officer.

Carmen gave the words "role model" new meaning. A graduate of Dunbar High School and Howard University, she nevertheless started as a typist in the Federal Government. But as discrimination diminished, she progressed in the federal system until she left to join Metro. There, she quickly rose from an assistant general manager to run the agency.

"Washingtonian of the Year," "Distinguished Citizen of the Region," "Woman of the Year," "Distinguished Black Woman of the Year,"—there was no honor Carmen Turner did not get or deserve.

To know Carmen, however, was to admire her for far more than her consummate professional skill and her breakthroughs to new heights for women and people of color. Carmen was all human, all compassion, all heart—and all business. Carmen, the rarest of combinations, put it all together and gave it her all. She was so radiant that her light still shines across this city and this region. I have lost a wonderful friend. Washington has lost that and much more.

Mr. McMILLEN of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, today, is a sad day for the Washington community as it loses one of its finest citizens. Carmen Turner served this community with remarkable competency and personal character. Her rise through the ranks from a GS-2 clerk-typist to general manager of the Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Authority until her final accomplishment as chief operating officer of the Smithsonian has been marked by charm, character, and conviction.

I am pleased and grateful that I had the opportunity to work with Carmen Turner when she was the director of Metro. Her far-reaching leadership and dedicated management style kept Metro growing while also effectively addressing the day-to-day challenges of Washington's intricate mass transit system. Much of the national acclaim given to Metro is a direct result of the talents of Carmen Turner.

Carmen Turner was a leader with a strong, unflappable, and responsive manner that won her admiration and respect from anyone who came in contact with her. The Washington community will miss this very fine person. I pass my condolences onto her family and wish them well in these difficult times. I hope that the sadness they feel today can be tempered in some way by the community's outpouring of respect and affection for Carmen Turner.

Once again, my condolences to her family, Carmen Turner will be truly missed.

SAM WALTON, AN AMERICAN ORIGINAL

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. Mr. Speaker, this past Sunday our Nation lost one of its truly great citizens—Samuel Moore Walton, better known to those of us in northwest Arkansas as Mr. Sam.

As the founder of Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., Sam Walton revolutionized the retail market in this country. Starting with a single store in 1962 at the age of 44, he went on to build an empire that currently encompasses over 2,000 stores and subsidiaries. He accomplished this feat building upon a very basic principle—provide the customer with a quality product at the lowest price in a friendly and helpful environment.

I was privileged to know Sam for over 30 years. In fact, the Waltons opened their second Wal-Mart store across the street from my family's lumber company in 1964. Yet, despite his great success, he never lost his down-to-earth commonsense approach to life or his ability to talk to all kinds of people.

Sam Walton was more than just a marketing genius—he was an individual who lived his life in a selfless manner, always looking for ways in which he could better the lives of his fellow man. He was a man who loved his family and loved his employees or "associates" as he liked to call them.

Last month, I was honored to travel with the President and Senator PRYOR to Arkansas where the President presented Sam with our Nation's highest civilian award, the Medal of Freedom. In presenting this honor to him, the President outlined his success in business and in life. In accepting the award, and I might add in typical Sam Walton fashion, he immediately shared the credit saying "this is a labor of a partnership, a labor of folks who have pulled together and have enjoyed what they have done and have become partners in what we have accomplished."

As the President said this past Sunday, Sam Walton was an American original who embodied the entrepreneurial spirit and epitomized the American dream. His commitment to family and selfless giving to others is an example to us all.

Sam Walton touched the lives of thousands of people and families, both collectively and individually. The world is a better place for many because of his life and faith.

My family and I extend our heartfelt condolences to the entire Walton family. Mr. Sam will be sorely missed.

Mr. Speaker, I know my colleagues would be interested in the following articles, which chronicle the amazing, wonderful, and productive life of Samuel Moore Walton.

[From the Arkansas Democrat Gazette, Apr. 7, 1992]

SAM WALTON

The Democrat-Gazette joins Arkansans and Americans everywhere today in taking sad and solemn pause in remembrance of populist hero Sam Walton, 74, the unpretentious founder of Wal-Mart.

He may have been the most successful businessman of this century, but his vast wealth never diminished his need to remain a friend among hometown neighbors and to be one of them. The sight of Sam Walton wearing his Wal-Mart cap and driving his pickup truck around Bentonville will be sorely missed.

Sam Walton lost his courageous fight against complications of bone cancer Sunday morning, barely two weeks after President Bush had bestowed upon him the nation's highest civilian award—the Medal of Freedom.

"Mr. Sam," as he was fondly known to his 380,000-member Wal-Mart family, truly was one of the thousand points of light the president mentions often—an institution, not only to them and his beloved family, but to most other Americans as well.

As President Bush said in presenting the medal, Sam Walton epitomized what's good about America. And we'll add, certainly good for Arkansas. As everyone knows, Mr. Sam made things good for Arkansas in more ways than can be counted. In describing Sam Walton, adjectives such as "genuine," "selfless," "generous" somehow seem as inadequate as trying to list his philanthropic gifts, which are so well-known among educational institutions, Arkansas Children's Hospital and members of his religious denomination.

What irony there was in Mr. Sam's rise to the pinnacle of the retailing world, having begun as a J.C. Penney Co., trainee in 1940, only to later surpass that national chain's retail sales with his own retailing enterprise.

Walton first founded a small group of Ben Franklin five-and-dime stores before establishing his first Wal-Mart discount store in 1962 at the age of 44. The chain's meteoric rise from that single store is now history, having resulted in today's 2,000 stores and subsidiaries, which last year topped Sears, its last remaining obstacle, by posting sales totaling $43.9 billion.

Though the amassing of such a vast fortune was phenomenal, Sam Walton was about much more than wealth, as President Bush observed during his visit to Wal-Mart headquarters. Walton's hard work, his vision, the risks he took to help his company grow bigger and stronger, his "Buy American" campaign, his ability to listen to and bring out the best in people are the things most fondly remembered.

Typically, "Mr. Sam's" response was to give his employees the credit. "This is a labor of folks who have pulled together and enjoyed what they've done, and become partners," he said. "They deserve all the credit. I've helped . . . and the greatest thing is that we've gotten ideas from all 380,000 people in this company . . . that's the secret."

Only his family meant more to him than his associates, said Wal-Mart President and Chief Executive Officer David D. Glass. "Literally, his second home was a Wal-Mart store somewhere in America." And he often said that he was always comfortable there, surrounded by associates and customers.

It's hard to think of any Arkansan who accomplished more in his lifetime, or had more of an impact on not only Arkansas but small town America, than Sam Walton.

Considering that Walton did not open his first discount store until age 44, perhaps his greatest legacy will be as an inspiration to thousands of future entrepreneurs. They couldn't have a better role model.

Arkansas and America have lost a great man, one who will be missed but always remembered and revered.

[From the Northwest Arkansas Times, Monday, Apr. 6, 1992]

WALTON TOUCHED US ALL

It is a rare man whose death can be said to be a loss to the entire nation. But the life of Sam Moore Walton has ended with just that kind of outpouring, and Northwest Arkansas mourns with the rest of the country. We genuinely grieve for this man who meant so much to us all, and whether or not we knew him personally, it always seemed that he knew us.

Walton, 74, died Sunday in Little Rock after a long, harrowing battle with cancer. Much as it hurt, everyone realized Walton would probably lose this round with the disease, so in recent weeks, those who knew him have simply waited and watched as one of America's premier businessmen and an inspiration to so many did battle, and reflect on the contributions he has made to our way of life.

Walton was and is an icon. How many people can take their small business to the grand heights Walton did with his? How many can lay claim to the fact that they, without the usual flash and hype, was such an innovator and yet never lost his common touch with the people who helped make him what he was?

Sam Walton's gift was that despite his tireless work and salesmanship, he made it look easy. He reminded us that the American dream is still attainable, and proved it.

With his cheerleading leadership style and patriotic dedication to American commerce, Walton put on all the trappings of the dedicated salesman that he was, but he was also a moralist, and never put himself at the center of his success. The credit, he always said, went to someone else.

Even when he was ranked as America's richest man in an era when the U.S. economy was beginning to dwindle a few years ago, Walton maintained his modesty about his achievement, and always kept in touch with the people he felt closest to.

Walton himself was a regular fixture around downtown Bentonville, and his pickup truck was a familiar sight anywhere he went. He always believed that those who profited should give something back to their communities, and he lived by this philosophy. We needn't travel far to see the many contributions he made to our area, or the many tributes paid to him in return.

Walton, it has been said, created an entire American culture around his business, and made our state the envy of the nation.

There was much to learn from this man, and we hope our country has taken the opportunity to do so. It would be impossible to duplicate what Sam Walton did, since there will never be another like him, but at least we had the chance to see such a man in action, and to have gained something from his wisdom.

[From the Washington Post, Apr. 7, 1992]

SAM WALTON

Sam Walton was as direct and unglamorous as his business, which consisted mostly of finding out what people wanted and selling it to them at the lowest possible price. Although he was, by the mid-'80s, considered the world's richest man, chances are that if you lived in the urban Northeast you didn't know much about him or his principal works: the hundreds of discount department stores that have helped transform much of small-town America. In fact, he did little to draw attention to himself, unless driving an old pickup truck and continuing to lead a simple Arkansas existence could be considered an oblique bid for notoriety.

Mr. Sam—as he liked to be called by his employees, whom he liked in turn to call “associates”—had the idea some 30 years ago that there was big business to be done in small towns, much bigger than was being done in the 15 Ben Franklin five-and-dime franchises he and his brother had acquired since starting with a single store in Arkansas in 1945. He set out on his own in 1962 to build a chain. By the time of his death this week at 74, there were more than 1,700 Wal-Marts, mostly in the South and Midwest, with annual sales well over $40 billion.

The pattern with Wal-Mart has been to scout out promising towns and open a store nearby that combines under one vast roof much of the merchandise available in an old-fashioned town center, from drugs to clothes to bicycles. Understandably enough, Mr. Walton has been criticized as a despoiler of downtowns because of the many small merchants driven out of business by his relentless cost-cutting and low prices. But he was hardly the first to realize that Main Streets were being replaced by parking lots, and there is no denying that the demand was there for what Wal-Marts offered: low prices, convenience and helpful clerks.

He drove himself hard until near the end of his life, generally getting to work at 4:30 a.m. and going at high speed all day long. He was also a hard driver of others. The “associates” have never received high salaries, but they are encouraged to take advantage of company stock plans, which have been lucrative for many of them and no doubt encourage a greater attention to making the stores work. Mr. Walton seems to have conducted a lifelong war against complacency, within both his company and himself. Perhaps he disdained the trappings of wealth out of a fear that he would lose his feel for what it takes to meet the simpler needs of ordinary people. No one had better cause to know how demanding a business that can be.

[From the Associated Press]

AFTER REACHING FIRST GOAL, WALTON DIDN'T LIMIT HIMSELF ON FIVE-YEAR PLANS

BENTONVILLE, AR.—A longtime friend of Sam Walton said the founder of what became the nation's largest retailer hoped in the early years eventually to have 25 to 50 stores.

When the 74-year-old billionaire died Sunday, 1,735 Wal-Mart stores and 212 Sam's Club stores were in operation.

A.L. Miles of Bentonville worked for Walton for 23 years, retiring in 1991 as executive vice president for special projects.

“He was my hero almost my idol if God would let us have one on Earth,” Miles said in a copyright story Sunday in a special issue of the Benton County Daily Record. “It is kind of a cliché to say it this way, but right now Mr. Sam is organizing folks in heaven to get together to see what they can do for the folks down here on Earth.”

Miles said that in the early days 25-50 stores seemed an impossible goal.

“Once we achieved it, he would continue to write out his five-year plan on a legal pad, but he never again put a figure to the number of stores he wanted,” Miles said. “He would talk about osmosis of the stores taking this good store and spreading it across the world, not the United States but the world. And that will happen, spreading across the world, because of his partners.”

Another longtime friend remembers the day the name Wal-Mart came into being.

The Wal-Mart name was coined one day while flying over Mount Gaylor on the way to Fort Smith, Bob Bogle explained.

“He (Walton) jerked a card out of his pocket while he was tootling along,” said Bogle, who worked for Walton from 1955 until 1982. “He scribbled three or four names and said that he had to name the store he was putting in Rogers.”

“He couldn't call it a Ben Franklin because another man had the franchise in Rogers.”

“He had three or four words in each name and asked me to pick. I look at them and, knowing how much signs cost, knew to keep it simple. I scribbled Walmart the squiggly (hyphen) didn't come along until later.”

“He looked at it, said, ‘Huh,’ and stuck it in his pocket. I didn't hear anything and a few days later was checking out the building and I saw the sign painter climbing up a ladder. I looked have to be Vanna White to figure out the name. Now I see it in hundreds of places.”

Charlie Cate of Rogers, who started working for Walton as a stock boy in 1954 and worked in management when he retired in 1981, said Walton was a father figure.

“I've lost a good friend and a legend,” Cate said. “Sam Walton is like a daddy, and he was certainly the fairest man I've ever met. He was the most honest man I ever saw in the retail business.”

Cate said he's the only person who ever saw Walton crash an airplane.

“It happened in 1958 in Kansas City,” Cate said, noting that Walton had visited a store in Kansas City and Cate was taking him back to the airport. “There was 18 inches of snow on the ground and I was worried he wouldn't make it, so I stayed to watch. A crosswind caught him and he nosed over and totaled that plane. We always laughed about it that I'm the only one who ever saw him crash.”

Bogle said Walton often took his dogs with him on hunting trips.

“Old Roy (after which the company's dog food was named) would go in the airplane everywhere,” Bogle said. “That dog attended a lot of Wal-Mart meetings.” He laughed. “And as recently as two or three years ago, he flew home from (a hunting camp in) south Texas with Helen and eight dogs. There were four in cages, and four loose in the plane. It takes quite a devoted wife to go on a ride like that.”

BILLIONAIRE SAM WALTON, 74, DIES

(By Andrea Harter)

Sam Walton, who piloted Wal-Mart Stores Inc. to heights never before reached in the world of retailing, died Sunday from complications related to cancer.

Walton, 74, who had been at University Hospital in Little Rock since March 26, died at 8 a.m. Sunday.

The family has requested a private funeral service. Walton will be buried Tuesday in Bentonville.

No public memorial service has been announced.

Wal-Mart President and Chief Executive Officer David D. Glass notified the 380,000 employees of Walton's death over the Wal-Mart radio network which links more than 2,000 Wal-Mart related stores and subsidiaries by satellite.

Flags at the general offices in Bentonville and Wal-Mart stores across the nations were lowered to half-staff.

“I speak for Wal-Mart associates across the nation when I say we have lost more than our chairman and founder...we have lost a friend. For many of us, a mentor,” Glass said in a prepared statement.

“Only his family meant more to Sam Walton than his beloved associates. Literally, his second home was a Wal-Mart store somewhere in America,” Glass said.

“Sam said many times he was always comfortable there, surrounded by associates and customers,” he added.

“We miss him deeply,” Glass said. “But what he taught us, instilled in us; to respect the value of each individual, that the customer is always right, and the love for God and country, will live on forever.”

The family asked that memorials be made to the Arkansas Cancer Research Center or the First Presbyterian Church Endowment Fund for Missions. Accounts have been established at the Bank of Bentonville.

Walton's son, S. Robson Walton, issued a statement saying the family would not sell any of its stock. The Waltons own an estimated 38 percent of the outstanding shares, valued at between $20 billion and $23 billion.

The company said no management changes are planned.

In 1982, Sam Walton was diagnosed with hairy cell leukemia, but interferon treatments helped him send the disease into remission.

In 1989, Walton was diagnosed with multiple myeloma, or bone marrow cancer. In his second bout with cancer, he underwent extensive chemotherapy, radiation treatments and took experimental medicine.

Walton's last public appearance was in front of his employees, or “associates” as he called them, when the retailer accepted the Medal of Freedom from President Bush on March 17 at corporate headquarters in Bentonville.

Using a wheelchair and struggling for strength to speak, Walton called Bush's visit the “highlight of our career, my career and of our entire company. It is a memorable day for Bentonville, and we will always remember it.”

Walton had been hospitalized several times in Houston and Arkansas since January.

He is survived by his wife, Helen; a brother, J.L. “Bud” Walton of Bentonville; three sons, S. Robson Walton and James Walton of Bentonville, and John Walton of National City, Calif.; a daughter, Alice Walton of Lowell, and 10 grandchildren.

At news of his death, many employees at central Arkansas Wal-Mart stores on Sunday donned black ribbons on their work clothes and displayed photographs of Walton at their stores.

Samuel Moore Walton was known as “Mr. Sam” to employees and customers alike. He defied conventional retailing wisdom in the 1960s when he put discount stores in small towns, which other retailers had ignored while looking for larger markets.

What resulted is a retailing empire stretching across 43 states in 1,735 Wal-Mart stores and 212 Sam's Club wholesale warehouse stores. Wal-Mart has more than 400,000 employees.

At Walton's death, Wal-Mart had more than $43.8 billion in annual sales and was the nation's largest retail chain, surpassing Kmart and Sears Roebuck & Co.

His success made him one of the wealthiest people in America. In recent years, he spread his wealth among family members.

From Wal-Mart's headquarters in Bentonville, Walton built his retailing empire with a blend of sharp business sense, boundless energy and a common touch that set him apart as a business leader.

"He was a man who never wanted the store lights to go out," Gary Reinboth, a retired Wal-Mart Stores Inc. regional vice president, said. Reinboth was handpicked by Walton in 1964 to nurture the then-infant concept of nationwide discount stores.

IN THE BEGINNING

Sam and Bud Walton operated a chain of 15 Ben Franklin Stores when in 1962 they opened the first Wal-Mart Discount City store in Rogers.

Walton, who cut his retailing teeth as a trainee at a J.C. Penney store in Des Moines, Iowa, and became a successful Ben Franklin franchisee, began Wal-Mart as an experiment.

Working with their Ben Franklin stores, Walton and his brother learned that they could operate large stores in small towns.

In a 1987 interview for the 25th anniversary of Wal-Mart World, a company publication, Walton said they were doing an inordinate amount of business in a 15,000-square-foot store. The volume was out of character for a town of 2,000 people, he said.

The Waltons approached Ben Franklin executives with an idea of putting large stores in rural centers that would sell a high volume of goods at very low margins. Company officials, who scoffed at them, couldn't see any value in it, Sam Walton recalled.

DISAPPOINTMENT

Disappointed with the lack of enthusiasm at Ben Franklin, the Waltons decided to go out on their own. Their 16,000-square-foot Rogers store was stocked with anything Sam Walton could buy at discounted wholesale prices. It did $975,000 in sales the first year.

In a 1979 interview, Sam Walton said he did not decide he was going to have a string of discount department stores in small towns. He added that early on he did not set a sales goal.

Rather, he said, he started out with one store, and it did well. It was then a challenge to see if he could do well with a few more. When he did well with them, he opened a few more, he said.

It was two years before the second Wal-Mart was opened in Harrison, but the pace picked up as the chain opened store after store.

The company targeted rural towns, creating epicenters of commerce that reshaped Main Street America in the South.

With Walton's increasing buying power and knowledge of exactly what was needed for a healthy profit margin, Wal-Mart was able to undercut most Main Street merchants' prices. Many of those merchants became bitter critics of the Wal-Mart phenomenon.

MOVING UP

In calendar 1970, the company had 38 stores and $44 million in sales. Moving rapidly, the company in calendar 1980 climbed to 246 stores and $1.248 billion in sales. By fiscal 1985, it had 745 stores and $6.4 billion in sales, and in fiscal 1990, 1,402 stores and $25.8 billion in sales.

At the company's 1991 annual meeting in Fayetteville, Walton said the company would likely have $100 billion in sales by the end of the decade. The company has a goal of $54 billion in sales for the current fiscal year.

Underwritten by Stephens Inc. of Little Rock and White, Weld & Co., New York, Wal-Mart had its first stock offering in 1970.

The stock has split nine times in 22 years, each in a 2-for-1 transaction.

In recent years, Walton set up a management team that is expected to keep the company strong and on the path he cleared long before he died.

Walton's first-born, Rob Walton, is vice chairman of the company. Bud Walton, Sam Walton's younger brother, is a senior vice-president and director.

A charismatic man—known to wear moderately priced suits, casual shoes and an ever-present Wal-Mart baseball cap—Sam Walton said there was no genius involved in his success. It was more a matter of circumstance and luck, he said.

But many observers noted that he combined luck with great retailing talent and a solid corporate culture that transformed small-town America and mass merchandising.

Discounting was a tolerated stepchild to mainstream retailing when Sam Walton started his chain. By the 1980s, however, he and his Wal-Mart team had put together stores that drew customers in furs and high heels, as well as those in sneakers and sweat shirts.

"Wal-Mart has certainly written the most significant chapter in retailing history, and they've done it in an extremely quick fashion," said Don Spindel, an analyst with A.G. Edwards & Sons in St. Louis. "Their meteoric rise to the top has not been paralleled."

Despite its success, Wal-Mart has had its share of difficulties.

For example, Wal-Mart was underfinanced to the point of panic at times during the early years. One of its saviors was James H. Jones, a former New Orleans banker who is now on the Wal-Mart board of directors, according to author Vance Trimble in his unauthorized biography of Sam Walton.

To see how Walton built his company requires a look at his origins.

Sam Walton was born in Kingfisher, Okla., the son of Nancy and Thomas Walton. His mother died in 1950 of cancer at age 52. His father died at age 92.

OVERACHIEVING NATURE

Sam Walton's overachieving nature was visible at an early age.

Thomas Walton was quoted by Trimble as saying that his main goal as a father was "teaching the boys to work, work and work."

The Waltons moved from Oklahoma to Columbia, Mo., while Sam Walton was still young.

He was voted "Most Versatile Boy" by his Missouri high school classmates.

His leadership ability was seen as early as 1936 when, in spite of the nickname "Stumbling Sam," he quarterbacked his high school football team to an unbeaten, untied season.

After high school, he stayed in Columbia, where he attended the university of Missouri and earned a degree in economics in 1940.

He was labeled a "tough scrapper" and "Hustler Walton" by his University of Missouri fraternity brothers.

His plan had been to go into insurance, but during college he became interested in retail. Upon graduation, he joined J.C. Penney Co. Inc. as a trainee.

Walton's career at Penney's ended when he joined the Army, where he served as a captain in the Army Intelligence Corps. He married Helen Robson on Feb. 14, 1943, in Claremore, Okla.

Walton took up retailing again when he left the service in 1945, buying the Ben Franklin franchise in Newport, Ark. By 1947, he had opened a second store in Newport called the Eagle store.

"When Sam came to Newport, he wanted to learn from everybody," said Tom Jefferson, district manager of a Sterling Variety Store across the street from the Walton-franchised Ben Franklin store.

"He believed in people and those who worked for him. Well, he wanted them to have everything he had—drive and success," Jefferson said.

Jefferson joined Wal-Mart in 1972 and worked for the company for 15 years, most of the time as a Walton confidant and executive vice president of store operations.

TURNING POINT

Sam Walton reached a turning point in 1950 when he lost the lease on the Ben Franklin store in Newport. Details of the event are told by Trimble in his book.

Walton achieved success in Newport from 1945-50 with a $25,000 initial investment from his father-in-law. The growth of his business eventually caused its demise.

Walton was in competition with P.K. Holmes, a businessman who owned a department store and the building for Walton's Ben Franklin store. When Walton's lease was up for renewal, Holmes refused to negotiate an additional term.

Before leaving Newport in 1950, Walton rented a building next to the Sterling store, another of his competitors, to block its expansion. He then turned to Siloam Springs.

A Siloam Springs shopowner wanted $5,000 more for his shop than Walton was willing to pay, so Walton headed north to Bentonville, where he found an aging merchandiser looking to sell his town-square business.

Walton bought a Bentonville store for $15,000 and opened a Walton's five-and-ten-cent store.

The building still stands today, and in May 1990 was reopened by Wal-Mart as a visitors center with displays and information on the history of the company.

Walton moved his wife and four children into a rented house and nailed an orange crate to the wall at the Bentonville store for use as a bookshelf. With two sawhorses and a sheet of plywood, he fashioned a desk.

It was in Bentonville that the idea for a national chain of discount stores began to take shape, corporate historians say.

Wal-Mart directly employs more than 3,000 in its general offices in Bentonville, and in four distribution warehouses and support industries.

BIG ACCOMPLISHMENT

On May 11, 1950, the Benton County Democrat (later purchased by Walton and renamed the Benton County Daily Record), hailed the arrival of the new retailer, saying, "it is a big accomplishment to have people such as the Waltons come here to live. This is a fine family, and their progressive plans mean much to the business life of this city."

With a twist of fate and timely financial backing, Walton could have made Little Rock his home, and mall developing his life's focus.

Early in his career, he tried to develop Arkansas' first shopping mall in Little Rock, where Park Plaza now stands. He failed for lack of capital.

W.R. "Witt" Stephens, founder of Little Rock's Stephens Inc. and another Arkansas business legend, bought out Walton and developed the project.

Walton has received numerous prestigious retailing and business awards since 1978.

In 1984, he received the Horatio Alger Award from the Horatio Alger Association of Distinguished Americans, based in Alexandria, Va.

The annual award is presented to individuals whose initiative and efforts led to significant career success.

A compulsive worker, Walton carried his work with him into quail-hunting fields and onto tennis courts, sites of his two main non-Wal-Mart hobbies, said Ron Loveless, a retired Wal-Mart executive who had known Walton most of his life.

"He was 100 percent business 100 percent of the time," Loveless said.

Loveless' mother was the Walton housekeeper, and Ron Loveless was privy to an inside glimpse of the man who is credited with rewriting the standards for retail sales and customer service, now known as the Wal-Mart way."

"It wasn't hard to know his routine. In the early days he was at work about 4 a.m., checked the mail and paperwork until about 7 a.m., then he hit the stores," Loveless said.

When the Sam's Club wholesale concept emerged in 1983, "it was an exciting time for the company," Loveless said.

Walton made no secret of scoping out the competition for good retailing ideas.

The Sam's Club idea came from the California-based Price Club chain.

"People often asked, 'Was he just ambitious, or was he power hungry? . . . I say no. He just wanted to be the best at everything,'" Loveless said. "I've seen entire company policy change in one day over one constructive comment submitted by a stockman."

IMMENSE IMPACT

Walton had an immense impact on Arkansas, especially the northwestern corner of the state.

"Every man, woman and child who understands how the economy works should thank Sam Walton for our prosperity in Northwest Arkansas," said George Westmoreland, a first vice president for Merrill, Lynch, Pierce Fenner & Smith.

Walton served on the Bentonville City Council and was president of the Bentonville Chamber of Commerce.

His family, which gave $5 million to the University of Arkansas at Fayetteville for construction of a performing arts center, also gives generously to other schools.

Loveless, who declined a college education promised by Walton, decided to enter the Wal-Mart chain as a pet department worker.

"It got into you blood. You just wanted to be like him," Loveless said. Loveless retired five years ago as head of the Sam's Club division.

Walton retired for a short time in 1974, but after a 20-month leave returned to the company, saying he couldn't keep "my hands out of it."

While Wal-Mart was making money in the late 1970s and early 1980s, organizers unsuccessfully tried to unionize company employees.

UNION TALK

In response to union talk, Walton devised a profit-sharing plan that has made several Northwest Arkansas residents millionaires, or at the very least, handsomely wealthy.

Still, the retail company has drawn criticism over the years for employing many part-time workers not privy to health-care insurance benefits.

More recently, manufacturers' sales representatives have begun a national campaign to try to change Wal-Mart's relatively new policy of dealing only with most vendors' top officials, bypassing the sales representatives.

Walton's retailing success in Oklahoma, Missouri, Kansas and Arkansas drew him into other ventures.

Walton entered banking in 1961 when he bought, with a loan co-signed with his wife, Helen, the Bank of Bentonville for $350,000.

The Bank of Bentonville is now the flagship bank for the Walton bank holding company, Arvest Bank Group, which has 10 banks stretching from Fayetteville to Bella Vista.

Arvest also has a half interest in a Norman, Okla., bank and in August 1991 bought State Bank N.A. in Tulsa in an attempt to gain a large business stake in the oil town's economy.

ARVEST BANK GROUP

Arvest Bank Group has assets in excess of $1 billion, with the Bank of Bentonville holding about $300 million in assets.

Walton, in 1987 introduced Hypermart, based in Garland, Texas. Hypermart is a gigantic Wal-Mart Discount City store that includes a full-scale grocery.

In the late 1980s and early 1990s, Walton downsized the Hypermart concept into the newest, fastest-growing segment of the company—Supercenters.

There will be six Supercenters in Arkansas by the end of 1992, with Bentonville's showcase store scheduled to open in May.

In 1991, the company expanded into Mexico, opening a Sam's Club version of its store through a partnership with Cifra S.A., Mexico's largest retailer. Also, Wal-Mart is nearing completion of its first non-mainland store in Puerto Rico.

In February, Walton announced that he had signed a deal with Doubleday, a New York publishing house, to write his autobiography with the help of John Huey, senior editor of Fortune magazine.

Walton reportedly received an advance of $4 million for the rights to his story, which company officials said would be donated to charity.

As for the formula behind Walton's achievements, "There was only one secret for Wal-Mart success, and it wasn't a secret. People just couldn't believe it was so simple," retired Wal-Mart executive Gary Reinboth said. "It was the customer."

"Many times we could have changed our liberal (merchandise) return policy and saved some money," Reinboth said.

"But it didn't pay dividends to take care of a customer by turning him away," he said. "That point was always driven home by Sam. His mind was always working."

Searching and scraping for ideas, Walton was never at a loss for words when rallying his employees.

In a 1982 company publication about his life-threatening illness, Walton told his employees:

"If I'm to have a health problem, I'm really fortunate to have this type of disorder," he wrote.

"I am completely confident, too, that with the right treatment, I'll be able to continue doing things I enjoy most for at least another 20 or 25 years."

"The last thing I need or want would be undue sympathy or undue conversation concerning my health."

TO COMMEMORATE THE 50TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE CORO FOUNDATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. PETERSON] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. PETERSON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased and honored to join with my colleagues here today to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the Coro Foundation for Public Affairs. As my predecessors have indicated, Coro had its beginning in 1942 in San Francisco, CA. Since then Coro has opened additional training centers in Los Angeles, New York, Kansas City, and in 1973, a center to serve the Midwest in St. Louis, MI.

The St. Louis center is, in every sense of the word, a midwestern center. Its graduates hail from a number of States surrounding Missouri, including Illinois, Texas, Oklahoma, and my home State, Minnesota. Coro Midwest makes an active effort to recruit young people from Minnesota in order to add diversity of experience and perspective to their classes of trainees.

The Coro Fellows in the St. Louis center use the entire Midwest as their training campus. For example, in 1987, the St. Louis class of fellows traveled to St. Paul, MN, to study State government there. I am proud to say that my home State was selected for study because of its fine reputation for honest politics, progressive approach to public policy, and fine quality of life enjoyed by the citizens of Minnesota.

The Coro Foundation in the last 50 years has trained thousands of people in public affairs. A number of these graduates have gone on to distinguished careers, including the Cabinet, media, the foreign service, and the non-profit sector. I am confident that our country has benefited in many unrecognized ways from the contributions of Coro graduates. I send my heartiest congratulations to the Coro Foundation on this, their 50th anniversary, and I extend my sincerest wishes for another 50 successful years.

COMMUNICATION FROM THE CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE BUDGET REGARDING CURRENT LEVEL OF SPENDING AND REVENUES FOR FISCAL YEARS 1992-96

(Mr. PANETTA asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Committee on the Budget and as chairman of the Committee on the Budget, pursuant to the procedures of the Committee on the Budget and section 311 of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, as amended, I am submitting for printing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the official letter to the Speaker advising him of the current level of revenues for fiscal years 1992 through 1996 and spending for fiscal year 1992. Spending levels for fiscal years 1993 through 1996 are not included because annual appropriations acts for those years have not been enacted.

This is the fifth report of the 102d Congress for fiscal year 1992. This report is based on the aggregate levels and committee allocations for fiscal years 1992 through 1996 as contained in House Report 102-69, the conference report to accompany House Concurrent Resolution 121.

The term "current level" refers to the estimated amount of budget authority, outlays, entitlement authority, and revenues that are available—or will be used—for the full fiscal year in question based only on enacted law.

As chairman of the Budget Committee, I intend to keep the House informed regularly on the status of the current level.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON THE BUDGET,
Washington, DC, April 8, 1992.

Hon. THOMAS S. FOLEY,
Speaker, House of Representatives,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: To facilitate enforcement under sections 302 and 311 of the Congressional Budget Act, as amended, I am herewith transmitting the status report on the current level of revenues for fiscal years 1992 through 1996 and spending estimates for fiscal year 1992, under H. Con. Res. 121, the Concurrent Resolution on the Budget for Fiscal Year 1992. Spending levels for fiscal years 1993 through 1996 are not included because annual appropriations acts for those years have not been enacted.

The enclosed tables also compare enacted legislation to each committee's 602(a) allocation of discretionary new budget authority and new entitlement authority. The 602(a) allocations to House Committees made pursuant to H. Con. Res. 121 were printed in the statement of managers accompanying the conference report on the resolution (H. Report 102-69).

Sincerely,

LEON E. PANETTA,
Chairman.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

RYDER'S TONY BURNS MEETS THE CHALLENGE OF CULTURAL DIVERSITY IN THE WORK FORCE

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to recognize Tony Burns, the chairman of Miami's Ryder System, who was recently featured in Hispanic magazine in a "CEO Roundtable on Workforce Diversity," along with executives from America's top corporations.

Reaching out to the Hispanic community is important to Ryder System, an international company which provides services to the transportation industry. Mr. Burns points out in the article that Ryder's location in Miami since 1933 has heightened its awareness of diversity, and made his company into a truly multi-ethnic community.

Mr. Burns has promoted work force diversity at Ryder through bonus programs for managers who achieve hiring goals. In order to meet these goals, Ryder recruits not only in the Miami area, but throughout the country. It also sponsors scholarships for Hispanics seeking MBA's at the University of Chicago and Wharton where Mr. Burns serves on the Board of Overseers.

Ryder also strives to create the proper atmosphere for Hispanics and other minorities to advance within the company. Mr. Burns is especially pleased with the Ryder Hispanic Council, a cross-section of Hispanics throughout the company that act as employee consultants to executive level management on issues of sensitivity.

Mr. Burns is also well known for his contributions to the south Florida community. Earlier this year, he received the Greater Miami Chamber of Commerce's 11th annual Sand in My Shoes Award which is the chamber's highest recognition of an individual community volunteer. During the last 17 years, his public service has touched dozens of organizations from the Boy Scouts to the United Way of Greater Miami.

I am happy to pay tribute to Tony Burns through this statement in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. He is one of the many community leaders who has worked tirelessly to create Miami's triethnic community. He has shown that working to promote cultural diversity is not only the right thing to do, but also is good business.

B'NAI B'RITH WOMEN OF UNION CELEBRATE 50TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. MATTHEW J. RINALDO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. RINALDO. Mr. Speaker, the B'nai B'rith Women's Chapter in Union, NJ, is celebrating its 50th anniversary, and I wish to offer my congratulations for their exceptional service to the community. Officially chartered on April 13, 1942, the chapter has been involved in a number of worthwhile ventures, ranging from its scholarship program to the Anti-Defamation League Date Book which it distributes throughout the community.

In a period when we witness all too many negative images in the media, the Union chapter's program, "Dolls for Democracy," sends a positive impression to students of the lives and accomplishments of great Americans, including Washington, Lincoln, George Washington Carver, Eleanor Roosevelt, Dr. James Salk, Golda Meir, and Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. The women of B'nai B'rith also are involved in broadening interfaith understanding and respect for religion and culture through the Your Neighborhood Celebrates Program in Union.

Wherever there is a good cause that promotes harmony, civility and tolerance, the B'nai B'rith Women's Chapter in Union is involved. It supports an annual picnic for the Sadie Sachs Day Nursery in Vauxhall, the yearly veterans party at the East Orange, NJ, VA Hospital, the Eyes for the Needy Program in Millburn, projects for the Children's Specialized Hospital in Mountainside, the elderly in nursing homes, and donations to Russian Jewish immigrants.

In seeking a kinder, gentler America, we need to go no further than in our own communities where organizations like the B'nai B'rith Women of Union have been striving to help us build a better, more harmonious society for a half century.

I salute its members and officers for their remarkable spirit of good will, and offer my congratulations to the copresidents, Shirley Trencher and Adeline Friedman, and to the other officers who have raised funds, increased the membership, and who have worked as volunteers to assure the success, reputation, and traditions of this vital national organization that has done so much to foster racial, ethnic and religious tolerance in America.

TRIBUTE TO THOMAS SARACINO

HON. DAVID E. BONIOR

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. BONIOR. Mr. Speaker, on the evening of April 10, Thomas Saracino will be honored at a special dinner at Fern Hill Country Club. I am very pleased to join the Clinton Township Goodfellows in paying tribute to a remarkable individual who has generously contributed his time and energy to our community.

While a dedicated and thorough professional for over 40 years, Thomas Saracino has been equally involved with his community. His contributions and support to the Goodfellows organization has been invaluable. Tom is directly involved with the toy packaging committee and the annual spaghetti dinner. In addition to this he is also involved with American Legion Post 570.

On all accounts, his commitment and involvement are admirable.

Mr. Speaker, through his commitment and hard work, Thomas Saracino has touched countless lives as an active, responsible citizen. On this special occasion, I ask that my colleagues join me in saluting the fine accomplishments of Thomas Saracino and extend to him our best wishes for all his future endeavors.

SALUTE TO BILL SWINK AND BILL EDWARDS

HON. ELTON GALLEGLY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. GALLEGLY. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to inform my colleagues of two outstanding citizens of my hometown of Simi Valley, CA—Bill Swink and Bill Edwards.

Bill Swink was named "Businessperson of the Year," and Bill Edwards was selected as "Citizen of the Year," by the Simi Valley Chamber of Commerce, and both deserve their honors.

Bill Swink has worked vigorously to improve Simi Valley and its business climate for many years. Besides owning three successful businesses, he has found time to devote hundreds of hours to our community.

He has supported Little League, Pop Warner, and Bobby Sox Softball teams for years and has been a Century Club member of the Boys and Girls Club for 11 years. In addition, he's a 10-year member of the Kiwanis Club, including serving as president; a 9-year member and board member of the Simi Valley Rotary Club; and active in Footprinters for over 10 years.

Bill also has been a member of the Chamber of Commerce for 30 years, where he served on the board, helped establish business seminars, the Trade Fair, and monthly mixers to help establish and expand business opportunities. He served as president in 1979 and 1980 and has always made time to help others become successful in their businesses.

Bill Edwards has been an integral part of the community for 26 years, and during that time he has become known as the Voice of Simi Valley for his work emceeding pageants, elegant affairs, fundraisers, charity events, and the Simi Valley parade.

Bill also is one of our community's biggest supporters of children, both personally and professionally. He has generously donated time to the Boy Scouts, the Boys and Girls Club, the Jaycees, the Salvation Army, the Free Clinic, and Care and Share, among organizations too numerous to mention.

As the chamber's citation stated,

His long-time dedication and commitment, his unflinching good nature, and love of Simi Valley and its people is why he was selected as Citizen of the Year for 1991.

Mr. Speaker, Bill Swink and Bill Edwards have proven themselves to be two shining points of light in the firmament of my hometown, and I ask my colleagues to join me in honoring them.

INTRODUCTION OF THE SMALL BUSINESS INCENTIVE ACT OF 1992

HON. EDWARD J. MARKEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, today, along with Congressman RINALDO, I am introducing the Small Business Incentive Act of 1992 at the request of the Securities and Exchange Commission. This legislation would amend the Securities Act of 1933 and the Investment Company Act of 1940 in an effort to promote capital formation for small businesses by reducing certain regulatory requirements.

The last several years have seen many small businesses struggle to meet the financing demands that would enable them to remain vital and competitive. Small businesses create jobs, promote innovation, and contribute to the tax base in the United States. They also invigorate the local and national economies and promote the overall competitiveness of U.S. industry. It is significant that companies employing nine or fewer workers account for 75 percent of all business enterprises in this country. Without adequate capital, those companies lack the fuel to power this important employment engine.

Recent concerns about a credit crunch have focused largely on diminished bank funding available for small companies. The reasons for such reduced loan availability are many, not least of which is the general sluggishness of the economy itself. The effects of the credit crunch in my own State have been devastating. The self-fulfilling prophecy of a depressed economy resulting in less money available to small businesses, in turn further depressing the economy, needs to be addressed and rectified.

One way to provide small businesses with increased opportunities to raise funds for operations and growth is to make it easier for such companies to tap the securities markets. This bill seeks to facilitate such a goal. One concept that is certainly worth exploring is the creation of categories of specialized investment companies, geared toward investment in small company securities, that would require less detailed regulation. The designation of certain classes of investors that require less hands-on protection also deserves careful scrutiny.

Yet, while efforts should be explored to improve access to capital for small businesses, we must at the same time remain vigilant in ensuring that consumers, taxpayers, and, in the case of the securities markets, investors, are not left in the lurch. Measures that may have the superficial appeal of, for example, reducing paperwork burdens on business may in fact have a profound negative impact on investors that rely on adequate corporate disclosures to evaluate the merits of an investment. Even such sophisticated investors as small towns and depository institutions may at times be ill-equipped to evaluate properly the risks of certain investments unless they have access to appropriate information and unless there exist rules to ensure proper disclosures.

The growth of the penny stock industry provides a case study in how illegitimate enterprises masquerading as legitimate small businesses can exploit laws intended to assist start-up companies. In fact, fraud and abuse in the penny stock industry was greatly facilitated by laws reducing regulation in the name of promoting small business. Through lack of disclosure and poor regulatory oversight, it is estimated that as much as $2 billion per year in penny stock fraud was generated. In response to those rampant abuses, Congressman RINALDO and I introduced, and the Congress enacted into law, the Penny Stock Reform Act of 1990 (Pub. L. 101-429). The lesson we have learned from this and the other financial debacles of the 1980's is that whenever regulation is proposed to be reduced or modified, we must take a close look at whether the unintended consequence of such actions might be to harm those that the laws are designed to protect.

The SEC bill we are introducing today has laudable goals and is a timely addition to the debate on how best to meet the capital needs of small businesses. Our job over the next several months will be to explore the elements of the proposal, with an eye to both the extent to which the plan is likely to stimulate investment in small businesses and whether investor protection would be diminished as a result of the proposed changes. We will also explore the larger question of whether spurring equity investment via the public securities markets is the best way to broaden access to capital for small companies.

As John J. Cullinane wrote in the Boston Globe on March 1, 1992, "making it very easy for small companies in need of capital to go public shifts the burden of viability of the securities to the buyer, severely undercutting the intent of the legislation that created the SEC in the first place. . . . Small companies desperately need 'patient' capital that banks and venture capitalists are organized to and should provide. New companies often fail for the most obvious reasons," pitfalls that good venture capitalists and hands-on loan officers can help them avoid. Our task in the upcoming months will be to examine these issues, and to look closely at the potential benefits and costs of enacting this legislation.

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION PROVIDING FOR PREPAYMENT OF SBA 503 LOANS

HON. ROD CHANDLER

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to create jobs and help small business by adjusting the Small Business Administration 503 Loan Program.

Congress established the SBA 503 Loan Program to foster job creation and to expand the tax base through the growth of small business. Approximately 3,700 small business owners borrowed under the 503 program at a time when interest rates were extremely high. As interest rates have fallen, the prepayment premiums on these loans have placed a heavy burden on these small business owners.

Under the current system, many 503 borrowers cannot pay off their loans in advance without incurring onerous prepayment premiums often in the 20 percent to 40 percent range. These premiums have presented a serious impediment to further growth and expansion of many of these borrowers' small businesses.

The SBA 503 Program has been replaced by the SBA 504 Program. Small business owners who borrowed under the 504 program do not have these large prepayment premiums. Businesses that borrowed under the 503 program are not permitted to refinance in order to take advantage of lower interest rates. Lower rates may permit expansion in some cases or survival in others. Furthermore, purchasers of a business are not allowed to assume 503 loans. Therefore, these businesses cannot be sold without the sellers sustaining severe losses.

My bill will correct this inequitable situation. It will permit prepayment of 503 loans at a set prepayment penalty rate that is consistent with commercial lending practices. It replaces the current discount/premium prepayment formula that has produced unconscionable prepayment premiums. Today, I urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring this legislation that helps small businesses and promotes economic growth and the creation of more jobs.

IS THERE A CONNECTION BETWEEN MONEY AND GOVERNMENT?

HON. DONALD J. PEASE

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. PEASE. Mr. Speaker, sometimes I despair at how we are going to solve our campaign finance problems. There are few Members—and I am not one of them—who enjoy fundraising over policymaking. But the need exists—there is no getting around it—so we do it.

Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, there is a light at the end of the tunnel. It is the Campaign Spending Limit and Election Reform Act of 1992 which we are voting on today. Granted, it is not the perfect solution to our campaign finance problems, but it is a good start. In fact, in many respects, S. 3 is similar to legislation I introduced last year.

S. 3 controls campaign costs by establishing voluntary spending limits for House and Senate candidates. The bill also limits the amount of money that candidates may accept from PAC's; and it limits the amount of money that candidates may accept in large individual contributions. If candidates agree to spending limits, they will become eligible for matching campaign funds.

My regret is that the conference committee did not choose to include a tax credit for individuals who make small campaign contributions. I have always believed this to be the best way to bring the average citizen back into the political system and to counterbalance the influence currently wielded by PAC's and large individual contributors.

I urge my colleagues to vote for the conference report on S. 3. Let's send a signal to the American public that the Congress is willing to take the first step to cutting the connection between money and Government.

KAREN VELAZQUEZ, HONORED TEACHER

HON. ILEANA ROSLEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to recognize Karen Velazquez, who has been honored by the Dade County Public School System as being one of its best educators. She was one of seven candidates to be chosen to compete for the Golden Apple Award for Dade's best teacher of 1991-92.

Ms. Velazquez teaches advanced Spanish and English to speakers of other languages and is the administrator of the Bilingual Vocational Language program at Colonial South Dade High School. She uses unusual classroom techniques and outside projects to make learning fun for students. She was recently featured in the Miami Herald for her extraordinary commitment to education. The article "She Make Her Charges Aware of Their Abilities" by Alessandra Soler reveals why she is so loved and respected. The article follows:

South Dade High School students say Karen Velazquez is more than a teacher. To them, she's an adviser, a friend and someone who makes a difference in their lives.

"She helps us out with school and our personal problems," said Veronica Lozoya, 18, a senior. "She gives us a lot of work but always spends time with those of us who don't understand."

Velazquez, who teaches advanced placement Spanish and English to speakers of other languages, uses innovative classroom techniques and outside projects to involve students in education. Those techniques helped earn her the Region VI nomination as Dade's 1991-92 Teacher of the Year.

Velazquez, 40, works with about 70 students in grades nine through 12 and serves as counselor and administrator for the Bilingual Vocational Language Program. The program allows her students to take vocational classes while still in high school.

Velazquez also runs a computer lab to help kids learn English and sponsors the Mini-Corps Club, which encourages migrant students to get involved in school activities. She supervises the Spanish Honor Society and has arranged for the group to serve South Dade's migrant farmworkers community, providing food and toys for families and children.

In the class room, she sometimes lets students take over. Students in her ESOL classes learn about democracy by electing officers to do various jobs, such as keeping tabs on absentees and their makeup assignments.

"When given authority, the kids are a lot harder on themselves than I would normally be," she said. "They also become more aware of their abilities."

Marian Link, principal at South Dade, said Velazquez makes learning fun.

"She gets her students involved and active in the classroom," she said. "She allows them to make mistakes and still feel good about themselves."

Born in Grove City, Ohio, Velazquez graduated from Ohio State University with a degree in anthropology and foreign language education. She also has a master's in foreign language education.

Her interest in anthropology led her to Mexico, where she lived for three years before returning to Ohio to start her teaching career.

"I started teaching because I wanted to share the culture and the love I had for it with the students," she said.

Velazquez started in Dade at Carol City High in 1986. She returned to Mexico for a while, came back to Miami and was assigned to South Dade, 28401 SW 167th Ave. The school has a large Mexican population, tailor-made for Velazquez.

"I teach my students the language and how to cope with the American culture," Velazquez said. "My rewards are being able to see the students function within society. And I love working with the Mexican culture. I feel right at home here."

Mr. Speaker, I commend Karen Velazquez for her outstanding dedication to teaching. Her devotion in helping immigrant students get accustomed to the culture and language of the United States is an inspiration to all teachers in Dade County and around the Nation.

MISS HARMONY MONAHAN IS ARIZONA'S "MEETING AMERICA'S CHALLENGE" CONTEST WINNER

HON. JON KYL

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. KYL. Mr. Speaker, each year the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States and its Ladies Auxiliary conduct the Voice of Democracy broadcast scriptwriting contest. This year more than 147,000 secondary school students participated in the contest, the theme of which was "Meeting America's Challenge." Miss Harmony Monahan, a sophomore at Snowflake High School in Taylor, AZ, was the winner for my home State. Miss Monahan is knowledgeable and insightful, and I would like to submit her essay to my colleagues. This young woman is certainly "ready to meet the challenge of the future."

MEETING AMERICA'S CHALLENGE

(By Harmony D. Monahan)

If you watched the news every night for one week, anyone would realize that my generation is facing more serious challenges than any generation in the history of our country ever has. Things that were unthinkable in the past are happening right before our very eyes. America has never been so advanced.

In the medical field the breakthroughs are incredible. Genetic Engineering has opened the door to things that doctor's never believed possible. The application of this breakthrough is sure to have astounding results. Lives can be saved. Diseases wiped out, and problems solved before a child is born.

In the field of Technology new discoveries are being uncovered every day. The technologic world of computers holds America together. They have helped our country maintain the position as a world leader. In the Gulf War, although it was the weapons that won the war for us, it could not have been done without the computers behind them.

It is just now that we are beginning to realize the importance of Ecology in our world. We are seeing the damages we have done to the earth. Things we could not see before. Not only are we recognizing the problems, we are taking major steps to solving them. Companies are cooperating with environmentalists on safe packaging, pollution and nuclear waste disposal. Individuals have been made aware of the importance to recycle and care for our earth.

On the world's political front my generation has witnessed radical changes in the political make-up of the world. The fall of the Berlin Wall, the Declaration of Independence by the Baltic States, and the crumbling of the Russian Empire. All of these changes will reshape the political face of the world. No one is sure of what political system is going to replace communism, but whatever it is there is one thing that is for sure. It is the challenge of my generation to make sure that America stays the strong world leader it has been from the start.

The fields I have mentioned, medicine, technology, ecology and world politics all have one thing in common. When it comes down to it, it is people, human beings, who determine how these medical breakthroughs, technological advances, ecological needs and political maneuvers effect others.

To me the greatest challenge of our generation is to rediscover the values that America is founded on and that made her the great Nation she is today. All of the fields I have talked about require ethical decision making. The advances I have discussed are going to affect thousands, even millions of people. This is why it is so important for the people making these decisions to have a strong sense of values. Honesty, integrity, and respect for human life are just a few. The teenagers of my generation will be the people making these decisions in the near future. That is why it is so important that these values are instilled in the youth of America. The number one way to ensure this is to reconstruct the family unit. The family is the cradle of these values. It is the duty of the elderly to pass on all they have learned from the past. The lessons that will aide us in the future. We, the youth, need to listen to our elders and put their warnings and advice into action. Heeding the advice of our elders, learning from the mistakes of those who have gone before us and rekindling the values that have guided this country for 200 years, is what makes my generation ready to meet the challenge of the future.

EFFORTS TO REVIVE THE SEMINOLE CULTURE

HON. ENI F.H. FALEOMAVAEGA

OF AMERICAN SAMOA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. FALEOMAVAEGA. Mr. Speaker, through Public Law 102-188 (S.J. Res. 217, H.J. Res. 342), Congress and the President designated 1992 as the Year of the American Indian. This law pays tribute to the people who first inhabited the land now known as the continental United States. Although only symbolic, this gesture is important because it shows there is sympathy in the eyes of a majority of both Houses of the Congress for those Indian issues which we as a Congress have been struggling with for over 200 years. In support of the Year of the American Indian, and as part of my on-going series of this year, I am providing for the consideration of my colleagues an article from the March 25, 1992, edition of the Seminole Indian about Louise Jones Gopher, and her efforts to revive the Seminole culture.

PEOPLE TO WATCH—LOUISE JONES GOPHER

(By Nisha Pulliam)

At times, Louise Jones Gopher feels she is fighting against a tidal wave threatening to engulf Seminole traditions. Gopher is director of cultural education for the five Seminole reservations in Florida and is working to keep their language and culture alive.

After a survey was taken of the reservation children, it was found that many of them were losing their language and knowledge of the old ways. A cultural education program was established through the Seminole Tribal Council in 1982.

Gopher was hired and is the only cultural director of the tribes have had. She was the first Seminole woman and the second Seminole to graduate from a four-year college.

Although Gopher had opportunities to work off the reservation, she chose to stay with her people.

"I grew up in Fort Pierce and on the reservation and I wanted to stay here," she said. "The cultural program put it all into perspective for me."

Gopher, Miss Seminole of 1965, was born in a traditional Seminole camp in an orange grove on Orange Avenue in Fort Pierce. She spoke no English but attended public schools with her brother and sister in Fort Pierce where they were the only Indian children.

She continued her education at Indian River Community College, the University of Florida and Florida Atlantic University, where she received her degree.

"My father was a workaholic and strong on education because he didn't have any," she said. "He didn't push us but inspired us."

Gopher works out of an office on the Brighton Reservation in Glades County where Creek is the native language. To further complicate matters, Miccosukee is spoken at the other reservations and few of the approximately 2,000 Seminoles speak both languages.

"We're having a hard time hanging onto our language here at Brighton," Gopher said. "Most of the children understand it but don't speak it. It's easier for them to speak English."

Television has had a major influence on the tribes and Gopher is working to neutralize it. She has formed nursery schools and a head start program where their native language is spoken.

She is documenting conversations with older Seminoles before their memories are lost.

Older women are now teaching the younger women basketmaking, beadwork and how to sew patchwork clothing. Gopher has brought Seminoles to the outside world at various festivals to display and sell their Seminole crafts.

She also travels to schools off the reservations to educate non-Indian children about the Seminoles.

"We get so many requests now, I have to turn many down."

Gopher feels the various programs have had an impact.

"We were so busy trying to keep up with the outside world getting TVs and VCRs in place that we were losing our culture."

But Gopher feels the existence of the cultural program has made the people aware and feels there is hope.

Personal. A widow for the past 15 years with three children.

Car. 1989 Chevrolet Lumina.

The best thing about living on the reservation. It's quiet, peaceful and safe.

The worst thing about living on the reservation. There isn't any worst thing.

My greatest asset. The ability to talk in front of people. I used to be very shy until I went away to school and had to hold my own, being the only Indian at most places.

My biggest weakness. I'm not as forceful as I should be. I'm too easygoing.

My biggest accomplishment. My kids and the good relationship we have. They are comfortable with me and me with them. My children tell all the other kids to call me when they have a problem.

My personal hero. My late brother Bert Jones, who died at 42, in a tractor accident. By that time he had become a medicine man for the Seminole tribe and was taking over the Corn Dance Festival. He had learned all the traditional medicine and did it on his own motivation.

The best part about being director of cultural affairs. Being able to go to other reservations and keep up with what's happening with other tribes around the country.

The worst part about being director of cultural affairs. It's like a losing battle trying to keep the language and culture alive.

Favorite midnight snack. Any leftovers.

Last good book I read. A Land Remembered by Patrick Smith.

Last good movie I saw. The Silence of the Lambs.

Most embarrassing moment. I took my daughter into the bathroom of a bank in Fort Pierce when she was a baby. The light was out and I forgot to pull up her diaper and she followed me out to the lobby with her diaper around her ankles.

If I couldn't be working in cultural affairs I'd be, probably, something working with the youth.

My personal philosophy. What goes around comes around.

Any other words of wisdom. I just try to mind my own business and treat other people fairly like I want to be treated. I try to listen to my kids and not take out my problems on them. When I'm not fit to be with, I shut myself in a room away from everyone.

TRIBUTE TO MARIE ABDALLA

HON. DAVID E. BONIOR

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. BONIOR. Mr. Speaker, on the evening of April 10, Marie Abdalla will be honored at a special dinner at Fern Hill Country Club. I am very pleased to join the Clinton Township Goodfellows in paying tribute to a remarkable individual who has generously contributed her time and energy to our community.

The willingness to take an active role in our community is a responsibility we all share, but few of us fulfill. Marie has unfailingly devoted herself to this task. While a dedicated and thorough professional for over 43 years, Marie has always been affiliated and involved with many community organizations. In addition to Goodfellows, she has been involved with the Clinton Township Senior Citizens Center, and Meals on Wheels.

Mr. Speaker, through her commitment and hard work, Marie Abdalla has touched countless lives as an active, responsible citizen. On this special occasion, I ask that my colleagues join me in saluting the fine accomplishments of Marie Abdalla and extend to her our best wishes for all her future endeavors.

SALUTE TO DALE MILLER

HON. ELTON GALLEGLY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. GALLEGLY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor Ventura County Fire Battalion Chief Dale Miller as he retires after 35 years of service.

Always a popular chief, Dale will be a hard act to follow as the battalion chief in Simi Valley. He also has been a strong community leader, serving in a variety of youth-related capacities and for 14 years as a member of the Simi Valley Rotary Club. It's fitting that as he retires, he is serving as the president of the local Rotarians.

Once his term of office is up, Dale and his wife, Barbara, will be pulling up stakes and moving north to Oak Hurst, CA, where he will build a home on a 40-acre lot, fish, and play golf.

Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues to join me in saluting Battalion Chief Dale Miller, and in wishing him well upon his retirement.

IN REMEMBRANCE OF DUDLEY CARTER

HON. ROD CHANDLER

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. Speaker, I am saddened to announce the passing of a world-renowned woodcarver, Dudley Carter, who died at the age of 100. Mr. Carter was a longtime resident of Redmond, WA.

A few years ago, I had the honor of presenting Mr. Carter with my first Heroes Award. The Heroes Award is given in recognition of individuals in my district who, like Mr. Carter, have unselfishly devoted their time to the community. Mr. Carter exemplified this type of individual in every way. He was an inspiration to many young artists as he provided an opportunity for them to work closely with him on many projects. In addition, he taught them the importance of hard work and striving to do your very best.

Mr. Carter, born to a pioneer family in 1891 in British Columbia, was a timber cruiser and forest engineer most of his life. He spent much of his time exploring and mapping Pacific Northwest wilderness. The chief inspiration for Mr. Carter's art was his childhood among the Haida and Kwakiutl Indians of British Columbia. The lofty totems, community houses, and war canoes of these tribes became motifs in Mr. Carter's work.

His career as an artist has been marked with numerous awards and achievements. Mr. Carter is best known for Forest Diety, a sculpture located at the entrance of Bellevue Square in Bellevue, WA, and Legend of the Moon, inside the entrance of Marymoor Park in Redmond, WA. Other works of Mr. Carter's are on display in Washington and Oregon and in other nations, including Japan and Germany.

Mr. Carter's strength, dedication, and love for his art were true gifts of an artist. He will be long remembered by his family and friends for giving so much of himself to the art community both locally and throughout the world. I am deeply appreciative for the wonderful works by Mr. Carter and the fortunate opportunity we have to be graced with his memory for many years to come.

EMPLOYMENT ASSISTANCE FOR WORKERS ON CLOSING MILITARY BASES

HON. PATRICIA SCHROEDER

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill that makes technical corrections to the Base Closure Act of 1988 and 1990, to allow for job retraining assistance at the most advantageous time. I am pleased to have my colleagues, BEN NIGHTHORSE CAMPBELL, DAVID SKAGGS, JOEL HEFLEY and LEE HAMILTON, join me in sponsoring this bill.

This bill amends the 1988 and 1990 base closure laws to allow employment assistance under the Job Training Partnership Act [JTPA] once the base closure announcement is made.

The 1990 Defense Conversion Adjustment Program (29 U.S.C. § 1662d) provides for assistance under JTPA for employees of closing military bases. Employees are eligible for this assistance if they have either been laid off or received notification of layoff. $150 million was authorized and appropriated in the Fiscal Year 1991 Defense Authorization Act for defense employee assistance.

When Congress enacted this Program in the fiscal year 1991 Defense Authorization Act, we intended that the program provide timely and effective assistance for employees adversely affected by base closures and the drawdown in the military. We adopted the JTPA model as the vehicle for providing adjustment assistance. But this model does not neatly fit the base closure situation and needs to be changed in order to provide effective assistance.

Base closures stemming from the 1988 and 1991 base closure commissions have been announced and planning for the closures are being implemented. Although employees on these bases know that they will lose their jobs on the base, most have not received an actual notice of layoffs. Under OPM rules, this notice will come only 60 days before the actual layoff.

But without an actual notice of termination, the employee is not eligible for benefits under JTPA. For example, the retraining program at Lowry Air Force Base in Colorado received this instruction:

[E]ach targeted worker must have either received a notice of layoff or been terminated in order to be determined eligible for basic readjustment and retraining services. A notification that the base is closing is not considered a satisfactory "notice of termination" to provide service.

My bill corrects this problem, so the announcement that the base is closing is considered a "notice of termination" for JTPA purposes. Instead of qualifying for retraining only 60 days before being laid off, the employee can benefit from a longer transition period, once he or she effectively knows that the base will close and the jobs will be eliminated. This early intervention gives the employee the most benefit out of the assistance.

As the Office of Technology Assessment recently noted in its report "After the Cold War," "the elements that make up an effective displaced worker program are well known and long established" and cited the pioneering work of former Secretary of Labor (and Secretary of State) George Shultz:

Early action is critical. The best time to start a displaced worker program is before layoffs begin. It is the best time for workers to get financial, personal, and job counseling, to explore options, and to find a new job without demoralizing delay. (OTA, p. 67)

As we make the often difficult transition to lower defense spending, we need to insure that workers are given an ample opportunity to make a transition to a new job. This bill will allow workers to obtain the most useful job training assistance when they need it most. Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to join me in this effort.

BECKY NEIBURGER, HONORED TEACHER

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to recognize Becky Neiburger, who has been honored by the Dade County Public School System as being one of its best educators. She was one of seven candidates to be chosen to compete for the Golden Apple Award for Dade's best teacher of 1991-92.

As a reading and language teacher to at-risk students at the Corporate Academy, Ms. Neiburger's goal is to improve her students' reading scores on standardized tests through an intensive program. She was recently featured in the Miami Herald for her extraordinary commitment to education. The article, "Her Reward for Hard Work?: Seeing Students Make Grade," by Alessandra Soler, tells of her great efforts. The article follows:

As a member of the Peace Corps, Becky Neiburger helped build schools. As a teacher at Dade's Corporate Academy, she's making sure kids graduate from them.

Neiburger, 45, teaches reading and language to at-risk students in grades 10 through 12. She is Region IV's nominee for Dade's 1991-92 Teacher of the Year.

"She genuinely cares about the students and devotes her efforts on their behalf," said principal Jack Annunziata. "She has an intense dedication in caring for young people."

The Corporate Academy, an alternative school at 137 NE 19th St., is funded by Burger King and the Dade school system, and gets contributions from other local companies. It's designed to help potential dropouts finish high school and go on to college or a job.

A reading resource specialist, Neiburger works with students who have trouble reading. Her goal is to get them ready for the communications section of the High School Competency Test.

In an effort to improve reading scores among her students, Neiburger last year started a program dubbed HOTTER (Higher Order Thinking That Emphasizes Reading).

Students discuss and analyze books as they read them. The program improved reading skills to the point that 71 percent of her 11th-graders passed the reading portion of the competency test last year.

Her enthusiasm and dedication make Neiburger a favorite among Academy students.

"She's always there for me," said Yolanda Fleming, 17, a senior. "She tells you your mistakes and takes time out to help you with any of your problems."

Born in Guatemala City, Guatemala, Neiburger graduated from Miami University in Oxford, Ohio, with a degree in political science.

She came to Miami in 1982, taught at a private school until 1985, then took a year off to travel. She went to work at Nautilus Middle School in 1986 and transferred to the Corporate Academy in 1989.

"I love it here," Neiburger said. "The philosophy at this school is a therapeutic approach to helping students who have a problem."

Mr. Speaker, I commend Becky Neiburger for her outstanding dedication to teaching. Her devotion in helping students with reading difficulties to graduate from high school is an inspiration to all teachers in Dade County and around the Nation.

NEW JERSEY'S FESTA ITALIANA CELEBRATES COLUMBUS' 500TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. MATTHEW J. RINALDO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. RINALDO. Mr. Speaker, the State of New Jersey has one of the largest Italian-

American populations in the Nation, and on June 13 they will celebrate their heritage at the 22nd annual Festa Italiana at the Garden State Arts Center in Holmdel, NJ. They are part of the more than 20 million American citizens who make up the Italian-American community.

New Jersey's Italian-Americans have strengthened the values of a society devoted to freedom and individual progress. They have been full participants in the life of this country, not only in time of peace but also in time of war. Indeed, Italian-Americans add to the rich cultural diversity of our State.

From the earliest immigrants to the newest generation, Italian-Americans played an important role as business men and women, professionals, teachers, artists, bankers, government officials, factory and service workers, homemakers, sport stars, entertainers, and hundreds of other productive enterprises. While they deeply love America, and identify themselves first and always as Americans, they still cherish and honor the rich cultural background of their Italian ancestors. Festa Italiana is an occasion at which they celebrate that heritage.

Daniel Webster once said that "there is a moral and philosophical respect for our ancestors which elevates the character and improves the heart." That respect is evident in the Italian community in New Jersey.

This year's celebration will pay a special tribute to Christopher Columbus. The 500th anniversary of Columbus' 1st voyage to America reminds us that he changed the world by uniting the old world with the new. That epic journey opened the way for successive generations of explorers and immigrants in search of freedom, opportunity, and new ideas.

We admire Columbus' faith in God, his sense of mission, his courage in the face of extreme adversity, his spirit of adventure, and his vision. Americans of all nationalities are proud of Christopher Columbus and what he means to America, and none more than the Italian people who followed him to America.

I salute the Festa Italiana committee under its general chairman, Anthony P. Lordi, Jr., of Linden, NJ, and his cochairpersons, Frank Guida of Metuchen and Carmen L. Urso of Linden, as well as the many others serving on the committee.

TRIBUTE TO MS. CHARLENE KING

HON. JON KYL

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. KYL. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in commendation of a woman from my own district in Arizona whose achievements I truly admire. Ms. Charlene King, a mother of four, once on welfare and living with her parents, was recently honored with the Humanitarian Award for Public Service for her tremendous contributions to her community. In addition to raising her children and studying carpentry at Rio Salado Community College, Ms. King participated in a community-service team which provided repairs and construction for low-income homeowners in Phoenix. Ms. King, a Navajo, hopes to someday return to her reservation in Northern Arizona to serve her community there. I wish her the best of luck, and hold her contributions as an honor student and a community volunteer up to my colleagues and constituents as an example of dedication and initiative.

H.R. 4848, THE LONG-TERM CARE FAMILY SECURITY ACT

HON. HENRY A. WAXMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, if you asked most American the best way to live out their last days, they'd say they would like to do it quietly at home. If you asked them the worst way to end their lives, they'd say years of bankruptcy and loneliness in a nursing home.

We must turn our attention to these issues as part of the health debate of the nineties. There is no true health reform without long-term care reform. There is no comprehensive health care without home care and nursing home care. There is no complete health insurance plan without a plan to pay for disability.

The legislation I am introducing today—along with the distinguished majority leader, Congressman DICK GEPHARDT—is to give Americans the chance to get the care they need and to choose the setting they want. Disabled people—old and young—should have the chance to get health services without impoverishing themselves, without burdening their families, without leaving their homes, and without living in fear of these things. This bill—a detailed summary of which appears below—will provide them with coverage for long-term care and protection against these catastrophes.

Mr. Speaker, the need for long-term care affects us all. The patients are our parents, our spouses, and inevitably ourselves. Most Americans have already dealt personally with a loved one in need of home or nursing-home care. Most Americans have had the experience of trying to find services and to arrange for payment. Most people know that such care is hard to get and even harder to pay for.

Our insurance system, public and private, doesn't help matters. Medicare, Medicaid, and commercial plans are all limited in eligibility and inadequate in coverage.

This bill establishes a new Federal program to address these problems. It provides assistance to severely impaired Americans, both elderly and non-elderly. It covers both home care and nursing facility services. It requires some forms of copayment for those who can afford it, but provides public payment for those who cannot. And it guarantees these things for all Americans.

The Long-Term Care Family Security Act is needed now. Illness and disability are tragedy enough. We should not compound them with fear and neglect.

SUMMARY OF H.R. 4848 THE LONG-TERM CARE FAMILY SECURITY ACT OF 1992

The Long-Term Care Family Security Act of 1992 is designed to achieve universal coverage for long-term care for disabled persons of all ages. A Public Program provides protection for home and community-based care and short-term nursing facility stays, without regard to income. The Public Program also provides a floor of income and asset protection for long stays in nursing facilities. All benefits are subject to cost containment and quality assurance mechanisms. Private long-term-care insurance policies for additional benefits are made eligible for favorable tax treatment if they meet Federal consumer protection requirements.

PUBLIC PROGRAM

Eligibility

All persons are eligible for either home and community-based or nursing facility care (regardless of their age, income or employment status) if they demonstrate any of the following:

Need for human assistance (including supervision) with three or more activities of daily living (ADLs) (bathing, dressing, transferring, toileting and eating).

Need substantial supervision due to cognitive or mental impairment and have at least one ADL limitation or require assistance managing their medications.

Need substantial supervision due to behaviors that are dangerous (to themselves or others), disruptive, or difficult to manage.

All persons who demonstrate any of the above needs and require long nursing facility stays are eligible for benefits when their incomes and assets reach protected levels.

Benefits

Home and Community-Based Care

Full range of home-care services (including skilled and unskilled services, personal assistance, and equipment to assist with ADLs); community-based services (including adult day care); and respite care services are available.

Benefits vary with degree of impairment: Eligible persons with limitations in fewer than four ADLs ("moderately disabled") are entitled to 52 hours of service per month. Eligible persons with limitations in four or more ADLs ("severely disabled") are entitled to 88 hours of service per month.

Additional hours may be made available to individuals with greater needs from pooled benefit hours (13 hours per month allotted to pool for each moderately disabled person; 22 hours per month allotted to pool for each severely disabled person).

Benefits are subject to 20% cost-sharing requirements, adjusted for sliding-scale low-income assistance.

Short-Term Nursing Facility Care

Coverage is available for two episodes of up to six months of nursing facility care.

Benefits are subject to 20% cost-sharing requirements, adjusted for sliding-scale low-income assistance.

Long-Term Nursing Facility Care

Asset protection is provided (in addition to the value of homes) in amounts up to $30,000 for individuals, $60,000 for couples.

Income for spouses, home maintenance, and personal needs is also protected.

Payment and Cost Containment

Payment rates for home and community-based services are Federally determined and are based on a fee schedule or prospective payment system developed by the Secretary.

Payment rates for nursing facilities are based on a specified prospective payment system, adjusted for severity of residents' impairments ("case-mix" system).

Payment rates for all types of services apply not only to services covered by the Public Program, but to any services delivered by participating providers ("all-payer" system).

Expenditures for home and community-based services may not exceed costs of entitlement hours plus pooled benefit hours.

Supply of nursing facility beds is limited to current bed-to-elderly population ratio in a State or the national average ratio, whichever is greater.

A Long-term Care Payment Assessment Commission is established to review and recommend to the Secretary and to Congress appropriate policy regarding rates, methods, and adjustments for payment for all services.

A Pharmaceutical Payment Assessment Commission is established to examine prescription drug costs and to explore issues relating to coverage of prescription drugs under government health care programs.

Administration and Quality Assurance

Designated assessment agency in each State determines functional and financial eligibility for benefits, and ensures specified quality of care standards.

Certified care managers, in cooperation with individual beneficiaries, develop plans of care for home and community-based services; arrange for, and oversee quality of, service delivery; and manage payment for services consistent with the limitations on expenditures.

Subject to Federal requirements, States certify and license care managers and providers.

Nursing home reform standards ("OBRA '87") remain unchanged.

Relation to Other Federal Programs

Medicare remains primary payer for persons eligible for Medicare benefits.

Medicare benefits remain unchanged except coverage for skilled nursing facility care is limited to 20 days.

Medicaid long-term care benefits are replaced by the Public Program except for intermediate care facility services for the mentally retarded ("ICFs/MR").

Long-term care programs supported through the Older Americans Act, Title XX, and the Protection and Advocacy Programs for Individuals with Mental Retardation or Mental Illness remain unchanged except for enhanced financing for the Ombudsman Program under the Older Americans Act.

Impact on Disabled Americans

3.1 million moderately and severely disabled Americans over age 65 are eligible for benefits.

800,000 moderately and severely disabled Americans under age 65 are eligible for benefits.

Cost and Financing

Preliminary CBO estimate of new federal costs for Public Program for first full year of implementation is $45 billion ($25 billion for home and community-based care; $20 billion for nursing facility care).

Taxes to finance new Federal costs include a payroll tax (0.5% on employer; 0.5% on employee for all wages except the first $5000); a tax on unearned income (2.5%); and a decrease in the tax-exempt inheritable amount (from $600,000 to $200,000).

Home and community-based care and short-term nursing facility benefits are fully Federally financed.

States are required to maintain current levels of financial commitment under Medicaid for population groups and long-term care services covered by the Public Program (indexed for increases in the medical CPI).

At full implementation, Federal and State governments share costs for increases in expenditures for the long-term nursing facility benefit in excess of the increase in the nursing facility market basket.

Phase-In Schedule

Year 1: Development and publication of implementing regulations.

Year 2: Provision of limited number of hours of home and community-based care.

Year 3: Provision of additional hours of home and community-based care.

Year 4: Full provision of nursing facility care.

Year 5: Full provision of home and community-based care.

PRIVATE LONG-TERM CARE INSURANCE

Relation to Public Program

Private long-term care insurance remains available for persons seeking protection of assets above the level specified in the Public Program; for additional home care services; for cost-sharing requirements under the Public Program; and for service needs associated with impairment levels less than those specified under the Public Program.

Purchase of private long-term care insurance ensures protection of assets above the levels specified under the Public Program equivalent to the amount of insurance purchased.

Standards

The National Association of Insurance Commissioners (NAIC) or, in its absence, the Secretary, is required to develop standards for State programs to regulate long-term care insurance policies; and for the issuers, sales practices, and content of such policies.

Standards for issuers include provision for examination of policy ("free look") and full refund; explanation of benefits relative to the Public Program; information on experience with claims denials; and limitations on agent compensation.

Standards for sales practices include requirements for agent certification and consumer education; prohibitions against unfair tactics, including "twisting", cold lead advertising, and high pressure techniques; and prohibitions against specified sales, including sales of duplicate policies and sales to Medicaid recipients.

Standards for policy content include coverage for a minimum benefit (protection for long nursing facility stays); optional development of standardized policies; protection against inflation, forfeiture, and use of pre-existing condition limits, and premium increases; and guarantees of renewability, continuation, conversion, and upgrade rights.

Enforcement

States are required to establish mechanisms to secure compliance with the specified standards, including the imposition of sanctions such as civil monetary penalties.

Secretary is required to establish mechanisms to ensure presence and operation of effective State regulatory programs ("look behind" authority).

Tax Clarifications

Private long-term care insurance policies are provided the same preferred tax treatment as accident and health insurance.

Expenditures for long-term care services are provided the same preferred tax treatment as medical expenditures.

REMARKS BEFORE THE CONFERENCE ON CONTEMPORARY CHINESE LAW WITH AN EMPHASIS ON TAIWAN

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I recently had an opportunity to address a very distinguished group of scholars who were meeting in Washington at the Conference on Contemporary Chinese Law With an Emphasis on Taiwan. I was particularly grateful to Dr. Tao-tai Hsia, of the Library of Congress, and a good friend. Dr. Winberg Chai, of the University of Wyoming, for their leadership at this important conference and for their very gracious hospitality. The following are thoughts which I shared with those in attendance at the conference:

REMARKS OF HON. TIM JOHNSON

Thank you for your kind invitation to join you at this luncheon in the midst of your conference on Contemporary Chinese Law with an Emphasis on Taiwan—I appreciate your hospitality and an opportunity to share a few brief thoughts with you.

The topics taken up by this conference—democratization, reunification, and economic and civil laws on the ROC are not only critically important, but extremely timely as well.

Having recently led a congressional delegation to Taiwan where we visited with President Lee, government officials and business leaders, let me say that our delegation came away impressed with the progress being made toward a more open, multi-party democracy on Taiwan. Much progress remains to be achieved, but I am confident that the people of the ROC will remain committed to pursuing the legal and constitutional reforms necessary to further the cause of democracy and individual civil liberties.

Obviously, the very difficult and sensitive issue of reunification is one which must be left to Taiwan and the Mainland, and it is only natural that differences of opinion should exist on Taiwan not only between the KMT and minority parties, but between factions of the KMT itself. Nonetheless, I believe that there is a great deal that the United States can and must do to promote needed political and economic changes on the Mainland which will facilitate the development of civil liberties for Mainlanders as well as allow for a better climate in which Taiwan and the Mainland can deal with the reunification issue.

We often refer to the Mainland as a socialist state—but the reality is that more than half their economy is no longer in state hands, and the share of the private economy has been growing rapidly. Further the unified state of the Mainland is fraying as economic reforms create effectively independent states, especially on coastal China. Mr. Deng's prevailing analysis is that the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe went about reform backwards—that they should have loosened their economies much sooner and their politics later, if at all. His argument is that people with full bellies will not complain too much about a lack of democracy, and that the Mainland should be prepared to absorb the ideas, money and technology of the outside world in order to assure economic growth. As a result, the Mainland's GNP grew by 7% last year in real terms, and the coastal provinces more in the range of 25%—due in a significant part to Taiwanese investment.

But I believe Mr. Deng will not be able to have it both ways—a growing capitalist economy and continued political repression. It is the nature of free economies that they require free people and free minds in order to remain competitive in an increasingly global economy. While the United States should express absolute opposition to weapon proliferation and repression of human rights, it is in our nation's interest to strengthen Sino-American cultural, educational and economic ties and to assist the Mainland with its "four modernizations."

Taiwan has, to its credit, established organizations to promote greater cooperative contact with the mainland—the Unification Council, Mainland China Affairs Commission and Straits Foundation. Trade and visitation between Taiwan and the Mainland have grown enormously in recent years. It is not the role of the United States to tell Taiwan when it should liberalize postal, trade and navigation links with the Mainland, but it is in the mutual interest of the United States and Taiwan to work toward a political and economic climate on the Mainland with which Taiwan can feel comfortable and secure. In the meantime, the United States should work to assure GATT membership for the ROC to further assure Taiwan's ability to continue economic growth.

If we choose the correct public policies in the 1990's, I am convinced that the next century will usher in an era of unprecedented prosperity in Asia and a flourishing of Chinese culture which would enrich all of the world. Thank you for your work in helping to lay the difficult but essential intellectual groundwork for such a new era.

THE EVERY FIFTH CHILD ACT

HON. PATRICIA SCHROEDER

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, if this Congress learned today that a debilitating, often fatal, condition threatened the lives of 13.4 million children—more than one-fifth of Americans under age 18; that afflicted children were three times more likely to die during childhood; that every day 27 U.S. children died from causes related to this condition; and that the ailment stunted not only the physical development of children, but also their social, emotional, and intellectual growth; would Congress take action?

If Congress found that remedies existed to correct the deadly conditions; that these measures saved lives and gave children a fairer start in life; but that this relief reached only a portion of the afflicted children; would Congress act to expand this relief?

If studies proved that this relief not only saved children's lives, but also saved money in later medical and social costs, would Congress act?

Mr. Speaker, I would like to believe that Congress would take decisive and immediate steps to free children from such an adversity. Yet the devastating circumstances I have described are not fiction but fact. The condition that afflicts one in five children is poverty, and its results devastate millions of lives each year. Children do not ask to be born into poverty, but they live—and die—with the consequences. Every 14 minutes an infant dies in the first year of life. One in eight children is hungry, and hungry children are 2 to 3 times more likely to suffer health problems. Untold thousands of children and families are homeless, and children are the poorest age group, two times as likely to be poor as elderly people.

I would like to believe that Congress would place these children's needs at least as high as defense budgets. But the budget walls would not even come down for children. When will we realize that, above all else, the future and defense of this Nation depends on the health and well-being of its young people?

The voters already understand this, and you can bet they will ask us this fall what we have done lately to assist children. A new poll, conducted by a Republican pollster, reports that 95 percent of registered voters believe poverty and homelessness are serious problems, and that 93 percent believe hunger is a serious problem. Two-thirds are willing to pay $100 more in taxes to end hunger among children and families.

Today, the esteemed chairman of the Education and Labor Subcommittee on Elementary, Secondary, and Vocational Education, Mr. KILDEE, is introducing the Every Fifth Child Act. This legislation responds to the overwhelming intention of voters to improve the well-being of children by increasing access to three outstanding cost-effective programs—WIC, Head Start, and Job Corps. I am pleased to be an original cosponsor of the bill.

The Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families, which I proudly serve as chairwoman, has documented the conditions facing children and the programs that improve well-being. The evidence is clear—WIC, Head Start, and Job Corps increase the nutritional, educational, and economic status of young people. They return significant savings in health, special education, public assistance, and crime costs.

Talk is cheap and time is short—this bill save lives and money, the best investment we can make. I urge my colleagues to support the Every Fifth Child Act.

ANGEL JONES, HONORED TEACHER

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to recognize Angel Jones, who has been honored by the Dade County public school system as being one of its best educators. She was 1 of 7 candidates to be chosen to compete for the Golden Apple Award for Dade's best teacher of 1991–92.

Ms. Jones is a seventh grade science and biology teacher at Thomas Jefferson Middle School. She was recently featured in the Miami Herald for her extraordinary dedication to teaching. The article "High Standards Are Her Hallmark" follows:

In Angel Jones' seventh-grade class Wednesday, the students were not students.

They were taxonomists, scientists who study classifications. And they were desperately trying to hang on to their jobs.

"I told them because of the recession I'm going to have to cut down on some employees," said Jones, who has taught science and biology at Thomas Jefferson Middle School for three years. "Based on how well they classify the buttons, I was going to cut jobs."

Jones, one of seven finalists for Dade County Teacher of the Year, is no textbook teacher. "I'm not the kind or person who is going to tell you. 'Come in. Open your books and answer all the questions for me,'" she said.

"My job is not to come here and baby-sit. My job is to make sure you're learning," Jones said.

TRIBUTE TO HURON-CLINTON METROPOLITAN AUTHORITY

HON. DAVID E. BONIOR

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. BONIOR. Mr. Speaker, today I wish to congratulate the Huron-Clinton Metropolitan Authority on its 50th anniversary. Back in 1942 it was easy to buy a swimsuit; however, finding a beach to wear it on was difficult. So that same year the Huron-Clinton Metropolitan Authority was created to provide parks for public use in the five southeastern Michigan counties of Macomb, Wayne, Oakland, Washtenaw, and Livingston.

The inception of the HCMA brought hope that larger, more diversified parks would be created. Today, through hard work, the Huron-Clinton Metropolitan Authority has developed 13 parks located along the Huron and Clinton Rivers.

These parks provide a variety of outdoor recreational activities for residents, both young and old, of southeast Michigan. The HCMA has also made a strong commitment to the environment through education programs and preservation.

I would also like to take this opportunity to thank the Huron-Clinton Metropolitan Authority for its assistance in building the bike path from Metro Beach to Stony Creek. The bike path will ensure safe travel for bikers and pedestrians.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, the dedication and commitment of the HCMA to provide quality outdoor recreation has had a considerable impact in the 12th Congressional District and in southeast Michigan.

On this special occasion, I ask that my colleagues join me in congratulating the Huron-Clinton Metropolitan Authority on its 50th anniversary.

SNOWE SALUTES MAINE VOICE OF DEMOCRACY WINNER

HON. OLYMPIA J. SNOWE

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to offer my congratulations to Monique Mari

Gibouleau of Old Town, ME, on winning the Maine VFW Voice of Democracy broadcast script writing contest with her outstanding essay. I find Monique's firm grasp of the historical challenges our Nation has met, as well as those we are currently encountering, highly commendable.

Currently in her junior year at Old Town High School, Monique competed among 147,000 high school students nationwide and was chosen as the winner for Maine.

Each year the VFW chooses a theme for the contest, this year it was "Meeting America's Challenge." In her speech, Monique concluded that America's greatest challenge is educating its citizens both now and in the future. Because I share Monique's view that education is indeed of great importance to the future of America, I would like to share her speech with my colleagues.

(By Monique M. Gibouleau, Maine winner, 1991/92 VFW Voice of Democracy Scholarship Program)

Throughout the years, America has met with many challenges, and the American people have dealt with them in various ways.

In the late 1700s, the challenge was the fight for independence and establishing a new nation and strong, wonderful government, and uniting several wary colonies.

In the 1860s the nation was torn in two as interests conflicted. The challenge of those times was to reunite the nation and to resolve its conflicts.

At the start of the twentieth century, the United States went through the challenge of foreign policy. Toward the 1900s, there was an explosion upon the USS Maine in Havana harbor which caused, eventually, America to go to war again. A few years later, the U.S. helped to get other nations out of tight places such as the Philippines which became a free country on July 4, 1946—nearly half century later. This was a time when the United States' challenge lay outside of the country for the most part.

Then the first World War began and the challenge of America was, at first, to stay out of it, and to be prosperous as other nations bought from the United States. But the United States became deeply involved with its allies, and the war to end all wars was through before the 1920s.

Later, a different challenge arrived in the form of the Great Depression, which improved with the coming of World War II when the neutral America sold goods and weapons on a "cash and carry" basis, stopping the unemployment crisis, after the United States went into World War II. The end came with an allied victory and there was temporary peace. The Vietnam Conflict and Korean War showed that there was not yet peace on earth.

There has been the challenge of stopping racism. There have been fights for the equality of the sexes. There have been many challenges throughout the history of our great nation, and today is no exception.

America's challenge of today is education. This is the education of everything! The people of today, not only the youth of today need education. People must be educated about all issues that need to be dealt with in life. People need to become aware.

America's challenge of today is the education of all things, of all people in the United States, of all the cultural backgrounds, and the great heritage of this nation. Beyond learning about the people making up the nation, people must also be educated about the issues that are dealt with by our representatives. They need to become aware of the issues that are dealt with in states and in the national government. The people must be challenged to learn.

The challenge of America is education on the environment. It is learning about the effects of toxic dumping and about common household waste disposal. They must be educated on reducing waste and recycling what can be recycled and as well as using well thought out methods of disposal for what must be discarded.

The challenge of America is education for the future. Schooling, and learning, and striving for knowledge and the accumulation of knowledge are necessary things for the future of our nation. That is America's challenge.

America has met its challenges in the past with strength, hope and desire, from the signing of the Declaration of Independence to the recent Gulf Crisis. I do not fear for the future—America meets its challenges well.

INTRODUCTION OF THE SMALL BUSINESS INCENTIVE ACT OF 1992

HON. JOHN D. DINGELL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, I commend my colleagues, Mr. MARKEY, the chairman of the Energy and Commerce Subcommittee on Telecommunications and Finance, and that subcommittee's ranking Republican, Mr. RINALDO, for introducing today, at the request of the SEC, the Small Business Incentive Act of 1992. According to the Small Business Administration, in recent years, almost two-thirds of U.S. employment growth has come from the creation of new firms. The Congress must take steps to encourage the continued productivity of this and other sectors of our economy.

However, I do not believe we should move forward on this bill without very careful hearings. And these legislative proposals should be examined against the Commission's recent package of proposed rule changes to reduce or eliminate registration, reporting, and accounting requirements for small businesses and to deregulate certain venture capital investment pools. While some of these proposals appear to have merit, others appear overbroad in scope and would unnecessarily remove safeguards and not provide adequate investor protections. Specifically, I would like the subcommittee to examine whether the combined effect is not a near total evisceration of the penny stock reforms we did in the last Congress. We should also examine the American Stock Exchange's new emerging company marketplace, and what the State securities regulators are doing in this area. Finally, we need to assess the effects, beneficial and otherwise, of the Small Business Investment Incentive Act of 1980, H.R. 7554, Public Law 96-477, October 21, 1980. We took a number of deregulatory steps in this area only 11 years ago in the 1980 act and it is advisable to see what was effective and what was not before we tear more pages out of the rulebook.

The Federal securities laws play a central and salutary role in the American capital marketplace. The central mandate is a simple one: That persons raising money from our citizens tell the truth about themselves, the securities being sold, and their business plans. The honesty and transparency of our markets, whether for large multinational companies or mom-and-pop operations, should never be compromised. Trust lost is not easily regained.

DEFENSE CUTBACKS MUST SLOW DOWN

HON. FLOYD SPENCE

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Speaker, America is facing its biggest demobilization since World War II.

Stunned military people know what it means. Over half a million of them will be tossed out into an economy where few jobs await.

Civilian defense workers, Reservists, and Guardsmen will also join the struggle for pay checks. What's more, millions of defense jobs in the shipbuilding, aerospace, and electronics industries could disappear.

At this rate, over 1 million new jobs will have to be created in the next 3 years. And slashing deeper—as some are pushing for—could cost 3.3 million jobs.

Let's face it—defense is a business. It creates jobs that support military and defense workers' families across the country. Cutting back too fast and too deep will do further harm to an already weak economy.

We must slow the pace of these proposed defense cutbacks. This will allow time for the economy to improve, and give people a better chance to find comparable jobs.

This approach can work better than the $1 billion economic conversion program that can't create jobs fast enough to help people now.

RECYCLING RANGERS AT PINE LAKE ELEMENTARY

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, by designating March as Recycling Awareness Month, Pine Lake Elementary has encouraged students, teachers, and parents to get involved in the recycling process. They were all part of a contest in which students competed for the best artwork created out of recyclable products. The school was recently featured in the Miami Herald for its efforts in saving the environment. The article "Kids Build An Awareness of Recycling" by Jon O'Neill tells of their accomplishments:

For students at Pine Lake Elementary, recycling is more than tossing things into a bin.

To prove it, the kids topped off a month of studying the subject by using recyclable things to make artwork and practical items. Their designs were on display in the media center at the school Tuesday.

Pine Lake, at 16700 SW 109th Ave., is a pre-kindergarten through third-grade school. Teachers wanted their young charges to get more involved with saving the environment, so they designated March "Recycling Awareness" month.

"We wanted to work with some basic ideas, but the kids really outdid themselves," said third-grade teacher Marilyn Carver. "We were impressed with what they did."

Each class designed its own recycling bin and learned what was OK to put in it. A team of students, the "Recycling Rangers," checked the bins each day and handed out rewards or warnings.

Students also held a bumper sticker contest. The best slogans now are being printed on bumper stickers that the school will sell. The money is going to help finance more environmental projects, Carver said. The kids also recycled old books.

The final projects, which took about two weeks, involved making items from recyclable goods, and having them judged. Winners were named from all four grade levels.

Malachi Green made "Space Robot Cat," a space-age kitty made from boxes, cans and sporting plastic fork whiskers.

"My mom helped some, but I did most of the work," said Malachi, 5, a kindergarten student. "I didn't realize I was going to be first place."

First-grader Clarence Harper, 7, also got an idea from his mother. He used dozens of aluminum cans to make a patio furniture set that was sturdy enough for little people to sit on. The set also featured a newspaper umbrella.

Diana Rairden, 7, won the second-grade competition with a book about how she made a composting pen at her house. The book includes pictures of Diana and her dad making the pen and mixing the compost.

"It was fun," Diana said. "Some of the food we mixed up was kind of disgusting, but I learned a lot. I learned we can stop trashing the earth."

Kaegan Blomseth, 9, was the third-grade winner. Using an idea she got from her sister, she built a birdbath made entirely of aluminum cans.

"It was real hard," Kaegan said. "Sometimes the cans wouldn't hold together."

Teachers and students say the month's lessons have been learned.

"They all want to tell me what I can and can't recycle now," librarian Toni Ziglich said. "It's amazing how much more aware they are."

Parents are learning, too. "I have to tell my dad to recycle because he doesn't," Kaegan said. "I'm going to make him now."

Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend the students and teachers of Pine Lake Elementary for their commitment in making ours a better world. Their involvement demonstrates how recycling can be both fun and simple. They are an example to us all.

SENSELESS REGULATIONS

HON. CASS BALLENGER

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. BALLENGER. Mr. Speaker, needless regulations ought to be repealed to promote economic growth. A recent report concludes that government regulations now cost the economy $400 to $500 billion annually. This means $4,000 to $5,000 per household per year, which reduces our country's ability to compete in international markets, prolongs the recession, and increases unemployment.

One burdensome regulation is the outdated Davis-Bacon Act. This depression era statute raises the cost of construction $1 billion a year by requiring a federally mandated wage for Federal construction projects above $2,000.

In my opinion, the Davis-Bacon Act needlessly pushes up Federal construction costs and in many cases pads the pockets of union workers. It shuts out minority contractors and others who bid competitively on Federal work. The act imposes artificial wages and causes construction costs to dramatically increase.

Today, Davis-Bacon does little more than milk the taxpayer. Rather than wasting millions each and every year on Federal construction, we could reinvest these dollars in low-income housing or health care.

Suspending Davis-Bacon, which is possible under Presidential authority, would send a strong signal to our constituents that we recognize we have a fiscal responsibility to spend their tax dollars wisely. Not only would it save money, the psychological impact of this decision could be enough to create an economic boom.

I hope the President uses his authority to suspend Davis-Bacon and help our economy get moving again!

NEW HAMPSHIRE-MAINE INTERSTATE SCHOOL COMPACT

HON. DICK SWETT

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. SWETT. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing H.R. 4841, legislation that would ratify the 1969 law of both New Hampshire and Maine's previously agreed to Interstate School Compact. Congresswoman OLYMPIA SNOWE and Congressman TOM ANDREWS of Maine and Congressman BILL ZELIFF, my colleague from New Hampshire, are joining me in support of the legislation.

Although this compact was signed into law in 1969 by both States, inadvertently it was not submitted to the U.S. Congress for the required approval. Finally, in 1992, we are taking steps to finish a process that should have been completed over 20 years ago.

This compact does not compel either State to establish interstate school districts, interstate committees, or even interstate discussions. It simply allows communities in either State who wish to look into the possibility of an interstate alliance to do so. Commissioner Eve Bither of Maine stated it best when she wrote, "The intent of this legislation is to enable towns from both States to combine their resources and form school districts if such a combination should prove economically and educationally feasible."

Our educational system faces severe fiscal restraints and limited resources as it struggles to provide quality education to our students. Local communities need the flexibility to pursue innovative solutions to their educational challenges. That is what the New Hampshire-Maine Interstate Compact is all about. New Hampshire's Commissioner Charles Marston wrote, "The Compact recognizes that border communities share more similarities than differences. Educational opportunities should not stop at the State line, whether you travel from east to west or west to east."

Mr. Speaker, I look forward to enactment of this enabling legislation and to the possible betterment of the educational systems of both New Hampshire and Maine. Someone once said, "Procrastination is opportunity's natural assassin." After 23 years we cannot procrastinate any longer. It is time to ratify this New Hampshire-Maine Interstate School Compact which will provide the voters of these States additional educational opportunities for their children.

SALUTE TO THE HONORABLE JUDGE BRUNO LEOPIZZI

HON. ROBERT A. ROE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, it is with the greatest pride and admiration that I rise today to salute a truly outstanding individual from my Eighth Congressional District of New Jersey who has made an enormous contribution to his community, his State and our Nation over the past 20 years.

I am speaking of the Honorable Judge Bruno Leopizzi of Paterson, NJ, who will be honored for his innumerable contributions on Sunday, April 26, 1992, by the prestigious Nineteen Hearts Society of the Federation of Italian Societies with a dinner at La Neve's Restaurant in Haledon, NJ.

I know that this event will be a source of great pride, not only to Bruno Leopizzi, but to his devoted family; his loving wife Terry; his two daughters Elaine and TerriAnn; his son Raymond; and all six of Bruno Leopizzi's grandchildren Raymond, Ryan, Anthony, Michael, Christopher and Cara. Further, I know this event will also have great significance for the people who have come to know Bruno Leopizzi through his great involvement with the community both professionally and socially.

Mr. Speaker, Bruno Leopizzi was born in Houston, PA, to Luigi and Agatha Leopizzi. He received all of his education in the Sandy Hill section of Paterson, NJ. After receiving his law degree at John Marshall Law School, Bruno was admitted to the New Jersey Bar in 1951. He was later admitted to practice in the U.S. Federal Court and the Supreme Court of the United States.

In the early years of his career, Bruno Leopizzi established a private practice from 1951 to 1972 when he was appointed to the district court. Four years later in 1976 the Hon. Judge Bruno Leopizzi was appointed to the county court level and in 1979 to the Superior Court of New Jersey.

Bruno Leopizzi is not only an important member of the community but holds membership in the Passaic County Bar Association, the New Jersey State Bar Association, the American Bar Association, the New Jersey Trial Lawyers Association and the Justinian Association. Judge Leopizzi has also in his spare time lectured at the New Jersey Judicial College, the Institute for Continuing Legal Education, the Skills and Methods Court for New Attorneys; been a visiting lecturer at Rutgers Law School and Drew University, as well as, a Moderator for Moot Court.

Judge Leopizzi has in the past held such notable positions as municipal prosecutor in Paterson, city attorney for Paterson, attorney for the Board of Health in West Paterson, NJ and numerous other positions. In his spare time Judge Leopizzi is a member of the Italian Circle, the Italian Sportsmen Hall of Fame, and a past member of St. Anthony's Catholic Club.

Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to present a brief profile of a truly outstanding and dedicated citizen whose dedication to his profession and his community have made our community, our State and our Nation a far better place to live, the Honorable Judge Bruno Leopizzi of Paterson, NJ, honoree of the Nineteen Hearts Society for 1992.

U.S. GOVERNMENT-PRIVATE SECTOR EXPORT COOPERATION

HON. DOUG BEREUTER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, as cochairman of the House Export Task Force this Member would like to describe how recent cooperation between the U.S. Government and the private sector will produce a boon to the U.S. telecommunications industry.

More than ever, U.S. exporters and the Federal Government need to work as a team to increase U.S. sales abroad. Although it is not often that business and Government work together, when it does happen, the results can be impressive. A good example of this is the sale of AT&T telephone switches to Indonesia.

Mr. Speaker, Indonesia is a developing country with a great need for modern telecommunications. The United States, without question, is a world leader in the production of telecommunications equipment. In terms of mutually beneficial trade, the two countries were a perfect match; however, Indonesia demanded generous financing concessions, requesting a loan at 3½ percent interest over 25 years and a 7 year grace period.

Now, this financing request might seem very demanding, but United States competitors in Japan and Europe were able to offer such financing with the help of their governments. Fortunately, for U.S. exporters, this Government and business leaders worked together to compete internationally.

Together, the Export-Import Bank, the Agency for International Development, and the Trade Development Program worked together to produce an attractive $60 million dollar loan package. Even with such a financing package, there was a great deal of pressure from competing governments. To further compete, officials of the U.S. Government at the very highest level contacted Indonesian officials to let them know the project was a United States priority.

Mr. Speaker, because of this teamwork, AT&T was able to demonstrate its superior technology and receive half of the $380 million dollar award. Additionally, AT&T expects to receive many times that amount in follow-up business. Most importantly, the U.S. Government's investment will be returned many times over in additional U.S. exports and new jobs.

Mr. Speaker, it is the kind of teamwork which is increasingly important in a world where governments as well as companies compete for international markets.

CLIFF PEAKE RETIRES AS PRESIDENT OF UNION COUNTY CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

HON. MATTHEW J. RINALDO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. RINALDO. Mr. Speaker, the business community in Union County will honor Clifford M. Peake, president of the Union County Chamber of Commerce, on his 22 years of exceptional service when he retires as president of the chamber of commerce. It is a well deserved tribute and public expression of appreciation for Cliff Peake's leadership in promoting new business, aiding existing enterprises and industries in dealing with local, county, State and Federal Government agencies, and in attracting investment and jobs into Union County.

Under Cliff Peake's leadership, businesses and industries in Union County have been able to play a significant role in promoting and planning improvements in public transportation, including the proposed rail connection between Newark Airport and the city of Elizabeth, and many other projects that are vital to the future economic growth and prosperity of Union County.

He began his career in 1950 after service in the U.S. Army and graduation from Idaho State University. Cliff Peake gained a broad view of the American business community, from agricultural-based counties to industrial cities, by serving with the chamber of commerce in five States—Jerome, ID; Golden, CO; North Platte, NE; Bellville, IL, and Gary, IN, before coming to the Union County Chamber of Commerce in Elizabeth, NJ, in 1969. Whether it was with ranchers in the Great Plains or industrial and corporate executives in Union County, Cliff Peake's personality, openness, knowledge, and salesmanship in behalf of American business and free enterprise earned him the respect and friendship of many people, including those outside the business community.

The competition the United States faces in the global marketplace, and the need for better trained and educated employees, led Cliff Peake to serve as cochairman of the Kean College Business Council, and membership on the executive committee of the Union County Industry Council.

But economic development and job training have not been his or the chamber of commerce's only interests. For the last two decades, Cliff Peake has been a catalyst in enlisting the support of corporations and business executives and employees in community fund drives and in supporting our hospitals, private social service agencies, and charities. Several million dollars have been raised through these charitable activities, and Cliff Peake deserves a great deal of the credit for appealing to the generosity and community spirit of many businessmen and women in Union County.

During the years that I served as a New Jersey State Senator and Member of Congress, I have dealt with Cliff Peake on many important issues affecting business and industry. He was always fair-minded, honest, dependable and well informed, and proved to be an invaluable contact between business and government.

Mr. Speaker, I congratulate Cliff Peake on his outstanding service to our county and State, and for his efforts in promoting our free enterprise system. I wish Cliff Peake and his wife, Jo, a long, healthy and happy retirement, and the appreciation of the community for a job well done.

NINA KASPER, HONORED TEACHER

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to recognize Nina Kasper, who has been honored by the Dade County Public School System as being one of its best educators. She was one of seven candidates to be chosen to compete for the Golden Apple Award for Dade's best teacher of 1991-92.

As the teacher of Colonial Drive Elementary's special education prekindergarten class, Ms. Kasper's goals are to achieve integration between the physically and mentally impaired kids, and parent involvement. She was recently featured in the Miami Herald for her extraordinary dedication to children with special needs. The article "Her Special Classroom Magic Gets Kids, Parents Involved" by Roxana Sotc reveals why she is so loved. The article follows:

Region V's 1991-92 theme for Teacher of the Year is "A touch of Magic." The staff at Colonial Drive Elementary believes that definitely applies to Nina Kasper.

"In the classroom she is like a magician," said principal Paulette M. Martin. "She's very natural and talented at what she does. She's one of a kind."

Kasper, 28 is the teacher of the year nominee from Region V. She also is Colonial Drive's only special education prekindergarten teacher. She takes care of 11 kids who are visually impaired, physically handicapped, mentally handicapped or language impaired.

"We try to make our kids do the kinds of things that any other 3- 4-year-old might do." Kasper said. "Of course, our kids have special needs, but we try to provide hands-on, active and creative learning experiences to enable them to grow in a natural and functional manner."

Kasper's two main goals are integration and parent involvement.

"I wanted to expose children without disabilities to those with disabilities," she said.

"So I talked to a second-grade teacher and we decided to join our students in a special project."

That project is a garden the two classes planted together at the beginning of the school year.

"At first, the kids were wary of each other, but now, seven months into the program, we've noticed tremendous growth on both sides," Kasper said. "The second-graders are more compassionate and sensitive toward my students and they, in turn, have learned to become part of the mainstream."

A couple of weeks ago, the students picked and cleaned tomatoes, carrots and other vegetables they are growing and had a "salad party."

To Kasper, parent participation is very important. That's why she now has more parent meetings and sends newsletters home often so she can stay in touch with them.

"Nina makes a very big difference in the children's lives," said Mary Porter, whose 5-year-old son Joseph is in Kasper's class. "She spends time with them and they really learn with her. Joseph loves her. He talks about her all the time and he loves to go to school."

Born in Long Island, N.Y., Kasper came to Miami in 1984 to attend the University of Miami. In 1986 she got a bachelor's degree in special education and in 1990 she went back to UM to receive her master's degree in early childhood/special education.

She worked at Arcola Elementary in North Dade before coming to Colonial Drive, 10755 SW 160th St., where she has taught for four years.

Kasper loves to talk about her kids. She says they are very well attuned to each other's abilities and disabilities and that they always help each other out.

"It is always a challenge, but teaching them is very rewarding," she said. "It's touching to see a kid with Down's syndrome help a physically impaired one walk to the table."

Mr. Speaker, I commend Nina Kasper for her outstanding commitment to teaching. Her devotion to educating children with special needs is an inspiration to all teachers in Dade County and around the world.

REGULATORY ASPHYXIATION

HON. JACK FIELDS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, I am submitting for the RECORD an article written by Joe Farrell, president of the American Waterways Operators. This article is especially timely as we are in the midst of a 90-day moratorium on Federal regulation called for by President Bush.

I would urge my colleagues to give consideration to this finely written article by Mr. Farrell. It is past time for Congress and the Federal agencies to give relief to an economy that is overburdened with government regulation. I hope that this article will give us all a better understanding of the need to reduce regulation in order to spur economic growth.

The text of the article follows:

REGULATORY ASPHYXIATION

(By Joe Farrell)

During the State of the Union address, President Bush announced that major cabinet departments and federal agencies would institute a 90-day moratorium on new federal regulations that could hinder economic growth. Moreover, the President ordered all major departments and agencies to carry out a "top to bottom" review of all existing regulations with the goal of eliminating those that hinder growth and speeding up those that stimulate economic activity. AWO applauds President Bush's initiative to take a fresh look at federal regulations which unduly increase costs, and which capriciously strangle—in miles of red tape—many sectors of the American economy.

We view the President's plan for reducing the burden of regulation as a timely and positive development. In our comments to the President and Secretary of Transportation, we have emphasized that the review will only yield real, tangible results if the agencies responsible for its view our industry's comments with an open mind and with a willingness to revise or repeal rules which sometimes enjoy strong support within the bureaucracy.

In AWO's response to the President's initiative, we gave particular attention to those rules that are unnecessarily burdensome, or which impose needless costs or excessive red tape. In the interest of brevity, we are providing you here with only the essential components of each issue. AWO has already provided the President and Secretary of Transportation with fuller, more developed commentary on each of these matters in response to the respective regulatory proceedings.

Perhaps one of the most absurd examples of regulatory overkill and bureaucratic arrogance is a pending EPA regulation to hold companies operating tank barges transporting reformulated gasoline "presumptively liable" if the gasoline at the distribution point does not meet environmental standards. These EPA proposed guidelines under the Clean Air Act will subject barge carriers to new, and wholly inappropriate, liability standards and cargo testing requirements.

AWO views the liability presumptions and testing requirements aimed at barge carriers as the kind of unnecessary regulation that chokes sound business activity. At the core of AWO's objection is the notion of "presumptive liability," an unacceptable and absurd premise. Even the statute which spawned the regulation exempted our industry from testing. And, as EPA itself acknowledges, carriers have traditionally not been presumed liable for violations detected downstream of the carrier. This proposal would shatter that precedent and include barge carriers in the liability chain for no real purpose and with no basis in law.

AWO is increasingly alarmed that the reasons behind EPA's proposal have not been publicly aired. Seeking to understand EPA's rationale, we were dismayed when our questions to an EPA attorney yielded and angry, defensive response, but little concrete information. We were told that oxygenated (and reformulated) gasoline were "simply too important" to take chances and that "things could happen [to the gasoline] in transit." When we asked whether EPA had encountered problems with cargo contamination during barge transport under other fuels enforcement programs, we were told only that "You [barge transporters] have the same obligations as everybody else." Of particular note, we were also told that "there's no way carriers won't be included" in presumptive liability and testing requirements. If this is a foregone conclusion, the notice-and-comment process is a shocking masquerade.

AWO has requested formal clarification that this attorney's apparent unwillingness to take seriously an agency's obligations under the Administrative Procedure Act is not shared by those in authority within EPA.

On another front, a pending Coast Guard rule would require pilots on tank barges when they are inside the boundary line. This is clearly without precedent. In 1985, the Coast Guard issued a regulation which affirmed the longstanding practice of towing vessel captains navigating their tug/tank barge units without having to engage the services of an independent pilot. Towing vessel captains, who spend much of their at-sea time navigating in ports and congested pilotage waters, have always served as pilots for barges in their tow. In 1988, the Coast Guard strengthened that provision, allowing towing vessel captains with a substantial specified level of experience piloting large barges to navigate those vessels. And in 1990, the Marine Safety Council, a panel of the most Senior Coast Guard Admirals, reaffirmed the policy.

Now, the Coast Guard appears ready to abandon the provisions. If so, the cost of hiring an independent pilot, at a modest four moves per voyage, would add from $73,000 to $290,000 to a vessel's annual operating cost.

We are told the decision is based on the vague and hazy assertion by the Coast Guard that "new considerations" in the post-Valdez era (presumably political ones), have made the agency wary. AWO strongly supports regulations which assure marine safety, but this is not an issue in which marine safety is at all involved. In spite of the President's call for reason in federal regulation, the Coast Guard's political concerns would produce regulations which saddle the tank barge industry—and those who rely on its services—with substantial, unnecessary costs.

Still another example of regulatory balderdash resides in the Coast Guard's effort to establish a range of user fees for Coast Guard inspection and licensing services. These fees, in some instances, bear no resemblance to the cost of providing the service, and, secondly, will require some vessel owners to pay twice for the same service. The operators of inspected, ABS-classed barges will be required to pay for largely duplicative inspections by the Coast Guard and by the American Bureau of Shipping. These are clearly unnecessary and burdensome costs which should be eliminated to the benefit of both the industry and the Coast Guard by allowing an operator to have his vessel inspected only once, by ABS.

A special case is the outrageous $955 fee proposed for inspected deck barges. This is wildly inconsistent with the cost of Coast Guard inspection. A deck barge is neither complex nor time-consuming to inspect. Even with the Coast Guard's estimated cost of $87 per hour of inspection time, AWO's analysis concludes that an annual fee of $200-$300 for small or medium-sized barges and no more than $250-$450 for large barges is more accurate.

Also note that a second Coast Guard user fee proposal would establish user fees for personnel licensing and documentation. This proposal also needs serious revision since the proposed user fees have been developed with virtually no input from the regulated community, and the Coast Guard has seriously underestimated the financial burden which the fees will represent.

As a matter of policy, AWO believes the Coast Guard should refrain from issuing final regulations for any category of user fees until public comments on each regulatory proposal—merchant mariner licensing and documentation, vessel inspection, and vessel plan review and approval—have been received and evaluated. The true economic impact of user fees on marine transportation can only be evaluated when the cumulative effects of each new fee have been tallied.

A great deal has been said and written about the Coast Guard's proposed regulations regarding financial responsibility for oil pollution, and there is little value in regurgitating the debate here. However, there is a critically important principle at stake. Specifically, the Coast Guard's proposal, if implemented as written, will shut down the waterborne transportation of petroleum and petroleum products. To do so will severely disrupt what has heretofore been a stable and competitive marine transportation system, and will set in motion unacceptable financial, employment, and operational chaos.

The essence of the impasse which currently exists is the unwillingness of a major part of the marine insurance sector to issue Certificates of Financial Responsibility (COFRs) under the regulatory regime the Coast Guard has proposed. Therefore, either the regulations must be written in a way to allow the existing insurance mechanisms to continue to work, or, in the event that is not possible, then the Congress must assist in an appropriate way which allows such regulations to be written. What is clearly not an option is to develop regulations which halt the movement of petroleum and petroleum products by water into and within the United States.

The list of regulations and proposed regulations that merit review under the President's criteria is seemingly endless. Consider that in 1989, DOT issued a final rule on workplace drug testing programs which requires employers to use a laboratory certified by the Department of Health and Human Services. Employers must submit to the laboratory "blind" urine specimens, some spiked with drugs for which the employer is testing, and some blank. The samples must be submitted in such a way that the laboratory cannot distinguish them from genuine employee specimens.

AWO believes that to require employers to purchase services from government-certified laboratories, and then require them to take responsibility for the quality control of those facilities is patently wrong.

To require employers to perform this policing function not only represents an inappropriate abrogation of a responsibility properly vested in the government, but also imposes needless costs. The total per-sample cost of this process could range as high as $75. AWO has encouraged DOT to remove this unnecessary burden upon private employers, and place responsibility for monitoring government-certified facilities where it properly belongs—with the government.

Other regulations which we have indicated to the White House are counterproductive to economic growth and which, based on measurable "cost-benefit," should be reviewed include:

The Department of Labor's proposed regulation requiring employers to require employees to wear seat belts and to hold periodic driver safety training sessions for all employees. Fines are imposed for any transgressions discovered. There are already laws in most states on this issue. This is clearly not a proper role for the private sector.

The pending Coast Guard rule which would define "tank vessel" for purposes of response plans required under OPA 90 to include tugs and towboats. This is unprecedented, not intended by Congress, and will levy a burden on up to 7000 towing vessels which is not required by the law.

OPA 90 requires phasing-in of double hulls. The Coast Guard economic analysis shows that the benefit is well below the cost of so doing.

The pending EPA regulation which will require vapor recovery from tank vessels loading gasoline in ozone attainment areas. A Booz-Allen Hamilton study shows that these vapors contribute 0.2 percent of ozone precursors.

The regulatory proposal to be issued by the National Ocean & Atmospheric Administration concerning Natural Resource Damage Assessment. The highly speculative economic theory for determining dollar values for "nonuse" damages being utilized could cost industry billions with no discernable environmental benefit.

While many pundits—particularly in the media—have tended to dismiss this Presidentially-mandated regulatory review process as gimmickry, AWO has chosen to take the President at his word. We believe that if such a review is indeed carried out, the economic benefits and motivational stimulus this process could achieve would go a long way a restarting this country's long stagnant economy.

We take the President and this proposal seriously.

ISRAELI LOAN GUARANTEES

HON. TED WEISS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, recently several of my colleagues engaged in a special order on the Israeli loan guarantees. Regretfully, because of a prior commitment I was unable to participate in this important dialog. I would like to share my thoughts on this critical issue.

For more than two decades, securing free emigration for Soviet Jews was one of the central objectives of United States-Soviet relations. Among the revolutionary changes that we have witnessed over the past several years has been the fulfillment of this objective. Hundreds of thousands of Jews have left the former Soviet Union to settle in Israel; hundreds of thousands more are expected in the coming years.

One would believe that this historic achievement would be cause for celebration in the states of the former Soviet Union, in Israel, and here in the United States. Instead, the Bush administration has embarked on a path that has not only ended hopes of providing humanitarian assistance in the short term, but has damaged a relationship that has been special and strong for more than 40 years.

From the moment Israel requested assistance in the form of loan guarantees, the President and his administration's response can be termed confrontational at best. When the President declared himself to be alone in standing up to a thousand lobbyists pushing for loan guarantees, he instigated a long and acrimonious debate that continues still. What started as a debate on how best to help Israel absorb an estimated 1 million immigrants, has degenerated into a squabble that threatens the very foundation of United States-Israeli relations.

It is difficult to understand how we have come to this point. Israel has not asked for further financial assistance, but rather, the means to help themselves. The cost of absorbing the Soviet Olim has been estimated at many tens of billions of dollars. The vast majority of this money is to be raised in Israel. Only a portion is to be raised in the international financial markets. What Israel requested from the United States was support so that they themselves could obtain these desperately needed loans.

Claims that the loan guarantees would ultimately cost the United States $10 billion are unfounded. Israel has a perfect record of repayment on loans and there is little risk that they will default now. In fact, a recent GAO study determined that there was little risk of Israel being unable to repay loans obtained with the assistance of American guarantee.

Furthermore, a substantial proportion of the money Israel intends to borrow will provide economic benefit to the United States. Much of the money will be spent purchasing pre-fabricated homes, construction materials, and other products made here in the United States.

In addition, if Israel is able to absorb these immigrants successfully, its potential for economic growth is substantial. The immigrants arriving into Israel are unique in the extraordinary level of skills that they bring. Many are doctors, engineers and scientists. These are the kind of skilled professionals that enable any economy to grow.

The United States has been presented with any opportunity to provide humanitarian assistance to one of its strongest and most important allies. Instead, Bush has allowed this situation to degenerate into a contentious and often bitter debate. The United States must reserve this and seize the opportunity to provide humanitarian assistance to this close ally. We can help Israel to help themselves. This we must do.

INTRODUCTION OF THE CABLE CONSUMER PROTECTION AND COMPETITION ACT OF 1992

HON. EDWARD J. MARKEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, today I rise to introduce the Cable Television Consumer Protection and Competition Act of 1992. This legislation, which yesterday was reported favorably by the Subcommittee on Telecommunications and Finance, is designed to protect consumers from unreasonable rates and the poor customer service practices of some cable operators and to promote competition in the video marketplace.

In 1984, Congress passed the Cable Communications Policy Act in order to facilitate the growth and development of the then fledgling cable television industry. The 1984 act removed a major obstacle inhibiting the growth of the cable industry by lifting the rate and other structural regulations imposed upon cable systems nationwide by local franchise authorities. Since then, cable has experienced exponential growth that has exceeded the goals and expectations of the Cable Act. In 1991, there were approximately 10,800 operating cable systems in the United States, serving over 28,000 communities, reaching about 54 million subscribers. This means that perhaps over 158 million people, about 58.6 percent of the Nation's TV households, are now served by cable. This phenomenal explosion of growth has ensured that today most of the Nation's consumers have access to quality programming services through cable television.

However, the deregulation of the cable industry and its subsequent growth has resulted in some serious problems. Some cable operators have abused the license provided by the 1984 Cable Act to indulge in price gouging, indiscriminate rate hikes, and other monopolistic practices. The drastic increases in cable rates since deregulation provide a glaring example of these concerns. A series of GAO studies commissioned by the subcommittee, show that, in the 6 years under the Cable Act, cable rates for basic service have skyrocketed 61 percent, rising at more than three times the rate of inflation. The most recent consumer price index statistics released last month by the Bureau of Labor Statistics disclose that cable rates rose at a rate 250 percent higher than the price for other goods and services during 1991. In February 1992 alone, cable rates rose at a pace five times the rate of inflation. America's consumers rightfully demand relief from these excessive rate increases.

In 1990, the House passed legislation, H.R. 5267, that addressed issues related to the operation of the cable industry. H.R. 5267, re-introduced in the 102d Congress as H.R. 1303, included provisions intended to curb rate increases, promote access to programming for services in competition to cable, and promulgate universal standards for customer service. This bill, however, did not go far enough to meet the demands of today's marketplace and consumer needs and is deficient in several important areas. First, H.R. 1303 does not deal with the increasingly serious problems facing the television broadcasting industry, and the threat to the historic tradition that broadcasting has held in this country. Second, the 1990 bill was followed by two more years of excessive rate increases, which burden an increasingly vulnerable consumer public. And third, a fully competitive video marketplace providing meaningful consumer choice has not arrived; the current market is stagnant at best. Congress now faces a situation that demands passage of a stronger bill—one that will spark competition and give consumers more choice in multichannel video programming.

The legislation I introduce today, the Cable Consumer Protection and Competition Act of 1992, is a significant improvement on the 1990 bill. It will provide consumers with real choice in video programming and needed relief from the skyrocketing rates and poor service practices that have characterized the operation of some in the cable industry since deregulation. The bill will achieve these goals by enacting reforms in the key areas of rate regulation, competitive program access, consumer protection, and broadcasting rights.

On rate regulation, the bill includes provisions to promote competition and to empower franchising authorities to oversee a rate formula established by the Federal Communications Commission [FCC] and implemented by the cable operators. In addition, the bill includes provisions to rein in the renegades of the cable industry by requiring the FCC, on a per case basis, to regulate unreasonable rates charged for service. The bill also reduces the regulatory burdens faced by small cable systems, particularly those in rural areas, in complying with the rate formula established by the FCC.

On program access, the bill remedies the discrimination faced by direct broadcast satellite, and other emerging video services, in acquiring programming necessary to compete with cable. It prohibits vertically integrated cable programming services from unreasonably refusing to deal with any multichannel video system operator, and from discriminating in the price, terms, and conditions in the sale and delivery of programming. The bill permits cost-based differential pricing, such as volume discounts, and takes cognizance of differences in the costs of creation necessary to attract entrepreneurial investment in programming. The bill also grandfather existing exclusive contracts that were in effect before June 1, 1990. In addition, the legislation includes a provision that prohibits exclusive contracts that deny access to a programming service for rural areas that are not served by cable.

The bill also protects local television broadcasters by giving them the choice of mandatory carriage, so-called must carry, or requiring the cable operator to obtain their consent before carrying their signal. These provisions promote the future viability of over-the-air television broadcasting by restoring equity to the relationship between broadcasters and cable operators.

On consumer protection, the bill shields consumers from unfair practices of cable operators. An anti-buy-through provision permits consumers to buy premium program services, such as HBO, without being forced to purchase any tier other than basic service. Recognizing that all cable operators currently do not have the technology available to implement this provision, the bill gives such systems a maximum of 5 years to adopt the technology necessary to conform to the bill. Additional provisions require the FCC to establish universal customer service standards, and set maximum permissible rates for additional hookups, installation, and equipment such as converter boxes and remote controls. The bill also requires cable systems to be compatible with the advanced features of consumer electronics equipment such as TV's and VCR's. Finally, and particularly significant from the consumers' standpoint, the bill makes remote control units commercially available so that consumers will no longer be forced to rent remotes from operators.

This bill will bring real change to the video marketplace and an industry in need of reform. It is a comprehensive and effective means of bringing consumers relief from excessive rates and of fostering long-term competition in the market for delivery of video services. It is good for consumers; good for competition; good for the future of free-over-the-air broadcasting; and yes, good for the viability of the cable industry itself—because the discipline and opportunities promised by the legislation will stabilize the video marketplace and lead to fair competition. This legislation has the full support of a wide range of groups representing America's consumers, such as the Consumer Federation of America, the National Association of Broadcasters, the Association of Independent Television Stations, the National Consumers League, the National Council of Senior Citizens, and organized labor. I urge my colleagues to join America's consumers in supporting this bill.

TRIBUTE TO AL THOMPSON

HON. EDOLPHUS TOWNS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. TOWNS. Mr. Speaker, it is my distinct pleasure to highlight the numerous achievements and contributions of Mr. Al Thompson, president and chief executive officer of Consolidated Beverage Corp. Through his vision and hard work a small vending machine company has become a successful wholesale/retail enterprise.

A native New Yorker, he is the father of two children, Valora and Albert. He attended Metropolitan Vocational High School and joined the U.S. Marine Corps in 1955 and served 2 years of active duty. He returned to New York after his tour of duty ended and remained active in the Marine Reserve. He retired from Reserve service in 1985 as a master sergeant.

A man of many talents and professional experiences, Al Thompson joined the housing authority police in 1958 as a patrolman. He rose to the rank of sergeant and subsequently was promoted to lieutenant. In his spare time he moonlighted as a salesman for the Miller Brewing Co. He worked in that position for 15 years. When he retired from the housing police in 1974 he started his own wholesale/retail beverage company, Abelson Distribution, Inc. Three years later, he started Consolidated Beverage Corp., which has grown to the point where the company has a fleet of 9 trucks and employees 39 employees.

Initially contracted as a wholesaler with Pabst and Ballantine Beer to serve the Harlem community, his marketing territory was expanded to include New York State and the Caribbean islands.

Generous with his time and resources, Mr. Thompson works extensively with young people. He serves on the board of directors of the Harlem-Dowling Children Services, New York Urban League, and the Urban Resources Institute. He contributes to over a dozen community organizations. He is directly responsible for creating the Bernice Riley-Thompson Foundation in honor of his mother. He has been the recipient of Man of the Year awards from the American Cancer Society and the New York City Partnership.

Ever ready to undertake new challenges and be an innovator, when appointed as deputy chief of the New York Fire Department he implemented the use of the rabbit tool, an instrument that promotes speedy entrance into barricaded doors. Recently, when the city could not afford to purchase this device, he purchased one for the fire department using his own money.

A man of many talents and accomplishments, he currently serves on the 11th Congressional District Service Academy. Mr. Al Thompson is a testament to the American work ethic, and a credit to the African-American community.

GLENDNA NAJARRO HONORED AS 1
OF DADE'S TOP 10 STUDENTS

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, this year's Do The Right Thing Program recognized 10 of Dade County's outstanding students for their work and commitment to our community. Among this year's recipients was Glenda Najarro, a senior at Jackson High School. Glenda has served as a volunteer for the Salvation Army and is involved in other organizations in the community.

At Jackson High School, she is a member of the Future Educators of America and of the Italian Club. Glenda has taken part in various activities for the betterment of our community. In her capacity as a member of the Salvation Army, Glenda helped to raise money for a young girl who was paralyzed in a car accident, and organized a food and toy drive for the New Family Shelter. Glenda has also volunteered at Jackson Memorial Hospital, has been involved in Miami Jackson's Clean-Up Campaign, the Ethnic Fair, and Hispanic Heritage Month.

Glenda's service to the community began soon after her brother was murdered. It was then that she decided to serve as an example by assisting and caring for others in our community.

I commend Glenda for her terrific work throughout our neighborhoods. I am delighted that Glenda and other young students like her have decided to work for the good of our community and to help others who need assistance. Her devotion to her work sends out a message to other young people in our community to make a difference and make your work count for others who need assistance.

I am pleased to honor Glenda Najarro for her terrific work and her desire to stand up for others. Her work is an example to all young people of our community.

COMMENDING FRANCE ON ITS MORATORIUM ON NUCLEAR TESTING IN THE SOUTH PACIFIC

HON. ENI F.H. FALEOMAVAEGA

OF AMERICAN SAMOA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. FALEOMAVAEGA. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to celebrate news of great importance with our colleagues and the country. Yesterday, the nation of France, through an address by her Prime Minister to the National Assembly, announced a moratorium for 1992 on its Nuclear Testing Program in French Polynesia.

France's decision to impose a nuclear testing moratorium is a monumental step forward for the nation of France, the peoples of the South Pacific, and the countries of the world. President Francois Mitterrand and Prime Minister Pierre Berezgoy are to be highly commended for their courage and leadership in taking this decisive action.

The announcement of France's moratorium has especially been a moment of joyous celebration for the island nations of the South Pacific. For decades, Pacific islanders have stridently criticized the French for using their backyard—Tahiti's Moruroa and Fangataufa Atolls and surrounding waters—as a waste repository for close to 200 nuclear detonations. Last year, I introduced legislation, House Concurrent Resolution 243, which recognizes the concerns of the South Pacific people by calling upon the Government of France to cease all nuclear testing in French Polynesia.

The radioactive damage from France's nuclear testing to the fragile coral atolls, marine environment, and island populations nearby can only be imagined, as the French—for good reason—have not allowed unhindered study. It doesn't take a rocket scientist, however, to realize that when the equivalent of more than 200 Hiroshima-class bombs have been detonated in a small area, the effect will be monstrous. The world bears witness to the Hades-like destructiveness of a mere two detonations in World War II. Only the passage of years shall reveal the true legacy of France's nuclear testing in the South Pacific.

Today, it is the dawning of a new era. France's moratorium has temporarily brought the nuclear nightmare in French Polynesia to an end. I hope the nightmare never resumes.

Through a global perspective, President Mitterrand's moratorium, joining that of Russian—C.I.S.—President Yeltsin's imposed last year, is a call for sanity in a world often teetering on the brink of nuclear madness. All are agreed that nuclear proliferation must be stopped. Yet we read constantly about Third World countries, desperately aping the superpowers, with their attempts to gain nuclear technology. Clearly, before there can be a stop to nuclear proliferation and meaningful disarmament, there must be a halt to destructive nuclear testing.

Mr. Speaker, it is time that our country, the world's leading democracy, answer Russia and France's call for a comprehensive test ban. Mere rhetoric cannot suffice where other governments have acted. To continue nuclear testing while opposing nuclear proliferation as a signatory to the Non-Proliferation Treaty [NPT] is to invite ridicule, derision and charges of hypocrisy and bad faith. That is not what America is all about.

That is why I am a cosponsor of H.R. 3636, the measure calling for a 1-year ban on U.S. nuclear testing, which was introduced by the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GEPHARDT], and the distinguished gentleman from Oregon [Mr. KOPETSKI]. I applaud these gentlemen, and all those who support H.R. 3636, for their vision and concern for a world that will be safer tomorrow for our children and generations to come.

Mr. Speaker, let us not let this historical opportunity for a solution to nuclear madness pass us by.

On the foregoing subjects, Mr. Speaker, I have four items that I will submit for the RECORD: Copies of House Concurrent Resolution 243 and H.R. 3636, a letter I have written to President Francois Mitterrand and a New York Times article on France's nuclear testing suspension, written by Alan Riding.

H. CON. RES. 243

Whereas the Government of France has been conducting nuclear tests in the atolls of Moruroa and Fangataufa in French Polynesia since 1966;

Whereas these tests have included more than 130 underground nuclear tests;

Whereas there is considerable concern among the countries of the South Pacific about the possibility of radioactive contamination in the region as a result of these underground tests;

Whereas the members of the South Pacific Forum agreed at the Forum's annual meeting in July 1991 to "give consideration to an expanded programme of opposition to France's nuclear testing in the region";

Whereas despite French claims that its nuclear testing program is absolutely safe, there is some scientific evidence to suggest both that some radioactive leakage has already occurred at the testing site and that additional, more serious leakage might occur in the next 10 to 100 years;

Whereas there is also concern in the region that the Moruroa atoll is in danger of disintegration as a result of the testing program; and

Whereas the Government of France would have the option of using United States nuclear testing facilities if it gave up testing in the South Pacific: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that the United States should recognize the concerns of the people of the South Pacific and call upon the Government of France to cease all nuclear testing at Moruroa and Fangataufa Atolls.

H.R. 3636

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Nuclear Testing Moratorium Act".

SEC. 2. ONE-YEAR MORATORIUM.

During the one-year period beginning on the date of the enactment of this Act, the Secretary of Energy may not conduct any explosive nuclear weapons test unless the President certifies to Congress that the Soviet Union (or a successor state of any part of the Soviet Union) has conducted an explosive nuclear weapons test during that period.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Washington, DC, April 8, 1992.

HON. FRANCOIS MITTERRAND,
President, Government of France,
Paris, France

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I was overjoyed to hear today, through Premier Pierre Berezgoy's address to the National Assembly, that you have made the decision to suspend for 1992 France's nuclear testing program in French Polynesia.

Truly, the nuclear testing moratorium is a monumental step forward for the nation of France, the peoples of the South Pacific and the countries of the world.

Three years ago, you courageously pronounced that France would stop her nuclear testing program in the South Pacific if the United States, the former Soviet Union and others would stop their programs. As a Member of Congress and the House Foreign Affairs Committee, I took your offer to stop nuclear madness to the floor of the House of Representatives. In a speech on May 25, 1989, I strongly urged the United States to follow France's lead in stopping the destructive practice of nuclear testing.

Since then the world has changed greatly, and, surprisingly, for the better. President Yeltsin has boldly enforced a unilateral moratorium on nuclear testing in Russia/CIS. In the United States, Congress has current legislation (H.R. 3636) calling for a one year nuclear testing moratorium. This measure, of which I am a co-sponsor, has widespread support and momentum for passage can only grow with France's recent action.

Mr. President, I applaud your strength and leadership in enacting France's nuclear testing moratorium. It is through such decisive action, and not mere rhetoric, that the nuclear powers of the world shall inevitably be forced to reach accords for nuclear disarmament and limitation. History shall record that the world was made a safer place for us, our children and generations to come through the vision of men such as yourself.

With kindest personal regards,

Sincerely,

ENI F.H. FALEOMAVAEGA,
Member of Congress.

FRANCE SUSPENDS ITS TESTING OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS

(By Alan Riding)

PARIS.—France announced today that it was suspending its 32-year-old program of nuclear weapons testing in the South Pacific until the end of this year and suggested that it would extend the moratorium in 1993 if other nuclear powers followed suit.

In his first address to Parliament since taking office last week, Prime Minister Pierre Bérégovoy said President Francois Mitterrand had written to leaders of the other nuclear powers urging them to conclude their strategic disarmament negotiations and halt nuclear testing.

He added that France would retain its independent nuclear deterrent as "the keystone of our defense policy," but would continue to press for global arms reductions. "In 1993, we will see if our example is followed and if common sense has advanced," he said.

While the French decision is a direct result of the end of the cold war, the announcement was immediately interpreted here as a move by the Socialist Government to court two fast-growing environmental parties, which have long opposed France's nuclear testing policy.

In regional elections last month, the two parties, the Greens Generation Ecologie, won 13.9 percent of the vote against just 18.3 percent for the Socialists. The Government's defeat prompted Mr. Mitterrand to dismiss Edith Cresson as Prime Minister and name Mr. Bérégovoy in her place.

With parliamentary elections 11 months away, the main conservative coalition currently looks likely to win a big victory, but political experts say they believe that the Socialists have a small possibility of retaining power if they can form a coalition with the two environmental parties.

With an eye to next year's elections, Mr. Bérégovoy also pledged today to give priority to fighting unemployment, currently running at 9.9 percent of the work force, and he reduced the sales tax on luxury goods from 22 percent to 18.6 percent to help the auto industry.

Aware of public disenchantment with the country's political class because of several corruption scandals, the new Prime Minister further announced plans to legislate against conflict of interest and to require officials to disclose their wealth.

The decision to suspend nuclear tests was predictably welcomed by the green parties as well as by Greenpeace, the international environmental group. "It's fantastic," Lena Hagelin, a Greenpeace director, said. "Now we hope to be able to work together to convince the remaining countries to follow France's example."

While Russia suspended its nuclear testing for one year last October, the United States and Britain have not adopted a similar policy. France, which exploded its first nuclear device over the Sahara in 1960, has carried out 196 nuclear tests in French Polynesia since 1966.

Over the last 17 years, all tests have taken place underground, with successive governments arguing they were needed to maintain France's nuclear deterrent. In recent years, an average of six tests have been held annually.

But the policy proved costly in diplomatic terms. France's relations with New Zealand touched rock bottom in 1985 after French agents sank a Greenpeace ship, Rainbow Warrior, in Auckland harbor as it prepared to travel to Muroroa atoll to protest a scheduled nuclear test.

THE FEDERAL INSURANCE SOLVENCY ACT OF 1992

HON. JOHN D. DINGELL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to introduce today the Federal Insurance Solvency Act of 1992.

When we buy insurance, we buy a promise—a promise to pay for hospital care in the event of a car accident or illness, to provide for a family's support and child education in the event of a parent's death, to provide an annuity for the retirement years—or any of the myriad other occurrences for which a person seeks protection. The purpose of this bill is to ensure that when a person buys insurance, the insurer keeps the promise of the insurer to pay.

We all know of the failures in the insurance industry in recent years. The collapse of Executive Life, Mutual Benefit, and others have caused great concern as to the stability of the insurance industry.

The business of insurance is, as I noted, the business of promises. An insurance company collects premiums today for payments it will make tomorrow. The essence of that transaction is trust: trust in the integrity of the insurer and trust in the system of regulation of the financial condition of the industry.

This trust, as has become even more clear over the last few years, is not always justified. For the past 4 years, the Energy and Commerce Subcommittee on Oversight and Invest-tigations has studied the causes of insurance company insolvencies. What we have discovered is that insurance companies can be inviting targets for mischief, scoundrels, and fraud.

The subcommittee has also looked at the financial condition of the insurance industry and the regulation of insurance companies under the State regulatory system. Insurance regulation has traditionally been within the purview of the States. But recently, even State insurance commissioners, through their voluntary association, the National Association of Insurance Commissioners [NAIC], have recognized that more is needed. This is why the NAIC has established a national program of solvency certification and regulation. Even the insurance commissioners recognize that the issue is not whether there will be national regulation, but how this national regulation will be done.

The NAIC argues that national regulation should be done through a voluntary organization that attempts to pressure States to adopt national standards for the industry. It seems to me that we should consider doing this national regulation in a more straightforward manner by the Federal Government. This would simplify the regulatory system, for those companies that choose this route, by providing a single, coherent system of financial regulation for those parts of the industry that are clearly in and affect interstate and foreign commerce. This will leave to the States the financial regulation of those companies that choose to stay in the State regulatory system, and allow the States to focus even more of their attention on the protection of insurance consumers through the such efforts as the regulation of market conduct. The NAIC is a voluntary organization. We would not allow the solvency of banks or savings and loan institutions, the safety of airline transportation, or the purity of our air and water, to be overseen by volunteers. The insurance industry is no different.

We recognize, at the same time, that State regulation is important and that many insurance companies may be satisfied with State supervision. That is why this bill creates a voluntary system by which insurance companies may, if they choose, come within the Federal regulatory orbit. This system will be open to large and small insurers alike. If they choose to obtain a Federal certificate of solvency, then they will be exempt from State regulation of their solvency and their financial condition, although other State regulatory requirements such as those which protect insurance consumers, will generally apply. Federally certified insurers will be members of a national insurance protection corporation so that in the event a member fails, the policyholders will be protected. However, this corporation will not be backed by the U.S. Government and the member insurers themselves will pay all claims. The rehabilitation and liquidation of federally certified insurers will be handled by the Commission.

This legislation acknowledges the global nature of the insurance and reinsurance industry. This is particularly true with respect to reinsurance. The $23 billion U.S. reinsurance market is the world's largest. With almost 1,800 foreign reinsurers accounting for over 40 percent of U.S. reinsurance premiums, only the Federal Government can set policy with these major international trading partners.

This sector of the insurance industry clearly needs to be regulated at a level of government that can adequately, forcefully, and legitimately address international trade issues. The issues involved in reinsurance regulation are not local. They are international, and include such vital national priorities as fair and open markets. Even more important for the sake of consumers, there must be sufficient access to reinsurance in the U.S. marketplace so that insurance is available and reasonably priced.

State regulators, though sincere in their efforts, simply lack the lawful jurisdiction and material resources to address these global economic issues. Investigations by my Oversight and Investigations Subcommittee has shown the inadequacy of a state-by-state approach of regulating the international components of the reinsurance business. The lack of uniformity in the State insurance codes, together with the fact that this business is conducted on an interstate and international basis, suggests that the Federal Government should regulate this part of the industry. By creating a single regulatory source for financial condition, with the resources, focus, and jurisdictional authority to adequately regulate this international marketplace, we can address the unique features inherent in the reinsurance mechanism.

The Federal Insurance Solvency Act ensures that U.S. insureds and reinsureds will have proper access to the vital insurance capacity of the international markets. This legislation, however, contains major new safeguards to protect American consumers of these insurers and reinsurers, including the establishment of significant financial standards, jurisdictional requirements, and reporting obligations on these entities.

This legislation will encourage financially sound international insurers and reinsurer to enter the U.S. market and continue to provide such essential coverages as medical malpractice, environmental liability, war risk, aviation and marine hull, cargo, and catastrophe reinsurance protection. It will, however, with its strict regulatory requirements, discourage bandits who have sought to prey on U.S. entities. The qualification requirements and the Commission's expansive investigatory authority will make the United States a much less attractive hunting ground for these elusive, and sometimes fraudulent, operators.

Mr. Speaker, I insert a more detailed explanation of the bill to follow my remarks. That statement sets forth the particular means by which this legislation would:

Establish Federal certificates of solvency for insurers;

Regulate reinsurance;

Set the parameters of Federal authority;

Establish a national insurance protection corporation;

Create a self-regulatory organization dealing with insurance agents or brokers; and Set Federal standards and procedures for rehabilitation and liquidation.

The insurance industry is very complex and we need to be sensitive to the complexity in crafting a new Federal regulatory system. Many details, and perhaps even major new issues, may well need to be examined as this process moves forward. I know that this bill will be much debated, and I look forward to that debate. I want to hear how this bill could be improved, and encourage those who care about this debate to join it.

Mr. Speaker, in the end, the debate on how to effectively regulate the insurance industry will revolve around a single question: How can we best protect the trust of American insurance consumers? Too often today, people say that government does not work. I believe that the American people expect us to make sure that it does work. And the work of insurance solvency regulation requires a Federal presence. The essence of this bill is to employ the good offices of the Federal Government to make sure that insurance promises, which have sometimes been failed promises, will be kept. And that that trust, once gained, is always deserved.

FEDERAL INSURANCE SOLVENCY ACT OF 1992

The Federal Insurance Solvency Act of 1992 establishes an independent regulatory agency to regulate the financial condition of insurance and reinsurance companies in the United States. Its purpose is to ensure that policyholders receive the coverage they pay for when they purchase insurance. This Commission, which is named the Federal Insurance Solvency Commission and is modeled on the Securities and Exchange Commission, will be the sole regulator of financial condition for the insurers and reinsurers that it certifies for solvency. The Commission will be self-funded and will carry out the functions specified below.

FEDERAL CERTIFICATES OF SOLVENCY FOR INSURERS

The Federal Insurance Solvency Commission will be authorized to grant Federal certificates of solvency to insurers which operate in the United States. The Commission will establish standards for these certificates that will include minimum capital and surplus requirements. The Commission will monitor the financial condition of certified insurers and their compliance with these standards, and will be authorized to suspend or revoke a certificate for failure to comply with the standards or if the insurer is no longer financially secure enough to continue to do business.

Federal certificates of solvency will be available for any insurers in interstate or foreign commerce, which may also choose to remain in the state regulatory system. The standards for a Federal certificate will vary depending on the size of the insurer, the type of business it does, and whether it is a domestic or foreign company. One of the main goals of the bill is to ensure that there will be sufficient insurance available in the U.S. marketplace so that policyholders will have reasonably priced insurance choices in a competitive environment. At the same time, while not favoring large or small companies or domestic or foreign companies, the standards and monitoring by the Commission will ensure that any federally certified insurer will be there at the end of the day to pay the policyholders for their claims, whether for personal injury arising from a car accident, replacing a home destroyed by a hurricane, or paying an annuity to a pensioner.

As noted, the Commission will be authorized to grant certificates of solvency to foreign insurers. Such certificates will require the foreign insurer to establish a Commission-approved trust fund in an amount adequate to ensure payment of U.S. policyholders. This extra level of protection from foreign insurers is necessary to ensure that the funds are there to pay U.S. policyholders in the event the foreign insurer has difficulty with its business outside the United States. These foreign insurers will also be required to submit to U.S. legal jurisdiction; to provide for a recipient for service of process in the U.S.; and to allow the Commission to review all corporate financial records if there is reason to believe the U.S. operations of the insurer company might be financially threatened by the insurer's non-U.S. operations.

A Federal certificate of solvency will authorize the insurer to write business throughout the United States with no other regulation of its financial condition by any State. A federally certified insurer will also be able to obtain from the Commission a certificate to provide reinsurance if it meets the additional standards to do so.

All federally certified reinsurers will be members of the National Insurance Protection Corporation. This Corporation will ensure the payment of claims on insurance policies in the event a federally certified insurer becomes financially impaired or insolvent.

CERTIFICATES TO PROVIDE REINSURANCE

As an important step in ensuring that policyholders have their claims paid, all insurers in the United States will be allowed to take credit for reinsurance only if the reinsurance is provided by a federally certified reinsurer. There are two ways to obtain a federal certificate to provide reinsurance.

First, a reinsurer may obtain a certificate to be a professional reinsurer. This certificate will be available to those reinsurers that do only the business of reinsurance—that is, they do not write direct insurance for policyholders. To obtain this certificate, the professional reinsurer will have to maintain a minimum of $50 million in capital and surplus. A reinsurer that obtains this type of reinsurance certificate will not be subject to any state regulation except for taxation and corporate governance.

Second, a Federal reinsurance certificate will also be available to any State-licensed insurer, to any insurer that holds a federal solvency certificate, and to foreign reinsurers. To obtain this reinsurance certificate, the applicant will have to meet higher capital and surplus requirements than are needed to provide insurance, and will have to submit to Commission regulation and monitoring of financial condition. In the alternative, applicants licensed to do the business of reinsurance in their State or country of domicile may obtain the certificate if they meet a different set of additional requirements, which include full funding of the risks they have covered in the United States, and, if appropriate, establishing an extra trust fund to guarantee payment on those risks. Both the funding and the trust fund will have to meet the standards set by the Commission, and the reinsurer will have to submit to the Commission oversight as to U.S. operations.

Holders of either type of reinsurance certificate will be subject to full monitoring of financial condition by the Commission. Foreign reinsurers that obtain reinsurance certificates will also be required to submit to U.S. legal jurisdiction; to provide for a recipient for service of process in the United States; and to allow the Commission to review all corporate financial records if there is reason to believe the U.S. operations of the reinsurer might be financially threatened by the reinsurers non-U.S. operations.

RELATIONSHIP OF FEDERALLY CERTIFIED INSURERS AND REINSURERS TO STATE REGULATORY AUTHORITY

Federally certified insurers will not be subject to any State regulation of financial condition because this will be regulated solely by the Commission. They will remain subject to the corporate governance and tax laws of the States in which they are domiciled and do business. If a State chooses to regulate the rates of insurers, such rates will apply to federally certified insurers. They will also be required to participate in State-established residual risk pools and will generally be subject to State market conduct and policy form regulation. Federally certified insurers will not participate in State guaranty funds because they will be members of the National Insurance Protection Corporation.

There will be a partial exception from certain State regulation for highly capitalized insurers that provide commercial insurance to large insurance buyers. The partial exception will be from state regulation of market conduct, rates, and forms. The Commission will be responsible for market conduct regulation for this type of insurance. There will be no regulation of rates and forms.

This exception will be available only for highly capitalized property and casualty insurers, that is, such insurers that have more than $50 million in net worth or in a trustee surplus account. Moreover, this exception will apply only when the highly capitalized insurer provides commercial insurance to a large insurance buyer. A large insurance buyer is a purchaser that has a net worth of at least $10 million. As to this commercial insurance, only beneficiaries, not the buyer, will be able to make claims against the National Insurance Protection Corporation in the event of the insurer's insolvency, and then only if the large insurance buyer is itself bankrupt. Otherwise, the buyer must pay all the insurance claims owed by the insolvent insurer.

States will be explicitly prohibited from discriminating against federally certified insurers as to taxes, rates, or any other regulatory activity. States will also be explicitly prohibited from imposing barriers to the withdrawal of an insurer from either a line of business or all business in a State. The Commission will be authorized to direct any State to stop any regulatory or other action that substantially threatens the financial soundness of federally certified insurers operating in that State.

Federally certified professional reinsurers will be subject to regulation by the appropriate States as to corporate governance and taxation. They will not be subject to state regulation as to their reinsurance activities.

Holders of Federal reinsurance certificates will be subject to regulation by the appropriate States as to corporate governance and taxation. If they obtain a federal solvency license to provide insurance, their sole regulator for financial condition will be the Commission. The reinsurance activities of federally certified insurers will not be subject to state regulation. Their insurance activities will remain subject to state regulation in the same manner as any other federally certified insurer. If the certified reinsurer does not obtain a federal solvency license, then it will remain fully subject to state insurance regulation.

NATIONAL INSURANCE PROTECTION CORPORATION

All federally certified insurers will be required to join a nationwide self-regulatory organization supervised by the Commission that will cover the claims of the policyholders and beneficiaries of those federally certified insurers that become insolvent. This organization, to be known as the National Insurance Protection Corporation [NIPC], will have an organizational structure, procedures, and requirements that are substantially similar to those of the Securities Investor Protection Corporation, which was established by the Securities Investor Protection Act of 1970 and operates under the supervision of the Securities and Exchange Commission. The Corporation will be prefunded by member insurers with risk-based assessments.

NIPC will be divided into three divisions: First, property and casualty insurance, which will include personal and commercial insurance except that sold to large insurance buyers; second, life and health insurance; and third, commercial insurance sold to large insurance buyers.

NIPC will have limits on the amount of recovery of a single claim. Categories 1 and 2 will each be divided into funds (a personal fund and a commercial fund for category 1; a life fund, a health fund, and an annuities fund for category 2). Claims will be paid first from the fund in a division that covers the type of claim. If that fund is insufficient, claims will be paid from the other fund in the division. Divisions and accounts may borrow from each other and the Corporation will be authorized to borrow to pay claims in the event funds are inadequate to cover current claims. The Corporation and its obligations will not be backed by the full faith and credit of the United States. The Corporation, and the accounts within it, must be repaid from assessments on member insurers of the account which was inadequate.

NIPC will be prefunded through assessments on member insurers, and assessments will be risk-based. The Corporation, with the approval of the Commission, will set a maximum that NIPC can collect through prefunding, as well as an annual cap on the amount of additional assessments that might be needed to cover the claims arising from insolvencies. Assessments will continue to be levied until the prefunded maximum is reached and, in the event of insolvencies, until claims are paid.

If a State imposes premium taxes on insurers, such State will be required to provide a premium tax offset or credit, or any other similar offset or credit, to the same extent that it provides such for assessments for its State guaranty fund.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF REGISTERED AGENTS AND BROKERS

Insurance agents and brokers will be allowed to become members of the National Association of Registered Agents and Brokers [NARAB]. The purpose of this organization will be to reduce duplicative regulatory requirements that are now imposed on agents and brokers that seek to do business in more than one State.

NARAB will be a nationwide self-regulatory organization that will operate under the supervision and oversight of the Commission, which will have the authority to review and modify its bylaws and rules. NARAB's organization, procedures, and requirements are substantially similar to those of the National Association of Securities Dealers, which was established pursuant to the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 and operates under the supervision of the Securities and Exchange Commission.

NARAB will have the authority to establish membership criteria as to the integrity, personal qualifications, education, training, and experience of members. States will continue to have the authority to regulate member agents and brokers as to those matters, such as market conduct, but will not be able to impose additional requirements in those areas subject to regulation by NARAB.

REHABILITATION AND LIQUIDATION

The Commission will be responsible for the rehabilitation and liquidation of all federally certified insurers and reinsurers. As to the federally certified foreign insurers and reinsurers, this authority will extend to the assets in the U.S. trust fund and the Commission will have legal authority to proceed against the foreign company in U.S. District Courts to recover any amounts due that exceed the assets in the trust fund.

State-licensed insurers which are not federally certified will be rehabilitated or liquidated by the responsible State regulator in the appropriate U.S. District Court. The procedures for rehabilitation and liquidation for state-licensed insurers will be those established by this Act for federally insurers and reinsurers.

COMMUNIQUE OF MEETING OF DEFENSE MINISTERS HELD AT NATO HEADQUARTERS IN BRUSSELS

HON. DANTE B. FASCELL

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, on the first of April NATO achieved another milestone at the meeting of defense ministers held at NATO headquarters in Brussels.

At that meeting, the NATO defense ministers and representatives of the former Soviet block, including representatives of 7 of the 11 republics of the Commonwealth of Independent States, established a long-range program designed to diminish tensions, enhance stability and improve the understanding and cooperation in the Euro-Atlantic area.

I commend the communique of that historic meeting for all my colleagues and to the American public for study and request that it be included in the RECORD. The communique follows:

STATEMENT ISSUED AT THE MEETING OF DEFENCE MINISTERS AT NATO HEADQUARTERS, BRUSSELS ON APRIL 1, 1992

(1) We NATO Defence Ministers and Representatives of Belgium, Canada, Denmark, Germany, Greece, Iceland, Italy, Luxembourg, Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, Spain, Turkey, United Kingdom, the United States, and the Defence Ministers and Representatives of Armenia, Azerbaijan, Belarus, Bulgaria, the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic, Estonia, Georgia, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, Moldova, Poland, Romania, Russia, Tajikistan, Ukraine and Uzbekistan met today in Brussels for the first time.¹ We considered how we could deepen dialogue and promote co-operation between us on issues that fall within the competence of Defence Ministers.

(2) Much has already been done to develop the partnership between our countries. The Rome Declaration of the North Atlantic Alliance and the Work Plan for Dialogue, Partnership and Co-operation of the North Atlantic Co-operation Council as well as bilateral contacts and exchanges in the defence field provide an excellent basis for further progress. Today, in a spirit of friendship and goodwill, we discussed the contribution which we, as Defence Ministers, can make to this process in order to promote our common objectives.

(3) The positive changes in the security environment of recent years have major implications for the organization of our defences. In this context, we are determined to achieve early entry into force without renegotiation and full implementation as soon as possible of the CFE Treaty and expect to see the Treaty in force by the time of the Helsinki Summit in July. In the interest of further strengthening security and stability in Europe, we also support the determination of the participants in the CFE IA negotiations to reach, in connection with the entry into force of the CFE Treaty, an agreement to limit the personnel strength of their conventional armed forces in time for the Helsinki Summit at the end of the CSCE meeting. We welcome the Open Skies Treaty and the Vienna CSBM Document 1992 as major new steps towards greater openness and confidence-building in the security field. Complementary bilateral and regional efforts aimed at achieving enhanced confidence and security can also make a positive contribution.

(4) We all agree on the importance of the safe, responsible and reliable control of the residual nuclear arsenals. We took note of the assurances given in this regard with respect to the reliability, security and single control of the nuclear weapons of the former Soviet Union. We equally took note of the intention of the states concerned to join the Treaty on Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons as soon as possible as non-nuclear weapons states. We confirm the need to ensure full respect for the Treaty and to contribute in all possible ways to efforts aimed at preventing proliferation of nuclear weapons and other weapons of mass destruction.

(5) Many of us are faced with major restructuring of defense efforts and some are addressing basic issues of defense organization and planning for the first time. All of us can benefit from an intensification of contacts and co-operation. It is therefore with satisfaction that we note the progress which has already been achieved through an extensive visits programme, discussions, courses and frequent military contacts at all levels. But more can and will be done. To this end our Chiefs of Defense Staff will meet on 10th April 1992 in the framework of the first Meeting of the Military Committee in Co-operation Session. It will be the beginning of a regular series of meetings at the highest military level.

(6) Furthermore we have agreed that:

A high level seminar on defense policy and management will be held covering the role and constitutional position of armed forces in democratic societies, as well as strategic concepts and their implementation; a key purpose will be to identify specific issues to be pursued during subsequent co-operation in defence related matters;

An initial workshop will address practical aspects of defence management and the reform and restructuring of armed forces. This will be followed up by several panel tours to capitals conducted by small groups of experts as well as by participation of co-operation partners in relevant NATO training;

A workshop will be held to provide an opportunity to share experiences and to identify the most suitable practices and work methods for the environmental clean-up of defence installations;

Small teams of civilian and military defence experts, drawn as appropriate from several Alliance countries, could be sent, on request, to countries desiring advice. These teams will be made available as quickly as possible to assist in Ministries of Defence or other areas in the defence establishment and will be prepared to stay in place as necessary. Detailed arrangements for meeting the needs of co-operation partners can be pursued in the Group on Defence Matters;

Further agreed activities of mutual interest in our field of responsibility will be organized in the framework of the Group on Defence Matters and reported to us or our representatives on a regular basis. The Group on Defence Matters could also act as a clearing house for proposals for co-operation in the defence field, including bilateral or multilateral activities not necessarily involving all of us.

The aim is not only to increase mutual understanding and confidence among us, but also to provide practical assistance on defence related matters at a time of profound transformation and transition. NATO members have promised to make available for this purpose the considerable expertise and experience they have developed in defence related issues. The list at annex, which is not intended to be exhaustive, provides an initial basis for discussion of areas for co-operation in defence related matters.

(7) We have entered a new era of partnership amongst our states. The resulting improved understanding and transparency will help develop patterns of co-operation and create conditions that encourage peaceful solutions to political problems. We are determined to grasp this opportunity to deepen our relationships, enhance security and contribute to the evolving process of a Europe whole and free. In our capacity as Defence Ministers we shall therefore play a full part in dialogue, partnership and co-operation. We shall meet to review the progress of work in the defence field annually or more frequently should circumstances warrant it.

AREAS FOR FURTHER COOPERATION IN DEFENCE RELATED MATTERS

The following is a list of possible areas for cooperation in defence related matters. There are various ways in which they could be addressed: seminars, workshops, panel tours, courses, bilateral or multi-lateral co-operation. Some topics will be most suited to military contacts, others dealt with primarily through civil channels; many will involve joint activities. As well as acting as a clearing house for proposals for co-operation, the Group on Defence Matters could also help organise activities in the following areas. The list is not intended to be exhaustive, but it could form the basis for a future work programme including practical activities.

Military strategies.—including discussion of concepts such as defensive sufficiency, stability, flexibility and crisis management;

Defence management.—the planning and management of defence programmes in democratic societies, to include accountability, financial planning, programme budgeting and management, research and development, equipment procurement procedures, personnel management.

The legal framework for military forces.—the establishment of a constitutional framework, the position of armed forces in a democracy, the democratic control of armed forces and civil-military relations, parliamentary accountability.

Harmonisation of defence planning and arms control.—the consequences of arms control for defence planning, the role of military forces in verification, proliferation, resource implications of CFE.

Exercises and training.—the philosophy, format, requirements and standards of training and exercises.

Defence education.—Organisation of education for both military and civilian defence personnel.

Reserve forces.—mix of active and reserve forces, force structures, training.

Environmental protection.—the military and the environment, protection, conservation, clean-up of facilities.

Air traffic control.—military contribution to air traffic management.

Search and rescue.—military contribution to search and rescue activities.

Military contribution to humanitarian aid.—practical experiences, planning, co-ordination, civil-military co-operation.

Military medicine.—organisation and practical issues (occupational health, preventive measures, hospital management, medical supply, education).

TRIBUTE TO ABRAHAM EPSTEIN

HON. TED WEISS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor the life and work of the late Abraham Epstein whose 100th birthday anniversary will be celebrated on April 20, 1992. Abraham Epstein was one of America's leading advocates of social security legislation and was a true pioneer of social justice. His renowned book, "Insecurity: A Challenge to America" is regarded as the primary source book in the field of social insurance. He was the executive secretary and founder of the American Association for Old Age Security which later became the American Association for Social Security. Mr. Epstein's work galvanized public opinion and made passage of social security legislation possible. He remained a strong advocate of health insurance and a reformed unemployment insurance system until his death in 1942. At the time, he had been working on a plan for postwar social security to adapt the system to meet the specific needs of a society in the process of demobilization.

Mr. Epstein was born in Russia and emigrated to the United States in 1910. He graduated from the University of Pittsburgh and later studied at Columbia University. He was an acclaimed lecturer on social insurance at New York University and Brooklyn College.

Before founding the American Association for Social Security, Mr. Epstein was research director of the Pennsylvania Commission on Old Age Pensions and he organized and served as secretary of the Workers Education Bureau of America. His concern for social issues and justice led him abroad to study economic and social conditions in Germany and Russia. Mr. Epstein also acted as the American representative to the Social Insurance Commission of the International Labor Office from 1934 until 1937 and was a consulting economist for the Social Security Board as well as an executive board member of the New York City Affairs Committee.

Abraham Epstein dedicated his life to the fight for social security, health insurance and other pertinent social causes. His work played a significant role in shaping the programs and politics of the social assistance system in the United States today. His sudden death in 1942 cut short a brilliant and successful career. Today, I join Abraham Epstein's sister Esther, wife Henriette, and son Pierre in honoring and celebrating the life and work of this exceptional social pioneer.

NATIONAL FORMER PRISONER OF WAR RECOGNITION DAY

HON. BOB McEWEN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. McEWEN. Mr. Speaker, it was with deep honor and much gratitude that I had the opportunity, earlier today, to address the gathering of the American Ex-Prisoners of War in Statuary Hall in the Capitol, to again call national attention to the unique sacrifices, suffering, pain, and hardship endured by those brave Americans who were prisoners of war.

As we have learned from their stories of captivity in enemy hands, the dangers of combat did not end with their capture. Rather, many were forced to undergo cruel treatment in unhealthy conditions.

In steaming, dehydrating Pacific and South East Asian jungles—in the freezing cold wintertime of Korea and Central Europe—and, as many of us suspected, and was recently confirmed, in the harsh wastes of Soviet Siberian concentration camps—our former prisoners of war were forced to face unusual punishment under the roughest of conditions.

Rather than the sudden shock of combat, they often were forced to deal, on a daily basis, with a brutal enemy. For many, the suffering was endured for years at a time. Sadly, many of their comrades did not survive.

National Former Prisoners of War Recognition Day honors not just those who were captured, but also their families, who lived long months, and even years, in uncertainty.

This day of national recognition cannot fully reward, nor adequately express our appreciation for these special Americans. But, it is an expression of thanks to them, and it sends a strong message that we will never forget their extraordinary bravery under the most difficult circumstances.

PAULETTE COVIN, HONORED TEACHER

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to recognize Paulette Covin, who has been honored by the Dade County public school system as being one of its best educators. She was one of 7 candidates to be chosen to compete for the Golden Apple Award for Dade's best teacher of 1991-92.

Ms. Covin is an English teacher at Drew Middle School who has dedicated 11 years to her dream. She was recently featured in the Miami Herald for her extraordinary dedication to teaching. The article "She's Fulfilled a Life-long Dream" follows:

As a child, Paulette Covin always emulated the role of a teacher. She knew when she was little that she wanted to educate others.

"As a kid growing up, I was always the one to be a teacher," said the language arts teacher at Charles Drew Middle, 1801 NW 60th St. "I had all the toys."

For 11 years, Covin, 33, has been teaching English and reading to Drew Middle School students.

"I love the way my life has been going," she said, "I was sent here for a purpose. I plan to fulfill that purpose—to educate our children. I want them to have a purpose in life."

Mr. Speaker, I commend Paulette Covin for her outstanding commitment to education. Her devotion to helping students have a purpose in life demonstrates her exceptionalism as a teacher

PUT BUSINESS OF RUNNING PRISONS BACK IN THE HANDS OF STATE PRISON OFFICIAL

HON. PETE GEREN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. GEREN of Texas. Mr. Speaker, crime is one of the biggest problems facing communities all around this Nation. Not a day goes by that we don't hear from our constituents about the growing incidents of crime in their neighborhoods. Parents are afraid to let their children walk to school alone, the elderly are afraid to leave their homes, and men and women are afraid to walk outside after dark. Freedom is the greatest right shared by all Americans, Mr. Speaker, but all too often, Americans have lost this freedom because they are afraid of becoming another victim of crime. And why shouldn't they be afraid when convicted rapists and murderers are serving, on average, 6 and 7 years, of their sentences respectively.

You would think that we would be doing everything we can to make sure that the people that commit crimes pay their debt to society. But, unfortunately, many States have had their efforts to combat crime hampered by the Federal courts. The demand for increased prison space has never been greater, but as we all know, construction of new prisons is extremely expensive and is often politically charged. According to the Criminal Justice Institute, 27 States have one or more of their prisons operating under a population cap or limit imposed by the Federal courts. Removing these population caps would result in a direct increase of available beds for prisoners at an overall savings to the taxpayer.

Currently, State prison systems around this country are operating, on average, at 115 percent of capacity. However, the Federal prison system, which is not bound by any court orders establishing prison population limits, is operating at 165 percent of capacity. According to the U.S. Department of Justice, if State prison systems were allowed to operate at the same capacity as their Federal counterparts, an additional 268,000 beds would become available at a savings of $13 billion.

Unfortunately, criminals are well aware of the situation with the prisons of our country. They know that in most cases, if they are caught and convicted, the sentence that they will be given is not the maximum sentence that the crime could bring because of the shortage of prison space. And in most cases, they will never even serve the full time of the sentence imposed because States have to abide by burdensome Federal court restrictions on prison space. My own State of Texas is a case in point, where criminals convicted of violent crimes serve an average of only 23 days for every year of their sentence.

Crime is becoming more attractive every day because the deterrent has become less and less.

Mr. Speaker, these criminals are not being released early for good behavior. They are being released to make room for others. The need for increased prison space is growing every day. But instead of filling Texas prisons to 100 percent of their capacity, the State prison system is now operating under a Federal court consent decree that establishes a 95-percent cap on prison populations. If we were allowed to operate at just 5 percent more, or 100 percent, it would mean an additional 2,517 prison beds in Texas.

Tomorrow, the Texas Board of Criminal Justice will decide whether to allow the early release of 2,900 inmates to provide space for new prisoners. If this population cap were removed 85 percent of those considered for early release would remain in prison to serve our their term. We have all heard the horror stories of convicted murderers being let out of prison early only to murder again. How many horror stories do we have to hear before we do something to correct the situation?

Mr. Speaker, today I am joined by Congressman BUD CRAMER of Alabama in introducing legislation to remove the Federal courts jurisdiction from hearing any cases dealing with inmate capacity of State penal or correctional institutions. The legislation would limit original jurisdiction and the appeal of these cases to the State courts, with ultimate appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court. Our legislation will put the business of running prisons back where it belongs—in the hands of State prison officials.

States are well equipped to determine the proper capacity rates of their respective prison systems while still guaranteeing the constitutional rights of inmates housed within the system. This legislation does not give prison officials the authority to act with indifference to the rights of inmates, and does not effect a person's right to appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court to ensure that the constitutional rights of prison inmates are protected. However, it tells the Federal courts, in no uncertain terms, that they will no longer be able to unfairly tie the hands of State prison officials.

The Federal courts should not have the authority to force prison officials to improve prison conditions beyond the basic necessities required by the Constitution, and the Constitution does not mandate comfortable prisons. However, many States including Texas are now operating under court orders or consent decrees that impose conditions on prisons that go well beyond the requirements of the Constitution.

Our legislation has received the endorsements of groups whose names alone bear testimony to the situation in our Nation. Groups like Parents of Murdered Children, Justice for Murder Victims, Justice for Homicide Victims, Inc., and Citizens for Law and Order. These groups represent the opinions of the citizens of this country. They want something done that will allow them to breathe a little easier when their children go out to play or when they go for a walk after dark. Let's show them that we are serious about our war on crime and keep prisoners where they belong—in prison.

Our legislation is certainly not a cure-all, Mr. Speaker, but it's a step in the right direction and I urge all my colleagues to support Mr. CRAMER in this endeavor.

PUT BUSINESS OF RUNNING PRISONS BACK IN THE HANDS OF STATE PRISON OFFICIALS

HON. BUD CRAMER

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. CRAMER. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the bill introduced by my colleague from Texas [Mr. GEREN].

This bill is supported and endorsed by groups like Parents of Murdered Children, Justice for Murder Victims, and Justice for Homicide Victims, Inc. This bill is a solace for the relatives of slain innocent victims. Of course, it will not bring back their loved ones, but it can help ensure that those guilty of committing a heinous crime will do their time.

Crime is a growing blight on society. It knows no borders and does not discriminate. It is causing people to fear sitting on their porch at night or letting their children play in the park or walk to school alone.

The bill we are introducing is not a panacea to this problem. However, it does render assistance to several States. Several States have one or more of their prisons operating under a population cap or limit imposed by the Federal courts.

Currently, State prison systems around this country are operating, on average, at 115 percent of capacity. However, the Federal prison system, which is not bound by any court order establishing prison population limits, is operating at 165 percent of capacity. According to the U.S. Department of Justice, if State prison systems were allowed to operate at the same capacity as their Federal counterparts, an additional 268,000 beds would become available at a savings of $13 billion.

The question is, Mr. Speaker, do we allow convicted felons to go free because of a population cap that is not related to the heinous nature of their crime? Do we allow murderers to go free to murder again? The answer is no.

This bill would prohibit the Federal district courts from having jurisdiction over any action to determine questions regarding the inmate capacity of any State penal or correctional institution. The bill would limit original jurisdiction and the appeal of these cases to the State courts, with ultimate appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court.

This legislation does not give prison officials the authority to act with indifference to the rights of inmates, and does not affect a person's right to appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court to ensure that the constitutional rights of prison inmates are protected.

I urge my colleagues to seriously review this issue and work with us to make our communities safe.

TRIBUTE TO MR. JERRY GILMORE

HON. MARTIN FROST

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to bring recognition to Mr. Jerry Gilmore, who will be honored on April 21st for his 16 years of service as a member of the Dallas County Community College District Board of Trustees.

Jerry is someone I know personally and hold in the highest regard and personal respect. His work as a public servant has been commendable. He has given of his time and intellect to serve Dallas County.

During his term of service as trustee, he served as Vice Chairman from 1978-80 and twice as Chairman of the Board, 1980-82 and 1984-86. In the 16 years in which he served as fiduciary officer, 6 of the 10 existing DCCCD facilities were opened: Cedar Valley College, North Lake College, Brookhaven College, the District Service Center, the Bill J. Priest Institute for Economic Development, and the R. Jan LeCroy Center for Educational Telecommunications.

While serving his tenure on the board with four DCCCD Chancellors—Bill J. Priest, R. Jan LeCroy, Lawrence W. Tyree, and J. William Wenrich—and interim Chancellor Ted B. Hughes, Jerry gained the respect of many. He is appreciated within the Dallas County Community College District and throughout his constituency for his genuineness, deep concern for the welfare of students, sense of humor and his clear understanding of the role of trustee as policymaker and custodian of the public trust.

I would like to offer congratulations to Jerry for his excellent service on the Dallas County Community College District Board of Trustees. I am certain that he will continue to be active in the community, and look forward to working with him in the years ahead.

PATENT SYSTEM HARMONIZATION ACT OF 1992

HON. WILLIAM J. HUGHES

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, today Representative MOORHEAD, the ranking Republican on the Judiciary Subcommittee on Intellectual Property and Judicial Administration, and I are introducing a bill that would improve intellectual property protection world-wide and would harmonize our patent system with patent systems of the rest of the world.

The United States leads the world in technological innovation. Regrettably, some countries are not providing fair and adequate protection for American inventions. Last year, my subcommittee held 2 days of hearings to examine how best to protect American intellectual property world-wide. We are closely monitoring multinational and bilateral efforts to harmonize our patent law and improve protection abroad.

There could be much to gain from international harmonization of our patent laws. For example, it would be very much in the United States' interest for other countries to reduce the time it takes to review patent applications. A harmonization treaty could also eliminate the cost that is involved in filing a different patent application in every country. However, as in any give and take exchange, harmonization would require changes in our American patent system.

Congress must consider whether a harmonization treaty, including both the changes to U.S. laws, and the changes in the laws that would be made by our sister countries, would overall benefit the American people. The bill that we are introducing today provides Congress with the opportunity to consider these changes in the event that a treaty is worked out. We would not, at this time, consider making these changes absent the concessions that the United States is seeking in the laws of other nations that are necessary to assure adequate and effective protection of intellectual property.

The Patent System Harmonization Act of 1992 anticipates the likely components of a harmonization treaty and reflects the ensuing changes that might be called for in our patent laws. These include a conversion to a first-to-file system; the recognition of prior user rights; the publication of patent applications 18 months after they are filed; and a change in the term of patents. These provisions will each be considered by the subcommittee.

First-to-file: The United States currently awards a patent to the first-to-invent. Most countries of the world, however, including those of Europe and Japan, operate on the basis of a first-to-file system. It is probable that the United States must agree to change to a first-to-file system if we are to have a patent harmonization treaty. Accordingly, if we do not want to change from the first-to-invent system we must be willing to forego the benefits of harmonization. Many American inventors already operate on a first-to-file basis in order to preserve their ability to obtain world-wide patent protection. Also, the Patent and Trademark Office estimates that, in most cases, it issues the patent to the inventor who is not only the first-to-invent, but who is also the first-to-file.

However, American inventors and American industry have raised serious concerns about the first-to-file system. In particular, inventors fear that legitimate innovators will not always win the race to the Patent Office because of inadequate resources to file a patent application. Consequently, the bill we are introducing today includes a provision that would allow inventors to file an inexpensive provisional application, whereby an inventor could pay a partial application fee to hold his or her place in line and secure an early priority date.

Prior user rights: The Patent System Harmonization Act would grant certain prior user rights to inventors who independently develop innovations that are included in another inventor's patent application. This is a secondary feature of a first-to-file patent system. The subcommittee will carefully examine whether prior user rights are in the public interest, and what the proper and fair scope of prior user rights should be in a first-to-file system.

Publication of patent applications after 18 months: This bill would provide for the publication of patents 18 months after they are filed. By contract, the United States currently keeps all information relating to a patent application confidential throughout the period that the application is pending. This enables individuals to maintain nonpatentable inventions as trade secrets. However, countries of Europe and Japan publish the patent applications 18 months after they are filed. American inventors do not have the same access to scientific and technological information that our foreign counterparts enjoy. Also, because European countries and Japan take much longer than the United States to determine whether to grant a patent, American inventors do not reap the benefits of confidentiality in the United States when they file abroad.

Expedited search and examination: Many inventors are concerned that publication of their patent applications will jeopardize their trade secret protection on inventions that turn out not to be patentable. Accordingly, the Patent System Harmonization Act contains procedures for expedited review and examination of a patent application. Under the procedures, an individual could learn whether the invention is patentable before the application is published, and could withdraw or abandon the application before 18 months in order to avoid having the information made public. This would be particularly useful for independent inventors and universities that may not seek worldwide protection for their inventions.

A 20-year patent term: The current patent term in the United States is 17 years. The Patent System Harmonization Act would provide for a 20-year patent term, consistent with a patent harmonization treaty. However, instead of beginning on the date that the patent is issued, the 20-year term would begin on the date that the patent application is filed. The bill further provides for protection for the provisional rights of the patent owner during the pendency of the application.

Senator DECONCINI, the chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Patents, Trademarks, and Copyright, will be introducing similar legislation in the Senate. The Subcommittee on Intellectual Property and Judicial Administration, which I chair, will hold joint hearings with our counterpart subcommittee on the Senate Judiciary Committee to consider this legislation. I look forward to working with Representative MOORHEAD and with my other colleagues on the Judiciary Committee in assessing the merits of the harmonization treaty and of the specific provisions of the Patent System Harmonization Act. In addition, our subcommittee will seek the views of members of the public, including the very inventors, commercial enterprises, and other organizations who use the intellectual property system to the betterment of our society.

I am hopeful that multilateral negotiations will produce a treaty that benefits the American people and improves the protection of intellectual property worldwide. By introducing this legislation today, we expect that Congress will be ready to promptly consider a final treaty agreement and any ensuing implementing legislation.

GEORGE WALTERS, HONORED
TEACHER

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to recognize George Walters, who has been honored by the Dade County public school system as being one of its best educators. He was one of seven candidates to be chosen to compete for the Golden Apple Award for Dade's best teacher of 1991-92.

Mr. Walters is a music teacher at Hialeah Middle School whose jazz band has received great reviews under his guidance. He was recently featured in the Miami Herald for his extraordinary dedication to teaching. The article "Music Instructor Credits Students" follows:

With waves of his hand, George Walters conducts a symphony as if he were climbing a ladder—up to the altos, then down to the baritones.

"I need more from the tubas and the trombones," the music teacher told his students. "Accent that note."

Being nominated for teacher of the year is a great honor, but credit belongs to the students, said Walters, who teaches at Hialeah Middle School, 6027 E. Seventh Ave.

Under Walters' guidance, his jazz band has received superior marks from the Florida Bandmasters Association all eight years he has been teaching there.

Mr. Speaker, I commend George Walters for his outstanding commitment to education. His devotion to helping students understand the beauty of music demonstrates his exceptionalism as a teacher.

GENDER EQUITY IN AMERICA'S SCHOOLS

HON. DICK SWETT

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. SWETT. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express great concern about a serious situation occurring in our Nation's schools. Recent studies by the American Association of University Women indicate that America's educational system is not equally meeting the needs of both male and female students. Although girls and boys are approximately equal in their abilities when they enter school, upon graduation 12 years later, girls have fallen well behind their male counterparts in academic areas such as math. As a result, they have also suffered a greater loss of self-esteem.

Under title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972, discrimination by sex is illegal in any education program that is federally funded. Enforcement of title IX should be a priority in order to ensure every girl a fair chance to obtain an equal education. But apparently, it is not. In 1990, researchers found that 37 percent of district administrators in 21 States not only had not complied with title IX to any extent, but also felt there was no need to address the issue of educational equity between boys and girls in schools.

Mr. Speaker, a number of suggestions have been made as to how these differences arise. Starting in preschool, girls are separated from boys because girls at that age are found to display a higher development of motor skills. Boys usually require more help, and thus demand more attention from the teacher. Researchers Myra and David Sadker have studied this pattern for many years. One of their findings was that boys were more apt to call out in class, eight times more apt than girls. When a boy spoke out, the teacher listened to him and responded to his remarks, but when a girl called out in class, she was told to raise her hand if she wished to speak.

The problem of poor self-esteem which girls suffer from stems in part from the widespread sexual harassment they encounter in junior high and high schools. One study found that 65 percent of female high school students in vocational courses reported harassment by male classmates and even by some teachers.

Girls are rated when they walk into classes, are made to feel inadequate when they are the only girl in a class, and are teased to the point of tears by boys thinking it is all in fun. Contrary to the opinions of these boys, as well as to school personnel, this behavior is not funny. This situation should not be judged as boys being boys. Girls need to feel secure in order to achieve in an educational setting. Sexual harassment is also prohibited under title IX and that prohibition should, likewise, be enforced.

Many recommendations have been made as to how to solve the gender equity problem. Title IX guidelines ensuring this equality should be strictly enforced. School curriculum should include some course work on gender issues and encourage new research on women's issues. Women should be given greater opportunities to participate on education reform boards and commissions. Finally, school administrators should create and enforce a policy against sexual harassment in the school system.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to work with our Nation's educators to find ways to address this serious inequity. We must find ways to ensure an educational environment that is gender equitable and, hence, will give young American girls a better chance for the future.

TRIBUTE TO REAR ADM. JAMES PERKINS III

HON. BEN GARRIDO BLAZ

OF GUAM

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. BLAZ. Mr. Speaker, on the 28th of this month, a typical change of command will take place in the Territory of Guam during which the Commander of Naval Forces, Marianas, will be relieved following a typical 2-year tour. But, what is not typical about this particular change of command is the fact that an extraordinary officer will be leaving behind a commendable list of accomplishments over a relatively brief of time.

Admiral Perkins is from a new breed of flag officers who are not only technically proficient in their individual professional responsibilities but widely versed and aware of the dynamics, strategically, politically and economically, of the region in which they serve. It would not be inaccurate to say that more changes have conspired in the political, cultural, and security aspects of activities in this region over the past 2 years than any similar period in recent history.

Both as Commander of Naval Forces in the Marianas and the representative of the Commander-in-Chief, Pacific, Admiral Perkins devoted much of his energy to understanding the problems of the region, to helping find solutions to those problems and to anticipating and projecting the region's potential. Although he had to address his military responsibilities within a highly politicized environment, he skillfully managed to advocate the interests of the Navy and the Department of Defense while at the same time ensuring an excellent working relationship with the leaders in the community and countries in the region.

From a personal standpoint, I have had the privilege of knowing virtually every officer who has served as Commander of Naval Forces in the Marianas since it was established following World War II. I can state, without reservation, that Admiral Perkins has served as well as the best of them and has exceeded the performance of most of them. In this day of rapidly changing national and international relationships, it is very comforting and reassuring that our country has senior officers of his stature in highly responsible positions serving our country in an ever widening array of responsibilities.

I have come to this floor today to pay tribute to this outstanding officer for a superb performance. This tribute is the most I can offer my friend as he departs for another assignment, but it is the least that he deserves.

Adios, Admirante. Thank you, maraming salamat po, and dangkulo na y Si Yuus Maese.

ORPHAN DRUG AMENDMENTS OF 1992

HON. HENRY A. WAXMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to join my distinguished colleague, Mr. STUDDS, in introducing the Orphan Drug Amendments of 1992.

In order to protect consumers, the Federal Government, and other institutional purchasers of orphan drugs from paying unreasonably high prices, this bill is necessary.

The Orphan Drug Act has been a tremendous success in stimulating research on drugs for rare diseases. Orphan drugs are drugs that have so little prospect of profit that they would not be developed without the incentives of the Orphan Drug Act. They are called orphans because they had no parents to sponsor them.

The purpose of the act was to create incentives—in the form of tax breaks, grants, and market exclusivity—for research and marketing of orphan drugs. The most important incentive is the 7-year protection against competition. Under the act, 500 orphan drugs have been designated for research and 60 orphan drugs have been approved for marketing.

In addition to the drugs for which it was intended, the Orphan Drug Act has been used as a shield against competition by some of the most profitable drugs that have been developed in recent years. For example, it is estimated that by the end of 1991, Genentech will have reaped almost $600 million in sales from human growth hormone. Human growth hormone is used to treat a thyroid deficiency in children who are not growing normally.

Another example is Amgen's drug, EPO, which generated approximately $900 million in sales during its first 2½ years on the market. EPO is used for patients on kidney dialysis and its principal purchaser is the Federal Government. There are three other drugs which have been given market exclusivity under the Orphan Drug Act and which are reaping between $50 and $100 million in sales each year.

That is not the end of the story; it is only the beginning. Equally troubling is the fact that there are a significant number of other potential blockbuster orphan drugs in the pipeline.

The bill that Mr. STUDDS and I are introducing today would refine the Orphan Drug Act to provide that a product loses the market exclusivity conferred by the Orphan Drug Act if its total sales exceed $200 million, unless research costs are greater than sales. For orphan drugs, $200 million in sales will lead to substantial profits, and certainly to profits that provide a sufficient incentive to continue to stimulate the production of orphan drugs. The vast majority of drugs that have qualified for orphan drug status under the law will not be affected.

Mr. Speaker, the original Orphan Drug Act, adopted in 1983, required a showing that the drug would not be profitable in order to take advantage of the market exclusivity and other incentives of the Orphan Drug Act. The 1983 act was too restrictive; it did not stimulate research into orphan drugs. In 1985, the definition of orphan drug was changed so that potential profit was no longer an issue. Instead, a drug qualifies as an orphan drug if it is designed to treat a patient population of fewer than 200,000 patients. The 1985 amendments were successful in stimulating research on orphan drugs. But the 1985 amendments were too broad in that it confers orphan drug status on drugs that plainly would have been developed without the incentives of the Orphan Drug Act.

The bill being introduced today strikes the appropriate middle ground. The vast majority of orphan drugs will not be affected because they generate sales far under $200 million. But the small number of extraordinarily profitable orphan drugs will lose their market exclusivity once sales exceed $200 million. This will allow for competition in these important markets which should lower the prices of these drugs. The resulting benefits will flow to consumers, the Federal Government, and other institutions that purchase drugs.

THE INTRODUCTION OF THE STATE MARITIME ACADEMY CADET LICENSING RELIEF ACT OF 1992

HON. JACK FIELDS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to introduce today a bill to provide relief to the young men and women who attend our state maritime academies.

Regrettably, during the last Congress, the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act removed long-standing prohibitions against the collection of certain Coast Guard user fees.

In response to this legislation, the Coast Guard has proposed a number of new fees, including one for issuing licenses for our Nation's merchant mariners. Under the Coast Guard's proposed rule, those who seek to work in our maritime industry would have to pay fees up to $500 to obtain their maritime licenses.

While I oppose establishing any fee or charge for the issuance of a license, I am particularly distressed that there are no exemptions from these fees, and that they will apply to cadets graduating from our State maritime academies.

These cadets, who normally take a licensing examination with 3 months of graduation, do not have the financial resources to pay these onerous fees. They have just completed 4 years of college, have spent thousands of dollars on college expenses, and have yet to earn a penny in their chosen profession.

In addition, unlike students enrolled at our National Service academies, cadets at our six State maritime academies which are: Texas A&M University at Galveston, the California Maritime Academy, the Great Lakes Regional Maritime Academy, the Maine Maritime Academy, the Massachusetts Maritime Academy, and the New York Maritime Academy pay tuition and receive no income while attending school.

Mr. Speaker, these fees place a heavy burden on these cadets at a time when they can least afford it. These fees, if implemented, would serve a powerful disincentive to those contemplating a career in the U.S. maritime industry. Also, the implementation of these fees would be unfair, in that other transportation professionals, like airline pilots and train engineers, do not pay licensing or examination fees.

While these fees will do little to reduce our Federal deficit, they will cause tremendous pain for our State maritime academy graduates as well as the U.S. merchant marine industry, which is struggling for its survival.

In testimony before the House Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, the superintendents of the State maritime academies stated that "it is unconscionable to mandate to young men and women who pay for an education which clearly supports our national security to take and pass a licensing exam, and then charge them a fee to take it. In essence, the user fee is a graduation tax which is exorbitant in relation to an entry level cadet's income history."

These superintendents strongly recommended that the user fees for licenses be waived for all cadets taking an entry level examination, and Mr. Speaker, that is the purpose of this legislation.

Under my bill, the approximately 2,600 cadets who graduate each year from our six State maritime academies would not have to pay for their initial, entry-level license fees. While my bill would reduce annual Federal revenues by about $250,000, it is a sound investment in these men and women who will help revitalize our maritime industry.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to join Representatives BILLY TAUZIN, BOB DAVIS, NORM LENT, OLYMPIA SNOWE and me in support of the State Maritime Academy Cadet Licensing Relief Act of 1992.

NATIONAL RECYCLING DAY

HON. LOUISE M. SLAUGHTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Ms. SLAUGHTER. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be a cosponsor of House Joint Resolution 396, designating April 15, 1992, as National Recycling Day. On that day we should remind ourselves about and renew our commitment to the importance of recycling.

Decades ago, trash was simply taken to the town dump. It was piled into a pit that soon became a giant hill, to be visited by animals in search of food. Eventually, the dump was abandoned and another one started. Ignorance was bliss, and people did not see a problem.

Today, knowledge has banished ignorance and we are looking beyond dumps. But as old dumps are closed, new landfills often cannot be opened to receive the debris of our society. We no longer have the space or the ability to overlook the environmental and health effects from improperly controlled landfills.

Incineration is also not the final answer for how to get rid of our trash. Burning creates sometimes toxic ash, which must still be disposed of, as well as additional air pollution.

So society has returned to an old idea: recycling.

I am proud that the communities in my congressional district have begun aggressive curbside recycling programs. I participate at home, and also recycle cans, bottles, and paper in my offices.

The Kenneth B. Keating Federal Building in Rochester, the location of my district office, is a shining example of recycling in action. All agencies in that building have joined a recycling program which is continually processing more material: 6,320 pounds last month, up from 2,300 pounds in August 1991. I applaud these efforts to decrease our landfill waste.

Like many others, I have switched to using recycled paper and stationery, and I have initiated and supported initiatives to expand recycling on Capitol Hill. It is a timely acknowledgement of National Recycling Day to note that this statement will probably appear on recycled newsprint in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which will be using only recycled paper by the end of April. This switch will save money, as well as natural resources.

To broaden the market for recycled goods, I have introduced the Recycling Initiatives Grant Act which will offer the first Federal grants to support the creation of innovative methods of recycling, and marketing or transporting recycled goods. Our goal is to disseminate information about techniques that have the potential to help communities across the Nation.

In order to preserve our precious environment, we must make changes now to stop degradation and restore what we have polluted. Recycling is cost-effective, energy efficient, and resource conserving, and it will be a centerpiece of any energy, economic, and environmental policy of the future.

I am proud to represent constituents who take recycling seriously and are committed to changing their habits and attitudes for the benefit of our environment. National Recycling

Day is an appropriate occasion to recognize their efforts.

THE NEW HAMPSHIRE-MAINE INTERSTATE SCHOOL COMPACT

HON. THOMAS H. ANDREWS

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. ANDREWS of Maine. Mr. Speaker, education of our youth is a critical issue. Towns across this Nation are finding it more difficult to offer programs due to budget cuts. Budget cuts have a ripple effect on students, teachers, and our Nation's economic future. Because of escalating costs in educating our youth, in addition to decreased revenues, communities are forced to look for creative alternatives to educate their children properly. At Federal, State and local levels, we must invest time and dollars in education now, to help students gain the skills necessary to succeed.

Acton, a small town in my district of Maine, has experienced a population boom. In fact, its secondary school population has doubled since the 1960's and is expected to double again within the next 10 years. Acton students currently attend Wells High School, which is part of the Wells-Ogunquit Community School District. While the quality of education provided to Acton students has been excellent, concerns have been raised about the long hours of travel between Acton and the Wells-Ogunquit area, the high transportation costs incurred, and the difficulty students encounter in trying to participate in extracurricular activities. Furthermore, additional questions have surfaced over whether or not the State tuition rate is adequate to meet rising costs for expanded high school facilities at Wells High School.

Interaction between State school districts is becoming an alternative for communities to explore. The Maine State Department of Education has informed me that Acton has discussed possible educational options, such as an interstate school, for its secondary students with the towns of Wakefield and Milton, NH. Both towns have indicated they would welcome having Acton as a part of their school district. Obviously, there are a number of complex issues in the formation of an interstate school district, such as State required curriculums, tuition arrangements, and special and vocational education. Unfortunately, the primary obstacle to the formation of an interstate school district is the absence of a congressional ratification of the New Hampshire-Maine interstate school compact.

Mr. Speaker, today I am pleased to introduce with my colleagues, Congresspersons SWETT, SNOWE, and ZELIFF, a bill granting the consent of Congress to the New Hampshire-Maine interstate school compact. This is a result of working with many people including the Maine State Department of Education. In particular, I appreciate the hard work of Congressman DICK SWETT. I am excited about creating an opportunity for Maine and New Hampshire to combine resources and offer alternative means for educating students.

The purpose of this compact is to increase educational opportunities within the States of Maine and New Hampshire by encouraging the formation of interstate school districts. The intent of the legislation is to enable the towns in both States to determine if an interstate school is indeed feasible. The compact was originally passed and signed into law by both States in 1969. Granting congressional consent for this nonbinding compact will allow members of the communities in both States to discuss viable possibilities for such a school. It does not in any way commit or mandate any town to form a district or build a school.

It is imperative we encourage the expansion of educational opportunities for our youth through creative alternatives. Support for the New Hampshire-Maine interstate school compact will do just that.

DEMOCRACY AND DEMOCRATIC TRADITION ARE ALIVE AND WELL IN JAMAICA

HON. MERVYN M. DYMALLY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. DYMALLY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to recognize the transition of power which recently took place in Jamaica. That transition is, I believe, important for two fundamental reasons. One, it represents an end of the active political career of one of the most admired and respected men in world politics, Michael Manley. Second, that transition is very important because it once again demonstrates how democracy and a democratic tradition are alive and well in Jamaica.

Prime Minister Michael Manley is from one of Jamaica's leading political families. His father, Norman Manley, was a leader in Jamaica's pro-independence movement and one of the country's five national heroes. He also was founder of the People's National Party [PNP] which is the party currently in power. Never before has the PNP been headed by anyone other than a Manley. The demitting of Prime Minister Manley from office represents an historical moment both in Jamaican history, and, indeed, in the history of world politics in general.

There is no dispute that Michael Manley has been one of the 20th century's greatest leaders. He successfully led Jamaica to a path of free market, private sector-led growth and was a charismatic leader who inspired people both in Jamaica and elsewhere.

During the past 2½ years as prime minister, Michael Manley implemented sweeping market reforms and adjustment programs that liberalized the Jamaican economy and paved the way for foreign investment and rapid economic development. Jamaica has created the most attractive investment climate in the Caribbean and is the first Caribbean country to qualify for the enterprise for the Americas initiative and the Inter-American Development Banks; multi-lateral private sector development fund.

The peaceful transition of power is a tribute to Jamaica's long democratic tradition. Jamaica's ruling PNP chose a new prime minister strictly adhering to party rules and to the Jamaican Constitution. The democratic tradition in Jamaica remains strong and intact. Serious debate was allowed to occur yet in the end, all agreed to accept the winner of the contest and all agreed to serve for the good of the party and the country.

I would like to extend a personal congratulations to the victor of the campaign and Jamaica's new Prime Minister, P.J. Patterson. I am sure that during his administration Jamaica will continue to prosper economically and serve as a clear example of a functioning democracy which provides stability with a responsiveness to the needs of its citizens.

GLORIA MITCHELL YOUNG, HONORED TEACHER

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to recognize Gloria Mitchell Young, who has been honored by the Dade County public school system as being one of the best educators. She was 1 of 7 candidates to be chosen to compete for the Golden Apple Award for Dade's best teacher of 1991-92.

Ms. Mitchell is the director of a child-care center at the D.A. Dorsey Education Center for adult students. She was recently featured in the Miami Herald for her extraordinary dedication to teaching. The article "Community, Kids Are Her Priorities" follows:

Gloria Mitchell Young probably has enough credentials to work almost anywhere. But her heart remains devoted to the community and kids at the D.A. Dorsey Education Center in Liberty City.

Young is the director of a child-care center at the adult education school and trains adult students who want to be child-care center workers. At the Dorsey Center, adult students get training with children whose parents drop them off on the way to work.

Student Monica Ragin, 24, said Young is an excellent teacher. "She goes over with you step by step until you get it," Ragin said.

Mr. Speaker, I commend Gloria Mitchell Young for her outstanding commitment to education. Her devotion to helping adult students improve their lives demonstrates her exceptionalism as a teacher.

TRIBUTE TO DR. CHARLES HILDEBRANDT

HON. DICK SWETT

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. SWETT. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to an outstanding educator from my home State of New Hampshire—Dr. Charles Hildebrandt. Dr. Hildebrandt, a professor of sociology, is also the founder of the Holocaust Resource Center at Keene State College. The center houses one of the 15 largest collections of books on the Holocaust in the United States as well as a growing video collection. Later this month, the center will reopen in its recently renovated home, marking the first day of this year's national remembrance of the Holocaust.

In addition to his responsibilities as director of the Holocaust Resource Center, Dr. Hildebrandt has helped teachers throughout New England integrate the Holocaust into their regular educational curricula. He has also actively participated in Holocaust remembrance events over the past 15 years. Dr. Hildebrandt is deeply committed to the struggle for justice, and his work delineates for us the potential destructiveness of human intolerance.

Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues to join me today in congratulating Dr. Hildebrandt upon the reopening of the Holocaust Resource Center and particularly, in paying tribute to him for his outstanding work. By keeping alive the memory of the 6 million Jews and the 5 million other victims of the Holocaust, Dr. Hildebrandt reminds us of the need for human tolerance and social justice. George Bernard Shaw once said, "Life is not a 'brief candle.' It is a splendid torch that I want to make burn as brightly as possible before handing it on to future generations." Dr. Hildebrandt's life burns brightly, illuminating the minds of the people of New Hampshire. His efforts to establish and maintain the Holocaust Resource Center demonstrate his dedication to underlining the responsibility we all share to ensure that tragic events like the Holocaust are never repeated.

THE F-15 SALE AND ARMS CONTROL IN THE MIDDLE EAST

HON. MEL LEVINE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Speaker, today I will be sending a letter to the President with 236 of my colleagues urging him to refrain from formally notifying Congress of a rumored sale of 72 advanced F-15 fighter aircraft to Saudi Arabia. Congressional leaders who joined me in signing the letter include: Representative DANTE FASCELL, chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee; Representative WILLIAM BROOMFIELD, ranking minority member of the Foreign Affairs Committee; Representative DAVID OBEY, chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee on Foreign Operations; Representative MICKEY EDWARDS, ranking minority member of the Appropriations Subcommittee on Foreign Operations; Representative DAVID BONIOR, the majority whip; Representative NEWT GINGRICH, the minority whip; Representative VIN WEBER, secretary of the House Republican conference; Representative STENY HOYER, chairman of the Democratic caucus; Representative VIC FAZIO, vice-chairman of the Democratic caucus; and Representative BILL PAXON.

A sale of this nature does not serve America's long-term interest. Just over 1 year ago, American troops returned from the Gulf after defeating Saddam Hussein. Our sons and daughters were sent to fight a war in a region teaming with American and other Western manufactured armaments. But this administration just doesn't understand that by pumping billions of dollars' worth of America's best weaponry into the Persian Gulf region, it is more likely, not less, that American troops will one day have to return.

In the aftermath of the gulf war, there was a lot of pious talk from the Bush administration about Middle East arms control, but this has turned out to be just rhetoric.

The Bush administration's reckless approach to arms sales also ruins United States credibility to promote arms control issues with the new states of the former Soviet Union. Cash starved, the new Republics are expropriating Soviet military hardware that has been deployed on their territory and exporting it to dangerous countries like Syria and Iran. Our credibility to stop arms exporting countries from making these destabilizing arms sales is directly related to our own willingness to lead by example. Clearly, the Bush administration does not have the political will to do this.

I have inserted the full text of the letter for the RECORD. I also urge my colleagues to review the following editorial from The New York Times, "F-15 Sale: Wrong New World Order," March 8, 1992, which outlines the absurdity of a large-scale F-15 sale to the Saudis at a time when we have an historic opportunity to stem the flow of arms to this volatile region.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, April 9, 1992.

The Hon. GEORGE BUSH,
President, The White House, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: We are writing to express our concern over recent arms sales to the Middle East. Since the Gulf war, the Administration has sold $14.8 billion worth of major military equipment to Saudi Arabia. Now, we have seen reports that the Administration is considering another sale of advanced F-15 aircraft to the Saudis. This emerging pattern leaves the impression, at home and abroad, that the Administration is not serious about arms control in the Middle East.

A central theme of U.S. post-Gulf war policy towards the Middle East has been to "change the way" the nations of the region interact with one another. Genuine arms control must be an integral element of this approach. The sale of additional F-15 aircraft to Saudi Arabia is incompatible with any meaningful arms control policy. Such an F-15 sale would represent a significant escalation of the regional arms race.

The Administration has succeeded in bringing together the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council—who account for 80% of the world's weapons trade—to talk about arms control. This is an accomplishment that must be built upon, not undermined. The Administration's current approach to arms sales puts the U.S. in a position where we are unable to ask a country like Russia to refrain from selling top-of-the-line SU-24 aircraft and T-72 tanks to Iran because we are unwilling to stop our own sales.

Congress wants to work closely with the Administration in establishing a comprehensive security arrangement that protects and promotes American interests in the Middle East. We urge the Administration to consult with and share its plans with Congress on these matters so that U.S. arms policy to the region can be effectively coordinated. For instance, we believe Congress should be fully consulted on the conclusions of the recent survey and report prepared by the Defense Department on the long term needs of Saudi Arabia and what this means in terms of arms transfer policy.

Thank you for the opportunity to express our views.

[From the New York Times, Mar. 8, 1992]

F-15 SALE: WRONG NEW WORLD ORDER

Why should the U.S. stimulate competition to sell advanced fighter planes to the Middle East when it could instead promote international cooperation to shut down arms sales? Congress has to face that question now that the Bush Administration says it intends to sell 72 F-15 fighters to Saudi Arabia.

The sensible answer is to delay the sale and instruct President Bush to seek agreement from Britain and other leading arms merchants not to sell such planes to the Middle East. That would give Mr. Bush a chance to fulfill his previous pledges to curb arms sales to that volatile region.

Days after the defeat of Iraq, Mr. Bush told Congress: "It would be tragic if the nations of the Middle East and the Persian Gulf were now, in the wake of war, to embark on a new arms race." At his urging the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council—also the leading arms suppliers to Iraq and the world—are drafting guidelines to curb sales to the region.

Yet in the year since, his Administration has approved $8.6 billion in new arms sales to the region, the highest one-year total ever. That sends the wrong message to would-be buyers and sellers.

The sale of 24 F-15H's and 48 F-15E's makes an ideal test case for restraint. The F-15H ranks as a top-of-the-line aerial combat fighter. The F-15E is America's most advanced ground-attack aircraft, never before marketed abroad.

As defense budgets decline, commercial competition has intensified. F-15 manufacturers argue that if Congress simply blocks the proposed sale, Saudi Arabia will buy the British-built Tornado instead. Whoever loses the Saudi contract may have to shut down production and lay off workers as early as 1994. That's why curbs won't work without British agreement.

Such curbs could also induce Russia to limit the size of its sale of MIG-29 fighters to Iran, a transaction that gave Saudi Arabia a new reason for wanting to add to its arsenal. Andrei Kokoshin, a Russian arms control expert, said that "if other countries would have started reducing arms deliveries, this would have some effect, but it turned out that most democratic countries are not stopping arms sales."

That point has not been lost on the Chinese, who continue marketing their missiles while calling for dollar limits on Mideast arms sales.

The F-15 is Congress's notion of an ideal weapon system: parts are produced in 346 Congressional districts in 47 states. And the manufacturers' case comes down to "jobs, jobs, jobs." But U.S. security could be jobbed if Washington doesn't exercise restraint and induce other sellers to do the same.

HOUSE ADMINISTRATOR—CAN IT WORK WHEN THE DEMOCRATS REFUSE TO WORK WITH THE REPUBLICANS?

HON. CASS BALLENGER

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. BALLENGER. Mr. Speaker, today the House will consider House Resolution 423, a bill to establish the position of House Administrator. The Democratic leadership took this step reluctantly, only taking action after a series of scandals involving the House bank, the House post office, the House restaurant, and the House elevators became public knowledge. These scandals, which horrified America, have plagued Congress for years and are clearly indicative of the type of leadership the Democrats offer.

It had been my hope, and that of other Republicans in the House, that frank discussions between the parties could yield a constructive reform that all sides supported. Unfortunately, House Resolution 423 is just another example of the same old game that the Democrats like to play.

A bipartisan task force negotiated for over a week in order to bring a bipartisan reform package to the floor. And as the Republican leader BOB MICHEL said, "Republicans have not been increasing the playing field but rather narrowing it in hopes of reaching an agreement. While there has been progress towards incorporating some of the Republican ideas the devil remains in the details."

The Democratic package addresses the day-to-day management of the House and as may be expected retains their power and authority in this area. The Republicans are seeking much broader reform, not only in administration, but in the legislative and procedural workings of the House.

I plan to support the substitute offered by Republican leader MICHEL. The Republican plan: Creates a Chief Financial Officer elected by two-thirds vote of the House, with responsibility for all financial and managerial responsibilities and supervision of the post office; creates an inspector general position to conduct independent audits and investigations; eliminates the Doorkeeper and the Postmaster, transferring Doorkeeper duties to the Clerk; requires equal representation of majority and minority parties on the House Administration Committee and the Subcommittee on Legislative Appropriations; and requires the membership and staff ratios of each committee and subcommittee to reflect the ratio of majority and minority party Members in the House at the beginning of each Congress.

In addition, my party is demanding either a ban on proxy voting in the committee meetings and an increase in the Republican Representatives on the Rules Committee from four to six members—the Democrats have nine members; limits continuing resolutions to 30 days and requires them to list all appropriations contained in the bill not previously authorized by law; requires laws on labor, safety, antidiscrimination, and freedom of information to apply to the House, and prohibits franked mass mailing by Members outside their congressional districts. Republicans also support a bipartisan task force to study congressional reform and report to the caucuses by the time Congress adjourns, and a vote on a reform proposal offered by Representatives GRADISON and HAMILTON to create a Committee on Congress.

With the current crisis of confidence in the House and its elected Members, we must solve the problems of this institution, but the scandals of the past year indicate we need fundamental changes in the way the House operates. The Republican package makes these changes. I deeply regret that my colleagues on the other side of the aisle refused to accommodate these important changes.

ELLEN MEWBORNE SHULER: A VOICE OF EXCELLENCE

HON. FLOYD SPENCE

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Speaker, each year the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States and its Ladies Auxiliary conduct the Voice of Democracy broadcast scriptwriting contest. This competition is open to secondary school students who submit a script on a theme chosen by the program. This year's theme was "Meeting America's Challenge."

It gives me great pleasure to announce the name of this year's winner from the State of South Carolina: Miss Ellen Mewborne Shuler. A resident of my district, Miss Shuler attends the Orangeburg Preparatory School of Orangeburg, SC. I extend to her and her family my heartfelt congratulations and commend her for her excellent script.

At this time in the RECORD, Mr. Speaker, I wish to insert Miss Shuler's winning script on "Meeting America's Challenge." I am sure that my colleagues will agree that her words are an inspiration to all of us.

MEETING AMERICA'S CHALLENGE

(By Ellen M. Shuler, South Carolina winner, 1991/92 VFW Voice of Democracy Scholarship Program)

In 1789, the developing nation of America inaugurated their first President to lead their entire nation. Those early citizens wanted a leader with experience, motivation, honesty, perseverance, and dedication. George Washington exhibited such qualities. As Jefferson stated of Washington, "never did nature and fortune combine more perfectly to make a man great". But have these leadership qualities changed over the centuries? No—it is still America's challenge to find the ideal leader with those same qualities. Experience, motivation, honesty, perseverance, and dedication are still America's challenge.

America's first challenge is finding a leader with experience. Theodore Roosevelt knew what he was doing when he began the conservation movement in America. Roosevelt, a lover of the outdoors, owned two ranches out west and would spend 14 to 16 hours a day riding horses over his land. His experience out west gave him a heart felt sense of the word conservation. This experience led him to add more than 125 million acres of land to the national forests during his Presidency. Because of Roosevelt's influential quality of experience, conservation is still important in our nation.

Motivation is another key quality in a leader. John F. Kennedy's "New Frontier" campaign motivated our country to new and greater heights. His famous quote, "Ask not what your country can do for you—ask what you can do for your country" raised the spirits of American citizens. This eagerness continued through his term. For example, Kennedy began the Peace Corps which is still helping the underdeveloped nations of the world. Motivation helped Kennedy achieve his goals as a leader.

The perfect leader can also gain his goals through honesty. Who else demonstrates honesty better than our 16th President "Honest Abe" Lincoln? His term came during the difficult years of the Civil War. Lincoln's honest hatred of slavery may have caused him to lose the South's favor, but it gained freedom for all Americans. Obviously, Lincoln decided to be true to his own feelings of what is right for our nation. Lincoln vowed to always be honest even if he lost all his friends. He said, "I shall have at least one friend left, and that friend shall be down inside of me." Abe Lincoln knew the importance of being an honest leader.

Leaders must also know the importance of perseverance. Susan B. Anthony persevered all her life toward the goal of women's rights. When she was barred from speaking at a temperance movement rally because she was a woman, she persevered, forming the Women's State Temperance Movement Society. Her contribution of the International Women's Suffrage Alliance helped achieve the 19th Amendment which gave women the right to vote. Susan B. Anthony's perseverance as a leader helped make that possible.

Martin Luther King also demonstrated perseverance as a leader in the movement for black equality. He struggled under harsh circumstances to fight for the right of blacks. He said "I have a dream". King's dream came to life when blacks gained their civil rights. His perseverance made his dream a reality.

And finally, the American challenge is to find a leader with dedication. Just as leaders should show dedication to their people, the people should show dedication to their leaders. Thus, we need to dedicate ourselves to finding and supporting the ideal leader. As American citizens we are responsible for finding such a leader. And voting is our way to do so. When you vote, you make a conscious effort to strengthen the leadership in our country.

America's challenge to find the ideal leader has continued for over 200 years. And to remain a great nation, we must continue to value the leadership qualities of experience, motivation, honesty, perseverance and dedication. In the early part of this century, the great leader of India, Ghandi stated, "We must be the change we hope to see in others." This was India's challenge then and I believe it should be America's challenge now. "We must be the change we hope to see in others." The challenge of finding the ideal leader depends on us.

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION REGARDING DUTY SUSPENSION

HON. EDWARD J. MARKEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of two bills I am introducing today to suspend the duty fees on two products that are critical to the future of the Dupont Merck Pharmaceutical Co., a growing company with a major plant in Billerica, MA.

Dupont Merck currently employs more than 600 employees in a region of Massachusetts which currently suffers from double-digit unemployment. The future growth of the Billerica operation is no small matter for the people who are struggling in the recession-racked Massachusetts economy.

My bill would lift the duty fees on cardiolite and neurilite, two products with enormous growth potential. The duty suspensions would help make Dupont Merck competitive in world markets, which, would, in turn, lead to continued growth and job creation. As you know, standard procedure on these bills is for the Ways and Means Committee to ask the International Trade Commission and other executive departments to review the proposed suspensions to ascertain whether there are American producers of these products. A preliminary review has indicated there are no American producers. If the formal review indicates otherwise, I would, of course, reevaluate my support for these two bills.

THE TIME IS NOW TO ADDRESS WORTHY WAGES

HON. SCOTT L. KLUG

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. KLUG. Mr. Speaker, today as we conclude our business in Washington, early childhood professionals, including child care teachers and providers in Madison, are participating in a national day of action and empowerment called Worthy Wage Day.

According to the Wisconsin Early Childhood Association [WECA], "There is no single, quick, or simple strategy for solving the problem of low wages. The WECA believes the staffing crises must be addressed through several activities including: educating the public about the causes of the current crises, advocating for public policies and resources that support quality child care, and most importantly, building a unified and organized work force willing to raise the problem of inadequate compensation from the level of a problem that must be solved now. Without a strong voice for child care teachers and family care providers, the public can and will turn away from the problem."

In these changing socioeconomic times, with single parents working or both parents of a family working, child care, nursery schools and different programs for kids have become an important element in our communities. The Madison/Dane County Worthy Wage Coalition makes two very important points: Paying the price of quality care is a sound investment in our community and that quality child care for children is linked directly to the wages, status and working conditions of the caregivers.

That's why I am particularly pleased that we have made progress on increasing funding for Head Start programs. For every dollar we spent on Head Start, we can save another $3 from what would have been spent on remedial services later in that child's life. Head Start is a sound investment in our country's future. It strengthens family relationships and builds stronger communities.

Whether it's through Head Start, child care, nursery schools or other children's programs, we must be mindful of those who play such an important role in the early development of our kids. I'd like to thank the Worthy Wage Coalition for their work to remind us all of the importance of our children's caregivers and teachers.

PROTECTING HEALTH WITH RU-486

HON. LOUISE M. SLAUGHTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Ms. SLAUGHTER. Mr. Speaker, Last week-end more than half a million people flooded into Washington to march for women's lives. I hope that all people in the executive, legislative, and judicial branches heard that message.

One of the ways that we can protect both women and men's lives is to support research on a drug known as RU-486. Although RU-486 is most widely known as a means to terminate early pregnancy, research is also being conducted on its potential use in the treatment of glaucoma, breast cancer, female infertility, Cushing's syndrome, acquired immune deficiency syndrome and as a contraceptive. The United States, however, has prohibited all import and Federal research of this drug.

The Sarasota, FL, Independent recently published an article by Kappie Spencer that outlines the reasons and effects of the United States' shortsighted view toward RU-486. I would like to insert this article in the RECORD for my colleagues to read:

THE POLITICS OF ABORTION AND THE IMPACT OF RU486 IN IRELAND AND THE UNITED STATES
(By Kappie Spencer)

Editor's Note: Kappie Spencer is a member of the American Association of University Women and founder of the Florida Women's Consortium, both of which passed resolutions to support the import of the controversial drug RU486, commonly called the "morning after pill" which could be used to terminate pregnancy, but may also be used in the treatment of cancer, Alzheimer's disease and AIDS. The Florida Senate is currently considering a resolution which would request this state be chosen for national research on RU486.

How many American hearts ached for the 14-year-old Irish girl who was raped, pregnant and then denied permission to travel to Britain for an abortion? And how many Americans cheered when on February 26, 1992 the ruling by a lower court was reversed by Ireland's Supreme Court to allow the trip? It was a good decision. Ireland, however, is not alone in having imposed oppressive political regulations.

There are two exceptions to Ireland's highly restrictive constitutional law on abortion. One would allow abortion to save the life of the mother. The second would allow the use of a "morning after" pill to terminate the pregnancy within 72 hours of conception. What a boon to the victims of rape and incest who suffer a double trauma when sexual abuse is compounded by pregnancy. In allowing the use of the pill, Ireland is a shining example of an enlightened humanity. How many Americans know that we are being denied the use of this drug in our own country?

Unfortunately, in America a rape or incest victim is left without that recourse. The "morning after" pill has been banned for import. If a pregnancy occurs, then a surgical abortion is the only way to terminate the pregnancy. Abortion politics is a nasty business. The banning of this drug adversely affects not just young women but all Americans—the young or old, rich or poor, black or white, male or female.

In Europe the pill, RU486, is being hailed as a "miracle drug" and is being tested for use in the treatment of cancer, glaucoma, Cushing's syndrome and other maladies. Although it is being marketed as an abortifacient, it may prove to be a breakthrough in the treatment of a number of the great curses of humanity, including AIDS and Alzheimer's disease.

Because of its properties as an abortifacient, this drug is being withheld from Americans. It has been banned in this country even for use in clinical research and testing. The Right to Life forces are claiming "credit" for the "feat".

I am pro-choice. I firmly believe that the government should neither forbid nor mandate (as China does) abortion. Although I abhor the thought of abortion I view it as a necessary alternative in our imperfect world.

Abortion is legal and has been a medical option for two decades in the United States. It is unconscionable that a small segment of society, because of the right-wing religious beliefs, would act to block a drug which holds such great promise.

I am confident that this pill will ultimately be the answer to the abortion issue. In France and other European countries the new "miracle drug" is being used as a morning after pill to prevent pregnancies or to terminate pregnancies in the very early stages thus reducing the need for surgical abortion.

It is now clear that the politics of abortion have kept this drug out of the hands of doctors, clinics and research labs in the United States. It has been called a national disgrace that a drug so widely hailed throughout the world as the most significant discovery in reproductive medicine since the oral contraceptive is being controlled by the Right To Life forces. All Americans are being held hostage by the dictates of radical anti-choice crusaders who threaten to boycott any pharmaceutical house which makes the pill available in this country even for research on cancer.

How dare any group call themselves Right To Life while blocking a drug which holds such tremendous promise? How dare they call themselves Right To Life while watching women die of breast and ovarian cancer and men die of prostate cancer? How dare they call themselves Right To Life while depriving people of their eyesight and therefore a more enjoyable life? How dare they use political blackmail to block even the research and testing properties of the drug not related to reproduction?

How many reading these words will develop cancer in the next ten years? How many wives, mothers and daughters must die of breast cancer, and how many men must die of prostate cancer or brain cancer, and how many reading this page will be unable to read this or any other page when glaucoma takes their vision and eyesight? Will the research come too late for me? Or you? Or your child or loved one?

The moderates in this Pro-life camp should rejoice in the very properties of the RU486 which radical Right To Life members have pledged to fight. Because RU486 prevents a fertilized egg from being implanted in the uterus, it can be administered "the morning after" to women and girls who are victims of rape and incest, thus eliminating the possible need for abortion.

It now appears that the drug may be also be useful in the treatment of certain types of infertility—those caused by endometriosis for example.

RU486 can be used to induce labor when a fetus has died in utero. It can also be used as an aid to cervical dilation, thus reducing the need for cesarian sections, and as an adjunct to normal labor in expediting delivery in cases of prolonged and difficult labor without harm to the fetus.

Americans everywhere should get involved. Too many appear to view the great debate on abortion as a spectator sport. The ideological suppression of science may have the most devastating effect on those who sit on the sidelines and watch the abortion debate.

We have a lot to lose by being reluctant to talk about the abortion issue. This issue affects all of us. Let's talk about it with our neighbors, our friends, our health officials, our candidates for public office, and let's include our pro-life friends who are not blinded by "fetal life at any price". To do nothing, and to avoid talking about abortion is a conscious choice. Everything we do, or don't do, conveys a message to somebody.

Among the many health and science organizations which support the importation of RU486 for research and testing are the American Medical Association, the World Health Organization, the American Public Health Association, the World Congress of Obstetrics and Gynecology and the American Association for the Advancement of Science.

We can no longer sit back and watch. It is time for Americans everywhere to write or call their Congressmembers in support of the RU486 Regulatory Fairness Act of 1991 to overturn the current ban on the importation of this drug for clinical research and testing.

A miracle drug is on the market in France, Great Britain and other countries, but it is being kept out of the United States. Isn't it time to become involved?

INTRODUCING CONVERSION BILL

HON. BARBARA B. KENNELLY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Ms. KENNELLY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to discuss the plight of the thousands of Americans who will be displaced because of impending defense cuts across this Nation and to introduce the Defense Economic Reinvestment Act of 1992, which will play a critical role in assisting these workers.

World events have left the world a vastly different place than it was just 1 year ago. The failure of communism and the breakup of the Soviet Union have removed the threat which has driven our defense spending for the last 40 years. Our country can finally realize the peace dividend which for so long was a distant hope. With the cold war now over, we can begin to reduce the immense level of resources we have dedicated to our national security and begin to refocus our efforts on technologically advancing our society.

However, while most concede defense cuts are necessary, I have heard distressingly few ideas from the administration concerning the fate of the loyal citizens who have dedicated their lives to building the weapons which have secured our Nation for a generation. These Americans are our true peace dividend. To simply cast them aside because they are no longer needed is senseless, shortsighted, and unacceptable. The Federal Government must tend to the needs of these Americans, as it always has. A portion of the savings to be realized through defense cuts must be utilized to assist displaced defense workers. We must ensure they are given the tools to compete in this changing world.

To fill the leadership vacuum left by the administration, Congress must act. The Defense Economic Reinvestment Act of 1992 would provide the assistance to communities, workers, and industry, that will be critical to our economic well-being in the coming years.

The first provision includes $1.4 billion to create an incentive for companies to hire displaced defense workers. The incentive would be equal to 25 percent of the first $20,000 of qualified first-year wages paid to a qualified worker. Eligible workers include those displaced due to contract cancellation, defense industry downsizing, base closings, and force reductions.

Some $2.8 billion would be authorized over 5 years to create a Reemployment Assistance Program. States would have the option to establish Worker Readjustment Assistance Programs for dislocated workers. States would have access to a pool of Federal money, in the form of a credit of up to 12 percent of the current Federal unemployment tax that is paid by employers. These funds could be used for: job counseling, job search and relocation assistance, retraining, and income supplements while in training. Eligible workers include those displaced due to contract cancellation, defense industry downsizing, base closings, and force reductions.

Some $100 million would be authorized for the Department of Defense to make funds available to tier 1 public research universities within 50 miles of defense distressed areas to establish programs to retrain engineers laid off from the defense industry or recently discharged from the military. This funding would be in the form of one-time startup grants in an amount not to exceed $2 million per qualified university. Such programs would retrain engineers as environmental engineers. Engineers enrolled in the engineer retraining program would also be eligible for income support under title 2.

The second section of the Defense Economic Reinvestment Act of 1992 would focus on communities hard hit by defense cuts. A $1 billion Grant Assistance Program, the Defense Economic Development Block Grant [DEFBG] would be established for defense distressed areas. Grants would be available to defense-distressed areas to assist in the economic transition necessary as a result of contract cancellation, defense industry downsizing, base closing, or force reductions. The Department of Defense would be required to give preference to those defense-distressed areas that submit a comprehensive economic development plan and those which emphasize the creation of export-related or manufacturing jobs.

In addition, the Department of Defense would be required to give preference to those communities which suffer the largest proportional damage. Grants would flow from the Department of Defense directly to the defense-distressed area—not through State governments. For purposes of this act, a defense-distressed area is any area within a 50-mile radius of a defense-distressed community.

The Defense Economic Reinvestment Act of 1992 takes important steps to assist industries remain competitive in these changing economic times. DOD currently requires companies to reimburse DOD for a pro rata share of the development costs for technologies developed at DOD's expense if that technology is being commercially sold to non-U.S. Government customers.

DOD also insists on sharing data rights with numerous companies for a variety of reasons. A section 800 panel study is underway in an effort to review acquisition laws at the Department of Defense with a goal of streamlining those laws.

A report to the Under Secretary for Acquisition is due on December 15, 1992. The Secretary of Defense must then report to Congress by January 15, 1993. At present, a Government-Industry Committee on Rights in Technical Data is reviewing rights regarding technical data. This committee will also report to Secretary Cheney upon completion. This bill states that it is the sense of Congress that the Secretary review this study and report to Congress without delay. We must make it easier for industry to compete by removing stifling regulations.

This legislation also calls for $500 million to be authorized for the development of alternative technologies which would be available to tier 1 public research universities with existing campuses within 50 miles of a defense-distressed area and independent not-for-profit research institutions with advanced degree programs. Funding would be available only to those qualified entities which conduct: biotechnology, photonics, agro-environmental and marine science research including underwater robotics, and marine biotechnology.

With regard to universities only, funding priority would be given to those institutions that conduct research as part of a comprehensive State economic development and conversion plan to create new commercial enterprises. In addition, the Secretary should consider giving funding priority to those qualified entities whose research has potential for dual use applications.

The Defense Economic Reinvestment Act of 1992 would also elevate the Office of Economic Adjustment to a higher level headed by a new Assistant Secretary for Economic Adjustment within the Office of the Secretary of Defense. OEA would also receive $200 million for additional staffing resources and a discretionary fund. An enhanced OEA could better facilitate and assist the economic adjustment and industrial diversification of industries, communities, and workers that are adversely affected by defense cuts. An elevated OEA could assist in minimizing job and economic loss due to reduced levels of defense spending by identifying and notifying the communities and businesses within the United States that will be adversely affected by defense downsizing.

OEA could serve as the liaison between Federal Government programs on technology transfer, marketing assistance, small business, economic development, job training, and export enhancement in order to ensure that all available Federal resources are utilized to minimize the adverse effects of defense downsizing. OEA could also assist State economic development offices in the planning and implementation of diversification strategies.

A proven way to improve the results of assistance programs is to ensure a rapid response to impending layoffs. The sooner help arrives on the scene, the better the chances of providing the necessary resources and guidance necessary for a worker to make a successful transition from one job to the next. An advanced plant closing/layoff notification provision patterned after the Worker Adjustment and Retraining Notification Act [WARN] would be created in an effort to close some of the large loopholes in the current WARN legislation. This bill would require contractors and subcontractors to notify OEA, the local worker representative, and the chief elected official of local and State government as soon as possible after a facility receives actual or constructive notice of a cancellation or delay of a defense contract held by that facility, if it results in 50 or more workers being terminated. This notification requirement would remain in effect even if the layoff or closing does not stem from a weapon system cancellation.

We are at an important time in our Nation's history. We simply cannot allow our highly skilled workers to be treated recklessly. We must remember those forgotten by the present administration. I hope you will join me in standing up for the well-being of defense workers who otherwise have no place to turn for help.

MARKING THE BICENTENNIAL ANNIVERSARY OF THE U.S. CONSULAR SERVICE

HON. DANTE B. FASCELL

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, April 14, 1992, marks the bicentennial anniversary of the U.S. Consular Service. Everyday throughout the world Americans turn to Consular Service employees for help and guidance. When they do, they are served by some of the finest people that this Government has to offer. The Consular Bureau is unique in Government service. It is a team comprised of foreign service and civil service employees working successfully together to accomplish both a domestic and overseas mission of serving and protecting American travelers.

All who have served as consular officers should be proud of the significant role that they have played in promoting our foreign policy goals and in promoting the highest ideals of the United States here and abroad.

Consular and passport officers are truly important links in maintaining and expanding world freedom. Their assistance to travelers permits the free exchange of ideas, which enables people throughout the world to meet and forge the strong and lasting alliances essential to maintain open and free societies.

Last year consular and passport officers issued over 3 million passports and 6 million visas. They visited over 6,000 Americans jailed overseas, helped resolve over 100,000 welfare and whereabouts cases and assisted with over 7,000 foreign adoptions. They provide a vital link between American travelers in trouble overseas and families here at home.

Their ability to handle this overwhelming volume of work with the care and concern that each individual case requires is worthy of praise.

The Consular Service has a distinguished tradition for which it can be proud. I am sure that the American travelers throughout the world join me in wishing best regards and sincere congratulations to the men and women of the Consular Service. I am confident they will continue to serve the American people with the same dignity and dedication that they have for the past 200 years.

THE SEVENTH ANNUAL SALUTE TO PASSAIC SEMIPRO BASEBALL REUNION DINNER

HON. ROBERT A. ROE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to four great Americans who will be honored on Friday, May 1, 1992, for their outstanding athletic contributions to Passaic County baseball. On that special day, the Seventh Annual Salute to Passaic Semipro Baseball Reunion Dinner will be held at the Athenia Veterans Hall in the great city of Clifton, in the heart of my Eighth Congressional District of New Jersey.

The weather is getting warmer and spring is in the air. As a nation, we prepare to once again celebrate the annual rite of spring which uniquely binds us together as a society. Of course, I am referring to the great game of baseball, our national pastime.

Mr. Speaker, it is a high honor indeed to recognize and pay tribute to those athletes who put Passaic semipro baseball on the map. Their outstanding talents, which they displayed between the lines, truly made the diamond shine.

Of course, I refer to the following greats of Passaic semipro baseball: Charlie "Brown" Benigno, James Labagnara, Andrew Sabo, and Stephen Sargent. Each and ever one of these individuals has made vital contributions to the game that gave them so much pleasure.

Mr. Speaker, the name Charlie Benigno is synonymous with Garfield baseball. His career started when he was a player and manager of the Garfield Jewells. Later in 1938, he organized the Garfield City League which was classified as a twilight league. This league, reputed to be one of the strongest in New Jersey, included teams from Clifton and Passaic.

In 1946, under Benigno's sponsorship, the Benigno club entered the North Jersey League. In 1954 they won the title and proceeded to win the New Jersey Tournament of Champions, a prestigious competition that occurs at the end of the year.

Benigno also took steps to promote women in sports by sponsoring the Garfield Flashettes in the early 1950's. The Flashettes were the first women's softball team in the area. They played all throughout the Northeast and acquired many State and regional awards recognizing their playing abilities.

Charlie Benigno has strived to expand baseball's popularity in Garfield and northern New Jersey at large. Not only has he served on the executive committee of Garfield's Babe Ruth League, but also served on the executive committee of Garfield's Little League, which he helped organize in 1953. In 1976, he was inducted into the Bergen County Semi-Pro Baseball Hall of Fame. Currently, he serves as the president of their board of trustees. In 1985 he received a contribution award from the reunion committee of the North Jersey Baseball League. Charlie "Brown" Benigno has done an outstanding job in promoting baseball's popularity in northern New Jersey.

James "Labby" Labagnara has dedicated his life to baseball and is being honored for his vital contributions to the game. As a player for such teams as the Prospects, Eastside Red Sox, Gavins, Davenport, and P.S. Electric, his pitching contributions provided the winning edge.

As a pitcher, "Labby" was tough to defeat. In 1931, he went 9-1 and was named to the New Jersey State All Star Team for the third consecutive year. He went on to an outstanding career, compiling a record of 450 games won against only 64 losses, while batting .335.

Labby continues to be involved in the game, devoting many hours to coaching American Legion baseball teams. He has won 10 county titles as well as State titles in 1962 and 1972. Passaic County baseball has truly been enriched through his love of the game.

Andrew Sabo has played for many local and semipro teams throughout his career. Some of his great achievements include leading the Paterson Industrial League in batting one year and going to Wichita, KS with the Curtiss Wrights and playing in the Baseball Congress Tournament.

When Andy played for the Midland Park Ranger, he had the opportunity to play against Johnny "No Hit" Vandermeer. He later played against Cleveland Indian great Larry Doby. Andy also played for Glen Rock A.C., Ridge-wood A.C., Porky Osheas of Hackensack, Benignos, Jewell A.C., Lutheran A.C. and Paradise A.C. of Garfield.

Tonight we recognize Andrew Sabo for his outstanding contribution to baseball in our area. He has demonstrated dedication and love for our national pastime, baseball.

Stephen Sargent started his baseball career in Passaic, on the sandlots of Passaic High School. He played semipro ball with the New York Parkways. A highly talented shortstop, he was offered a professional contract by the Cincinnati Reds after a try out at the Polo Grounds. Steve starred on the Manhattan Rubber Team, which won the 1938 Industrial Championship with his magnificent play at short.

Steve joined the U.S. Navy and proudly served during World War II. Upon leaving the Navy, he became a police officer in Passaic. He was strongly involved with the Police Athletic League, managing the PAL in the little league division.

When these titans of amateur ball played, the quality of semiprofessional baseball was of an extremely high caliber. Major league baseball had only eight teams in each league, not yet having expanded to the west coast. Semiprofessional teams were the pride of their communities, with keen competition between local towns. This is an era that has gone by us now, but it is certainly not forgotten.

Mr. Speaker, I am certain that this year's dinner will be a smashing success, as it has been each and every year. I applaud the tireless workers of the outstanding dinner committee, which is once again comprised of those individuals dedicated to preserving our semipro baseball heritage in Passaic County. We owe a tremendous debt of gratitude to Ted Lublanecki, Sr., Ted Lublanecki, Jr., Ben Lublanecki, Jean Lublanecki, Charles Lajeskie, and Mike Ivanish. Without their dedication, this event would not be possible.

Mr. Speaker, the talents of this select group of honorees and their most important contributions to semiprofessional baseball in Passaic will live on as the legacy they have bequeathed to today's promising athletes. I salute these great Americans for their outstanding achievements.

ARTS EDUCATION: A FOUNDATION FOR LEARNING

HON. TED WEISS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, much has been said and written on the need to reform our young people's education—both for their futures and the future of our Nation. Yet, one of the best learning tools in every aspect of education is often trivialized or treated as something less than a priority—namely, the arts.

Studies continue to show the direct positive correlation between ability and experience in the arts and other academic skills—not only in creativity, imagination, self-confidence, and self-expression but in mathematics and even standardized tests.

Moreover, the arts have an enormously valuable role beyond education. Where other methods may fail, the arts are often the sole window to recovery, communication, or healing. Particularly in underserved and inner-city areas, the arts have been used effectively in therapy for young victims of violence or children with physical or emotional disabilities.

In short, it serves our youth and the Nation well to make the arts an educational priority. Proper attention and resources must be devoted to arts education programs—not only for a child's educational development but for their human development as well.

I recommend the following article from U.S. News and World Report, entitled "Looking for a Renaissance: The Campaign to Revive Education in the Arts," to my colleagues and ask unanimous consent that it be inserted in the RECORD.

[From U.S. News & World Report, Mar. 30, 1992]

LOOKING FOR A RENAISSANCE; THE CAMPAIGN TO REVIVE EDUCATION IN THE ARTS

(By Miriam Horn with Jill Sieder)

At a time when reformers are struggling to remake a failing educational system, the South Bronx's St. Augustine School of the Arts stands as a model of the possible. Serving Kids in the nation's poorest congressional district, a blighted neighborhood where only 1 in 4 children will ever graduate from high school, the school uses a curriculum built around music, dance, the visual arts and creative writing to defy the odds: Ninety-five percent of St. Augustine students are reading at or above grade level. All but a few will go on to high school and graduate. And though many come from single-parent families damaged by drugs, AIDS or violence, virtually all are model students; disciplined, cooperative, confident.

Successes like St. Augustine's are fueling a growing campaign nationwide to restore the arts to their former place in the basic curriculum. Mounting evidence that comprehensive programs in the arts can radically improve graduation rates, grades and overall achievement levels has captured the attention of an array of groups with a vested interest in educational reform, from the Future Business Leaders of America to the National Council of Teachers of Mathematics.

These seemingly unlikely advocates are taking on those who view music, dance and painting as frills that can safely be axed in a budget crunch. This week, two suits being filed by the American Civil Liberties Union and 26 local Louisiana school districts, both charging that the state has failed to provide an adequate education for its children. Supported by music educator Ellis Marshallis (father of jazz stars Wynton and Branford) and New Orleans Parish District Attorney Harry Connick Sr. (father of pianist Harry Connick Jr.), the suits focus in part on the state's arts-impooverished schools and recent attempts to save money by further slashing arts education. The Louisiana plaintiffs have modeled their complaint on a successful suit brought against Kentucky in 1989. Among the remedial actions ordered by the state supreme court was the provision of "sufficient grounding in the arts to enable each student to appreciate his or her cultural and historical heritage."

NOT CRITICAL

The lawsuits in Kentucky and Louisiana are testimony to the dismal state of arts education nationwide. Only nine states mandate arts curricula for all high-school students. In New York City, two thirds of the 600 public elementary schools have no art or music teachers. Fewer than 1 percent of all students in Los Angeles County receive comprehensive arts education, and 30 percent fewer juniors and seniors now study music than in the '50s. The arts are simply not viewed as critical to the job of preparing young people for the workplace—an attitude that was reflected in the six National Educational Goals announced by the president and the governors in 1990. No mention was made of the arts.

That stance may be softening. In a speech last week to the President's Committee on the Arts and the Humanities, Secretary of Education Lamar Alexander outlined plans for an America 2000 Arts Partnership. His proposals included a national clearinghouse to share information on community-based arts education programs and a national center for arts education to develop curricula and standards.

Such initiatives clearly stop short of a major commitment. Yet even if school is viewed in the narrowest possible terms—as preparation for standardized tests and the job market—research has shown arts education to be an asset. Recently, a College Entrance Examination Board study found that students who took more than four years of music and arts scored 34 points higher on verbal SATs and 18 points better on math SATs than those who took music for less than one year. At the University of California at Los Angeles, a study of students served by the Music Center of L.A. County's Artist-in-Residence program found improvement in reading, writing and speaking skills, social studies, science and math.

The explanation for such improvements is not mysterious, given the close connection between disciplines such as music and math. Through the study of rhythmic and harmonic structures, for instance, fractions and ratios acquire concrete meaning. In fact, the study of music may affect basic brain development. Scientists at the University of California at Irvine are finding that musical training at a very early age, even before the development of verbal skills, stimulates neural activity. They believe music exercises the brain and expands a child's thinking ability. The visual arts are similarly useful. A study by the National Arts Education Research Center found that nonart majors significantly improved their understanding of geometry through the study of sculpture and architecture. Among female students, who typically lag in math skills, the gains nearly closed the gender gap.

Such alternative approaches to education owe much of their inspiration to the work of Howard Gardner and Project Zero at Harvard's Graduate School of Education. Educators miss a great opportunity, argues Gardner, by focusing too narrowly on the development of linguistic and logical-mathematical abilities. Equally important, he believes, is the development of spatial, musical, bodily-kinesthetic, interpersonal and intrapersonal skills. "The arts are a major area of human cognition, one of the ways in which we know about the world and express our knowledge," he says. "Much of what is said in the arts cannot be said in another way. To withhold artistic means of understanding is as much of a malpractice as to withhold mathematics."

INTO THE CLASSROOM

Karen Gallas, a teacher at Lawrence School in Brookline, Mass., has had great success teaching biology by putting Gardner's philosophy to work. Her students are required to observe and record the anatomy and physiology of insects, but Gallas encourages them to present their knowledge in whatever medium they choose. One child wrote a poem imagining life as an ant, while others drew or acted out what they learned. The exercises displayed a much deeper assimilation of the basic concepts than conventional rote memorization. "Knowing isn't just telling something back as we receive it," asserts Gallas. "It means transformation and change."

Historically, American educators shared that view. For most of the country's history, arts instruction was well financed and a source of great prestige, according to Diana Korzenik of the Massachusetts College of Art. Skill in the visual arts was seen as critical to those entering the professions, including the sciences. "The way you understand an organism or solve a problem," said renowned biologist Louis Agassiz, "is by drawing it." While American educators lost sight of this connection in the '60s, Japan and West Germany continue to require arts education for all students from kindergarten through high school. That they also design the most competitive products on the world market has not gone unnoticed by America's corporate leaders, who have become outspoken champions of arts education.

JOB SKILLS

In fact, despite the current perception of the arts as dispensable luxuries, a growing number of educators believe they provide valuable preparation for the working world.

Indeed, the U.S. Department of Labor issued a report last summer urging schools to teach for the workplace of the future. The skills they called for—the capacity for working in teams, communication, creative thinking, self-esteem, imagination and invention—are precisely those found to be fostered by arts education.

Outside of a few states heavily invested in arts education—notably South Carolina and Minnesota—it has been left to the nation's museums and orchestras to expose kids to the arts. The most comprehensive program offered nationwide is that developed by New York City's Lincoln Center Institute, which provides intensive teacher training and long-term artist residencies in the public schools; the program has been replicated in 15 cities. Similarly far-reaching are the Music Center of L.A. County's multicultural workshops and performances, which reach 1 million students a year with programming in French, Tagalog, Navajo, Korean, Spanish and Chinese. More-targeted programs, such as Jacques D'Amboise's National Dance Institute and the Dance Theater of Harlem, provide arts training to inner city kids and often locate talent that might otherwise be overlooked.

Though some of these programs have received support from the National Endowment for the Arts, it has only been in the last several years that the agency has begun working directly with the states to achieve the goal established at its founding: to make the arts a basic part of every kid's education. Not generally a favorite agency among conservatives, the NEA in this instance can appeal to advocates of a traditional education built around the great works of Western civilization. It was Plato, after all, who called music "a more potent instrument than any other" for education, and schools like St. Augustine are modeled on the cathedral schools of the Renaissance and the classical lycees.

Ultimately, the greatest value of the arts may be that they offer children the means to envision other worlds, to know that they can transform reality with the exercise of their own creative will. For kids whose horizons extend no further than the dead ends of the inner city, that leap of imagination can be critical.

[From U.S. News & World Report, Mar. 30, 1992]

REACHING THE NEEDIEST KIDS WITH PAINTING AND DANCE

As effective as the arts are for enhancing basic education, they can be even more valuable as therapy for children with a range of physical and mental disabilities.

At the Harlem Horizon Art Studio in Harlem Hospital's Trauma Center, Bill Richards teaches a rigorous painting course for children who have been injured by falls or gunshot wounds. The former Moore College of Art professor has had startling breakthroughs with several hundred children.

Against all odds, The most dramatic involved 15-year-old Abraham Daniel, who after falling three stories from scaffolding spent a month in a coma and awoke a paraplegic. Under Richards's guidance, Abraham managed to control the violent shaking of his hands sufficiently to paint. As he improved, his teacher provided larger challenges, larger canvases. When one afternoon, Abraham found himself unable to reach the top of a canvas, he stood up. He finished the painting, put down his brush and walked to the bathroom.

At the Nordof-Robbins Music Therapy Clinic at New York University, children with problems ranging from cerebral palsy to Down's syndrome learn to express themselves through music and frequently display remarkable abilities. The discipline of music, according to the founder, "brings order to their disorganized inner world." Drama and dance work particularly well with learning-disabled children, who often withdraw into a passive protective shell.

Dance away. Sandra Hook, a former teacher at McKingley Elementary School in Muscatine, Iowa, recalls one "emotionally scarred little boy" asking permission, after several weeks of study with a dancer in residence, to go up in front of the student body to dance with the professionals. "It was the first time he ever volunteered to do anything in front of others."

Another teacher in Vancouver, Wash., took an autistic child to a children's theater festival. At the end of the performance, the child began to converse with one of the puppets. It was the first time the child had ever spoken.

S&L'S BEAT THE CLOCK—WIN AGAIN

HON. MEL LEVINE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to be a cosponsor of the Resolution Trust Corporation Reform Act of 1992 and the Financial Consumers Association Act of 1992. This important legislative package should be included as a core part of any RTC reform bill the House passes.

The American taxpayers have already invested billions of dollars in the S&L bailout, and will invest billions more before the mess is finally cleaned up. Passage of this reform package will help ensure that their investment is protected.

In particular, section 8 of the bill contains the text of H.R. 4710, a bill I recently introduced which is designed to substantially assist banking regulators in recovering billions of lost dollars in S&L deposits. I want to thank my colleague, Mr. JONTZ, for including my legislation in this important package.

Specifically, section 8—and H.R. 4710—of the Resolution Trust Corporation Reform Act of 1992 extends the statute of limitations applicable to civil actions brought by the Federal conservator or receiver of a failed depository institution from 3 to 5 years, amending the Federal Deposit Insurance Act and other laws. By doing so, it helps the Federal Government to bring cases against officers of failed financial institutions and their advisors, like lawyers and accountants.

The S&L crisis has cost taxpayers hundreds of billions of dollars. It has cost thousands of depositors their life savings. Those responsible for these outrageous crimes should not be allowed to escape payment and punishment for their actions by hiding behind a statute of limitations.

The clock has already run out on suits for over 100 thrift failures, and it's expected that the regulators may want to file lawsuits over the next 3 years for up to 400 more. American taxpayers shouldn't be penalized because there are too many court cases against corrupt S&L's to pursue every one adequately.

The RTC has already brought big cases under these laws, including those against former Lincoln Savings and Loan Association chairman Charles Keating and a number of other well-known thrift directors. Without this extension, many more high-dollar cases may never be fully prosecuted.

I urge my colleagues to support both of these bills and include them in any House RTC reform package.

TRIBUTE TO FRANCES S. REESE

HON. HAMILTON FISH, JR.

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize and pay special tribute to Frances S. Reese, a very dear friend and one of a handful of individuals who transformed America's attitudes and laws about preserving our natural environment. Franny Reese is being honored by the Exchange Club of Southern Dutchess County at their 24th Annual Meritorious Award Breakfast in Fishkill, NY on April 28 in recognition of her work to save the wild-life and preserve the scenic beauty of one of the country's most important waterways—the Hudson River.

I join her many friends and admirers and compliment Franny on being chosen to receive this honor. Throughout her life, she has displayed an intense resolve to enhance the quality of life in the Hudson Valley. As a founding member, chair, and now chair emerita of Scenic Hudson, she focused public attention on landmark cases in which our precious natural and historic resources were at risk.

An ardent environmentalist before that word even entered our daily lexicon, Franny played a pivotal role in the Storm King conflict which inaugurated the national environmental movement. From 1963 to 1980, when a landmark environmental decision on the preservation of Storm King was handed down, no volunteer devoted more energy or played as central a role for as long a period of time as Franny Reese. She secured the support of 22,000 contributors from 48 States and 14 foreign countries. She raised the money for legal costs; spoke tirelessly at public meetings and with the press; wrote articles and editorials; and, in so many other ways, was unstinting in her efforts to raise the public's awareness of and support for Storm King's preservation.

The Storm King case would establish the rights of ordinary citizens to sue in the courts on behalf of the environment. When the U.S. Court of Appeals handed down its decision on December 29, 1965 requiring the Federal Power Commission [FPC] to consider scenic and historic resources and alternatives, it was the first time the court had ever reversed an FPC license for a powerplant. The decision would spark the Federal Environmental Protection Act and the New York State Environmental Quality Review Act. Never again would any agency or corporation start a construction project without first considering how it would affect the natural resources and wildlife of the area.

During more than a quarter century, her voice has been a strong one, leading a chorus that has helped give the Hudson River Valley a rebirth. Marshes have been reclaimed under the National Estuarine Sanctuary Program; New York State has adopted a coastal management program; PCB's are no longer spilling into the river; and, hundreds of properties have been added to the National Register of Historic Places.

Most recently, Franny was very active in the planning of the Hudson Valley Greenway, which will create a linked chain of parks, trails and historic, and cultural sites stretching from New York City up to the Troy Dam. Franny Reese has been a most vocal and tenacious defender of and ambassador for the environment and a model for a generation of environmentalists in the Hudson Valley and throughout the Nation.

Her involvement in quality-of-life issues goes far beyond the environment. She has lent her considerable talents to numerous causes within her community of Dutchess County, NY, serving on the boards of the Grinnell Library, Zion Church Vestry, the Boscobel Restoration, the Young-Morse Historic Site, and the Retreat House of the Redeemer. She also serves as vice president of the Auxiliary of Columbia-Presbyterian Hospital, secretary of the board and chairman of the student life committee at Marist College, and is a member of the Greater Hudson Valley Coordinating Council.

Among the many awards and honors she has received over the years: EPA's Environmental Quality Award; the New York State Department of Environmental Conservation Award; the Garden Club of America National Environmental Award; Marist College 1991 President's Award; and, the American Conservation Society's For the Environment Award.

Mr. Speaker, I am well aware that the exceptional contributions that Franny Reese has made over the years have benefited not only the people of the Hudson Valley but this Nation as well. I am pleased to call her my good friend and am confident that she will continue to provide invaluable service to her community. The impact she has had on the Hudson Valley will be felt for generations to come.

TRIBUTE TO BISHOP ROY E. BROWN

HON. EDOLPHUS TOWNS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. TOWNS. Mr. Speaker, today I want to acknowledge the spiritual efforts of Bishop Roy E. Brown, senior pastor of Pilgrim Church located at 628 Central Avenue in Brooklyn, NY. Bishop Brown was ordained in April 1964. In 1966 he became the pastor of Pilgrim Baptist Church. Under his pastorate the church has grown in size and stature. In 1976 the congregation and the church moved to its present location.

In 1989 and 1990 the church purchased, renovated, and opened two new churches in Brooklyn along with the Renaissance Convention Center. On July 18, 1990 Bishop Brown was consecrated to the Bishopric as the presiding bishop of Pilgrim Assemblies International Inc.

This year on April 19, the church will convene its annual convocation in Brooklyn. Delegates from throughout the United States will come together in the spirit of faith and brotherhood to further the religious efforts of Pilgrim Assemblies International Inc. I am delighted to recognize and praise the tireless efforts of Bishop Brown, a man loved and respected not only in the Borough of Brooklyn, but throughout our Nation.

SKI AREA PERMIT SIMPLIFICATION

HON. PAT WILLIAMS

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing two bills for the purpose of bringing common sense into our Federal policy toward downhill ski areas. The first bill will simplify the formula under which ski areas pay rental fees to the United States for the use of national forest lands. The second bill will set out the conditions in which the Forest Service may consider requests to build employee housing on national forest land. I am joined in this legislative effort by 44 of my colleagues who are persuaded of the need for this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I want to emphasize at the outset that this legislation effort should not have been necessary. The ski industry has tried for 3 years to work with the U.S. Forest Service to simplify the fee system. Instead, the end result of these negotiations and appeals is that the Forest Service has refined its fee system so as to be so complex, so open to subjectivity and interpretation that the industry was left with no other choice but to come to Congress for relief.

Mr. Speaker, the policy of this Nation has been that downhill skiing is an appropriate use of public land. Skiing is good for the physical and mental health of our citizens. Many of those who have enjoyed the mountains and hills of the East, Midwest, and West have done so at downhill ski areas. Should the corporations that operate these areas pay the Federal Government fair market value for the use of these public lands? Absolutely. Should the Federal Government make the ski business so complex and so uncertain that it becomes impossible to make basic investment decisions in the development of ski areas? Absolutely not.

The problem, Mr. Speaker, is that the Forest Service has created a 40-page regulatory nightmare for the process of determining the fees owed for the use of national forest land. The regulations have redoubled in complexity in recent years as the agency has tried to bring into the equation the value of facilities which are in some way associated with the ski area, but not physically located on or perhaps even near the national forest portion of the resort. As one might expect this has caused wide varieties of interpretation between Forest Service offices, and so the simple fact is that confusion reigns.

For example, at the Big Mountain near Whitefish, MT, the Forest Service has now determined that receipts from the adjacent cross-country ski trails, located entirely on private land, should be considered in the fee determination. They also state that receipts from businesses adjacent to the ski area but located on private land—a photo shop, a bar, a hot dog stand, a hotel reservation service, and a chocolate shop—should also be counted in the overall determination of the fee. Mr. Speaker, this scenario is being played out at virtually every national forest ski resort in the Nation.

What we propose in this legislation is to take the existing 40 pages of fee determination instructions and reduce it to a one line calculation. Fees under the bill would be calculated by multiplying ski area gross revenues by four graduated revenue brackets. My bill proposes, and the ski industry supports, a progressive fee schedule, in which very large areas will pay a higher percentage of gross revenue. The total effect is that smaller, community based areas will find their fees reduced slightly; this is appropriate because many of these areas are financially marginal, yet they provide top-notch recreation for the millions of people who live near such an area.

Large destination ski resorts will find their fees increased under the bill. Despite this, the large areas support the new formula because it will greatly reduce their administrative and bookkeeping burdens. And, by providing certainty about the fee basis, will allow these resorts to develop their areas without worry that the Forest Service will be looking for ways to bring new, private land investments into the fee determination.

Mr. Speaker, it is my intention, and the intention of the 44 cosponsors of this bill that the new system will be revenue neutral to the Federal treasury. I repeat—revenue neutral. In furtherance of this discussion, and because we believe it critical that the Congress be fully confident about the revenue consequences of this proposal, I have asked the U.S. Forest Service to conduct a specific comparison of this proposal with their own to verify the revenue consequences of the new formula.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is a sensible proposal which will reduce paperwork, accounting, and administrative burdens on the ski industry and the Forest Service, while at the same time return a fair market value rental fee to the United States. It will say unequivocally to ski area operators and potential ski area developers that when you operate on public land, these are the rules: stable, sensible, and not moving targets.

The second bill I am introducing today addresses the problems ski resorts have in finding appropriate housing for ski area employees. The problem is that because real estate and rents in ski resort towns are so expensive, employees often wind up being forced to commute from two or three towns away to get to work at the ski area. This creates a dangerous and unnecessary situation for the young people who have chosen to take a couple of years off in order to work as a desk clerk or lift operator and maybe get some skiing in.

This bill will provide the Forest Service with direction, and importantly, discretion, to work with the ski area permittee to identify suitable locations for ski area employee housing on national forest land. We believe, Mr. Speaker, that if a suitable location exists, in the vicinity of a resort, but on public land, that there should be some ability of the agency to help address the problem.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, we should reaffirm that skiing is a good use of public lands, and that millions of people find great outdoor enjoyment through the sport. Our Federal policy should encourage this good activity.

MEETING AMERICA'S CHALLENGE

HON. PETER A. DeFAZIO

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. DeFAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I submit for the RECORD the essay by Laura K. Reinhardt, who was the Oregon winner of the "Meeting America's Challenge" essay contest.

MEETING AMERICA'S CHALLENGE

(By Laura K. Reinhardt)

The rays of sunlight begin to fade behind the horizon. My strength dwindles as the glowing sun sinks lower in the western sky. An autumn wind darts through the trees and blows the leaves of orange, rust, and gold. The boy, ahead of me, stops along the rocky path. I shrug off my burdensome backpack and collapse to the earth. Nine other high school students and I, are part of an Outward Bound survival program on an adventure of a lifetime deep in the wilderness. We will meet challenges. We have pacted to meet them together. Our survival depends on each of us—united. Two days have passed and we've struggled across a river and now, a fearful canyon looms ahead. I stop to think.

I scoop up a bit of earth in my hands and watch it sift through my fingers. This is the soil of America and as I think of my country I realize that it too, is on a journey of survival. Our forefathers started on a journey to create a better life for the citizens of a young democracy. Now the challenge grows. Two hundred and fifteen years later, we stand on the edge of a new world order, with the U.S. in front, having led the free world through two World Wars and a recent crisis in the Gulf. But there is trouble at home.

The United States of America is at a crossroads. New world orders cannot be forged abroad if we are deteriorating from within. We can restore Kuwait to its homeland, but we struggle with restoring our homeless to dignity. We can bring peace to the Middle East, but can we bring peace to Brooklyn? We can bring technology to Eastern Europe, but will we use the same technology to smear ourselves on television?

If we are to meet this awesome challenge successfully, we must be committed to ourselves and our country. We must get our strength through leadership and teamwork. We must be prepared for the tumbling rocks and falling trees that may strew our path. It is up to us to search and build it in the right direction with the tools of a true democracy; a powerful economy, a strong military, and a caring heart. Are you willing to accept the challenges of the mighty wilderness that stands before us? I am, help me.

We must first have a purpose, goals for us to strive for and reach. Every one of us must take an oath of devotion to our country to care and serve it well. A different world cannot be built by indifferent people. This is the people's challenge. Let us use our "Voice of Democracy". It is time to build bridges to help in the understanding and uniting of our people; to eliminate violence and suffering and demand human rights. Speak out to save our land so we can experience the greatness of our forests, oceans, and skies for years to come. Use our voices to talk with other countries and work for world peace. President Ronald Reagan said, "The most powerful force in the world comes not from balance sheets or weapon arsenals, but from the human spirit."

On the trail, darkness has come and so has a silence found only in the stars above. I gaze into the red flames of our campfire dancing against the black of the forest. I think of the young and the old of our country uniting to meet this challenge. The old's wisdom and experience are the burning coals of the fire and the youth's idealism and energy are the sparks jumping from the glow, igniting America's flame of growth.

America's citizens have shown us former vistas, former summits that have enheartened us. In 1920, with the enactment of the 19th amendment, women climbed the summit called suffrage. In 1954, after the Supreme Court's decision in Brown vs. Board of Education, young black children seated next to white children in a Kansas school, climbed the summit called equality. In 1969, less than a decade after President Kennedy urged us to the moon, with Apollo II's Eagle resting in the lunar dust, America climbed the summit called space. America's youth must seek new peaks.

Oliver Holmes said, "I find the greatest thing in this world is not so much where we stand as in what direction we are moving." There are no shortcuts through this rugged terrain of hills and gullies and cliffs but together we can strive for, and attain to anything. We need to strengthen our countries ideals and morals by absorbing, listening to, and understanding each and every individual by seeking new approaches to timeless values. We must employ all of our skills and abilities. Summits are reached by climbing. Tomorrow is another day; a canyon is to be crossed. Stars twinkle.

I lick the morning dew from my lips, yawn, and reach with my arms to the sky. I know my friends and I will meet this test but will America meet her's? It is the challenge facing all of us. As our horizons are ever always distant, let us not stand still and look into their purple shadows. Instead, let us seek the higher purposes that lie beyond.

THE MIDDLE CLASS BOOM OF THE 1980'S

HON. BOB McEWEN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. McEWEN. Mr. Speaker, the Congressional Budget Office, a highly partisan arm of the congressional Democratic leadership, has been engaged in a concerted effort to rewrite the economic history of the 1980's.

In order to support the party's political theme that the economic prosperity of the Reagan era was illusory and unfairly distributed, the Democratic leadership's CBO has contrived deceptive statistics and a number of distorted reports.

It is a credit to the CBO staff's creativity and skill in torturing innocent statistics that it takes a significant amount of time and effort to decipher their deceptions and explain just how distorted their presentations are.

Mr. Speaker, the following piece by Alan Reynolds, the highly respected director of economics at the Hudson Institute, explains in detail just how intentionally deception and distorted a recently released CBO study is.

Although the highly partisan and economically absurd CBO study received significant attention from the national media, thus serving its purpose of further distorting the record of across-the-board economic growth of the Reagan administration, I commend the following column by Allan Reynolds to everyone who prefers to know the economic truth about the 1980's.

THE MIDDLE-CLASS BOOM OF THE 1980'S

(By Alan Reynolds)

One of the more persistent myths about the previous decade is that a small number of people saw huge increases in their incomes, while middle-class incomes stagnated and the poor fell behind. A front page New York Times story last week, "The 1980s, A Very Good Time for the Very Rich," thus claims that 94% of all gains in real, after-tax income between 1977 and 1989 went to the most affluent 20% of families, with 60% of the gains supposedly concentrated among the top 1%.

The source of these figures is a December study prepared for the House Ways and Means Committee by the Congressional Budget Office. The CBO has once again tortured innocent statistics with typically creative agility. The biggest problems arise from using a "tax simulation model" to estimate capital gains. The largest capital gains for the middle class have been on houses and pensions, but such accrued gains are not taxable—so the CBO pretends they don't exist.

NOT ADJUSTED FOR INFLATION

Taxable gains, which alone are counted as income, are often realized on assets held for many years. Yet the CBO fails to adjust the basis of these gains for inflation, and fails to subtract non-deductible capital losses, and thus vastly overstates real income at the top. Since the CBO's estimates of realized, nominal gains in a single year are counted as regular income, the effect is to overstate grossly real gains at the top while excluding, by definition, most gains in the middle. And since more high-income taxpayers realized gains while the capital gains tax was reduced, such increased sales of assets automatically show up as increased "income."

To make matters worse, CBO estimates of capital gains for recent years have been enormously inflated. In 1989, the CBO estimated that capital realizations would total $254 billion in 1990. However, Rep. Richard Arney (R., Texas) notes that the actual figure came in at around $120 billion.

Census Bureau surveys are not concocted from tax returns and dubious estimates, and they reveal a far different picture. For all U.S. families, average real income rose by 14.9% from 1980 to 1989, compared to 8.3% in the previous decade. Such a huge increase could not possibly have been confined to a small fraction of families.

A recent Business Week story claims "the bottom 20% of wage earners lagged behind inflation through the 1980s." This is misleading on two counts. First of all, very few family heads in the bottom 20% are "wage earners." Half of the family heads in the lowest fifth didn't work at all in 1990, while only 21% worked full-time all year. By contrast, more than 83% of the families in the top fifth had at least two people working (the average was 2.3).

Second, the claim that the bottom 20% lagged behind inflation is justified by starting with the inflationary boom of 1979 and ending with the recession of 1990. Average real income among the poorest fifth of families fell by 14.5% from 1979 to 1982, but then rose 11.9% between 1982 and 1989. Using 1979 as a base year (or using 1977 as the CBO did), simply averages the Carter collapse against the Reagan recovery. Average real incomes rose in every income group from 1982 to 1989, and were still significantly higher in the recession year of 1990 than in 1980.

The graph shows the really interesting story about what happened in the 1980s. If the middle class is defined as those earning between $15,000 and $50,000, in constant 1990 dollars, then there was indeed a "vanishing middle class" in the 1980s. But this certainly did not mean that those in the middle earned less. On the contrary, it means that 5.3 million families left the middle class by earning a lot more money. What actually happened is not that a fixed percentage of families earned higher incomes, but rather that a much larger percentage of families earned higher incomes.

As the graph shows, 30.5% of American families earned more than $50,000 in 1990 (in constant dollars); only 24.7% earned that much in 1980. The percentage of families earning more than $100,000, in 1990 dollars, rose to 5.6% in 1989 from 2.8% in 1980, before slipping to 5.4% in 1990 (the "top 5%" thus included all families with incomes above $102,358, including all members of Congress).

It is impossible to describe accurately this increased percentage of families earning high incomes in term of fifths (or "quintiles") of the income distribution. Because there were so many more families earning high incomes in 1990 than in 1980, it meant families now require a much higher real income to be averaged within the top 20%, top 5% or top 1%. In 1980, an income of $53,716, in 1990 dollars, would put a family in the top fifth. By 1990, though, that goal post had to be raised to $61,490. After all, it is not possible to fit 31% of all families into the top 20%.

Suppose some miracle had lifted the incomes of 60% of U.S. families above $61,490, rather than 31%. At first glance, this would seem to be a good thing. Certainly the families affected would think so. Yet the effect on income distribution statistics would infuriate habitual income levelers. Since the income currently defining the "top 20%" could not possibly accommodate 60% of all families, a family might then need an income of something like $200,000 to remain in the top fifth. Clearly, the average of all incomes above $200,000 is bound to be higher than the average of those above $61,490.

So, in this hypothetical widening of prosperity, there would doubtless be many hysterical stories reporting that average incomes rose sharply among the top 20%. Indeed, this must be true, by definition. However, incomes in this example would have risen sharply below the top 20% too, which is precisely why the minimum cutoff point defining the top 20% would have to be raised so high. This hypothetical example is simply an extreme illustration of what did, in fact, happen in the 1980s, and why it remains so widely misunderstood.

When statisticians added up all the incomes in the top 20% in 1990, they no longer included incomes between $53,716 and $61,490, which were included in the 1980 average. Any "average income" among the top fifth today is therefore certain to be much larger than before, simply because the supposedly comparable average in 1980 used to be diluted by lower incomes that no longer qualify. This is even more true of the top 5%, or top 1%, where the lowest cut-off point has risen far more sharply. In 1990 dollars, the top 5% included all families with incomes above $84,088 in 1980, but only those with incomes above $102,358 in 1990. Once again, we can scarcely be surprised that an average of all incomes above $102,358 is larger than an average of incomes above $84,088.

Averaging the incomes above two different income levels is particularly nonsensical at the top. This is because, unlike any other "fifth," the top has no ceiling. The middle fifth in 1990 consisted of families earning between $29,044 and $42,040, so the average in that group was roughly in the middle, $35,322.

Even if thousands of families in this group managed to raise their incomes above $42,040 in 1992, that would have very little impact on the average income of the group. Instead, families with increased incomes below the top fifth will simply move up into a higher fifth. If millions of families do that over time, the thresholds will gradually be pushed up a bit, raising the average. But the fact that every quintile below the top has a ceiling means it takes a very large number of families earning much larger incomes to create big gains in any of the lower four-fifths of the income distribution.

This is not so at the top, since all pay increases within a top income group must raise the average, rather than moving people into a higher group. At the top 1%, even a few hundred rock stars and athletes can boost the averages.

TAUTOLOGICAL CBO

Any average of "top" incomes—from "X" to infinity, where "X" must become larger as more families increase their incomes—is almost certain to grow faster than more narrowly defined income groups, where increases are limited by definition. CBO studies based on this simple tautology are no more enlightening than discovering that an average of all families earning more than $10,000 a year always experiences greater average income gains than families whose incomes are between zero and $10,000.

What happened in the 1980s is that a much larger percentage of U.S. families moved up above income thresholds that used to define "the rich." This pushed the thresholds up, necessarily raising the average above the higher top thresholds.

The much-lamented "vanishing middle class" may be a political problem, resulting in a shrinking audience for politicians who base their campaigns on class warfare. But a larger percentage of relatively affluent families is not an economic problem. And all the statistical confusion resulting from an increased percentage of families with high incomes makes the fuss about shares of income going to the top fifth, or top 1%, quite misleading, if not absurd.

LEGISLATION SUSPENDING DUTY ON CONTINUOUS OXIDIZED PAN FIBER TOW

HON. BEN NIGHTHORSE CAMPBELL

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. CAMPBELL of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to introduce legislation that will make a significant contribution to ensuring the continued competitiveness of U.S. industry. My legislation will suspend for a the 3-year period the duty on continuous oxidized polyacrylonitrile [PAN] fiber tow.

BF Goodrich manufactures airline carbon brake assemblies in a facility in Pueblo, CO, in my district. These brake assemblies are recognized worldwide for their high quality and dependability. Their brake structures are so well respected they were able to capture a large portion of the European consortium Airbus business—outbidding a number of European companies. As a result, they are exporting a vast majority of their carbon brakes to France for assembly on various aircraft. Additionally, a recent award to supply Boeing's 777 carbon brake along with their 747-400 program will result in a significant amount of exported goods around the world.

While BF Goodrich has shown the technical ability to deliver a superior product to airframe manufacturers, they still have difficulties competing economically with overseas competitors. The only qualified source for the principal raw material for the carbon brakes is located in Scotland, supplying BF Goodrich and its chief competitors. Unfortunately, BF Goodrich's competitors are able to receive the raw material duty free while our trade policies dictate a 6½-percent duty. Even worse, BF Goodrich will soon be facing a drastic increase in the duty, up to 10 percent.

BF Goodrich has recently requested that U.S. Customs classify this material under the provision for "friction material for brakes for civil aircraft." This duty-free subheading describes the merchandise but they have been advised that for some very technical reasons the provision cannot be applied. Additionally, Customs is currently reviewing the classification of the product and may change the classification to increase the rate of duty to 10 percent. BF Goodrich has been given a drawback rate which will allow them to eventually recover the majority of the duty that is paid. However, because of the long manufacturing cycle, it will be some years before the duty is recovered. The foreign competitors in this industry have an immediate duty advantage over U.S. companies because of duty-free movement of their product within the EC.

The aircraft braking business is extremely competitive since it ranks second, dollarwise, on the list of aircraft components that require replacements due to wear. Since any given aircraft will be in production for 20 years and the life of the aircraft is 20 years, the replacement costs are a significant factor both at Boeing and Airbus, but more importantly the airlines. The 6½-percent or possible 10-percent rate of duty would put BF Goodrich in a competitive disadvantage that could ultimately impact its ability to assist in the balance of trade issues that are impacting the United States today.

Since no domestic supplier exists for PAN, the only option available to BF Goodrich is a suspension of the 6 percent duty. I believe my proposal would make a great contribution to an extremely important industry. I look forward to working with my colleagues on this issue in the coming weeks.

NATIONAL QUILTING DAY

HON. BEVERLY B. BYRON

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mrs. BYRON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to offer a resolution that will designate the third Saturday in March 1993 as "National Quilting Day." I am introducing this resolution to recognize the long and colorful history of quilting, a practice that has been woven into our society for over 3,000 years.

Along with the quilts themselves, quilting as a practice has been passed down from generation to generation. Quilting is practiced for a variety of reasons. Long before the advent of central heating, quilts were made to keep people warm. One can only imagine the warm, cozy feeling one gets as they snuggle under a soft quilt. Quilts were also practical because they often made use of old scraps of material, that were otherwise destined for disposal. These scraps of material were often pieced together and made into a quilt. This was very popular during wartime, when most material went to the war effort, and were scarce at home. This was no more evident than during the Revolutionary War, when quilters showed their true patriotic colors. When the Continental Congress called upon the colonists to promote native industries, women from all classes and walks of life joined in the quilting process and gave the Colonies a sense of self sufficiency and nationalism. During the Great Depression, quilting was seen as a great opportunity for families struggling economically, to be thrifty in troubled economic times. Eleanor Roosevelt incorporated quilt making into the new deal, making it part of the Work Projects Administration [WPA]. Women throughout Appalachia, the Carolinas and Midwest were introduced to this wonderful craft.

Aside from practical purposes, quilting has been a central component in the social landscape of our society. The quilting bee was by far the most popular activity associated with quilting. Along with church and barn raisings, quilting bees were highlights of the social season, particularly along the frontier where contact with neighbors was sporadic at best. These bees afforded the people an opportunity to gather with their distant neighbors and socialize, catch up on old news, and of course, make new quilts.

Contrary to popular belief, quilting is not a practice reserved solely for women. Boys and men were often recruited by the women in the family to aid in cutting and sewing of quilts. In fact, two of our past Presidents, Dwight Eisenhower and Calvin Coolidge, were both enlisted for such tasks. As boys, Dwight Eisenhower and his brothers aided their mother in making a family quilt, while Calvin Coolidge helped cut figures for a quilt used during his Presidency. The product of their labors can still be seen at their respective family museums.

Today, quilting is just as popular as ever. Women continue to quilt out of love for the colors, designs, and the act of quilting itself. Many find it therapeutic and relaxing. I would like to extend my thanks to the National Quilting Association [NQA], located in my district in Elliott City, MD, for their support on this resolution. The NQA was founded by seven women in 1970 and chartered in 1972. Membership is now at 5,500 with over 200 chapters worldwide. Their purpose is to preserve and promote quilting and all activities associated with it. Please join me as cosponsors in honoring this tradition that has become an indispensable component in the American landscape.

DEAR COLLEAGUE

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to introduce for the RECORD a copy of a Dear Colleague that will be circulated to other Members of the House tomorrow.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, April 10, 1992.

DEFENSE ALTERNATIVES FOR THE 1990S AND BEYOND: STRATEGY FOR SUCCESS OR DESIGN FOR DISASTER?

DEAR COLLEAGUE: In the wake of the apparent collapse of totalitarian communism in the former Soviet Union and the probable end of 50 years of bipolar superpower competition, President Bush seized the initiative and announced large defense reductions, in addition to those previously planned by the Pentagon.

The President in his state of the Union address declared, "Two years ago I began planning cuts in military spending that reflected changes of the new era. But now, this year, with imperial communism gone, that process can be accelerated." The reductions President Bush approved will save an additional 50 billion dollars over the next five years. By 1997, defense spending will be reduced by 30 percent since the President took office. These reductions are considerable, but President Bush is firm in his determination not to risk our national security through further cuts. "These cuts are deep, and you must know my resolve: This deep, and no deeper."

As the Secretary of Defense pointed out at a briefing regarding the President's plan, defense outlays as a share of the U.S. gross national product will now fall to just 3.4% in FY 97, well below any time since prior to WW II. Meanwhile, mandatory federal spending will increase 33% and domestic discretionary spending will increase 8% over the same period.

The President's Budget, the "Pentagon Plan," recognizes world changes with increased reductions but still manages to preserve a strong base force for future potential conflicts. Unfortunately, despite these major cuts and the President's commitment to preserve adequate defense strength, Congress has proceeded forward with plans of its own to further reduce defense spending.

Les Aspin, Chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, has outlined several additional defense alternatives for the future. These options, unlike the Pentagon's plan, are based more on past rather than future potential conflicts. Despite the unique circumstances associated with Panama and Iraq, including very modern host facilities, more than adequate time to build up U.S. forces, and the failure of the enemy to properly use the resources at hand, these conflicts are used for justifying additional cuts.

Meanwhile, the Pentagon, looking forward, has focused on seven potential scenarios for future conflict. These scenarios recognize the possibility of various regional confrontations that could require a U.S. military response. While some may question the probability of any of these scenarios, no one can argue against the possibility and the danger of these conflicts occurring. Ten years ago, few would have predicted major U.S. military operations in Panama and Iraq. Tomorrow's wars could be even more serious.

The FY 1993 Budget, recently passed by the House, calls for $7 billion in cuts on top of those already planned by the administration. This House budget basically recognizes Option C of Chairman Aspin's alternatives. With the President's and Mr. Aspin's plans at hand, as well as the Pentagon's assessment of future defense requirements, it seems prudent to examine how these force structures stack up against potential future requirements.

Listed below are the force requirements for three of the seven Pentagon scenarios, as outlined in a New York Times article, and the force structures proposed by DoD and Chairman Aspin:

	Army divisions	Fighter squadrons	Air-craft carriers	Marine MEFs ¹
P. Gulf	4-5	15	3	1
Korea	5+	16	5	2
P.C. & Korea	10+	30+	8	3
Europe	7+	45	6	1
FY91 force	16	108	15	3
DoD base force	12	45	13	2+
Option C	9	30	12	2

The two most glaring differences between Option C and the DoD plan, and potential deficiencies in Mr. Aspin's plan, are the lack of adequate active Army divisions and Air Force fighter squadrons for a European conflict or concurrent Korea/Persian Gulf conflicts.

The Aspin plan for active Army divisions would not cover concurrent conflicts in the Persian Gulf and Korea, and would be dangerously stretched in a European scenario. Meanwhile, all 30 fighter squadrons in Option C would barely cover two simultaneous conflicts, with no additional assets left for other contingencies. These 30 squadrons would not even come close to fulfilling the requirements of a European scenario.

The implications for airpower in Mr. Aspin's plan are especially dangerous. Desert Storm should have proved once and for all the value of U.S. air superiority for quickly projecting power and enhancing the effectiveness of ground units. The DoD proposal, which already reduces active Army divisions by a third from 18 to 12, preserves an adequate number of fighter squadrons at 45. By slashing that number to just 30 in the Aspin plan, we risk not only losing air superiority, but more importantly, the lifesaving support Air Force squadrons provide our ground units and allied ground forces.

Chairman Aspin also claims that his proposed reductions will not result in large cuts in personnel. However, with Air Force and Army force structure reduced so drastically, it will be extremely difficult to prevent personnel reductions to meet these lower force levels.

While the $7 billion FY 93 cut in Mr. Aspin's plan may not leave our fighter squadrons and other units dangerously limited this year, the five-year proposed cut, $114 billion, promises to make our future force structure perilously small. With modernization programs such as the F-22 not scheduled for production until early next century, our forces will not be able to compensate for this lack of size with technological superiority.

Four times this century we have failed to reduce our military forces wisely. We didn't reduce forces wisely after World War I and it cost lives in World War II. We didn't reduce forces wisely after World War II and it cost lives in Korea. We slashed recklessly after Korea and again after Vietnam. In his recent testimony before the House Armed Services Committee, Admiral Leon Edney, Commander in Chief, U.S. Atlantic Command, echoed the warning of most of our other senior military commanders:

"I believe the force levels associated with the base force presented in the budget before you are prudent. To go deeper faster as some members of Congress have outlined would place our ability to reduce in a balanced manner at risk and could jeopardize the quality as well as the readiness of our forces."

When President Bush states "This deep, and no deeper," he seeks to preserve our national security. The Pentagon proposal for defense reductions is a sound strategy for future success. Unfortunately, additional cuts, such as those proposed by Congress, are not well designed for potential future conflicts and could result in disaster for our military forces.

Yours for a strong and secure USA,
ROBERT K. DORNAN,
U.S. Congressman.

BOTH FEDERAL JUDICIAL VACANCIES IN THE VIRGIN ISLANDS SHOULD BE FILLED

HON. RON de LUGO

OF THE VIRGIN ISLANDS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. DE LUGO. Mr. Speaker, the Legislature of the Virgin Islands recently passed a resolution petitioning to have both long vacant judgeships in the two-judge Federal District Court of the Virgin Islands filled within 6 months.

The resolution expresses the great frustration of the people that I represent with the failure of the President to fulfill his statutory obligation to nominate candidates for both judgeships and the great problems this has caused for the exercise of justice in our territory.

As the Virgin Islands' Delegate in the Congress, I have been asked to make sure that every Member receives a copy of this resolution. I am including it in the RECORD for this purpose and to continue my efforts to have qualified judges put on our bench as soon as possible.

The text of the resolution follows:

RESOLUTION

Whereas, two judgeship vacancies have existed on the bench of the District Court of the Virgin Islands for in excess of twenty-four months; and

Whereas, during the period of these two judgeship vacancies, numerous representations have been made to the President of the United States and to the United States Congress pointing out the crucial need to fill the positions; and

Whereas, the representations made to Congress have included but have not been limited to personal visits to Washington D.C. by the liaison to the White House, the Honorable Lilliana Belardo de O'Neal, who accompanied by her colleague, the Honorable Senator Holland Redfield, met with federal officials in Washington in January 1991 and appealed for positive action with respect to nominating qualified Virgin Islanders to the positions; and

Whereas, in addition to the efforts of the liaison to the White House, the Honorable Lilliana Belardo de O'Neal, the V.I. Delegate to Congress, the Honorable Ron De Lugo, members of the V.I. Bar Association and the Executive Branch of the V.I. Government as well as U.S. Judges, those who have business before the courts, several civic and public organizations and others, have all tried to encourage President Bush and members of the Judiciary Committee of the U.S. Senate to fill the two judgeship vacancies; and

Whereas, on the local level both the St. Croix Avis and the Virgin Islands Daily News have editorialized on the subject, taking the position that the unfilled vacancies stymie the judicial system of the Virgin Islands; and

Whereas, letters to the editors have been published in both the St. Croix Avis and the Virgin Islands Daily News demonstrating the anxiety of the V.I. populace in general over the continued existence of the judgeship vacancies; and

Whereas, the matter has escalated into one which has drawn national attention inasmuch as an article which appeared in the July 1, 1991 edition of the Washington Post, entitled "For Some Federal Judges, Long Days in Paradise," highlighted the problem created by the void and the cost to the federal government of the hiatus; and

Whereas, according to the July 1, 1991 Washington Post article, at the last account some 22 judges from various cities on the mainland had served as makeshift judges on the bench of the District Court of the Virgin Islands; and

Whereas, the situation, whereby numerous travelling judges preside on the District Court bench, has caused a scheduling nightmare, a backlog of cases and an environment where visiting federal judges are assigned the highest caseload per judge among all the federal courts; and

Whereas, the lack of consistency evident in this arrangement has resulted in more than one attorney having a criminal case heard by three, four or more visiting judges; and

Whereas, on the sociological level, many concerned citizens in the Virgin Islands have stated that the problem of visiting judges is a serious one because of the preconceived prejudices they may bring with them, on the one hand, and their lack of familiarity with the norms, values and customs of the islands, on the other hand; and

Whereas, according to a December 6, 1990 article in the Daily News, the then visiting Chief Judge, of the Third Circuit Court of appeals, A. Leon Higginbotham, is reported to have said that it is a tragedy that there are not two permanent judges sitting in the Virgin Islands and that he himself has expressed both to the Attorney General of the United States and to the Judiciary Committee of the United States Senate that these two appointments should be the highest priority of the Bush Administration and the Senate Judiciary Committee; and

Whereas, the then Chief Judge Higginbotham is said to have noted that there are a large number of highly competent attorneys in the Virgin Islands who should fill the two judgeship vacancies; and

Whereas, on August 6, 1991, the issue of the two vacant judgeships existing in the U.S. Virgin Islands became internationalized when in an interview with United Nations Radio, Dr. Carlyle Corbin correctly pointed out that it is inexplicable that U.S. Government officials have failed to respond positively to the many representations made to them with respect to the two judgeship positions; and

Whereas, Dr. Carlyle Corbin's comments clearly implied that the federal government was acting capriciously and arbitrarily with respect to the two positions; and

Whereas, by a facsimile letter to the Honorable Lilliana Belardo de O'Neal, Liaison to the White House, on May 20, 1991, Mary McClure, Special Assistant to the President for intergovernmental affairs, stated that two excellent candidates were "currently" in the clearance process; and

Whereas, since May 20, 1991, the Honorable Belardo de O'Neal, Liaison to the White House has written several letters, forwarded dozens of newspaper clippings, made numerous telephone calls, and met formally and informally with federal officials in an attempt to resolve the problem; and

Whereas, despite, several promises by White House officials that action on the U.S. Judgeship vacancies was impending, only one person has been nominated to fill a position and no action has been taken to confirm that nominee; Now, Therefore, be it

Resolved by the Legislature of the Virgin Islands:

Section 1. The Congress of the United States is respectfully petitioned by the Legislature of the Virgin Islands on behalf of the people of the Virgin Islands to employ its power and authority to ensure that the judgeship vacancies on the District Court of the Virgin Islands are filled within six months of the date of passage of this Resolution.

Section 2. Copies of this Resolution shall be forward to the President of the United States, each member of the United States Senate and United States House of Representatives, the Attorney General of the United States and the V.I. Delegate to Congress.

LAWMAKERS INTRODUCE ANCIENT FOREST LEGISLATION

WASHINGTON.—Reps. George Miller (D-Calif.) and Bruce Vento (D-Minn.) today announced joint introduction with leaders of the House Agriculture and Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee of legislation to protect old growth forests of the Pacific Northwest.

The Committees agreed to mark up the legislation during the first two weeks of May—beginning on May 6.

"Last year, a panel of eminent scientists, working with hundreds of forest experts, delivered a devastating indictment of the state of the old growth forests of the Pacific Northwest," said Miller, chairmen of the House Interior Committee. "They told us that if we do not take drastic action soon, an entire unique ecosystem and the wildlife and fish species that depend on it will collapse.

"The time for action to meet this crisis is now," Miller said.

"The chairmen of the House committees and subcommittees with jurisdiction over this critical issue are united in our determination to move a bill based on the sound and reasoned advice of knowledgeable scientists," said Vento, chairman of the Subcommittee on National Parks and Public Lands.

Reps. Miller and Vento, with Agriculture Committee Chairman Kika de la Garza, Forest Subcommittee Chairman Harold Volkmer, Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee Chairman Walter Jones and Fisheries and Wildlife Subcommittee Chairman Gerry Studds, introduced their bill on Thursday.

The chairman indicated they intend to add provisions to their bill to help ease the transition for timber-dependent workers and communities in the Northwest and strengthen protection of watersheds as well.

The measure calls for the establishment of an old growth forest reserve as outlined in a report entitled "Alternatives for Management of Late-Successional Forests of the Pacific Northwest" last October, commonly referred to as the Portland Panel report. It would require the U.S. Forest Service and the Bureau of Land Management to prohibit timber harvest and take other management actions necessary to save old growth forest ecosystems.

The report by the Scientific Panel on Late Successional Forest Ecosystems, convened at the request of the Agriculture and Merchant Marine Committees, outlined a series of alternatives and options to achieve various levels of protection for old growth forest ecosystems and wildlife dependent on those ecosystems.

"We support the least restrictive management alternative the scientists have reported is necessary to provide a high degree of confidence that the diverse old growth biodiversity which includes wildlife and fish such as salmon and trout are going to survive and will not result in another endangered species gridlock," they said. "It is the alternative necessary to assure the protection and enhancement of watersheds and forests."

Miller also emphasized that he would be offering an additional amendment to initiate a similar scientific panel review of the Sierra Nevada forests in California and will propose strong interim protections of the Sierra old growth ecosystems.

The chairmen agreed to the following mark-up schedule: Agriculture Subcommittee on Forests, Family Farms and Energy, May 6; Interior Subcommittee on National Parks and Public Lands, May 7; Interior Committee, May 13; Agriculture Committee, May 14.

UNACCOUNTABLE CONGRESS: IT DOESN'T ADD UP

HON. TOM DELAY

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. DELAY. Mr. Speaker, when Joe DiGuardi left the House in 1989, his interest in congressional accounting, budgeting, and financial management never waned. In fact, Mr. DiGuardi has been serving as chairman of Truth in Government, a citizens' educational watchdog organization he founded, serving as president of the Albanian American Civic League, and is currently running for reelection on the Republican ticket in New York's 20th Congressional District.

In addition to keeping an active political schedule, Mr. DioGuardi has also written a timely and compelling book, "Unaccountable Congress: It Doesn't Add Up." This bill should be read by every voting American, and especially every Member of Congress.

Applying his experience as a certified public accountant [CPA] and firsthand knowledge of the inner-workings of Congress, Joe DioGuardi poignantly exposes the fancy fiscal footwork, phantom funding gimmicks, and bogus budget balancing that legislators use to deceive the American people by failing to disclose the true cost and financial condition of our Federal Government.

Determined to have his voice heard among citizens, legislators, and reporters who have become desensitized to House Democrat mismanagement, Mr. DioGuardi has constructively exploited the current House scandals and other allegations of financial and sexual improprieties lowering the public opinion of Congress to build upon an earlier 1987 expose, "A House of Ill Repute," authored by him and nine other Congressmen and now updated as chapter 6 in DioGuardi's "Unaccountable Congress."

Finding it both ironic and telling that no Member of Congress has ever been hounded into disgrace and retirement because his or her sneaky gimmick was exposed, former Representative DioGuardi details how the phoney accounting principles and budget practices Congress delights in are a far greater threat to our country than anyone's sexual escapades or personal enrichment schemes.

Although Mr. DioGuardi had earned a partnership, at age 31, in Arthur Anderson & Co., a Big Eight accounting firm, he still found that auditing government books was no easy task. "Exploring the financial management of the United States Government," DioGuardi writes, "is very much like being blindfolded and lost in the New York subway system: you don't know where you are, have no idea where you are going and you could fall off the edge at any moment."

"Unaccountable Congress" is more than a book about accounting. Mr. DioGuardi guides his readers through a maze of devices legislators use to obscure spending.

In layman's language, Mr. DioGuardi explains "fudging economic numbers" to make budget projections work, the "off-budget treatment" for hiding Federal expenses, the "current services budget" ploy for faking spending reductions, the "fraud, waste, and abuse excuse" to create theoretical savings and, when all else fails, the "magic asterisk" which deceptively balances a budget by promising—somehow—to find savings later.

"We are living," DioGuardi concludes, "in a fiscal fantasyland that, unlike Cinderella, ends unhappily ever after."

FIREARMS RELATED ACCIDENTS HAVE DECLINED

HON. RICHARD T. SCHULZE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. SCHULZE. Mr. Speaker, I commend to my colleagues the following article which appeared in the New Gun Week. It points out that through proper education and training firearm accidents have declined an impressive 50 percent in the last 20 years to a scant 0.6 per 100,000. The dramatic decline in firearms related accidents over the last two decades is in good part attributable to nationwide hunter safety training program conducted by the National Rifle Association and local gun clubs.

[From the New Gun Week, Feb. 14, 1992]

Recent accident records reveal that, statistically, it is safer to hunt than it is to take a bath. While no one would suggest that everyone stop bathing and instead take up hunting, a comparison of hunting and other shooting accidents with accidents from other common activities helps to put firearms accidents in perspective.

Hunting is one of the country's oldest and most popular outdoor traditions with some 20 million Americans taking to the fields and forests annually in pursuit of game. According to the latest available figures from the Hunter Education Association, hunting continues to be one of the safest forms of recreation. In 1990, there were 146 firearms related hunting fatalities—bath tub drowning account for more than twice as many, an average 350 deaths annually.

Getting back to the original point; all of the shooting sports are safe and getting even safer. The National Safety Council's most recent data from the agency's Accident Facts, 1991 Edition, reports 93,500 accidental deaths in 1990. Nearly half, 46,300 were a result of motor-vehicle accidents. Falls accounted for 12,400. Poisoning claimed 6,500; drowning 5,700 and fires took another 4,300. Suffocation by ingested objects, choking, claimed 3,200. Firearms accidents accounted for 1,400, less than two percent. During the 20-year period from 1970 to 1990 the number of accidental firearms deaths declined more than 41 percent, from 2,406 in 1970 to an 87-year record low of 1,400 in 1990.

The rate of firearms accidents is also very low. For 1990, the overall death rate for all accidents was 37.5 per 100,000; the firearms rate was only 0.6—again, less than two percent of the overall rate. For the same 20-year period, 1970 to 1990, the rate of firearms accidents declined an impressive 50 percent from 1.2 per 100,000 to 0.6 per 100,000.

According to Robert Delfay, executive director of the National Shooting Sports Foundation, "the dramatic decline in firearms related accidents over the last two decades is in good part attributable to nationwide hunter safety training, the firearms safety programs conducted by the National Rifle Association and local gun clubs, almost universal use of 'hunter orange' safety clothing and industry sponsored educational programs."

Through 1991, nearly 20 million hunters and shooters have received safety instruction through accredited state hunter education programs. Many of these programs incorporate firearms safety literature such as the National Shooting Sports Foundation publication "Firearms Safety Depends On You," a 12-page pocket booklet that re-emphasizes and reaffirms the basics of safe gun handling and storage.

TRIBUTE TO RICHARD AURELIO

HON. EDOLPHUS TOWNS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. TOWNS. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to recognize the considerable achievements of Richard Aurelio, a cable industry executive with 30 years of experience who serves as president, Time Warner New York City Cable Group which services 775,000 subscribers in Brooklyn, Manhattan, and Queens. No stranger to the cable industry, Mr. Aurelio served as president and general manager of Brooklyn Queens Cable Television [BQ Cable] a Warner company prior to the merger of Time, Inc., and Warner Communications.

This gentleman has had a varied and distinguished career in communications, government, and journalism. He embarked upon his cable industry career in 1979 when he worked for Warner's cable operations as a senior vice president of governmental affairs.

His professional experiences include serving as president of D.J. Edelman, of New York, Inc., an international public relations firm. He also served as deputy mayor to former New York City Mayor John V. Lindsay, and was the former press secretary and administrative assistant to former U.S. Senator Jacob K. Javits.

Mr. Aurelio also served for 6 years as a founding member of the board of directors of the New York City Off-Track Betting Corp. and for 2 years as a member of the New York State Charter Commission.

He received his B.S. degree in journalism from Boston University and subsequently worked for several New England newspapers. He also worked as a reporter and news editor for Long Island's Newsday newspaper.

Richard Aurelio is a former Air Force veteran who served in the Korean war. He resides in New York with his wife, Suzanne. He is the proud father of a son, Marco. I am pleased to recognize his 30 years of service to the cable industry and the people of New York City.

TRIBUTE TO STEPHEN J. FARKAS

HON. JAMES A. TRAFICANT, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, today I rise to pay tribute to Stephen J. Farkas, my uncle, upon his retirement from Commercial Intertech after nearly 40 years.

Stephen Farkas was born in the midst of the Great Depression in 1930 in Campbell, OH, to Stephen and Helen Kish Farkas, my maternal grandparents who moved to Youngstown from Pennsylvania where my grandfather had worked in the coal mines. Growing up in Youngstown with his sister, my mother Agnes, Uncle Steve attended St. Matthias and Woodrow Wilson High School. While at Woodrow Wilson High School, Steve excelled at basketball, football, and baseball lettering in all three sports.

In fact he did so well, that in 1985, Woodrow Wilson High School inducted Stephen Farkas into its All Sports Hall of Fame as an "Outstanding Running Back." While he was at Woodrow Wilson, he was not only the leading rusher on the football team, but the leading scorer on the basketball team and the top pitcher on the baseball team.

In fact in his senior year versus Struthers High when I was but a boy in attendance, I can remember Uncle Steve receiving a kickoff 3 yards in the end zone and returning it 103 yards for a touchdown. This amazing feat of athleticism still stands to this day as a record for the longest kickoff return in the Youngstown metropolitan area's history.

Uncle Steve led the league in rushing yards and average yards per carry during his sophomore year in 1946 during Woodrow Wilson High School's only undefeated season, one of the greatest teams in Ohio history.

After I had completed my career at Cardinal Mooney High School, I enrolled at the University of Pittsburgh where I was the starting quarterback from 1960-62. On nearly every occasion, my Uncle Steve and Aunt Eleanor and my parents would be at the game. Uncle Steve was always there lending a helping hand and advise to me and my brother, same.

At the age of 21, Stephen Farkas enlisted in the Navy and served aboard the USS Ashland, LSD-1. One year later, he married the beautiful Eleanor Babik of Lansingsville. How vividly I recall seeing this handsome couple together at family and community functions. Stephen represented the U.S. Navy in the Mediterranean and the Panama Canal for 4 years until 1955. He then returned to the Youngstown area to work for Commercial Intertech, formerly Commercial Shearing, as an electrician where he followed both his father Steve, my grandfather, and Uncle Charlie Kish at the Youngstown industrial landmark.

Uncle Steve and Aunt Eleanor completed the American dream when they built a home in Austintown, where they raised their two children, Steven and Lori. Their daughter, Lori, and her husband, Mark Bleggi, are the proud parents of Stephen and Eleanor's first grandchild, Ashley, a most beautiful young lady, indeed.

So after nearly 40 years of service to the Commercial Intertech Corp., Stephen Farkas has earned his retirement.

I am sure that I join our immediate and extended family, plus all of his coworkers in congratulating him on his service to both the Commercial Intertech Corp. and the community.

Uncle Steve Farkas is a great friend, a great uncle, great father, great husband, and I love him dearly. He is truly a great American patriot, as well.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

PASS THE REFORM PACKAGE TODAY

HON. THOMAS R. CARPER

OF DELAWARE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. CARPER. Mr. Speaker, in recent years, we have witnessed an embrace of democracy by people in nations throughout the world; from the Soviet Union to Eastern Europe to Latin America to Southeast Asia and, even, to South America. Ironically, that embrace is occurring at the very time when a number of Americans, here in the cradle of democracy, are losing faith in our basic Democratic institutions, including our Nation's Congress. As I sit here this afternoon, listening to the tenor of this debate, I must confess that I am losing a little more of my faith, too.

A question on the minds of too many Americans in recent months has been, "How can we trust those in Congress to manage our Nation's business when they can't even manage the running of Congress on a daily basis?" It is a good question, one that demands both answers and action.

A number of steps must be taken if we are to begin to restore the confidence of the American people in us, in this institution, and in our ability to govern. Today, we have the opportunity to take one of those steps. Not all of the steps. Not the last step. The first step.

In judging the legislation before us today, however, we should ask ourselves at least three questions.

First, are these changes comprehensive and real, or are they largely illusory;

Second, do they provide for professional management and independent auditing of House operations, or will they simply mask the continuation of a decades-old, political patronage system of mismanagement; and

Third, will these changes begin to alter the perception of many Americans that Members of Congress have become some kind of privileged class, served by the people, rather than servants of the people.

I believe these reforms, while long overdue, represent genuine change and incorporate some of the best ideas of both Democrat and Republican Members alike.

A professional administrator for non-legislative affairs, selected on merit by the bipartisan leadership of the House, likely will produce a sea of change in the way that business is conducted here. The designation of an inspector general to audit the financial management of the House, promises to hold the collective feet of future Congresses to the fire if that person is truly independent. And, finally, a number of the perks that Members have enjoyed, and taxpayers have decried, will be abolished. Those that remain—haircuts, meals in House restaurants, a gymnasium, access to a physician—must be paid for by Members at market prices. And they should be.

In closing, let me just add that I did not come here 10 years ago to enjoy the perks of Congress, to vote by proxy on my committees, or to abuse our franking privileges. I doubt that any of us did. We came here to help govern our Nation. There is much that needs to be done, much that demands our full attention—the availability and affordability of health care, budget deficits approaching $400 billion, stagnant productivity, a declining standard of living, dysfunctional families, and schools where too little learning occurs.

Let us pass this reform package today. But let us also pledge to work together this year for badly needed reforms in the way we finance our campaigns and in overhauling the legislative process of this body. And while we do so, let us get back to work—now—on the issues and concerns that brought each of us here in the first place.

A TRIBUTE TO GLENVILLE HIGH SCHOOL: NATIONAL BICENTENNIAL COMPETITION

HON. LOUIS STOKES

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to pay tribute to the Glenville High School students for doing exceptionally well in February during the National Bicentennial Competition on the Constitution and Bill of Rights. The Glenville High School students recently captured the districtwide championship, and although they were unsuccessful in securing the bid in Columbus, we are extremely proud of them.

The competition, which is viewed as the most extensive educational program in the country, is part of the 200th anniversary of the Bill of Rights celebration. For the past 4 years, the tournament has allowed students, nationwide, to become well-versed on the Bill of Rights.

Mr. Speaker, Not only does the competition help the students to become experts on the Bill of Rights, but it prepares them for the future. The 29 students are able to meet with individual adults who serve as role models and mentors throughout the competition process. Constitutional scholars, lawyers, Congressmen, Senators, and Government leaders all participate in the learning process.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to rise today to praise the achievements of the Glenville High School students. I also commend Glenville High School Principal Elbert Cobbs and his staff for their outstanding work. I wish them much continued success.

VICTORIOUS VETERANS' PEACE DIVIDEND

HON. MAXINE WATERS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Ms. WATERS. Mr. Speaker, I am privileged to be introducing pieces of legislation today that constitute the Military Coalition's Victorious Veterans' Peace Dividend.

I came to Congress in 1991, just after the collapse of the Soviet Union. With the end of the cold war, many people—representing many different constituencies—realized the potential a peace dividend could have on their communities. Clearly, with our primary military threat extinct, it would no longer be necessary to spend $300 billion a year for national security. Those savings could be reinvested and meet the needs of our people.

The legislation put forward today does not deal with precisely what this country ought to spend to defend itself. Rather, it focuses on one fundamental principle. Those military service men and women—and their families—who have given so much to fight the cold war, deserve to share in the fruits of victory.

When I came to Congress, I thought of the peace dividend as a way to house the homeless, heal the sick, educate our children, and train the jobless.

However, serving on the Veterans Affairs Committee has opened my eyes to another great American tragedy. This Government has a promise to keep to our veterans and the military servicepeople who have trusted us. I have heard horror stories from around this country of Persian Gulf veterans, burned and homeless—of career military men and women let go, just before they were to qualify for their pension. The list goes on and on.

It must be said—over and over again—veterans and military families are at the top of the list of those who deserve a slice of the peace dividend.

Military downsizing is ruining the lives of tens of thousands of people who thought they had a career in the military. The last 10 years has seen a continuous erosion in veterans benefits across the board. It does not seem unreasonable to earmark some portion of the projected savings in military spending to those who have sacrificed so much. Veterans have gone from parades to poverty in one short year. How soon we can forget. My package would do several important things. Let me briefly explain what each of the five bills introduced would do.

First, we would give enlisted military personnel who have served between 18 and 29 years the same rights to retention as officers—thereby giving them a chance to earn their military pension.

Second, we would repeal the provisions of the 1990 Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act which curtailed a series of veterans benefits including pensions, health care reimbursement, and compensation for certain widows.

Third, we would assist the so-called forgotten widows, widows of retirees who died before 1974, who currently receive no survivor benefits.

Fourth, we would clarify and enhance the military survivor benefit plan so surviving spouses receive the same benefits as those under the civil service survivor plan.

And finally, we would provide a one-time 10 percent cost-of-living adjustment for pre-1963 military retirees whose COLA's have not kept up with other retirees.

I would like to make one additional point. Last week, the House failed to pass legislation that would have allowed transfers within spending accounts. I supported this measure and believe it to be important. However, in today's case, the proposals we are advocating could be paid from the military account of the budget. No budget transfer would be necessary. Thus, while it may be difficult to get money for housing or health care or job training in this year's budget, we can still reprogram military funds to meet the needs of our military families. It may be all that is possible this year.

The total cost for this package would not exceed $2 billion a year, although a precise estimate is difficult to make. President Bush's most recent defense budget cuts an $50 billion over the next 5 years. Most think this number will be even lower.

In conclusion, this much is clear—if we choose to act, we can pay for these reforms—and pay back a great debt to the military men and women of this country.

Finally, this battle for the peace dividend is only beginning. Next year, the budget walls will be eliminated. It will be a scramble to fund priority programs, but it will certainly be possible.

BILL TO END FEDERAL PERKS

HON. WILLIAM J. HUGHES

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, today I am joining with my colleague, Congressman ROB ANDREWS of New Jersey, in introducing legislation to prohibit the use of taxpayer funds to provide subsidized meals or other services throughout the entire Federal Government, including the executive branch, independent agencies, and Federal court system.

Our bill is a followup to the legislation we introduced last month to end similar congressional perks. Our latest bill would do the following:

First, prohibit the use of taxpayer funds to provide meals, medicine, medical services, athletic facilities, entertainment, or other services at any Federal agency or department at costs lower than those charged to the public, except where those services are directly related to the official business of the agency;

Second, prohibit the use of Government cars or drivers at all Federal agencies except where such transportation is necessary for purposes of national security, the personal safety of the official, or is the most practical and cost-effective means of transportation available to carry out official functions of the agency; and Third, require the detailed, public disclosure of all travel taken outside the United States by employees of all Federal agencies on an annual basis.

I realize that many of these services have traditionally been provided, but it's a new age. While I understand full well the need to provide some conveniences to Federal agencies, it should not be done at public expenses.

I urge my colleagues to join with us cosponsoring this legislation, so that we can eliminate the perks and begin to rebuild public confidence in all our institutions of Government.

THIRTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE ACCOKEEK FOUNDATION, A MARYLAND INSTITUTION

HON. STENY H. HOYER

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, 35 years ago this month, a group of farsighted citizens established a nonprofit organization " * * * to preserve, and study for the benefit of the people of the Nation, the historical sites and relics, trees, plants, and wildlife rapidly disappearing from an area of great natural beauty along the Maryland Shore of the Historic Potomac River."

The Accokeek Foundation, working in close cooperation with the U.S. Congress, the Mount Vernon Ladies Association of the Union, and the U.S. Department of the Interior, has accomplished its goal and much more in the ensuing years. As a result of its efforts, the 4,700-acre Piscataway National Park, which lies in Charles and Prince Georges Counties in Maryland, has been preserved. The precious and pristine view from George Washington's historic home in Mount Vernon, VA, has been protected for present and future generations. Creation of the park represents the largest assemblage of voluntary donations of scenic easements by private property owners in the history of the National Park Service. And a variety of programs have been established to increase the public's awareness of our national and regional identity, based on our heritage of natural richness, agricultural productivity, environmental quality, and cultural diversity.

The Accokeek Foundation operates the national colonial farm, which is open to the public year round and demonstrates ordinary life on a middle-class tobacco plantation on the eve of the American Revolution. It also has an arboretum, nature trails, rare varieties of farm plants and animals, and a long-term project to restore the American chestnut tree.

Furthermore, the Accokeek Foundation has taken the lead in the Potomac River heritage project, an effort to bring together the business, environmental conservation, historic preservation, museum, and tourism communities along the entire 350-mile length of the Potomac River in a common recognition of the vitality and significance of this corridor in our American heritage.

The foundation is also actively involved in studying the best techniques and principles of sustainable agriculture: A mission which could influence the way food is produced in the future. This new project is a living memorial to the Accokeek Foundation's founder, Mr. Robert Ware Straus who died last August.

To think that all of these activities are being undertaken by one institution is amazing, but to consider that it is taking place only a dozen miles from our Nation's Capitol, in Piscataway National Park, is overwhelming.

The relatively small investment made by the Federal Government has produced enormous conservation and cultural dividends. The foundation's board of trustees, advisory council, and honorary institute include more than 50 distinguished individuals committed to working with the foundation's staff and expanding corps of volunteers.

The Accokeek Foundation is a model of cooperation between the Federal Government and the private sector. Its projects have been held up and replicated many times, both in the United States, and abroad. A genuine asset to Maryland and the Nation, the Accokeek Foundation celebrates its 35th anniversary with a renewed commitment and vision to influence the future for the better.

INTRODUCTION OF THE WHISTLEBLOWER PROTECTION ENFORCEMENT ACT

HON. THOMAS H. ANDREWS

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. ANDREWS of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to introduce legislation that helps ensure better treatment of our Nation's whistleblowers.

It takes courage to speak out against wrong-doing. It takes even more courage to bring attention to fraud when you fear retaliation or losing your job. Nevertheless, genuine whistleblowers take this risk. They believe it is the right thing to do.

We need to encourage such honesty in the workplace and protect those who strive to stop illegal or fraudulent activity. Our Nation depends on people to do this. Unfortunately, our Government has not done enough to provide basic protections to those who seek to prevent waste, fraud, or abuse. Unless we improve our Government's response to whistleblowers, we will continue to send them the message that it is not worth trying to change the system, that the Government won't get involved, and that they are on their own.

In 1989, a good law was passed—the Whistleblower Protection Act. This act sets out a clear path for Federal employees to follow when they are penalized for blowing the whistle on waste, fraud, and abuse. There is a serious problem, however. Once whistleblowers seek the Office of Special Counsel, they are left to wait, and wait, and wait.

The Office of Special Counsel is set up to investigate cases and determine if there are reasonable grounds to a whistleblower's allegations. Every 60 days the Special Counsel is required to notify the whistleblower of the status of its investigation. Unfortunately, there is no deadline for the Office of the Special Counsel determining whether or not a whistleblower's case has reasonable grounds.

Paul Camire, a worker at the Portsmouth Naval Shipyard in my district, has waited for 2 years to hear from the Office of Special Counsel. His case represents what can go wrong when an honest person speaks out.

In 1988, Mr. Camire raised concerns about quality controls on parts being used in the construction of nuclear reactors for submarines at the shipyard. He found defects in the metal fasteners used in nuclear submarines, potentially a very serious problem. Following Naval Sea Systems Command procedures, he issued a letter to Navy quality assessment personnel detailing the deficiencies.

Before the Navy could take action, Mr. Camire was ordered by his superiors to cancel the letter. When he refused, they canceled it for him. Shortly thereafter, he was reassigned out of his job in the quality control division, and put him to work in an area where he had little expertise, thereby ending his career advancement. He became subject to ridicule. Prior to this reassignment, Mr. Camire had an unblemished career record. He had received both performance awards and a monetary bonus for his excellent work at the shipyard.

After trying to work things out at the shipyard, Mr. Camire turned to the Maine congressional delegation for help. On January 17, 1990, the Office of Special Counsel accepted his complaint and said the case was under active review. In early February 1991, I contacted the Special Counsel's office to determine the status of the case. I was told it was still under active review. In May 1991, I called the Special Counsel again to request an expedited review. In July 1991, Senator GEORGE MITCHELL and I wrote to the Office to ask, yet again, for the Counsel's final investigation report. More than 2 years after first receiving this case, the Office of Special Counsel still has the case under active review.

This is completely unacceptable. Mr. Camire deserves to be freed of waiting. There is no doubt in my mind that Mr. Camire felt that he was doing the right thing. He was concerned about safety and the potential danger to military crews aboard nuclear submarines. Now, years later, Mr. Camire still has no answer. He has not won back his position at the shipyard. His health has suffered. Mr. Camire has been left to twist in the wind after trying to do what he thought was right, and essential, to protect lives.

My legislation would help prevent this situation from occurring in the future. Rather than have whistleblowers wait for months and years, the Office of Special Counsel would be required to notify the whistleblower within 18 months of receiving the allegations whether or not the Special Counsel finds support for the whistleblower's case. This deadline gives ample time for a full and thorough investigation. This does not restrict the Office of Special Counsel from further gathering information on a case. The whistleblower, however, would not be left in limbo, waiting for years without an answer, whatever it may be.

This is just the first step in improving conditions for whistleblowers. I will work on additional legislation to increase and strengthen whistleblowers' rights and protections. We should be encouraging honest citizens to come forward, not treating them poorly. We benefit from their honesty. Whether we like it or not, Mr. Camire's case is an example for anyone else who sees wrong-doing. People see how Paul Camire has been treated and see that they could not win by speaking out. This must change. Citizens who demonstrate integrity and honesty should be rewarded, not penalized.

CONGRESSMAN GEORGE MILLER
SALUTES PUBLIC PRIVATE VENTURES

HON. GEORGE MILLER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, I have recently had the great pleasure to get to know more about a Philadelphia group called Public Private Ventures.

PPV was created in 1977 as an outgrowth of the CETA Program. It was an attempt to develop a research-oriented organization charged with responsibility for finding the best ways to deal with poor youth, and, as part of that, to measure the effectiveness of various approaches.

Last month, as the leadoff witness in hearings chaired by the gentleman from New York, Mr. DOWNEY, Michael Bailin, the president of Public Private Ventures presented to the Ways and Means Human Resources Subcommittee an important report on a summer program called STEP, Summer Training and Employment Program. The report is entitled, "Anatomy of a Demonstration."

The STEP Program has been a model of public/private initiatives, funded by the foundations, corporations, and the Department of Labor. It was first tried in five demonstration sites—Boston, Portland, Oregon, Fresno, Seattle, and San Diego—and involved 5,000 poor youth, 14- and 15-year-olds.

STEP's was focusing on stemming summer learning loss and preventing teen pregnancy. The young participants were paid for doing work and took classes as well. Because one summer was viewed as not enough to have a solid positive impact, participants were offered two summers in the program.

The report released last month by PPV was startling in many respects. First, it found that STEP had positive short-term impacts on the young people involved. Over the summer, STEP significantly boosted the youth's academic competence and knowledge of responsible sexual behavior. Second, it found that the program originally implemented in the five demonstration sites could be replicated in another 100 communities with considerable effectiveness.

What the research did not find—and here's the more sobering news—was any appreciable long-term positive impact on the young STEP participants.

This was one of the most indepth evaluations of any program ever undertaken. The effort looked back 8 years and asked the tough question: What became of these young people once they were out of the STEP Program and back in the community? The answer is not much in a positive sense.

What is the lesson from "Anatomy"? Some might say that we may conclude that nothing works and we should stop funding such things.

Others though would surely come to a different conclusion. I am one of those who believes strongly that the problem is not that STEP did not work. We know that it did in the short-term. The problem is that we throw children into these programs to get short-term boosts. Whether it is Head Start for the youngest or STEP for the teenagers, we should never expect that such boosts are enough.

Mr. Bailin and the authors of "Anatomy" believe that we must find effective ways to attack not only the problem of summer, when so many poor children lose so much ground, but also the problems created by other periods of gap time in these youngsters lives—weekends and evenings, for example, as well as the period between their completing high school and—for those who do not continue their education—their entry into the job market.

Public Private Ventures continues its search for the best approaches to helping poor youth. Their ongoing initiatives on mentoring, their focus on unwed teen fathers, their indepth look at youth service, all deserve our attention and our support.

In the meantime, their work serves as a reminder that unless we take the problems of poor youth more seriously, we will relegate another generation to the scrap heap.

FUNDING NEEDED FOR IMPROVEMENTS AT NATIONAL PARKS IN THE MARIANA ISLANDS

HON. BEN GARRIDO BLAZ

OF GUAM

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. BLAZ. Mr. Speaker, in 1978, Congress established War in the Pacific National Historical Park in Guam and American Memorial Park in Saipan to commemorate the bravery and sacrifices of those who participated in the Pacific theatre during World War II. Unfortunately, in their current state, these Parks do not deserve to be called National Parks nor are they fitting memorials to our Pacific World War II veterans.

We, in Congress, were all very conscious of the 50th anniversary of the attack on Pearl Harbor in December 1991. The summer of 1994 will mark the 50th anniversary of the liberation of Guam and the capture of the Northern Marianas from the Japanese. The recapture of Guam liberated the only American community occupied by the enemy during World War II. But, as we have seen repeatedly, freedom rarely comes easily and the liberation of Guam and the capture of Saipan was no exception. For the nearly 6,000 who perished and the over 20,000 who were injured during the Campaign, the fact that these park sites lie on American soil is the only testament to their many sacrifices. While other countries have erected monuments in Guam and Saipan, our parks have received minimal funding and appear abandoned for lack of interest. The makeshift visitors' center at War in the Pacific NHP consists of a refurbished office building with limited space and few interpretive devices while American Memorial Park in Saipan consists of the acreage and a single plaque. This can hardly be considered a national park and does little as a memorial to the Americans who perished at the sites. Needless to say, it is an affront to anyone whose relative fought in the Pacific to allow these parks to remain in such ignoble condition during the 50th anniversary of the Marianas campaign.

Mr. Speaker, in an effort to rectify this woefully embarrassing state of affairs with respect to our treatment of our World War II veterans, I am introducing legislation on behalf of myself, Mr. MONTGOMERY, Mr. PICKETT, Mr. STUMP, Mr. BREWSTER, Mr. YOUNG of Alaska, Mr. KENNEDY and Mr. LAGOMARSINO. This bill is very similar to S. 2321 introduced last month by Senator DANNY AKAKA who has once again proven to be a great friend of both our veterans and of our people. Both bills will increase the authorization level from $500,000 at War in the Pacific NHP and $3 million at American Memorial Park to $8 million for each park. These increases will allow for construction of appropriate facilities for the interpretation of the events which occurred in the Mariana Islands. These facilities will provide a suitable forum for the 50th anniversary celebration on June-July 1994 as well as a lasting remembrance for future generations.

INTRODUCTION OF THE FLEXIBLE MEDICAL ACCESS PLAN

HON. BENJAMIN L. CARDIN

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. CARDIN. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Flexible Medical Access and Cost Containment Act. This legislation abides by the three cardinal principles of health care reform by controlling costs, providing for universal access and retaining the high quality of medicine.

One role of the Federal Government is to ensure that every American has access to health coverage. Much of the debate on health care reform focuses on what role, if any, the Federal Government should play in directly providing health insurance. Conservatives—of both parties—argue that Government involvement in health insurance creates bureaucracies and other inefficiencies in the health market. They believe the competition among private insurers guarantees efficiency and a fair market price for insurance. Liberals have argued just the opposite. They compare our private insurance system with single payer systems and claim we can save up to $100 billion by eliminating the duplicative administrative costs of the private health insurance industry.

My bill calls the bluff of both conservatives and liberals. It would create a level playing field for competition between private insurance companies and the Federal Government. As insurers both would be subject to the same underwriting and marketing restrictions: no group insurance may discriminate based on health status or medical history; insurers must guarantee availability on a continuous, year-round basis and guarantee renewability; pre-existing condition exclusions would be limited to the first 6 months an individual is insured; and all small group plans must be community rated. Both private and public insurers would be required to pay health providers the same reimbursement rates. The Federal Government would sell its insurance products to businesses and individuals based on a premium per enrollee, just as private insurance companies do. This is in contrast to other pay-or-play schemes in which businesses buy public insurance based on a percentage of payroll. My proposal would provide increased tax breaks to help small businesses purchase insurance, but these tax breaks would apply equally, regardless of whether the business purchased public or private insurance.

A mandate on employers to provide insurance would be phased-in over several years. The option to buy public insurance would be available only to small- and medium-sized firms with up to 100 employees. If the Federal Government can provide an attractive product at a lower cost than I imagine most of these businesses will buy the public plan and big businesses will begin lobbying for the right to buy into the public plan. If the public plan cannot compete with private insurance, then the debate on moving toward a single payer system should end. Private insurance will live or die by the market. Public insurance will live or die by its claimed efficiencies.

To address the needs of the poor and the near poor not in the work force, Medicaid would be abolished and replaced with a new, Government-sponsored plan administered as a separate program under Medicare. This public plan would pay the same reimbursement rates as all other insurance plans to ensure there would be no cost shifting by the Government to private insurance plans and to encourage more doctors to treat poor patients.

I would note several considerations provided for small businesses in my proposal. Only small- and medium-sized businesses will have the option of purchasing the new public plan. The mandates for small businesses to provide health coverage do not take effect until cost containment efforts have been in place for 4 years. The bill also provides for a tax subsidy to help small businesses to purchase health insurance.

Another major role for the Federal Government is to control health costs which have been increasing as if there were no bound. Some reform proposals would establish one set of payment rates for all health services throughout the country. While I am not philosophically opposed to rate-setting, the possibility of these important health decisions being made on a national basis concerns me. Many Members of Congress, particularly my colleagues on the Ways and Means Committee, share my frustration at the inability of Medicare's prospective payment system to change the behavior of hospitals.

It is notable that the one State that has been able to control hospital costs without disruptions in the delivery of care is exempt from the national prospective payment system. My legislation builds on the model of local rate-setting best illustrated by Maryland's Health Care Cost Review Commission for hospital reimbursements. Maryland is exempt from the Medicare hospital payment system so long as costs per admission in Maryland hospitals remain below the national average. By setting its own rates, Maryland has been able to reduce costs per admission from 25 percent above the national average to about 9 percent below the national average. These savings have been achieved without resorting to rationing and have allowed such prestigious institutions as Johns Hopkins Hospital and the University of Maryland Hospital to prosper.

My proposal would have a national commission establish limits on the rate of growth of all health costs and apportion this spending among the States. It would be the States' obligation to create payment systems to meet these spending targets for all covered health services. The Federal commission would set payment systems for States that fail to establish rate-setting commissions. Health needs vary throughout the country and States should be empowered to respond to these needs, just as Maryland is using its rate system to respond to the State's disproportionately high incidence of cancer. Local rate-setting also allows for experimentation from State to State on the best methods for improving the public health.

The bill provides for a phased-in reduction in the rate of growth of health care until costs are growing no faster than the economy. The all-payor systems and the other administrative simplification provisions will allow for significant savings. On top of this, the financial incentives to reduce unnecessary care will allow for real constraints on spending without reducing the quality or availability of health care.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation will accomplish the three major goals of health reform: providing universal access to health coverage; making health care affordable; and ensuring the continued high quality of medicine in our country. It allows for diversity and encourages innovation in our health care delivery system. It is fiscally responsible and politically possible; I believe it is significantly less costly than the pay-or-play plans. I urge my colleagues to consider this legislation as the health reform debate moves forward.

ADMINISTRATION RESPONSE TO PALAU MISLEADING DOES NOT SPEAK FOR CONGRESS

HON. RON de LUGO

OF THE VIRGIN ISLANDS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. DE LUGO. Mr. Speaker, an administration official has finally responded to proposals made last year by the leaders of the trust territory of Palau to resolve the future political status of their islands.

Unfortunately, the response was misleading and contrary to our Nation's obligation to help the territory develop into a self-governing status appropriate to its circumstances and the wishes of its people. According to a report by the Associated Press, the response has jeopardized the future status that the Federal and territorial governments have been working to develop for years.

I want to make it clear that the response does not reflect the views of the U.S. Government as a whole.

Mr. Speaker, as you know, the United States has approved an arrangement to make the territory a state in free association with our Nation through legislation that I, as chairman of the Insular and International Affairs Subcommittee, sponsored. But, although the arrangement was negotiated with Palau's Government, it has not been approved in seven referendums in Palau.

Last May, Palau's leaders told the subcommittee and the administration that the arrangement would not be approved "as is." They also, though, asked that Federal representatives work with them to overcome its problems.

In making this request, they stressed that they would not ask for more money; that their proposals would be negotiable; and that, if an understanding could be reached informally, they would seek their people's approval of a modified arrangement before seeking formal U.S. approval.

The Interior and Insular Affairs Committee responded by having representatives discuss the issues with representatives of Palau last July. Our bipartisan conclusion was that what Palau wanted to propose was a reasonable starting point for negotiation.

After bipartisan pressure from our subcommittee, the administration assigned a representative to listen to Palau's proposals, but it never really engaged in the negotiations Palau sought.

Instead, officials asked Palau's leaders for demonstrations of their good faith—which they received—and sent both counterproductive signals and hints that there would be a substantive response to Palau's proposals.

There are several specific problems with the response that they finally gave Palau a few days ago that I want to note.

First and foremost, the response implied that it spoke for the Congress.

It did not.

Second, it declined to negotiate, asserted that there would not be further cooperation and progress between the United States and Palau until free association is approved, and threatened that the United States might abandon its trust responsibility for Palau.

This was a crude attempt at intimidation, unworthy of this great Nation and inconsistent with the obligations regarding Palau assumed by law in 1947. It was particularly outrageous because Palau is so powerless: There are only 15,000 people in the islands.

Third, it suggested the Congress would be likely to take back much of the money already appropriated for the arrangement if any modifications whatsoever were made. Its contentions in this regard will cause unrealistic fears.

Fourth, it recognized only three of the possibilities for Palau's future political status: the free association arrangement as negotiated to date; independence; and—contradicting the administration's own arguments against negotiating—a modified arrangement.

Finally, I would also like to note that the response's discussion of Palau's proposals themselves indicates that the proposals are a reasonable basis for modifications.

Mr. Speaker, consensus in Palau on the proposed status arrangement is even more essential than it usually is for an area's status development. This is because Palau's constitution requires 75 percent approval of the arrangement since it would grant the United States military nuclear rights that are otherwise prohibited by the islands' constitution.

For almost a year now, many of Palau's leaders have agreed to try to get the arrangement approved if modifications that overcome the problems with it can be agreed to. The worst aspect of the administration's response to date to the proposals of Palau's leaders is that it subverts the consensus that exists to try to gain approval of a free association arrangement.

Not living up to our Nation's commitments to help Palau develop into a self-governing status appropriate to its circumstances and the wishes of its people now will not eliminate the need to do so later. And we may have an even more difficult job of working out a future status arrangement with Palau if we do not take advantage of this opportunity.

So, the administration should provide Palau's leaders with a constructive and sympathetic response to their proposals rather than undermine their efforts to resolve the territory's future status.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I want to explain that we have not criticized the administration's lack of response to Palau over the past months in the hope that their eventual response would be more positive than it has turned out to be. I make these critical remarks today not for any political purpose; but to encourage more responsible efforts in the future.

HOW WILL IT PLAY IN PEORIA

HON. WILLIAM (BILL) CLAY

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Speaker, national attention has recently been focused on Peoria, IL; specifically on the labor dispute between Caterpillar, Inc., and its employees represented by the United Auto Workers of America. On April 1, 1992, April Fool's Day as it is known colloquially, Caterpillar announced that it was unilaterally implementing key provisions of what it terms to be its final contract offer. But the threat to permanently replace any striking worker who failed to return to work by April 6, 1992, was not an April Fool's joke.

The contract between the UAW and Caterpillar expired on September 31, 1991. Of the 17,000 Caterpillar employees represented by the UAW, 12,500 represented on the picket line. The company clearly resorted to economic weapons. It stockpiled goods in advance of the strike; it sought to bargain directly with employees rather than through their representatives at the bargaining table; it replaced striking workers with managers and salaried employees; and it locked out union employees in its efforts to gain concessions from the union.

The workers at Caterpillar are utilizing the only legal means available to them—they have chosen to legally withhold their services in an effort to force management to take seriously what these workers feel are fair and adequate terms and conditions of employment. They are undergoing severe deprivations in order to protect their long-term ability to provide for their families. By hiring permanent replacements, Caterpillar has made a mockery of the only rights workers have in a labor dispute—the right to strike.

Mr. Speaker, the practice of permanently replacing strikers is insidious and destroys more than the rights of American workers. As the citizens throughout this country from Jay, ME, to Morenci, AZ, can testify, resorting to hiring permanent replacements destroys the social fabric of entire communities. It pits neighbor against neighbor and exalts self-interest at the expense of community interest. Having seen what has occurred in other places, it is difficult to overstate the foreboding I feel for the citizens of Peoria. The hate and mistrust engendered by Caterpillar's hiring of permanent replacements is likely to last a generation.

The permanent replacement of striking workers is a loophole in our labor laws that this country can no longer afford. It makes hollow the right of workers to exercise a voice in the determination of their terms and conditions of employment. It destroys the partnership between management and worker, exacerbates both the severity and the duration of the labor dispute, and imposes costs on businesses resorting to this tactic from which they frequently cannot recover.

The House of Representatives has already passed legislation I have sponsored to end the practice of permanently replacing strikers—H.R. 5, the Workplace Fairness Act. Unfortunately, President Bush has said that he will veto the bill.

Clearly, the practice of permanently replacing striking workers is one that employers and business owners feel is in their best interest. As elected Representatives, however, our duty is to the welfare of the Nation as a whole. Where the self-interest of one's friends so clearly conflicts with the common good, we have a duty to tell our friends that what they ask for is too much. It is on this basis that I ask all my colleagues, and particularly my Republican colleagues, to work with me to ensure that the Workplace Fairness Act becomes law. The practice of permanently replacing workers who exercise their lawful right to strike must end once and for all.

Mr. Speaker, I commend to my colleagues' attention two articles from the "Daily Labor Report", a publication of the Bureau of National Affairs, Inc. The first article appeared on October 21, 1991, and is entitled "Chief U.S. Mediator Says Use of Permanent Strike Replacements Makes Bargaining Difficult". The second article appeared on April 3, 1992, and is entitled "Analysts Say UAW-Caterpillar Dispute Could Have Significant Ramifications".

CHIEF U.S. MEDIATOR SAYS USE OF PERMANENT STRIKE REPLACEMENTS MAKES BARGAINING DIFFICULT

Bernard E. DeLury, the head of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service, disagreed with the Bush administration Oct. 18 on the effectiveness of U.S. labor law when it comes to the issue of permanent strike replacements.

DeLury, who heads the federal agency charged with mediating disputes between labor and management, said in an interview that the permanent replacement of economic strikers "exacerbates the collective bargaining process" by making it more "difficult" for the parties in collective bargaining to settle their differences over a new contract. "There are times when we will help the parties get through the wages and the conditions and the benefits, et cetera, et cetera, only to still have the issue of what to do about permanent replacement workers still on the table," DeLury said. Under these circumstances, he said, "it is difficult to get rank-and-file members to ratify that agreement if they don't have any assurances of coming back to work. That's what I mean about exacerbating the process."

Pressed to expand on how the use of permanent strike replacements affects the outcome of bargaining, DeLury agreed that it has a negative influence on the process. "It makes [the process] more difficult," he said, "because the idea of collective bargaining is to reach an agreement together from beginning to end."

DeLury said he believes the use of permanent strike replacements is only one of many factors contributing to the decline in strike activity in the United States over the past decade. But he said he thinks that strike activity would have declined even if the use of replacements had not been a factor because the majority of employers and labor leaders "know they have to work closer than ever before" to compete in an increasingly global marketplace.

According to the latest FMCS data, the number of strikes that began in fiscal year 1991, which ended Sept. 30, was 589, the lowest ever recorded by the agency. The peak level of strike activity in the United States, he said, was in 1977 when 3,111 strikes were begun.

President Bush has threatened to veto legislation approved July 17 by the House (HR 5) that would make it illegal for businesses to replace union workers who strike for economic reasons (138 DLR A-11, 7/18/91). The Senate is expected to take up an identical version of the House bill (S 55) early next year.

In testimony last March before the House Education and Labor Committee, Labor Secretary Lynn Martin defended the status quo and warned that the proposed change in the law would lead to more strikes. Current labor law, she said, "has served the public interest well, and has contributed to the economic well-being of this country by reducing labor strife and encouraging dispute settlement." Martin also testified that passage of H.R. 5 would "eliminate a major check on precipitous striking, promote increased labor unrest, and disrupt the flow of commerce."

NOT A STRIKE-HAPPY CULTURE

DeLury said he does not share the view that a ban on the permanent replacement of strikers would open the floodgates to more strikes in this country.

"I don't agree with that. I don't agree with that at all," he said, adding he thinks that the relationship between management and labor in the United States had reached a more "mature" level.

"By and large, most of the major corporations that have collective bargaining agreements work within the system, and they even work very well without the federal mediation service. We had 28,000 negotiations in fiscal year 1990 . . . 7,000 of those negotiations used a federal mediator to help them reach an agreement . . . 21,000 did it on their own . . . and out of it in that year there were 711 strikes or about 2.5 percent. That's what I mean about the maturity level. . . . It has been 2.5 to 3 percent for three decades. It's just not a strike-happy culture," he said.

DeLury said he is often asked by foreign visitors about the apparent inconsistency of American labor law that guarantees workers the right to strike, but permits employers to replace them permanently. "I tell them that's the stage we're in right now because we are a free country and we live by law, and our elected representatives try to create the law that's the best for us to live with," he said.

DeLury, a Bush administration appointee, said he hopes that a compromise will be reached between the White House and Congress in the interest of improving labor-management harmony and U.S. competitiveness.

"How this is going to turn out, I don't know . . . but I hope it turns out in such a fashion that the bitterness on both sides will evaporate to the point where we can get down to working together to be competitive as a nation. We sure as heck aren't going to get there if we waste our time fighting," he said.

The FMCS director said he declined an invitation earlier this year to testify on the legislation because he felt that it would be inappropriate for the head of the agency to take a position for or against the bill.

"I want the parties to use the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service. I'll work with whatever laws that the Congress of the United States gives us, and I have to maintain that type of a posture," he said.

"As far as whether there should be a law or whether there shouldn't be a law, I leave that to the politicians. That's not my job. I'll work with whatever they give us to work with," he said.

DeLury, who was appointed by President Bush in March 1990, made his remarks after a speech to the 64th convention of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Department.

ANALYSTS SAY UAW-CATERPILLAR DISPUTE COULD HAVE SIGNIFICANT RAMIFICATIONS

DETROIT.—The protracted and often bitter United Auto Workers conflict with Caterpillar Inc. may turn out to be one of the key labor combat fields of the decade, analysts said April 2.

Caterpillar moved first April 1, announcing it is implementing key provisions of its final contract offer, which the UAW has rejected, and threatening to permanently replace workers who don't return to work April 6.

The UAW's reaction was to widen its strike to include four additional facilities in Illinois, putting 1,800 more workers on the picket lines. That brings the total number of strikers to about 12,500.

The Peoria, Ill.-based construction equipment manufacturer contends it must decrease its labor costs in order to compete in global markets. The union, for its part, wants to maintain pattern bargaining, job security for all future and current workers, and fully paid medical insurance regardless of where workers seek treatment.

The Caterpillar fight is being watched closely by labor and management officials throughout the nation. In fact, the outcome could set the agenda for labor relations in the 1990s, said Harley Shaiken, labor professor at the University of California at San Diego.

"It could have a very large impact, given the importance and visibility of Caterpillar, and given the intensity of the conflict so far. How it's resolved could have a very important, precedent-setting effect on a number of industries," he said.

For one thing, the UAW is concerned that if the company succeeds in getting around pattern bargaining, Big Three automakers may try to scrap it in contract talks next year.

"And it isn't simply that Cat wants out of the pattern with Deere & Co., but, what with the new divisions and tiers there, it doesn't want a uniform pattern at all for the company," Shaiken said.

Caterpillar in the last decade was a model of U.S. competitiveness against Japanese firms in global markets. "So at issue is:

What are the domestic implications of success in the global marketplace? The irony here is that Caterpillar is saying to succeed internationally, it has to pay less domestically," Shaiken said.

Both the UAW and Caterpillar officials are expecting a dramatic confrontation at picket lines April 6.

After it determines how many workers have returned, the company will begin recalling furloughed workers and advertising for permanent replacements. A company official April 2 said Caterpillar needs between 10 and 15 percent fewer workers now than when the strike began, so those who don't return "may lose their place in a reduced workforce."

The UAW said in an April 1 statement that Caterpillar is attempting to break the union, and predicted that workers will remain united and force the company to reopen negotiations.

Caterpillar has proposed wage hikes of up to 4 percent over three years for skilled workers only, plus a two-tier wage system in which new parts plants workers get about half as much as workers with higher seniority. Following a pattern set last year at Deere, the UAW is seeking 3 percent wage increases across the board, plus two lump-sum payments, a UAW spokesman said.

In what it has termed a final offer, the company also has offered fully paid health care only to workers who use the company's network of doctors and hospitals. Otherwise, workers pay 30 percent of costs.

ACTIONS VIEWED AS RISKY

Caterpillar's April 1 actions were viewed by analysts as extremely risky, even though the firm soft-peddled those risks.

For one thing, the action could result in severe damage to the morale and to the skill level of Caterpillar workers if long-time workers are replaced, Shaiken said. For another, with production tied up and inventories drained, continuation of the dispute could make it impossible for Caterpillar to take advantage of a sales rebound expected later this year.

The company lost $404 million in 1991 on sales of more than $10 billion. Analysts expect losses to reach $100 million in the first quarter next year, largely because of the strike.

"Caterpillar is really playing hardball with this strike. As of yesterday, it is redefining the rules," Shaiken said. "When they had the last strike, in the early 1980s, the issue was the agreement, not the future of the union."

Another observer said the company is adamant that it needs an agreement that allows it to be more competitive, but said high-stakes politics are taking their toll. "It's a game of semantics: There's a new chairman at Caterpillar, and election time at the UAW," said Eli Lustgarten, a PaineWebber analyst. "But it shouldn't be something that reasonable people at a bargaining table couldn't negotiate out. It's peculiar that it's come to this."

NORTH AMERICAN ENVIRONMENTAL, LABOR, AND AGRICULTURAL STANDARDS ACT AND WESTERN HEMISPHERE ENVIRONMENTAL, LABOR, AND AGRICULTURAL STANDARDS ACT

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing two bills that would require U.S. trade negotiators to deal directly with environmental, labor, and agricultural concerns as part of any future free trade agreement. These bills—the North American Environmental, Labor and Agricultural Standards Act of 1992 and the Western Hemisphere Environmental, Labor, and Agricultural Standards Act of 1992—would require our trade negotiators to address legitimate environmental, labor, and agricultural standards as part of any free trade agreement.

Last spring, Congress engaged in a heated debate on whether to grant President Bush's request to extend fast track authority to negotiate a North American Free Trade Agreement [NAFTA] with Mexico and Canada. Most of the concerns raised dealt directly with the adverse environmental impact and the extensive labor dislocations that may result from a free trade agreement.

Congress narrowly approved the President's request, but not before passing a resolution expressing the sense of Congress that the proposed NAFTA must address five priority concerns:

First, labor rights and standards; second, environmental standards; third, strict rules of origin; fourth, a workable dispute resolution mechanism to enforce the terms of the NAFTA; and fifth, an acceptable adjustment assistance program for workers, firms, and communities adversely affected.

Since that time, however, it has become clear that our trade negotiators are not heeding the advice of Congress to actively address these legitimate labor and environmental concerns within the context of this unprecedented trade agreement. Yes, the Bush administration has sent its representatives to the Hill. But what has the administration done to incorporate labor standards and environmental standards into the proposed NAFTA agreement? I think we all know the answer to that question.

More importantly, the administration has no intention to include labor and environmental standards in the NAFTA negotiations. The President and his trade advisers refuse to tackle these crucial issues, perhaps under the mistaken impression that the politics associated with a free trade agreement will force Congress to grudgingly approve any free trade agreement. That gamble is not worth taking.

Since this Administration is unwilling to negotiate these legitimate trade-related issues, it is up to this Congress to force our trade negotiators to pursue labor and environmental standards in any proposed free trade agreement.

Our first priority must be to structure a free trade agreement to serve the needs of the men, women and children who will be directly affected by any agreement, and not simply enter into an agreement that will increase the bottom line of multinational corporations. We must take a people first approach to all free trade agreements. Granted, any free trade agreement must serve a multitude of needs. Most importantly, any free trade agreement must not only expand investment and trade between nations, it must also serve the broader objectives of creating good jobs at decent wages, cleaning our environment, and providing greater public safety.

We have a responsibility to our constituents—millions of whom will be directly affected by the decisions made at the bargaining table—to include labor standards and environmental standards in any free trade agreement. The long-term implications of building economic integration on a low-wage competitive strategy threatens the national interest of the United States, of Canada, and of Mexico. Reliance on such a strategy, as is currently the case, will lead only to the erosion of living standards in the United States and Canada while doing nothing to alleviate the profound inequality and poverty in Mexico.

Moreover, a narrowly drawn free trade agreement will only increase the likelihood that the three countries will seek to harmonize national standards at the level of the lowest common denominator.

This is unacceptable. Let us send our trade negotiators a wake-up call.

I would like to make clear that I am also a cosponsor and supporter of House Resolution 246, proposed by my colleague from California, Representative WAXMAN, which announces Congress' intent not to approve the enabling legislation of any trade agreement that jeopardizes U.S. labor, environmental, public health, or consumer protection standards. The bills I am introducing today in no way are intended to contradict the Waxman sense-of-Congress resolution. More importantly, the North American Environmental, Labor, and Agricultural Standards Act of 1992 and the Western Hemisphere Environmental, Labor, and Agricultural Standards Act of 1992, complement Mr. WAXMAN's proposal. While the Waxman resolution clearly reflects growing unhappiness with the dynamics of the current international trading system, my legislation charts a new course toward constructing an alternative trading system that serves to protect the rights of workers and the environment and not just the interests of corporate managers and financiers.

Both of the bills I am introducing contain identical labor, agricultural, and environmental standards, the highlights of which are the following:

Proposes, as principal U.S. negotiating objectives, fundamental labor, agricultural, and environmental standards—for example, freedom of association and full public disclosure of toxic chemical and hazardous substance discharges;

Proposes that it be a principal U.S. negotiating objective to threat the systematic denial or disregard of the aforementioned labor and environmental standards, as a means of gaining a competitive trade advantage, as an actionable unfair trade practice;

Provides for the establishment of a dispute resolution mechanism to enforce the terms of any free trade agreement and to adjudicate unfair trade petitions filed by governments or informed persons in any signatory nation; and Authorizes technical assistance to bring scientific and technological expertise to bear in resolving trade disputes and facilitating continental solutions to trade-related environmental and workplace safety and health problems across national borders.

The stakes are far too great for Congress to sit back on its heels while the Bush administration is negotiating a free trade agreement that will affect our economic competitiveness, our standard of living, and the environmental quality of the Western Hemisphere will into the 21st century. I hope you join with me in supporting these bills, in elevating the discussions that have taken place to date, and in bringing to the negotiating table the concerns of millions of Americans, Mexicans, and Canadians.

CORDIS CORP. FORTUNE

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to recognize Cordis Corp., whose strategic changes several years ago allowed it to deviate from a struggling company to a much stronger one today. The Miami-based company, who in 1991 enjoyed a net income of over $9 million, is a medical equipment manufacturer, a business of much competition. It was recently featured in the Miami Herald for its incredible growth during the past 3 years. The article "Cordis Corp.: Strategic Change Spur Rebound" tells of its accomplishments:

When it came to corporate turnarounds, the judges had just one thing to say: Cordis.

The company made a major strategic change several years ago, moving from the manufacture of heart pacemakers to artery-clearing angioplasty equipment. Since then, it has come back healthier and wealthier than anyone ever expected.

It has kept its product line narrowly specialized. It has tapped global markets. And it has grown very quickly.

For the six months ended Dec. 31 Cordis earned $10.2 million, or 71 cents a share, compared with $7.9 million, or 58 cents a share, for the same period a year earlier. Six-month sales were $105.4 million, compared with $94.9 million in 1990.

Sales of angiographic equipment, the bulk of Cordis' business, increased 13 percent. Sales of neuroscience products, a new field, jumped 10 percent.

Those increases are particularly impressive, Mobley said, considering the tough competition in the health-care sector.

Fedor said Cordis has made a remarkable comeback, considering it divested more than half the company.

"They've come from nowhere all the way back to be a stronger company than they were three years ago," he said.

Kraft said it is unusual for a company to pull off such a strategic about-face so quickly.

"Their success is due to management that shifted focus and found a new niche," he said.

Hille said the key to Cordis' successful turnaround was that it developed new markets in conjunction with its new focus.

"This is a company with a narrow product line that has been able to penetrate a world market very quickly," he said.

Wyman praised Cordis for steady improvement in its return-on-equity, a key indicator of financial health.

Mr. Speaker, I commend Cordis Corp. and its talented management for its prosperous efforts to become a better company. In these difficult economic times, the company's quick and successful turnaround is admirable to all in the business world.

WE NEED REAL LEGISLATIVE PROCESS REFORM NOW

HON. BOB McEWEN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. McEWEN. Mr. Speaker, There was an unfortunate time in the 1970's when the U.S. military, and those who wore the uniform of this Nation, were held in low esteem by many Americans.

Stories of $600 toilet seats, $200 screwdrivers, and $5 nuts and bolts that cost a nickel at the local hardware store. All those stories brought disgrace to the Pentagon and every single serviceman.

There was some mismanagement in the Armed Forces. There was never an excuse, and never will be an excuse, for $600 toilet seats and such.

But, that didn't mean every man and woman who served their Nation in the Armed Forces was dishonest or wasteful. Quite to the contrary, there were still excellent people serving this Nation with honor and professionalism.

This House is presently held in just such a state of low regard. Rather than overpriced screwdrivers and bolts, the House post office, restaurant, and pay disbursement office have proven to be horribly mismanaged.

Those management disasters have brought shame to every Member of Congress.

Nevertheless, just as it was wrong to condemn every soldier, sailor, and airman who served in the Armed Forces because of abuses in the Pentagon procurement system, it is wrong to blame every Member of the House for the post office and bank problems.

There are administrative problems in the House. The Democrat leadership tried to manage, or should I say mismanage, support services such as the post office and restaurant the same way they've done it for the past four decades of one-party rule in the House.

The single most important thing that the American people must understand about this management system is that it is completely partisan. One party, the majority, the Democrats, they run this place. Essentially, every management decision is made on the other side of the aisle.

They consider it bipartisan when they ask for advice. But usually the House Republicans read about these administrative disasters in the paper, rather than participate in the process.

House Resolution 423 begins to address those problems by attempting to develop a nonpartisan administrative structure. Even that limited goal is unattainable because the Democrats, at the very time that Congress is held in utter disrespect by the American people because of failed administrative management, have crafted a partisan response. A purportedly bipartisan administrative subcommittee—three Democrats and three Republicans—would refer tied measures to the utterly partisan full House Administration Committee.

Even now, the Democrat leadership refuses to accept true bipartisanship when it comes to running the restaurant and post office.

Considering that bipartisanship is too much to ask for with important matters such as serving lunch in the House dining room, is there any surprise that truly needed reforms in the legislative process are far too much to hope for.

The American people need to understand the legislative process in the House is run completely by the Democrats.

If you think administration of the post office is a partisan issue to the Democrats, you can't imagine the level of partisanship on the Rules Committee, or just about anywhere else in this legislative process.

The Honorable minority leader, Mr. MICHEL, has tried his best to make some needed reforms in the legislative process along with correcting the administrative problems.

The post office, restaurant, and bank may make the front page of the papers, but they don't effect the lives of the American people. The problems with this partisan legislative process run by the Democrat leadership do hurt the American people.

The legislative process in this House needs serious reform. The Democrat leadership, which runs roughshod over the minority on a regular schedule, obviously oppose these real reforms.

They say we don't have time. They say "solve the administrative problems now, and we'll work on the other stuff later." Sure.

Quite simply, we need real legislative process reform now. That's the real important issue. Anyone can figure out that the post office, restaurant, disbursement office, and other services shouldn't be partisan and political.

The real reforms that will help this country are in the legislative process. Support an open rule for once. Support the Michel reforms. Support reforms that matter so this Congress can work for once.

UNITED STATES FACES CHALLENGES ON MANY FRONTS

HON. DON EDWARDS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, our distinguished colleague from California, the Honorable ANTHONY C. BEILENSON, in a report to his constituents, has set forth his views on some of the major issues facing our Nation. I found his examination of our economy, the need for health care reform, and the role of the United States in a changing world to be insightful and thought provoking.

I'm sure our colleagues would find much food for thought in his commentary, which I am pleased to enter into the RECORD.

REPORTS ON THE ECONOMY, HEALTH CARE REFORM, AND THE UNITED STATES ROLE IN A CHANGING WORLD

(By Congressman Anthony C. Beilenson)

1. PROMOTING ECONOMIC GROWTH

Leading economists are predicting that the U.S. will emerge from the recession sometime this year, but most expect the recovery to be weak. In an attempt to help end the recession, President Bush and Congress have been trying to enact some tax cuts, even though that would likely make the economy worse in the long run without doing much to help it now.

Responding constructively to this recession has been far more difficult than it was in previous downturns because we face two very different economic challenges: ending the recession, and reversing the far more serious long-term problem of slow growth caused by too much borrowing and spending, and too little savings, investment, and productivity. Unfortunately, the traditional remedy for recession—deficit spending—is precisely the opposite of what is needed—lower deficits—to promote sustained economic growth and strengthen our ability to compete in the global market.

The budget deficit problem

As economists have been saying for years, reducing our federal budget deficits is the most important step the government can take to increase jobs and productivity. Cutting federal borrowing would free up more of our nation's limited pool of savings for private capital investment. At the same time, by reducing the amount of money required to pay interest on the national debt (now more than $200 billion a year), more tax dollars would be available for investment in public programs.

To put our deficits and debt in perspective, it took the United States almost 200 years to accumulate a total national debt of $900 billion. But in just the last 11 years, that debt has quadrupled to $3.6 trillion because of our staggering annual budget deficits. No relief is in sight: this year's deficit is expected to be $400 billion and, even under optimistic assumptions, the government will continue to borrow more than $200 billion annually for years to come unless the President and Congress enact sizeable spending cuts or tax increases.

A tax cut?

Republicans and Democrats began wrangling over different tax-cut plans after President Bush challenged Congress to pass his proposal by March 20. The President's plan emphasized capital gains tax cuts and tax breaks for certain business activities, most notably real estate. The packages approved by the House of Representatives and the Senate contained many of the tax breaks proposed by the President, but also provided a modest amount of tax relief for middle-income families, and an increase in the top tax rate for high-income earners.

When the House considered this legislation, I voted against all the tax-cut alternatives. None of the measures would have done much to stimulate the economy now, and all of them would have made it worse in the long run by plunging us further into debt. Fortunately, it now appears unlikely that anything but a very limited tax-cut bill, if any at all, will be signed into law.

Real help for the economy

Many economists believe that lower interest rates are beginning to generate new economic activity and, in fact, will do more to help the economy than any action Congress or the President can take. That is not to say that Congress should not do anything. We ought to be spending more money to improve the skills of our work force and update our infrastructure. More investment in such areas as education, job training, research and development, new technologies, and roads and bridges is essential if we are to compete successfully in the international marketplace and create jobs that pay steadily rising wages. And more spending in those areas would also create jobs right now.

We should pay for that additional spending—so that we do not increase the deficit—by raising modestly the tax rate on income over $200,000. We should also use the savings from cuts in the defense budget (which ought to be about double the five-year, $50 billion reduction proposed by President Bush) on investment that will generate jobs, including the conversion of defense facilities into civilian plants which could use existing workers and equipment to make commercial products. The House of Representatives has approved a budget plan for 1993 which takes some important steps toward reducing the amount of money spent on defense and increasing the amount spent on domestic programs, but we ought to be moving faster in that direction.

Once the economy begins growing again, we must return to reducing our annual budget deficits and slowing the growth of the national debt. Until we find a way to live within our means, we will not be able to ensure rising living standards for Americans. Nor will we be able to make any substantial progress in addressing the pressing problems we are facing in such areas as education, health care, infrastructure, public safety, illegal immigration, and environmental protection. Solving the deficit problem is the key to solving virtually every other problem our nation faces.

2. RESCUING OUR HEALTH CARE SYSTEM

The cost of health care is continuing to rise at more than double the rate of inflation, while growing numbers of Americans are unable to afford the care they need. Everyone agrees that the system needs to be fixed, but no consensus has yet emerged on the best way to do that.

What's wrong with our system

Besides the 40 million Americans who have no insurance at all, an additional 50 to 60 million Americans have inadequate insurance. And even people who have sufficient coverage know that they can lose it in a moment if they change jobs or if their employer changes or drops the company's health benefits plan.

Many employers are in fact already cutting back on the health benefits they offer because of the skyrocketing cost of health insurance. Sometimes they have no choice: if just one employee of a small business has an illness requiring costly health care, the company might be unable to obtain any insurance at all.

Insurance coverage for older Americans is also insufficient. Almost all Americans over 65 are covered by Medicare, but that program—despite the fact that it is projected to quadruple in cost over the next decade—provides no coverage for long-term care, and leaves beneficiaries spending an average of 17 percent of their income for medical care.

Incredibly, we are spending almost twice the average amount per person that Europeans spend on health care. And the problem is only getting worse: if we don't revamp the system soon, health care costs will increase to about 17 percent of our gross domestic product—up from 6 percent in 1960—by the year 2000.

To make matters even worse, costs are distributed unfairly. A disproportionate share of the high cost of health care is being borne by small businesses and by individuals who buy their own insurance because they cannot negotiate discounts with insurers as large companies and federal, state, and local governments can. And everyone who has private insurance pays more for it because hospitals and doctors commonly shift part of the cost of treating uninsured patients to privately insured patients.

Solving the problems

Three principal ways of addressing these problems have emerged:

Tax Subsidies for Purchasing Insurance

President Bush has proposed providing tax credits and deductions to help people buy their own insurance, along with some market reforms to help those who have been denied coverage because of pre-existing health conditions. The President's plan would cost about $35 billion a year, but he did not propose a way to pay for it.

Among the major plans being discussed, the President's would cause the least amount of change for health care providers, insurance companies, and businesses in general. But it has two major flaws (besides the fact that it would greatly increase the federal budget deficit): it would not ensure coverage for everyone; and it would do next to nothing to help control rising health care costs or solve the cost-shifting problem.

Play or Pay

Many members of Congress support an approach that has come to be known as "play or pay." Under this plan, all businesses would be required to provide insurance for their employees, or to pay a per-worker tax enabling their employees to participate in a government-sponsored health insurance program. Older Americans would continue to be covered by Medicare, and everyone else would be eligible for some type of government-sponsored insurance.

A play-or-pay plan would guarantee coverage for everyone, and it would avoid a disruptive change to the health care industry. But, like the tax-subsidy approach, it would pour more money into a health care system that already costs too much while doing little to control those costs.

Single Payer

Other members of Congress, including myself, are supporting a plan under which the government would provide health coverage for everyone, for all necessary services, including nursing-home care. Although it would be paid for through payroll and income taxes, all but the wealthiest five percent of Americans would actually pay less for health care, through their taxes, than they pay now for health care through insurance, hospital and doctors' fees, prescription drugs, and other health-related expenses combined. Patients would be free to choose their own doctors and other health care providers.

Immense savings are possible under a single-payer plan because the entire system would be on a budget within which doctors' fees and hospital charges would be negotiated annually. In addition, by having one insurance plan for everyone rather than the myriad of public programs and the thousands of private insurance plans we have now, administrative costs would be reduced dramatically.

Some worry that this approach could lead to waiting periods for elective surgery, as it sometimes does in Canada, whose system is the model for this plan. But even if that turned out to be case, it would be a price worth paying for ensuring that everyone has access to the care they need and that no one would ever face bankruptcy because of an illness. Equally important, a single-payer plan is also the only alternative that would keep health care from consuming an ever-increasing share of our nation's wealth, draining our resources away from more productive uses, and hurting our ability to compete in the global marketplace.

Although a number of congressional committees have been holding hearings on health care reform, a comprehensive bill in this area is unlikely to be signed into law this year. Whether we enact legislation next year depends largely upon who is elected President in November and whether he can gain the support of Congress for the particular plan he favors.

3. PLAYING A CONSTRUCTIVE ROLE IN THE WORLD

Foreign policy issues have been all but ignored in Washington this year as President Bush and Congress concentrate on the economy and other domestic problems. But no matter what difficulties we face at home, we cannot afford to relinquish our responsibilities in global affairs. We are still the only nation to whom the majority of peoples in the world look for political, economic and moral leadership—and, as the most powerful nation on earth, we have special obligations that no other country has.

Now that the Cold War is over, we have an exceptional opportunity to begin concentrating on issues where U.S. leadership can make the difference between whether or not future generations of Americans live in a safe and humane world and enjoy a decent quality of life. Our top international goals should include helping other nations establish democratic governments, preventing regional conflicts, stopping the proliferation of sophisticated weapons, slowing population growth, and protecting the earth from further environmental degradation.

The U.S. needs to be playing a large role in fostering democracy abroad—particularly this year, as we witness emerging governments in the former Soviet Union and eastern Europe struggling to establish and maintain viable democracies. Through diplomacy and such means as trade agreements and assistance from international lending institutions, we could be doing much more to ensure the success of these nascent democracies. Similarly, many countries in our own hemisphere could use more help from us in strengthening the often-fragile democratic rule.

Promoting democracy is important from a human rights perspective, of course. But it also enhances our own security. Popularly elected governments seldom start wars of aggression against their neighbors—wars that often end up involving others, including ourselves. The Persian Gulf war is an obvious example, and our failure to push harder for democratic reforms in Middle Eastern nations has been one of the more disappointing aspects of our post-Gulf war policy.

Resolving regional conflicts

The U.S. also needs to take a stronger role in preventing and, when necessary, helping to resolve regional conflicts. The most useful policy we can pursue is to support the United Nations in its growing role of negotiating solutions to conflicts and monitoring and enforcing peace agreements. Even though the cost of U.N. peacekeeping is increasing (primarily because of missions in Cambodia and Yugoslavia), it is an enormous bargain compared to the costs of fighting a war we might otherwise be drawn into—and compared to the costs of a defense establishment we would otherwise have to maintain. Our share of the cost of U.N. peacekeeping will be $800 million this year; fighting the war in the Persian Gulf last year cost the U.S. $1.5 billion a day. While we are downsizing our own military, it makes sense to use a modest amount of the savings to support international efforts to keep the peace.

Halting weapons sales

Besides supporting collective action through the U.N. as an alternative to costly and risky unilateral action by the U.S., we ought to establish as a principal objective of American foreign policy a determined effort to end sales of advanced weapons to developing nations.

The most likely military threats facing us today and for the foreseeable future are from authoritarian regimes, such as Saddam Hussein's in Iraq, which are eager to acquire whatever high-potency weaponry they can lay their hands on. Sadly, current U.S. policy does more to help distribute sophisticated weaponry than to halt it. We are the largest provider of conventional arms to the developing world, having sold over $18 billion worth of advanced weapons to Third World nations in 1990 alone. In addition, more than half of our $15 billion foreign aid budget consists of military assistance for many of these same governments.

It is in our own best interest to stop transferring arms ourselves, and to press other arms-producing nations (most of whom are our good friends and allies) to halt them as well. Slowing the proliferation of weapons is the right and moral thing to do; it is an effective means of lessening the likelihood of regional conflicts into which we might be drawn; it would save U.S. taxpayers' money both by lowering the cost of foreign military aid and by enabling us to spend less of our own defense budget. And it would help build a better world, in which impoverished countries could devote their resources to providing for the needs of their people rather than developing their military capabilities.

Reducing population growth

In addition to our traditional foreign policy focus on military threats to our security, we must begin addressing much more seriously the problems of population growth and environmental degradation throughout the world.

The most urgent problem mankind faces for the remainder of this century and beyond is the rapid growth of the human population. More than a quarter of a million babies are born every day, 90 percent of them in the poorest nations in the world, where populations are now doubling every 20 to 25 years. This rapid growth is far outstripping the ability of those countries to provide food, shelter, and jobs for their people, as well as taking a huge toll on their resources—decimating forests, eroding fragile soil, and polluting and exhausting water supplies. More and more land is becoming desert, and tens of millions of people are moving to increasingly crowded urban slums, living in desperate conditions that often lead to political unrest.

Even though the natural growth of U.S. population is moderate, we are feeling the effects of rapid growth in the rest of the world as hundreds of thousands of immigrants enter the U.S. each year. Southern California, in particular, has become a magnet for many who are fleeing difficult economic and environmental conditions in their homelands. Although we should be doing much more than we are at the moment to control illegal immigration, all the resources we can possibly muster for that task will not stop people from finding their way into the U.S. if these enormous population pressures continue to mount.

The most useful and humane step that we can take to slow population growth is to continue a substantial amount to the United Nations-led effort to ensure that family planning services are provided to everyone who wants them by the year 2000. The U.N. plan projects that if voluntary family planning services were available universally by the end of the decade, the world's population would eventually stabilize at about 10 billion, rather than the 15 billion currently projected.

Unfortunately, the abortion issue has crippled U.S. aid for international family planning. Over the last decade, both Presidents Reagan and Bush have vetoed or threatened to veto any foreign aid bill which contains funding for family planning organizations that pay for abortions—despite the fact that those organizations are already prohibited by law from using U.S. funds for that purpose.

One cost-free way to increase our support for international family planning programs would be to eliminate most bilateral aid for economic development in Third World nations and offer, instead, generous amounts of assistance for family planning. No matter how much economic aid is poured into those countries, there will be no noticeable improvement in the living conditions of their people if they do not curb their population growth.

Protecting the environment

The U.S. also needs to take a more vigorous role in leading efforts to reverse the many different kinds of serious environmental damage occurring throughout the world.

We did help forge an international agreement to phase out of the use of chlorofluorocarbons (CFC's), the prime culprit in the thinning of the ozone layer. And, because of newly discovered ozone damage, we have moved to halt CFC production even faster than originally planned. But the Bush Administration has been reluctant to commit to stabilizing emissions of carbon dioxide, the primary cause of the global warming phenomenon. Because our country is responsible for one quarter of the world's carbon dioxide emissions, little progress can be made in reducing them without our cooperation.

Global warming will be one of the key issues at the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development (the "Earth Summit") in June, where the U.S. will have an opportunity to take the lead in promoting international action on the environment. In addition to global warming, the conference will address deforestation, air and water pollution across international boundaries, toxic waste, and other matters. Along with like-minded colleagues, I have urged President Bush to attend the conference, as many other heads of state plan to do, to make it clear that our country is fully committed to solving these problems.

The U.S. should also be striving to include environmental protection measures in trade agreements negotiated with other nations. A group of us in Congress have been urging that the Bush Administration incorporate strong environmental provisions in both the new round of General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) and the proposed North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA). It is essential in the latter agreement to ensure that Mexico does not become a haven for businesses seeking to avoid stricter environmental protection required by U.S. law.

Now, with the East-West rivalry gone, it is more possible than ever to offer our leadership and help on a wide array of issues—and it is necessary for us to do both to serve our own interests and the broader concerns of all humanity.

TRIBUTE TO THE DUKE UNIVERSITY BLUE DEVILS BASKETBALL TEAM

HON. TIM VALENTINE

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. VALENTINE. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to salute the remarkable achievement of an outstanding group of scholar-athletes from Durham, NC—the Duke University Blue Devils basketball team.

On Monday night, two outstanding academic institutions—Duke and the University of Michigan—played in the final game of the NCAA Basketball Tournament. Both of these teams truly represent the best and brightest of American higher education today.

I am tremendously proud of Coach Mike Krzyzewski and all of the Blue Devils. Their unique ability to mix scholarship and athleticism provides a positive example for the students of this Nation to follow. Duke has established and maintained the highest standards both educationally and athletically, and I take great pleasure in highlighting their most recent accomplishment.

The Blue Devils' string of victories in the postseason tournament was impressive, and their record of achievement on and off the basketball court has been unparalleled. In fact, I suggest that head coach Mike Krzyzewski bring his team up to Washington to help us clean up our image. Maybe their being here will help bring up our sagging poll numbers.

Mr. Speaker, I take great pride in representing the best congressional district in the United States, and I am pleased that I can say again this year that I represent the best college basketball team as well.

A SALUTE TO AMBASSADOR JOSEPH VERNER REED

HON. MERVYN M. DYMALLY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. DYMALLY. Mr. Speaker, people always seem eager to spread bad or negative news. I would like to take this occasion to do just the opposite. I recently heard His Excellency Chitmansing Jesseramsing, Ambassador of Mauritius, pay high tribute to former United States Chief of Protocol Joseph Verner Reed, who retired from this position last October.

Ambassador Reed now serves as Under Secretary General of the United Nations and Special Representative for Public Affairs. Prior to his tenure as Chief of Protocol, he was Under Secretary for Political and General Assembly Affairs—the highest ranking American in the U.N. Secretariat—and, before that, was United States Ambassador to Morocco. He came from, and returned to what he refers to as "The Parliament of Man," much to the delight of the diplomatic community.

It is a proud moment when a foreign diplomat speaks so highly of a top U.S. official, and states why he has been so effective. I think His Excellency's remarks should be shared with you and the American public, and hereby submit them for inclusion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Ambassador Jesseramsing represents the small multiparty, democratic island nation of Mauritius in the Indian Ocean, off the East Coast of Africa, which became a new Republic on March 12 of this year. He came to the United States about 25 years ago and is one of the longest-serving diplomats and a suave, discerning observer of American life. He also serves as envoy to Canada and to seven countries in Latin America and the Caribbean.

Leonard H. Robinson, Deputy Assistant Secretary for African Affairs, says Ambassador Jesseramsing does well at that. Mauritius, he states:

Is looked upon as the Hong Kong or Singapore of the African orbit, but it is also an unknown country and has little weight in the world at large. Jesseramsing doesn't have a lot of blue chips to play but he has done a marvelous job of keeping this little island nation visible in Washington.

As a developing country, Mauritius has been able to forge one country out of many different cultural strains and languages. In this way, Jesseramsing likens his nation to the United States. "My country has been called the crucible of God's laboratory," he says. "People have come from all over the world, yet they have kept all their cultures alive. That is also the strength of the United States." It is in this vein—of recognizing differences but also appreciating the contributions which each group of people and each nation make to the international community. That, Jesseramsing speaks of Reed.

Ambassador Jesseramsing came to know Ambassador Reed well when Mauritius Prime Minister Sir Anerood Jugnauth came to the U.S. on an official visit. Also, as dean of the Commonwealth Ambassadors, Jesseramsing followed closely what he called "the excellent manner in which he [Reed] shepherded H.M. Queen Elizabeth II during her 1991 visit to Washington."

In his remarks, Ambassador Jesseramsing commented on the erroneous mental pictures brought to the minds of many by the phrase "Third World." He went on to state that many assume the term equates with either poverty and/or lacking in sophistication.

Not so with former U.S. Chief of Protocol Joseph Verner Reed. He will be missed especially by countries whose economy and population do not compare well with the wealth and size of the United States and whose cultural heritage might not fit easily into what many consider to be mainstream western civilization.

Unlike some of his colleagues, Ambassador Reed always saw in cultural and other differences between nations a unique and rich heritage that bespoke his truly global view and heartfelt conviction that all people are created equal. He had a true understanding of the pride other people take in their own national heritage of culture and custom.

There is much to be said for this man who, for nearly three years, balanced graciousness and propriety with a depth of real concern and caring for foreign diplomats from nearly 150 different embassies. With his prior service at the United Nations, he was devoted to the pursuit of international fellowship. He developed a profound sensitivity to the needs and hopes of emerging nations, especially African nations, and he succeeded in developing a special rapport with the so-called "Third World representatives."

At the same time, Joseph Reed was never lax in his obligations to the larger and/or more economically powerful nations. They were as much a part—no more, no less—of his "diplomatic beat."

He promoted international brotherhood in his own special, inimitable fashion. He was not one who bandied slogans; rather, he let his actions speak for him. As a result, he earned the respect and admiration of virtually every member of the international diplomatic community in Washington, as well as in other capitals of the world.

My colleagues in the diplomatic world and I experienced Ambassador Reed's enduring friendship. In the embassy milieu, true friendship is a most valued item. Two of the important ways in which Joseph Reed exhibited his friendship were sharing information in a timely fashion and always being available when needed. For these reasons, Jose Luis Fernando Lopes, former dean of the diplomatic corps, praised Reed for "facilitating exchanges of vital importance to our respective nations."

Other qualities which drew Joseph Reed to those who knew him were his genuine sense of humor, his truthfulness, and his exceeding tact. He was knowledgeable and highly principled. He was an accomplished diplomat who held a fierce loyalty to his country and to his President.

Probably most endearing to his friends was his exuberant personality. He always gave the impression he was excited about his post. It was never just a job; it was a commitment. And that was the standard against which he measured his own performance.

It was an exacting standard. But it was tempered with being able to take everything in stride. He faced life with an infectious smile and with an acute understanding that the American novelist F. Scott Fitzgerald was wrong when he wrote, "The rich are different from you and me."

To Joseph Reed's way of thinking, neither that dictum nor its corollary (that the haves-nots might be essentially different from the haves) was ever a serious consideration. This "Mr. Right" of the American diplomatic stage held the conviction that every ambassador—from whatever country—was far more than just a "bit player" in the act. Simply stated, "That's class."

Joseph Verner Reed is, indeed, a class act. In fact, he has set a new standard for that rare designation. Truly, he is a man for all seasons.

THE 50TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE COUNCIL OF NATIONAL LIBRARY AND INFORMATION ASSOCIATIONS

HON. MAJOR R. OWENS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. OWENS of New York. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to extend my congratulations to the Council of National Library and Information Associations [CNLIA], which this year is celebrating its 50th anniversary. The council is an organization founded to promote cooperation and coordination among national library associations. Since 1942, it has served as a forum in which library and information associations have been able to discuss their common problems.

A list of successful projects which were originally conceived and developed through the council includes the Bowker Annual of Library and Book Trade Information; the American National Standards Committee (Z-39). On Library Information Sciences and Related Publishing Practices, which became a prime influence in the formulation of national standards of modern information services; and the U.S. Book Exchange. The latter grew out of the council's first project in 1945, the American Book Center for War Devastated Libraries, later to become the Universal Serials and Book Exchange, Inc.

Other activities of the council have included the fostering of the start and development of the library manpower project, the revival of Who's Who in Library and Information Services, and the establishment of a study group on library education which suggested the creation of the Continuing Library Education Network and Exchange [CLENE]. In addition, CNLIA was a major force in the library community in seeing that the U.S. Congress passed revisions to the Copyright Act of 1976 which struck a balance between the rights of creators and users. It has also been credited with crafting the notice used by libraries to alert individuals that the materials they are photocopying could be protected by the Copyright Law.

Today, the Council continues to be active in the library world. The membership now numbers 19 library associations. Each member is usually represented on the Council by its president and one appointed delegate. The following library associations are current members: American Association of Law Libraries, American Library Association, American Society of Indexers, American Theological Library Association, Art Libraries Society of North America, Association of Christian Librarians, Association of Jewish Libraries, Catholic Library Association, Chinese American Librarians Association, Church and Synagogue Library Association, Council of Planning Librarians, Library Binding Institute, Lutheran Church Library Association, Medical Library Association, Music Library Association, National Librarians Association, Society of American Archivists, Special Libraries Association, and Theater Library Association.

As CNLIA looks toward the future, it will continue to promote closer relationships among its members of in the United States and Canada. Through the individual and collective efforts of these associations, librarians will be empowered to fulfill their rightful role in society.

TRIBUTE TO THE AMERICAN SCHOOL FOR THE DEAF IN HARTFORD, CT

HON. BARBARA B. KENNELLY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mrs. KENNELLY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commend and congratulate the American School for the Deaf, located in Hartford, CT. This institution celebrates its 175th anniversary tomorrow. Founded in 1817, the American School for the Deaf was the first facility in the Western Hemisphere dedicated to continuing special education, and it was and is still today, Connecticut's only educational organization devoted exclusively to serving the deaf community.

This outstanding institution was originally founded by Thomas Hopkins Gallaudet. Gallaudet, a native Philadelphian, moved to Hartford, CT, as a small child. A prominent Hartford surgeon, Dr. Mason Fitch Cogswell was a Hartford neighbor whose daughter had been deafened during infancy. Gallaudet observed Dr. Cogswell's daughter, Alice, and become convinced that she had the ability to learn and communicate. More important, he believed she should be afforded the opportunity to attend school. Dr. Cogswell optimistically considered the prospects for educating not only his daughter but all of the hearing-impaired children in New England. After researching, Cogswell and Gallaudet along with other Hartford leaders determined that a school for the deaf was desperately needed here in America. There were afterall, schools in Europe for the hearing impaired but not one to aid the deaf population in America in the early 19th century. With that in mind, Gallaudet set out to Europe with the intent of mastering a method to educate deaf children. On his journey home, Gallaudet met a deaf French teacher, Laurent Clerc. Over the course of their 55-day journey across the Atlantic, Gallaudet learned the language of signs from Clerc, and Clerc learned English from Gallaudet.

In April 1817, the American School for the Deaf first opened to three students, including Alice Cogswell. And every year since 1817, in April, the American School for the Deaf observes Founders' Day in honor of Thomas Gallaudet and Laurent Clerc.

The American School for the Deaf is celebrating 175 years as a successful educational institution with a long list of accomplishments. Since its opening, the American School for the Deaf has been recognized as both a national and world leader in educating the hearing impaired. In 1920, the school moved from its original location in Hartford to its present location in West Hartford. The utilization of innovative models and instructional techniques was instrumental in its recognition as 1 of the 25 foremost programs in this Nation to prepare students with special needs for employment or postsecondary education.

Among its accomplishments are a series of firsts. Allow me to list these significant firsts. It was the first school in the United States to employ deaf teachers; it was the first school to receive State aid for primary and secondary education and also the first to receive Federal support; the first deaf superintendent of a school came from the school's faculty. In addition, the American School for the Deaf implemented the first vocational education program for the deaf and it continues to offer the only rehabilitative program for deaf adults in New England, and the only program for the emotionally disturbed deaf children in New England. The widely used form of American Sign Language was first created at this school.

This remarkable institution continues to provide comprehensive education and other related services to deaf students and their families—families not only from my State of Connecticut, but to students and families from other States and other countries.

Mr. Speaker, the education of our Nation's youth has always been a priority for me because I believe education is key to our success as a nation. Meeting the needs of our children is a step in the right direction. While we will embark upon reforming our Nation's struggling school system in May, let us not forget that there are schools and institutions across this country that are successful in their mission.

Mr. Speaker, I commend and congratulate this fine institution, the American School for the Deaf, as it celebrates its 175th anniversary tomorrow.

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION REGARDING INVESTMENT TAX CREDIT

HON. BYRON L. DORGAN

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, today, I am introducing legislation to restore, on a temporary basis, an investment tax credit to help stimulate some much needed economic growth in this country.

I think that a temporary, targeted investment tax credit [ITC] is an efficient and effective device for promoting the kind of investment in machinery and equipment that is needed to spur real growth and productivity in the U.S. economy. A temporary cut in capital costs and increased cash-flow for business entrepreneurs and farmers will provide a spark to the country's economic engines that have sputtered far too long during this prolonged recession.

In my legislation, I have attempted to minimize the potential revenue costs of the bill by targeting ITC only to the purchase of equipment used as an integral part of manufacturing, production, or extraction. Moreover, I expect that such a provision would be included in a comprehensive revenue-neutral economic growth package that would not have an adverse budgetary impact. It just seems to me that we can no longer afford to delay investing in an approach calculated to accelerate economic recovery, to increase productivity in manufacturing and on our farms, and to help stimulate long-term investments in America's future.

Generally, my bill provides a temporary 10-percent tax credit for investments made in manufacturing and production property that a taxpayer places in service in the United States before January 1, 1994. The normal business credit limitations and recapture rules would apply.

Finally, I believe that the ITC is an approach with a proven track record that can be supported by both the Congress and the President. And I think that Congress should act quickly to pass an ITC, while there is still an opportunity to help get the Nation's economy back on track.

A detailed summary of the bill follows:

SUMMARY
IN GENERAL

This legislation provides a temporary investment tax credit for certain property that is used as an integral part of manufacturing, production, or extraction activities. The amount of the credit generally equals 10 percent of the adjusted basis of the property. The credit generally is allowed for property that is placed in service after the date of enactment of the bill and before January 1, 1994.

DEFINITION OF QUALIFIED PRODUCTIVE PROPERTY

The ten-percent tax credit is allowed only with respect to "qualified productive property." For this purpose, qualified productive property is defined as tangible property (other than a building or its structural components) that is used as an integral part of manufacturing, production, or extraction but only if: (1) a depreciation deduction is allowable with respect to the property for federal income tax purposes and the useful life of the property is at least three years; (2) the original use of the property commences with the taxpayer; and (3) the property is placed in service after the date of enactment of the bill and before January 1, 1994.

For the purposes of the bill, the term "manufacturing, production, or extraction" includes (1) the construction, reconstruction, or making of property from scrap or salvage, as well as from new or raw materials; (2) the cultivation of the soil and the raising of livestock or other agricultural produce; (3) the mining, processing, and refining of minerals, including oil and gas; (4) the processing of food; (5) the cultivation of orchards, gardens, and nurseries; (6) the construction of roads, bridges, or housing; (7) the operation of sawmills and the production of lumber products; and (8) the rebuilding of machinery.

The credit provided for by the bill generally is not allowed with respect to any property which is used predominately outside the United States. In addition, the credit is not allowed with respect to any property to which the energy credit of present law or the rehabilitation credit of present law applies, unless the taxpayer elects to not claim such credits.

DETERMINATION OF AMOUNT OF CREDIT

Under the bill, the amount of the credit for any taxable year generally equals 10 percent of the aggregate basis of qualified productive property placed in service during the taxable year. To enhance the incentive under the bill for taxpayers to purchase assets with longer economic lives, the entire basis of the qualified productive property with a useful life exceeding three years under the accelerated cost recovery system is eligible for the 10-percent credit. However, in the case of qualified productive property with a three-year useful life under the accelerated cost recovery system, only 60 percent of the basis of such property is taken into account in determining the amount of the credit.

OTHER RULES

The adjusted basis of any qualified productive property is reduced by the amount of the credit allowed with respect to such property. In addition, the at-risk rules and recapture rules (if property is prematurely disposed of) provided for by present law apply to property for which a credit is allowed under the bill. Finally, the credit provided for by the bill is included as a general business credit and, thus, is subject to present-law rules that limit the total amount of certain business-related credits that may be used for any taxable year.

EFFECTIVE DATE

The bill applies to qualified productive property that is placed in service after the date of enactment of the bill and before January 1, 1994. In the case of qualified productive property that is constructed, reconstructed, or erected by a taxpayer, the bill generally applies only to the portion of the basis of the property that is attributable to construction, reconstruction, or erection occurring during the period after the enactment and before January 1, 1994.

HONORING THE 100TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE WESTERN PENNSYLVANIA HOSPITAL SCHOOL OF NURSING

HON. WILLIAM J. COYNE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. COYNE. Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to speak today in honor of the Western Pennsylvania Hospital School of Nursing. Between April 24 and 26, over 1,000 alumni and guests are expected in Pittsburgh to celebrate the 100th Anniversary of this esteemed school of nursing.

Nursing has changed in many remarkable ways over the course of the past one hundred years. Still, one characteristic of nursing which has gone unchanged is the commitment to providing quality care for the injured and the ill.

The West Penn Hospital School of Nursing has played an active role over the past century in educating and training nurses. Nursing and the education of nurses has changed remarkably from the early days when student nurses would sweep and mop the floors of their units, boil surgical instruments, plan patient menus, and scrub and disinfect beds. The training and commitment to professionalism found at West Penn School of Nursing has contributed to the development of nursing. West Penn has played an active role in ensuring that the nursing profession obtain much of the respect and stature to which it has long been entitled.

In September 1892, West Penn Hospital established the School of Nursing and began training its inaugural class of 17 students. During this first year, West Penn admitted male students and became one of the nursing schools in the United States to admit men. Within 5 years, the student body grew to 45 students, including 9 men.

These students experienced a rigorous training schedule which began at 6:45 a.m. daily with rollcall and uniform inspection. At the same time, these future nurses were aware that they were receiving one of the best nursing educations available anywhere in the world.

The West Penn School of Nursing grew along with the great demands for skilled nurses during the First World War. School enrollment grew to 200 students. Many of the graduates would serve their country in military service caring for fellow Americans and others wounded or injured during that war.

The growth of West Penn School of Nursing led to the establishment of new facilities at the school's present location in the Bloomfield community of Allegheny County. By 1923, construction began on a School of Nursing dormitory and the classroom structure at the present location.

The outbreak of the Second World War again witnessed significant contributions by nursing students from West Penn to the Army Nurse Corps. West Penn also soon became the first hospital nursing programs in Allegheny County to affiliate with a college and offer a bachelor's degree. In addition, West Penn became one of the first nursing schools to become accredited.

Today, graduates from the West Penn School of Nursing receive state-of-the-art health care training. In addition to the intensive academic work that students complete during a 2-year diploma program, students who wish to may obtain a baccalaureate degree with an additional 2 years of study onsite at West Penn through an affiliation with Clarion University of Pennsylvania. Nursing students also enjoy the benefits of studying nursing in Pittsburgh with its many internationally renowned medical facilities. This dynamic health care environment provides West Penn nursing students with regular contact with professionals and technologies which are at the cutting edge of modern medical science.

West Penn has been a leader in expanding the role of nursing among health care professionals. These women and men are trained to take their rightful place alongside other health care professionals in providing the best possible care for their patients.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join in commending the contributions of West Penn School of Nursing to the development of health care excellence in our country. I wish the alumni, the school's professors and staff, and its students the very best as West Penn begins its second century.

EDWARD "REDDY" GEORGE IS FIREFIGHTING LEGEND IN BALLSTON SPA, NY

HON. GERALD B.H. SOLOMON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, in rural districts like New York's 24th, citizen volunteers are the only fire protection we have. That is why I was a volunteer fireman for more than 20 years. And that is why I have such enormous respect for someone like Edward George of Ballston Spa, who's been a volunteer firefighter for 70 years. That is longer than most people have been alive.

Volunteer firefighters like Edward George save countless lives and billions of dollars worth of property every year. I think it is in recognition of such long service that friends of Edward George, those who knew him by his nickname of Reddy, are planning a banquet in his honor on April 25. I certainly plan to be there.

Reddy is going on 89, and he's been one heck of a firefighter for a long time.

But that is not all. He was Ballston Spa police chief in the midfifties and undersheriff of Saratoga County for 2 years. He also had quite a reputation as a semipro football player and a baseball catcher back in the 1920's. And he used to own and train trotters.

But he is best known for his long service to Union Fire Co. No. 2, which he joined in October 1922. We can all imagine the changes in firefighting tactics and equipment since that time. One thing has not changed and that is his dedication.

Reddy was second assistant foreman in 1931-32, first assistant foreman from 1933-40, and second chief in 1942. Naturally, he is not quite as mobile as he used to be, but it seems as though just a few years ago he was still driving firetrucks around.

Mr. Speaker, what would the communities of America be without people like Edward George?

Please join me in paying tribute today to a great firefighter and a great American, Edward Reddy George of Ballston Spa, NY.

USDA'S ANIMAL AND PLANT
HEALTH INSPECTION SERVICE
CELEBRATES 20TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. E de la GARZA

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize the Animal and Plant Health Inspection Service [APHIS], an agency of the U.S. Department of Agriculture, on its 20th anniversary.

APHIS is one of the Department of Agriculture's most important regulatory agencies. Its primary responsibility is to protect American agriculture and the American public from plant and animals pests and disease and from damage caused by predators and certain nuisance wildlife. In addition, APHIS enforces Federal laws for the human care and treatment of animals.

The agency carries out its responsibilities through a number of programs and activities here in the United States and abroad. It conducts pest exclusion activities at our Nation's borders, facilitates exports, carries out cooperative control and eradication programs, maintains domestic and international pest and disease surveillance, conducts animal damage control, ensures that animal biological products are safe and effective, and regulates the release of certain genetically engineered organisms.

Since its creation on April 2, 1972, APHIS has achieved several successes. It has successfully brought under control outbreaks of animal disease such as exotic Newcastle disease in birds and hog cholera in swine. APHIS has also tackled such plant health emergencies as the Mediterranean fruit fly and citrus canker. The agency has been engaged in a long-term effort to eradicate the boll weevil and brucellosis that will also hopefully be successful.

I am particularly proud of the work APHIS has done in eradicating the screwworm from the United States and Mexico. This parasitic blowfly in years past has caused serious losses to the livestock industry of the Southwestern United States and has threatened human health as well.

Through USDA efforts the screwworm was eradicated from the United States in 1966. With APHIS support, Mexico was declared screwworm free in February 1991. Now the agency is engaged in cooperative efforts with several Central American governments to eradicate the screwworm from that area, too.

APHIS activities in the years ahead will be extremely important. Global agricultural trade continues to expand bringing with it the need to be vigilant in protecting the health of our own agricultural sector. The agency's role will be particularly important if the proposed North American Free Trade Agreement becomes a reality.

Mr. Speaker, I congratulate APHIS on its 20th anniversary as a protector of American agriculture and the American public. And I comment its employees for their dedication and success in carrying out the agency's mission.

CONGRATULATIONS TO THE BENTON RANGERS

HON. GLEN POSHARD

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. POSHARD. Mr. Speaker, I rise to congratulate the Benton Rangers for their third place finish in the Illinois class A basketball championships.

If ever there was a basketball hotbed, it's Benton. The team has an outstanding tradition of top players and supportive fans. And the 1991-92 edition did not disappoint.

The Rangers finished this season 26-7, capping it off with a 76-69 win over Augusta Southeastern and a third place finish. That is quite an accomplishment, because in Illinois you don't get to Champaign without earning it every step of the way.

I have always been impressed with the Benton tradition and this team upheld that with distinction, whether in victory or defeat. I am proud to represent the Benton Rangers and the people of Benton in the U.S. House of Representatives.

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing House Concurrent Resolution 308, a resolution condemning the military regime in Burma, also known as the State Law and Order Restoration Council [SLORC], for its ongoing, horrifying abuses of human rights, the trafficking of illicit drugs, and the mass buildup of military arms for domestic repression.

SLORC is an international terrorist organization that is causing critical problems for the region, the people of Burma and our own national security.

Refugees from Burma continue to flee to neighboring countries with as many as 500,000 residing in Thailand, Bangladesh, India, and China. Regional stability, already tenuous, is threatened as these nations seek to cope with the huge influx of desperate people. In addition, the Armed Forces of Thailand and Bangladesh have had serious clashes with SLORC's soldiers who were pursuing prodemocracy forces and fleeing refugees.

The Burmese people who won their democratic freedoms through a fair election now live in a constant state of fear of torture, imprisonment, forced labor, rape, and execution. Asia watch reports that there is a "complete lack of basic freedoms" and that there is "continuing imprisonment of thousands of suspected opponents of SLORC."

SLORC's support for their nation's production of opium directly affects our own national security as American communities desperately seek to cope with illicit drug consumption.

The resolution calls on the President to seek an international arms embargo against the State Law and Order Restoration Council until power has been transferred to a legitimate, democratically elected government. House Concurrent Resolution 308, also calls on the President to instruct the Secretary of State to call privately and publicly for an end to China's military sales and economic support to SLORC until such time as all political prisoners are unconditionally released—including Daw Aung San Suu Kyi, martial law is lifted, and the results of the May 1990 elections are fully implemented.

According, I ask that House Concurrent Resolution 308, be printed in full at this point in the RECORD and that my colleagues support the resolution.

H. CON. RES. 308

Whereas, since 1962, Burma, known as the Union of Myanmar, has been ruled by a military dictatorship;

Whereas the founding of the State Law and Order Restoration Council (SLORC) in 1988 signalled a crackdown against pro-democracy demonstrators and anti-government insurgents;

Whereas independent human rights organizations, the United Nations Human Rights Commission, the United States Department of State, and other groups document widespread and continuing human rights violations against students and others exercising their basic rights to freedom of expression, association, and assembly;

Whereas those organizations agree that SLORC abuses against the people include egregious actions such as arbitrary arrests, torture sometimes leading to the death of those in custody, compulsory labor such as forced portering for the military, and unfair trials before military tribunals;

Whereas the United Nations Human Rights Commission on March 3, 1992 voted a unanimous resolution condemning Burma for human rights violations and appointing a special rapporteur to give a public report to the next meeting of the United Nations General Assembly and Human Rights Commission;

Whereas the United States Department of State describes Burma as having one of the worst human rights records in the world;

Whereas in democratic elections held on May 27, 1990 the Burmese people voted by an overwhelming majority for the representatives of the National League for Democracy;

Whereas the National League for Democracy is led by the 1991 Nobel Peace Prize winner Daw Aung San Suu Kyi who has been under house arrest since July 1989;

Whereas the United States recognizes the individuals who won the 1990 elections as the fairly chosen representatives of the Burmese people;

Whereas despite the clearly expressed will of the people of Burma, the military regime headed by generals Saw Maung and Ne Win has refused to transfer power to the people's elected representatives;

Whereas according to the 1992 International Narcotics Control Strategy Report published by the Department of State, the production of illicit drugs in Burma has doubled since the formation of the SLORC in 1988;

Whereas, according to the same Department of State report, Burma is the world's largest source of illicit opium and heroin, producing 60 percent of the world's supply;

Whereas, since 1989, the SLORC has provided both military and economic support to drug trafficking groups and allows them to produce and trade illicit drugs at will;

Whereas the majority of all opium and heroin produced in Burma is exported to the United States;

Whereas drug use in the United States has contributed to or directly caused the death of thousands of Americans, especially young people and the urban poor;

Whereas the SLORC military regime reportedly used proceeds from the sale of illegal narcotics to purchase up to $1,000,000,000 of arms in 1991 from the People's Republic of China;

Whereas it has been reported that the SLORC purchased these arms through the Chinese Polytechnologies Corporation which is managed by Deng Xiaoping's son-in-law;

Whereas the Chinese arms purchased by the Burmese military regime include tanks, jet fighters, rocket launchers, assault rifles, armored personnel carriers, patrol boats, anti-aircraft guns, and other assorted arms;

Whereas the SLORC uses arms obtained from China and other suppliers to wage war against the pro-democracy forces, including groups such as the Democratic Alliance of Burma and the All Burma Student Democratic Front;

Whereas SLORC repression includes the murder of thousands, the rape of women and young girls, and the enslavement of men, women, and children as porters in Burma army campaigns against minorities and pro-democracy forces;

Whereas the SLORC obtained from China and other suppliers arms to wage war against ethnic minorities and religious groups, including the Karen, Kachin, and Rohingya;

Whereas, in July 1991, the European Community announced a total arms embargo against Burma;

Whereas, in December 1991, the European Community announced that they would no longer accelerate military attaches to Burma;

Whereas SLORC suppression of human rights is forcing tens of thousands of Burmese people to flee to Bangladesh and Thailand;

Whereas, in March 1992, United Nations Secretary General Boutros-Ghali declared the mass exodus of tens of thousands of Burmese people to Bangladesh as threatening to regional stability and called upon the Burmese military regime to rectify the causes of the tragic situation there; and

Whereas the cycle of narcotics sales and arms purchases must be broken: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that—

(1) the President should seek an international arms embargo against the Burmese military regime until power has been transferred to a legitimate, democratically elected government; and

(2) the President should instruct the Secretary of State to call privately and publicly for an end to China's military transfers to the Government of Burma until such time as all political prisoners are unconditionally released (including Daw Aung San Suu Kyi), martial law is lifted, and the results of the May 1990 elections are fully implemented.

THE SCHOOL TO WORK TRANSITION AND YOUTH APPRENTICESHIP ACT

HON. WILLIAM F. GOODLING

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Speaker, today my distinguished colleague from Wisconsin, Mr. GUNDERSON, and I are introducing the School to Work Transition and Youth Apprenticeship Act. The bill is designed to address the problem of providing support for American youth who do not currently intend to seek a post-secondary education. The bill will help these students make a successful transition directly into the workforce or into further education and training which is directly related to the occupation of the student's choice. Since about half of American youth do not go on to college and since the United States provides little assistance in making the transition from school to work, this bill addresses a critical need by supporting these students and assisting them for a smooth transition into the workforce.

The bill is in three titles. Title I improves national efforts by building a Federal compact between the Department of Education and the Department of Labor in order to design a framework for a system of youth apprenticeship programs and to define the respective roles of business and industry, organized labor, educators, and the training community in the integration of academic and occupational standards and assessments. Further, the compact will create partnerships of interested groups such as the business community, the education community, and the training community which will identify and develop voluntary national skills standards, develop methods to assess the skills standards, recommend curricula for achieving skills standards, and ensure that the skills standards will be useful.

Title II provides challenge grants to States to encourage States to design and implement a school to work transition system including the establishment of a youth apprenticeship system within the State by changing policies in order to enable youth to make the successful transition into the workforce or other education which is related to an occupation. This title also encourages States to serve noncollege and college bound youth equitably and to expand the post high school options and opportunities available to these students. In order to achieve the goals of the act, the State is allowed to conduct such activities developing curriculum for school to work transition programs, conducting teacher training, promoting alternative learning programs, and soliciting assistance from the private sector.

Title III provides grants to partnerships of local educational agencies and the business community for youth apprenticeship programs. These grants will create employer-school partnerships that integrate academic instruction, structured job training, and paid worksite learning, and offer program services to students beginning in the 11th or 12th grade. Students who complete a youth apprenticeship will receive a high school diploma and receive a certificate of mastery in an occupational field. These grants will expand the range of skill training options for young people through immediate entry into a skilled occupation upon graduating from high school, entry into technical postsecondary education programs, or entry into technologically oriented programs at colleges and universities.

I hope that you will join me in cosponsoring this legislation.

A TRIBUTE TO THE UNITED WAY OF BUFFALO & ERIE COUNTY

HON. HENRY J. NOWAK

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. NOWAK. Mr. Speaker. I am delighted to take this opportunity to extend my congratulations to the United Way of Buffalo & Erie County, which is celebrating its 75th anniversary this year.

This broadly supported and highly regarded organization's mission statement is: "To increase our community's capacity to address health and human care needs through the efficient generation and distribution of resources as guided by the combined leadership of volunteers and professional staff."

We in the Buffalo area know firsthand how well the United Way of Buffalo & Erie County has accomplished its stated mission.

The organization began during the turmoil of World War I.

Recognizing the community's needs, The Charity Organization Society, the Children's Aid society and Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, and the District Nursing Association decided to join efforts to more effectively meet those needs.

In 1917, over $153,000 was raised by the new Joint Charities and Community Fund in its first year. Reflecting its growth and the depth of public support, what has become the United Way of Buffalo & Erie County increased that figure to $17,215,495 in 1991.

The United Way today exists as a family of 89 health and human service agencies which provide more than 300 service programs to the community.

The United Way's service areas include children's services, mental health/counseling, food and shelter, crisis/intervention services, services to the disabled, services to the elderly, employment/training, and substance abuse prevention. Since it deals with such a diverse range of needs, the organization clearly is an invaluable asset to the community.

The strength and credibility of the organization is achieved through its dedicated volunteer structure and professional staff, as it maintains the most cost-efficient and effective use of donors' dollars. Community services are funded through the United Way's annual fundraising campaign by efficiently using more than 90 cents of every dollar to provide its much-needed services.

It is a pleasure for me to join the many supporters and beneficiaries of the United Way of Buffalo & Erie County in congratulating it on its 75 years of achievement and to wish it continued success.

Following is a brief history of the United Way of Buffalo & Erie County, which I would like to insert at this point in the RECORD:

A key element in any successful venture is the ability of diverse groups to come together and work toward a common goal. For the past 75 years, the United Way of Buffalo and Erie County has been doing just that—acting as the catalyst in a community-wide effort to address health and human service needs by uniting corporations, government, organized labor, human service agencies, private citizens and others.

In 1917, our country was faced with the violence and horrors of WWI. While help was needed for those struggling overseas, the need was just as great for organizations that helped people back home. It was from this need that the United Way of Buffalo and Erie County was born. Three local organizations—the Charity Organization Society, the Children's Aid Society and Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, and the District Nursing Association—decided to join forces in their fundraising efforts in order to more effectively meet growing community needs. This group, known as the Joint Charities and Community Fund, raised over $153,000 that first year.

This organization grew and developed over the years, steadily increasing the number of agencies involved and the amounts raised. The names changed throughout its history—from Joint Charities to United Way and Community Fund (1942), to Community Chest of Buffalo and Erie County (1946), to United Fund of Buffalo and Erie County (1960), to the modern-day United Way of Buffalo and Erie County (1972). The mission though, has remained fundamentally the same: joining forces to increase the community's capacity to care for one another.

Today, the United Way exists as a family of 90 health and human service agencies that provide more than 300 service programs to the community as well as a community problem solver that channels both money and other resources toward the most pressing needs currently facing Western New York. The $153,619 of 1917 has increased to $17,215,495 in 1991, a figure which must continue to grow in order to keep pace with increasing needs.

The agencies funded by today's United Way address a wide variety of issues, providing services from cradle to grave. Service areas include: food and shelter, crisis/intervention services, children's services, mental health/counseling, services to the disabled, services to frail elders, employment/training, and substance abuse prevention. In addition to funds allocated to member agencies, over 500 additional agencies receive funds and services through designations, grant programs, Gifts-In-Kind, Emergency Food and Shelter and Management Assistance Services.

Every aspect of United Way activity involves a cooperative effort on the part of knowledgeable, dedicated community volunteers and the well-trained and highly qualified United Way staff. Over 3,000 local volunteers and the well-trained and highly qualified United Way staff. Over 3,000 local volunteers devote their time each year to fundraising, allocating funds, planning, marketing, service delivery, and other activities for the United Way and its member agencies. The strength of the organization lies in this volunteer structure, as it allows for the most cost-efficient and effective use of donor's dollars. The result is that over 90 cents of every dollar raised in the United Way's annual fundraising campaign finds its way directly to community services. The less than 10% that goes toward administrative costs is among the lowest for any non-profit organization in the country.

Some of the people who make the United Way work in 1992 include chairman of the board of directors and president of Rockmont Corporation Jeffrey A. Rochwarger, chairman of directors and president of Rockmont Corporation Jeffrey A. Rochwarger, chairman since April of 1991, and president Robert M. Bennett, who has held his post since 1985. They are but two of the thousands of individuals who are involved in this intricate community-wide operation that for 75 years has been helping to improve the lives of the citizens of Buffalo and Erie County.

In keeping with its mission, the United Way has responded to the changing needs of the 1990's through various programs and initiatives. Areas such as literacy skills, elder care, and services to children have been targeted as sources of growing concern, and will receive increased attention and funding throughout this decade.

SCHOOL-TO-WORK TRANSITION AND YOUTH APPRENTICESHIP ACT

HON. STEVE GUNDERSON

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Speaker, today I am joining with my good friend and colleague from Pennsylvania, Mr. GOODLING, in introducing a bill that we believe will go a long way in addressing a critical need in the U.S. educational system. Our bill, the School-to-Work Transition and Youth Apprenticeship Act will encourage the development of State and local programs to provide education and employment opportunities for our Nation's youth who plan to enter the work force immediately after high school, or who plan to enter into technological post-secondary education or training, as compared to 4-year colleges and universities.

The United States is currently undergoing a great deal of change. One of the driving forces of this change is the evolving American work force, which will require significant investment in human capital in the future, as well as reform in our national human resource investment policies and practices. U.S. competitiveness is declining, and we will lose our eco-conomic leadership within the decade if we do not make these necessary changes and investments right away.

While the United States still maintains the highest standard of living in the world, the gap is narrowing, with wage rates in the United States lower than in Germany, Sweden, and Denmark, and falling. The United States still leads the world in productivity, but its growth has ranked last for over a decade compared to other industrialized nations. But the United States still has the capability to remain top in the world. We continue to have the potential to create jobs at a rate higher than the number of people entering the labor market, if we operate at peak efficiency. According to the "Economic Report of the President" just published in February, despite temporary setbacks of several recessions, employment has increased by 38 million, from 71 million in 1971 to 109 million in 1991. This 53 percent growth far surpassed that of most other major industrialized countries, with Japan growing only half as fast; and France, Germany, and the United Kingdom less than one-fifth the United States rate. The President's report also notes however, that of the jobs created, there was a significant shift toward high skilled jobs requiring education beyond high school.

Not only is it critical that our work force be well-educated and trained to fill these high paying jobs of the future, it is critical to recognize the link between the quality of the U.S. education and training system and our ability to compete with other countries. Other industrialized nations recognized these linkages long ago, emphasizing: Excellence in primary and secondary education; upgrading standards and expectations for all students; and youth apprenticeship as ways to prepare students for work.

The basic building block for career preparation is a good education, but the U.S. educational system does not adequately prepare students for work, particularly noncollege-bound students. At a time when only 50 percent of U.S. youth go on to college after high school, with only 20 percent of all youth completing 4-year degrees, our U.S. educational system continues to be disproportionately geared toward meeting the needs of the college bound. Very little attention is paid to bridging the gap between school and work.

This attitude compares to competitor nations, where schools and employers typically work together to facilitate youth's entry into the work force. In Japan for example, high school seniors get jobs almost exclusively through school-employer linkages, with employers basing hiring decisions on schools' recommendations. In Germany, roughly two-thirds of all youth participate in apprenticeships. In the United States, the national apprenticeship system is not widely used, nor is it generally a program that lends itself to youth. However, apprenticeship-like programs, offering shorter-term youth apprenticeships in combination with academic studies, have been found to be very effective in providing U.S. youth with a formal bridge from school to work. Yet, less than 4 percent of high school students nationwide during the 1989-90 academic year were enrolled in such work-based programs.

Part of the blame for the lack of student preparedness for work must also rest with employers. In addition to placing high value on worker education and training, other countries' businesses have adopted new high-performance work organizations—abandoning outdated U.S. management structures developed in the early part of the century—on which many U.S. companies are still based. Competitors utilizing high performance work organizations, as well as innovative U.S. companies, depend on highly skilled workers who participate in decisionmaking in systems driven by customer needs. This recognition of the direct linkage between investing in human capital and competitiveness has helped fuel the success of our leading competitors, and is the subject of a great deal of activity on the part of the administration, Congress, and leading business organizations in the country. It is becoming widely recognized that U.S. business must take part in this sort of reorganization, and subsequently, work with schools and training systems to develop needed curriculum and set necessary standards—and demand those standards—in order to get the type of workers that are required by this sort of reorganized workplace.

Since the 1970's, the Department of Labor has conducted a number of youth apprenticeship demonstrations that have successfully proven the feasibility of starting youth apprenticeship during high school. In September 1990, the Department of Labor awarded $3.2 million in seed grants to six organizations to explore ways of redesigning school curricula so that students learn job-related subjects in a practical context and noncollege-bound students are better prepared to enter the work force. This money has been leveraged into a $10.5-million program. While these programs are meeting with success, and are hoped to lead to changes in the way U.S. students learn basic workplace skills, the number of youth participating in apprenticeship programs in 1990 totaled only 3,500 students.

As a part of the President's Job Training 2000 initiative, both the Department of Labor and the Department of Education plan to expand efforts in the area of youth apprenticeship. The administration is also providing leadership in the identification of national, industry recognized skill standards, and work-based competencies needed by employers in today's workplace. Just this week, the Secretary of Labor's Commission on Achieving Necessary Skills [SCANS] issued its final report entitled "Learning A Living: A Blueprint for High Performance," which calls for reorganization of education and work to close the skills gap and prepare the work force for the future.

Codifying the ongoing work of the Departments of Labor and Education, title I of our bill will require that voluntary national industry recognized skill standards be developed for most major industries and occupations throughout the United States. Specifically, this legislation requires that the Secretaries of Labor and Education, through a compact established under the bill, designate and provide assistance to partnerships of industry, labor, educators, and the training community for the development of skill standards and methods of assessment and curriculum development for the utilization of such standards. Through such a process, all stakeholders in the system should benefit: Employers through development of objective hiring criteria, as well as highly trained workers; employees through the provision of an identified career path, as well as portable credentials when changing jobs; labor organizations in representing the interests of their members with regard to career paths, compensation, and ongoing skills training; and educators and trainers by helping them to improve the quality of their education and training systems and linkages to the workplace.

Further, title I would require that an agreement or compact be established between the Secretary of Labor and the Secretary of Education, specifically between the Employment Training Administration and the Office of Adult and Vocational Education, respectively, to: Design the framework for an American youth apprenticeship system; designate and oversee the skill standard partnerships outlined above; and to oversee the activities required under titles II and III of this legislation.

Title II of the bill would provide competitive grants to States for the design and implementation of State and local policies, infrastructures, and programs necessary to develop statewide school-to-work transition systems. In order to receive grants under this title, States would be required to develop a State plan providing assurances that they will: Incorporate preemployment skills and competencies, as well as career awareness and exploration activities into their States' elementary/secondary curricula; provide teacher and counselor training in school-to-work transition; assure that guidance and counseling, focusing on transition to the work force, is available to all students; and assure that skill standards, as well as employment competencies, developed at the State and Federal levels, be incorporated into the education and training system, to the degree possible.

Finally, title III of the bill provides State and local grants for the actual development of youth apprenticeship programs at the local level. Under this program, grants would be provided to States on a competitive basis, to be distributed to local consortia composed of partners which include local educational agencies, individual schools, vocational/technical schools, or technical and community colleges, and an employer, employer association, or a private industry council as established under the Job Training Partnership Act. The goal of this title is not to limit or track students in non-college-bound programs, but just the opposite. The intent of this legislation is to expand the range of skills training and career options for youth, enabling immediate entry into a skilled occupation upon high school graduation, or entry into a certified apprenticeship program, a technical postsecondary education/training program, or into technologically oriented programs at colleges and universities. As defined by our bill, youth apprenticeship is an employer-school partnership that integrates academic instruction, structured job training, paid work site learning, and work experience. Such a program is to be offered to students beginning in the 11th or 12th grade, and results in the receipt of a high school diploma and either an approved certificate of occupational and academic mastery, entry into a related post-secondary program, or entry into a certified apprenticeship program. While title II of our bill concentrates on assisting States to adopt comprehensive reform in the broader area of school-to-work transition, title III is very focused to establish local youth apprenticeship programs.

Mr. Speaker, while school-to-work transition is still a relatively new issue in education, and there is still a lot to be learned, I strongly feel that we are headed in the right direction with this legislation. With the introduction of this bill today, we are sending a message that all U.S. youth deserve an education that will lead to full and rewarding employment. We welcome input from all parties that have an interest in this legislation. There is no question that we must invest in all of our Nation's youth, both the college and the noncollege-bound. Through a reform of our educational system to provide comprehensive school-to-work programs in grades K-12, and more focused programs such as youth apprenticeship for upper level high school students, we will go far to build the necessary bridge between school and the work force.

MAKING THE HEALTH SYSTEM WORK FOR AMERICA

HON. MICHAEL A. ANDREWS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. ANDREWS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, America's health care system does not work. It does not work for the woman who gets breast cancer and can't switch jobs because the insurance company won't cover the treatments. It does not work for the small business that can't afford to cover its employees. It does not work because the cost of health care keeps going up.

Medical costs have doubled since 1980. The price of premiums paid by businesses has tripled. Thirty-seven million Americans do not have health insurance. The American people are demanding action, but are not comfortable with the proposals made so far.

Other Democratic proposals try to fix these problems by having the Government run the health care system. The administration's proposal does not do enough to control costs.

I am joining with my colleagues, Congressmen JIM COOPER and CHARLES STENHOLM to call for a new approach to health care reform. It is called managed competition.

Our proposal rewards the customers of those health organizations that get the best results at the lowest costs. We want to create a market where consumers can shop for health care and health insurance as a single product. They will buy health care based on cost and quality like any other consumer product.

Right now, consumers shop for providers based on quality and for insurance based on cost. We want to stop the insanity of an insurance system that is separate from the health care system. Hospitals, physicians, and insurance companies should make more money when people are healthy not when people are sick.

Under our plan, health care providers will have an incentive to find and use less expensive procedures because their bottom line will be the same as the insurer. Both will want to provide effective health care at the lowest cost.

The System we have now allows too many hospitals to provide the whole range of specialized care. For example, a study in California determined that one-third of the hospitals doing coronary bypass operations failed to meet the volume standard set by the American College of Surgeons. At a lower volume, physicians do not have enough experience to be effective. The result has been a higher mortality rate in these low-volume hospitals.

Many of those patients would have lived had they gone to centers of excellence with high volume like the Texas Medical Center. Under our proposal, they would have lived because providers will be organized more efficiently and effectively.

The Tax Code also encourages wasteful health spending. For every extra dollar businesses spend on health care, only 70 cents comes out of their pocket. The other 30 cents comes from the Government. This Government subsidy encourages inefficiency.

The most abusive example is a health plan with first-dollar coverage. This means that the business pays for every health care expense including the deductibles and copayments. This arrangement takes away the incentive for consumers to use the health care system prudently.

Our proposal limits the tax deduction for businesses to the cost of the least expensive insurance plan. Businesses can buy more expensive plans, but they will not receive a taxpayer subsidy.

If we will eliminate first-dollar coverage plans, we also add an incentive for people to stay healthy. Americans must take more responsibility for their health.

Prevention is the key to controlling health care costs for the individual. We will ensure 100 percent immunization levels for children. We will give flu vaccines to older Americans. And we will require health insurance plans to have no deductibles or copayments for preventive care.

It is incredible that our health care system does not measure quality. We rarely collect data on whether a patient gets better or not. We need to know when the health care is working. Under our bill, providers will be required to disclose their performance in a public report.

We are not getting our money's worth from health care. Economics teaches us that if supply increases, then prices should fall. The supply of hospitals and physicians has been growing rapidly since the 1960s. Yet, health care costs have risen steadily over that time. The cost of health care has risen from 9 percent of the gross national product in 1980 to nearly 14 percent today. Clearly, the market isn't working.

The market will work if we arm consumers with information about the cost and quality of health care. Under our bill, we will once again get value for our money.

But not everyone can afford health insurance even once we control costs. The average American family without health insurance has an income less than $20,000. The average uninsured adult works for a small business with fewer than 25 employees.

Our plan targets these families. Small businesses will pay lower premiums because they will have the benefit of group rates through health insurance purchasing cooperatives. Our plan will guarantee health coverage to 40 percent of the uninsured in Texas, offering financial assistance to an additional 30 percent who are between 100 and 200 percent of poverty.

Our plan is the only comprehensive health reform bill that can be enacted this year. It does not call for price controls, which the administration strongly opposes. It greatly expands access to health care, which Democrats strongly support. It is a plan that we can afford.

SOFT DRINK LICENSE TRANSFERS

HON. CHARLES E. SCHUMER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Speaker, over the last few years, the Federal Trade Commission [FTC] has developed a practice of opposing soft drink license transfers from smaller bottlers to larger ones that also handle larger brand products. This course has been pursued by the FTC despite repeated expressions of congressional concern about the effect of this policy on competition and consumers, and concern that the FTC was ignoring mandates of the 1980 Soft Drink Interbrand Competition Act.

Unfortunately, these congressional concerns have proven valid. In fact, the FTC's repeated opposition to piggybacking has undermined interbrand competition, reduced the availability of soft drinks and raised prices to consumers. The FTC has blocked license transfers in such diverse markets as Broward County, FL, San Antonio, TX, and Duluth, MN. But nowhere has the damaging impact of the FTC policy been more apparent than in the New York City metropolitan area. There, two independent bottlers that distributed 7-UP, Crush, Hawaiian Punch, and Barq's sodas have ceased operation. The only viable bottlers who have come forward to try to rescue these brands also happen to bottle larger brands. The FTC has refused to approve the transfer of these franchises on the grounds that it would reduce competition among bottlers in New York, while apparently ignoring the effect of this ruling on the viability of these small brands and competition at the consumer level.

These four smaller brands currently have no authorized distribution in much of the New York area, the largest soft drink market in the country. This situation hurts those brands, and hurts the consumer, who is seeking a reduced selection of soft drinks and, in some instances, higher prices.

Our bill imposes a temporary limitation or moratorium on the FTC's authority to challenge piggybacking arrangements such as these. The immediate effect will be to put the brands back into distribution in New York. The bill limits, but does not eliminate the FTC's authority. It does not have any impact on the authority of the Department of Justice to enforce out antitrust laws, if need be. It is a temporary, needed and surgical solution to an obvious problem. During the moratorium period, I hope that the FTC will reconsider the effects of its existing approach toward the soft drink industry, especially small concentrate manufacturers, and consult further with the industry and with Congress.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my fellow Members of Congress to support this modest measure before the FTC's approach drives the Nation's independent soft drink manufacturers from the marketplace.

PREVENTING FRAUD IN MULTIPLE EMPLOYER WELFARE ARRANGEMENTS

HON. WILLIAM J. HUGHES

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, today, we, along with 11 of our colleagues, are introducing legislation to correct regulatory loopholes which permit unscrupulous operators from bilking hundreds of thousands of Americans out of health care protection and leaving them with millions of dollars in unpaid medical bills.

In harsh economic times, with health care expenditures rising to more than double the rate of inflation, some businesses are pooling funds and contracting with entrepreneurs to offer health benefits to their employees at reduced rates. These pooling arrangements are defined as multiple employer welfare arrangements [MEWA's] under the Employee Retirement Income Security Act [ERISA].

Companies that participate in MEWA's generally self-insure by depositing premiums in a reserve fund overseen by the plan's administrators. Although no State or Federal agency is able to tell us exactly how many of these plans exist, testimony provided to the Subcommittee on Retirement Income and Employment indicates that approximately 3,000 MEWA's presently operate throughout the country.

Fraudulent MEWA's often operate like classic Ponzi schemes. Administrators collect premiums, pay themselves hefty fees to support extravagant lifestyles, and retain only a small portion of the premiums to pay claims. When things get too hot and they are unable to pay benefits, many of these bunco artists simply move to another State to try to sell new policies and mask the plan's underfunding.

While a number of MEWA's fill a gap in our health benefits system by allowing small businesses to pool resources and risks, unscrupulous administrators often exploit a black hole of ambiguous authority between Federal and State regulators. This practice has lured in numerous unsuspecting companies, leaving thousands of people personally liable for all their medical bills.

A recently released report of the General Accounting Office [GAO] that we requested reveals that between 1988 and 1991 alone more than 600 fraudulent or mismanaged MEWA's left over 400,000 Americans and their families with $123 million in unpaid health claims. The GAO study found that these plans are increasingly a source of regulatory confusion, enforcement problems, and fraud.

Many MEWA's function covertly and cannot be identified by the Labor Department and individual States. Consequently, many have been able to embezzle funds for years without being detected. A majority of States report to the GAO that problems with MEWA's have increased over the past 3 years.

A number of States also told the GAO that many of these plans are incorrectly claiming that they are collectively bargained or single-employer plans rather than MEWA's and are thus exempt from State regulation.

For example, State officials questioned the validity of entities claiming exemption as collectively bargained plans, noting that by selling associate memberships these entities marketed health benefit coverage to individuals with no participation or representation in the union. Another State questioned the validity of a labor-leasing entity claiming exemption as a single-employer plan, noting that the entity hired employees of several companies and then leased the employees back just to qualify for the exemption.

Gaps in the regulatory enforcement of MEWA's take on even greater significance given the administration's recent health reform proposal to encourage more small businesses to participate in similar health insurance networks.

As we work vigorously toward a comprehensive approach to health care reform, we must strengthen our current monitoring and enforcement system. Serious failures lie in our health insurance system. Americans cannot wait for the political jockeying in health care reform to end before their rights are protected. Hard-working employers and employees are too often falling victim to a growing number of con artists who offer empty promises of health coverage, while skimming off millions of dollars in insurance premiums. Protection is needed immediately.

We urge our colleagues on both sides of the aisle to support this important legislation.

Below is a summary of the legislation we have introduced today:

MULTIPLE EMPLOYER SELF-INSURANCE ENFORCEMENT ACT OF 1992

PURPOSE OF LEGISLATION

This bill amends title I of the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 (ERISA) to clarify and improve the integrated regulation and enforcement of federal and state agencies concerning the viability and operation of self-insured multiple employer welfare arrangements (MEWAs) and employee leasing welfare arrangements. A basic objective of this Act is to prevent fraudulent and mismanaged MEWAs from leaving hundreds of thousands of small business employees bankrupt and without their vital health coverage.

ELEMENTS OF LEGISLATION

(A) Clarify states' authority in the regulation and enforcement of self-insured MEWAs.

(B) Distinguish between fully insured MEWAs and self-insured and to what extent ERISA preemption applies.

(C) Provide requirements for reporting and disclosure to both participants and participating employers of MEWAs, to ensure consumer awareness of the risks and financial liability associated with self-insured plans.

(D) Provide for adjudication of benefit claims, for self-insured MEWA participants, either through alternative dispute resolution or a hearing before an administrative law judge at the Department of Labor.

(E) Establish a federal certification process for regulating self-insured MEWAs. Establish states' authority to monitor and enforce self-insured MEWAs' financial viability.

(F) Establish a registration process for all fully insured MEWAs and employee leasing welfare arrangements. All plans will file with the Department of Labor no later than March 1st of each year.

(G) Specify who can sponsor a self-insured MEWA. Amend the definition of MEWA to include certain employee leasing arrangements and certain union associate membership programs.

(H) Establish a felony for any person who falsely represents to any employee, employer, sponsor, the Department of Labor, or any state, an arrangement as to certified MEWA, an exempt employee leasing welfare arrangement or a union plan.

(I) Establish Federal standards for regulating employee leasing welfare arrangements that are administered and enforced by the states.

(J) The National Association of Insurance Commissioners may develop model standards for state certification, that will become the federal standards upon approval by the Congress by a joint resolution. The NAIC will submit these standards to the Congress within one year of enactment.

ALFRED E. JOHNSON

HON. JOHN P. HAMMERSCHMIDT

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. Mr. Speaker, an outstanding citizen of the State of Arkansas, Alfred E. "Coach" Johnson, passed away in Little Rock on March 31. I would like to take this opportunity to extend my condolences to his wife, Irene, and their two sons, Ed and Al, Jr.

Al was a native Arkansan, born in my hometown of Harrison. However, he was well known outside of our State and was certainly no stranger to those of us on the Public Works and Transportation Committee.

He was an executive director of the American Association of State Officials here in Washington and testified before Congress many times. Al even turned down an appointment as Federal Highway Administrator to stay with the association. I know a number of my colleagues remember Al and have high regard for his professionalism and dedication to the development of our Nation's transportation infrastructure.

In recognition of his outstanding service, the association established the "Alfred E. Johnson Achievement Award" to honor an outstanding employee from one of the association's member departments at each annual convention, who demonstrates the greatest promise of advancement in engineering or administration.

Following is an article which highlights Al Johnson's numerous achievements.

OBITUARY AND SOME CAREER HIGHLIGHTS OF ALFRED EUGENE JOHNSON

Alfred E. Johnson, a native Arkansan was born in Harrison on July 10, 1907, into one of the early families who helped the founding of the town.

He enrolled in College in 1924, and earned a B.S.C.E. Degree from the University of Arkansas in due time. Alf decided on a highway career when he was a young schoolboy and the National highway cry was "Get out of the Mud".

Alf Johnson got a start in his career during the summer college vacation of 1927 as a Levelman on a highway location survey which now is U.S. Route 71, through the Ozark Mountains. He continued to work part time while in college through 1929, when he had the opportunity for full time work in the State Highway Department, but he continued his studies during his entire active career using extension courses, night graduate subjects, workshops, seminars, and home study of new texts to expand his knowledge and keep current to be better qualified to supervise.

He was with the Arkansas State Highway Department in the field and the headquarter offices until December 31, 1954, and moved to Washington, D.C. on January 1, 1955, when he was drafted by the State Highway Department to be Executive Director of the American Association of State Officials after a relatively new Arkansas Highway Director, who was very much opposed to any Interstate highway program in Arkansas called for Johnson's resignation because Johnson was interested in drafting a National Interstate highway program, and for recommending to the State Highway Departments that they participate in such a program, if enacted.

He was in Washington until 1973, when he moved back to Arkansas, after he had reached the mandatory age for retirement.

Johnson was a strong voice in State and National highway affairs for a quarter century; was listed in Who's Who in America; was called "Arkansas' Own Mr. Highway" by the Arkansas Gazette; was the subject of a Coverplate and story in an issue of the Engineering News-Record; was termed a "Road Giant" on the coverplate of a National Dun Donnelley publication; and the State Highway people called him "the Coach".

Johnson was given the responsibility of the Chief Engineer's office of the Arkansas Department after having broad experience in surveys, research, experimentation, troubleshooting and all phases of highway planning, designing and construction and maintenance of roads and bridges.

He was a persuasive leader in moving the Department into a modern era of improved management and operations; making employee tenure based on merit; getting salaries competitive; opposing the practice of soliciting political contributions from employees; enhancing the recruitment of Engineering graduates; and was the father of the Retirement System.

While in Arkansas he was President of the Little Rock Engineers Club; the Arkansas Engineers Club; the Southeastern Association of State Highway Officials, which he helped organize; and in 1954 he was President of the American Association of State Highway Officials.

It was at the 1954 Annual Meeting of the Association that the States first learned from Johnson a complete, accurate and detailed outline of the proposed National System of Interstate Highways and he called on them to support the program to ensure the highways would be constructed by the States and not some other arrangement.

Johnson had been Chairman of a small Blue-ribbon advisory group of outstanding highway people in 1954, to work with the new Federal Commissioner of Public Roads, Frank du Pont, his dedicated Chief Engineer, Frank Turner, and Assistant to the President, Sherman Adams of the White House in drafting the President's Grand Highway Plan (the Interstate System) and getting it ready for hearings by the Clay Committee in 1954 so it could be sent to Congress in 1955. Johnson was given the chore of explaining the proposal to the Highway Committee of the Governors' Conference and the National League of Cities to obtain their support. The program was defeated by Congress in 1955, but was reconsidered and enacted and signed by the President in 1956.

Alf Johnson was considered one of the five principal architects who turned the many reports and fantasies over the years of individual transcontinental "Superhighways" into reality—the Interstate Highway System.

Other activities while still in Arkansas included; being selected as one of the two to write the Traffic Engineering section of the first White House Highway Safety conference Report; was Chairman of the select committee that planned the AASHO National Highway Research Project in Illinois; and was Chairman of the AASHO Planning and Design Policy Committee, composed of Chief Engineers, that developed the official design standards for the Interstate Highways, which were approved by the Commissioner of Public Roads twelve days after the President signed the bill for the Interstate program.

After moving to Washington, Johnson was honored with an Honorary membership in the Institution of Highway Engineers of Great Britain; became a Life Member of the Society of Civil Engineers; was the Reporter of the Middle East Conference of the International Road Federation at Beirut; was appointed Vice-Chairman of the Organizing Committee of the Ninth Pan-American Highway Congress; was named to Advisory Councils of two Federal Cabinet Departments and received the Secretary's Award; was one of the two creators of the National Cooperative Highway Research Program that is under the umbrella of the National Academy of Sciences and administered by the Transportation Research Board, was a Life Member of the American Road Builder's Association; was Life Member of the Washington Road Gang Club; and was the father of the AASHO Fiftieth Anniversary "Golden Book" that is one of the best historical records of highway development in America from 1607 to 1964.

Johnson was one of the three people to receive the largest number of coveted and prestigious honors and awards available in the highway field (over 40 awards and honors were received with the most prestigious awards being; the Bartlett Award; the MacDonald Award; the Roy W. Crum Award; the Neil J. Curry Memorial Gold Award; the P.D. McLean Memorial Award; the Road Builders Man of the Year Award; the Trail Blazer Award; and an Engineering News-Record Plaque.

His favorite honor was the State Highway Departments establishing the "Alfred E. Johnson Achievement Award", when he retired, that honored an outstanding employee of an AASHO Member Department at each Annual Convention, who demonstrated the greatest promise of advancement in engineering or administration.

A very important component of the Interstate system is outstanding and uniform signing nationwide. After the Committee of the Traffic Engineers of all the AASHO Member Departments were unable to agree on the principal features of its assignment, Johnson assumed the chore, and after inspecting and studying the signing on all the existing major toll roads and urban freeways, he then drafted a tentative Interstate sign manual and submitted copies to the Member Departments for constructive comments, which justified changes. The manual was then approved by AASHO and the Federal Highway Administrator, making the sign manual official. Johnson also established the numbering system for the Interstate system, which was a State responsibility since all the systems are parts of the respective State highway systems.

While in Washington, "Coach" Johnson turned down an appointment as Federal Highway Administrator to stay with AASHO until retirement.

He was a strong and dedicated supporter of the highly satisfactory State-Federal Highway partnership that started in 1916. It is unique in Intergovernmental programs, and it has produced the World's best and biggest road network.

When he would be driving on a section of the Interstate system, he would occasionally express his proud satisfaction with his efforts in the Interstate program.

Alf Johnson retired on November 1, 1972, and stepped down with gratitude, dignity, honor and pride. He soon moved back to Little Rock from the Washington mainstream, to a quiet life, and purposely assumed a reclusive attitude toward any involvement in current highway policies to avoid influencing his successors in any manner out of respect and courtesy to them.

Johnson wanted his remaining years to be used for enjoying his family, to keep current on Worldwide highway progress, to read and study, and to pursue his outdoor hobbies that he had neglected because of the years of heavy work schedules required by his job.

Mr. Alfred E. Johnson, the "Coach" died at the age of 85 years, on March 31, 1992 at Little Rock, Ark.

He is survived by his widow, Irene Berta Walker Johnson of the home; a sister, Edith Elizabeth Johnson Bartlett of Blytheville, Arkansas; two sons, Alfred E. Johnson, Junior of Little Rock, and F. Edwin Johnson of Greenwood, Mississippi; and six grandchildren.

Burial, with a Graveside Service, was in Forest Hills Memorial Park on the historic "Old State Coach Road", which was originally built along the centuries old Southwest Indian Trail as one of the Andrew Jackson Military Roads in 1828. It has been upgraded from time to time and is now Arkansas State Route No. 5.

Mr. Johnson was of the Presbyterian faith.

A SALUTE TO 100 BLACK MEN OF MARYLAND, INC.

HON. KWEISI MFUME

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. MFUME. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in honor of a special group of African-American men who have endeavored quietly over the past year to improve the quality of life and the future potential of many young men in the greater Baltimore area.

100 Black Men of Maryland, Inc., became incorporated within the State in April 1991. In 1 brief year, this organization has established the Men Inspiring Students to Enjoy Reading [MISTER] Program. This program is designed to inspire young men within the community to read for knowledge and pleasure and to explore the wonders of the world through reading.

100 Black Men of Maryland, Inc., is the Maryland affiliate of the national 100 Black Men organization. 100 Black Men have taken the initiative upon themselves to save our Nations young black males from the violence and other everyday pitfalls which may deter their development and full integration within society. 100 Black Men have gone into some of the most troublesome situations and molded fine diamonds out of a mound of rubble and despair.

The various professional industries that comprise 100 Black Men serve as surrogate family and teachers to these young men and show through a positive example that these young people are not alone in their quest to better their lives and understand the complexities of the larger society in which we are all challenged to succeed within.

Mr. Speaker, as with all successful socially conscious organizations, a key component for success is community involvement. It takes all kinds of people to make this world better and I am sure the 100 Black Men could use the talents and skills of a wide variety of persons to help expose our young men to a variety of experiences and opportunities.

On April 18, 1992, 100 Black Men of Maryland will host a reception entitled "An Enchanted Evening With Peabo Bryson." This event is an excellent opportunity for interested persons within the community to familiarize themselves with the diverse programs and individuals involved with the State organization.

Mr. Gene Giles, President of 100 Black Men of Maryland, should be commended for his vision and creative vitality on behalf of his organization and our Nation's youth. I support 100 Black Men and hope that everyone who is interested in their mission would take the time to salute their State and local chapters.

SALUTING THE FUN WITH SCIENCE TEAM

HON. CLYDE C. HOLLOWAY

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. HOLLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, it is with pride and pleasure that I pay tribute today to the Dupont Fun With Science Team, including East St. John High School science teacher John Ellis, of Reserve, LA, whose imagination and love of work has helped make learning fun for thousands of students.

Mr. Speaker, America faces a shortage of scientists and engineers. The National Science Foundation has estimated a shortage of 1 million engineers and scientists by the year 2000. Because of the interest of the Du Pont Corp., the initiative of John Ellis, and the involvement of his colleagues, students everywhere are getting and staying interested in science. Thanks to Fun with Science, thousands of young people have discovered science as a topic of interest, and many will no doubt pursue science as a career.

Mr. Speaker, typical of the praise which educators everywhere have for the Fun With Science Program are the observations of Aline T. Barr, representing the department of chemistry and physics at Nicolls State University in Thibodaux, LA: "It was excellent from the standpoints of both science and entertainment," she observed. "I have conducted more than 40 science workshops during the past 10 years, and can verify that the program presented by Du Pont is excellent. It is motivating, captivating, entertaining and educational. Du Pont's interest and participation is serving as a model for other corporations."

Mr. Speaker, effective education requires imagination, commitment, and communication. Fun With Science Combines all three. Even better, it is a model program which can be, and is being emulated, by educators and scientists everywhere. I salute this program, its corporate parent, Du Pont, its innovative teacher, John Ellis and the entire Dupont team, including Charlie Bottolfs, Mari Talavera, Karl Johnson, Millard Hutchinson, Joe Barrow, Faye Scotti, Butch Galino, Tom Pappenhagen, Keith Wilkins, Patricia Banquer, Laura Barrios, Bill Swonger, and Nancy and Tyler Davis. Mr. Speaker, Fun with Science is a credit to everyone.

REMOVING GOVERNMENT ROADBLOCKS TO SMALL BUSINESS JOB CREATION

HON. ANDY IRELAND

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, today I join my distinguished colleague from Washington, Mr. CHANDLER, as well as several others who are concerned about small business job creation, as an original cosponsor of legislation to rescue some 3,700 small business owners who have come face-to-face with an 800-pound gorilla known as the Federal Financing Bank [FFB].

In the high-interest environment of the 1980's, these small business owners borrowed money to expand their businesses and create jobs. Their loans were guaranteed by the Small Business Administration pursuant to section 503 of the Small Business Investment Act and were funded through the FFB, an agency of the U.S. Treasury. These borrowers turned to the SBA 503 Program because they were ready to grow and create new jobs in their communities, but they could not find affordable long-term financing from any other source.

Today, those borrowers are finding that outrageous prepayment premiums have made it virtually impossible to refinance their loans at today's lower rates; they have made it virtually impossible to sell an FFB-financed loan without incurring a substantial loss. As one borrower put it, "owners (with loans funded by the FFB) cannot even die without placing an intolerable strain on their estates."

Today's lower interest rates have given large corporations the opportunity to strengthen their balance sheets by refinancing their debt in the private capital market. Individuals are refinancing their home mortgages in record numbers, as well. This is good for the country. It translates into new investment, new jobs and higher levels of consumer spending. SBA 503 borrowers, however, are unable to take advantage of today's low-interest-rate environment.

Why can't these small businesses grow? Why can't they hire new workers? Why are they forced to cut back on the work force they currently employ? Because the FFB is demanding premiums of as much as 40 percent of the unpaid balance for the privilege of prepaying their 503 loans. As a result, money that would otherwise go to job creation and tax-base expansion—the stated goals of the 503 lending program—are instead lining the coffers of the FFB.

This program was solved in 1987 for new borrowers using the SBA's development company loan program. These loans are now financed in the private-capital market, rather than through the FFB. These private-capital loans—known as 504 loans—carry set prepayment premiums that are in keeping with commercial-lending practices. But 503 borrowers remain locked in—in many cases for another 20 years—to the FFB's unworkable prepayment terms.

We in Congress have an obligation to not ignore the thousands of 503 borrowers who are victims of fluctuating interest rates and bureaucratic inertia. We have an obligation to their employees and their communities, as well.

The legislation we are introducing today fulfills that obligation. It gives 503 borrowers a 2-year option to trade the uncertainty and onus of the FFB current prepayment formula for a defined prepayment penalty that reflects rates charged by commercial lenders. Our bill will allow business that are ready to grow and expand the flexibility to do so. It will give owners at the end of their careers the opportunity to retire in dignity, without forfeiting their life savings to huge FFB prepayment premiums. It should become law.

I am looking forward to working with Mr. CHANDLER, Chairman WYDEN of the Small Business Subcommittee on Regulation and Business Opportunities, and every Member who cares about small-business job creation to move this important bill swiftly through the legislative process.

ELECTIONS IN ANGOLA

HON. SAM GEJDENSON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. GEJDENSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to applaud the announcement by the Government of Angola that elections are scheduled to be held on September 29 and 30 of this year. This important announcement means that for the first time since gaining independence and for the first time since this country was plunged into a horrible civil war 17 years ago, the people of Angola will experience democracy.

In February, the Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on International Economic Policy and Trade, which I chair, held a hearing on United States business opportunities in Angola. We heard from the State Department, from experts on Angola and from corporations such as Equator Bank and General Motors. Both companies are members of the United States-Angolan Chamber of Commerce.

During that hearing, we heard of a number of obstacles that American companies face when seeking to do business in Angola. It is not that there are few business opportunities in that African country, but rather that the United States Government has been slow to remove the barriers to trade with Angola.

Angola, for example, remains on the list of Marxist-Leninist countries prohibited from receiving U.S. aid even though its government has set a date for free and fair elections and is making the transition toward a market economy.

Jeffrey Davidow, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs, appeared at our February hearing and indicated that once a date for elections was set, the State Department would seek the necessary approval from the President to remove Angola from the Marxist Leninist list. We are still waiting for the administration to take action. There is no question that such a move would receive broad bipartisan support.

It is imperative that the United States do everything in its power to encourage free and fair elections in Angola. The Angolan people deserve a new democratic life, economic stability, and peace.

COMMENDING UNITED STATES
RECOGNITION OF CROATIA, SLO-VENIA, AND BOSNIA-HERCEGOVINA

HON. PETER HOAGLAND

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. HOAGLAND. Mr. Speaker, today I congratulate the administration for finally recognizing the independence of Croatia, Slovenia, and Bosnia-Herzegovina.

For months, we here in Congress have heard firsthand stories from Croatian-Americans and Serbian-Americans of the struggles Croats and Serbs have gone through in their attempts to adjust to a new order. Thousands of innocent people have died, on both sides. Fortunately, through the persistence of U.N. Special Envoy Cyrus Vance, the latest ceasefire has held for the most part and U.N. peacekeepers are being deployed.

I am troubled about why this administration waited so long before recognizing the inevitable. The dissolution of Communist Yugoslavia was inevitable after the breakup of the Soviet Union, and the Soviet Union's grip on Eastern Europe was broken. For over 40 years after the end of World War II, the diverse Balkan States in Yugoslavia were held together by a Communist dictatorship guided, in part, by Moscow. Most experts will agree that without this central control, the divergent ethnic groups in greater Yugoslavia would have broken up long ago, or most likely, would never have come together under one flag.

In 1776, a new democratic experiment appeared to the world for recognition. The first to answer our appeal was the Republic of Ragusa, the Croatian city-state of Dubrovnik. Tuesday, we finally repaid that act of support made over 200 years ago. If the United States is to remain the true example of freedom and democracy in the world, we should be eager to recognize and support in other areas of the world the struggle to achieve what we have. I commend the administration for finally recognizing Croatia, Slovenia, and Bosnia-Herzegovina.

EXTENDING THE MORATORIUM ON NEW FEDERAL REGULATIONS

HON. BARBARA F. VUCANOVICH

OF NEVADA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mrs. VUCANOVICH. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, I joined several of my colleagues in introducing a sense-of-Congress resolution to urge the President to extend his 90-day moratorium on new regulations for a period of 1 year.

Overregulation in America today has reached epidemic proportions. It bloats the Federal Government, saps our businesses, taxes our consumers, and impedes our ability to compete. It has been estimated that Government regulations levied on American business end up costing American consumers $400 to $500 billion annually or a staggering $4,000 to $5,000 per family, per year.

If the present moratorium is lifted as scheduled at the end of this month, we could open the floodgates of new regulations on an economy which is just beginning to recover from a recession.

The success of the moratorium is clear; since the moratorium was announced, the number of rules proposed by Federal regulations has been cut in half. According to Vice President QUAYLE, this cut in new rules and an aggressive effort to revise current regulations could save $10 to $20 billion in business costs presently being passed on to consumers. In addition, deregulatory actions taken by the EPA and the Department of Agriculture could save an additional $10 billion in 1992 alone.

All of this points to one thing: the moratorium must be extended. I am joining some of my colleagues in the House in sending a letter to President Bush applauding his pledge to curb the growth of Federal regulations and to bring rational cost/benefit analysis into the regulation writing process. In that letter, we encourage the President to extend the moratorium until the system of drafting, evaluating, approving, and promulgating regulations has been overhauled. To abandon the moratorium at this stage would be a disaster for the fight against regulatory excess, for the American economy, and for the American consumer.

Extending the moratorium will prevent Federal bureaucrats from piling more and more expensive mandates on each of us as individual citizens and small businesses. It will allow businesses to invest their resources in job-creating activities rather than satisfying bureaucrats in Washington, DC who want to tell them how to run every aspect of their business.

We must stop forcing businesses to close by regulating them to death and sucking the lifeblood out of our economy. I hope that the President will see fit to extend the moratorium so that we can do away with unnecessary regulations.

RECOGNITION OF ELISA EMERITZ

HON. GEORGE J. HOCHBRUECKNER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. HOCHBRUECKNER. Mr. Speaker, each year the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, and its ladies auxiliary, sponsor the Voice of Democracy Broadcast Scriptwriting Program. The program is now in its 45th year and requires high school student participants to write and record a 3-to-5 minute script on an announced patriotic theme. This year's theme was "Meeting America's Challenge," and over 147,000 students participated in the program nationwide.

Elisa Diane Emeritz, a senior at Patchogue-Medford High School of Medford, NY, has been named the 10th place national winner. The will become the recipient of the $1,500 Department of Illinois and its Ladies Auxiliary Scholarship Award. Elisa is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Dadid Emeritz. She plans a career in broadcast journalism. Elisa was sponsored by VFW Post 2937 and its Ladies Auxiliary of Medford, NY.

Mr. Speaker, I take great pleasure in congratulating Elisa Emeritz on her 10th place finish in the 1992 Voice of Democracy Broadcast Scriptwriting Program.

ANCIENT FOREST PROTECTION

HON. GEORGE MILLER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, today, I am pleased to join Agriculture Committee Chairman KIKI DE LA GARZA and our other colleagues in the House Committees of the Interior, Agriculture, and Merchant Marine and Fisheries to introduce legislation to protect old growth forests of the Pacific Northwest.

The committees have agreed to mark up this legislation during the first 2 weeks of May, beginning on May 6.

Last year, a panel of eminent scientists, working with hundreds of forest experts, delivered a devastating indictment of the state of the old growth forests of the Pacific Northwest. They told us that if we do not take drastic action soon, an entire unique ecosystem and the wildlife and fish species that depend on it will collapse. The time for action to meet this crisis is now.

The subcommittee and full committee chairman, including National Parks and Public Lands Subcommittee Chairman BRUCE VENTO, Forest Subcommittee Chairman HAROLD VOLKMER, Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee Chairman WALTER JONES and Fisheries and Wildlife Subcommittee Chairman GERRY STUDDS, are determined to work together to resolve this critical issue, and I look forward to working with them.

During the markups next month we intend to add provisions to the bill to help ease the transition for timber-dependent workers and communities in the Northwest and strengthen protection of watersheds as well.

The bill introduced this evening calls for the establishment of an old growth forest reserve as outlined in a report entitled "Alternatives for Management of Late-Successional Forests of the Pacific Northwest" last October, commonly referred to as the Portland Panel report. It would require the U.S. Forest Service and the Bureau of Land Management to prohibit timber harvest and take other management actions necessary to save old growth forest ecosystems.

The report by the scientific panel on late successional forest ecosystems, convened at the request of the Agriculture and Merchant Marine Committees, outlined a series of alternatives and options to achieve various levels of protection for old growth forest ecosystems and wildlife dependent on those ecosystems.

I support the least restrictive management alternative the scientists have reported is necessary to provide a high degree of confidence that the diverse old growth biodiversity which includes wildlife and fish such as salmon and trout are going to survive and will not result in another endangered species gridlock.

I plan to offer additional amendment to initiate a similar scientific panel review of the Sierra Nevada forests in California and will propose strong interim protections of the Sierra old growth ecosystems.

A SORRY ANNIVERSARY

HON. FORTNEY PETE STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, Wei Jingsheng is a Chinese political activist who is currently serving his 14th year in prison. Today, I ask my colleagues to take a moment to consider his case and reflect upon Wei Jingsheng's imprisonment and upon the human rights situation in China.

On March 29, 1978, Wei Jingsheng was arrested and charged with counterrevolutionary activities. His crime was the creation of a poster triumphing the importance of democratic reform. Wei titled his poster "The Fifth Modernization" adding democracy to "The Four Modernizations" that Chairman Deng Xiaoping created to promote economic development. Six months later, Wei began his 15-year sentence.

After Wei's arrest, the Chinese Government cracked down on those pushing for democratic reform. The famed Democracy Wall, an officially sponsored setting for free expression, was closed. The Chinese Government silenced underground presses and intellectuals.

This blatant disregard for the guaranteed human right of nonviolent expression of one's opinions continues today. The Government's handling of the prodemocracy Tiananmen Square demonstrators persists as an outrage. The Chinese Government stubbornly goes ahead with execution and imprisonment of those standing up for democratic reform.

This trend runs parallel with another disturbing pattern in the Chinese Government. Over the last decade, the PRC has sold nuclear weapons technology to almost every major nuclear threshold state, including Iraq, Iran, Pakistan, India, and Algeria.

This policy of political oppression and reckless nuclear arms proliferation can not endure. I call upon the Chinese Government to begin to correct their ways and release Wei Jingsheng. I also call upon the Chinese Government to halt the sale of nuclear weapons technology to nuclear threshold countries. If the Chinese Government does not begin to make progress in these areas, the administration must make it clear to the Chinese that our country will not tolerate such irresponsible behavior.

H.R. 3427, THE DEFENSE MANUFACTURING AND CRITICAL TECHNOLOGIES ACT OF 1991

HON. JOAN KELLY HORN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Ms. HORN. Mr. Speaker, our manufacturing sector continues to lose jobs. Worker productivity remains constant. Our trade imbalance soars. In the meantime, our international competitors continue their aggressive efforts—often assisted by their governments—to move forward in high technology industries. We must stop getting in the way of our businesses and industry and move forward with constructive measures to develop critical technologies.

We as a Nation have excelled in expanding the frontiers of science. But we have fallen behind in applying these scientific discoveries to consumer products and to increasing industrial efficiency and productivity. Because of this, our international competitiveness has suffered.

Last year, I, along with Senator BINGAMAN, introduced legislation to improve our Nation's competitiveness. The Defense Manufacturing and Critical Technologies Act of 1991, H.R. 3427, represented a first step toward closing the gap between us and our competitors in the manufacturing sector. It sought to strengthen manufacturing technology in defense-related industries by establishing a broad manufacturing extension program to aid small- and medium-sized businesses and augment our position in the 22 critical technologies recognized as essential to advanced technology in the 1990's and the 21st century. This legislation was incorporated into the conference report of the National Defense Authorization Act. In addition, funding was appropriated for most of the programs included in H.R. 3427. However, two programs were not funded, manufacturing extension centers and critical technology application centers.

The legislation I am introducing today, the Manufacturing Extension and Critical Technologies Act of 1992, represents the next step in closing the gap between us and our competitors in the manufacturing sector. This bill will strengthen manufacturing technology in defense-related industries. It will use a broad manufacturing extension program to aid small- and medium-sized firms in utilizing the technology available to increase their productivity and the competitiveness of their products. Our Department of Agriculture has used extension programs for years to develop an agriculture technology that is the envy of the world. We can do the same, in a smaller way, in manufacturing.

In the area of critical technologies, this legislation will also move our Nation forward. It will authorize the Secretary of Defense to establish regional critical technology application centers on a cost shared basis with industry and State and local agencies. Such a step is a necessary follow-up to see that American technologies are utilized here. These technologies are vital to the ability of the United States to compete in such high technological areas as computers, advanced materials, and aerospace.

The time to act on this is now. During the past decade or more we have lost the consumer electronics market to Japan. VCR's, walkmen, stereo components, and televisions represent inventions discovered in America, but manufactured elsewhere. Our basic manufacturing industries have likewise been allowed to decay. This legislation will provide industries with the help they need to develop American inventions into marketable products here, where our businesses can reap the profits of these inventions and our workers can find productive good paying jobs. We cannot afford to lose more products invented here, and the markets and profits that go with manufacturing them, to our international competitors. Our future prosperity and standard of international competitors. Our future prosperity and standard of living depend on producing our own. In addition, our national security and foreign policy independence rely on our ability to manufacture critical weapons components within our borders. We must ensure that we are able to supply our defense needs here.

We must continue to build on the work done at the National Institutes of Standards and Technology [NIST], the Federal Laboratory Consortium, as well as many State, local, and private industry groups, which in the absence of a clear direction from Washington, have forged ahead to do what they knew was necessary. We must support their efforts and expand them. This legislation is the next logical step to accomplish this goal.

With the legislation, our Nation can regain its world leadership in advanced technology and essential manufacturing. To do nothing is to write off our Nation's, and our children's, future.

ABANDONED BY OUR HEALTH CARE SYSTEM

HON. GERRY E. STUDDS

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. STUDDS. Mr. Speaker, I recently received an unusually thoughtful letter from a Plymouth, MA, family which underscores the inadequacy of our health care system, and illustrates the vulnerability of millions of Americans who are in need of basic health care.

This letter forcefully reminds us that, as we continue to debate, costs continue to rise, and more and more Americans are denied basic coverage. We no longer have the luxury of time. Our people are hurting. The time has come to enact national health insurance.

I commend this letter to my colleagues:

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE STUDDS, I was happy to see your interest in a health care bill. You have always been a fair advocate for New England fishermen. Now, it seems to me, the most important thing you can do for Massachusetts fishermen is to back an equitable health care plan.

I would like to tell you our story. When my husband became a full-time lobster fisherman 10 years ago, we joined a health care program that was available to lobstermen. We faithfully paid our monthly premiums. Then, the first two carriers under the management of our trust company went into receivership, leaving hospital bills and subscribers in litigation for years. We were annoyed when we read in our local newspaper that the former owner was investing in million dollar real estate deals. We had few medical bills at the time, so we continued to pay premiums to a new carrier.

Then in September 1990 my husband had emergency abdominal surgery and we were glad we had insurance. However, our third carrier also went bankrupt and left us with $10,000 of hospital bills in litigation. Yet, we were assured that our new carrier was reliable.

In January 1991 my husband had follow-up surgery, again costing more than $10,000. But before that bill could be paid, our supposedly reliable carrier went into receivership. And so, even though we had paid over $20,000 in premiums during the previous 10 years, to more than five carriers, our hospital bills go unpaid. Of course, we are angered beyond words. But more important, this is not an efficient way to fund health care. It does seem to make a few entrepreneurs and lawyers rich at the expense of working men and women.

President Bush stated in his inaugural address that he would help these entrepreneurs with even less regulation. I, of course, cannot see his point of view.

Now we are awaiting acceptance by yet another carrier. Only this time our premiums will be higher and we may not be covered for pre-existing conditions. This is not an efficient way to provide health care.

It is imperative to us that we have a reliable National Health Care Program. In November I will vote for the candidate who offers such a program. But I will certainly expect him to see it through.

Please do not allow this issue to become just another "political football."

Sincerely,

PUBLIC LIBRARIES

HON. ELIZABETH J. PATTERSON

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mrs. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize our Nation's libraries during National Library Week.

Public libraries have a long tradition in teaching people to read. As an advocate of education, I support the need to improve libraries which provide many services to people of all ages. The use of Federal funds by South Carolina libraries has greatly enhanced their ability to meet the information needs of all South Carolinians.

Last summer I had the pleasure of attending a rally for libraries in Greenville, SC, in my district. This facility has done outstanding work in serving the homeless by providing deposit collections of materials which concentrate on literacy and life skills.

Spartanburg County Library, also in my district, received a Library Services and Construction Act grant this year to distribute storytime kits on a rotating basis to day care centers not presently using the library. This outreach endeavor also provides training of day care staff in the use of these materials. It is through projects like these that libraries are preparing children to enter school ready to learn.

I would like to join many of my colleagues in supporting National Library Week. As this country seeks to implement the National Education Goals envisioned in America 2000, the role of libraries must not be overlooked.

ACTORS THEATRE OF LOUISVILLE: ON THE CUTTING EDGE

HON. ROMANO L. MAZZOLI

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, recently, Actors Theatre of Louisville celebrated the 16th anniversary of the Humana Festival of New American Plays.

The festival is a 6-week springtime repertory of new plays that offers, as the Washington Times says, "the most ambitious rotating showcase of new scripts in the country." In many instances, the plays move on to national acclaim. Producers, directors, theater artists, and critics from around the country annually travel to Louisville to take in the Humana Festival.

Under the guidance of producing director, Jon Jory, Actors Theatre continues to explore important cultural and social issues with innovative new works. This year's showcase was no exception as the festival included plays examining racial and ethnic identities, urban violence, and our attitudes toward the terminally ill.

The Humana Festival showcases both new writers as well as established playwrights. This year's festival included works by Tony Award winners, David Henry Hwang and Marsha Norman, Pulitzer Prize winner Lanford Wilson, and National Book Award winner Joyce Carol Oats.

Mr. Speaker, New York deserves its reputation as the center of American theater, but as a native Louisvillian, I am proud of the name my hometown has acquired—because of Actors Theatre and the Humana Festival—as a major force in drama and the theatrical arts.

I commend to the attention of my colleagues the reviews of the Festival which were recently published in the New York Times and the Washington Times.

ABOUT DEATH, BAD DREAMS AND D. BOONE DEBUNKED

(By Mel Gussow)

LOUISVILLE, KY., March 22—Debilitating illness and rituals of death were among the themes dramatized at the 16th annual Humana Festival of New American Plays at the Actors Theatre of Louisville this weekend. In fact, there was so much medical equipment onstage in the marathon of eight plays and three 10-minute one-acts that one could conjecture that the Humana Foundation had not only given financial support to the festival but had also supplied scenery, props and costumes.

In a program note, Jon Jory, the company's artistic director, characterizes our times—and presumably the plays in the festival—as "fraught with fear and omens of disaster." Moving out of a hospital environment and responding to current social and economic crises, other plays dealt with violence, both actual and metaphorical.

This year there was no feeling of discovery, as there was when Beth Henley's "Crimes of the Heart" and Romulus Linney's "2" had their world premieres in Louisville. But there were three plays of more than usual interest. All of them are elevated by a highly individualistic sense of humor and each needs more work from the playwright before taking a next production step. Those three are José Rivera's "Marisol," a black-as-night comedy about urban nightmares, the most challenging of the plays in the festival; David Henry Hwang's "Bondage," a social satire set in an S&M parlor, and Marsha Norman's exuberant time-machine yarn, "D. Boone."

"Marisol" suffers from an overload of myth and portent, but it is fired by a comic ferocity. This could evolve into Mr. Rivera's most venturesome work. While some Louisvillians might have been perplexed by the weird urban extremities depicted onstage, beleaguered New Yorkers may identify them as the norm.

Deserted by her guardian angel and left to die or survive by her own wits, the doll-like title character (Karina Arroyave) bolts herself into her apartment behind a 10-foot-high door with 14 locks, and then watches fearfully, as with a click each lock falls to the floor. Standing next to her on the subway in another scene is a creature that could be a twin of the Wild Man of Borneo, and on the street she is accosted by a man with a scorched face. These and other grotesqueries are played by V. Craig Heidenreich, a masterly match for the vulnerable heroine. The play is too sprawling and ambitious to fit into the Actors Theatre's small upstairs stage, but in a more fluid production and with a tighter script, angels would fly and devils would terrify.

Seeing a marathon of plays over a period of three days, theatergoers can be overcome by restlessness, or worse, but from its opening image, Mr. Hwang's "Bondage" riveted the audience to its seats. The scene is a brightly lighted Los Angeles house of dreams, in which a man, covered from head to toe with heavily zippered black leather, is hanging spread-eagled on chains. In the subsequent interplay, a similarly garbed dominatrix and this willingly masochistic client act out fantasies and demonstrate that, as one character says "All's fair in love and bondage."

In this uncharacteristic mode, the author of "M. Butterfly" proves to be a wry observer of contemporary mores and racial stereotypes. The actors (B.D. Wong and Kathryn Layng) play their roles to the hilt, even as they unmask, an exceedingly intricate maneuver because of the technical complexity of the costuming. As the play moves from Genet-land to something approaching a romantic comedy, it occasionally stalls. An hour is too long for this escapade, but there is no denying that the playwright is having fun with his bondage badinage.

The Hwang play is a part of a new Actors Theater emphasis on multiculturalism. Its companion one-act is Suzan-Lori Parks's "Devotees in the Garden of Love," a drawing room comedy set in a war zone. With its convoluted narrative, "Devotees" abandons the audience in a labyrinth. But there are sparks in it of the limber black patois that previously marked Ms. Parks's talent.

Ms. Norman's "D. Boone" was commissioned especially for Kentucky's bicentennial. Daniel Boone is, of course, at the top of the state's pantheon of heroes (along with college basketball stars). A tree stump in which the frontiersman is supposed to have carved his name stands in the Filson Club historical society as an artifact for the true Boone believer.

In her spoof, the playwright debunks the stump and the myth himself, and turns D. Boone into a guileful pragmatist, playing diplomacy to stall the Indians from attacking. The playwright engages in her own game of make-believe, freely mixing history with fanciful figments, as contemporary characters step through a teepee in a museum installation and find themselves Boone's companions. This "Back to the Future" framework allows the author to comment on historical revisionism and on almost anything else that enters her mind.

One might regard "D. Boone" as good ol' boy regionalism. I view it from the opposite direction, as a comedy that, with substantial revisions, might be transformed into a film starring Steve Martin and Billy Crystal, with Robin Williams in a cameo as Chief Blackfish, Boone's friendly foe. Cinematized, it could, of course be a boon at the box office.

While Ms. Norman lightened up and revealed her droll side, John Conklin, in his debut as playwright and director, revealed nothing at all. The signs for his "Carving of Mount Rushmore" were auspicious. Mr. Conklin is one of our most creative designers of theater and opera, and the monumental subject would seem to be a natural one for his imagistic talent. But in an act that Mr. Hwang might characterize as masochistic, he unwisely turned his back on his role as scenic designer.

A tiny home movie screen used for shaky projections and dozens of chairs (a tag sale from "Grand Hotel"?) substitute for scenery. In this spare setting, actors speak randomly from the record, with one tourist quoting adjectives like "colossal" to describe the edifice we do not see. Only hinted at in this brief exercise is the serious question raised by Rushmore, whether it was a defensible act of art or a desecration of the natural environment. Ms. Norman is far more telling in her commentary on that tree stump.

The festival's other keen disappointment was John Olive's "Evelyn and the Polka King." No amount of good will toward the playwright for his past plays could justify this work's production. The story line is as tiresome as the polka music insistently played by an onstage band. Perhaps the play would have been more interesting if it has been "Evelyn and the Poker King."

Some theatergoers were touched by Mayo Simon's "Old Lady's Guide to Survival," about a lonely octogenarian who is losing her eyesight and forms an alliance with an Alzheimer's patient. Lynn Cohen in the title role is the chief asset in a play that sacrifices wistfulness for sentimentalization. In Ross MacLean's "Hyaena," a ghoulish visitor hangs around a hospital praying for patients to die. Despite a promising premise—the title character is the opposite of the care-keepers we have seen in other plays—this is a work without subtext. Joyce Carol Oates's 10-minute "Procedure" is procedural rather than dramatic, a slice of death as two nurses prepare a body for the morgue.

In contrast, the other 10-minute plays are exemplars of the short form: Jane Anderson's "Lynette at 3 A.M." is an absurdist cartoon about a woman's sleepless night in which she encounters the ghost of a neighbor who has just died. Lanford Wilson's "Eukiah" is a Faulknerian story about barnburning, with a jolting Wilson twist. Mr. Wilson wastes no words, offering an object lesson in artistic economy to less disciplined peers at this year's festival. He also has a warning to Kentuckians awaiting the Derby. As one of characters in "Eukiah" says, "Never trust anything anyone says if it's about horses."

THE HUMANA DRAMA

(By Hap Erstein)

For much of its season, the Actors Theatre of Louisville is like other regional non-profit stage companies. It produces the usual off-Broadway hits and, yes, each holiday season presents its own version of "A Christmas Carol."

But during the month of March for the past 15 years, Actors Theatre has turned into "Playwrights Theatre," offering the most ambitious rotating showcase of new scripts in the country.

Again this year; those who want to know what's happening in theater in the United States—or at least what currently interests ATL Producing Director Jon Jory enough to develop and present—are attending the Humana Festival of New American Plays.

A strong field of works continues in repertory through this weekend. And several are likely to be seen in future seasons across the country.

The Humana Festival roster includes already established playwrights such as Tony Award winners David Henry Hwang ("M. Butterfly") and Marsha Norman ("The Secret Garden"), Pulitzer Prize winner Lanford Wilson ("Talley's Polly") and National Book Award winner Joyce Carol Oates ("them").

More typically, the Humana Festival gives emerging writers their first important national platform. Even more than for the celebrity writers, the standing-room-only audiences at the festival last weekend were buzzing about Puerto Rican surrealist Jose Rivera and his comic view of urban apocalypse, "Marisol."

True to form, the Humana roster also includes a few plays whose inclusion is hard to fathom.

In this category is certainly "The Carving of Mount Rushmore," written and directed by scenic designer John Conklin. It's a safe bet that this curious collection of sentence fragments and thought shards about the making of the controversial monument to democracy will not be produced again with any regularity, if at all.

But other entries probably will have extended the life, primarily because of the following the event has acquired over the years.

For "special visitors weekend," the audience is a virtual who's who of the theater industry—more than 400 key artistic directors, literary managers, agents, producers and critics. Each is hoping to discover the next "Gin Game," "Agnes of God" or "Execution of Justice"—all plays that originated in Louisville.

MARISOL'S ODYSSEY

Although the theme and tone of Mr. Rivera's "Marisol" is hardly upbeat, his is a most refreshing voice. His comic facility with language is bracing. He presents for our consideration a young woman from the Bronx, Marisol Perez, who resides in a lethal neighborhood of a hostile world where mere survival is a major accomplishment.

Marisol has learned to harden herself to the intrusions of the homeless, the substance abusers, the merely maniacal. Because of this, she thinks, she has remained relatively unharmed by the constant assault of her environment.

Actually she has been protected all this time by a guardian angel, a large woman in leather jacket and gloves who watches over Marisol from on high. This angel makes no claims that it's a wonderful life, but at least Marisol is beating the odds by staying alive.

However, Marisol is put on notice by the angel that she can no longer protect her. Because the world has grown so sick and degenerate, the angels have decided to rebel against an obviously indifferent God and wage war in the heavens. Without angelic oversight, Marisol's world goes from inhuman to severely weird.

By experiencing such night-marish depths—encounters with homicidal crazies, a pregnant man, a pyromaniac skinhead Nazi and one of his victims burnt to a charred mess—Marisol goes through a spiritual salvation.

This odyssey is conveyed through Mr. Rivera's stunning verbal agility and director Marcus Stern's ability to bring these horrific visions to life. Contributing to the impact is diminutive actress Karina Arroyave as the modern day Alice-through-a-grimy-looking-glass.

Mr. Rivera's odd vision can be seen to a lesser degree on the network television show "Eerie, Indiana," which he co-created. That job presumably allows him the freedom to write such stunning but commercially dubious works as "Marisol."

Although currently a West Coast playwright, Mr. Rivera lived for years in the Bronx, and "Marisol" breathes with gritty authenticity. Though its societal indictment is geographically broader, it is a quintessential New York play.

ROMANCING BOONE

Miss Norman, on the other hand, has written an homage to Kentucky in "D. Boone," a relatively light comedy about hero worship and unexpected love right under your nose.

It takes place in a Kentucky history museum, amid supposed artifacts of the revered pioneer in buckskins, Daniel Boone. Flo, a custodian, has fallen in love with this legendary figure and discovered a way to travel back in time to the 18th century to meet him.

Because of her romantic fixation, she is blind to the assets of new employee Hilly. Until, of course, the final curtain.

Miss Norman was previously best known for such stark dramas as her case history of suicide, "Night, Mother." But "D. Boone" hasn't a morose thought in it. Perhaps this is the result of the playwright's recent concentration on the musical theater:

Artistic directors will have to be more adventurous to present Mr. Hwang's love story "Bondage," although at its core the play is surprisingly innocent and heartfelt.

OK, so it takes place entirely in a sadomasochism parlor in Los Angeles. There, a man and a woman covered in leather verbally abuse each other in order to get the upper hand in this unconventional relationship.

In fact, "Bondage" has a serious purpose. It is an exploration of racial images. The characters role-play and assume various ethnic identities while the truth remains hidden behind the leather. This absorbing one-act work is in keeping with the themes of "M. Butterfly," which dealt with gender confusion and assumptions about dominance.

Inviting the audience to play along, the program does not list the cast members, so their ethnicity remains somewhat shrouded until the final moments of "Bondage." In this premiere production, the male character is played with an in-over-his-head vocal quaver by the impressive "M. Butterfly" Tony winner, B.D. Wong.

The expected kinkiness of "Bondage" probably will work against it in obtaining outside bookings. Also a detriment to the play's commercial future is its one-act length.

THREE SHORT PLAYS

The problem is magnified in a bill of three brief plays, all entries in Actors Theatre's 10-minute play contest. This Kentucky theater has long used this competition as a way to discover new writers without having to wade through full-length scripts.

This year, however, it attracted some major writers who demonstrated the dramatic viability of this short format. Mr. Wilson, who shared first place in the contest with Jane Anderson, wrote a minithriller titled "Eukiah" about a stableman trying to coax a young boy out of hiding to find out what he knows. Although his other work shows few signs of it, Mr. Wilson knows a great deal about the art of building suspense.

Miss Anderson spins a short comic tale called "Lynette at 3 AM," another episode with a continuing character of hers. Lynette is an insecure insomniac who lies awake in bed needing to have her love affirmed by Bobby, the big lug lying next to her who simply wants to get some sleep.

After hearing gunshots, she soon is visited by a murder victim who imparts some wisdom. In addition to some funny dialogue, the playlet is considerably helped by the direction of Reid Davis, who positions Lynette's bed vertically, giving the audience a ceiling's-eye view.

Death gets a more serious look in Miss Oates' 10-minute exercise in realism, "Procedure." The title says it all, as a veteran nurse walks a neophyte through the clinical steps for preparing a body for the hospital morgue. The scene is chilling.

The strides that Miss Oates has made as a dramatist since her first Humana appearance two years ago are evident here. However, "Procedure" could be improved by the removal of a needlessly ironic coda.

FACING DEATH

Just as Broadway is about to have a flood of activity this season, just as regional theater activity has stabilized, just as it appears for once that theater is not dying, the Humana Festival seems preoccupied with death.

Consider Ross McLean's "Hyaena," the story of a man who befriends and holds vigil over dying hospital patients as a way to confront death at the moment they expire.

Mr. McLean certainly understands the discomfort many of us feel around the dying. He has created an extraordinary character in this metaphorically carnivorous stranger. But like "Procedure," it must play itself out to its inevitable conclusion, draining the mystery of the hyena's motives as it goes.

Concerned with the related topic of old age is Mayo Simon, whose "Old Lady's Guide to Survival" is a variation on "The Odd Couple." Set in sunny San Diego, it pits a fiercely independent woman who is losing her eyesight against a free-spirited busybody whose eccentricities drift into the horror of Alzheimer's disease.

The play starts out comically, with Mr. Simon showing he knows how to write characters that intrigue and hook an audience into caring. After intermission, however, the work sprawls and flies off in several directions—all predictable.

If this were a commercial out-of-town try-out, you would write it off as classic second-act troubles. Perhaps Mr. Simon can fix it; there could be interest in this sitcom with a few serious things on its mind.

POLKA MUSICALS?

You probably weren't wondering, but playwright John Olive ("The Voice of the Prairie") and composers Carl Finch and Bob Lucas have explored whether a polka musical could be a viable entity. Rash generalities should not be made about the potential in the genre, but they have not succeeded with "Evelyn and the Polka King."

The musical is about a pair of lost souls trying to get in touch with their dreams. Hank Czerniak was once proclaimed "the Polka King," and he may be again if he can stay off the booze and make a comeback from oblivion.

The last thing he needs is Evelyn, the daughter he never knew he had, who arrives looking for clues to the biological mother from whom she has been estranged.

The story has potential, the onstage backup band called the Vibra-Tones has brass and oom-paah to spare and Tom Ligon as Hank is quite winning. The material itself—the play with songs—is too clumsy and uninviting. A good, if goofy, idea squandered.

RACIAL ASSUMPTIONS

The idea behind Suzan-Lori Parks's "Devoetes in the Garden of Love" is not at all clear. Miss Parks, like her characters, is black. But as with Mr. Hwang's "Bondage," which her one-act play was designed to accompany, she challenges any and all racial assumptions you may bring to the theater.

Her play involves a mother and daughter who spy a battle in the valley below, apparently being fought for the daughter's hand in marriage. As they wait, they discuss the niceties of etiquette and the value of old fashioned romantic love. On occasion, television monitors descend to give the audience and characters news from the front—represented by a reporter's narration over scenes from the Persian Gulf war.

If there is any more to the play, it is not apparent.

HOPEFUL SIGNS

On balance, though, the Humana Festival shows plenty of vigor.

It is a harbinger of theatrical health ahead, perhaps, even if the plays are concerned with death, old age, despoiling nature to make monuments to presidents and the general breakdown of society.

For when a play like "Marisol" is telling us that our world has sunk to its lowest ebb, there is something oddly cheering about hearing the message from such a startlingly talented new messenger.

INTRODUCTION OF THE FEDERAL FACILITIES TOXICS RELEASE ACT

HON. HOWARD WOLPE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Speaker, today, I am joined by over 75 colleagues in introducing the Federal Facilities Toxics Release Act, legislation that would bring Federal facilities under the Emergency Planning and Community Right-to-Know Act [EPCRA]. This bill would require public disclosure of data on chemical emissions and source reduction efforts at government plants. Also, the legislation calls for government participation in local planning for emergency responses to chemical releases.

Federal facilities are known to be the Nation's largest polluters, releasing billions of pounds of toxic chemicals into the environment. The Department of Defense alone is responsible for 14,041 toxic waste sites at 1,579 domestic facilities. And just one Department of Energy facility, the Hanford Nuclear Reservation, has released more than 200 billion gallons of waste into the environment.

Just as staggering as the military's toxic wastes are the inconsistencies and gaps in government data pertaining to them. Reliable information systems are essential for tracking toxics from cradle to grave and implementing pollution prevention. The key to this reliability is having Federal facilities and industry report in a consistent and identical manner.

In 1986, Congress passed title III of the Superfund Amendments and Reauthorization Act [SARA] which recognized the public's right to know about the risks posed by a number of private sector facilities which produce certain toxic chemicals. This valuable information is compiled by EPA in a multimedia database known as the Toxics Release Inventory or TRI.

In 1990, the Pollution Prevention Act [PPA] was passed requiring these same private sector industries to report on their source reduction efforts. However, similar facilities owned by the Federal Government are exempt from these laws, creating a double standard that is unacceptable.

EPCRA and PPA are unique among environmental laws. Both are nonregulatory statutes that rely on reporting and public disclosure of information to achieve environmental protection.

While the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency has formally requested the head of each Federal agency to voluntarily comply with the Emergency Planning and Community Right-to-Know Act, only a few government-owned and -operated facilities are currently reporting under the Toxics Release Inventory [TRI].

It is time that every Federal installation report its toxic chemical releases into the air, water and land under the TRI. Without this information, neither the public nor the government itself will ever know the full extent of environmental problems or have the tools necessary to make progress in reducing chemical waste.

I urge my colleagues to cosponsor this important environmental and public right-to-know bill.

NEW JERSEY'S CREDIT UNIONS REMAIN STRONG NAFCU'S 25TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. MATTHEW J. RINALDO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. RINALDO. Mr. Speaker, despite the current recession, New Jersey's credit unions remain strong. Our State is home to 433 credit unions, which have a total membership of over 1 million people. Over $3.4 billion in our citizen's savings is held in these financial cooperatives.

Credit unions provide low-cost financial services to their members. These are not huge, impersonal financial institutions; these are neighbors and coworkers helping each other. Approximately 315 of our credit unions have assets of under $5 million.

Over 92 percent of New Jersey's credit unions are federally chartered, and I am proud to recognize the 25th anniversary of the National Association of Federal Credit Unions. Since its founding in 1967, NAFCU has served as a highly effective advocate for credit unions in the legislative and regulatory process.

NAFCU was instrumental in the establishment of the National Credit Union Administration as an independent regulator, and the creation of the National Credit Union share insurance fund. The NCUSIF serves to protect member's deposits up to $100,000, and has an unparalleled record of safety and strength. Without NAFCU's efforts, I seriously doubt that credit union members would have share draft accounts, or a number of other services.

A few years ago, I was privileged to work closely with NAFCU's president, Ken Robinson, and its vice president for governmental affairs, Bill Donovan, to secure an exemption for Federal credit unions from oversight by the Federal Trade Commission. Because the National Credit Union administration had proved to be such an effective regulator, FTC jurisdiction was no longer necessary. My amendment succeeded in large part because of NAFCU's diligence and persistence in pursuing this legislative goal.

I am pleased to honor NAFCU at the beginning of its second quarter century of service to Federal credit unions, and I look forward to many further accomplishments in the future.

HAMILTON STANDARD—A PART- NERSHIP WITH CONNECTICUT SCHOOLS

HON. NANCY L. JOHNSON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mrs. JOHNSON of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, it is common knowledge that industry and schools need to come together to help educate our young people and to enable America to have the most highly trained and educated work force. United Technologies' Hamilton Standard Division of Windsor Locks, CT, has answered the need for this partnership by donating more than half a million dollars of surplus tooling, gauges, and equipment to local vocational and technical high schools and colleges.

For years, Hamilton Standard has given back to the community; the community that supplies its workers and purchases its products. Not only does Hamilton Standard realize the need for the business community to form a partnership with schools for educational advancement, but its employees also recognize the economic problems that have severely cut into school budgets. Hamilton Standard found that it had a surplus of goods needed by schools and made a donation that assisted in alleviating some of the economic burden and updated the equipment in the schools.

I commend Hamilton Standard for its generosity and awareness of the needs of the community. The company stands as an excellent example of the partnership that is necessary to improve the education of American students and prepare the way for an educated and technically advanced work force.

STRATEGIC MANUFACTURING ALLIANCE ACT OF 1992

HON. PAUL B. HENRY

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, earlier this year I introduced legislation to change the vision and charter of our Commerce Department by proposing that we restructure it as the Department of Manufacturing and Commerce. As I stated then, we can only maintain our preeminence as an industrialized nation if the Federal Government and the private sector come together as never before to keep our manufacturing base competitive in the international marketplace. Manufacturing is the force that creates jobs, drives economic growth and innovation, and determines our Nation's standard of living. That is why we need a coherent strategy and a Government office working for U.S. manufacturers. Today, therefore, I am introducing the Strategic Manufacturing Alliance Act, which I believe can help shape such a strategy. In short, my bill would establish a grant program through our Technology Administration to foster new competitive alliances or consortia between our academic community and struggling U.S. manufacturers.

While a number of positive policy changes have occurred over the last few years to create programs like the Advanced Technology Program [ATP] and the Regional Manufacturing Centers Program among others, a recent General Accounting Office [GAO] report pointed out that Federal efforts to enhance the competitiveness of manufacturers have "not been realistically aligned with the basic needs of most manufacturers." It concluded that the majority of U.S. manufacturers need to be able to apply off-the-shelf current technologies more efficiently so that they can raise productivity, improve product quality, and respond to changing market conditions. It also indicated that manufacturers need help training their work force so that new technologies are applied properly. This is what my proposal is designed to do.

The Strategic Manufacturing Alliance Act concept might best be described as an industry-specific "American Keiretsu"—not to allow antitrust activities, but rather to allow companies and nonprofit research institutes or universities to come together and address basic research, worker training, and technology application needs on an ongoing basis.

Unlike current technology outreach that tries to transfer new breakthroughs to industry in an extension or vendor-type fashion, my proposal would require industry to identify its own needs and set its own research, application, and worker training agendas. I believe this structure will attract more firms by giving them a vested interest in the program. In fact, it would force grant applicants to demonstrate that they have ascertained private sector participatory commitments for their proposed consortium. This is what I think has been lacking in our current extension programs. It's awfully difficult to walk into a manufacturing firm, say one that only has 100 employees, and tell them that they need to incorporate this technology or that technology into their manufacturing process so that they can become more competitive. They may like your idea, but a more pressing problem might be training workers or making their current equipment technology run more efficiently. My point is that manufacturers know what their most pressing needs are. So why not foster a support structure that will allow them to have those needs addressed?

To my knowledge, there is no Federal program that looks at the shorter term needs of most manufacturers and ties R&D, technology transfer, and worker training into one comprehensive program—and is industry-driven. On a larger scale there is the Sematech and the U.S. Advanced Battery Consortium, but nothing is targeted at smaller manufacturers and suppliers. The Department of Commerce ATP program funds individual cutting edge technology development proposals. The Manufacturing Centers Program is aimed at transferring advanced technologies from our NIST labs.

Because the Commerce Department's Technology Administration is currently in the process of evaluating how its technology programs can be broadened to more effectively meet the needs of the average manufacturer, it makes perfect sense to establish, at least for demonstration purposes, a revolutionary manufacturing support program like the Strategic Manufacturing Alliance Act. As this Congress continues to develop its competitiveness strategy for the 1990's, I believe we must embrace this type of concept or eventually, America's small manufacturing backbone may be broken by overseas competition.

IN HONOR OF LOUISE ENDEL

HON. ROSA L. DeLAURO

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Ms. DELAURO. Mr. Speaker, for four decades Louise Endel has been a motivating force behind virtually every aspect of New Haven's cultural and community life. Today, Habitat for Humanity of New Haven will honor her with its first annual Master Builder Award. This award gives Louise the recognition she so well deserves for her years of leadership and I would like to add my voice to those that join together today to pay tribute to an outstanding leader, a tireless volunteer, and a longstanding, very dear friend.

Louise is truly a master builder—she has been instrumental in building political coalitions, in organizing cultural programs, and especially in bringing together communities of people. Whether organizing a political campaign, a performance, or an activity for inner-city youngsters, Louise has a unique talent for uniting those around her in working toward a common goal. She makes a difference in countless lives, and inspires the rest of us to renew our commitment to public service.

Louise has long been a motivating force behind cultural institutions ranging from the nationally recognized Long Wharf Theater to innovative arts programs like artspace and creative arts workshop. Indeed, there are few cultural events in New Haven that Louise has not helped bring about—from first night to artspace performances, Louise is there to make it all happen.

Louise's commitment to New Haven's cultural life is matched only by her devotion to serving its neediest population. For years, working through Habitat for Humanity of New Haven, she has helped working families build and own their own homes. Underserved youngsters in our community have also benefited from Louise's active participation in organizations such as the Urban League and the Nine Squares Neighborhood Youth Leagues.

Louise Endel possesses a rare combination of skill and compassion, courage, and warmth. What's more, she generously shares her gifts with the entire New Haven community. Those of us who know Louise well are especially pleased to see her publicly recognized today for those qualities and abilities we have always admired. As her colleagues gather today in New Haven to pay tribute to her achievements, I join them in expressing my appreciation, my admiration, and my loving friendship for Louise Endel.

TRIBUTE TO THE VILLAGE OF SHOREWOOD HILLS ON ITS 65TH ANNIVERSARY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. KLUG. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to pay tribute to the Village of Shorewood Hills, a community in my district, which this summer will celebrate its 65th anniversary.

The first census of Shorewood Hills, then known as the territory, was taken just 65 years ago this month on April 12, 1927. The next day a notice of intended incorporation was posted on trees and poles throughout the area, which was then a part of the town of Madison.

On June 28, 1927, residents voted 76 to 8 for incorporation, and the village was officially created, becoming home to 60 families. According to Shorewood Hills history, the first village caucus was held on July 14 in the school house and Harry Geisler was elected the first village president.

Today, the village of Shorewood Hills is a vital part of the greater Madison community. Many citizens who have served in village government have worked hard to maintain a high quality of life. Village residents take great pride in their community as evidenced by strong village-wide participation in local governance and community activities.

The community is currently undergoing a major redevelopment project in its business district. The Veterans' Administration Hospital and much of the University Hospital of the University of Wisconsin are located within the boundaries of Shorewood Hills. And, since its incorporation in 1927, the community has grown more than 10 times. This year, 635 families call the Village of Shorewood Hills home.

It is an honor to be able to wish the residents of the Village of Shorewood Hills a very happy 65th anniversary.

OPPOSITION TO THE INCUMBENT PROTECTION ACT

HON. JOHN J. RHODES III

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in opposition to House Concurrent Resolution 423. It has been euphemistically called campaign reform. In reality, however, it is more appropriately titled the "Incumbent Protection Act of 1992."

The American public wants meaningful campaign reform. Reform that will restore fairness to the electoral process, short of public financing of congressional campaigns. We need to make process more competitive, not less. We need to make incumbents more responsive to their constituents, not less. Nothing would make an incumbent more efficient and effective than the likelihood of a competitive challenge each election cycle.

I have been pushing for meaningful and responsible campaign reform since 1989 when I joined with 148 other Members of Congress in asking the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the Republican leader to form a bipartisan task force to develop and bring a bipartisan campaign finance reform bill to the House floor. Unfortunately, the 101st Congress ended without final action on meaningful campaign reform legislation. Although a similar task force was organized this Congress, it failed to produce a bipartisan piece of legislation.

As a result, the Democrat leadership took their bill (H.R. 3750) to the floor of the House of Representatives on November 25, 1991. After considerable debate, and the 155 to 270 defeat of a Republican campaign finance reform alternative (H.R. 3770) which I cosponsored, the Democrats so-called Gejdenson public financing bill (H.R. 3750) passed by essentially a party-line vote of 273 to 156. The House-passed bill must now be reconciled with the campaign finance reform bill (S. 3) passed by the Senate on May 23, 1991, by a vote of 56 to 42.

I will vote against Democrat leadership's public financing bill for several reasons. First, I do not support public financing of congressional campaigns. The Democrat bill amounts to a blank check taxpayer subsidy for politicians. Unfortunately, this check won't bounce and taxpayers will be stuck with the tab.

The Democrat bill fails to specify from where this billion-dollar incumbent bailout will come from. But, the taxpayers know. The taxpayers know that their hard earned money will be going to finance entrenched politicians keep their jobs. The public financing provisions alone would cost $270 million or more per year.

Additionally, the Incumbent Protection Act also sets an arbitrary spending limit of $600,000 on challengers, but conveniently would not include in that limit the value of the advantages and tools of incumbents, such as franked mail, staff allowances, and free media coverage.

The bill does not even seriously address two other major problems—Political Action Committee [PAC] contributions and the use of soft money.

The fact is, the Republican substitute more severely limits the power of PAC's by reducing from the present $5,000 to $1,000, the amount any individual PAC may contribute to a candidate per election. Our bill increases the involvement and power of smaller, local contributors; requires that a majority of contributions come from within a congressional district; and totally bans the use of soft money.

Our bill also would be effective for the 1992 elections. The Democrat bill would not become effective until 1993.

Any objective reading of the legislation will reveal what this bill really is—incumbent protection, pure and simple. I urge my fellow Members to reject the Incumbent Protection Act.

A.H. BELO CORP. CELEBRATES ITS SESQUICENTENNIAL—150 YEARS

HON. MARTIN FROST

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. Frost. Mr. Speaker, A.H. Belo Corp. has been around for a long time. Now headquartered in Dallas, it is the oldest continuously operated business in the State of Texas, with media representatives throughout the world being familiar with its name.

Texas history and the history of A.H. Belo Corp. are joined hand-in-hand. Founded as the one-page Galveston Daily News on April 11, 1842, during the time that Texas was an independent nation, the firm has now expanded to the point of being a giant in the media industry.

A.H. Belo Corp. today publishes the Dallas Morning News, the Texas Almanac, seven community newspapers in the Dallas-Fort Worth area, and owns network-affiliated television stations in five U.S. markets, including WFAA-TV in Dallas-Fort Worth and KHOU-TV in Houston.

The newspapers and television stations owned by A.H. Belo Corp. have been known for their excellence and high standards. Through eight wars and five generations, these same qualities have directed Belo's course, and I have every confidence that the same will be true of its future.

A.H. Belo Corp.'s 150th anniversary underscores the vision, creative spirit, and determination that have built an institution dedicated to journalistic excellence and community service.

On this anniversary date, I am proud to call your attention to this great firm and its outstanding history. I am pleased to represent many of the employees and owners of the corporation, and I am pleased to give them this well-deserved recognition.

TO MODIFY THE U.S. ECONOMIC EMBARGO AGAINST VIETNAM

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, the March 31 New York Times carried an article reporting that the administration is under pressure from American business and some of our allies overseas to modify the U.S. economic embargo against Vietnam. According to the article, those calling for a change in policy include the President's Export Council, a private sector organization, Members of Congress, and the executive branch agency responsible for trade policy.

I certainly understand the concerns of the business community that the United States could be left behind as businessmen from other countries move into Vietnam. Foreign oil companies could also quickly buy up the best offshore tracts there.

It behooves us to remember, however, that our Government made a solemn promise to the American people and to the veterans of the Vietnam war, that normalization of relations with that country would be linked to resolution of humanitarian concerns such as the POW/MIA issue. This is a promise that must be kept.

The concerns of the business community are real. It is no secret that the Japanese, our strongest economic competitors in Asia, have already sent a business team to Vietnam to look at investment opportunities, and that the Japanese Ministry of International Trade and Industry [MITI] will soon resume trade insurance. Further, several of our other allies are also starting to look at opportunities for their businesses. The French in particular are reportedly growing impatient at Vietnam's continuing exclusion from International Monetary Fund and World Bank financing.

To demonstrate our willingness to move on normalization of relations with Vietnam, the administration in April of last year presented the Vietnamese with a well thought out and reasonable plan that is often referred to as the roadmap. The signing of the Cambodian peace accords made it possible to start implementing the roadmap, but how we progress through its four phases is tied to resolution of POW/MIA and other concerns.

Assistant Secretary of State Solomon's March trip to Indochina produced significant responses from the Vietnamese. These commitments might meet the requirements of phase I of the roadmap and even allow moving into phase II, during which U.S. businessmen would be permitted to explore business opportunities.

The Vietnamese have agreed to a five-point program to accelerate their cooperation with us on POW/MIA investigations. Specifically, they have agreed to: First, give the U.S. greater access to their central records, archives, and museums as well as individuals who may have information about POWs and MIAs; second, allow rapid response to live-sighting reports; third, begin a 2-year plan for accelerated joint investigations in Vietnam; fourth, continue work on trilateral efforts with the Laotians and the Cambodians; and fifth, conduct technical exchanges between United States and Vietnamese experts. Beyond the progress on the POW/MIA issue, it has been reported that Vietnam has released most of the remaining couple hundred Vietnamese political prisoners from the war who were still being held in re-education camps.

The administration deserves congratulations for the progress that has been made on relations with Vietnam. Before we move from phase I to phase II of the roadmap, however, I hope the administration will carefully assess how the Vietnamese implement their commitments. The five-point program agreed to by the Vietnamese should form the foundation for future progress on the POW/MIA issue. All five elements should be tested and validated before we move to the next phase.

Mr. Speaker, like many Americans, I look forward to the day when the United States can normalize relations with Vietnam and its people. While I have concerns about the political and human rights situation in that country, I do not harbor, as I am sure most Americans do not, any lingering animosity from the Vietnam war. There is much we could gain from friendly relations with the 66 million people of Vietnam, including trade and other commercial opportunities. I regret the hardships that our embargo and opposition to loans are causing the Vietnamese people.

But we have an irrevocable commitment to the American people to seek the fullest possible accounting of our POW's and MIA's from the Indochina War. The five-point program on POW/MIA's, agreed to by the Vietnamese, is an important development in this connection. Nevertheless, we must be careful, especially in the early stages of implementing the roadmap on United States-Vietnam relations, in order to ensure there is a sound basis for further progress.

ESTELLE HOSKINS LISTON: A GRACIOUS LADY MARKING 100 YEARS

HON. EDOLPHUS TOWNS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. TOWNS. Mr. Speaker, as a native North Carolinian, I am pleased to offer these remarks which celebrate the life and accomplishments of an exceptional individual who has devoted her entire life to others.

Estelle English Hoskins, the youngest child of Sally and Daniel Hoskins, was born on April 26, 1892, in Camden, SC. At the age of 4, she moved with her family to Charlotte, NC, where she would later be educated in some of our State's leading black institutions including Myers Street School and Scotia Seminary—now Barber-Scotia College. She would later establish a long and distinguished career as a teacher in both public and church-related schools.

On June 28, 1916, she was married in Charlotte to Hardy Liston of Fairfield County, SC. The 40 years of their marriage were spent as a union of two educators devoted to the pursuit of excellence in higher education for African-Americans as they served together at Slater State Normal School—later Winston-Salem State Teachers College, Knoxville College in Knoxville, TN, and Johnson C. Smith University in Charlotte. To their marriage was born six children and included the nurturing of a niece and nephew and countless colleges who were all the beneficiaries of the moral, emotional, and economic support of these two very special people. This far-flung family now includes daughters and sons-in-law, 14 grandchildren, 20 great grandchildren, 3 great-great grandchildren, and a host of other relatives and friends.

Upon answering the call to return to Charlotte in 1943 as her husband assumed the role of vice president and then president of the Johnson C. Smith University, Estelle Hoskins Liston would continue a life of service to the campus and local community, enveloping the faculty and staff and their families with her elegance and grace—always with an attentive eye for an opportunity to teach and nurture and challenge those she touched to strive for excellence. An active participant on the boards of the Bethlehem Center, the Girl Scouts, Parent Teacher Associations, and the Young Women's Christian Association, her participation in the Presbyterian church has extended through local, Presbyterial, Synod, and national levels. An individual of boundless faith and religious conviction, her association with Seventh Street Presbyterian Church, now First United Presbyterian, dates from 1896 to this day.

A variety of alumni associations, sororities, literary, and social organizations have also enriched her life and she theirs. She has continued to live in Charlotte since being widowed in 1956 and to the extent that progressive blindness and advancing age have allowed, she has continued a life filled with interest in the issues of the day and concern for people everywhere. I am pleased to join hundreds in the State of North Carolina, and others around the Nation in celebrating the centennial birthday of Estelle English Hoskins Liston.

THE 200TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE
MONTAUK POINT LIGHTHOUSE

HON. GEORGE J. HOCHBRUECKNER
OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. HOCHBRUECKNER. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to honor the Montauk Point Lighthouse as it prepares to celebrate its 200th anniversary on April 12, 1992.

Two hundred years ago, by an act of the Second Congress, the President of the United States, George Washington, was authorized to construct a lighthouse on the tip of Long Island at Montauk Point, in New York. The lighthouse was the second public works project to be authorized by the U.S. Government and is the oldest lighthouse in continuous operation in the Nation. The lighthouse continues to serve as a marker for vessels headed for New York Harbor, Long Island Sound, and other ports along the eastern seaboard. Due to its historic value, the lighthouse is included in the Nation Register of Historic Places.

I believe the Montauk Historical Society is owed a special commendation at this time. This community service organization has been the driving force in ensuring the lighthouse's continuing legacy. Without their commitment to the lighthouse's preservation, I would not be before you today.

Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues to join me today in honoring the Montauk Point Lighthouse, a proud symbol of American history.

TRIBUTE TO GARY HANKINS,
CHAIRMAN METROPOLITAN POLICE DEPARTMENT LABOR COMMITTEE

HON. ELEANOR HOLMES NORTON

OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Ms. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to honor Mr. Gary Hankins whose contributions to the Washington, DC Metropolitan Police Department have been outstanding.

Gary Hankins joined our police department in 1970 and worked his way to becoming the first spokesperson of the police department's public information office with the mandate of improving relations among the department, the community and the media. In this position, Mr. Hankins proved himself an invaluable asset.

After 11 years as the department's spokesperson, Gary Hankins formed the Metropolitan Police Department Labor Committee of the Fraternal Order of Police and became its first chair. From 1981 to 1991 Mr. Hankins fought diligently and successfully to improve working conditions and benefits for the members of this bargaining unit. He also became a national spokesman for law enforcement.

Gary Hankins retired on February 22, 1992 from the Metropolitan Police Department and from his post as chair of the Labor Committee. He will continue to devote much of his time to the department in a civilian capacity.

Appreciation is due to Gary Hankins for his untiring efforts on behalf of his fellow officers and the residents of the District of Columbia.

IN PRAISE OF STEVEN REED AND JONATHAN D. CAHN

HON. JOHN LEWIS

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. LEWIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, the canons of ethics for the Nation's legal profession encourage lawyers to provide counsel and representation for those in our society who would otherwise have a difficult time in paying for legal advice.

Steven Reed and Jonathan D. Cahn, of the Steptoe & Johnson law firm in Washington, DC, provided a shining example of what lawyers can and should do in performing pro bono services for the public good during congressional consideration of the Older Americans Act reauthorization.

Their counsel on highly technical and esoteric issues relating to the enforceability of rights under the Older Americans Act and the Civil Rights Act was a service above and beyond the call of duty. It certainly deserves praise and recognition, not only for the high quality work but also for the spirit in which it was performed.

The entire Congress benefited from this scholarly legal research. The House of Representatives and the Senate were able to produce a better bill because of the extraordinarily effective service that these two attorneys provided in analyzing complex issues relating to the intrastate funding formula and the enforceability of rights to target services to low-income minorities.

Mr. Reed and Mr. Cahn conducted their analyses in a selfless manner, and without much fanfare. However, these two superb attorneys deserve our praise for their exceptional service.

The entire Cahn family has been tireless in their long, devoted efforts to make legal services more readily available to the poor, minorities, and others who often found themselves friendless in the court. Mr. Edgar S. Cahn and the late Jean Camper Cahn were the leading forces in creating the legal services program. They worked tirelessly to make our legal system more responsive to the poor and disadvantaged.

The Cahns were also brilliant advocates in the courts, executive agencies and elsewhere. Jean Camper Cahn was one of the lead attorneys in the landmark Meek versus Martinez case. This decision recognized for the first time that plaintiffs could successfully assert rights under the Older Americans Act to target services to low-income minorities that could be enforced under the Civil Rights Act.

I salute Steven Reed, Jonathan D. Cahn, and the entire Cahn family for the valuable pro bono services that they have provided to our society.

TRIBUTE TO CODY WARD

HON. GREG LAUGHLIN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. LAUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, heroes come in every shape and size. Today, I would like to recognize a hero from my hometown of West Columbia, TX.

On February 7, 1992, 17-year-old Cody Ward and his friend Jason Bell were traveling in separate vehicles to Columbia Lakes when Jason lost control of his truck and flipped over, landing upside down in a deep ravine filled with water.

Cody immediately plunged into the water, worked open the bent door, and pulled Jason to safety. He then transported him to the hospital where Jason was treated successfully. Due to Cody's quick thinking and unselfish actions, his friend is alive and well today.

Cody has brought honor to himself, his family, to the great State of Texas, and indeed to his Nation through his actions. I am proud of this young man. His selfless act of compassion should serve to remind each of us of the strength and courage our Nation was founded on.

LT. GEN. CHARLES D. FRANKLIN

HON. IKE SKELTON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, all of us in the House of Representatives were saddened to learn of the recent death of Lt. Gen. Charles D. Franklin, a former Chief of Legislative Liaison for the Secretary of the Army. All of us in Congress who worked with Chuck Franklin came to admire his professionalism and his devotion to duty. I felt a special kinship with him. He was a native of my congressional district, and a classmate of mine at the University of Missouri.

Gen. Chuck Franklin was a valiant soldier and patriot. His decorations include the Silver Star, the Distinguished Service Medal, the Legion of Merit with oak leaf cluster, the Distinguished Flying Cross, and the Army Commendation Medal with oak leaf cluster. He served his country with valor in combat in Vietnam, and then put his experience to use in building the Army that was so magnificent in Operation Desert Storm.

However, Mr. Speaker, it is not just for his career in the military that we remember Chuck Franklin. As former Secretary of the Army, John O. Marsh, Jr., put it in his moving eulogy, Chuck was "a soldier whose roots were in the farmlands of Missouri." He was, Secretary Marsh said, "a man of spirit and commitment. He was committed to this faith and the things in which he believed. He was committed to his Country * * *. Finally, he was deeply committed to his family."

It is to his family, Mr. Speaker, that all of us in the House extend our most heartfelt condolences. We know that more than anything else, Chuck Franklin was a loving son, husband, father, and grandfather. We share the grief of his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Jewell Franklin of Linn Creek, MO, his wife, Pat, his children, Chuck, Debby, and Susan, and his grandchildren, and we thank all of them on behalf of the Nation for sharing this great man with us.

TRIBUTE TO PATRICIA CUSHING AND CHARLES PECK—WINNERS OF THE CABLE IN THE CLASSROOM EDUCATOR AWARD

HON. DICK SWETT

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. SWETT. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to two truly remarkable schoolteachers from my home State of New Hampshire. Patricia Cushing, enrichment coordinator, and Charles Peck, science teacher at North Hampton Elementary School, were recently selected to receive the 1991 Cable in the Classroom Educator Award. They were among only 15 persons nationwide who were chosen to receive this prestigious honor.

The eighth grade class at North Hampton, under the guidance of Patricia and Charles, has been working diligently since September to produce the winning entry. Their project, inspired by Turner Broadcasting System's "Jason Project" and the Discovery Channel's "Scientific American Frontiers," was comprised of four separate activities: creating a remote-controlled submersible capable of retrieving objects at the bottom of a swimming pool; painting a mural of the ocean floor on the window of a local business; making a video documentary of the project; and writing an article about the project for the school newspaper.

Under the direction of Patricia and Charles, the students used teamwork to learn about science and technology. In an age when we are all disappointed and alarmed with the results of recent studies detailing the poor state of science education in our country and the correspondingly low scores of American students on international examinations, it is heartening to know that people like Patricia and Charles are working to reverse this downward spiral.

Mr. Speaker, an alarming 25 percent of students fail to graduate from high school every year. Our country desperately needs imaginative educators like Patricia and Charles to create programs which help students to recognize and reach their full potential in academia and help to build their self-confidence. With this sort of hands-on program, students are encouraged not only to remain in school, but also to excel.

Patricia, Charles and their talented students along with their mentors, have rolled up their sleeves and attacked projects that many would argue are too advanced for eighth graders. Although we will not know if the submersible will actually work until later this spring, the project has already been a success because of the valuable experience these students have received.

Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues to join me in congratulating Patricia Cushing and Charles Peck on receiving this award. It is refreshing that amidst the crisis in education our country is facing, people like Patricia and Charles effectively demonstrate that dedicated people can make a crucial difference in the lives of our Nation's children.

A TRIBUTE TO TULA CHRISTOPHER

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, on April 15, 1992, the artwork of Tula Christopher, the late wife of former San Francisco Mayor George Christopher, will be on exhibit in my San Mateo, CA office. I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues who Tula was, and why she was so special to so many of us.

Tula was a rare and wonderful woman who graced the lives of many. Those lucky enough to have known her will always remember her as a creative, sensitive, and wise soul with a great capacity to care for those who were less fortunate than herself.

Tula made a lasting and positive impression on everyone who crossed her path, whether they were heads of state at a White House reception, or elderly hospital patients with whom she would often visit.

As the first lady of San Francisco, Tula had the formidable responsibility of receiving and entertaining visiting dignitaries and statesmen. She gained a reputation as a most gracious hostess, always very modest, unpretentious and hospitable. Mayor Christopher never traveled on official capacity without Tula, for she was an emissary of the first order. Tula and George were married 55 years at the time of her sudden death.

Tula spent a great deal of time visiting the sick and the elderly in area hospitals. She would comfort them, hold their hands or comb their hair. She always did this quietly. There were no press releases, no political hay making. She was motivated by compassion and compassion alone.

No matter the time or occasion, Tula carried herself with exceptional grace, charm, and dignity—and in doing so, she always engendered those qualities in others.

Tula was a marvelous painter, and the richness of her life is reflected in her artwork. Although she did not study in the classical sense, she was an inspired and talented artist. Today we can take great pleasure in the artistic legacy she has left for us.

Mr. Speaker, I look forward to hosting the exhibit of Tula's work in San Mateo. While her passing was a great shock to those of us who knew and loved her, we can all take great comfort: Tula lived a happy and full life. Always generous, kind and loving, she graced us all, and in our warm and lasting memories of her—and through the art she created—Tula touches us still.

THE EARNINGS LIMITATION IS AN UNFAIR PENALTY ON SENIOR CITIZENS

HON. JIM BUNNING

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. BUNNING. Mr. Speaker, the unfair Social Security earnings limitation has, for years, unfairly imposed a phenomenal marginal tax rate on our senior citizens. In fact, liberalizing it has been a personal interest of mine and I can't tell you how happy I am that we've finally reached an agreement to raise the test to a reasonable level.

The earnings limitation is a relic from the depression era. It has penalized seniors who choose to work after they retire and, for years, it has created undue hardship for many of our citizens. Many seniors need to work jobs just to help them make ends meet. And the earnings limitation is a terribly unfair penalty on them.

I'd still like to see the darned thing repealed, but doubling the limit is a major triumph for America's senior citizens.

Mr. Speaker, it is our duty to our senior citizens to pass this much-needed legislation. It is truly a victory they deserve.

LET'S RESTORE THE ORPHAN DRUG ACT TO ITS ORIGINAL PURPOSE: SUPPORT THE ORPHAN DRUG AMENDMENTS OF 1992

HON. GERRY E. STUDDS

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. STUDDS. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing legislation today to reform the Orphan Drug Act, a law enacted in 1983 to provide incentives for pharmaceutical companies to develop drugs of little commercial value for rare or orphan diseases. I am joined by Mr. WAXMAN of California, chairman of the Subcommittee on Health and the Environment. Contrary to the intent and spirit of the law, drug companies are co-opting it to shield immensely profitable drugs from competition.

Shortly before the Congress adjourned last November, I introduced similar legislation, H.R. 3930. Our new bill incorporates provisions originating in S. 2060, legislation advancing in the other body sponsored by Senators METZENBAUM and KASSEBAUM.

The Orphan Drug Act confers tax benefits for pharmaceutical R&D costs and expedited Food and Drug Administration [FDA] marketing approval to companies sponsoring orphan drugs. These are defined as therapies for diseases or conditions afflicting fewer than 200,000 people. However, the most important incentive under the act is the provision of a 7-year period during which a company is granted exclusive rights to market a new drug for a specific rare illness.

By most accounts, the law has been a success. To date, 469 drugs have received orphan designation and 59 of those have been approved for marketing. In addition, the research grant program authorized by the act has supported roughly 200 grants to assist with clinical testing of drugs which show promise in treating rare diseases or conditions.

However, the purpose of the law is being subverted by the market monopolies conferred on very profitable drugs. At least three approved drugs considered to be commercial blockbusters within the pharmaceutical industry were granted designation by the FDA as orphans.

In fact, these products—human growth hormone, erythropoietin [EPO] and aerosolized pentamidine—either had been developed or were well under development before they were swept under the purview of the act. For example, there were five companies—not just one—rushing to develop growth hormone at the time. Obviously, in contrast to companies developing true orphan drugs, the act's incentives had nothing to do with the development of bioengineered growth hormone.

The commercial success of these drugs seems to belie their designations as orphans. Aerosolized pentamidine, for example, a drug for the treatment and prevention of pneumocystis carinii pneumonia in AIDS patients, has amassed sales in excess of $300 million. Erythropoietin, a treatment for renal disease-related anemia, is approaching $1 billion in sales.

Mr. Speaker, a principal reason these products are so lucrative is because drug companies have priced them with impunity, to the detriment of desperate patients and families, and all under the protection of the 7-year orphan drug monopoly.

For example, recombinant human growth hormone costs patients $10,000 to $30,000 annually, while patients needing EPO incur charges of $6,000 to $8,000 per year. Ceredase, an orphan drug approved last year for the treatment of Gaucher's disease, an enzyme-deficiency disorder, can cost hundreds of thousands of dollars per year.

The Orphan Drug Amendments of 1992 is intended to address those other instances where orphan drug exclusivity was misapplied to drugs of tremendous commercial value. Under the bill, orphan drugs of tremendous commercial value. Under the bill, orphan drugs with cumulative sales above $200 million would lose their market exclusivity. In the very unlikely event a drug's R&D costs exceeded $200 million, the bill provides for the sponsor to retain market exclusivity until it recoups its costs. This concept has been endorsed by the National Organization for Rare Disorders the Association of Biotechnology Companies, and the National Commission on AIDS.

In addition, there currently is no mechanism in the law to rescind market exclusivity if an orphan drug's target population exceeds the statutory 200,000 limit, as will soon be a tragic reality with AIDS. Hence, we may soon see monopoly markets for many unpatented AIDS drugs in the pipeline. This would clearly be unfair if the indications for these drugs affect such a large number of people with AIDS that a competitive market could be supported. Accordingly, our legislation would require the FDA to look into the future in assessing whether the patient population of a particular orphan disease exceeds the 200,000 threshold.

The Orphan Drug Amendments of 1992 would restore the Orphan Drug Act to its true purpose: To ensure that therapies for rare ailments are developed and that patients whose lives may depend on them have access to these therapies.

ELWHA RIVER ECOSYSTEM AND FISHERIES RESTORATION ACT

HON. AL SWIFT

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Speaker, today I introduce the Elwha River Ecosystem and Fisheries Restoration Act as a companion bill to S. 2527. This legislation, whose goal is to restore the legendary salmon runs on the Elwha River, is the product of many months of negotiations. We have attempted, and I think succeeded, in putting together a bill that addresses the myriad of concerns that surround this difficult issue.

The current situation on the Elwha River is chaotic: Two dams block the passage of salmon, limiting their spawning habitat to just several miles while over 70 miles of pristine river are completely inaccessible; the Lower Elwha Tribe and environmentalist have sued—or threatened to sue—for removal of the dams; FERC and the Department of the Interior disagree over whether FERC has jurisdiction to relicense the dam that sits in Olympic National Park; the company that relies on power from the dams to run their business now wonders whether that power will be available in the years to come, threatening the jobs of over 300 workers in Port Angeles; and, the city of Port Angeles is uncertain of how its water supply will be protected if dam removal is ordered by the Federal Government or the courts.

The Elwha River Ecosystem and Fisheries Restoration Act is a package that will deal with all this uncertainty. Without it, it will be left for the Federal courts to unravel piece by piece. There are times we should not ask our courts to address our problems, where legislative solutions are far superior in covering all the bases; this is just such a case.

I urge Congress and the administration to fund this project to its completion. It is a large undertaking, but it is less expensive than fish-mitigation programs on other watersheds throughout the country; watersheds that don't have miles and miles of untouched ecosystem sitting within a national park. Furthermore, given all the uncertainty—legal and otherwise—surrounding this issue, this bill is an efficient way to handle this situation.

TRIBUTE TO ASA H. CREWS, SR.

HON. DONALD M. PAYNE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. PAYNE of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my colleagues here in the U.S. House of Representatives to join me in honoring the memory of a very special man who touched the lives of all of those around him, Asa H. Crews, Sr.

Mr. Crews was born on April 12, 1907. Sadly, he passed away last December, but he left behind a legacy of wisdom, determination, compassion, and devotion to his family that will be long remembered. Because his life meant so much to so many people, it is fitting that we pause to celebrate the anniversary of his birth.

One of 10 children born to the late Anderson and Mariah Jane Crews, he joined the church at an early age and kept his faith throughout his life. Education was his passion, and he received his high school diploma at Henderson Institute on March 23, 1929, where he graduated as valedictorian and class president. Earning his diploma was not an easy task after walking 2 miles each way to school and working for 2 hours prior to classes. Although lack of financial resources prevented him from continuing his formal education, his love of learning and his intellectual curiosity motivated him to educate himself on a vast array of subjects. A collector of books, magazines, and newspapers, he was an avid and voracious reader. If there was an article that interested him, he saved it for future reference, and there were many.

If there was anything that was broken, needed fixing, or was about to be broken, he fixed it, for he had the exact tool necessary to accomplish the task which was easily found among his collectibles of hard-to-find tools.

Mr. Crews also had a passion for work. He served on the Pennsylvania Railroad as a trackman for 35 years until his retirement. In addition to his duty with the railroad, he operated a home maintenance business.

He later became active in the New Hope Baptist Church in Newark, NJ, where he was a member of the male chorus and senior choir.

His ties with his family in North Carolina continued through the family reunions started there some 75 years ago, which are still being celebrated annually. He was an active member in the Baldwin Avenue Block Association serving as its secretary-treasurer until his passing.

Mr. Crews was devoted to his wife, Marshanna White Crews, whom he married on August 29, 1933. He dearly loved his children and his grandchildren and played an active part in their lives, as they did in his, with the support of his wife.

Mr. Speaker, at a time when there are too few role models for our young people, the shining example set by Mr. Crews continues to inspire those he left behind. The lessons he taught about family values, hard work, concern for others, and love of learning will live on for many generations.

I know my colleagues join me in honoring the memory of Asa H. Crews, Sr. on the anniversary of his birth. Our thoughts are with his family at this time—his wife, Marshanna Crews; his children, Asa H. Crews, Jr., M.D.; Shirley Crews Coxson; Donald Crews; and Mary Crews Kornegay, his six grandchildren, his sisters and brothers, and his many nieces, nephews, cousins, relatives and friends.

A CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO STRAIGHT TALK CLINIC, INC.

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to Straight Talk Clinic, Inc., an outstanding community service organization located in southern California that serves my district and surrounding areas in southern California. In a time of reduced government services and increasing demand for those services, I salute the ability of this organization to offer much needed help to all needy individuals.

On April 25, the city of Cypress and Orange County leaders will assemble to pay tribute to the accomplishments of this fine organization. I would like to take this time to add my voice in tribute to their outstanding work.

Straight Talk Clinic, Inc., based in Cypress, CA, has worked for the betterment of the southern California community for the last 20 years. It was founded in 1972 to provide education counseling and support to persons suffering from mental illness, substance abuse, and developmental disabilities. Since that time this worthwhile organization has expanded its mission to include counseling services for the extended families of these needy people through a family hot line and residential treatment for persons suffering with AIDS.

We all recognize that reduced government services have limited the ability of the most needy of our population to obtain help in living a normal life. Straight Talk Clinic has filled this void. Their charter specifically demands that help must be provided to those most limited in their access to such services elsewhere. I am pleased to find out that Straight Talk has never turned away an individual because of an inability to pay. This type of charity is hard to sustain, and I salute this organization for its continued commitment to the most needy.

Straight Talk Clinic, Inc., was initially started by a staff of dedicated volunteers backed by a few generous donations. It has grown under the leadership of its director, Bruce Robbins, to provide much needed services to over 2,000 disadvantaged children, adults and families in southern California.

My wife, Lee, would like to join me today in extending this congressional salute to Straight Talk Clinic, Inc., and Bruce Robbins. We wish them continued success in the years to come.

IN RECOGNITION OF THE FORMATION OF THE CHICAGO CHAPTER OF THE BETA PI SIGMA SORORITY, INC.

HON. CHARLES A. HAYES

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. HAYES of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my congratulations to the founders and members of the Chi chapter of the Beta Pi Sigma Sorority, Inc. This new chapter, Chi, will be initiated in Chicago, IL on Saturday, April 11, 1992.

Founded on February 8, 1945, the Beta Pi Sigma Sorority, Inc. is a national business and professional organization. The Beta Pi Sigma Sorority, Inc. and the Chi chapter members have made a strong commitment to stimulating the civic, educational and cultural interest of this Nation for the betterment of the business community. In addition to the many civic activities that will be sponsored by the new Chi chapter, the sorority will also endow scholarships to local students to pursue an education in the business and professional world.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to acknowledge the initiation of the members of the Chi chapter of the Beta Pi Sigma Sorority, Inc., and certainly wish them well at their ceremony on April 11, as well as in their endeavors in the years to come.

TRIBUTE TO LOU SFORZA

HON. SUSAN MOLINARI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Ms. MOLINARI. Mr. Speaker, on the evening of Friday, April 10, 1992, a very special event will take place. There will be a testimonial dinner honoring a distinguished labor leader and former Uniformed Firefighters Association president, Mr. Lou Sforza.

This reception gives friends and colleagues an opportunity to express their thanks and gratitude for the years of service and devotion that Lou has given to the community. From his participation in the Uniformed Firefighters Association to his contributions in the labor movement, starting as the Staten Island trustee, to vice president for legislation and then as president spanning a career of over 20 years.

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the residents of Staten Island and Brooklyn, I would like to thank Lou Sforza for his dedication and service to our community. Because of his long and active career, we are all better off.

U.S. TAX DOLLARS SHOULD BENEFIT AMERICAN INDUSTRIES AND THEIR WORKERS

HON. RALPH REGULA

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. REGULA. Mr. Speaker, I would like to enter into the RECORD today a commendation to the Trades and Labor Council of Massillon, OH, concerning their celebration of Buy American Day, on April 11, 1992. These men and women are fighting to preserve their jobs and the continued health of American business.

Recently, network news televised a segment in which they documented the undeclared war now existing in the world. It is a conflict of national economies pitting U.S. firms against foreign companies in a battle that will affect our lives just as surely as the bombing of Pearl Harbor 50 years ago.

This morning, 985 Americans, and their families, learned they no longer have a job. They are the innocent casualties of this war. By Easter, another 13,000 families will join them and each one is the direct result of unfair foreign competition.

U.S. productivity is high and prices are low. So why do we continue to lose ground in the marketplace? It is through an assortment of trade tricks that our open markets are being exploited and jobs lost.

U.S. products can compete anywhere in the world. As I speak, Timken roller bearings fly overhead in the world's satellites, Ford cars fill Europe's highways, Intel computer chips are sought by the Japanese through licensing agreements, and United States steel exports continue to increase by dramatic jumps of over 500 percent.

American consumers should be told this story of the quality and competitiveness of U.S. products, and be proud of it. Once informed, they will recognize that the label "made in the U.S." means savings, durability, and value.

The U.S. Government should be the biggest buy American customer. But even now Geneva bureaucrats are attempting to persuade our negotiators to trade away our buy American laws in the GATT trade talks now underway in Switzerland.

If they had their way, NASA's Cape Canaveral in Florida, will find the tag "made in Japan" on each of its astronaut's space suits. Proposed changes to our Government procurement law would force the Federal agency to buy hardware and even launchers from foreign suppliers rather than from the domestic contractors that have served the agency for more than 30 years. It would apply equally to purchases of steel, bearings, and all products.

This is wrong. Less than a year ago we were able to preserve buy American on domestic bearings and we will do the same in the GATT.

When we spend U.S. tax dollars it should be for the benefit of American industries and their workers.

A TRIBUTE TO BERNICE AND JOSEPH TANENBAUM

HON. GARY L. ACKERMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to Bernice and Joseph Tanenbaum, who will receive the Friends of St. Mary's Hospital for Children 11th Annual Community Service Award. The award will be presented on Friday, May 8 in Flushing, Queens.

The award is presented to in recognition of the Tanenbaum's efforts on behalf of the chronically ill, handicapped and terminally ill children of St. Mary's Hospital for Children in Bayside.

The Friends of St. Mary's Hospital are part of an old tradition of pediatric care established in New York City by the sisters of St. Mary in 1870. In addition to quality care and rehabilitation services provided by St. Mary's inpatient, home care, and outpatient programs, the hospital housed the country's first full service palliative care unit for terminally ill children and their families.

The St. Mary's approach to caring for chronically ill and handicapped children rests on two basic tenets: A strong belief in family-centered care and a devotion to the needs of the whole child. Working together, the staff of St. Mary's and its volunteers help each family cope with their problems, comfort their child, learn to manage their child's medical condition and eventually follow up on treatment and prevention at home. In all of its efforts, St. Mary's makes a concerted effort to focus on the whole child, rather than solely on the medical problems.

Bernice and Joseph Tanenbaum have given a great deal of their time and of themselves to St. Mary's Hospital for Children. I commend them for their tireless volunteer initiatives on behalf of those who are less fortunate, particularly for the children of St. Mary's. Their generosity and kindness have truly made the world a better place for many ill children.

Mr. Speaker, I call on all my colleagues in the House of Representatives to join me in congratulating Bernice and Joseph Tanenbaum for their tremendous volunteer work, and on receiving the Friends of St. Mary's Hospital 11th Annual Community Service Award.

MARISOL ESTEVEZ HONORED AS ONE OF DADE'S TOP 10 STUDENTS

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, this year's Do the Right Thing Program recognized 10 of Dade County's outstanding students for their work and commitment to our community. Among this year's recipients was Marisol Estevez, a senior at Miami High School.

Marisol is the president of her class at Miami Senior High School, where she has become an important part of many projects. She has organized the prom, grad night, and other extra curricular activities at the school. In addition, Marisol helped raise money in order to keep the school's tutorial program where she helps other students with their studies.

She has taken part in various activities for the betterment of our community. Through her desire to assist other young people, Marisol has assisted many students at the tutorial center. Some of these students have joined regular classrooms because of the help Marisol has given them. Marisol understands the problems that face young people, like herself, and is always willing to assist them in any way she can.

Marisol is a wonderful example of assisting and caring for others in our community. I commend Marisol for her terrific work throughout our neighborhoods. I am delighted that she and other young students like her have decided to work for the good of our community and to help others who need assistance. Her devotion to her work sends out a message to other young people in our community to make a difference and make your work count for others.

I am pleased to honor Marisol Estevez for her terrific work and her desire to stand up for others. Her work is an example to all the young people of our community.

SOCIAL SECURITY EARNINGS TEST H.R. 2967

HON. JON KYL

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. KYL. Mr. Speaker, as an original co-sponsor of the Older Americans Freedom to Work Act, H.R. 967, I support total repeal of the Social Security earnings limitation under which Social Security recipients age 65 to 69 lose $1 in benefits for every $3 they earn above $10,200 per year; those between the ages of 62 and 65 are forced to sacrifice $1 in benefits for every $2 earned above $7,440 per year. I believe the earnings test is inherently unfair, especially to seniors who need and deserve their full Social Security benefits and who also want to work.

Today, the House considers H.R. 2967, a compromise bill which increases the earnings cap over 5 years to $20,000 for persons age 65 through 69. While that is not as complete a remedy as total repeal, it is a step in the right direction, and I intend to support the bill to move it to a conference committee with the hope we can agree to a total repeal. In any event, as I noted, raising the earnings test will provide relief to millions of senior Americans and add to the productive capacity of our Nation.

H.R. 2967 also contains a new provision which increases Social Security benefits for certain widows age 80 and over. I am troubled by the fact that there has been no debate or committee testimony on this provision; the haste with which this part of the bill was put together raises some concerns as to whether we should be addressing this issue in this bill. I am especially concerned about the allegations of discrimination based on the setting of the age of 80 as the beginning point for increasing benefits. We have no indication of the cost of alternatives and only the roughest estimate of the costs of this provision.

Notwithstanding my concerns, I urge my colleagues to support this bill because of the critical importance of increasing the earnings limit. Questions about the widows provision can be addressed in conference. We cannot let this opportunity pass to finally get some relief from the arbitrary and unfair earnings limit.

CATERPILLAR STRIKE

HON. ELIOT L. ENGEL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the striking U.A.W. workers at the Caterpillar plants. These brave people have been on strike for the last 6 months while Caterpillar has tried to bust their union.

Yesterday, Caterpillar said that any workers who did not return to work would lose their jobs. In a great show of solidarity, only 400 of the nearly 12,000 striking workers actually crossed the picket line. Despite this great show of solidarity, this is just the beginning of the fight because Caterpillar is threatening to place ads in newspapers and hire permanent replacement workers.

I find this behavior appalling. Caterpillar should not be trying to break the union, but instead should be sitting down at the bargaining table to work out a contract. Ever since Ronald Reagan broke the air traffic controllers strike in 1981, some companies have been attempting to break unions with impunity. This practice has to stop.

Mr. Speaker, the situation at Caterpillar emphasizes the assault which is continuing against a worker's rights to strike. Last year the House passed, and I voted for H.R. 5, which would bar the hiring of permanent replacements for striking workers. We need to get this bill enacted into law in order to preserve the collective-bargaining process. I urge my colleagues to join me as I work to accomplish this goal.

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, this year's Do The Right Thing Program recognized 10 of Dade County's outstanding students for their work and commitment to our community. Among this year's recipients was fourth grader Herissau Fleurimond of Pine Villa Elementary School.

Herissau arrived in the United States from Haiti a few years ago, and he spoke very little English. However, he has worked very hard and applied himself to his schoolwork in order to excel. His hard work earned him success in the classroom. He is now the best math student in his class, and he enjoys helping other students with their math as well.

Herissau is the captain of the safety patrol program at his school. This is his second year as a participant of the patrol program. In addition, Herissau is in the honors choir and he enjoys volunteering his time at Pine Villa Elementary School.

Herissau's work in the school's activities have helped him to become an important part of many projects. His hard work sends out a message to other young people in our community to make a difference to others and get ahead by doing a good job.

I am pleased to honor Herissau Fleurimond for his terrific work and his desire to stand up for others. His work is an example to all the young people of our community.

TRIBUTE TO SAM KANE

HON. SOLOMON P. ORTIZ

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. ORTIZ, Mr. Speaker, I rise in tribute to my dear friend, Sam Kane, of Corpus Christi, TX. Mr. Sam, as he is affectionately known in my hometown, is an amazing man of distinct honor and dedication.

Let me tell you how America came to be so lucky as to have Mr. Sam as a citizen. Our luck was borne of tragedy—the tragedy of the Nazi domination of Mr. Sam's homeland of Czechoslovakia. Ever the patriot, he was inducted into the Czech Army. Before he could do his duty on the frontlines, his unit was captured by the Nazis and put in a prison camp, which was a way station for the concentration camps. Always resourceful, Mr. Sam escaped from the camp—and spent the duration of the war fighting with the resistance.

Realizing that Communist rule in his homeland was assured; he reluctantly made his plans to leave his beloved Czechoslovakia. His efforts with the resistance were too precious to accommodate any sort of despotism—of the right or the left—over the Democratic principles to which he strictly adhered. His journey to south Texas was made possible by virtue of the fact that new immigrants from Europe needed sponsorship to enter the United States, and Mr. Sam's uncle provided that sponsorship.

How lucky we were. He came to Corpus Christi with his dear wife, Aranka, whose 5-year survival of the horrors of Auschwitz speaks volumes of her own courage. They plunged into life in the United States with a mere $200 in their pockets. Mr. Sam began as a plumber's assistant. He soon heard of a meat market at a local grocery. That's where the legend began. He learned to buy and sell meats. Things prospered for the Kanes. Through diligence, hard work, a little luck, and reinvestment in his business; he built a meatpacking empire.

By virtue of his life's experience, Mr. Sam has, for the past 20 years, dedicated his efforts to educating Texans, and anyone else who will listen, about the necessity of mutual responsibility and kindness to our fellow human beings. He recognizes that the ethical and moral values, which have guided the footsteps of man since the dawn of civilization, are the fundamental principles which we—as a nation—must heed. He has actively reinvested in his community through philanthropic activities and jobs for his fellow Texans.

For 20 years, Mr. Sam has channeled his energy into the Texas Friends of Chabad, the social welfare center which teaches us how to be good to one another. We live in one of the greatest civilizations of democracy that exists in our world. It is not perfect, but with the undyling support of good people like Sam Kane, this democracy will stand as an example of how kindness can prevail over treachery. Mr. Sam, it is with great pride and humility that I salute you for your service and dedication to the basic principles of kindness.

Those of us who know him, know that Mr. Sam is the living example of how simple human decency can touch so many lives. Thank you, Mr. Sam.

TITLE XX ADOLESCENT FAMILY LIFE PROGRAM

HON. RICK SANTORUM

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. SANTORUM, Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to reauthorize and increase funding for the Title XX Adolescent Family Life Program, and I would like to discuss the program and the issues involved. I would introduce my remarks with the commentary of Senator DANIEL MOYNIHAN, who has said that the social problems faced by America's youth are "overwhelmingly associated with the strength and stability of their families," while adding, "Our problems do not reside in nature, nor are they fundamentally economic. Our problems derive from behavior."

While the Federal Government has demonstrated a strong commitment to delivering clear messages about the destructive consequences of drug abuse, school dropout, and drunk driving, the message given to teens about sexual activity has been ambiguous, and in my opinion, totally inadequate. While teens have been properly informed about the risks inherent with the decision to become sexually active, many school administrators and health officials have decided that safe sex is the highest standards which can be expected of our adolescents. I disagree.

The problem with the safe sex message is that it doesn't work. Last year in America 1 million adolescents became pregnant and 3 million contracted a sexually transmitted disease. Consistent and reliable use of contraceptives can reduce the risk of pregnancy and STD's—reduce, not eliminate. Unfortunately, an understanding of adolescent psychology demonstrates that adolescents are not effective and reliable users of contraceptives. In terms of their cognitive development, adolescents are primarily concrete rather than operational thinkers, meaning they are more likely to frame and act upon decisions based on immediate outcomes rather than long-term consequences. Along these lines, adolescents often neglect to properly use contraceptives because of minimal but in their view adverse factors such as social reputation, awkwardness, spoiling the moment by putting on a condom, or even bloating and weight gain associated with the pill.

We must realize that teenagers, while being physically developed in their sexuality, still lack the emotional and cognitive maturity to make decisions about sex based on life outcomes. Contemporary American culture include an incessant and aggressive bombardment of images, innuendos, and messages about sex. Quite frankly, most of these are complete distortions of reality. The lovemaking depicted in movies, television, and magazines, or referred to in pop music almost never account for the risks and responsibilities involved with sex. Likewise, the value and benefits of self-denial, chastity, and marriages undefiled by previous sexual experiences are rarely seen. When it comes to sex, the just do it mentality of our day is taking a high toll, and teenagers need more than condoms to resist peer pressure, challenge cultural messages, and make decisions that will build their future instead of jeopardize it.

A growing consensus of Americans have reached the decision, albeit from different angles, that the most effective approach for preventing teen pregnancy and STD's is to equip adolescents with the skills needed to choose abstinence. I also feel that this training should emphasize family responsibility and the institution of marriage as the proper and most healthy context for sexuality to be consummated. The family is the cellular fiber which holds our society and every republic together, and I believe that all government efforts to impact adolescent attitudes and behavior about sex should affirm the family and assist parents in their role as the primary sex educators of children. Programs should also help teens develop the character qualities needed to eventually maintain families of their own, including a sense of personal responsibility, self-control, discipline, commitment, respect for others, and an ability to understand and respond to the needs of others.

This commitment to moral values and the strength of the American family is an intrinsic part of the Title XX Adolescent Family Life Program. In addition to providing grants to organizations for the development of abstinence-based curricula, the program also funds organizations providing essential care services for pregnant and parenting adolescents. Each title XX care project is required to provide 10 core services which include pregnancy testing, prenatal and postnatal care, nutrition counseling and information, pediatric care, mental health services, screening and treatment of STD's, adoption counseling and referral, family planning counseling and referral, family life education, and vocational training. By design, these services are delivered in the context of a long-term, case management approach and the ongoing involvement of parents or guardians, as well as the adolescent father. As for results, selected title XX care projects have demonstrated excellent success in reducing infant mortality and low birthweight, at a rate far beyond those achieved through other forms of government assistance.

The bipartisan and prestigious National Commission on Children has recommended that funding for the Title XX Adolescent Family Life Program be increased to $40 million. My legislation matches this recommendation, updates the statute findings to reflect current trends and statistics, and provides authorization for expanded research on the effectiveness of grant projects and related issues. This innovative, successful, and indispensable program deserves the full backing of Congress. I encourage you to extend your support.

SULEE ALLEN HONORED AS 1 OF DADE'S TOP 10 STUDENTS

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, this year's Do the Right Thing Program recognized 10 of Dade County's outstanding students for their work and commitment to our community. Among this year's recipients was Sulee Allen, a seventh grader at Allapattah Middle School. Among her many works and talents, Sulee has volunteered her time to helping her classmates with their studies.

At Allapattah Middle Schools, she has earned her place on the academic honor roll and on the citizenship honor roll. Sulee has taken part in various activities for the betterment of our community. Through her desire to assist other young people, Sulee has worked with many students with behavior problems as well. She understands the problems that face young people, like herself, and is always willing to assist them in any way she can.

Sulee is a wonderful example of assisting and caring for others in our community. She enjoys performing for the members of her community as well. In her capacity as a performer, she sings and recently performed a monolog at her church.

I commend Sulee for her terrific work throughout our neighborhoods. I am delighted that Sulee and other young students like her have decided to work for the good of our community to make a difference and make your work count for others.

I am pleased to honor Sulee Allen for her terrific work and her desire to stand up for others. Her work is an example to all young people of our community.

TRIBUTE TO CARMEN E. TURNER

HON. JAMES P. MORAN, JR.

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Speaker, yesterday morning the Washington, DC metropolitan area—and our country—lost a great friend, an insightful leader, and committed public servant with the passing of Carmen E. Turner.

Carmen Turner served as under secretary of the Smithsonian Institution since December 1990, and in this all-too-brief period brought to her position a spirit and human touch that is too often in very short supply in large government organizations. As the chief operating officer and second-ranking official of the Smithsonian, she was responsible for the day-to-day operations of one of our Nation's greatest treasures and the world's largest museum and research complex.

It was in her previous position, however, as the general manager of the Washington Metropolitan Transit Authority, that Carmen touched all of us in the Washington region and for which we will remember her the most.

Carmen Turner assumed the position of general manager of Metro in July 1983 and under her guidance and steady hand of leadership the system grew almost twofold to become the second-largest rail transit and fourth-largest bus transit system in the Nation. During her tenure our Metro system reached far outside the Nation's Capital into the outer suburbs of Virginia and Maryland and became as much a tourist attraction as our monuments on The Mall. A visionary leader, she concentrated her efforts on securing firm commitments from the Federal, State, and local governments to finish all 103 miles of the Metro system and to ensure that the system ran efficiently and safely. That our area enjoys the use of the finest subway and bus system in the world is a clear tribute to the 7 years that Carmen Turner spent accomplishing her vision of our community.

RICHMOND, IN, HIGH SCHOOL RED DEVILS

HON. PHILIP R. SHARP

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of the House the recent accomplishments of the Richmond, IN, High School Red Devils team, which won the Indiana State High School Athletic Association men's basketball championship. This triumph not only reflects skill and dedication, but also a special sense of teamwork and perseverance, which carried them through numerous moments when their games were very much in doubt.

I hope that their achievement is a lesson not only for other athletes and students but also for many communities and individuals, as they seek to respond to the difficult challenges in today's world.

I praise the outstanding performance of these talented young student athletes as well as the spirited support given them by their school and the entire Richmond community.

The following vivid account of the Red Devil's struggle and triumph was written by the talented sportswriter Mike Lopresti, and appeared in a recent edition of the Richmond Palladium-Item.

STORYBOOK VICTORY WAS ALMOST WORTH THE WAIT

(By Mike Lopresti)

INDIANAPOLIS—All my life. All a lot of your lives, too.

Charlie Brown's team finally won a baseball game Saturday night. He got a date with the little red-headed girl, too.

Wile E. Coyote finally caught the Roadrunner.

The district attorney finally beat Perry Mason.

Anything is possible. Anything. Richmond is state basketball champion.

In the 82nd year of the greatest high school sports event on the planet, Richmond took the long last step. Nothing will change it. Nothing will take it back. No demon from another school will streak into the key, receive a pass, and shove a stake through the heart of a city. Richmond's got it. And it's got it for keeps.

It was almost worth the wait, wasn't it? The way it finally came, I mean. Stylish.

Storybook. Dreamland. One for the history annals. And not just Richmond's history.

Because consider this: Know how many teams have ever had to go overtime in the afternoon and come back in overtime at night to win the championship? Know how many in all the years they have bounced basketballs in this state?

None. That's how many. Until now. Not Marlon or Muncie Central. Not anyone else in the North Central Conference, where all eight teams have won the State Championship.

That's just perfect, isn't it? We always knew the top line of the Red Devils' resume read they lost tournament games like nobody else. And when it finally came time to win, they did that like no one else, either.

You have to feel sorry for the last three teams that Richmond beat. Know how Ben Davis feels? Know how Jeffersonville feels? Know how Lafayette Jeff feels?

How Richmond has felt. At least 1 million times, it seems.

That is why, as Sunday dawns on Richmond's first day as state champion, this city should take this moment, hold it, cherish it. There is not another basketball locale in this state of hoop hotbeds that knows, from cruel lessons, how hard it is to do what this team has just done.

Here is all you need. A bunch of kids who don't quit not even when logic would tell the densest man it is time to go home. Such as Saturday afternoon against Jeffersonville. And Saturday night against Lafayette.

And a coaching staff that can keep its sanity and purpose through the minefield of heartache and setbacks that tournament basketball is and always will be.

And a city that cares enough to send its very best—in this case, more than 4,000 long suffering souls to the Hoosier Dome.

And one other thing you need. Luck. Tons of the stuff.

What Saturday did was give this city the chance to remember. And also to forget. When the last seconds ticked away in the Hoosier Dome, it was the past that was lifted off Richmond's shoulders.

Three weeks ago, it started. The walkover sectional. The regional that came easily enough to stoke the fires of hope. The semistate and Billy Wright's Shot.

And before all that, the last loss to Anderson at home, when it seemed that this team was a brick or two shy of a load. One more time. That was the general feeling that winter night. The Red Devils, team and crowd, filed out disappointed. And unaware that fate—at long, long, long last—was about to smile upon them.

SALUTING RETIRING CULVER CITY
MAYOR PAUL JACOBS

HON. JULIAN C. DIXON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Speaker, it is with deep admiration and respect that I rise to ask my colleagues to join me in saluting Mayor Paul Jacobs of Culver City, CA, an outstanding public servant in my congressional district. As Mayor Jacobs prepares to retire from his duties this month, it gives me great pleasure to acknowledge and celebrate his many contributions to the great city of Culver City.

Paul's career has truly exemplified the honorable tradition of unselfish public service.

While establishing a successful career as an attorney, he served for 4 years as a member of Culver City's Planning Commission. This experience led him to run successfully for election to the city council, on which he has rendered distinguished service to the citizens of Culver City since 1976. In recognition of his great leadership ability, Paul's colleagues on the city council conferred on him the role of mayor on seven separate occasions during his career on the council.

The outstanding reputation of Culver City's Redevelopment Agency is attributable in large measure to the knowledge and skills he exercised during his many years as chairman of the agency. In addition, Paul's effective advocacy for the interests of Culver City before State and Federal officials and agencies has been a major asset to Culver City.

It is to Paul's credit that Culver City has been the recipient of many distinguished awards during his tenure. These awards include the highest awards given by the National Organization of Disabilities and the National Parks and Recreation Association; U.S. and California awards for excellence in municipal finance; and numerous others in the areas of law enforcement, fire prevention, earthquake preparedness, and public works.

Paul's greatest legacy, however, is a dynamic, well-run city in which his fellow citizens and neighbors take enormous pride.

Mr. Speaker, it has indeed been a great honor to work with Paul Jacobs. Please join me, then, in wishing Paul, his wife, Joy, and their sons, Jason and Damon, great happiness and continued prosperity in the years ahead.

MENTALLY DISABLED CHILDREN HELPED BY THREE SCHOOLS' SPECIAL PROGRAM

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to recognize 60 mentally disabled children who have been preparing themselves for a Special Olympics by skating in Miami, FL. In a Miami Herald article entitled "Disabled Children Get a Ticket to Glide," Todd Hartman reports on the uplifting experience for some south Florida children, who have been finding skating a challenge. I commend the following article to my colleagues:

Wayne Taylor stood 10 feet away from a girl on roller skates. She inched toward him, her arms spread like wings and a smile decorating her face. Slowly and steadily she completed the journey to the wall.

"Look at how much you've improved," Taylor said. "In just two weeks . . . look at it."

That was one of many happy scenes Wednesday at Hot Wheels skating rink in Kendall, where 60 mentally disabled kids were pretty keen to the idea of having wheels on their shoes. Some whirled around the rink like pros, some clung to the walls and some were tickled to get across the rink without wiping out.

They came from three area schools: Tropical Elementary, 4545 SW 104th Ave.; Cutler Ridge Middle, 19400 SW 97th Ave.; and Riviera Middle, 10301 SW 48th St. The children are preparing for a local Special Olympics meet in March. Not all of them will be fast enough to race in the event, but they all appeared to be enjoying the education.

"There's one boy that doesn't do anything in P.E. class, then he gets out here and skates all over," said Carole McArthur, a teacher of adaptive physical education at Cutler Ridge Middle.

"This is the first experience most of them have had skating," said Lillian Stevens, an aide. "They love it."

The most remarkable aspect of the program, at least in the eyes of the instructors, is how quickly the students have improved. Upon their arrival three sessions ago, many were afraid to step into the rink. One boy was so afraid to let go of the wall, he was shaking. On this day, he sailed on his own for a few feet before landing in the secure arms of an adult.

"The first day, some of them couldn't even put their skates on," said Taylor, director of competition and training for Miami's "Mega-City" Special Olympics program. "Now some of them are just flying around the track."

"Kids who I never think can get off the carpet, at the end of the hour, they're out there in the rink somewhere," said Thomas Mitchell, a marketing director for the rink, who is helping with the program.

Mitchell said the biggest hurdle for the kids to overcome is a lack of self-confidence.

"Once they overcome the fear, they work wonders," he said.

They overcome that fear, at least in part, by learning how to fall, the first thing instructors teach them. After that, it's how to get up, then balance, then how to gain forward momentum, though some already know that.

"I've been skating since I was 5," said Rochelle Cunningham, a 13-year-old at Riviera Middle. "I know how to do all this stuff."

One of the most promising rookies at the rink is Gloria Manning, a skating pro who coaches some of the country's best roller skaters.

Manning, who is working with mentally disabled kids for the first time, is taking to it well. She leads the groups, and coaches the most advanced of the kids.

"You have to be positive," Manning said. "If they take one step, that's one more than they took before."

Near the end of the session, instructors turn on music and flash the disco lights. The kids skate around the oval at various speeds, some holding the wall, some racing each other.

"What an uplifting experience," said Muriel Bennett, a retiree who is volunteering with her husband. "These kids are so grateful and so loving. The first time they tried to skate they were so fearful. It's amazing to see them now."

I would like to thank the teachers and volunteers of Tropical Elementary, Cutler Ridge Middle and Riviera Middle School and all people who have taken the time in adding a little happiness to the lives of 60 disabled children.

TRIBUTE TO COL. JOHN JOSEPH CLUNE

HON. JOEL HEFLEY

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 9, 1992

Mr. HEFLEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to one of Colorado's finest Col.

John Joseph Clune. Colonel Clune, who recently passed away while recuperating from a bone-marrow transplant, was the highly respected athletic director at the U.S. Air Force Academy for 16 years. He retired last summer at the age of 59.

While athletic director, Colonel Clune served under five AFA superintendents, four faculty deans, and five commandants. While surviving the many personnel changes at the AFA, Colonel Clune remained a constant source of inspiration to the young men and women with whom he came in contact.

The sports world benefited greatly from the solid leadership and support he provided over the years. He was active in many organizations including the College Football Association, the National Association of Collegiate Directors of Athletic, and the Western Athletic Conference. Also, he was instrumental in developing the AFA's women's athletics department and in luring the U.S. Olympic Committee and Training Center to Colorado Springs.

The college sports world has lost one of its most valuable assets. But thanks to all the special memories he left behind, he is someone who will not soon be forgotten.

He is survived by his wife, Pat, four children, and one grandchild.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 423

HON. CRAIG THOMAS

OF WYOMING

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. THOMAS of Wyoming. Mr. Speaker, I've not been a Member of Congress nearly as long as most of you—less than 3 years—but I came here to represent the people of Wyoming and participate in establishing national policy and direction.

But we're not doing that and I've been disappointed in the management of the place. Disappointed because of the disruption brought down on all of us and the institution by the scandal of this House administration. An attempt to mute the illegal activities in the Democrat-administered post office and problems with the bank were bad enough.

But what's even more disappointing is that the House could be taking this opportunity to deal with incentives to economic growth, health care, national debt, and the real problems we are here to solve if our leadership had been doing its job.

The Congress has been in session all week. But we're not solving problems. We're not dealing with issues. We're talking about another Democrat plan to put a Band-Aid on the administration problem rather than healing the break.

Don't vote for the democrat plan and accept another half-measure. I hope you'll support the Michel reform bill, of which I'm a cosponsor, and really change the way we do things so we can get on with the business we were elected to.

TRIBUTE TO CPL. DAVID RONALD ARNOLD

HON. FRANK RIGGS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. RIGGS. Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to honor constituents who have demonstrated excellent service and dedication for their community. I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate California Highway Patrol Officer, Cpl. David Ronald Arnold.

Corporal Arnold has dedicated himself to public service as a volunteer officer for 2½ years, with the Martinez Police Force and for 31 years of outstanding service, as a law enforcement officer with the California Highway Patrol.

As a former law enforcement officer in Santa Barbara and deputy sheriff in Sonoma County, I can appreciate your commitment to serving in law enforcement. Your achievements as an officer with both the Martinez Police Department and the California Highway Patrol should be valued throughout your lifetime. Your distinguished background and your accomplishments in the community are highly commendable and an encouraging sign for others to follow.

You and your wife, Quepha, along with your four children and eight grandchildren have much to appreciate with such a wonderful family. Now you can enjoy this time ahead. May the fishing be plentiful and your life filled with continued joy.

Again, congratulations and best wishes to you and your family.

HOUSE ADMINISTRATION REFORM

HON. TOM LEWIS

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. LEWIS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, tonight, I voted for substantive reform within the Michel substitute to House Resolution 423, House Administrative Reform. This substitute changed the House administrative structure, made substantial changes in the legislative process, cut the size of committee staff by 50 percent and banned proxy voting in committee.

When the substitute failed, the only alternative was the Democratic plan which replaced the concept of a Chief Financial Officer with the independent power to audit and investigate with a Director of Non-Legislative and Financial Service who remains responsible to the Speaker and who may or may not employ a CPA to conduct audits.

My vote as present indicated my willingness to vote for substantive reform which would sincerely address my concerns and those of my constituents over the administration of this House. However, with the defeat of the Michel substitute, what the Democrats offered was a weak attempt to create an illusion of reform and one which I refused to participate.

I strongly support House administration reform. But I refuse to endorse a plan which only pays it lip service and is in direct contradiction to the people's wishes.

PUERTO RICAN CHAMBER OF COMMERCE BECOMES SOUTH FLORIDA'S NEWEST CHAMBER

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, it is my great pleasure to recognize the South Florida Puerto Rican Chamber of Commerce which was recently formed.

The new chamber combines the efforts of two former chambers with a new leadership dedicated to promoting business activity between Florida and Puerto Rico. Both Dade and Broward business leaders have been meeting for almost a year to lay the ground work for this latest addition to the many different chambers and business groups in south Florida.

The chamber's first event was a reception honoring Diego E. "Duke" Hernandez, Vice Admiral, U.S. Navy (retired), a Puerto Rican who now resides in Miami and is a senior vice president for Right Associates, an international management consulting firm. Admiral Hernandez's distinguished 35 years in the Navy included service as commander of the aircraft carrier U.S.S. John F. Kennedy.

One of the leading activities of the new chamber will be providing information on commerce between Florida and Puerto Rico. The chamber will use its association with chambers of commerce and trade associations in Puerto Rico and Florida to assemble an interstate trade directory for its members.

I extend my sincere hope for the chamber's success, and special thanks to its president, Melvin "Skip" Chaves and executive vice chairman Victor Gutierrez.

I would also like to take this opportunity to thank the following individuals on the chamber's board of directors: Barbara "Bobbie" Ibarra, corporate secretary; Eduardo Godoy, treasurer; Gail Ruiz, parliamentarian; Carlos Julia, vice chairman for marketing and promotions; Frank Unanue, vice chairman at large; Joseph Rios, membership chairman; Tom Cordero, finance chairman; Raymond Marin, programs chairman; Henry Rojica, corporate events sponsors chairman; Keith Harrell, fund raising chairman; Bruce Kaplin, business development chairman; Carmen Diaz Fabian, research and publications chairman; Luis de Rosa; and Gregory Reyes.

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO IMPROVE THE HISTORIC PRESERVATION ACT

HON. GEORGE ALLEN

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, today, I am pleased to introduce a bill to improve the Historic Preservation Act. While protecting historic property, my bill will enhance and respect the prerogative of local governing bodies to resolve local land use issues and to strengthen private property rights. I would like to thank my colleagues, Congressman DON YOUNG, the ranking Republican on the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs and Congressman RON MARLENEE, ranking Republican on the Subcommittee on Parks and Public Lands, for joining me in sponsoring this legislation.

Specifically, the legislation will give local governing bodies the opportunity—including a reasonable period of time—to concur in or object to the Secretary of the Interior's determination of eligibility for the National Register of Historic Places of a parcel of property 5 acres or larger. This legislation does not affect the ability of the Interior Department to list properties on the National Register of Historic Places or declare properties as National Landmarks. The bill will simply prevent trespassing on the prerogative and the ability of localities to determine the future of local land for which they have responsibility, as well as prevent the Interior Department from keeping properties eligible in perpetuity for listing on the National Register to the detriment of both historical preservation and private property rights.

Private property owners, through their local elected representatives would have a greater voice in the process of considering historic preservation. When the question of historic designation arises, hearings would be held. Those people interested in the subject would participate in a more equitable process to express their opinion in the determination of historically significant sites.

The Federal Department of the Interior has declared thousands of properties across the Nation eligible for listing on the National Register of Historic Places. These declarations of eligibility are made without the consent of either property owners or local governing bodies. At least the Department of the Interior provides a measure of property owner consent before actually listing properties on the National Register. Owners of merely eligible property can not plan uses for their land. In some cases their land has been devalued, and their hands are virtually tied as to the future of their property. In other cases, properties may increase in value. But, why not allow a fair public discussion and determination before elected local officials responsible for zoning use determinations rather than Federal appointed officials?

Once a property has been declared eligible for listing, the potential use of the land is subject to a federal 106 review process. That is, Federal agencies are required to review the impact of certain land uses involving Federal agencies on historic properties. Mr. Speaker, this amounts to Federal intrusion on decisions regarding local land use, which, in my view, are the prerogative of the local governing body and the people. My bill will restore this prerogative to the localities and the people.

I am a strong supporter of historic preservation and a great enthusiast of the history and valor displayed during the War Between the States. However, I believe historic preservation can be achieved in a reasonable manner without the intrusion of the Federal Government into local issues and the infringement of the right of landowners to do what they want with their private property.

JESUS R. TOME: A COMMITTED ASSISTANT STATE ATTORNEY

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to recognize Jesus R. Tome, who like his grandfather and uncle in Cuba is dedicated to the practice of law. As a Dade County assistant state attorney, Mr. Tome is in charge of the crimes division and supervises the prosecution of misdemeanors at county court. He was recently featured in the Miami Herald for his commitment to public service and good leadership. The article "Career Choice: Lawyer, Of Course" by Oscar P. Musibay tells of his accomplishments:

For Jesus K. Tome, pursuing a career as a lawyer seemed natural. His grandfather and an uncle had been lawyers in Cuba.

"If anyone had a problem, they came to my grandfather," Tome said.

Today Tome, 28, is a Dade County assistant state attorney in charge of the crimes division of county court. He supervises the prosecution of misdemeanors.

Dade State Attorney Janet Reno says she's pleased with Tome's commitment to his job. She recalled that he interned at the state attorney's office while attending the University of Miami.

"He's shown a commitment to public service for a long time," Reno said. "The county court is where most people see the criminal justice system in action and it's important to have good leadership. Jay has been superb. He is thorough and sensitive."

Tome's family arrived in Miami in 1969. Days after coming here, his father, Vicente, began working as a land surveyor. His mother, Eloisa, spent four years raising the family's four children, then went to work as a teacher.

Tome, the oldest child in the family, began the first grade at Flamingo Elementary in Hialeah. He clearly recalls his first days at the school.

"I remember sitting in a desk alone," Tome said. "I was told to sit and color. The other kids were doing their work. It was scary and frustrating. I felt strange because I knew I was doing something different. By the end of the first year, I won an award for most improved. I learned to speak English."

Tome went on to St. John the Apostle school in Hialeah through the eighth grade. He graduated from Monsignor Edward Pace High School in North Central Dade in 1981. At Pace, Tome said he was influenced by baseball coach John Messina, who spoke up for him after another teacher tried to have him expelled for misbehaving in class.

"He was a great young man," Messina said. "I've had thousands of students and he stands out. He was never satisfied with mediocrity."

Tome graduated from UM with a bachelor's degree in political science and entered Boston University's school of law in 1985. He said he wanted to study outside of Florida, but wanted to return to Miami to practice law.

"It's the way I've been brought up," Tome said. "There is a certain loyalty to family, friends and the community where you were brought up."

Mr. Speaker, I commend Jesus R. Tome for his dedication and hard work in the criminal justice system. His experience and knowledge of the law will certainly prove successful in his future endeavors.

A TRIBUTE TO THE 10 EAGLE SCOUTS OF MIAMI'S BOY SCOUT TROOP 575

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to recognize today Miami's Boy Scout Troop 575, which was recently featured in the Miami Herald for producing a record number of 10 Eagle Scouts. The 10 Scouts recently received the Boy Scouts of America's highest honor at a ceremony at Sts. Peter and Paul Catholic School. The following article by Marilyn Garateix reports on their achievement:

For a decade, 10 Boy Scouts from Troop 575 in the Roads area of Miami have been working toward Scouting's highest rank.

On February 29, they will collect their Eagle Scout badges together—and earn a place in Scouting history.

Only 2.5 percent of Boy Scouts ever make it to Eagle Scout. Having 10 from one troop is remarkable, Scouting officials say.

"That's very rare. Any troop that has 10 Eagles at once is excellent," said Tim Rose, spokesman for the South Florida Council of the Boy Scouts of America, which covers Broward, Dade and Monroe counties.

"[Troop 575] is really beating the odds," he said.

The 10 Scouts—ranging in age from 16 to 19—will receive their Eagle badges and neckerchiefs in a special ceremony at 7:30 p.m. February 29 at Sts. Peter and Paul Catholic School, 900 SW 26th Rd.

In all, 120 South Florida Eagle Scouts will be honored that day—out of 36,000 Scouts in South Florida, Rose said.

Troop 575 has produced 23 Eagles in the past decade, including the 10 newest Eagles, said Scoutmaster Gene Leon. His son Gene Jr., 18, is among the 10.

The key to success has been doing everything by the book—and more, Leon said. "Here, you have to earn everything. There aren't any quitters," he said. And if there are, Leon doesn't want them in Troop 575.

For the Scouts, the reasons are simpler than that:

"It's part of our life," said Rene Morales, 17.

"It's the challenges," said Carlos Palacios, 18.

"You just can't leave it," said Frankie Miranda, 18.

"If I didn't go to Scouting once a week, every Wednesday, I would feel something was missing," said Carlos Castillo, 16.

Ralph Perez, at 19 the oldest Scout, earned his Eagle award in the summer of 1990, but put off collecting it so he could share the experience with his friends.

"Through Scouting we've become friends," Perez said. "We come together, we earn our badges. There's lots of things we learn here."

The Scouts—who all attended Sts. Peter and Paul Catholic School at some point—have spent almost a decade together learning how to tie knots, handle a canoe, set up camp, make fires and more.

"At first it was just something to do," said Castillo. "But it's been a chance for me to do fun things with the group. And it's also been a chance to become a better leader."

The Scouts shrug off the nerdy image some of their friends have about Scouting. "That's a stereotype because people don't understand what we do," said Morales. "Troop 575 has a really good balance between fun and work." And there's been a lot of work involved.

To become an Eagle, a Scout must first advance through the ranks. Tenderfoot, Second Class, First Class, Star, Life. He then must earn 21 merit badges—11 are required and he chooses 10.

One of the final challenges is completing a service project. Troop 575's Eagles made improvements to Sts. Peter and Paul Catholic School, where the troop meets every Wednesday.

Each Scout chose a project, which was approved by the troop's adult leaders and local and national scouting officials.

"The goal is to show leadership and get it done," said Armando Blanco, Troop 575's assistant scoutmaster.

They built a playground and bleachers, refurbished desks and the auditorium, turned one empty room into a music room and another into a refreshment area for the PTA, and collected blood.

Over the years, some thought about quitting. But they said their friendships, and the challenges in Scouting kept them involved.

"As soon as you become a Boy Scout, you work to become an Eagle," said Ralph Perez. "That's the thing everyone wants to become."

I am pleased to pay tribute to Scoutmaster Gene Leon and the other adult leaders and Scouts of this fine Boy Scout troop by reprinting this article from the Miami Herald. Their story shows how one Boy Scout troop can do so much to help young Americans develop the character and leadership skills which will greatly benefit our community and Nation.

KILLIAN HIGH SCHOOL STUDENTS SEND IMPORTANT ANTIDRUG MESSAGE

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, "John" is the name of a powerful play which uncovers the difficulties and pressures our young people face today with alcoholism and drug abuse. It was written and performed by the Killian Players at Killian High School and tells the story of a high school student's struggle with alcoholism and drug abuse. The five Killian Players were invited to participate in a World Drug Conference in Houston for the play's strong antidrug theme. The students were recently featured in the Miami Herald for their eye-opening efforts to keep our community drug free. The article "Caring Peers: Students Write, Perform Play With Powerful Anti-Drug Theme" by Jon O'Neill follows:

Some students at Killian High have found a formula for an anti-drug message kids can relate to: Come up with their own play about one student's struggle with alcoholism and drug abuse, then go out and perform it.

It worked. Well enough that the group of five kids, dubbed the Killian Players, have been invited to a World Drug Conference in Houston at the end of this month.

"They're really something," said Marilyn Culp, executive director of the Miami Coal-tion for a Drug-Free Community. She has seen the current play, titled John. "The play really moves you, especially when you think they've done it all themselves. When it goes from kids to other kids, it means more."

The play was written by senior Sarah Wasielewski. It's the story of John, a young alcoholic and pothead played by Todd Rosenberg. It starts out as he talks with a psychologist, played by Ana Pelaez, and goes through several flashbacks with his boozing and dope-smoking friends, portrayed by Carlos Fahra and Sacha Bussey.

The finale is a scene in which John confronts his alcoholic father, played by Luis Augsten. Although some scenes are tense and sad, the play ends on a positive note.

DOSE OF REALITY

"We try to hit people between the eyes," said Paul Avery, drama director at Killian, 10655 SW 97th Ave. "We want to deal with kids on their level. We're proud of the way it gets our message across."

Avery has been involved with anti-drug and anti-crime efforts since 1981, working with Crime Watch and Informed Families. John has been performed at schools all over Dade, and some schools outside the county.

The kids also conduct workshops and show other students and teachers how to put together similar presentations, Avery said.

It was after a performance in Orlando that Avery and the Killian Players were invited to the Houston conference, which will bring together 9,000 adults and students from all over the world to talk about drug abuse prevention.

MIRROR OF LIFE

For the Killian Players, John is a kind of a mission

"When parents look at my character, I think some of them see themselves in a mirror," said Luis, 16, who plays the father. "I want the parents to realize that things like this happen and understand what it does to their kids."

Todd, 16, also wants to be a looking glass of sorts when he portrays John.

"If people see themselves in me, I want them to know they can get help," Todd said. "In John's situation, it was almost too late."

The students are excited about the possibility of going to Houston. The only sticking point is money—the trip will cost about $4,000 total. The group has gotten some contributions, but is still trying to raise the balance.

"It's incredible that we were invited," Todd said. "It's an honor to be able to represent Dade County. We just hope we can get all the money together in time."

Mr. Speaker, I commend these five students, Sarah Wasielewski, Todd Rosenberg, Ana Pelaez, Carlos Fahra, and Sacha Bussey, for their commitment to change. Their important antidrug message will undoubtedly make a difference.

A TRIBUTE TO THE SOUTH FLORIDA SHOMRIM SOCIETY

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 9, 1992

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to pay tribute to the South Florida Shomrim Society, a Jewish law enforcement officers society in south Florida. I am especially delighted to recognize Shomrim's annual dinner, dance, and awards ceremony which was held on March 28.

This year's Shomrim Officer of the Year award was posthumously presented to the late Detective Steven Bauer from the North Miami Police Department. Steve was killed on January 3 at a bank in north Miami while working an off-duty job in uniform. After his death, Steve was promoted to sergeant. Accepting this award was Steve's widow, Caroline, his two brothers, Miami Beach police officers Mike and Bob Bauer, and North Miami Chief of Police Ken Each.

As a result of Steve's death, a 15-day investigation by detectives from north Miami, metro homicide, Miami Beach, Hialeah and the Florida Department of Law Enforcement, five suspects were arrested and later charged.

National Shomrim is having its winter meeting in south Florida this year in conjunction with its annual affair. Many presidents of several northern Shomrim affiliates joined the South Florida Shomrim Society in honoring Steve.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to pay tribute to the officers and board of directors of the South Florida Shomrim Society: David Waksman, Robert Singer, Greg Feldman, Evelyn Weiner, Kenneth Goodman, Jack Zelman, Elliot Lipson, Rabbi Michael Eisenstat, Irving Heller, Richard Plager, Rabbi Pinchas Weberman, Mark Seiden, the Honorable Samuel Smargon, the Honorable Abe Resnick, Franklin Kreutzer, Louis Weiser, Herb Schoenfeld, and Eugene Friedman.

SENATE—Friday, April 10, 1992

(Legislative day of Thursday, March 26, 1992)

The Senate met at 9:30 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the Honorable RICHARD H. BRYAN, a Senator from the State of Nevada.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us observe a moment of silence for the family of former Senator, Gale McGee, who died yesterday. [Moment of silence.]

Let us pray:

Eternal God our Father, far too often families are hostage to Senate schedules and tragically neglected as business preempts time and concentration of the Senators. As we anticipate the Easter/Passover recess, grant that Your servants will give priority to their families and take seriously biblical exhortation.

"Submitting yourselves one to another in the fear of God. * * * Husbands, love your wives, even as Christ also loved the church, and gave himself for it. * * * And, ye fathers, provoke not your children to wrath: but bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord."—Ephesians 5:21, 25; 6:4.

Gracious, patient God, at a time when the dysfunctional family is recognized as a source of great social disorder, help the leadership of our Nation be examples of what family life ought to be in the interest of national life. Help the Senators to give themselves permission to take time, to make time for their families.

In the name of Jesus who said, " * * * Suffer little children, and forbid them not, to come unto me: for of such is the kingdom of heaven."—Matthew 19:14. Amen.

APPOINTMENT OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will please read a communication to the Senate from the President pro tempore [Mr. BYRD].

The legislative clerk read the following letter:

U.S. SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, DC, April 10, 1992.

To the Senate:

Under the provisions of Rule I, section 3, of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby appoint the Honorable RICHARD H. BRYAN, a Senator from the State of Nevada, to perform the duties of the Chair.

ROBERT C. BYRD,
President pro tempore.

Mr. BRYAN thereupon assumed the chair as Acting President pro tempore.

RESERVATION OF LEADER TIME

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the leadership time is reserved.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the majority leader.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, am I correct in my understanding that the Journal of the proceedings has been approved to date?

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The majority leader is correct.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, am I correct in my understanding that, under the previous order, the Senate will be returning to the consideration of the budget resolution?

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The majority leader is correct.

Mr. MITCHELL. I further understand that under the previous order, Senator DOMENICI is to be recognized to offer a substitute resolution.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The majority leader is correct.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I note that Senator DOMENICI has just entered the Chamber.

I suggest the absence of a quorum and permit the time to run against the resolution.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONCURRENT RESOLUTION ON THE BUDGET

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will now resume consideration of the pending business which the clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 106) setting forth the congressional budget for the United States Government for fiscal years 1993, 1994, 1995, 1996, and 1997.

The Senate resumed consideration of the concurrent resolution.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. DOMENICI] is recognized to offer a substitute amendment.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I yield myself time off the resolution.

We are in the process of making sure that the proposed substitute conforms with the amendments that were cleared last night so that we do not have a substitute that leaves out some of those things the Senate approved yesterday afternoon and into the evening. We will have that ready soon at which time we will tender the substitute.

In the meantime the distinguished junior Senator from Virginia, Senator ROBB, is on the floor and he wants to speak in support of the substitute which will be offered. I ask unanimous consent that he be allowed to speak and take it off of the resolution on our side.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOMENICI. How long would the Senator like to speak—10 minutes?

Mr. ROBB. Not to exceed 10 minutes.

Mr. DOMENICI. Not to exceed 10 minutes.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROBB] is recognized for a period not to exceed 10 minutes.

Mr. ROBB. Mr. President, I thank the senior Senator from New Mexico. I speak now because I am going to be attending a hearing during the next few hours in the conference committee and will not be available for the regular debate. I would like to say a few words that relate to the general purpose of the amendment.

Mr. President, the key to controlling the budget has never been much of a secret. As the senior Senator from New Hampshire pointed out in his compelling farewell address, entitlement payments are the three-alarm fire which threatens to burn down their entire budget.

Our amendment goes right to that point. It caps entitlement spending in a very reasonable and responsible way which allows programs to meet their commitments to the constituencies we have pledged to serve. It cuts defense spending by more than the President's budget, yet does so based on a clear strategic vision and it is built from the bottom-up, by the Chairman of the Armed Services Committee. And most importantly, it shows a practical way to move in the direction of what I believe we all want: a balanced budget—although I am personally prepared to move in that direction even more rapidly.

• This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by a Member of the Senate on the floor.

Equally important is what it does not. This amendment achieves budgetary savings without stunting economic growth. It sets targets well in advance so they can be planned for and met without undue hardship or avoidable waste, and it preserves the domestic discretionary budget. This is not just a sense of the Senate or a political gimmick; it is a substantive plan designed to move us toward our goal of true fiscal responsibility.

The Federal debt is about $3.9 trillion and rising fast.

We talk every day in this body about billions and trillions of dollars. After a while, those figures can lose their meaning. Let me try to put it into a new perspective.

Mr. President, you and my other colleagues are probably familiar with M&M's, the little candy. The folks of M&M/Mars, a good Virginia company, tell me that they crank out some 200 million M&M a day. That company has been going continuously since 1940. Yet, in all that time, Mars still has not made as many M&M's as there are dollars in the public debt. If M&M's cost $1 each, we would probably cut down on our consumption. Why we have not applied that same logic to debt dollars—which, because of interest, cost us far more than $1 dollar each—is beyond me.

If we do not get control of entitlements—if we leave the budget on its present course—the Congressional Budget Office says that mandatory spending will grow from $710 billion to $977 billion by fiscal 1997. Net interest payments—just interest payments—will reach $280 billion. That does not create a job, or restore a child's health, or defend the Nation. That is just money right off the top for debt service. And it would be all for naught, since CBO projects that if we do nothing, while the deficit may be predicted to shrink for a while, it will begin to rise again in 1999.

That is why I joined my distinguished colleagues in sponsoring this resolution. I will tell you frankly that I do not agree with every number on every line of this resolution. And it is important that we be willing to match caps on Federal spending with restraints on the tasks that we transfer to the States. It would not be fair to once again cut the funds they have to work with while increasing their responsibilities.

We can fine-tune the numbers in due course through the existing committee structure. The important action required of this body today is to address the most important single element of our budgetary crisis. To put out a fire, you do not pour water on the part of the building that is not burning; you douse the flame.

Any time, Mr. President, you mention entitlements, it's easy to be misunderstood or to have one's argument misconstrued. I hope that those who may disagree with us will appreciate the spirit in which this proposal is offered. We do not seek to end entitlements, or even to reduce them. We do, however, believe that it is necessary to restrain their growth. That is, first and foremost, what this amendment does.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues, once the amendment is formally offered by the Senator from New Mexico to join us on the path to fiscal responsibility and hopefully, eventually toward a balanced budget. That path starts here; it starts now; it starts with a realistic budget that applies restraint where it is most needed and most effective. In my judgment, Mr. President, we cannot begin too soon.

I thank the Chair and I thank my colleagues and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would inquire as to under whose time the quorum will be charged. Under the rules, the Chair would inform the distinguished Senator from Virginia, in order to suggest the absence of a quorum the Senator must control time. The question arises as to whose time will the absence of a quorum be charged to?

Mr. ROBB. Mr. President, in the absence of any prior agreement, I ask unanimous consent that time be charged equally.

Mr. SASSER. I object, Mr. President. The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is heard.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I assume the Senator from Virginia is speaking on the time of the proponents of the amendment and I would suggest the time be charged against the proponents of the Domenici-Nunn substitute.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair views that as a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. ROBB. Mr. President, I think that the distinguished senior Senator from Tennessee can certainly object to the request that it be divided equally, but I had made a previous request that it be divided equally in accordance with what is normal procedures in the Senate when there are no Senators seeking recognition. I would hope that that would prevail.

But the simple request to have it all charged to the proponents has been made and it is assumed there is no objection. I would note objection to that procedure. However, that procedure, in the absence of ability to pursue the course requested, has probably the same effect.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair might inquire, from a parliamentary point of view, has the Senator from Virginia objected to the unanimous consent request propounded by the Senator from Tennessee which the Chair understood was to charge the time under the quorum call to the proponents of the amendment?

Mr. ROBB. The Senator from Virginia objected.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is heard.

The Chair would inquire as to who yields time?

Mr. RIEGLE addressed the Chair.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Who yields time?

Mr. RIEGLE. I wonder if the Senator from Tennessee might yield me 1 minute.

Mr. SASSER. I am pleased to yield to the Senator from Michigan.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan is recognized for 1 minute.

Mr. RIEGLE. I thank the Senator.

Before the Senator from Virginia leaves the floor, I expect we are going to have a spirited debate here and I just want to make it clear that I view this amendment as an attack on elderly people of this country. We have seen it before and we saw in the 1980's when Reagan came after Social Security and came after Medicare. They are coming after Medicare again here. I think it is outrageous.

I do not want anybody to be under any misapprehensions, the Senator from New Mexico or anybody else, about these efforts to cut these programs for senior citizens in this country and the protections that they need for their health in order to maintain the fat tax cuts of the 1980's that went to the wealthiest people of this country, and that are too large and part of which has to come back into the Treasury. You are going to have a hot debate here today before it is over.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Who yields time?

Mr. DOMENICI addressed the Chair.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I think we will be ready shortly to send the amendment up. But I do not want to waste time, so I will start debating the issue. I say to Senator SARBANES we just were telling the chairman we do not have the amendment perfected nor all the amendments that were added yesterday, but it will be ready very shortly.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator yield for one question?

Mr. DOMENICI. Sure.

Mr. SARBANES. Was this amendment considered in the committee?

Mr. DOMENICI. No, this amendment was not considered in the committee.

Mr. SARBANES. I find that very interesting because it is an amendment that is sweeping in its import. I think the Senator from Michigan just made a very important point. It seems to me, and we will obviously have an opportunity to debate this, but to try to introduce this kind of sweeping proposal without even having considered it in the committee and examined it in the committee is not a very encouraging way to do business.

Mr. DOMENICI. Well, I thank the Senator from Maryland, but let me tell you, I introduced this as a freestanding budget resolution more or less on April 1. It has been here and pending because it was in the RECORD.

But, nonetheless, I do not believe this matter requires extensive public hearing. In a couple of hours everybody is going to understand what we are going to try to do.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inquire of the Senator from New Mexico, without objection, the Chair is assuming the time is now being charged against the Senator offering the amendment?

Mr. DOMENICI. I indicated at the outset that I wanted it charged on the resolution off my side.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has that right and the Chair notes the request.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, let me open this discussion this morning by taking everyone back to a point in time when Spencer Tracy and Katharine Hepburn were in a movie. Some might remember that movie. Katharine Hepburn, a newspaper publisher, is trying to talk Spencer Tracy, a successful businessman, into running for president. Tracy gives a rousing speech to the chamber of commerce about the country and what is wrong with professional politicians. I could not imitate Spencer Tracy, but let me in my own way tell the Senate what he said on that particular day to the chamber of commerce as it was all staged.

Politicians, said he, instead of trying to pull the country together, are helping to pull it apart just to get votes. To labor, they promise higher wages and lower prices; to businesses, higher prices and lower wages; to the rich, the agenda of let us cut taxes; and to the poor, we will soak the rich; to the veteran, cheaper housing; to the builders, uncontrolled housing prices.

Well, things have gotten no better. If anything they have gotten worse. So today, I will be sending a substitute budget resolution to the desk because I am very worried about what is going to happen to the United States of America and what we are going to leave for our children and our children's children.

We just came out of a recession and Americans were worried about their future. They had little confidence in the future. In their hearts and in their minds they were wondering if their children were going to have a chance to have a job, an opportunity, to make progress, have an increased standard of living.

I am here today to suggest to the American people and to the Senators that want to look at the future, that the future of the United States of America is bleak unless we control the ever-expanding deficit.

In fact, Mr. President, I believe the children and grandchildren of the adult Americans today and of those who purport to be leaders of America, I believe they are destined to a life of less and less and less.

I have, on one occasion, called this proposal save our children from poverty.

Everybody suggests that we ought to have jobs for our people and I believe they are saying jobs for our children, and opportunity to earn a living. Almost every group in America is worried about jobs for the future. The facts are stark. Senators, Budget Committee chairmen, ranking Members, for 15 years now have brought budget resolutions to the floor of the Senate and suggested we were getting the budget under control and getting the deficit under control, only to find that after the votes were cast and after the facts were in, the deficits did not come down, they went up.

Frankly, with the budget resolution that is before us reported out of the committee—I helped get it to the floor—deficits in the future will not come down appreciably. But if they do, and they come down to somewhere around $200 billion a year, then they will start back up. And I regret to tell the Senate that if we leave everything alone—which I assume those who oppose some reform and some rational control, they will be saying leave it alone—let me suggest that once this deficit in 1997 gets to $236 billion, it will start up again. And by the year 2002 it will be $423 billion.

Let me put it another way. If we do not do something, and for those who do not want to apply some reason to the mandatory expenditures of our Government, then they ought to suggest what we should do. We cannot tax the American people enough to get this deficit down. We cannot cut defense enough to get it down. We could get rid of the entire discretionary budget and it would not solve this problem. We will double the debt of the United States between 1993 and 2002. It is $3.1 trillion now. It will be $6.2 to $6.3 trillion by 2002. There is no way around it unless we decide to do something reasonable and rational to save our children's future.

Let me suggest what the Senator from New Mexico, the Senator from Georgia, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. RUDMAN], and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROBB] are going to place before the Senate soon. We are going to ask the Senate to do what is right for all America. We are going to say, first, from 1994 through 1997 or 1998, we are going to accept the defense reductions recommended by the Armed Services Committee chairman, Senator NUNN: About $35 billion. And we are going to apply those back to the discretionary accounts with sense-of-the-Senate language saying they ought to be added to a frozen—5-year freeze in appropriated accounts, domestic; add the $35 billion back to be used for what many have said are incentives for growth: Education, infrastructure, and things of that sort. That is the language and that is the hope. But in any event those savings go back into discretionary. Foreign assistance is frozen for 5 years.

That means we have to look at two other things. This resolution says take Social Security and leave it alone because it is pretty obvious that the taxes collected for Social Security well beyond 2002 will pay for the checks to each senior citizen and all the new ones joining and will provide for an increase each year equivalent to the cost of living. So Social Security is left intact.

We have then said there is only one other thing and it is the rest of the mandatory expenditures of our Government. The rest of the mandatory expenditures of our Government—and we can go through a list before we finish our debate on our side and inform the Senate what kinds of things are in there—but essentially it is a group of programs that fund automatically, and are about $450 billion this year. Those programs will grow automatically to $912 billion, almost $1 trillion by 2002. They will be growing from 1993 to 2002, 8.2 percent. So if the inflation is 3 percent they will be growing at 5 percent more.

We understand part of that growth is because new people that are qualified are added to the beneficiary rolls. But we also know that the remainder of that super cost is because we have not, as a Congress, looked at these programs to see if there are any reforms possible that will reduce their cost and yet accomplish the primary goal of our country, to help the beneficiaries with either money or services as contemplated by the general law that gives them our resources.

Frankly, there are going to be all kinds of speeches much like that the Senator from Michigan gave, and more, about this terrible plan and how it is going to hurt people. As a matter of fact it is amazing, it is amazing—since yesterday afternoon when the Senator from New Mexico, joined by his cosponsors, first discussed in depth what was in that resolution that we introduced here in the Senate, our proposal to save America and to save our children from poverty, we already got telegrams 2 hours after it from all over the country saying that this is going to hurt a veteran's group, this is going to hurt people on welfare, this is going to hurt seniors on Medicare. And, frankly, I only ask that each of those beneficiary groups and each of those people, Americans, before they get worked up about this, they listen to what is being proposed and that they evaluate whether they want to be part of saving the United States of America's economy or do they want it to go bankrupt?

That is a harsh statement, but I believe, Mr. President, and the reason I brought this substitute resolution to the floor is because the American people and fellow Senators have to understand what is going to happen. There is no use glossing it over anymore. If we do not change, we are going bankrupt.

Let me tell you what I think is bankruptcy in America. We will not file a chapter 11 for this great Nation, but we are going to have permanent recessions. If we had a 2-year recession and we could hardly stand it, you continue the current policies of spending tax dollars that we do not have, telling Americans that we can give them whatever they have been getting and more, stay on that course and the debt will double in 10 years.

We will have literally no net savings. Business will not be able to borrow money to grow. Foreign countries will have us by the neck. We will borrow to the hilt. And if we are worried about Japan today, just continue this debt until they own so much they will decide whether we are going to do what we want or not or whether we are going to do what they want or not. And that is going to occur regularly, to the extent that this Senator does not want to be there and say at least I tried.

I do not want to be there when they say, "Why didn't you know about it? Why didn't you do something about it, Senator?" and be unable to respond.

I respond today by saying it is almost too late. It is an election year, and if we do not do it now, next year is an election year, and 2 years after that, and this deficit will continue to gobble up our savings, inhibit our productivity and the grandeur of America will turn pale and we will evidence sustained recessions or incredible inflation, one or the other.

Having said that, this proposal that Senators NUNN, RUDMAN, and ROBB offer with me is as follows: We take all of the mandatory expenditures of our Government, we put those expenditures in one package, excluding Social Security—that means Medicare, that means Medicaid, that means farm programs, all of them—

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. DOMENICI. I want to finish my thought, please.

Mr. SARBANES. I just need a list of the programs the Senator is talking about.

Mr. DOMENICI. We will furnish that. We will be glad to.

Mr. SARBANES. Does the Senator have that list?

Mr. DOMENICI. Yes.

We are going to put those programs in one package. We are going to look at it and say, how much are those programs growing, all combined? And we find, sad to say, that on their own, automatic pilot, nothing to do about it in the Congress; the President cannot do anything about it, they are growing at 8.2 percent a year, such that that one bundle of programs will double in size in 10 years. It will be approaching $1 trillion.

Now, Mr. President, before we hear the cries of anguish, just listen and see if we have not been reasonable, practical, and tried to do something that is deserving of our leadership in the Senate.

First, we said we will do nothing about it. We will leave it just as it is for the year 1993, knowing full well that Congress is seriously considering total reform of the health care programs of the country.

So we leave it alone for 1 full year. In the following year, 1994, we say all of these programs should grow but any new case load, any new person who is entitled, comes into that bundle and gets what they are entitled to. We add inflation to every program, so any pension-type program that is in there, we say add inflation. And then we say, on top of that, we will add 2 percent. So we are not just providing for inflation and new cases, new coverage that comes into the program, we are also saying add 2 percent.

Now, Mr. President, for those who are wondering what happens then—we have just finished 1993, now we are in 1994—at that point, applying that formula, no significant reform is necessary. However, that is 2 years to take a serious look at what the new health care program is going to be; how much is it going to cost? At that point there is clearly a target against which they can put the new programs in place.

Then in 1995, that 2-percent kicker, that superinflation that we have added on, becomes 1.5, the year after that 1, and the year after that zero.

So that entire bundle of mandatory expenditures will continue to grow as we have described it now—1993 just like it is; 1994, 2 percent on top of all the people and all the institutions that are covered plus inflation; and then down to 1.5, 1, zero.

It just happens, Mr. President, that puts in place a requirement that the committees of the Congress look at this entire package each year and determine whether or not they want to reform some, change some, so that they will not grow as fast as they did before.

Mr. President, I will submit for the RECORD, since some will ask how will the committee do this, a document entitled "Deficit Reduction Options, Entitlement and Other Mandatory Spending." I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the document was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Source: CBO, Reducing the Deficit: Spending and Revenue Options (February 1992).

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, here is a list of about 100 proposals that have been put forth by the Budget Committee of the House, Ways and Means, Finance, OMB. It suggests such things as GSL's default risk-sharing; FEHB prefund annuitants health benefits, and just a myriad of ideas that could be applied by the committees to get these programs so that they grow, 5 years from now they will be growing at inflation alone, and all new cases that need coverage.

I submit for the RECORD these options so people can look at them. Obviously, a budget resolution is not the place to adopt these. Congress will be looking at this for 2 years and decide how it can reform and take care of the maximum, where does it want to change things to be more consistent with reality.

Now, Mr. President, some are going to say why would we do this?

I think we have to ask the question why would we not do it when we do not have the money to pay for it?

Would Americans really want us to bankrupt America so that we can give them what we do not have? They have the right to ask us if we have been frugal elsewhere.

Mr. President, I cannot believe that we can be any more restrictive on expenditures in the rest of the budget than this proposal: A 5-year freeze on foreign assistance; a 5-year freeze on domestic programs. Except we give them back the peace dividend, at least the additional peace dividend, from the next 4 years of cuts, provided by the distinguished chairman of the Armed Services Committee, on defense in the outyears—put that back, frankly, that is a very frugal approach.

Domestic programs will be growing at about 1.2 percent—nominal, but even inflation. Then we ask the entire bundle of mandates to be looked at by the Congress; that the Congress begin planning to change them. And it has nothing whatsoever to do with anything other than the American economy cannot afford any more; the American taxpayer cannot afford any more. And the numbers are so large that you cannot tinker around the edges and fix it.

Mr. President, I am absolutely convinced that if we really had a chance to take every group of Americans that is in that mandatory entitlement package and shared with them what we are sharing right here, I am convinced that they would say: Be fair in your reforms, in changes here and there; we will sacrifice a bit; we will get a little less than we have grown used to spending. Or some changes will occur where those who are wealthy will not get so much.

There are many people of high means getting many subsidies from the United States. There are many in the health care area getting many subsidies from the United States. Medicare part B premiums: Many Americans are having 75 percent of their health care premiums paid for by the taxpayer when we pay nothing for a working man and woman with three children unless they have an employer who is providing them with insurance. Yet, we pay 75 percent, regardless of wealth, regardless of state of income, costing billions and billions of dollars.

Mr. President, it seems to me that I should add a couple more things, because we have to assume that the American economy is going to recover and grow. We have assumed that it is going to grow, as suggested by the Congressional Budget Office, about 2.2 percent; not very stupendous growth, but imagine what is going to happen to growth if we do not start down this path of fiscal sanity.

So we assume that if that does not happen, there is no chance to get the deficit under control. What we are talking about here today will not even scratch the surface.

So let me, for these opening comments, repeat:

Those who sponsor this substitute ask the U.S. Senate today to adopt a budget resolution that sets this proposal in place. And our commitment is that we will draft a law, a statute that puts these in law, and they will be enforced when the Congress adopts that law. For now, we want to put before the Congress the idea that we must get this under control, and that this is a fair way.

Mr. President, let me talk about the two programs that I am sure are going to draw much attention, Medicaid and Medicare.

Mr. President, some will stand up and say Medicare and other programs in this mandatory group have all the money they need; leave them alone. Mr. President, there is no money for Medicaid other than the taxpayers' money. I do not think there is any question that we are not going to go through a health care reform without finding a way to have some cost containment. The cost containment on Medicaid surely will bring Medicaid down from an annual 30-percent increase to something more reasonable.

We give the Congress 2 years to plan for this before anything is done. Eventually, if we passed the law that implements this, we would pressure all of the programs by saying the total has to meet this formula. Frankly, the same for Medicare.

There is not anyone that thinks the expenditures for Medicare and for part B Medicare can go on as is indefinitely. Almost everyone that is assuming that they are going to have a new method and system of delivering health care assumes that there will be cost containment in those programs.

We are talking about helping with the cost containment by telling the committees of Congress: Here are the dollars that we can afford; let us not kid anyone. There is not any more; we are already spending borrowed money. But at least if we stay on this path, we have a chance of getting this deficit in 10 years close to balanced.

Mr. President, I know that there are some who are going to think that those of us who sponsor this amendment do so because we want to take money away from Americans who are entitled to it. Mr. President, we do this, four of us—and Senator RUDMAN will be here to talk about it, as will Senator NUNN—but we do this because we do not know any other way to save America for our children. We do not know any other way.

If the deficit does not matter, then we are off in left field. If it matters, Mr. President, the budget resolution before us, unless it is modified as we suggest, is not a blueprint for getting the deficit under control. As a matter of fact, it increases the deficit, increases the debt over the 5-year numbers, and does so rather dramatically. That we will continue to do, even though we assume we are out of the recession.

The deficit will come down a little bit because we assume the savings and loan bailout will run its course. That is in the underlying resolution; that is in the resolution we will send to the desk.

Mr. President, I am sure that before we are through not only will this resolution say, according to some, that we are taking things away from seniors and from veterans—and frankly, Mr. President, we are not taking anything away from anyone. What we are saying is that everyone in this country has to understand that there is no money in the Treasury; that we are borrowing it in wheelbarrows, millions and millions of dollars a day.

In fact, I guess it would be fair to say $1 billion a day. The deficit exceeds $365 billion, and there are 365 days in a year. So some used to say $1 million here, $1 million there really counts. Some got up to $1 billion. Well, it is $1 billion a day we are borrowing. And we will go back up beyond $365 billion a year again very shortly.

That is because even if we control everything else in the budget, this package of mandatory expenditures—and the name is pretty near right. We have set some formulas, and the money goes out—mandatory, automatic pilot.

Now I will close with these two summarizing remarks, at least for now. One, if we do not do anything to control the mandatory expenditures, the deficit will continue skyrocketing.

The debt will be doubled in 10 years. America will have little chance to grow and prosper. We will be relegating to our children, instead of a growing standard of living, constant, consistent recessions, no growth, and I have never had anyone write me a letter suggesting they want recession, because they know they are bad.

Second, this can be done without hurting anyone. If the committees of the Congress, in the 2 years provided, want to take a look at these programs, look at the suggestions, from means testing some to actually providing different ways of doing things, we can easily get it under control.

How much time have I used in these opening remarks?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has used 35 minutes.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I yield the floor at this point.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, may I inquire of the distinguished ranking Member, is he prepared to lay down the substitute at this time?

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I have not had a chance to discuss this with the chairman. I will suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. SASSER. If the Senator will withhold, I yield 10 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Michigan, and we can discuss this.

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, I thank the chairman.

Today's debate is perhaps the most important debate we will have had about the fraud and the failure of Reaganomics and supply-side economics. I listened to the Senator from New Mexico talking about the fact that there is no money in the U.S. Treasury. Why is there no money in the U.S. Treasury? What has happened to America, particularly since 1980, that has caused us to move up to these massive multibillion dollar deficits? Why are we in recession? Why do we have his massive unemployment in the country? Sixteen million people are either unemployed or working part time, because they cannot find full-time work.

It is because of the failure of the program of Reaganomics. That program came right off that side of the aisle, just like this proposal today is coming right off that side of the aisle. And what happened? The central theory of Reaganomics was this: Give huge tax cuts to the richest people in this country, and it would set off a supply-side miracle that would boost growth, bring great amounts of new jobs and money into the Government. But it was a total fraud and a sham. And, in fact, David Stockman, who was the Director of OMB at that time, has written in his book that they knew at the time that it was a fraud, and that it would cause these massive deficits; that you could not give these huge tax cuts to the wealthy in this country without creating huge structural deficits in the Federal budget.

So now all those years have passed. We have had Reaganomics trickle-down in place since 1980. Eight years of Reagan and Bush, and almost 3½ years of Bush and QUAYLE with the same policies, and the country is in deep, serious economic trouble. It is not just the issue of the Federal Government deficits which are massive. We have problems all through our system because of this crazy and selfish economic strategy that was foisted on the country a few years ago.

The people who are leading this charge today on the other side of the aisle were the people in charge here in the Senate during the early 1980's, when this fraudulent economic strategy and program was put in place.

The reason that the Treasury is empty is that the tax cuts to the wealthy were too large, and the people sponsoring this amendment are in here today protecting those huge tax cuts still going to the wealthiest people in our country. And those tax rates on the wealthiest should go up so they start paying their fair share so we can bring down this deficit.

But, what they are doing, they are protecting those tax cuts for the wealthy. That is what this is all about. And the only way they can do it now is to go in and start strip mining the programs that we have in place for the elderly, for our veterans, for the people in our society who are in the worst circumstances and who need help. So they are in here today to chisel away at those programs, cut those programs down, so they can protect these outrageously large tax cuts to the wealthy, which were put in place in the 1980's. The wealthy of this country, who are defending this proposal, are not willing to put one dime back in for the public good. The whole creed of selfishness and class privilege is in the saddle today. It is in this administration, and it is embedded right in the heart of this proposal that is being offered and put forward by the Senator from New Mexico.

This plan is going to end up having the effect of cutting the Medicare benefits of people all over this country. Who gets Medicare benefits? The people who principally rely on them are not the wealthy. No. If the wealthy get sick, at any age, and they need specialists, the best doctors, best hospitals, best medicines, they can afford to get them, and they go get them. It is the people who do not have great wealth who have to rely on Medicare.

In our system today, doctors in our system are not required even to service Medicare patients, and more and more in our country, doctors are refusing to serve Medicare patients. Why? Because the reimbursement rates for the health care given to somebody on Medicare and elderly persons in America are so low that many doctors are saying, "I do not want to be bothered with that problem. Let them go to some other doctor."

To the wealthy, it does not mean anything, because they have protection and they have protection, in part, because they got the fat tax cuts from the same people that are bringing you this proposal today.

It is outrageous. If we had a national health care plan in place, if the Bush administration would come forward with a national health care plan that guaranteed access to health care and control of health care costs, that would be one thing. There is no Bush plan. There is no Bush plan. This crowd has been around now for 11 years. Has anybody seen the plan? Is the plan here in the Chamber today? Of course, it is not, because they have not offered one. We have offered one, I might say, on this side of the aisle. Here it is, S. 1227, offered by Senator MITCHELL, myself, Senator KENNEDY, and Senator ROCKEFELLER, cosponsored by others. This provides health care to people in this country and cost control to go along with it. There is no desire to do that on the other side of the aisle, and there is no plan. So now they are in here trying to chisel down what is left of the programs that help the people in the country who have to rely on the kind of help. So they want to chisel down the Medicare benefits and Medicaid benefits. Why? It is because they are protecting the wealthy people, who are unwilling to pay their fair share of the tax. That is what this is all about. And it is shameful, it is a sham, and it is hypocrisy.

The human needs of this country have to be met one way or the other. We cannot walk away from them. They are in there today to chisel down the veterans benefits. That is another outrage. A year ago, we were giving parades to the veterans of Desert Storm for their heroic work over in that part of the world in that war. Today, many of them are unemployed and, in fact, homeless. There was a story on national television the other day about some Desert Storm veterans who are living in cardboard boxes here in America, because they cannot find work and do not have a penny to their name. Is there a program coming in here today from the other side of the aisle to do something about that? Of course not. They have washed their hands of that problem, and they want to wash their hands of the problem of trying to make sure that the elderly people in this country that have to rely on Medicare are able to get the care they need. And it is expensive care. It is going to stay expensive until we pass a national health care program. Is there a plan being offered? Of course, there is not.

More sophistry.

Mr. DOMENICI. A plan to do what?

Mr. RIEGLE. I do not yield at this time, Mr. President. I listened to 35 minutes of that nonsense just a minute ago, this special privilege pleading that is going on. I am sick and tired of seeing the wealthiest people of this country protected from carrying their fair share of the responsibility of the needs of this country. The tax cuts that Senators on that side of the aisle foisted on this country for the wealthiest people in this country have damaged America.

They have hurt this country. You wonder why there are not enough jobs, not enough investment. The reason we went on a real estate binge, the cost of the finest paintings, big yachts, all off the chart, is all the money was going up to the top of the income scale. Even the Federal Reserve put out a report on it, how outrageous the imbalance of resources is in this country.

That is what this is all about. This amendment says protect the wealthy in America from paying their fair share of taxes. They made off with a bundle in the 1980's with a lot of protections and they do not want to give one penny of it back. Now that the Government is broke, they want to come back and strip mine the programs that are left.

I want to mention one more time the SSI benefits. Who would they go to in our society? This would be one of the programs cut under the amendment. You know who gets the SSI benefits—the elderly people in this country who are blind and disabled. And they need the help and they deserve the help. They helped build this country. But the crowd that is bringing this forward, and it is coming off that side of the aisle, has no more concern about those problems than the man in the moon. They are not interested in it. They could not possibly be, to come in here and recommend those kinds of cuts in those kinds of programs.

It would be one thing if they were bringing a health-care program along with it. There is no health-care program that has been offered. It is a bad joke. I am tired of it. I am tired of seeing the defense of wealthy privilege in this country and that elitist attitude in this country. The people of this country are sick to death of it and they want a change.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield me 10 minutes?

Mr. SASSER. I yield 10 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Michigan and before the very able chairman of the Banking Committee leaves the floor I want to thank him for his very strong and powerful statement. I just want to add a couple of visual presentations to support the point he made about the tremendous shift of income to the wealthy people in this country as a consequence of the tax policy of the 1980's.

The Senator is absolutely right. What is this amendment doing? You are talking about reductions in guaranteed student loan programs which give people the opportunity to get an education, so they can contribute to the economy, so they can be positive members of the economic system; you are talking about Medicare, medical care for the aged for our senior citizens; you are talking about Medicaid, medical care for people who cannot afford it in any other way; you are talking about the retirement system; you are talking about child nutrition; you are talking about supplementary security income which as the Senator pointed out is to help the blind and disabled; you are talking about veteran compensation.

Now they have excluded Social Security from this amendment, although that is a mandatory program, and the same rationale that holds for Social Security, holds for a lot of these other programs.

The Senator is absolutely right. They want to impose a mechanical cap. We are not told what specific programs are going to be cut. This cap, as I understand it, would save $40 billion in 1997. The Exxon amendment that was turned down yesterday, which was a very specific proposal for additional defense savings, and the tax package which increased taxes on the wealthy that was in the bill brought out by the Finance Committee, together would save more than the money that is projected in this proposal in 1997.

Mr. SASSER. Will the distinguished Senator yield on that particular point?

Mr. SARBANES. Certainly.

Mr. SASSER. Is the distinguished chairman of the Joint Economic Committee telling us that if we had enacted the very modest cut in military spending yesterday that was narrowly rejected by this body, and that if the President had not vetoed the tax on the wealthy and the millionaire's tax in the tax bill that passed this body, that these two measures, the slight reduction in military spending and the taxes on the wealthiest, would have saved more money, reduced the deficit more than this effort to strip mine Medicare, as my friend from Michigan has said?

Mr. SARBANES. In the year 1997, as I understand the figures, the Senator is correct.

Mr. SASSER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. SARBANES. Now the Senator from Michigan makes the point that there has been a tremendous shift of income in this country to the very wealthy and that this proposal is really an indirect way to try to preserve that. That is what this whole fight is about. That is what happened on the tax bill. The President vetoed the tax bill which had incentives on the investment side and a tax cut for middle-income people, in order that the top 1 percent of the country ought not to pay higher taxes.

Mr. President, this chart shows a share of family income of the top 5 percent of the country. Look what happened to it over the 1980's. The share of income of the top 5 percent in the country increased dramatically over the 1980's. This is exactly what the Senator from Michigan was talking about. The share of the top 20 percent also went up during that period of time.

But now look at what happened to the people in the middle during that period of time. Their share of family income went down during the 1980's, and the share of the people at the bottom also went down. They get just over 4 percent of the family income. That is, 20 percent of the families, the bottom 20 percent, get 4 percent of the family income. The top 20 percent get 44 percent of the family income. The top 20 percent get 44 percent, the bottom 20 percent get 4½ percent.

Mr. President, this chart provides a more graphic example of how income distribution has changed throughout the 1980's. The top 1 percent are the people on whom we tried to place an additional tax burden in the tax bill.

Now their average income since 1977 has risen from $315,000 to $560,000. Their pretax income has gone up 78 percent over the 1980's. Their taxes went up from $112,000 to $150,000. The point is always made on the other side that the rich are paying more taxes. Of course they are paying more taxes, they have a lot more income. They are not paying taxes commensurate with the increase in their income.

The logical extension of this is you have someone who says I pay all the taxes. You ask why do you pay all the taxes? He says I pay all the taxes because I have all the income. Of course, if you have all the income you are going to pay all the tax. This is the direction in which we have been moving in this country. So the taxes of the top 1 percent went up to $150,000, but their average income jumped up to $560,000. So their average after-tax income went from $203,000 to over $410,000.

Let me put it in percentage terms. Their pretax income went up 78 percent. Their taxes went up 34 percent which is not even half of what their income rose.

This is what the tax cuts of the 1980's did for the very wealthy in this country. Their after-tax income went up 102 percent, so they pay a little more taxes, but they have this huge jump in income, and because of the changes in the Tax Code their after-tax income doubled for the top 1 percent in the country.

Now, we have a proposal to mechanically cut a long list of programs. It is not specific which ones. But many of these programs are designed to help the least fortunate in our society, others are designed to meet some of the most pressing needs in our society, medical care, health care for our older citizens, health care for people who cannot afford it, student loans so people can go to college.

Then the Senator says, "How are you going to close this deficit?" They are projecting 2 percent growth. That is a pretty dismal performance. That is the problem with the Bush growth plan. There has been less growth in this administration than in any other administration in a postwar period. Bush is the worst on that score.

You talk about defense cuts. My understanding is that the defense figure 5 years out under this proposal will be $275 billion. It is $290 billion now. It is $290 billion now and the figure 5 years out will be $275 billion. That is a peace dividend? That is an adjustment in the defense budget to reflect what has taken place internationally? Who is kidding whom?

And third, if you did something to get these people in the top 1 percent, to carry their fair share of the tax burden, you would not have to come in here and strip mine these programs and obliterate these people who are in desperate situations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. SASSER. I yield an additional minute to the Senator.

Mr. RIEGLE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SARBANES. Yes.

Mr. RIEGLE. Could the Senator hold up the chart on the income?

I think what he has illustrated here is this huge increase in aftertax income to the wealthiest 1 percent in our country, they do not want to give any of this back and to avoid giving it back, they now want to see a cut made in Medicare. In other words, they want somebody on Medicare, an elderly person in this country who is sick and who needs care, to go without the care so they can keep that big fat tax increase.

That is what is going on here, and it is outrageous. If you were coming in here with any kind of fair tax plan at this time, there might be some plausibility to what you are talking about. You are taking it right out of the hide of sick, older people in this country, and it is just outrageous.

Mr. SARBANES. Let me show you what they are protecting. This is the Federal tax burden, 1977 compared with 1992. Federal taxes as a share of present tax income. Now the path line in 1977 for taxes as a share of income rose in this fashion. So there was some progression in the income tax.

Now look what has happened because of the 1980 tax changes, which were pushed so hard by the other side of the aisle. You have progression in the path line from $10,000 to not quite $100,000 and then look what happens to it. It levels right out. Above $100,000 there is no longer any progression in the tax burden as there was in 1977. Who benefits from that compared with the old system? These millionaires.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. SASSER. I yield 1 minute to the Senator.

Mr. SARBANES. These are millionaires, people that have incomes of a million or a half-a-million dollars a year, and they do not want to contribute anything to solve this economic problem.

The proposal says we are going to solve the deficit problem because we are going to come down on Medicaid, Medicare, student loans, child nutrition, and supplemental security income. That is the proposal.

Then we are told, it is not going to do anything this year; not going to do anything next year. Why do we not deal with the specifics?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. SASSER. I yield an additional 2 minutes to the Senator.

Mr. SARBANES. We had two proposals on the floor of the Senate in the past 2 weeks which would have contributed more to the deficit reduction than this proposal would in 1997.

Mr. President, there is a problem in dealing with the deficit, but the Senator from Michigan is absolutely right. You have to have a package that makes sense. You have to look at what the growth of the economy is going to be. You have to look at your defense figures.

As I understand it, this proposal has a defense figure 5 years out of $275 billion and the current defense figure is $290 billion. Now they talk about how much they are saving on defense by cumulating it over the 5-year period. But the fact remains that in the fifth year, the defense figure is going to be $275 billion as opposed to a current figure of $290 billion. There is no reference whatever to trying to meet the budget deficit problems by addressing the inequality in incomes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. SASSER. I thank the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. President, I might ask is the distinguished Senator from New Mexico prepared to lay down his amendment now?

Mr. DOMENICI. No, I am not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico is recognized.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I have heard the use of the word outrageous. Well, there is outrageousness around in abundance this morning.

Can you imagine when somebody proposes on the floor of the Senate that 450 billion dollars' worth of mandatory expenditures increase $110 billion in 5 years—that is the proposal, increase $110 billion—we have people outrageously saying we are cutting.

The other thing I hear is the $450 billion that we are going to be in debt 5 years from now can be made up by taxing the rich. You could take the entire fortune away from all the rich, everything, and you will not get $450 billion. The truth of the matter is we are over-committed.

Then you hear it said that we are going to take money away from those who are on AFDC, those who are getting some kind of assistance because they are poor. Mr. President, we offer an idea that says, look at all of those proposals and in the next 2 years figure out a way to take care of those in need and do not let the expenditures grow more than a certain amount. Every new person, new case, that is added, inflation on top of it, and 2 percent more. If that is cutting, I do not understand.

Does anybody believe that if Congress looks at this package that they are going to cut the programs they are describing here? The AFDC Program is not even using the formula amount. It is less than that much growth. We have to ask that some group of Senators that have authority to make changes look at this package and reduce it in a reasonable manner.

And it has nothing to do with the wealthy of America. In fact if you put that wealth chart up, one might ask the question among those wealthy people, why do they all get free Medicare even after they have received all of the money they put in? Should not somebody look at that when we are this much in debt? Should not somebody look at that for a $100,000-a-year income person that maybe when they have gotten all their Medicare expenditures that they put in the trust fund, when they got it back, maybe we ought to look at whether they ought to get everything free or not, when in fact our children are not going to have any jobs.

Now they are talking about economics and Bush as if Presidents wave wands and cause economic growth to occur. We do not have economic growth occurring because we have sustained deficits that are beyond the capability of this economy to assimilate and grow.

We come here talking about the future and we are hearing about the past. Now if we want a debate on what happened in the decade of the 1980's, with reference to who got what and who did not, we would be glad to have that. But the point is we cannot pay for what we have. We cannot pay for what we committed.

And it has nothing to do with hurting anyone. We are asking the Congress to take a look at those programs and see if they cannot find a way to reform some of them, taking care of people in a different way. And I add, does anybody think we are not going to have reform in the health care system?

Does anybody think that is not going to occur in the next couple of years? Of course, it is. We are suggesting that reform is cost containment also. And we are asking that during that 2 years there be a target so that cost containment will be given a real boost.

Is anyone suggesting we cannot take care of the health care problems of our seniors under the amount of moneys that will be allowed here and cause the trust fund to last much longer? I do not believe that. Having said that—

Mr. CRAIG. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOMENICI. I will be pleased to yield 5 minutes to the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Five minutes is yielded to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, parliamentary inquiry?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. DOMENICI. I will be pleased to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, what is the regular order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order under the previous order of the Senate is for the Senator from New Mexico to offer an amendment.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, let me just say a word to my friend from New Mexico. I do not want to discommode him but it is now 11 o'clock. We came in at 9 to take up his amendment. We have Senators all over here waiting, trying to catch airplanes. We have eight more amendments, I think, to dispose of.

Mr. DOMENICI. I am ready.

Mr. SASSER. I would urge my friend from New Mexico to lay down his amendment, and let us proceed on that if he intends to lay it down.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I will do that.

I ask unanimous consent when I submit this substitute amendment that I have the right to withdraw it if I desire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 1777

(Purpose: Setting forth the congressional budget for the U.S. Government for fiscal years 1993, 1994, 1995, 1996, and 1997)

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I send to the desk a substitute amendment for myself, Senator NUNN—I know it has been spoken of as if it is all on this side of the aisle. I understand we have two cosponsors from that side of the aisle, I might add—Senator NUNN, Senator RUDMAN, Senator ROBB.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. DOMENICI], for himself, Mr. NUNN, Mr. RUDMAN, Mr. ROBB, and Mr. SYMMS, proposes an amendment numbered 1777.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(The text of the amendment is printed in today's RECORD under "Amendments Submitted.")

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Idaho wants 5 minutes. I yield 5 minutes off of the amendment.

Mr. CRAIG. I thank my colleague from New Mexico for yielding.

I want to immediately associate myself with his remarks and the amendment that he has just sent to the desk, an amendment to Senate Concurrent Resolution 106.

Mr. President, I would like to begin by commending the distinguished Senator from New Mexico, the ranking member of the Budget Committee, for his consistent leadership and his attention to the nuts and bolts of what is necessary to reduce the Federal deficit. He has been, I believe, unrivaled in his willingness to toil at that task.

I strongly support the substitute Senator DOMENICI has offered. It is the only realistic approach at this time to deficit control.

It is my understanding, and I look to the Senator for confirmation or clarification, that the 1990 budget agreement, or budget summit, caps what we call all discretionary spending through fiscal year 1995, but does not cap levels of spending on entitlement, or mandatory, programs.

Mr. DOMENICI. The Senator from Idaho is correct.

Mr. CRAIG. We use terms like discretionary versus mandatory. But is it not true that discretionary really only refers to spending that will not take place unless the Congress acts through the appropriations process every year? And that mandatory does not mean, for the most part, that we must spend on certain programs, but rather that current law puts the funding of those programs on autopilot.

Mr. DOMENICI. The Senator has characterized that distinction correctly. Mandatory spending does include fulfillment of some prior, binding obligations that have been entered into but, for the most part, we are taking about entitlement programs in which we simply have to change the law to make any change in those spending patterns.

Mr. CRAIG. So, it would be fair and accurate to say that, mandatory is a term of art and that, realistically, all Federal spending, except servicing the national debt, is discretionary over the long run, and most of it is actually discretionary in the short run, as well. The practical distinction is one of different funding mechanics for different programs.

Mr. DOMENICI. That is essentially right.

Mr. CRAIG. Now, for fiscal year 1993, even if the final defense spending number that comes out of conference were to be the Budget Committee-approved number, which is supported by the distinguished chairman of the Armed Services Committee and was essentially the amount requested by the President, that level of spending still would be about $8 billion below the budget summit cap. Is that correct?

Mr. DOMENICI. The Senator is correct.

Mr. CRAIG. I also understand that, in the committee-reported budget resolution, outlays for domestic discretionary spending exactly meet the cap. And also in the substitute prepared by the ranking member, I believe that overall outlays for domestic discretionary spending exactly meet the cap.

Mr. DOMENICI. Yes, the Senator is right on both counts.

Mr. CRAIG. Now, this is curious. Defense spending has been declining in real terms for the last few years, and will decline in real and nominal terms for the foreseeable future, under everyone's projections.

In terms of constant dollars, spending on domestic discretionary programs has remained virtually unchanged since the last Carter budget in 1981, and declined slightly as a share of gross domestic product.

Only in the area of entitlement and mandatory programs have we seen dramatic growth both in inflation-adjusted terms and as a share of GDP. And that trend is expected to continue—and escalate—for as far into the future as anyone's crystal ball will permit us to see.

I ask unanimous consent the table be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ENTITLEMENT AND MANDATORY OUTLAYS

(Dollar amounts in billions)

Fiscal years	Current dollars	Constant (FY 1987 dollars)	Percent of GDP
1962	$32.3	$132.6	5.8

Mr. CRAIG. If these programs for which no statutory cap exists.

Mr. DOMENICI. The Senator from Idaho is absolutely correct. That is why, in my plan, I have been calling for restraint in non-Social Security mandatory programs that actually amount to a very modest level of restraint.

This is the one area of our budget which has been growing out of control and threatens to continue to do so unless we try to bring some fiscal discipline into these programs.

Mr. CRAIG. The Senator's budget proposal certainly has offered modest, but necessary restraint in this area. Let me be sure: In the substitute proposal, the Senator from New Mexico has been proposing to allow mandatory programs to grow for new beneficiaries at the rate of inflation plus an additional 2 percent in 1993, and phasing down that bonus adjustment out by 1997, so that, in 1997, these programs still grow by the rate of inflation. Is that correct?

Mr. DOMENICI. The Senator from Idaho is right. My plan would allow non-Social Security mandatory programs to continue increasing, but would slowly, in a phased way, create a fiscal incentive to find ways to economize.

Mr. CRAIG. I have already received a few apocalyptic calls and letters warning of the dire consequences of adopting the Senator's substitute. I cannot believe they really understand how it would work. A phased-in cap on mandatory growth would put the Congress and the administration on notice that it is time, among other things, to make the reforms in our health care system to bring skyrocketing costs under control. Everyone's budget benefits when that happens, not just the Federal Government's.

We are not saying, let us cut benefits or programs or services. We are saying, let us reevaluate what we are doing and who is benefiting, and see if we cannot accomplish our priorities more economically. Of every entitlement dollar, for example, we spend 80 percent on non-means-tested programs and only 20 percent on programs that were created to help the needy. In any case, spending would increase. We are only talking about how much of an increase should occur.

Frankly, I think the Senator's proposal is too modest. I have cosponsored

Senator BURNS' legislation to cap all domestic spending growth—entitlement and discretionary, alike—at 4 percent. A number of outside groups and think tanks have proposed an overall 3 percent cap on growth. I would much prefer that level of restraint.

But I appreciate the efforts of the Senator from New Mexico to begin to move our thinking in that direction. It is long overdue and it is necessary.

I believe we may never get these deficits under control and alleviate the drag on the economy they cause until we enact a firm, constitutional mandate that we produce balanced budgets. It is my understanding that the majority leader has given the Judiciary Committee some assurance that the balanced budget amendment which that committee has reported by a strong 9-4 vote will be on this floor in the near future and I look forward to moving that process forward.

Mr. DOMENICI. I thank the Senator for his comments and his concern. I know that, when he was in the other body, the Senator was a leader in the movement to obtain a balanced budget amendment to the Constitution, and I look forward to our working together on this and other efforts on behalf of deficit reduction.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. President, we cannot duck nor can we hide. Yet the rhetoric on the floor this morning would suggest the policies this Government currently operates under and this Congress responds to are on autopilot. I think we call them mandatory expenditures versus discretionary expenditures.

Let me tell you who controls the autopilot—100 Senators here on this floor. We are the pilots. We fly the aircraft of Government. We make the decisions on how much money will be spent, how many taxes will be levied, who will be taxed and who will not be taxed, how much of the wealth of this country will be redistributed and to whom and for what.

Let me tell you, as pilots of that aircraft, we cannot hide. It is on automatic pilot at this time and that automatic pilot is now flashing red, not because of anything that I might have done or anyone else, but by those on the ground, the American taxpayer, those responsible for the aircraft itself. They say it is in danger of a crash.

It is because there has been a sense of irresponsibility here for too many years to not look at the hard issues, to not recognize what has to be done and then to do so in a reasonable and responsible fashion. Not that the door gets slammed quickly or the aircraft gets slammed to the ground and its landing gears get knocked out from under it, but that it be allowed to land in a controlled fashion.

That is what I believe my colleague from New Mexico, in his substitute, has offered—that the pilots of the autopilot, if you will, those who really are in control, this Government, this Congress, this Senate grab hold of those controls and bring it in for a safe landing for everyone. That is the fundamental issue we are all talking about this morning. There is really no room for exaggeration.

A cut is not a reduction of an increase. A cut is a reduction in current levels of expenditure. I know the American people believe that, but nobody here on this floor is willing to admit it. That is what we are talking about this morning—at some time in the future, this Congress beginning to reduce the rate of increase in the mandatory expenditures so we can begin to reduce the deficit so we can go home and say to the young people of this country we are beginning to reduce the burden on you, so at some time, when you are out there at 35 or 40 or 45 years of age, you will not be asked to pay 65 or 70 percent of your gross pay back to Government to pay for the debt that was created by your forefathers.

We have not said that yet. We have not taken that step. We have not been that responsible.

The 1990 budget agreement was touted as the great compromise that began that slow path of reducing the deficit. Now the record speaks for itself, and I do not believe the American people believe for one moment that past rhetoric because the proof is on the table. The figures have been printed.

The fact is it did not work because nobody had the strength to begin to reduce, by law, those mandatory autopilot expenditures that everybody here today, except too few, suggest cannot be touched for whatever reason or another.

I suggest they can. I think my colleague from New Mexico, in a most responsible way, said to this Congress let us at least look at it. Let us at least send it back to the Budget Committee in the beginning of the next cycle in a responsible way and take a look at it. That is what he is saying.

I think that is fair, and I think the American people will agree with us because there is a message, and it is loud and it is clear. They are saying we ought to do something. I think we should. Action on this substitute would in fact be responding to the American people's call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WELLSTONE). Who yields time?

Mr. DOMENICI. How much time does the Senator seek?

Mr. RUDMAN. I need 10, 15 minutes, whatever the Senator has.

Mr. DOMENICI. I will use 30 seconds of my time first and then yield to him.

I am wondering how the Senators, either standing on the floor or in their seats, on the other side, how they voted on the alleged "help the rich get richer and poor get poorer" tax cut amendment. Unless my eyes are wrong—and I could be corrected—it seems to me Senators SASSER, SARBANES, and RIEGLE voted for that cut.

Mr. RIEGLE. Will the Senator yield to make that record accurate?

Mr. DOMENICI. If I said something inaccurate, I would.

Mr. RIEGLE. The Senator left something out that creates a misimpression. This was an alternative offered on the floor to change those tax rates to beef up the rates at the high end and cut them at the lower end and the vote on final passage included tax cuts to spur investment and business in this country and that ought not to be left out.

I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. DOMENICI. I am pleased to have it corrected.

Mr. RUDMAN. I thank my friend and the Chair.

Mr. President, I think it remarkable, listening to the debate this morning, that somehow there are Members of this body who think the American people are going to fall for the argument that this is a rich versus poor discussion.

In the press conference that Senators DOMENICI, NUNN, ROBB, and I held yesterday, I believe that each of us said uniformly that if we are going to get this budget under control, the first thing we ought to do is what every economist in America—every fiscal expert in America has said to us—and that is take this uncontrollable part of this budget and at least subject it to annual review. Find a way to slow its growth which is way above inflation. And then, if there is insufficient revenue, each of the four cosponsors of this legislation said, at that point, anyone should listen to the reasonable argument of increasing taxes in some segment of this population.

But the fact is that with deficits running at $400 billion a year, and according to the best projections, approaching $700 or $800 billion at the end of this century, and with the tax bite from the American people by 1993 about what it was back in the Carter administration, increased taxes alone will never solve this problem. In fact, if you adopted literally confiscatory tax rates on everybody in this country who earned more than $100,000 a year, you would still have escalating deficits.

The facts are these: That for a long time we have been involved in a game of political chicken in this Chamber, and we are going to see it again today. We are going to be required to cast votes as to whether we should exempt veterans and Medicare recipients and Medicaid recipients. And then those artful consultants and pollsters and media strategists, who frankly, in my view have polluted the American political system, will craft wonderful ads which will indicate that anyone who did not vote the right way somehow is against veterans, against the elderly, and against the poor.

Mr. President, I think some people around here are not listening. They are surely not reading my mail. I am looking forward to those votes, because I think there is a very unique way to tell the American people what those votes are really going to mean. To quote my friend, Paul Tsongas from Massachusetts, they will distinguish who in this body wishes to pander to special interest groups and who wishes to level with the American people.

With a country whose deficit is approaching the three-quarters of a billion mark within the terms of many Members on this floor, how can this body refuse to adopt this modest proposal?

What does this proposal do? It does not cut anything. It simply says that 2 years from now this Congress will be faced with caps on the major entitlement programs. Those caps will not be caps in a traditional sense. They will be current services, plus inflation, plus new eligibility.

We are going to say to the Senate Finance Committee and to the other committees that during that time we must find the ways and means to control the unabated growth of these programs. In the meantime, we are freezing discretionary spending, further cutting defense, and taking that defense money and putting it into very closely targeted programs, with which most of us in this Chamber, including the other side of this aisle, agree.

However, what we will be accused to today, before this day is over, is somehow favoring the rich, wanting to hurt the poor, wanting to hurt veterans, and further evolve this country into a class-warfare consciousness.

Mr. President, I do not think that is fair. I do not think it is reasonable. I do not think it is honest. Let us look down the road about 6 or 7 years if this is not done. The deficit of the United States will be somewhere around three quarters of a trillion for 1 year—1 year. The debt of the country will be approximately the same as 1 year's gross national product.

When Third World countries achieve those kinds of statistics, the World Bank comes in and says: If you want to borrow more money, we are going to set down the terms and conditions for you to borrow that money.

Mr. President, we are not that far away. We are 4 or 5 years away from that happening here.

What is it that Senators NUNN, DOMENICI, ROBB, and others, and I, are proposing? We are simply saying let us set up a system to review these entitlements on an annual basis, starting 2 years from today. I would ask the opponents of this amendment to cite one economist in America, liberal or conservative, Democrat or Republican, academic or working economist, who will disagree that the single and fundamental problem facing America is the unabated growth of entitlement programs, period.

If there are those who think that the rich should pay more taxes, they might find some agreement on this side of the aisle. They will find very little agreement to simply doing that and doing nothing else, because that money will be consumed in the blink of an eyelash. There is not enough wealth in this country amongst the rich to hold back the growth of these entitlement programs.

It is kind of interesting. Back in 1985, we passed Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. It was overwhelmingly passed by both Houses of Congress and supported by Democrats and Republicans alike. There was a lot of gloom and doom about what that would do. But what it did was to literally take the unabated growth at that time of both defense and nondefense discretionary spending and freeze it in its tracks. It has now grown, basically, I believe—my friend from New Mexico will correct me if I am wrong—at the rate of inflation, roughly at the rate of inflation.

Nothing has been hurt, that I have seen. Oh, we would like more for education, and we would like more for health, and we would like more for research, but of course, the reason we do not have it is because the Federal budget is being consumed by the entitlement programs, many of which are going to middle-class Americans who can afford to pay more of their fair share, and it is time we tell them so.

It is like the Purolator ad: Are we going to pay them now, or are we going to pay them later? But if we pay them later, it is going to be under circumstances where, frankly, I would not want to be in this Chamber or the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue when you have to tell the American people we are going to have to seriously cut back on entitlements, on Federal retirement, on civil service retirement, on military retirement, and cut back on veterans benefits, because we cannot borrow the money to support our profligacy. That is where we are headed.

Do not listen to me. Read any of the pieces in all of the popular media in the last 2 weeks, by columnists of all political stripes, on this very single issue. They have said to the U.S. Congress: Either address these entitlement programs or you are not serious about deficit reduction.

Mr. President, I do not know what the rest of this morning will bring, but I am afraid it is going to bring more rhetoric which is somehow going to say that those of us who are trying to do something responsible on both sides of this aisle somehow want to favor the rich and hurt the poor. That is bunk.

I expect we will have a vote that will deal with veterans, and the vote, I suppose, will be cast such that we should exempt veterans benefits from this proposal. I suppose those of us who vote no on that would be considered antiveteran.

Mr. President, I am a veteran. I saw the people disabled when they were disabled. I care as deeply about them as I care about anyone.

I do not believe a program designed to save the economic future of this country can be conceived of as "anti" anything. It is pro-American, it is for our children, it is for our grandchildren. And I hope we do not have a lot of careless rhetoric around here that seems to indicate that simply asking to review these entitlement programs, to let them grow at a normal rate, and to charge those committees of the Congress with the jurisdiction of finding ways to control these rising costs somehow is anything but the height of responsibility.

A month ago, the Senator from New Mexico and I sat down and we talked about this. In fact, it was about the time that I spoke on this floor about this very subject. The Senator from New Mexico said, "You know, I do not think we can probably do this. It is an election year. We will get all sorts of election year rhetoric, all sorts of votes that we will be put to, and all 30-second sound bites and commercials that will be designed to embarrass people politically." I said to him, "You know, PETE, you are probably right." But I sense something going on that many people may also be sensing. It was present in the Tsongas campaign. It is present in the ground swell of support for Mr. Perot, of Texas, that is getting all sorts of national attention. It is present in much of the conversations going on in this country on the radio talk shows. People really do not want to listen to class warfare, they do not want to listen to political bickering between Republicans and Democrats. They are tired of the President bashing the Congress and they are tired of the Congress bashing the President. They would like us to get together and set forth a rational plan to start studying this issue.

What we are talking about here today is an amendment, offered by the four of us, that does nothing for 2 years. It gives the Senate Finance Committee 2 years, under the leadership it has, to start coming up with ways and means to address the health care crisis and other crises that we face. If we do not do it now, I am not sure when we will.

I do not believe for a moment that if a new President is elected this fall, which is a possibility, that he will support such a program. I am not sure that people of my own party would be happy to support it in a second George Bush term because they would be looking at the 1996 elections. But I submit to this body that there is a responsible and decent way to approach this problem and to explain to the American people that what we are trying to do is fix our financial condition for the long term, not in the short term.

Mr. RIEGLE. Will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. RUDMAN. I am pleased to yield.

Mr. RIEGLE. I thank the Senator for yielding.

I was interested in the point he made, apparently in the press conference yesterday that he participated in, that was the issue of growth, about whether or not there should be changes in the tax system. I take it that at least the Senator from New Hampshire indicated that he thought, as part of the overall solution, that that was an issue that did need attention. Am I correct?

Mr. RUDMAN. Let me state it accurately. My recollection is—as I can certainly speak for myself—I also believe I heard Senator NUNN, Senator ROBB, and Senator DOMENICI clearly. What we all said was the first thing we must do is take the obvious growth of this Federal budget, and find a way to control it. That is the first thing we ought to do. That is No. 1. We have 2 years to do that.

During that 2-year period, if we should find that we can not close the gap, then each of us will consider changes in the tax structure. Were I here, I would do that. But the time to do it is not now. If we do it now, we will, according to historical precedent, simply say, "Now we have raised taxes and we can let this continued program grow," and eventually we will eat up all the money. That is historically what happens.

Mr. RIEGLE. If I may say, I said prior to the time of his coming to the floor, if this concept were being offered in a large context where you were talking about changes in tax law, growth policy, I just say to the Senator, you can raise the same amount of tax revenue today that we are now raising and change whom you raise it from. There is a problem in that area. And in the bulk of these programs, the reductions that are being proposed here are not going to hit the people at the high-income levels in any degree we are talking about. They will exact a real price down the line for people who are in fairly tough economic circumstances. And, if you are going to come in with a plan of pain, I think there has to be fairness. You have to share the pain, and you have to apply it all the way around the equation. I asked if there was a component like that in here. There is no such component, as I understand it.

Mr. RUDMAN. Let me respond to my friend from Michigan with this statement: I disagree presumptively with your assumption. I disagree that people at the lower end of the income level will be hurt by what we are trying to do. That is precisely what we are not trying to do. When we talk about means-tested programs, we are certainly not talking about people with no means.

Second, the people at the higher income scale virtually have no benefit in these programs, period. If you want them to pay more taxes, in some context that may be OK, but that will not solve the problem.

I wonder, I really seriously wonder, if we came to this floor with a resolution in a slightly different form that said that we would now not just do it by a sense-of-the-Senate resolution, but in fact we would put in here a component that would say we mandate the Senate Finance Committee to change the tax rates for all those with incomes over $150,000 and, in return for that, we will mandate a capping of entitlement programs today, would we get a majority on the other side? I ask that question.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator yield on that point?

Mr. RIEGLE. That is not what is being proposed.

Mr. RUDMAN. I am entitled to an answer. I do not think I will get an answer because I know the answer.

Mr. RIEGLE. Let us have the proposal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire has the floor.

Mr. RUDMAN. I yield to my friend from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. I thank the Senator. I appreciate his yielding.

As a matter of fact, he is about the only Senator on that side who has been willing to do that—I say that as an indication of respect for him.

Here is the problem that Senator RIEGLE has touched on. As we look out into the future, we have to be concerned about the deficit problem. The deficit comes from a number of sources. One is slow growth in the economy. If the economy grows at 3 percent rather than 2 percent, or 2 percent rather than 1 percent, that makes a very significant difference in your deficit problem. The deficit we are currently confronting has been added to significantly by the recession. The deficit we have been confronting has also been contributed to by the problems of the financial institutions, the payouts to the savings and loans and the banks. What the Senator is proposing sets a framework 2 years out. What he is proposing to do is to cap these various programs, and we ought to go down the list of what the programs are and appreciate how important they are to people's lives.

Senator RIEGLE's point, which I think is a very effective point, is that you are going to address the deficit by curtailing some benefits that are absolutely critical for some people—health care, supplementary security income, child nutrition—and for others, benefits that are essential to their opportunity and to the development of the society, like guaranteed student loans. There is no component in here for trying to address at least part of the deficit problem through recouping some of the enormous benefits in income that have flowed to the people at the top of the income scale as a result of the tax cut of the 1980's.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time yielded to the Senator from New Hampshire has expired.

Mr. RUDMAN. I ask my friend from New Mexico for additional time.

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield 10 minutes.

Mr. SARBANES. If we were taxing the top 1 percent of the country, which has 13 percent of the income, at the average rates of 1977, there would be an additional $40 billion in tax receipts from that source alone. That is not confiscatory, and that is just the top 1 percent of our population.

Then you have defense. As I understand your defense figures, 5 years from now we will be at $275 billion. We are at $290 billion today. Is that correct?

Mr. NUNN. If the Senator will yield, I do not know the exact number where we would be, but I can get that for you. We are proposing exactly almost what the chairman of the Armed Services Committee in the House proposed. We are proposing, over 5 years, only $15 billion less in cuts than the majority leader, Senator MITCHELL, proposed.

Mr. SARBANES. I understand that. We are trying to figure out how to address this deficit in the future and what the various sources are, which can make a contribution to deficit reduction.

Mr. SARBANES. The point I am making is that your own plan has a figure for defense, 5 years from now, of 275. The current figure is 290. I agree with the Senator that you are not going to be able to deal with the deficit from one source only. But this defense contribution, in my judgment, would be inadequate, and you are doing nothing on the tax side.

Mr. RUDMAN. Let me respond to my friend. Unless my friend from Georgia wants to clarify that.

Mr. NUNN. Just a response. The Senator's $275 billion is correct. The Senator should take note that this is lower than the defense number in the resolution at this point.

Mr. SARBANES. I understand that. We are projecting into the future and trying to find what are the sources that will help to address the deficit. You have a resolution now which essentially says that the source is going to be out of these programs. Your defense source is to go to 275. You have nothing in there on the tax side, and your growth assumptions are very meager and anemic.

They may be right, and they may not. But that is an important component of how you deal with the deficit. What you have done is put front and center only these programs, and the people who depend upon them. When we talk about them, we ought to name them by name. We ought to go through the programs to see their impact.

Mr. RUDMAN. We intend to.

Mr. SARBANES. And not the defense, not the tax, not the growth possibilities, all of which should and could and ought to be an important component of any deficit reduction strategy.

Mr. RUDMAN. I thank my friend. How much time do I have left?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 8 minutes remaining.

Mr. RUDMAN. I will use some of that. Let me respond to my friend from Michigan and my friend from Maryland. The Senator from Maryland made a very telling point, telling not for his argument, but for my argument. His telling point, is one that I think no one can disagree with.

The Senator stated that we could raise those rates back to their old rates, and we would get an additional $40 billion. I say, maybe we can raise them double that, and we could raise $80 billion.

The fact is that under all of the projections, that $80 billion will be sucked up by the growth of entitlement programs above population, above inflation, in about 3 years. Somehow I am missing something. I see the chairman of the Senate Finance Committee on the floor. That committee has enormous power. It has broad jurisdiction. What we are saying is simply this: Over 2 years, you and the other committees with concurrent jurisdiction should find ways and means—and certainly a health care reform package is part of it, a major part of it—to see how much of this growth above inflation and population we can control.

As a matter of fact, I do not know if the Senator from New Mexico quoted the statistic or not, but I believe the figure is that there will be $800 billion of entitlement growth over the next 5 years, of which roughly $347 billion is above and beyond what ought to be from population growth and from inflation; $347 billion.

Mr. SARBANES. If the Senator will yield for a question. When the Senator says "inflation," is he talking about the general rate of inflation?

Mr. RUDMAN. Yes. And, obviously, the medical rate of inflation is much higher.

Mr. SARBANES. The component of this package is health care. We all know that the health care rate of inflation has been substantially higher.

Mr. RUDMAN. Exactly. That is our point. We are simply saying—

Mr. SARBANES. Your are not holding people harmless by saying you are giving them inflation if you are giving them the general rate of inflation for health care costs, which have significantly exceeded the general rate of inflation.

Mr. RUDMAN. What we are saying is, in 2 years, the Senate Finance Committee, and other committees with concurrent jurisdiction, ought to report back to this body whether or not this target of baseline cost over the next 2 years, plus inflation at the general rate, plus a delta of 2 percent, plus new eligibility, is something we can live within. If we cannot, I have no doubt that that committee would recommend new revenue. And I voted for new revenue before, and would I be here again, I would vote for it again.

Mr. RUDMAN. But only if there was some effort to control costs. That is my underlying point. The Senator from Maryland said it better than I can say it. You can raise $40 billion, $50 billion, $80 billion in new taxes, and it disappears into a great black hole, unless effort is made to control the growth of these entitlements. That is all we are saying.

We are not saying do it today or next year. We are saying in 2 years from today, we ought to have a plan before us to see whether or not the cap works. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], has a health plan that is very interesting. The Senator from Kansas [Mrs. KASSEBAUM] has an extraordinarily interesting plan. Somehow, some way, we ought to be able to do something in this body in 2 years.

Is that asking too much?

Mr. RIEGLE. If the Senator will yield, I do not think it is. I think we can do something this year. We have these plans. Here is a health care plan, here. I mean, this issue ought to be dealt with. Unfortunately, we are not dealing with it.

I might just say, if the Senator will yield for another moment, the $40 billion that he speaks about of the amount of tax revenue that can be raised by having a fairer and, I think, larger tax on people in the high income levels, in effect to understand the hole we are now in, you have to back the train up and see what happened each year during the 1980's. The revenue loss year by year, in 1982, 1983, 1984, 1985, 1986, 1987, has been cumulative, and the money we have had to borrow and the interest we are paying on it, which is compounding, the hole we dug ourselves into, in part because of an absence of tax fairness and insufficient revenue coming into the Government, cannot be solved in 1 year.

The Senator is quite right. Nor can it be solved with one source. Nor should we think in those terms. But here is the problem now. When you lead with the chins of this crowd—to come back and look at these programs, and in fact, we have a letter from the head of the Paralyzed Veterans of America, and this is a man of conscience; he is representing the people that he represents. And he has concerns about these cuts and the others. The question is, why are we putting this cluster of programs and people on the front line now for the sacrifice, when we do not have the health care plan? In fact, we do not even have a proposal, quite frankly, from the administration. We do not have these other things ready to go, and we passed a tax plan, but it was vetoed, and there is no alternative. So what we are saying is that although we cannot get the whole plan together, let us take a group which includes a vast number of what I call "the walking wounded" and say: Look, we cannot get the other parts of it done. We do not even have a plan right now for doing the rest of it, but we are going to ask you to do your part.

Mr. RUDMAN. Mr. President, I am going to reclaim my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from New Hampshire has expired.

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield 5 additional minutes to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. RUDMAN. I will try not to use all of it. Let me just make a couple of observations. The Senator from Michigan is correct that we do not have a plan before us. That is precisely why this is a 2-year delay.

If we really were concerned about this, we ought to do something about it today. But we will not, for a whole variety of reasons. No one is speaking about cutting anybody. We are talking about a plan that will take entitlements, at their levels in 2 years, add inflation, population growth, and add 2 percent, and by that time, hopefully, these plans will have developed.

I happen to believe it will take a year or two for this Congress to finally agree on massive rehabilitation of whatever it is that is wrong with the health care system that causes its rate of inflation to be so much higher than general inflation. That is the first point.

The second point I want to make is—some statistics on taxes I agree with, and some I do not—the fact is that this Congress has done a pretty good job on both sides of the aisle of spending a good deal of money that we should not have spent. Unfortunately, that is not the problem. This year interest is the third largest item in the budget. It will be, I believe, the second largest item in 2 years. The chairman of the Appropriations Committee has been talking about how little is left for us to appropriate. As a matter of fact, I believe, but I do not have the figure in front of me, the total discretionary spending, nondefense was $210 billion to $215 billion this year, and interest is about $201 billion. Talk about a world being turned upside down. Something is wrong when the Appropriations Committee, with all of the legitimate needs of the country, gets squeezed out so badly that we have roughly the same amount of money to spend as we pay in interest.

Why? Not necessarily because of tax decreases. But largely because, if you look at the consumption of the normal growth each year, it is being largely consumed by growth in entitlement programs which nobody disagrees are needed by those people who receive them. All we are trying to say on this amendment is that there has to be a better way, and we have 2 years to find it.

On that note I would simply say that I am delighted this discussion is taking place this morning. It is the single most important discussion we have had to get this country back on track, to get the unemployed back to work, and to get real interest rates down. To protect the economic security of America we must deal with the deficit. Until and unless we deal with entitlements, we never will. I thank the Chair and yield back the time the Senator gave me.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I rise in support of the amendment offered by my colleague from New Mexico, Senator DOMENICI, and I want to commend him for this courageous and farsighted proposal.

Mr. President, as we grapple with this divisive and painful issue of the Federal deficit, I call to mind something once said by Abraham Lincoln, in his "House Divided" speech.

If we could first know where we are, and whither we are tending, we could then better judge what to do, and how to do it.

That is indeed what we should be about. I have listened to my colleagues as many of them have attempted to describe how we got here. Some have called attention to the increases in defense spending in the early part of the last decade. Some have cited tax legislation. Others have talked about runaway entitlement spending.

We will continue to have that debate, and it will be a good one. But it will not by itself answer the question of "where we are, and whither we are tending."

Where we are is in a sea of debt totaling nearly $4 trillion. And in a sea of frustration as well.

Every Member of this Congress is haunted by what will soon happen to this Nation's economy if we continue to practice business as usual. All of us, on both sides of the aisle, are tormented by our inability to get the deficit under control. Conscientious and committed Senators are voluntarily leaving this body in frustration over our inability to forestall what is coming.

Under the Constitution, Congress is granted the "power of the purse." Yet we feel powerless. Who until recently would have ever imagined that we could cut defense spending, freeze international spending, have only moderate increases in domestic spending, and yet see our annual deficit grow by tens of billions?

That brings me to the controversial entitlements cap provisions of this amendment. It is a frightening and troubling idea to everyone—even though it is not in any way a final commitment. Other legislation will be required to make it law.

First, just a quick word about what this amendment is and what it isn't. It doesn't affect Social Security; let everyone hear that. It doesn't enforce a sequester—in fact, it has no enforcement mechanism. It does not even require cuts—although in Washington we call any form of controlled spending growth a cut. This cap would allow entitlement spending to grow with inflation, with the number of recipients, and even with a margin of error—a cushion—above that.

I have heard it said that this amendment will not "solve any problems." Of course it won't—no budget resolution does. Here we are merely trying to take control of runaway spending; here is where we acknowledge the fact that we do not have unlimited funds to spend without regard for the Nation's future.

Mr. President, it is difficult to avoid hyperbole when talking about this problem. But it is that serious. We all know the unspoken and troubling truth—of what projected entitlement spending will do to the Federal deficit.

It is easy to dismiss the talk show hosts who howl about foreign aid and congressional salaries—we all understand that those are symbolic issues, and have a negligible impact on the deficit.

It is harder to stall the momentum of other ideas—that all we need to do is to cut defense. That all we need to do is to control pork-barrel spending. That all we need to do is to get the rich to pay their fair share.

Those are all important issues—I do not intend to criticize those who raise them.

But we all know we could slash defense by billions in excess of what the President proposed. We could squeeze dry all domestic discretionary spending. We could—and did, in 1990—pass various revenue-raising measures.

But we all know that unless we do this—unless we control entitlement spending—the deficit will continue to grow—uncontrollably.

I cannot look at the numbers which project our Nation's fiscal future without recoiling in horror. Unless we do something, our annual deficit will be $1.038 trillion in the year 2010.

I would say to my colleagues that this could well be an optimistic projection. This assumes that our economy doesn't buckle from sustaining a debt of that size. This assumes that there is no major crisis in an area like the banking industry. This assumes that we don't undertake major initiatives in education or child care. This assumes that we don't fight a war.

That is "whither we are tending" unless we take drastic action to reform the way we handle mandatory spending—the money we spend each year by formula, which isn't authorized, isn't appropriated, isn't prioritized, and often isn't meantested.

Mr. President, I have constituents who come to my office every day to say—help us. Extend this tax credit. Continue this program.

Sometimes these constituents have their children with them. I look at these kids and I am disgusted and disheartened to think of what we are doing to them—ironically, in the name of "compassion" for our fellow man.

Where is our compassion for our children? And their children?

And it is so unnecessary. If our national entitlement programs simply grew in proportion to the number of recipients, with inflation taken into account, by the year 2010 we could actually be looking at $990 billion annual surplus.

Again, I think that is optimistic—I think there are variables at work that make it impossible to project that. But the point remains that the difference between that scenario and doing nothing—continuing down our current path—is about $2 trillion a year.

And $2 trillion difference in the deficit could easily be the difference between survival and economic collapse.

I ask my colleagues to remember: No matter what party you belong to, or what might be your policy priorities, we are all on the same side of this one. My conservative colleagues have nightmares about the tax burden which would imperil the American economy as it tries to meet those spending demands. My friends on the other side are equally concerned. A debt of that size would leave nothing for us to spend on the physical infrastructure—roads, water works, schools—that the distinguished President pro tempore has vividly shown to be so vital. That debt would leave nothing for the causes espoused by my colleague from Minnesota, who has spoken out so urgently for spending on education and health care for our children.

We all lose—every one of us—in that scenario.

I ask my colleagues to acknowledge with me—with the Senator from New Mexico—that we have no option. Either we control entitlement spending, or we destroy the chances of our descendants to lead a decent life. That is not, as my colleagues well know, an exaggeration.

And yet this is so difficult—because entitlement spending generally provides that which we believe all of our citizens are "entitled" to—either because it is a basic human right or because it has been promised to them. Health care, unemployment compensation, veterans' benefits, retirement income—the spending we truly hold most dear.

But I would say to my colleagues—this may be our last chance to do this fairly and humanely. The longer we wait, the more draconian the cuts will be when they eventually come; and they will come; there is no avoiding that.

If we can do this now, we at least stand a chance. We stand a chance that whatever limits on spending are imposed will only affect wealthy recipients of Federal aid, or will only force systemic reforms that would be desirable in any event.

Not all entitlement spending is the same. Certain categories of benefits—Social Security—Federal retirement—veterans benefits—do not grow significantly out of pace with inflation and with the number of recipients.

If we reform entitlement spending now, there is a chance that these programs will not be affected, because they are not the real problem.

If we wait a decade or two, that will not be the case. Then when it comes time for our children to collect their benefits, the Nation will say—we are sorry; we are bankrupt.

The distinguished majority leader has noted that an entitlements cap would affect Medicare and Medicaid, because that's where the increases are.

Medicaid increased 38.1 percent in this year alone. It is expected to increase 15.8 percent a year for the next 5 years. Medicare is expected to increase by 11.7 percent over the next 5 years. That has nothing to do with Reaganomics—that is a product of the uncontrolled way that we provide health care.

I share the majority leader's concern that an entitlement cap is going to mean a lot of attention to programs like this that are so completely out of control.

And I will agree with the majority leader—if we are going to control entitlement spending, that is going to force us to completely restructure the way we provide health care if we're going to meet the needs of those dependent on those programs.

But we cannot avoid this or any part of our responsibility. We have a responsibility to reform our health care system, and we have an equal responsibility to control Government spending so that our children have something to inherit other than poverty and despair.

I would suggest to my colleagues that it is not an expression of compassion to say that we can't afford to cap runaway entitlement spending. Senator RIEGLE of Michigan was down here today expressing his concern for the needy who depend on Medicare. It is precisely because of those needy that we must do something to get this under control. Four-fifths of entitlement spending is not means-tested. If we act soon, we can confine the hardships to those who would not qualify for this assistance solely on the basis of need.

But if we continue to delay—then there will be nothing left for the needy in a few years. Tax hikes, defense cuts, domestic spending cuts—none of that will save them, and we all know that. Every year of late, we have been squeezing the appropriations committees and watching the deficits soar nonetheless. We will have nothing left for the needy or the wealthy in 15 years—and there will be many more needy people by then if we do not change our ways.

That is what this amendment is about. Yes, we do have an obligation to our elderly, and to our veterans. But we also dishonor our veterans by destroying the country that they fought to save. There is still time to meet our obligation to these people, and to meet our obligation to our descendants. But that time is running out.

I thank my colleagues and I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee is recognized.

Mr. SASSER. The distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee has been waiting here for some time. I yield to him 10 minutes.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, I thank the Senator very much.

There is no question but that there is explosive growth in entitlements, that concern is shared by every Member of this Senate, and I understand that. But if you are talking about putting an aggregate cap on these programs, it really will not work. If you look at where the explosive growth has taken place, it is not in all of these programs but it is in Medicare and it is in Medicaid. CBO projects that over the next 10 years you will see a further increase of the percentage of the GDP that goes to Medicare and Medicaid from 3.4 to 5.9 percent, an increase of over 60 percent.

But let's take a look at the other entitlements and see what is happening there. CBO projects an actual reduction of 1 percent in the GDP for these programs and that includes Social Security. That is why an aggregate cap on entitlements just will not work.

The proposal before us is a procedural solution similar to what we did under Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, which I supported and I voted for. But let me remind my colleagues, that when we enacted GRH we had a $200 billion deficit, as I recall, and today it is something approaching $400 billion.

What we have to do is address the underlying problem that is driving the growth in entitlement spending. Let me state that in the Finance Committee we have in part. What we have done by cooperating with the administration, we have worked to enact the Medicare prospective payment system with its approximately 500 DRG's in 1983, and physician payment reform, 3 years ago. We legislated those changes in Medicare. In doing so, we put the Federal Government substantially ahead of the private sector when it comes to cost containment in health care. There is much more that is going to have to be done.

We are continuing to see explosive growth taking place in health care generally. Yet according to CBO, Medicare costs per capita are growing at a rate of 2 percent lower per year than they are in private insurance.

Take a look at what we have done in Medicare with respect to hospital stays. Hospital stays in this country today are the lowest of any major industrial nation. We have made some progress there through the Medicare payment system.

We are going to start hearings on May 6 and May 7 in the Finance Committee to further address the problems of cost containment for health care in this country, including Medicare and Medicaid. But when we move to contain costs, let us understand what is happening. Today over 60 percent of the hospitals in this country are losing money on Medicare. Fewer and fewer doctors want to see Medicare patients.

I am interested to note in looking at this list of 56 Senators who sponsor a piece of legislation, S. 1810, that would increase Medicare payments to physicians by $5.7 billion, amongst them sponsors of this resolution. S. 1810 was important to these Senators, I feel sure, because of the problem we are having particularly in some of the Southern and Western States of getting physicians to agree to see Medicare patients.

The CBO has found that the problem of growth in entitlements spending is really a manifestation of the rapid rise in the cost of medical care. Thus the abstract concept of an entitlement cap cannot be turned into reality without squarely addressing the underlying problem of health care cost.

Bob Reischauer, CBO Director, in testimony before the Finance Committee indicated that attacking health care costs through Medicare and Medicaid reductions alone is just not the answer to the problem. A cap on Medicare and Medicaid, is not the way to address the underlying problems of the health care system. What has to be done is not to impose an aggregate cap over all entitlements which differ dramatically in their rates of growth.

Reducing Medicare and Medicaid expenditures through entitlement caps will make the overall health care problem even more difficult by increasing the cost of private health care.

On May 6 we are going to start hearings at which we will listen to those who want to reform the health care system using the play or pay approach, those who want the single-payer approach, those who want a tax-based approach, like the administration, to make their case. There is no question in my mind but that we need a total reform of the health care system in this country to get costs under control.

When businesses like Ford Motor Co. have to dedicate 20 percent of their labor costs to health care their competitiveness in the international markets is put at risk. What is happening to small businesses and their employees is a tragedy, and that is one of the reasons that, along with 26 of my colleagues, I introduced and we passed through the Finance Committee S. 1872 which addresses some of the problems of job loss, affordability and red lining of companies in an effort to improve access to health care and to increase the affordability of care for the small employer. S. 1872 also includes an increase to 100 percent of the tax deduction of the health care premiums for the self-employed. So, once again, I believe that to attempt a procedural remedy for these kinds of deficit problems instead of getting to the root of the problem of escalation in health care costs, would be a serious mistake.

I think one of the reasons we are facing $400 billion deficits today is because we adopted a procedural solution to the deficit problem and ducked dealing with the real issue. And this entitlement cap suffers from the same defect, a procedural solution to cure the fundamental problems associated with the growth in entitlement costs.

What is needed is to address the real cause of the problem. In talking to an outstanding authority on this the other day, Dr. Altman, I was interested to hear that he attributes much of the problem of cost to overutilization of expensive and high technology in the treatment of patients. He pointed out that the growing numbers of uninsured persons is having a profound effect in the growth of private sector health care costs.

The other day I was at the dedication of Texas Children's Hospital. They told me they had $43 million last year of uncompensated health care. Who do you think pays for that? You pay for it, those of you with health insurance, those who have the money to go to the doctors and to the hospital.

So obviously we have to deal with a pervasive problem of cost by reforming the health care system to promote cost containment and more cost-effective delivery of health care services. We have the best hospitals, the best doctors, and the most sophisticated technology in the world. We have the best medical care available in this country to those who can afford it. But once again we have an extraordinary system for which all are paying a price. That price is an alarming rate of growth in the percentage of the GDP of our country dedicated to health care and it will not be corrected by imposing an arbitrary cap on entitlement programs. We have to get to the underlying problem and not be diverted by a procedural approach to it. I think that proposal we are debating is a diversion. I think that if approved, it will lull us into thinking that we have dealt with the problem and gives us a false sense of security that more serious action can be avoided.

I would say to my colleagues on the issue of these hearings that start on May 6 and May 7—we will look at proposals for capping health care expenditures but I will tell you where the chairman is on that approach. I do not think that focusing only an entitlement programs gets to the underlying problem and I think we have to deal with cost containment itself on a more comprehensive basis.

When I listen to the head of OMB talking about health expenditures being from 13 to 14 percent of our GDP now going over 17 percent by the year 2000. I agree with Dick Darman that that is unsustainable. So what we are facing is the need to undertake a major reform of the health care system in this country. And the Finance Committee will be working to bring that about at the earliest possible time.

So, Mr. President, I understand the concern of the Members of both sides of this aisle over the escalation in the entitlement costs, but frankly I do not believe that this proposal will bring about the desired change. Putting an aggregate cap on entitlements makes no sense when there are substantial differences in growth rates of these various programs. Why put all entitlement programs at risk of a sequester when the real growth is occurring in health care programs?

We have to get to the underlying problem and we will address the Senator's concern as we try to bring about a comprehensive solution to the health care cost problem.

Mr. DOMENICI. Could I ask a question of the chairman?

Mr. BENTSEN. Yes.

Mr. DOMENICI. First, I want to thank him very much for his thoughtful remarks and for the statement he has made that clearly we have to do something about mandatory expenditures. I wonder if the proposal that we have before the Senate, if the Senator understands it as I do.

Would it be helpful, do you think, as you look at health reform, would it be helpful if the U.S. Congress deliberated and said that, looking at everything, we have—I am going to pick a number—$400 billion that we can expend and we say to the Finance Committee, would you tailor a national program so that we spend no more than $400 billion?

You see, I believe that the job of the Finance Committee, under the chairman's marvelous leadership, would be easier and would serve the public and the fiscal policy better if he knew in advance how much we could spend of tax dollars, because it is not hard to know that we cannot spend a trillion dollars a year on Medicare and Medicaid combined. It is easy to know that we cannot spend $700 billion, because you just add it up and the deficit will be out the roof. So at some point there is a number.

Actually I tailored this for 2 years. Some people wanted it to go in next year. It is 2 years before any real impact on the collective mandatory expenditures occurs during which time committees have hearings, chairmen like Senator BENTSEN look at various reform programs, start to assess how much we can afford and frankly I thought it would be helpful to be honest.

Mr. BENTSEN. I say to the Senator, I do not think an aggregate cap works because of the differences among growth rates in programs in the entitlement category. There is no question that our biggest cost escalation problem is in Medicaid and Medicare but that growth is attributable to the underlying increase in health care costs generally.

As we consider total reform of the health care system and its delivery, one of the issues we will discuss is an overall ceiling on the amount of money to be spent on health care in the country. But at the same time, I must say to the Senator that an aggregate cap like this that affects only public expenditures, I really do not think it solves the problem—in fact, it will increase costs to the private sector.

Mr. DOMENICI. I thank the chairman.

Might I just conclude by saying to him by way of a question, frankly, I did not think it would be easier to get a budget resolution through that had a spending ceiling if we only put that ceiling on Medicare and Medicaid. I thought people would be down here saying that is the wrong way to do it.

Mr. BENTSEN. Well, I would think that. I think what we have to address is the problem, and we have addressed some of it through reforms in Medicare and Medicaid and we have made some headway. We are substantially ahead of the private sector in cutting costs of hospital stays, for example. But to the extent that Medicare and Medicaid cut costs, hospitals, doctors, and other providers push over into the private sector the losses they experience because Medicare and Medicaid pay less than what it costs to treat these patients. In other words, you are seeing the shift of the cost burden and that adds to our problems by increasing the cost of private insurance and privately purchased care. In effect it is an extra tax that most people are paying to make up for the fact that Medicare and Medicaid pay a discounted rate.

The Finance Committee will soon be addressing the underlying problems. We will be talking about the comprehensive reform of the health care system.

I yield back the remainder of such time allocated to me.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee is recognized.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, how much time do we have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 45 minutes and 44 seconds and the Senator from New Mexico has 20 minutes and 58 seconds.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I yield 10 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts.

(Mr. KOHL assumed the chair.)

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I strongly oppose the Domenici substitute amendment. It pretends to limit entitlement spending to reasonable levels—but it flunks any meaningful truth-in-advertising test. Stripped of its bureaucratic jargon and budgetary disguise, it is nothing more than a Trojan horse assault on older Americans and poor Americans who are sick and need health care. Opponents of Medicare and Medicaid do not dare slash those programs directly, so they are making this devious attempt to do it indirectly.

Let's look at the record on the many different entitlements covered by this amendment. Over the past decade, if Medicare and Medicaid are excluded, entitlement spending has actually been growing slower than the consumer price index. If we look at the impact of this amendment over the 4-year period 1994-97, Medicaid and Medicare will be $68 billion over the proposed cap—and all other entitlements will be $15 billion under the cap.

These figures make the bottom line painfully clear. If this substitute amendment passes, we will be in the position of either cutting $68 billion out of Medicare and Medicaid, or else unfairly slashing that amount from many other entitlement programs that are in no way responsible for the excessive growth in entitlement spending.

I urge the Senate to reject this kind of arbitrary cut. We are talking about harsh and unjustified reductions in school lunches and school breakfasts for hungry children; food stamps for needy families; student loans for college students; income assistance for the poorest senior citizens and those who are blind and disabled. This amendment asks us to cut each of those programs—all because hospital and medical costs are out of control. Will the Senate condone deep cuts in retirement benefits of veterans and civil servants—all because this nation has failed to enact a sensible national health care policy?

We shouldn't even take the Domenici meat-ax to Medicare and Medicaid themselves, even though they are the source of the entitlement problem. This amendment is the wrong remedy, because it makes the elderly and the poor bear the burden, instead of the hospitals and physicians and insurance companies who are causing the entitlement spending crisis.

We know that hard-pressed States are already cutting back on Medicaid in terms of both eligibility and benefits. Thirty-six million Americans have no health insurance and the number is rising every year. Medicaid is a badly frayed safety net, but it is the only health protection available today to the poor and the uninsured. Surely, this is no time to cut back further. Even during the Reagan years, Congress rejected an equally harsh administration proposal to cap Medicaid. We should not make the same mistake today that we refused to make in the 1980's.

Deeper cuts in Medicare would be equally unjustified. Today, Medicare already pays hospitals 10-percent less than the cost of caring for elderly patients. The gap between Medicare payment levels and private payment levels continues to widen. In general, every dollar cut from Medicare means a dollar more in additional costs for average citizens and for business—because health care providers are quietly recouping what they do not get from Medicare by shifting costs to other patients.

Cuts in Medicare are not only a false economy—they are also hazardous to the health of senior citizens. As the gap grows between what private patients pay and what the Government pays for senior citizens, hospitals and doctors are beginning to view the elderly as second class citizens. Many physicians now refuse to accept additional Medicare patients. We enacted Medicare in the 1960's to stop this kind of cruelty, and we should not open the door to its return in the 1990's.

It is shameful that the poor and the uninsured are so often denied the services they need because they cannot pay. It will be doubly shameful if the same fate befalls senior citizens because the Federal Government fails to keep the promise of Medicare.

There is a better solution than the Domenici substitute. We know how to stop the skyrocketing growth in the cost of Medicare and Medicaid, and stop it fairly. It is a solution that is long overdue. We need comprehensive health care reform that meets two fundamental tests. It must guarantee basic health insurance for every American. And it must put in place a comprehensive program to control soaring health costs—not a program that simply slashes Federal health spending, while leaving the basic cause of the inflationary spiral in the current system unchanged.

I urge all Senators to join in working for this kind of fundamental reform, and to reject the non-solution proposed by the Domenici amendment. Without fundamental health care reform, an entitlement cap is not a true saving to the Government—it is an attack on the elderly, the poor, and the average American as well.

In addition, I join many other Senators in expressing my concern that this budget resolution, even without the Domenici amendment that would make it worse, is already unequal to the serious national challenges we face. The resolution we are considering does not provide adequate funding to revive economic growth, or make the long-term domestic investments needed to restore true prosperity.

Unfortunately, the shape of this resolution is dictated by our earlier failure to break down the walls between defense and domestic spending. I voted with the majority of the Senate in favor of removing the walls, and with the vast majority of Democrats for deeper cuts in Pentagon spending. But a Republican filibuster and lock-step Republican opposition has prevented us so far from altering the now-obsolete 1990 budget amendment. As a result, we cannot make sensible reductions in defense spending and use those reductions to pay for greater economic stimulus and needed domestic investment.

There is no question that deficit reduction is a necessary long-term goal. But reducing fiscal stimulus now, in the face of continued economic stagnation, makes no economic sense at all.

This economy is not out of the woods by any means. Last month's national unemployment rate of 7.3 percent is the highest rate since the recession began, the highest in 6 years. In Massachusetts, unemployment jumped to 9.1 percent last month, in a serious setback for our State economy.

Hope springs eternal. There are tentative signs of recovery today, but there were similar signs a year ago, and they turned out to be a mirage. Few experts believe, without a change in current policy, that any growth we achieve now will be robust enough to create significant numbers of new jobs. And without new jobs, this economy will continue to sputter along, and could well fall back into further recession.

This danger has been recognized by the vast majority of experts. Most recently, it has been stated publicly—in clear and unmistakable terms—by over 100 leading economists, including 6 Nobel Prize winners. Last week, those economists issued an open letter to the President, Congress, and the Federal Reserve, calling for lower interest rates, tax credits for business investment, and $50 billion in new assistance this year for hard-pressed State and local governments.

These economists recognize the short-term priority and the long-term problem facing the American economy. Their analysis concludes that it makes sense to use both fiscal and monetary policy to provide additional economic stimulus now, and to structure the fiscal part of that stimulus in a way that lets us begin to make the long-term investments we need in human resources, infrastructure, and productive business growth.

As their letter concludes: "The Nation cannot afford the economic waste and human distress of protracted high unemployment. We can put America back to work, and we can do it in ways that will enable our workers to be more and more productive in years to come."

That is the spirit which should be driving our efforts to enact this budget resolution and achieve a sensible economic program. The longer we delay, the deeper the hole we are digging for the economy and the more difficult it will be to restore growth and prosperity.

In January, I introduced legislation to provide such a stimulus. Other Senators, especially Senator SASSER and Senator SARBANES, have advocated similar actions. But our Republican colleagues are adamant against it.

The President and his advisers continue to look through rose-colored glasses. They refuse to modify their do-nothing policies that have resulted in the worst record of economic growth since World War II. Rigid ideology, not practical experience, is driving their decisions—and driving the economy into the ground. This lack of national leadership makes it impossible for Congress to do what is needed. We cannot do the job alone.

The only sound test of economic policy is whether it works. If the current policy does not work, try something else. Well, the current policy has not worked. It did not work for Herbert Hoover; it did not work for Ronald Reagan; and it will not work for George Bush. Without sensible stimulus and sensible investments in the future, America's economic performance and standard of living will continue to suffer.

Finally, it is clear that as a Nation, we have been under-investing for the past decade compared to our major international competitors. We have no one to blame but ourselves for the decade of poor economic performance the Nation has endured.

United States private investment as a percentage of GNP was at 18 percent during the 1980's, compared to 29 percent in Japan. Investment in research and development has been stagnant or declining, in sharp contrast to our major economic competitors.

We are also failing to maintain our public investments. About 25 percent of America's capital stock is owned by Federal, State, and local governments. But we are not investing enough even to maintain that stock, let alone improve it. In the late 1960's, infrastructure investment peaked at around 4 percent of gross domestic product. During the 1980's, it fell to just over 2 percent.

In the 1980's, Federal spending on education and training fell by 40 percent; on the environment, by 39 percent; on roads and transportation, by 32 percent.

This abdication of Federal responsibility has put unbearable pressure on State and local governments in recent years, and it has been a major factor in causing State and local taxes to rise. The fiscal squeeze on those governments, in turn, has become a major factor in prolonging the recession.

If we do not end the current squeeze and relieve these contractionary forces on State and local economies, the Nation's economy will not grow. The majority of the American work force will not have good jobs, or be able to participate in the American dream.

The handwriting is on the wall. You do not have to be a Nobel Prize-winning economist to understand that something is wrong. America continues to drift down the wrong track, because we are following the wrong economic policies.

As this debate has proved, Democrats have a better alternative, but we do not yet have the votes in Congress to enact it, let alone override a Presidential veto.

Nevertheless, it should be clear to all that the old order has failed. 1992 is like 1932 and 1960. We need new economic policies to lift this Nation out of the recession and begin restoring prosperity—and the sooner we adopt them, the sooner we will end this unacceptable slide.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the letter from the economists I mentioned and other materials may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AN OPEN LETTER TO PRESIDENT BUSH, MEMBERS OF CONGRESS, AND FEDERAL RESERVE CHAIRMAN GREENSPAN

The economists signing this letter urge you to take prompt measures to stimulate vigorous economic recovery in 1992-93 and at the same time to speed up productivity growth over the years ahead. We are afraid that many of the proposals you are now considering will fail to achieve either of these objectives, or will contribute to one at the expense of the other. Policies are available that will help on both counts.

We favor:

First, further reduction of interest rates by the Federal Reserve.

Second, tax credits for business plant and equipment investments.

Third, and importantly, a $50 billion-a-year program of federal assistance to state and local governments emphasizing public investment in education and infrastructure.

The Statement attached explains these recommendations and their rationale.

ECONOMISTS' STATEMENT

The U.S. economy faces both a short-run problem and a long-run problem. The two are quite different. For the immediate future the problem is temporary shortage of demand. The consensus forecast projects the economy to grow at a 3 percent rate in the second half of 1992. But even that would be at only half the speed we are entitled to expect in the first year after a long recession. For the longer run the prospect is slow growth of productivity and therefore slow growth of incomes, more and more unequally distributed between the best and worst off. Everyone agrees that the remedy for the long-run problem is more investment: in people, in infrastructure, in technology, and in machinery.

Expansionary Federal Reserve monetary policies have the virtue of stimulating spending in the short run on investments that pay off over the long run. We urge the "Fed" to cut interest rates still further. But the protracted weakness of the economy since 1989 signals unusual risks that monetary measures alone cannot produce a timely and healthy recovery. That is why it is prudent to adopt fiscal measures to help get the economy moving this year.

As Congress and the Administration decide on such policies, it is of overriding importance that they do it in a way that will not worsen the long-run problem. We believe that cutting income taxes is exactly the wrong approach. It would promote consumption, not investment. And although there is a case for a quick temporary tax cut, history tells us it would be almost impossible to reverse. Over-consumption is our chronic disease, not the cure.

Long before the recession wages had been falling behind inflation, far behind the aspirations of American workers. It is tempting to try to compensate for these disappointments by lowering taxes. But this is counterproductive. The only long-run solution is to raise the growth of productivity. Wages will follow. A far better vehicle for immediate stimulus is a program of federal assistance to state and local governments, aimed at increasing public investment in all forms, including education, which has suffered severely just at a time when improved and expanded education is widely recognized as an essential key to the future productivity and competitiveness of Americans. The long recession and stagnation in economic activity in the United States have devastated the finances of state and local governments. The prospect that economic recovery may be further delayed and will be weak when it occurs means that the fiscal crises of state and local governments will continue for at least two more years, probably longer.

Even before the recession began in 1990, these governments were being squeezed by declines in federal assistance, increases in costs of Medicaid and social services, deferred needs for infrastructure investments, and political constraints on taxation.

We believe, therefore, that the Congress should enact and the President should sign a program of additional federal assistance to state and local governments amounting to at least $50 billion a year (about 1 percent of GDP). This should be enacted immediately in order to provide timely financial assistance in 1992. The spending of these funds will help to stimulate the economy. Since the economy has idle resources of labor and capital available to meet additional spending with additional production and the threat of inflation is minimal, it is appropriate to let these expenditures add to the deficit financed by borrowing, and it would cancel most or all of the needed stimulus to aggregate demand if they were financed otherwise. In order to get the funds spent promptly, their distribution in 1992 should follow a simple formula with minimal conditions.

The long-run problems of our economy will not be solved in a year or two. The provision of federal aid to state and local governments should be part of a continuing long-run program. In later years, more elaborate targeting could be developed, to insure that the assistance is directed toward investment in people, knowledge, and productive infrastructure. Once the economy has substantially recovered, it will no longer be appropriate to pay for the program by federal borrowing. Instead, we propose that Congress and the President plan now to finance it by a combination of future cuts in defense spending and higher taxes. This program should not be allowed to interfere with continued reduction of the federal budget deficit.

Another measure that could help the economy in both short and long runs is the restoration of an investment tax credit, which served the economy well from 1962 to 1986. It would be far more effective than a reduction in the capital gains tax, because it can be more sharply focussed on new investment. Business investment spending will stimulate economic activity now, and the new plant and equipment will add to future productivity. A new ITC should be offered only for incremental investment above a recent base period and it might well be more generous for the coming two years of recovery than it would be permanently.

The nation cannot afford the economic waste and human distress of protracted high unemployment. We can put America back to work and we can do it in ways that will enable our workers to be more and more productive in years to come.

[From the New York Times, Mar. 31, 1992]
 ECONOMISTS SHIFTING PRIORITIES

(By Louis Uchitelle)

Prodded by three years of economic stagnation, a growing number of prominent economists are putting aside their criticism of the budget deficit as the worst of economic evils. Instead, they are advocating a temporary rise in the deficit to generate spending for public works that would put idle people and machinery back to work.

The latest evidence of the new priority appeared yesterday in an open letter made public in Washington and signed by more than 70 economists, some of whom said they would not have signed it even four months ago. Although a surge in retail sales has raised hopes that a recovery is finally under way, many economists say that without an injection of public spending, the recovery might not endure.

The letter, addressed to the Administration, Congress and the Federal Reserve, called for the quick outlay of $50 billion a year in Federal aid to state and local governments.

EFFORT WOULD FINANCE PROJECTS

The money would be borrowed by the Federal Government to expand education and to finance local public works projects that were halted or cut back for lack of local tax revenue. The right projects would pay for themselves, the letter said, "since the economy has idle resources of labor and capital available to meet additional spending with additional production."

"I signed that document because the infrastructure side of it, funneling money to education, highways and the like, is a key to generating solid economic growth," said Allen Sinai, chief economist at the Boston Company Economic Advisers. Until recently, Mr. Sinai had focused on the dangers of the budget deficit, which is expected to reach nearly $370 billion in the current fiscal year.

TEMPORARY SHIFT IN PRIORITIES

But the shift in priorities should be temporary, Mr. Sinai and other converts stress. Once the national economy is growing vigorously again, they will go back to criticizing the deficit as an intolerable burden for future generations—a view still widely held.

Nevertheless, for a growing group of mainstream economists, the priority has become the use of deficit spending to make the economy rebound after 36 months of nearly zero economic growth or outright recession.

"The right question for economists to ask is how to use resources productively, particularly idle resources, and if that leads to an increase in the deficit, so be it," said Allen H. Meltzer, an economist at Carnegie Mellon Institute and a scholar at the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative research organization. "I have said this before, but perhaps not as forcefully as I could have."

SPECTRUM OF VIEWPOINTS

This new emphasis on public spending as an economic stimulant, although by no means unanimous, is nevertheless showing up across the spectrum of economic viewpoints. It was evident in interviews with a dozen prominent economists late last week. All acknowledged the trend, although some, like Henry Kaufman, an economic consultant and the former chief economist at Salomon Brothers, said they themselves had not converted from viewing the deficit as the No. 1 enemy.

Their view is that deficit spending, by putting more money into circulation, increases inflation. Higher inflation, in turn, or just the prospect of it, prompts holders of bonds and Treasury securities to demand higher interest rates. And as higher rates spread through the economy, companies and consumers are discouraged from buying homes, cars and machinery on credit.

"There is a tendency lately among economists to disregard the credit markets," Mr. Kaufman said. "They have an important veto in all this." Rather than higher deficits, even temporarily, Mr. Kaufman wants to put pressure on the Federal Reserve to reduce rates another notch.

So do officials in the Administration, which has also proposed tax cuts for the middle class. Similarly, Gov. Bill Clinton of Arkansas, the leading candidate for the Democratic Presidential nomination, favors middle-class tax cuts—steering clear so far of the deficit-spending issue.

Another outspoken opponent of rising deficits, Charles L. Schultze, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution and chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers in the Carter Administration, bases his opposition mostly on concern that a temporary rise in deficit spending would become permanent in the hands of the Federal bureaucracy. But Mr. Schultze is beginning to waiver.

"I would like to wait a little longer to see if easier money—the recent decline in interest rates—will turn the trick," he said. "If it does not produce a satisfactory recovery, then we might have to do something with deficit spending."

SURVEY OF FORECASTERS

Reflecting this concern, 50 economic forecasters surveyed by the Blue Chip Economic Indicators now rate the deficit as of less importance than in 1988, the last year in which the American economy grew at an annual rate of more than 2 percent—the minimum considered necessary by economists to raise employment.

The chief sponsors of the letter made public yesterday in Washington were two Nobel laureates in economic science, Robert M. Solow of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and James Tobin of Yale University, themselves converts last fall.

"Most of us think that for the long run, the huge budget deficit and the inability of the country to reduce it are a serious economic problem," Mr. Solow said. "What has changed is that the recession has lasted a long time and the prospect is for a very slow recovery. Economists are prepared to say that there is a chance we will do more long-range damage by letting people sit in the puddle of economic stagnation than we will do if we have higher deficits temporarily."

CHANGES OF VIEWS

The letter encouraging this deficit spending was signed by at least half-a-dozen economists who would have declined to sign it three or four months ago, among them Mr. Sinai of the Boston Company; Jay Woodworth, chief economist at the Bankers Trust New York Corporation, and Roger E. Brinner, director of research at DRI/McGraw-Hill Inc., an economic consulting service.

Previously, they considered deficit spending for public works—the view that constructing, say, seaport projects pays for itself by expanding the nation's export capacity—too uncertain an economic stimulant to justify the risk of running up the national debt. And now they are giving ground.

"The deficit is still clearly a huge problem—that has not changed in my mind—but I am willing to let it slide up a few billion dollars in the short run, in order to make some progress in overall economic growth," Mr. Woodworth said.

SENSE OF URGENCY

And Mr. Brinner added: "I became very worried during the winter that people have lost faith in the economy, and that has increased my sense of urgency to do something. I would have preferred easier money—lower interest rates—rather than deficit spending to restore economic growth, but easier money is not forthcoming, so this is second best."

This new willingness to let the deficit grow is not shared by Alan Greenspan, the chairman of the Federal Reserve, who argues that a healthy recovery began to show itself last month in the sharp rise in retail sales and that deficit spending is therefore an unnecessary stimulant.

Indeed, the support for deficit spending would evaporate quickly if a full-blown recovery developed, said Paul Samuelson, another Nobel laureate, who until recently also opposed an increase in deficit spending. "No one wants to be caught favoring deficit spending when we are already in an expansion," he added.

[From the New York Times, Apr. 1, 1992]

BORROW MORE? YES. TO GROW

How's this for spit-in-your eye logic? Two weeks ago the Congressional Budget Office calculated that the already dismaying Federal deficit would rise this year by an alarming amount. Yet in the face of that, a group of 100 economists, including six Nobel laureates, calls on Congress to borrow billions more.

It may sound screwy, but in fact the call makes compelling economic sense. Yes, the stratospheric deficit needs to be controlled. But there are some things more important than reducing it quickly. What matters is less the size of the deficit than what the borrowed money is used to pay for. That's why the economists call for investing in infrastructure and education.

More public investments make sense in the short run, because they would help stimulate the economy out of recession. And they make even more sense in the long run by raising productivity and growth.

In an open letter to President Bush, Congress and the Federal Reserve Board, the economists call on Congress to pump $50 billion into assistance for state and local governments. The money would be used to better educate workers and to build highways, mass transit, technology centers. The open letter also calls for tax credits to stimulate private investment.

The economists acknowledge that these proposals would raise the deficit. But they make a convincing case for doing so. After all, the main reason for worrying about large deficits is that, by sucking money out of private capital markets, they drive down private investment. But if Congress turns around and uses the borrowed money to pump up private and public investment, the economy comes out ahead.

Besides, the alarming new $400 billion deficit figure is somewhat deceptive. It includes huge transfers for the savings and loan bailout and for interest. These expenditures do little more than swap dollars from one set of taxpayer pockets to another. That affects the distribution of income for particular people but doesn't much affect the overall economy.

All that said, however, Congress has no warrant for turning cavalier about borrowing. The deficit is projected to balloon later in the decade for rock-solid reasons—like skyrocketing Medicare and Medicaid expenditures.

Unlike bank bailouts and interest payments on the national debt, money spent on health care will represent a real drain on the economy. The trick is to get out of the current recession—and then tend to the immense deficit with a careful mix of tax hikes and spending cuts targeted to cut consumption rather than investment.

The economists' letter rings with the unsailable logic. Deficit reduction is important, but not at any cost. Short term and long, starving valuable public investment for the sake of lowering the deficit does more harm than good.

Mr. KENNEDY. I thank the Senator from Tennessee.

I yield back to him whatever time I have remaining.

Several Senators addressed Chair.

Mr. DOMENICI. How much does Senator NUNN need?

Mr. NUNN. I ask for 15 or 20 minutes.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I yield 20 minutes to Senator NUNN.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I think this has been a very good debate this morning. Frankly, if we could accommodate the views of everyone here in one resolution, and talk more about taxes and talk more about what we are going to do substantively in health care, and also put this cap on, I think we could solve the deficit problem over about a 7- to 10-year period. It is not going to be easy.

But I find myself a little, I guess, amused, maybe perplexed, about the arguments used here by the opposition. Not the conclusions, but the arguments.

We have a group of people standing up saying we are going to cut military retirement; we are going to cut food stamps; we are going to cut veterans' benefits. They are saying this because they are saying we are aiming at health care, and health care is going to keep growing. Therefore, these others are going to be cut.

First of all, there is no sequester in this amendment. This is a goal; this is a set of targets. It is hard for me to believe the U.S. Senate does not want to have a target of getting entitlement programs down to the rate of inflation plus population. That is what this body is saying.

We do not even want a target. We do not even want to tell our committees that they have a target.

Everybody knows the problem with Gramm-Rudman-Hollings was it excluded half the budget. Which half did it exclude? It excluded the half of the budget we are talking about right now.

So what we are saying is let us not ever have a target on this half of the budget. Let us just keep pitting defense against domestic discretionary and go merrily along our way. Let us have a big debate between the two political parties about taxes; have a debate about who is going to hurt the poor, have that kind of debate, and go right on along merrily and do nothing about entitlements. That is what I am hearing.

The Senator from Massachusetts argues we are going to target Medicaid and Medicare, and that is what is going to get hit. Then he argues, in the same speech, what is going to happen is student loans are going to get hit, because we are not going to hit Medicare and Medicaid. Then we have somebody else arguing we are not going to hit Medicare and Medicaid, and therefore agriculture is going to get hit. And then we have somebody else arguing that is not going to happen; we are not going to do anything about any of those programs. It is going to be veterans that are going to get hit.

Mr. President, they cannot all be right. They cannot all be right. Somebody is wrong, because if we simply live within these targets, if we simply keep the entitlement programs about 50 percent of the budget, within the rate of inflation plus the population growth, and if we start 2 years from now and begin to restrain the growth rate methodically, nobody gets hit. Nobody gets cut. Everybody's benefits continue to grow.

We are not cutting someone's benefits. We are talking about how much they are going to grow. We are talking about a rate of growth of inflation plus the population growth in the respective programs.

Mr. SASSER. Will the Senator just yield on that point?

Mr. NUNN. I want to finish my remarks, and then I will be glad to yield.

I see the chairman of the Appropriations Committee here. I heard the remarks of the Senator from Texas, the chairman of the Finance Committee.

Frankly, I agreed with 90 percent of what the Senator from Texas said. I think he is absolutely right when he says that this amendment does not solve the underlying problem.

As one of the authors of this amendment, I would stipulate that. It does not solve the underlying problem.

It is a goal. It is a target. It is an instruction to our committees to begin looking at this. That is what it is. It does not solve the underlying problem, no. Gramm-Rudman-Hollings did not solve the underlying problem. It did put restraint on half the budget. It let the other half off. The Senator from Texas said that we have to deal with Medicare and Medicaid. He is absolutely correct. He also said that in squeezing Medicare and Medicaid also we are putting more costs on the private sector, and their medical costs are going up. We have to address this as a whole, not just the Federal budget part of it. He is absolutely correct; there is no doubt about that.

He also announced he is going to be dealing with the problem. I think that is good. He also said very clearly that the administration has not dealt with the problem. I agree with that. So I agree with almost everything the Senator from Texas said. But I disagree with his conclusion, and that is that if we pass this, it is going to lull us into thinking we have dealt with the problem and give us a false sense of security.

Mr. President, that has been the problem for the last 10 or 15 years. We have been lulled into a false sense of security. Gramm-Rudman-Hollings excluded half the budget—half the budget—and we pretended it was going to get the expenditures under control. Everyone knew, when we excluded entitlements, that it could not.

I suspect we are going to have amendments this morning, one after another, to do what we did to Gramm-Rudman-Hollings and that is take some of these programs out. The first one, I am sure, with all my friends who are veterans will be veterans' programs. And I have received just about every award and I have been honored by them in almost every respect. Veterans' benefits have not been growing over the rate of inflation. In fact, over the last 10 years they have been under the rate of inflation. Veterans are not going to get hit under this proposal unless we come up with a law later that sequesters in a way that penalizes programs that are growing under the rate of inflation. I would not support such a procedure. We are not dealing with any self-implementing law this morning.

But here we go this morning, and it is going to be clear, before this debate is over, exactly why we have a runaway budget deficit. It is going to be very clear because we are going to have an amendment to exclude veterans. If that passes, and I suspect it will, we are going to have an amendment to exclude student loans. If that passes, and I suspect it will, we will have an amendment to exclude agriculture. If that passes, and I suspect it will, we will have an amendment to exclude unemployment. If that passes, and I suspect it will, we will have an amendment to exclude Federal retirement. If that passes, we will have an amendment to exclude food and nutrition, and then we will have an amendment to exclude SSI, and then we will have an amendment to exclude the earned income tax credit, and then we will have an amendment to exclude Medicaid, and then we will have an amendment to exclude Medicare, and, glory be, we will have 50 percent of the budget excluded, we will be back to the status quo and go home and make speeches about fiscal responsibility, and we will continue to debate how much we take out of defense to put into domestic discretionary programs.

I say that is the pattern, and that is where we are going. We will not make progress toward the deficit, but we will make it abundantly clear to the American people and to all those in the media who may be interested in this—and not many are, I recognize that, and that is one of the problems because you do not get enough media attention on this subject to even have an educational debate in the country. That is one of the big problems. But I say, Mr. President, that it is going to be clear before this debate is over—and that is why I think it is worth doing, I think it is a healthy debate—it is going to be clear what the problem is.

I agree with 90 percent of what the Senator from Texas said. There are a couple of things I do not agree with. I say, if we tell the Finance Committee, who has jurisdiction over a lot of these entitlements, and I know the Senator from Texas has done an extraordinary job in trying to deal with this, if we tell them they have a goal, we will be telling them the same thing that we tell the Armed Services Committee. We debated that yesterday. It may not have come out the way some of our colleagues wanted, but the Senate of the United States gave the Armed Services Committee their number. We are going to salute and meet that number. If it comes back to conference different, if it is lower on defense, we are going to salute, and we are going to meet that number.

The chairman of the Appropriations Committee gets his number. He gets his instructions. When this debate is over, Senator BYRD, from West Virginia, will have his instructions. He may not like what he has, but he is going to do his duty because he always has. He is going to meet his targets because he always has.

So what is wrong with taking the other 50 percent of the budget and saying, this is not something that we can ignore. We cannot ignore it. Mr. President, there are four basic components of deficit control. One of them is defense. One of them is domestic discretionary. Another is entitlements. And the way I divide it, in broad terms, the other is taxes. We have dealt with 3 of those over the last 10 years. We have raised taxes, maybe not in the way some people would like, but we raised taxes. I voted with the Senator from Texas 2 weeks ago to raise taxes on the wealthy, which was the point the Senator from Michigan made. I will vote to raise taxes on the wealthy. If somebody proposes that amendment to this proposal, I will vote for that, and I will make that part of deficit reduction.

So we have dealt with the tax part of this budget. We have not done enough perhaps. We are going to have to do more. I have said, and said yesterday when we announced this, I am willing to vote for more taxes, but not until we do something about the entitlements.

We have dealt with defense. I will not go through all the numbers on that. Maybe it is not as much as some people would like to cut. I am sure we are going to visit it again next year and there are going to be other cuts made in defense.

We have dealt with domestic discretionary. The Senator from West Virginia has made a powerful case, and I have listened to it carefully. He made a powerful case about what happened to domestic discretionary and a powerful case for infrastructure, the need for economic growth and skill training and education. He made a deep impression to me. I am going to be looking for more defense cuts because of the things the Senator from West Virginia said. I have listened to him. I have not voted with him, I have not agreed with his bottom line. I listened to him, I respect him, and I learned from him.

Mr. President, guess what part of the budget we have not dealt with? We have not dealt with entitlements, and before this debate is over, it will be very clear to everyone why we are not dealing with entitlements. People know that the phones are ringing, the mail will come in, every group that is in this category I rattled off this morning has been told by some phantoms here on Capitol Hill—and if you gave me a few hours, I could figure out who they are and say who they are, but I will not because this is part of the procedure in this democracy—they have been told, "Please notify your Senator your program is going to be cut, there is going to be a sequester. The veterans are going to be cut. Federal retirement is going to be cut. The military retirement is going to be cut. Unemployment is going to be cut. Food and nutrition is going to be cut. They have all gotten the notices in the last 24 hours, and we are getting the feedback. We are hearing from them.

When you explain it to them, they will say, "Oh, I didn't understand it that way. That isn't what our lobbyist in Washington told me. He didn't tell me that."

Mr. DOMENICI. Could I ask Senator NUNN a question? Most of these people would agree with what we are doing. Most of the people who called in would agree with what we are doing if they understood it. Does the Senator think it is going to be explained to them right?

Mr. NUNN. No; that is the problem.

Mr. President, I have no illusions. I can count votes around here, and I know how this is going to go. I could predict it before we ever put in our amendment. But I do think it is a healthy debate because it is apparent to anyone who might be interested in what the problem is in the Federal budget, and I think it is very clear.

I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. DOMENICI. I want to ask the Senator a question. Does the Senator know, of all of the entitlements we have heard how much of all of these entitlements go to those unfortunate people in our country who need help? Would the Senator happen to know, out of all the entitlements, what percent goes to the poor and what percent of the entitlements go to the nonpoor?

Mr. NUNN. I do not know the number, but I think a vast majority of the entitlement programs go to people who are not in any way categorized as poor.

Mr. DOMENICI. The Senator is absolutely right. The numbers are $500 billion go to the nonpoor and $100 billion to the poor.

Now, we could, somewhere along the line, if the debate was serious, we could say take out the 100 and look at the 500, but there would be problems with that, too. You can bet on it because, just as I received a letter—the Senator was talking about lobbyists. Did he get a letter that said: "Dear Senator NUNN, we would like you to know that Senator NUNN is offering an amendment which is going to cause us to lose our pension"? I received one. I received one from somebody that said: "Dear Senator DOMENICI, please be advised that we are worried about an amendment that Senator DOMENICI is offering." I assume that they are cranking them out some way. They did not even know they were writing to the same person they were talking about as far as the amendment. I do not see that the Senator has received any of those yet.

Mr. NUNN. I have received several of them. Most of mine so far say: Thank goodness Senator DOMENICI is sponsoring the amendment.

Mr. DOMENICI. And not Senator NUNN.

Mr. NUNN. They have not completely understood that yet, but they will by next week.

Mr. President, in my opinion, this is the most important fiscal amendment we will vote on this year. It would put us on a course toward fiscal responsibility and meaningful deficit reduction over the next 5 to 10 years. It would reduce future spending for national defense below the level contained in the resolution before the Senate. It would freeze future domestic discretionary spending at the current level, but it would create a special fund from defense savings for investment in public infrastructure and human capital projects. Most importantly, it would begin the process of restraining the future growth in mandatory spending on entitlement programs.

Let me be clear. This amendment is strong medicine. But everyone in this Chamber knows that our Nation is in poor fiscal health, and the long-term prognosis is not encouraging. The symptoms of our economic illness have been repeated on the floor many times during this debate.

The Federal debt has tripled, from $1 trillion to over $3 trillion, in the last 10 years.

The budget deficit has ballooned to $400 billion in fiscal year 1992. The Federal Government is spending more than $1 billion a day more than it is taking in, consuming savings that could otherwise go toward investments to improve our productivity and competitiveness.

In the last 12 years, the United States has gone from being the world's biggest creditor to the world's biggest debtor nation.

The rate of growth on mandatory spending in entitlements is out of control. CBO projects that over the next 10 years, Medicare and Medicaid will increase from 13.5 percent of Federal outlays to 25.3 percent. Last year OMB Director Richard Darman testified that by the year 2025, Medicare outlays alone could consume 30 percent of Federal spending.

Our challenge, Mr. President, is clear. Sooner or later—and I hope it is sooner—we must come to grips with fiscal reality. We must commit ourselves to a course of action that will promote sustained and robust economic growth and still get the deficit under control over the next 5 to 10 years.

No one voting for this amendment is going to win a popularity contest, at least not in the near term. But if we adopt this proposal, or something like it, we may begin gaining back something we are losing here in Washington—the confidence and respect of the American people.

DOMENICI-NUNN PROPOSAL

I want to briefly outline the main features of this amendment.

On defense, this proposal reduces defense spending below the Bush fiscal years 1993-97 budget by $35 billion in budget authority and $33 billion in outlays. That is a total reduction, in real terms, of over $450 billion in budget authority between fiscal years 1990 and 1997 from the 1990 budget summit baseline. By fiscal year 1997, defense spending under this proposal will be 3.5 percent of our gross domestic product, the lowest level since before World War II.

On domestic and international discretionary spending, this amendment proposes a nominal freeze over 5 years at the 1992 levels. However, the amendment creates a reserve fund for high priority investments in our human and physical capital—such as education, skill training, infrastructure, technology and other economic growth enhancing initiatives. Once the defense reductions are achieved, those savings would be available for these high priority programs. The reserve funds will not be available for all domestic discretionary programs, Mr. President—only those that are truly investments in future growth.

On entitlement programs, this amendment calls for the creation of a cap on mandatory programs starting in fiscal year 1994. It specifically excludes Social Security, which pays for itself. Initially this cap would allow for growth in caseloads, plus inflation, plus 2 percent. This allowance for 2 percent growth over and above inflation, and over and above growth in the number of people entitled to receive benefits, would decrease down to zero percent by 1997.

Let me make it clear, this amendment is not designed to eliminate all increases in future mandatory spending on entitlements. It is simply designed to restrain the future rate of growth to reasonable and affordable levels. In 1997 we would save $40 billion by restraining the future growth in mandatory programs. Ten years from now, the savings would be $150 billion a year, just from eliminating the excess growth in entitlement spending over above population growth and inflation. All these savings would be achieved without touching Social Security.

Or revenues, there are no tax increases in this proposal for the next 5 years. Our present tax code is part of the problem. It discourages savings and investment and encourages consumption. This has got to change if we are going to have the kind of growth we need to get our fiscal house in order and get real wages rising again.

Over the next 5 years, this proposal would reduce the deficit by about $100 billion more than the President's budget or the budget resolution reported by the Budget Committee. Over the longer term, it will get us at least in the neighborhood of balancing the budget by early in the next century when the Social Security surplus—which will be about $150 billion ten years from now—is included. I believe our long-term goal must be to balance the budget without counting on the Social Security surplus.

SHORTCOMINGS OF THE PROPOSAL

Mr. President, this proposal is not perfect. I have said for many years that any comprehensive deficit reduction plan must deal with all aspects of the Federal budget—defense spending, domestic discretionary spending, entitlement spending and revenues.

This plan deals only with three of the four elements. It does not address revenues. Simple arithmetic tells me that we will not get the deficit under control just by cutting spending. Sooner or later we are probably going to have to find some revenue increases.

I am convinced, however, that we must show the American people that we are serious about controlling spending before we can reasonably ask them to pay more taxes. I am convinced that we must act now to begin to control entitlements. Until we can demonstrate that we have the discipline to control entitlement spending, I don't think there will be very much support to raise revenues and for good reason.

When we have demonstrated we can get spending under control, then I will be in favor of increasing revenues if it is still necessary.

Controlling the deficit is not possible without economic growth. In fact, one of the assumptions of our proposal is that we will have average annual growth of 2.1 percent in our economy over the next decade. We have not been able to pass an economic growth package so far this year, and this amendment is not a substitute for an economic growth package. Our policies on the spending side and the revenue side must promote growth, but at the same time they must be fiscally responsible.

IMPACT OF THE DEFICIT ON THE ECONOMY AND LONG TERM GROWTH

Mr. President, our economy is in a vicious cycle of excessive budget and trade deficits, low savings, low investment, low economic growth, and stagnant productivity and standards of living. The budget deficit is reducing our economic growth, and low growth causes further increases in the deficit. Unless we break this cycle—unless we increase our savings and investment—we will see an accelerating downward spiral of our economic strength and in our ability to do anything about it.

If we intend to solve our long-term economic problems, our No. 1 priority must be to get the budget deficit under control. The current flood of Federal borrowing competes with every American business that would like to borrow to modernize and expand, raising interest rates for business and government. Higher interest rates make investment more expensive, so businesses invest less, and America loses jobs because higher interest rates mean more efficient plants don't get built here in the United States.

The deficit is also crippling the Government's ability to react to crises and opportunities at home and abroad. It has severely limited the possibility of using fiscal policy to combat the recession. It is difficult to find new money for our national needs, such as better access to health care for the 37 million Americans presently without insurance, or investments to address our long-term competitiveness problems.

UNCONTROLLABLE SPENDING

Mr. President, we all know that the major cause of our deficit problem is what we call mandatory or uncontrollable spending—entitlements and interest on the debt.

According to a recent study by the Congressional Research Service, over the past 25 years, spending on social welfare programs—the entitlement programs like Medicare, Medicaid, AFDC—has increased by an average of 6 percent per year, or $21 billion annually in constant 1991 dollars. Social Security has also grown rapidly, but so has the payroll tax pumping money into the Social Security system. Without the Social Security surplus, which was designed for future years, our deficit would look even worse. What the general fund borrows from Social Security must be paid back, and when that day of reckoning comes, the next generation of American leaders will be held accountable by voters.

In testimony before the Governmental Affairs Committee recently, Mr. Bowsher, the Comptroller General, gave a graphic example of runaway entitlements costs. He pointed out that Federal outlays for health care have increased by a whopping 185 percent in real terms since 1980, far outstripping any other category of outlays from the general fund.

Spending for interest on our growing national debt has grown 6.7 percent per year, an increase of $6 billion per year above the rate of inflation. Within another few years, interest on the debt will exceed the defense budget, just as it has already grown in the last decade to exceed domestic discretionary spending.

On the other hand, spending for discretionary programs—both defense and nondefense—has increased by 0.6 percent annually over the last 25 years, only about $2 billion per year above the rate of inflation.

THE LONG-TERM PROBLEM

Mr. President, the Congressional Budget Office economic projections for the next 10 years are not encouraging. According to CBO, if we continue to live by the budget agreement through 1995, and then let discretionary spending rise with inflation after that while revenues and entitlement programs continue to follow current law, not only will the deficit not go away, it will continue to grow.

CBO projects that even if the economy grows at about 2.5 percent per year in real terms, the deficit 10 years from now will be over $400 billion. According to press reports, OMB Director Darman recently told some Senators that the deficit could keep rising from this $400 billion level to a figure of over $600 billion by the year 2005.

An important distinction to keep in mind is that this year's $400 billion deficit includes a Social Security surplus of $50 billion. But 10 years from now, that surplus will be $150 billion. So a $400 billion deficit 10 years from now is really a deficit of almost $600 billion when you exclude the Social Security surplus. This money must be paid back to the Social Security surplus. This money must be paid back to the Social Security trust fund when the baby boomers retire. If we don't want to default on benefits when that day comes, then we are going to have to enact the largest tax increase in American history. One way or another, unless we change our current fiscal course, our children and grandchildren are going to have to sacrifice their standard of living to pay for ours.

Mr. President, we are not going to get the budget under control by doing nothing and hoping the economy will grow faster. CBO's projections already include an estimate of 2.5 percent real economic growth per year, and CBO projects a deficit of over $400 billion in the year 2002. We are not going to solve the problem just by raising revenue. We are not going to do it just by cutting domestic discretionary spending. And we are not going to eliminate the deficit just by cutting defense spending. Everyone in this chamber knows that we are not going to get the deficit under control until we control the rate of growth in mandatory entitlement spending. That is the real heart of the Domenici-Nunn-Rudman-Robb proposal before the Senate.

CONCLUSION

Mr. President, I can understand that a majority of my colleagues may not be quite ready for a dose of this strong medicine. But let me just say that if we do not do something like this—this may not be the best answer. I am not saying it is the only way. Maybe there are other ways. I am sure others are going to think about ways that are better. This proposal can be improved.

If we pass this this morning, we are going to have to implement it. We are going to have to think carefully and have hearings with all the interested parties about implementation. But the bottom line is this: This is the first generation of Americans in history that is maintaining its own standard of living by basically lowering the standard of living of our children and our grandchildren. That is the bottom line. That is what we are doing.

If that is the heritage we are willing to leave—then we can go on conducting the Nation's fiscal business the same way we have for the last 12 years. For those who are willing to maintain the status quo—to continue to borrow from our children and grandchildren—the vote on this proposal is "no."

For those who want change, Mr. President, for those who want to pass on a prosperous and expanding economy and a higher standard of living to our children and grandchildren—then the vote on this proposal should be "yes."

Everyone recognizes that we are going to have to put together a fiscal blueprint to reduce discretionary spending, control future growth in entitlements, and reduce the deficit. I think Senators will find that any blueprint that tries to accomplish these goals will resemble this proposal.

The longer we wait, the stronger the medicine is going to have to be to cure our fiscal problems.

The choice is clear, Mr. President, I rest my case.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I quite understand the motive of my friend from New Mexico and also the motive of my friend from Georgia. They are concerned about the growth in entitlements. I think many of us on both sides of the aisle are. We are worried about the growth in spending in other areas, too.

I think the objection primarily to this proposal that is brought to us today is, No. 1, it is ill-considered. I do not even think the authors, for example, have had time to fully consider it. My friend from Georgia says that under this proposal they are offering, veterans will not be cut. I am confident he believes that. But the facts are that under the formula they are proposing, and according to numbers that have come down from the Congressional Budget Office, the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office, in 1997 under their proposals veterans' compensation will be cut by $1.408 billion. Maybe it ought to be. I do not know. But the fact is it will be. Veterans pensions will be cut by $353 million in fiscal year 1997 under their proposal. Why? Because under the formula that they are offering you get a decreasing compensation for inflation, and these cuts do kick in.

Now, no wonder these people are calling, because some of them have read Senator DOMENICI's remarks, I suppose, in the RECORD and some of them have been alerted. What is wrong with that? Nobody complained about the defense industrialists, those who manufacture military equipment, when they were crowding these halls out here, when they were calling our offices. People were calling me and saying, oh, we cannot cut that military budget because we manufacture a certain part over here, 200 or 300 people might lose their jobs. Who put the word out on that? This is part of the democratic process, for people to be able to petition their legislators. Surely, my colleagues do not want to restrict the basic freedom. I know they do not. I know they believe in that.

Mr. RIEGLE. Will the Senator yield at that point just for 1 minute?

Mr. SASSER. I will be pleased to yield to my friend from Michigan.

Mr. RIEGLE. On that point. One of the letters is from the Paralyzed Veterans of America and signed by Victor McCoy, Sr., who is the national president. I am going to put the whole letter in the RECORD, but I just want to read one paragraph because these people do understand how this proposal works. Listen to what he says here. He is talking about this proposal coming from the other side. He says:

Both these approaches to control mandatory spending are inherently unfair to veterans. Both would force reductions in veterans' benefits due to uncontrollable growth in other programs. To force cuts in compensation for service-connected disabilities and survivors' benefits, disability pensions for wartime veterans, vocational rehabilitation, and educational benefits is to abrogate the Nation's commitment to the men and women who have served in the Armed Forces.

I would say, with all due respect to the Senator from Georgia and everybody else, I think this man has looked at this. I think he understands it. I think he is representing his people. I think he has a right to do so. And I do not think we ought to turn a deaf ear to what he is saying.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. McCoy's letter be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PARALYZED VETERANS OF AMERICA,
Washington, DC, April 2, 1992.

Hon. JIM SASSER,
Chairman, Committee on the Budget, U.S. Senate, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR CHAIRMAN SASSER: On behalf of the members of Paralyzed Veterans of America (PVA), I urge your strong opposition to an effort which would impose direct spending caps under which overall limits on mandatory spending would be enforced through sequestration. While PVA recognizes the importance of controlling growth in federal spending and reducing the growing national deficit, this proposal arbitrarily would subject entitlement programs for the nation's disabled and poorest veterans to sequestration; sequestration that is the result of growth in other direct spending programs. Additionally, this proposal exempts Social Security benefits thereby establishing a gross inequity in the treatment of America's veterans.

The proposal, which we understand will be sponsored by Senator Dominici, Ranking Member of the Budget Committee, is based upon the earlier OMB proposal contained in the President's Fiscal Year 1993 Budget. This earlier proposal would cap combined mandatory spending based on a "population plus CPI" with an established percentage allowance. The newer proposal would establish the cap using a smaller allowance factor.

Both these approaches to controlling mandatory spending are inherently unfair to veterans. Both would force reductions in veterans' benefits due to uncontrollable growth in other programs. To force cuts in compensation for service-connected disabilities and survivors' benefits, disability pensions for wartime veterans, vocational rehabilitation and educational benefits is to abrogate the Nation's commitment to the men and women who have served in the Armed Forces.

Again, I urge your opposition to any proposal to establish mandatory spending caps which targets veterans' benefits for reduction while exempting other mandatory programs or which would cut funding of veteran's programs due to growth in other entitlement areas.

Thank you.
Sincerely,

VICTOR S. MCCOY, Sr.,
National President.

Mr. RIEGLE. I will not read the letter from the Veterans of Foreign Wars or from the American Legion. I think these organizations are legitimate, solid; they are concerned; they are concerned for a reason, and I do not want to see them dismissed.

Mr. NUNN. Will the Senator yield briefly, just briefly?

Mr. SASSER. I will yield.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President I do not think anything in my remarks in any way disparaged any veterans organization whatsoever. They are sincere, honest, honorable people who have served their Nation. They have every right to notify us. I have always welcomed every correspondence that I have received from veterans. I welcome phone calls from anyone. Fine. I do think this amendment has been explained to them in a way that is not correct.

Mr. RIEGLE. I would just say to the Senator, I got the impression that the feeling was they were somehow misled or that they were somehow not understanding this thing.

I think the paragraph I just read makes it crystal clear they understand exactly how this would work. I will just read one line out of the letter from the head of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, who concluded on this proposal, saying: "This would constitute a grievous injustice to our disabled veterans." He goes on in that vein. That is Robert Wallace.

I think these people take their responsibilities just as seriously as we take ours. I think they do understand the proposal. I think they do understand the proposal. I think that is why they have written and why they are so distressed about it, and that is why I am distressed about it.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, a point I want to make and the point that I took the floor to make is that my friend from Georgia, I think in good faith and certainly believing it to be true, says that this plan does not reduce veterans' benefits. Now, the Congressional Budget Office disagrees with him on that.

I am confident that my friend from Georgia, who is known as one of the most energetic and dedicated Senators in this body, has not had the time to fully analyze this proposal which is before us in the press of business that has been coming before us in the last few days and last few weeks.

The bottom line is when you start analyzing this proposal, it is ill conceived. It is ill conceived. It does not address the problem that they seek to address in a fair and equitable manner. That is why we have this uproar in the community of people and groups that will be affected. It is just that simple.

Now, the comment was made that 80 percent of the people who will be afected are middle-income people. These are not programs that are means tested.

Now, if we are trying to get to middle-income entitlement programs, why did we exempt the largest one? Why did we do that? Why did we exempt Social Security?

Mr. DOMENICI. I would like to answer, if the Senator would like me to answer.

Mr. SASSER. Let me answer it and then the Senator can answer it on his own time. That amounts to 44 percent of all the entitlement programs. Why did we exempt that? Because this body knows the power, the power of the Social Security lobby. But who is here speaking for the food stamp recipients? One out of every ten Americans is on food stamps today. Why were they not included in here?

How about the supplemental security income people, the very poorest in our society, as the Senator from Michigan said, the lame and the halt. Why were they not included in here and the Social Security recipients excluded? I wonder why. Child nutrition, why were they not in here?

If we want to get the middle-income entitlement programs, I say to my colleagues, let us make a clean breast of it. Let us put Social Security in here. Let us show some political courage if we are so concerned. And I predict that if an amendment comes before this body to take another middle-income entitlement program—it is not totally middle-income, but upper-middle-income people benefit from Medicare—if there were to be an effort to modify it and exclude those at the top of the income bracket, why, the proponents of this would wilt like summer soldiers in the heat of the day. No, they will abandon this proposal.

So if we want to deal with these entitlements—and I think we all want to—to sit down and approach it in a systematic fashion, I say to my colleagues this will never be dealt with until there is leadership coming out of the White House.

The problem with this budget and the problem with these mandatory programs and the problem with this deficit is we have not had a good President of the United States for a long, long time and this country is the worse for it. We need leadership.

The distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee, the President pro tempore, who served in this body longer than any individual, who has written a two-volume history of the U.S. Senate, knows more about its workings and the individuals that have served here over half a century probably than any other human being on the face of the Earth, told this body yesterday that Congress is an amalgamation of 535 individuals. Congress reflects the best and the worst of the American people.

It reflects their wishes, their desires, their fears, and anxieties. But Congress and the U.S. Senate will rise to the task if there is leadership. It is leadership that is lacking. That is why I say to my colleagues we cannot come here today with some sort of ragtag package that has been made too quickly. It simply does not get the job done. It sends false alarms all across this country. It raises fears. It raises anxieties. And in the final analysis, it inhibits efforts to deal with the problem.

I see the distinguished majority leader is on the floor. I yield the floor.

Mr. MITCHELL addressed the Chair. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the majority leader.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I believe that this debate has served a very useful purpose. It has made clear, clearer than it has ever been, that the real problem confronting our society is the runaway increase in the cost of health care. This resolution has been criticized as unfair, and I join that criticism, because it would provide cuts in programs that are not the principal source of the problem, and avoid dealing with what is the principal source of the problem.

But I think the resolution does bring into focus, and causes us to debate and consider first the reality that we all know that the deficit is too large, and growing at too rapid a rate; and the very existence of the resolution and the very occurrence of the debate has made clear to Senators, and to the American people, that the crux of the problem, the root of the problem, is the rapidly escalating cost of health care.

The question has been posed here repeatedly today: Why should the compensation of a disabled veteran be cut because we are unwilling or unable to address the runaway costs of health care? It is a profound question. It is a very difficult question to answer.

I believe the answer is that the disabled veteran's compensation should not be cut. I believe the answer is that we should address the problem of health care. That is what the root cause of this is.

You look down this list of increases, you look down these programs that will be affected by this mandatory cap, and you see that the increase over and above the level set in the resolution is attributable almost entirely to health care costs.

The solution offered in the resolution is to cut other programs to make up for those costs, and then simply to provide a cap on the health care programs as well.

I do not think that is the answer. I think the resolution has served a useful purpose. But I think the answer is to deal with the problem of health care.

I hope that out of this debate comes a renewed determination that we will address comprehensive health care reform in this Congress in this year.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, will the distinguished majority leader yield for a question?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, certainly.
Mr. CHAFEE. The majority leader has set forth a very powerful statement. We have to do something about health care. Who is in charge around this place? I thought the majority party ran the Senate.

And if I might finish, Mr. President—

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I yielded for a question. If the Senator wishes to make a speech, I would ask the Senator to make it on his own time.

Mr. CHAFEE. Here is my question.
Mr. MITCHELL. Thank you.

Mr. CHAFEE. The Secretary of HHS has said the administration is willing to discuss a whole series of common points common to the program that the Senator introduced, common to the program the Republicans introduced, common to the program the chairman of the Finance Committee introduced. I think the Senator is familiar with those points of commonality: Insurance market reforms, small group purchasing, reform of medical liability insurance, and so forth, but nothing happens.

We never get an invitation to sit down. We can perfectly well do it. Is it going to solve everything? No. But why does not the majority leader convene a meeting as he so ably did when we did the Clean Air Act some 2 years ago?

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I will be pleased to respond to that question. I did not in my remarks make any reference to one party or the other on health care. I did not make any reference to the administration or the Congress. The Senator in his remarks and his question has sought to draw a partisan distinction. So let me respond to that.

I hope my remarks and—it was my intention to try to create a bipartisan effort to deal with health care. But the problem is as soon as you mention the subject, someone jumps up on the other side and tries to make it into a partisan issue and suggests somehow that the majority is at fault for this. So let me respond to that question in that context.

Mr. CHAFEE. You characterized my remarks as partisan. So proceed.

Mr. MITCHELL. President Bush took office nearly 3½ years ago. Health care was a problem then. Health care was a problem every single day that he has served as President and that we have sat in the Senate since he took office.

After 3 years of study, the President finally made a speech more than 2 months ago on health care. And to this very moment, at 12:39 p.m. here in the middle of April, the President has not submitted a bill, and the administration will not tell us if or when they will submit a bill.

The Senator asked about leadership. I say there is an absence of leadership. A critical problem confronting every family in America, a critical problem contributing to the runaway budget deficits which the authors of this resolution are trying to control—the intention to which I agree, but the manner in which I do not—is a problem which affects every one of us in our society. And to this moment 3½ years after taking office the President has yet to submit a bill on health care.

So I submit to the Senator that is the root of the problem, and that is where the lack of leadership is.

More than a year ago, I introduced legislation—it is right here—to deal with the problem of health care, which has as its principal objective controlling the runaway increase in the cost of health care.

When I introduced this bill, I said I do not present this as the perfect bill, as the only way, even as the best way to deal with health care. It is the product of 2 years of study and effort by a group of Senators who felt that we must bring runaway health costs under control.

We welcomed alternative suggestions, and I commend the Senator from Rhode Island, because he joined with a group of Republican Senators and made an alternative suggestion. But the Senator from Rhode Island knows deep in his heart and in his mind, just as I do, that no health care legislation, comprehensive in nature, can become law without the President's participation and active involvement. That has not occurred. Three and a half years after he took office, 2 months and 1 week after he made a speech, we still do not have a bill, and we do not have any indication of if or when there will be a bill.

I will sit down with the Senator from Rhode Island, the Secretary of Health and Human Services, and any person the administration would like me to sit down with. I invite that participation right here and now. I will have a meeting at any time to try to get this thing moving.

But there has been no interest at all. All we have received are partisan speeches attacking our bill. That is what we have received. All of those speeches—let me finish, and I will yield the floor and the Senator can respond.

All we got from the administration is partisan attacks on our bill. No effort to propose a positive alternative. I think this debate has crystallized this issue in a way that has not occurred up until now. I think this debate has made clear to everyone that we have to do something about runaway health care costs in our society. It is the root of the problem here. The Senator's resolution makes that clear beyond any doubt.

So there is no disagreement about the problem of the increasing deficit.

There is no disagreement about the root cause of it being health care costs. The disagreement is how do we address it?

We have proposed an alternative, and I invite the President to do the same.

Senator BENTSEN'S committee is going to hold hearings on May 6. Why does the administration not submit a bill by May 6? Why does the President not get up and introduce a bill, as opposed to making a speech, so we can take the bill we have introduced, and we can take the President's bill, and the bill of the Senator from Rhode Island, and see if we can, out of that debate and discussion, come up with legislation that will do what we all want to do: control these runaway health care costs—not just the cost to the Government, because one of the fatal deficiencies of the resolution, I believe, is that by simply capping reimbursement from the Government programs which constitutes less than half the total cost in our society, we will undermine numerous institutions, not the least of which are rural hospitals. A large number of rural hospitals in America would have to close if this resolution were adopted.

What we would have is massive cost shifting and no reduction of cost. If you say you are going to only stop or reduce the payments by one provider, or one source of payment, you are going to have leakage out there, and you have to have across-the-board, overall cost reduction in health care. In fact, the cost increases of programs we reimbursed outside of the Government are higher than in the Government, because we have the capacity to say we are only going to reimburse to a certain level.

So I say to the Senator, I welcome any meeting or discussion, and I welcome debate. We have to control health care costs, and we have to do it this year.

Mr. DOMENICI addressed the Chair.

Mr. NUNN. Will the majority leader yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator recognizes the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. MITCHELL. Can I correct one misstatement? I said I introduced a bill more than a year ago. It was June 5, 1991. It seems like a lot more than year ago, but it was slightly less than a year ago.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. Leader, before you leave the floor, let me congratulate you and thank you for your remarks. I do not know whether I thank you for the part that was partisan, but perhaps somebody will do that. Let us exclude that for a moment and say the Senator is absolutely right. There is no way to control the deficit of the United States without controlling health care costs, and that means the expenditure in our budget.

But there may be no way to have sustained economic growth if we do not control the other health care costs, also. They are already twice as large as any in the world. Japan is 8 percent of GNP. We are 12. We cannot continue that. And his observation that the runaway costs have to be controlled is indeed the problem, right to the heart of it.

Frankly, the majority leader should know that we had an alternative in terms of how we control this runaway budget. We could have taken just the number, the function that has health care in it and said, in the next 2 years let us gradually get it down to a level that is reasonable.

We could have done that. But what we have found, in 10 years of reviewing entitlements, that about every 5 years, when you look back at entitlements that you did not think were growing rapidly, somehow or another they turn out to be going wild.

Frankly, we did not, in this amendment, do what you have said we did. We took a bulk number for all of the mandatory entitlements and added them all up, and we said that number is going to continue to grow for all of them combined into 1993 and 1994, as if nothing was done. And in 1995, we reduced the total by an amount necessary to bring that within—every new case is taken care of, inflation is added on, the program is left intact, and we said 2 percent on top.

So you will know that we were not too far off, that did not even require any cut. In fact, zero in 1994. We were giving Congress 2 years to look at the entire package. There is no sequester in this bill.

So this letter where the Congressional Budget Office says how veterans are going to get hit cannot be true. It is speculation. In fact, it says "on each program of a sequester resulting from the proposal not yet complete." That is what it says.

Mr. SASSER. If the Senator will yield, does not your proposal refer to an enforcement mechanism?

Mr. DOMENICI. Not a sequester.

Mr. SASSER. I suggest that the Senator might review that proposal.

Mr. DOMENICI. We will be glad to.

Mr. SASSER. It did refer to an enforcement mechanism, and—

Mr. DOMENICI. We will be glad to do that.

Mr. NUNN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SASSER. I say that on page 38 it says, "provides a mechanism"—talking about growth—"provides a mechanism to reduce the growth of spending for mandatory programs except Social Security, if such mandatory spending exceeds the cap."

So if that is the case, Mr. President, whether you call it a sequester, or a mowing machine, or what, there is going to have to be a way to enforce it.

Mr. DOMENICI. We should look at a mechanism to achieve that. That is what it says. We are going to give the committees an opportunity to look at a mechanism to control this.

I say to the majority leader that I am absolutely convinced—and this is just my opinion—that had we said exactly what we have said here, and taken all of the entitlements and mandatories, except the health care ones and said to the Senate, do to them what we are suggesting we do to the entire package, the argument would have been: Why them? Maybe not by the distinguished majority leader, but no doubt, people would have said: Why them?

They would have had an argument on Medicare that it supposedly pays for itself, or an argument on Medicaid. We ought to save money on Medicaid.

So we, in good faith, said put them in one group and let the Congress decide how to control them within this definition of expenditures.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader.

Mr. MITCHELL. I appreciate that. I anticipate that would have been the argument. My point is this: The rising cost of health care in American society threatens not just the Government, it affects every American business.

It affects every American family. I have traveled all over this country for the past 2 years talking about health care, and business after business after business tells me—and I am sure other Senators—it is the single fastest-rising cost, the single greatest problem they have. Family after family after family is confronted with this tremendous increase.

Let me just cite one figure. Volumes of figures exist, but one makes the case. In 1980, the average cost per family in America of health care was $2,600 a year. In 1990, it is $6,500 a year. And the Bush administration has just recently projected that by the year 2000, it will be $14,000 per family per year—$14,000 a year, for each family in our country—on average. That is an unsustainable rate of increase.

My point is that we have to attack, control, and reduce the overall cost of care throughout our society, not just for the programs that are funded through insurance provided by the Government. I think that is the greatest challenge we face. I think it is, therefore, the most difficult challenge that we face.

Mr. DOMENICI. I do not disagree. I agree.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is what we must do, and I hope very much we do it this year. I am going to try very hard to do it.

I am determined to see that we get legislation brought to the Senate floor, and that we have votes on it. I cannot predict what the outcome will be. I hope we pass a meaningful program, and I hope it becomes law. I think this debate has made that clear beyond any doubt.

It seems to me it is no longer a disputable assertion that the root cause of our problems here is these rising health care costs. That is what we have to address and what I hope we will address.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield 2 minutes?

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield off the resolution, or whatever I have the time on; the amendment or the resolution.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, again I find myself agreeing with about 95 percent with what the majority leader said. He is absolutely right about health care and about it going beyond the budget.

I had a small business group come to see me the other day. It happened to be the printing industry in Georgia. They came to see me to demonstrate the point that it is pervasive in terms of effect beyond the Federal Government.

The particular industry's cost of health care was $3,700 a year. They paid the premiums for their employees. If you take the wage increases of their employees over the last 10 years, and the health care growth, if you project it out on the same line we are on now, by the turn of the century, the health care cost of the average employee with a family of four in the printing industry will exceed the total annual salary of those people. So they would not be able to eat, sleep, or buy anything, just based on the health care costs. That is the crash program we are on.

The majority leader is absolutely correct, I think, in 95 percent of what he said. But the 5 percent he is absolutely incorrect on is the fact he says if this proposal passes, rural hospitals will close down. The majority leader has to assume, to make that statement, that nothing is going to happen on health care. He has to assume that his plan is not going to pass; there is going to be no reform and no cost control between now and 1995. Otherwise, this proposal would not have the effect he has described.

So that is a worst-case assumption, and that assumption is exactly why we are proposing this amendment, so it does not come into reality.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the majority leader.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, if I could just respond, I appreciate the Senator's comments. Obviously, the human ability to predict future events is very limited. We all recognize that none of us knows what circumstance will exist in a month, let alone in a year or a decade.

I do know this: That we have in our State 40 hospitals. I have visited every one, most of them several times. And I come from a State with a relatively large land area and a sparse population; no big cities, a lot of small towns. Our hospitals are hanging by a thread.

Mr. DOMENICI. That is correct.

Mr. MITCHELL. Our rural hospitals are just about at the end of their ability to function, and in a State with incomes less than the national average, with the number of Medicare-eligible and Medicaid-eligible persons higher than the national average, the reimbursement levels under Medicare and Medicaid are crucial to the survival of these institutions.

And in our State, we have no proprietary for-profit acute care hospitals. These are all community based, non-profit institutions, able to function only because of the tremendous dedication of many volunteers, and people who contribute of their time and effort and money to enable them to keep going.

My only point is that if we now have any significant or drastic reduction in reimbursement levels without some alternative way to deal with this problem, then these institutions are going to have to close. We have had closures already. And whenever I meet with hospital officials, they constantly bemoan what they call the Medicare shortfall, which is the rate at which Medicare reimbursement falls below their actual cost of service to admit eligible beneficiaries.

I hope I am wrong, and I hope my prediction does not come true. And I hope very much that we are going to have to act. Because we have this rickety health care system from which, I should add, we derive enormous benefits.

We concentrate the debate on what is wrong; it is appropriate and natural in human affairs. There are tremendous benefits in the American health care system that have to preserve, although we have to bring the costs under control. It is now close to 13 percent of the GNP. The administration and others project it is going to double, to 26 percent in the next century, if we do not do something about.

That is unsustainable. Our society cannot maintain it. Our families cannot survive it.

I thank the Senator for his comments, and I accept the point he made.

I yield the floor. I must go now. Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, does the Senator want to ask a question?

Mr. WELLSTONE. The Senator from Rhode Island is anxious to speak. This would only be a question.

I wonder, given the discussion I heard, whether the Senator from New Mexico would find acceptable the following amendment that I am thinking about proposing:

The Domenici amendment shall not be effective unless and until the President submits, the Congress enacts, and the President signs a comprehensive health care reform measure that includes a strong and effective cost containment program.

I ask the Senator, because it seems to me that is what we are really talking about. I wonder what his reaction would be about that.

Mr. DOMENICI. That is not what we are talking about. I do not believe I would accept that amendment.

Mr. WELLSTONE. I will wait until later on, then.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I am going to yield 5 minutes to Senator CHAFEE. But while the leader is here, I wanted to say I do not believe that we are unaware of the fact that we only have a portion of the health care within the Government programs.

But I would say what I had in mind is the fact that 80 percent of the health care or more is in some way touched by the Federal Government; that is, when you take the tax deductions and all of those items, plus what we pay for, we are up around 80 percent. So I thought we had most of what we would be looking at.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from New Mexico has expired.

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield it off the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I would like to address the remarks made by the distinguished majority leader while he is here. To the best of my knowledge, that is the first time I have heard the distinguished Senator make his invitation, certainly to me and to the others on this side, to come forward with him to arrive at a component solution of this health care problem.

This is something that the administration is eager to do. When I asked the Secretary of HHS, before the Finance Committee: Would you join in an effort with the Democrats in the Senate to try and find a solution to this problem, he said yes.

So, to the majority leader, I say three cheers; four cheers in fact. We accept your invitation, and I will relay it to Dr. Sullivan whenever you want to sit down. And let me say that I do not view this problem as having all of the difficulty that many do, because as I previously stated, there are at least 10 points of commonality to the program we have, to the program the majority leader has, and to programs others have.

Is that going to solve every problem under health care? But it is going to take us a long way in that direction, it seems to me. And, by the way, these points of commonality are not exactly the same. The Senator's proposal on medical liability reform, for example, is different from the one we have. And the administration indeed has a bill on that very subject. So we can make real progress this year, and I will be there whenever you want to meet.

I might say to the majority leader that he did this with great success in connection with the Clean Air Act. If he remembers, the administration did not introduce a clean air bill in the Senate. And as I recall the situation, they had proposals which they introduced, as I recall, in the House.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, if I might, my recollection is—will the Senator yield—my recollection is distinctly different. The critical occurrence in the clean air bill was the President submitting a bill to Congress.

Mr. CHAFEE. There is no question that the critical point was the President supporting clean air legislation. There is no question about; no question.

As I recall it, the President did not have a bill in the Senate, but the majority leader may be right.

But there is no question that the catalyst—and I said this many times, and I give the majority leader credit—the catalyst for going somewhere on the clean air bill was the majority leader.

So I do not see why we have to say, well, the President is not giving us leadership so we cannot go anywhere. I do not agree with that. No. The Senate stands as an independent body with all kinds of prerogatives. And so let us do what we can. If it does not succeed in the other body and with the administration, so be it. At least we can go somewhere. So I await the invitation to dance.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I thank the Senator.

I have said before we are going to proceed with or without the President. We welcome his participation. We welcome the Senator's participation. I will extend an invitation to the Senator at the earliest opportunity to get together to talk about this issue.

Mr. CHAFEE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 2 minutes remaining.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I agree that the amendment by the Senator from New Mexico may not be the best way to proceed. There may be a better way. But it is going somewhere, it is proceeding.

Mr. President, I point out that what is destroying our ability to take progressive action in the whole series of domestic programs, whether it is health care, whether it is education, or whether it is the environment, is the fact that the deficit is consuming so much money. This year, we will pay $200 million interest. Unless we do something about these deficits, we are not going to get to first base with respect to our domestic problems. At least this is an effort. Is it perfect? Probably not. If somebody has a better way of doing it, let us hear it. I must say I have a lot of concerns with it.

Those on the floor have talked about doing something about those who are better off. But if we did anything in connection with employer deductibility of health insurance premiums, for example, or changing their treatment as tax-free fringe benefits—there would be an uproar and it would not get anywhere.

I know that there are those who have said that this comes down too hard on the health care group, on Medicare or Medicaid. Hopefully this legislation will be a catalyst to make some real programs in those particular areas.

Mr. MITCHELL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I have already stated my view on the resolution itself. I do not believe it wise or appropriate to have a cut in programs that are not increasing beyond the rate addressed by the resolution because health care costs are rising at a rate that is beyond the resolution. Why should we cut compensation for disabled veterans because health care costs are out of control?

Accordingly, Mr. President, I believe that if we are going to proceed with this resolution, then the Senate and each Senator should express his or her view on every one of the so-called entitlement programs. The use of the word "entitlements," while commonplace, is not fully accurate; the use of the words "mandatory programs." We should be talking about the specific programs: veterans compensation, farm price supports, foster care and adoption assistance, military retirement, unemployment compensation, food stamps.

Accordingly, Mr. President, it is my intention, on behalf of Senator SASSER and myself, to offer a series of amendments so that Members of the Senate will vote on every single one of these programs. I think that is the only fair and appropriate thing to do. I think it enables a Senator to make clear his or her position with respect to each one of these programs. Do we feel that veterans benefits should be cut?

Mr. NUNN. Will the majority leader yield for a question?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, I will yield for a question without yielding the floor.

Mr. NUNN. The majority leader makes a point about those programs that are growing over the rate of inflation. As one of the authors of this amendment, I offer the majority leader this proposition: Why do we not take all the programs that are not going to go over inflation and amend them one by one, and we could do that on a voice vote, and take those that are growing over the rate of inflation, which the majority leader indicates are primarily in the medical area but that is not the only area, and then have just one vote.

This proposition will apply to those growing over the rate of inflation. That would address the majority leader's problem. It would solve the problem and save the Senate the time of having to vote on all those amendments. And it would knock out everything in the entitlement programs that is not growing over the rate of inflation.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, that would also avoid the political accountability of a vote on the record of each specific program. I think we are going to proceed down this road. My preference is that this resolution be withdrawn, that we can proceed to finish the budget resolution. I think this has been an extremely useful debate. I think we focused in on the problem. But if the resolution is not to be withdrawn, then I believe, and I will insist, that the Senate vote on every single one of these programs.

Mr. NUNN. I do not know what the primary author may want to do on this. My advice would be that on all those programs not growing over the rate of inflation, we would all vote "yes" and accept the amendments. We can have a rollcall vote if the majority leader would like to spend several hours on rollcalls. And then we get down to those that are growing over the rate of inflation, and I would vote "no" on those. I do not know how other Senators may vote. That would be a complete accountability, if the majority leader wants to do that.

What I was trying to offer was a shortcut to that so that we could get down to the real question, and that is whether we want to control, in some fashion, the growth of those that are growing over the rate of inflation.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, if I still have the floor I wish to reply to the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. REID). The majority leader has the floor.

Mr. MITCHELL. Just so there is no misunderstanding, I do not agree with that approach. I made very clear I think it is wrong to say you are just going to cap those Government health programs, because, while that will have some effect here, it will not affect health care costs overall in our society. It will result in massive cost-shifting and cause severe dislocation in those institutions which service a large number of Medicare- and Medicaid-eligible persons; that is, the rural hospital in poor areas that I think will be devastated by this. But I think, if we are going to vote, if the Senator says he wants to vote to exempt all of these other programs, we ought to have that opportunity, and I think it ought to be on the record.

Mr. NUNN. Will the majority leader yield?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, for a question.

Mr. NUNN. I was not suggesting that the majority leader join in voting affirmatively on those programs that are out of control. What I was suggesting is that we could avoid several rollcall votes by going straight to that procedure. But whatever the majority leader decides will be satisfactory.

Mr. DOMENICI. Will the majority leader yield?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Mr. DOMENICI. I just want to ask a question. Frankly, if the majority leader would permit me to just give a couple of observations, I would like 3 or 4 minutes to go over and see Senator RUDMAN, and I will come back and tell the leader what I will tell him.

Mr. MITCHELL. Certainly.

Mr. DOMENICI. Let me suggest, I have managed budget resolutions for a long time and, frankly, it is not going to do any good, and I say this to my friend from Georgia, it is not going to do any good for him and I to say what we think our amendment and bill does. It is going to do what those people affected thinks it does. And it is going to be a vote—by each Member who votes to keep a group in, it is going to be a vote against them.

I am prepared, or I would not have introduced it, to vote no on taking anything out. I would vote to leave everything in because I understand what I have in mind. I have no difficulty explaining to my constituents what I have in mind. And there will be some angry. But, clearly, when they listen, I will be all right.

But I do not know that I want to put 50 or 60 Senators, or 40, on record, especially since we are only trying to set in motion here, a process that would require the committees to take a look at all this and come up with some approach, and have Members vote on a sense-of-the-Senate, things that we really were not going to carry out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator withhold? The Chair informs the Senator from Maine that the time has expired on the amendment. There is time, of course, with the bill.

Mr. DOMENICI. I do not intend—

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, without losing my right to the floor I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from New Mexico be permitted to continue for 2 minutes, without my losing right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOMENICI. So I will shortly, if the majority leader would do me the privilege of either putting us in a quorum or using time in such a way that I would in no way be prejudiced, I would like to go with Senator NUNN, my principal sponsor, to see Senator ROBB and Senator RUDMAN and we will return in about 5 minutes and we will give you our answer.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I of course believe we should accommodate the very reasonable request by the Senator from New Mexico.

Accordingly, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the majority leader withhold that suggestion for a quorum, momentarily? Will someone yield me 2 or 3 minutes?

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I yield the distinguished President pro tempore 5 minutes off mine.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, before the distinguished Senator from New Mexico and the distinguished Senator from Georgia leave the floor, I hope they will carefully consider and accede to the suggestion by the distinguished majority leader that the resolution—that this amendment be withdrawn. Let me toss an oxymoronic morsel onto the stage of discussion right at this point—to use one of Jackie Gleason's phrases, "how sweet it is" that, at last, we seem at last to be getting away from the splendiferous floccinaucinihilipilifications, in which we have engaged during these last several days. By that I mean the self-flagellation and the partisan missile throwing that we have lately witnessed on this floor and that we seem to be so caught up in all across this country as we head into a Presidential campaign.

The exercises that we have witnessed seems to have caught and engrossed the fascination of the press. We all seem to be engaged with the current rash of imbecilities that we have heard tossed around. At last we are getting around to debating something that deals with the basic problem confronting our country.

I want to compliment those who sponsored the amendment for their having, at least, called it up. And the distinguished Senator from New Mexico has gotten the unanimous consent of the Senate to withdraw his amendment. I hope he will do that because if there is anything among the several things that one can say about this debate thus far, it is that this is clearly a matter which demands the attention of the committees and Members of the Senate in a careful, thoughtful, sane, dedicated way rather than just calling up amendments on the spur of the moment here in the Senate solely to make some partisan gain.

I congratulate the Senator from Texas and I agree with him that this is a matter that needs to be dealt with in the way that he has suggested. There need to be committee hearings and we need to get at the underlying, basic causes that are driving the deficits through the ceiling.

I congratulate the majority leader and agree with him that a basic problem is the runaway cost of health care.

He has indicated a willingness, not only a willingness but an intention to see that, in due time, this matter is brought to the floor in an orderly way and that it is going to be debated and acted upon. But there is one other thing I will say in closing. I disagree with the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island. We cannot do this by ourselves. We all know what the Presidential veto pen can do. This is something, Mr. President, that is so deep, so permeating and so complicated and so filled with political mine fields that we need the leadership of the man in the White House. We will never get anywhere if we do not have the President's leadership.

It is going to take tough, courageous leadership. Because there is going to be pain in the solution. It needs to be comprehensive and carefully wrought.

We have seen over the past years how those who are the wealthiest people in this country have benefited the most by the 1981 tax cut. We have also spent vast resources on military programs, and to some extent that was probably necessary. But these have taken away from the Nation and its people and our children and their children—the resources that are so necessary if we are adequately to deal with the infrastructure concerns that so many of us have expressed, and other concerns as well.

So, in summation I would say let us take this resolution down. I have had my belief in the U.S. Senate renewed today. Because I have seen Senators on both sides of the aisle trying to come to grips with a very difficult, complex question. But the approach is going to have to be—as the leader and Senator BENTSEN and others have said—it is going to have to be a comprehensive approach. And there will be plenty of pain and no political gain. But we owe it to the Nation, and we are going to have to forget about being Democrats and Republicans and put the Nation first. And the man in the White House is going to have to lead. We are not now seeing that leadership. We are not getting it.

We cannot hope to solve this problem all by ourselves because the President will just sit down there and throw pot shots at the Congress.

That is what we are seeing now. That is the White House's program as the President goes into this election: Bash the Congress! And the press is eating it up. They love it! But that is not getting at the roots of the problem.

Mr. President, I thank the Senators who have introduced the amendment. It generated good debate. I thank those who have opposed it, and for good reason. I commit myself to my leader's service when he attempts to wrangle—when he attempts to deal with this difficult problem. I thank all Senators for their patience and contributions to the debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I would like to accommodate the Senator from New Mexico who made a request. I understand he said he just wants a few minutes to meet. I think he is entitled to that courtesy of 5 minutes. Might I suggest, Senators from Nebraska and Rhode Island want to speak? The situation we are in is that the regular order, as I understand it, would be a vote on this resolution. If we are going to proceed with it then I am going to offer amendments to it. I do not want to preclude anybody from speaking, but I do not want to lose my right to offer the amendments if they are going to proceed.

So the time is running against the resolution. If the Senators from Nebraska and Rhode Island wish to speak, I would like to do it in a manner that does not deprive the right I now have, which is to offer the amendment, if they are going to go forward.

Mr. EXON. Could I inquire of the majority leader, in full recognition of the Parliamentarian's discretion, if the majority leader could ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Nebraska be recognized for not to exceed 10 minutes without losing the majority leader's right to the floor?

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, would it be agreeable if I simply ask consent that no motions or amendments be in order until I am re-recognized? Then Senators can continue to address the subject and we can accommodate the Senator from New Mexico and the Senators from Rhode Island and Nebraska and the time will continue to be charged against the bill.

Mr. DOMENICI. I would wholeheartedly agree if you would consider for time purposes that that situation be for 10 minutes and then Senate MITCHELL will be recognized.

Mr. MITCHELL. Fine.

Mr. SASSER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader has the floor.

Mr. MITCHELL. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee for a comment or question.

Mr. SASSER. May I remind the majority leader that the Senator from Minnesota has been on the floor since early this morning wishing to be recognized, and we have been maintaining an informal list. He had risen to the top of it and he is followed by Senator EXON. I just make that comment in an effort to accommodate all Senators.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. DANFORTH. Who has the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader.

Mr. DANFORTH. Will the majority leader yield?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Mr. DANFORTH. I wonder, Mr. President, would it be possible, perhaps, to set this amendment aside and take up some other amendments so we can get some votes out of the way right now? This has been going on for 4 hours today. There have not yet been any votes and people are rescheduling planes. I think Senator DECONCINI has an amendment that I do not think will take very long but will require a vote and maybe we could in the next hour or so get off a few votes and then put this off until later in the day.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, if I might respond, it is, of course, a logical and plausible request. But since the Senator from New Mexico, who would necessarily be required to give that consent is right now in a meetings, and has indicated it is only going to take a few minutes, on whether he will withdraw or proceed with this amendment, I think we can probably save more time ultimately by bringing that to a conclusion right now. I think if it is withdrawn, it is my hope that the managers will be able to proceed to a prompt wrapup and disposition of this resolution to accommodate the Senator from Missouri and others. I think under the circumstances since we are very close to bringing this to an end, it would be best to permit it to do so.

Mr. CHAFFEE. Mr. President, I wonder if the majority leader would yield me 2 minutes?

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Rhode Island 2 minutes and I ask I be recognized at the conclusion of his remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is presently a request pending that there be 10 minutes during which period of time there be no amendments or resolutions offered.

Mr. MITCHELL. Or motions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Or motions.

Mr. MITCHELL. I renew that request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Senator from Rhode Island is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. CHAFFEE. Mr. President, Winston Churchill said on many occasions he had opportunities where he had been required to eat his words, and overall he found them rather delectable. I am in a similar situation, Mr. President. I suggested to the majority leader that I thought the administration never introduced a bill on the Clean Air Act. I was corrected in a very thoughtful manner by the majority leader. It turns out not only did the administration introduce a bill in August 1989, but I introduced it for them.

So, Mr. President, I publicly eat my words on that particular issue.

I would like to finish my remarks, if I might, Mr. President, by saying that I demur from the suggestion of the distinguished President pro tempore in his thought that we would not be able to get very far without the administration's leadership on this matter. I think we can. Again, I refer to those 10 points of commonality. Will we arrive at perfection? Probably not. But this year we do not have much time. We have a basis, something to work on, something that all of us subscribe to.

So I urge the majority leader on in his efforts and will cooperate in every fashion I can. I think we can really get something constructive done this year, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader controls the time. There is 8 minutes remaining.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Minnesota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. WELLSTONE. Mr. President, I really had intended earlier to give a rather lengthy statement about all this. I do not now think it is necessary. So much has already been said.

Let me just go on the record by making two points. One, it is very interesting that I heard from the Governor's office in Minnesota, a Republican Governor, and what I heard was, "Please oppose these caps." Their concern is just what has been stated on the floor which is that these caps, without having any real effective cost control with health care costs, means that we could run into a terrible amount of trouble back in our State. This would be especially true in our rural communities with Medicare reimbursement. What you would have happen—the majority leader spoke about this—would be cost shifting. That is to say, either doctors or hospitals are going to take care of people under Medicare or Medicaid and cover their costs, or they will not be able to, given the inflation and discrepancy between reimbursement and inflation, and they will just shift those costs.

Mr. President, let me one more time repeat the language of an amendment which I will offer unless the pending amendment is withdrawn. This would be after the other amendments and votes that the majority leader mentioned. My amendment would be as follows:

The [Domenici] amendment shall not be effective unless and until the President submits, the Congress enacts, and the President signs a comprehensive health care reform measure that includes a strong and effective cost containing program.

I really believe everybody should be for that amendment I just read, because I have heard the people who are for the caps say, "You are right, we have to control health care costs." I have heard those of us who have opposed those caps say that we do not want to do that unless we first control the costs—where we are really paying the price.

So it seems to me this is a nice kind of marriage made in heaven. I will offer this amendment unless the pending amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I yield 6 minutes to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. EXON. I thank the majority leader.

Mr. President, I have been listening with very keen interest to the remarks of the authors of this amendment, my friend and colleague from Georgia and my friend and colleague from New Mexico. I thought it was rather interesting to hear them tell about the storm of protest that is developing across the country to their amendment by a variety of sources, and I notice that both the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from New Mexico and I probably correctly say there are an awful lot of people who have been misled, who simply do not understand what they are trying to do, and false statements are being made against their amendment.

I thought it was so apropos because it happens to be that this Senator was in extended debate with those two same Senators yesterday and the day before that to try and make a modest reduction in the defense budget. At that time, all kinds of false statements were made on the floor of the Senate, not by people who might not be informed, but by people in this body who should be informed before they make remarks on the floor of the Senate.

In that regard, I must rush to protect, though, the veracity and the good common sense and the honesty and integrity of my good friend from Georgia, SAM NUNN. Never once during that debate, where he was on one side of the debate and I was on the other, did the chairman of the Armed Services Committee make any false accusations with regard to the intent or with regard to the numbers advanced for cutting the defense budget, as this Senator from Nebraska tried to do.

Likewise, I would like to come to the defense of the Senator from New Mexico. Although I did not remember or maybe hear all of his comments in opposition to the little budget cut from national defense that he joined Senator NUNN in posing, I do not believe that the Senator from New Mexico ever falsely implied that the Senator from Nebraska was doing things as other Members of this body on both sides of the aisle got up on the floor and said that EXON could not make his cuts without affecting manpower.

So I know that the Senator from Georgia and I know what the Senator from New Mexico is going through. But, Mr. President, here we go again. Some of the same who gave the country the Gramm-Rudman law—and its promise to balance the Federal budget—reconstituted under a new banner, have unveiled the latest device designed to exclusively and primarily take the heat off this body to cut the Federal budget now.

How many times must this body walk down the path of self-delusion before it learns that there are no painless cures, no secret bullets, and no magic machines which will reduce the Federal budget deficit next year or the year after that or even into the next century.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to not be fooled again. There is only one way to reduce the Federal budget deficit and that is to make hard choices.

If the Congress and the President want to reduce the deficit, there are really only three hard choices that we have to recognize and make. We can cut spending, we can raise revenues, or we can do a combination of both. There are no other ways to do it. There is nothing more nor less that we can do without encompassing those three key factors.

All these options that I have recommended—and if we are ever going to do anything, we are going to have to do it now—are not going to evade pain and sacrifice, pain and sacrifice this body apparently is unwilling to undertake as evidenced yesterday when this body shrunk by 4 or 6 votes away from a very limited reduction in the national defense expenditures.

I daresay in my public and private business life I have balanced more budgets than most either in this or the other body and, therefore, I clearly speak with some proven experience in this regard.

Less than 24 hours ago, to harken back to yesterday once again, this body demonstrated to the Nation that it was unwilling to make one of those hard choices when it rejected the Exon amendment to reduce defense spending by a mere $3.5 billion in 1993 outlays and $7.6 billion in budget authority below the resolution.

Now, those who passed on the opportunity to grab real deficit reduction right now with that vote yesterday attempt to shift attention to their latest, fanciful invention to cap entitlements.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. EXON. May the Senator ask for an additional 4 minutes under the previous agreement?

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent the Senator be permitted to continue for 4 minutes as under the previous agreement with the time charged equally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be the order.

Mr. EXON. As modest as the Exon amendment was, to make those cuts in 1993 as I have outlined, if the Exon amendment had been adopted at least over the next 5 years the Exon amendment alone would have reduced the deficit by $36.2 billion.

I guess Senator SARBANES said it well earlier. The combined savings of the Exon amendment, which was defeated yesterday, and the tax fairness bill recently vetoed by the President meets and exceeds the fiscal year 1997 savings produced by this amendment that we are now discussing.

If anyone needs to be convinced of the folly of this amendment, all they need to do is look at the history of the 1980's. After the Senate passed up the real deficit producers such as the freeze on budgets as Senator HOLLINGS and I offered year after year, the Senate brought into being a false and foolish promise of the Gramm-Rudman law and the budget summit agreement.

I would remind my colleagues that President Reagan promised a balanced budget in 1983. He failed. Gramm-Rudman promised a balanced budget in 1991. It failed. The son of Gramm-Rudman promised a balanced budget by the end of 1993. It failed. The much ballyhooed budget summit agreement promised a balanced budget in 1994, and it failed.

The new better mousetrap known as the entitlement cap will fail as well. The cynicism of this amendment is blatant. On page 2 of the talking points explaining this amendment, there is an admission that the entitlement cap will not even go into effect until 1994 and the sequester would not trigger until 1995. With a nudge and a wink, the code message to Senators is, "Do not worry; be happy. Let us just go on as we have in the past."

With this amendment, Members will tell their constituents, "I know I voted against the Exon amendment and other deficit-reducing amendments affecting your favorite program because I supported the entitlement cap which will save some really big dollars some time after the year 2000." Talk about budget odyssey.

The real danger in this amendment and the past amendments of its type is it holds out the false hope to the American people that this new Popsicle will not melt to sugar water outside of the freezer. A popsicle is a popsicle. The false promises of Gramm-Rudman 1 and 2 and the budget summit agreement allowed this body to fake rather than force action. The political establishment in Washington has delayed now for a decade facing this crisis with the Federal budget deficit.

The Nation can not and will not wait. The deficit is eating the economy alive and the American people know it. The public is smarter than we think. They will not buy this magical invention, however well intentioned.

The very architecture of the amendment works against serious deficit reduction. There are basically two entitlement programs which are really growing out of control and they are Medicare and Medicaid. They will continue their rampant growth until we act on health care. If these programs exceed the cap as they certainly will, reductions will be taken out of all entitlements, even those which have remained well below the cap. Such a system will discourage any chairman from seeking timely reductions in non-Medicare and Medicaid entitlements for fear of facing a double whammy, once when the cut is taken and again when the sequester is implemented. This amendment will also encourage members to pad their favorite entitlement programs to protect them from the expected cut.

In addition, what about those programs like agriculture which have already given at the office? No program has been reduced over the 1980's as has agriculture. Is it fair to cut agriculture because medical costs are increasing? The entitlement cap will further decimate American agriculture and hurt the State of Nebraska.

This amendment should be taken down for further study at least. It is nothing less, as structured, than a raid on the trust funds. As the Senator from Maryland so aptly pointed out last night, many of the so-called entitlements are programs supported by a dedicated source of revenue. Programs such as Medicare and railroad retirement have trust funds and sources of revenues to support their operations. If the entitlement cap works, it will further swell the trust funds so that they can be used to fund the day-to-day operations of the Federal Government just as the Social Security trust has been embezzled over the last several years.

This amendment should at least be taken down at this time. I yield the floor.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I am advised that the distinguished Senator from New Mexico is continuing his consultation with his colleagues. I believe it appropriate and fair to honor his request.

Therefore, I ask unanimous consent—

Mr. DECONCINI. Will the majority leader yield before he asks the question?

Will the majority leader now entertain setting this aside for 10 minutes to take an amendment on which we will ask for a rollcall vote—I do not think anybody will object to that—while they continue to discuss whatever it is they are discussing?

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, that would require the consent of the Senator from New Mexico, who is at this moment engaged in a meeting.

Mr. DECONCINI. May we try that?

Mr. MITCHELL. I would prefer to resolve the issue of his amendment one way or the other. However, we will get to that shortly.

Mr. President, to accommodate the request—

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I was going to suggest that the Senator from Arizona and I might briefly speak on the Senator's amendment.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator from New Mexico has reentered the Chamber.

Mr. DOMENICI addressed the Chair.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I have the floor. I am pleased to yield to the Senator from New Mexico for whatever comments he wishes to make while retaining my right to the floor.

Mr. DOMENICI. I have conferred with the other three sponsors of the substitute. It is our desire to proceed.

We understand there is the first amendment. We were told what it would be, removing the disabled veterans from the amendment in terms of excluding them. It would take them out; is that correct? Would that be the first amendment?

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, since the Senator's resolution is a substitute, I believe it is amendable in two degrees.

What I was going to do is proceed, and to have the Medicaid exemption to be the first-degree amendment; and then the veterans' compensation to be the second-degree amendment, on which we would vote; and then to have each of the provisions thereafter and vote on each of them in sequence. So we will end up having to vote on every single one of the provisions.

Mr. DOMENICI. Might I ask a parliamentary inquiry? If the majority leader filed the two amendments in sequence, as he just indicated, and we took a vote on the first amendment and the amendment succeeded, does the previous unanimous consent granting the Senator from New Mexico the privilege of withdrawing the entire substitute still apply?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico would still have the right to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. DOMENICI. We have conferred, and unless they want to say something, Senator NUNN is here, and I think we want to proceed with the first sequence of votes that you have discussed.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I would like to inquire and ask for the attention of the Senator from New Mexico. My understanding is that once I offered the first-degree amendment, there would then be 1 hour of time to be used or yielded back before the second-degree amendment, on which the first vote would occur, would be in order. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I am going to offer the first-degree amendment. I would suggest, in the interest of accommodating as many Senators as possible, that since we have already had more than enough debate on this, that in just a few minutes, we proceed to the offering of, the yielding back to the time, offering the second-degree amendment and the vote on that, if that is agreeable to my colleagues on the other side of the issue.

Mr. DOMENICI. I am agreeable at this moment that all time be yielded back immediately after you file the first-degree amendment, and that we do that right now; then we will take a minimum of time on the second amendment.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, might I suggest that we have something like 6 minutes equally divided, and then proceed to vote on the majority leaders amendment? It would be my view that this vote on the first amendment will basically forecast what will happen on the other amendment; that we do not need to put the Senate through the agony of voting on 12 or 13 separate amendments.

I do submit, I said a little while ago, I would be willing to exclude those programs going below the rate of inflation, because in my opinion they will not be affected, anyway. This is one of those programs. But since this is going to be the only vote, I think this is a very important symbolic vote. I think it determines whether the Senators are willing to begin excluding everything, which is what we have done for the last 10 years. And so, therefore, I will vote no on the amendment as a symbol of what is wrong with the procedures we have around here now; but not as if there is any reality that there is going to be any real cut in disabled veterans. I do not believe anyone believes that.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that it be in order for me to offer the first-degree and the second-degree amendments; that there then be 12 minutes of debate, equally divided, on the second-degree amendment; that it be in order for me now to request the yeas and nays on the second-degree amendment; and that the yeas and nays on the second-degree amendment occur after the use or yielding back of the 12 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 1778 TO AMENDMENT NO. 1777

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows: The Senator from Maine [Mr. MITCHELL] proposes an amendment numbered 1778 to amendment No. 1777.

On page 38, line 17 of the amendment, insert before the period the following: " , except that Medicaid shall be exempt from the cap and the cuts required by the mechanism described in this section."

AMENDMENT NO. 1779 TO AMENDMENT NO. 1778

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows: The Senator from Maine [Mr. MITCHELL] proposes an amendment numbered 1779 (to amendment No. 1778).

At the end of the matter proposed to be inserted, insert the following: " , Veterans' Compensation shall be exempt from the cap and the cuts required by the mechanism in this section".

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is aware that this time is 12 minutes' debate: 6 controlled by the majority leader; 6 by the Senator from New Mexico.

Who yields time?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 1 minute for the purpose of making a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, as I recall, the distinguished Senator from New Mexico [Mr. DOMENICI] earlier got the unanimous consent of the Senate that he might subsequently withdraw his amendment in the nature of a substitute. The Senate gave him that consent.

If his amendment is later amended, in my judgment, he does not have consent of the Senate to withdraw his substitute, as amended.

My parliamentary inquiry is, Does the unanimous-consent request that he earlier presented, and to which the Senate acceded, cover a later eventuality in the case of the substitute amendments having been amended?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has ruled that it does.

Mr. BYRD. I have to complain about the response of the Chair. In the future, I would like to know precisely what we are doing when we give a Senator the right to withdraw his amendment. Because once he starts down the road of having that amendment amended, the Senate might not want him to withdraw it.

I merely make that point, hoping that by making it on the RECORD, it will indicate how sometimes we act thoughtlessly on such requests.

I had earlier urged the distinguished Senator to withdraw this amendment, feeling that we had indeed accomplished something by generating a debate about the real problem, something that is real.

Now, I have no objection if the Senate wants to go ahead and vote on these things. I suppose we will. In my view, it is not a ruling by the Chair; it is just a response to a parliamentary inquiry. So there is no precedent here. I will not make a point of order, but I disagree with the Chair's position.

I think the Chair is wrong, and I say that with all proper respect to the Chair. The present occupant happens to be one of my favorite Senators.

With all due respect, I disagree with the Chair 100 percent.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, to obviate the possibility of this occurring as a precedent, I am going to suggest to the Senator from New Mexico that if we reach the point where he seeks to withdraw the amendment, that he then ask unanimous consent for it and not rely upon the prior authority.

Just so we do not create a problem in this regard, why do we not proceed with the debate now, and resolve that when we get to it?

Mr. DOMENICI. I am glad to do that, if you will assure me that at that moment I will get unanimous consent.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am going to try very hard to get unanimous consent.

Mr. DOMENICI. I will use 10 seconds and say to my friend from West Virginia, I ask unanimous consent—and perhaps I was not as clear as he would like, but I clearly intended this circumstance, that if that amendment was adopted, I could still withdraw it. I think the Senator will agree if I did that, the Senate could grant unanimous consent.

Mr. BYRD. No; I do not agree with that. It could, yes. But I do not agree that it should.

Mr. DOMENICI. All right.

Mr. President, how much time does the Senator from New Mexico have?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Five and a half minutes.

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield 2 minutes to the Republican leader.

AMENDMENT NO. 1779

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I want to commend the four Senators who have offered this amendment. I think we have to make a choice if we want to follow the path of Neil Kinnock in the welfare state, as they tried to do in Great Britain, without success. Or we can understand that we have responsibilities to disabled veterans and their families and everyone else, their children and grandchildren, and vote against the second-degree amendment.

The disabled veterans are just as concerned about the overall economy and about opportunities for their children and grandchildren, and for themselves, as anyone else. If we go down the list and exempt this group, this group, and this group, nobody is left; everybody is going to be exempt. Maybe we ought to examine Congress, too. That might be the best vote. Maybe we can exempt Congress, and we can have a real interest in how the vote came out. I think we are doing precisely the right thing. It is never too late to be responsible.

Mr. DOMENICI. Would the Senator from Georgia like 1 minute?

Mr. NUNN. Yes.

Mr. President, I have said probably all I need to say. I will vote against this amendment. I think there is no group in America that has done more for their children and grandchildren, indeed our country, than the disabled veterans. I do not believe the people who sacrificed so much for our country want to see our country go down economically, in spite of the fact that we have been able to be protected militarily. That is what we are talking about here.

The disabled veterans, and all veterans, had reductions below the cost of living from 1980 to 1990. They would not be affected by this amendment in any way. But if we start down this road of exclusion, we have made it clear that we will not only exclude those below the rate of inflation by growth, but every single program one by one. This determines, in my view, whether Senators would vote to exclude all of the others, leaving nothing but an empty shell. I will vote no.

Mr. ROBB. Mr. President, this vote is a gut check. As the Senator from Georgia has explained, it is a symbolic vote; it is not about veterans. As someone who spent 34 years affiliated with the armed service, and who has enormous respect for the veterans, paralyzed and others, that is not the point. If we are serious about deficit reduction, this is the way we send a message that we are serious about it. That is all this is. Otherwise, our ability to come to grips with the fiscal irresponsibility of the Federal Government is going to remain suspect.

I hope that those who understand the importance of the vote will vote their conscience and understand that the consequences of being held accountable by a number of groups that we support in many, many ways, will have to flow, if we are going to be serious about reducing the deficit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 2 minutes.

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield to Senator RUDMAN.

Mr. RUDMAN. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Virginia put it just right. This is not a vote about cutting veterans' benefits. This is a vote about taking a hard look at all of the entitlement programs to ensure that fairness exists and that their growth is curtailed where it can be fair to those who, in fact, may not be in need.

Unquestionably, disabled veterans have a need. I can say to the disabled veterans that I know—a number, I might add, Mr. President, I have known since the moment of their disability—that we are not setting forth a program to cut their benefits. We are setting in progress a program to save the standard of living for their children and their grandchildren and, to a larger degree, to ensure that as the year 2000 approaches, this country is fiscally able to discharge its responsibilities to those veterans.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I reserve 1 minute.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, who is in control of the time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ADAMS). The majority leader.

Mr. SASSER. I ask for 2 minutes.

Mr. MITCHELL. I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, this proposal before us has been hastily put together. It is ill-conceived. There have been no hearings on this proposal whatsoever. The proposal was not brought before the Budget Committee in the ordinary course of business for that committee to discuss. The proposal was presented to the body yesterday, really, by way of a press conference. That is where the chairman of the Budget Committee became aware that this particular substitute was coming before us.

With regard to the veterans here, let us look at what is happening to outlays for veterans' pensions. Outlays for veterans' pensions are steady from 1992 through 1994. This is not an area, or mandated area, of the so-called entitlement programs which is growing. Yet, this proposal subjects them to jeopardy as a result of the explosion in health care costs.

Under the CBO numbers, some have said this does not cut veterans' programs, but under the numbers produced by the Congressional Budget Office, veterans' compensation by 1997, under this proposal, would be cut by $1.408 billion. Veterans' pensions would be cut by $353 million. It does cut veterans. And I think, in the name of fairness, they ought to be excluded.

LETTERS IN OPPOSITION TO ENTITLEMENT CAPS

Mr. President, all Members should be aware of the depth of opposition to this entitlement cap proposal. I have received letters from Senate authorizing committee chairmen as well as a long list of organizations expressing unreserved opposition to this meat axe approach to controlling entitlement growth.

I would like to submit these letters for the RECORD, but let me just outline some of the major points:

Senator BENTSEN, chairman of the Finance Committee, recommends that we reject any form of entitlement caps. He points out that the reason entitlements are growing so fast is health care costs and that the real problem is not in Medicare and Medicaid, but in the larger health system of this country. He further points out that: "attacking health care costs through cuts in Medicare and Medicaid alone will only increase costs in the private sector."

Senator KENNEDY, chairman of the Labor and Human Resources Committee, has also sent me a letter protesting the entitlement cap proposal. He makes similar arguments about controlling health care costs throughout the system—not cutting programs serving the poor.

Senator CRANSTON, chairman of the Veterans Affairs Committee, has written a letter to Senator DOMENICI vigorously opposing entitlement caps. He points out that it could mean totally unfair cuts in Veterans programs including compensation, pensions, vocational rehabilitation, and GI bill educational benefits. We have also received a strongly worded letter from the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States protesting the proposal.

Senator GLENN, chairman of the Committee on Governmental Affairs, has also registered his opposition to an entitlement cap proposal which would subject civil service retirement to sequester as the result of growth in other direct spending.

Mr. President, I have letters here from groups representing the elderly, including the American Association of Retired Persons and the National Council of Senior Citizens; from groups representing children, including the Children's Defense Fund; from education groups, from representatives of labor organizations, from several hospital and other health care groups, and from many agricultural organizations.

They are all worried about the same thing I am: The entitlement cap proposal, as currently conceived, could force large cuts—through sequester or through a forced reconciliation process—on many programs which are not contributing to the entitlement growth problem. Veterans benefits, child nutrition, Supplemental Security Income, civil service retirement benefits, railroad retirement, foster care, student loans, and farm price supports to name a few.

Mr. President, I would like to submit a list of organizations who have contacted us in opposition to the entitlement cap proposal, and their letters, for the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
 COMMITTEE ON FINANCE,
 Washington, DC, April 2, 1992.

Hon. JIM SASSER,
 Chairman, Senate Committee on the Budget,
 Washington, DC.

DEAR JIM: I am writing to discuss the proposal in the President's budget which would create "caps" on the rate of growth of Federally funded entitlements such as Medicare, Medicaid, Guaranteed Student Loans and Veteran's Compensation payments. As you know, Senator Domenici, your Ranking Member of the Senate Budget Committee, introduced a Budget Resolution that contains an even more stringent version of entitlement caps.

Under these proposals, the rate of growth in aggregate entitlement spending would be capped each year. The maximum growth rate would be limited to the inflation rate plus the growth rate in the number of beneficiaries plus an additional percentage. Under Senator Domenici's plan, this additional percentage would be phased out to zero by 1997. According to Senator Domenici, if enforced, this would produce program cuts of $53 Billion between 1995 and 1997.

There is no question that entitlements as a class of programs are growing very rapidly. But the reason that entitlements are growing so fast is that the health care entitlements—Medicare and Medicaid—are increasing extremely rapidly. The Congressional Budget Office, in An Analysis of the President's Budgetary Proposals for Fiscal Year 1993 estimates that between 1992 and 2002, spending for Medicare and Medicaid will increase from 3.4% of GDP to 5.9% of GDP. During the same period, all other entitlements will decrease as a percentage of GDP.

However, the problem as we all know is not really in Medicare and Medicaid, but rather in the larger health care system of this country. Between 1975 and 1990, the growth rate in per enrollee costs was 2 percent higher for private insurance than for Medicare and Medicaid. Furthermore, according to a study of the Medicaid program done last summer under the auspices of the Office of Management and Budget, 60% of the growth in Medicaid program costs between 1980 and 1990 came from overall health care inflation in the economy. The problem of explosive health care costs is expected to continue: between 1992 and 1997, the inflation rate for overall medical costs is estimated to be twice that of high as the inflation rate in the economy as a whole.

Yet an entitlement cap marks all entitlements for cuts. This approach unnecessarily puts at risk programs that assists some of the most vulnerable Americans—the elderly, the blind, the disabled, veterans, children and rural families. It could affect the beneficiaries of Aid to Families with Dependent Children, Food Stamps, Guaranteed Student Loans, Veterans Programs, Farm Price Supports, the Social Services Block Grant.

Clearly we can best restrain the cost of Medicare and Medicaid growth if we can control costs in the overall health-care system. Indeed, Dr. Robert Reischauer, the Director of the Congressional Budget Office indicated in testimony before the Senate Finance Committee in April of last year that attacking health care costs through cuts in Medicare and Medicaid alone will only increase costs in the private sector. This will occur because lower payments under Medicare and Medicaid will cause health care providers to shift costs to employers and other private payers.

Therefore, while a crude "cap" on entitlement programs may reduce the Federal Government's expenditures, such caps will do nothing to arrest the underlying growth in health care costs and in fact, may exacerbate cost increases in the private sector. This effect will be especially problematic for small businesses whose health care costs are increasing at a rate far in excess of their ability to purchase insurance. The most effective way to accomplish the goal of containing growth in health care spending is to control costs in the health care system as a whole. I look forward to working with you towards this important objective. I recommend that you reject any form of entitlement caps in the Budget Resolution.

Sincerely,

LLOYD BENTSEN,
 Chairman.

COMMITTEE ON LABOR AND HUMAN RESOURCES,
 Washington, DC, April 6, 1992.

Hon. JIM SASSER,
 Chairman, Senate Budget Committee,
 Washington, DC.

DEAR JIM: I am writing to express my strong opposition to the arbitrary type of caps on entitlement spending proposed by President Bush and Senator Domenici.

While entitlement spending is projected to increase faster than the consumer price index and the budget as a whole in coming years, the vast majority of the "excess" increase in entitlement spending is due to Social Security—which is excluded from the current cap proposals—and to increases in Medicaid and Medicare.

Medicaid and Medicare are growing faster than other components of the economy because national health care costs are out of control. In fact, if Medicare, Medicaid, and Social Security are excluded, entitlement spending over the past decade has increased at a slower rate than the C.P.I. Between 1994 and 1997, if Senator Domenici's cap were in effect, Medicare and Medicaid would be $68 billion over the cap, and all other entitlements would be $15 billion below the cap.

Capping entitlement spending could have one of two results—both unacceptable. First, it could lead to arbitrary and unfair reductions in entitlements that are growing at a reasonable rate. Congress should not cut programs to feed hungry adults and children, to educate college students, to provide cash assistance to millions of elderly, disabled and other citizens living in poverty, to help poor families, and to meet retirement commitments to the military and civil service, all because health care costs are out of control.

Second, the cap proposal could lead to harsh and unacceptable cuts in spending on Medicare and Medicaid. At a time when 36 million Americans are uninsured and the number is rising every year, cuts in Medicaid would worsen an already disastrous situation and place further burdens on already hard-pressed state budgets.

Deeper cuts in Medicare would be equally unjustified. Today, Medicare already pays hospitals 10 per cent less than the cost of caring for elderly patients. As a result, the gap between Medicare payment levels and private payment levels continues to widen. In general, every dollar cut out of the Medicare program means a dollar in additional costs for average citizens with insurance and for businesses, as health care providers seek to recover Medicare underpayments by shifting costs to other citizens.

The solution to excessive entitlement spending is not to cap entitlements that are not out of control. It is not to slash Medicare and Medicaid while escalating costs in the health care system as a whole continues uncontrolled. In my view, the only realistic alternative is a program of comprehensive health care reform that will bring cost increases in the entire system down to a reasonable level. Until such reform is achieved, an entitlement cap proposal is not a true saving to the government—it is an unfair burden on the elderly and the poor.

I look forward to working with you on this issue, and I intend to oppose any arbitrary entitlement cap proposal.

Sincerely,

EDWARD M. KENNEDY.

U.S. SENATE,
 COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS,
 Washington, DC, March 27, 1992.

Hon. PETE V. DOMENICI,
 U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

Dear Pete: You have announced that you are planning to propose a program of direct-spending caps under which overall limits on mandatory spending (other than Social Security benefits) would be enforced through sequestration. As Chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, I am deeply concerned that this proposal would subject certain veterans entitlement programs to sequestration as the result of growth in other direct spending.

The precursor of your proposal appears to be the concept put forward in the Office of Management and Budget Director's Introduction to the President's FY 1993 Budget (page 1-15) to cap aggregate mandatory spending "at population-plus-CPI" plus a specified percentage allowance (either 2.5 percent or, if comprehensive health reform has been enacted, 1.6 percent). The concept is expressed in legislative form in title XLVI of S. 2217, a bill Senator Dole and you introduced on February 7, 1992, at the request of the Administration.

As shown in the March 3, 1992, analysis of S. 2217 prepared by the Director of the Congressional Budget Office (copy enclosed), using the 2.5-percent allowance above population and inflation factors, projected increases in non-VA direct spending in FYs 1993 and 1997 would result in sequestrations of $1.168 billion and $15.317 billion, respectively.

However, I understand that you are contemplating the use of a smaller and declining percentage allowance—2 percent for FY 1993, 1.5 percent in FY 1997, 1 percent in FY 1994, 0.5 percent in FY 1995, and zero percent in FY 1996. I am advised that, using these percentages, the sequestrations would be $3.3 billion in FY 1993, $5.3 billion in FY 1994, $11.4 billion in FY 1995, $20.8 billion in FY 1996, and $50.9 billion in FY 1997.

From the standpoint of veterans programs, these sequestrations would mean significant and totally unfair cuts in service-connected disability and survivors compensation, needs-based disability and death pensions for wartime veterans and their survivors, vocational rehabilitation for service-disabled veterans, and GI Bill educational benefits. I cannot imagine why you and the President believe that exposing these top-priority veterans programs to automatic reductions is good policy. In my view, the proposal is grossly unfair and would run the risk of defaulting on this nation's most fundamental obligations to those who made great sacrifices in answering the nation's call throughout a century marked by frequent armed conflicts.

For these and many other reasons, Pete, I urge you to reconsider this entire proposal. I agree with you that the deficits must be reduced and that strong and creative efforts must be made to control the health-care costs that are driving up the costs of Medicare and Medicaid and placing adequate health care beyond the reach of millions of Americans. However, we should not try to accomplish these goals through budget gimmicks that seek to force savings by threatening arbitrary cuts in programs that address our solemn commitments to veterans and their families and the basic needs of other Americans.

With warm regards,
Cordially,

ALAN CRANSTON,
Chairman.

U.S. SENATE, COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS,
Washington, DC, April 2, 1992.

Hon. JIM SASSER,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR JIM: It is my understanding that Senator Domenici is planning to propose a program of direct-spending caps under which overall limits on mandatory spending (other than Social Security benefits) would be enforced through sequestration. As Chairman of the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee, I am deeply concerned that this proposal would subject Civil Service retirement to sequestration as the result of growth in other direct spending.

I believe that the concept for this proposal was first put forward in the President's Fiscal Year 1993 budget to cap aggregate mandatory spending "at population-plus-CPI" plus a specified percentage allowance (either 2.5 percent or 1.6 percent). The President's budget proposed eliminating the protection from sequestration provided to the cost-of-living adjustments Federal civilian and military retirees receive. However, it proposed retaining the protection from sequestration for Social Security COLAs. The concept was expressed in legislative form in S. 2217, a bill Senator Dole and Sen. Domenici introduced on February 7, 1992, at the request of the Administration.

As I have said time and time again, I do not believe that one group of older Americans, simply because they chose public service, should be deprived of the inflation protection that other older Americans receive from Social Security. I believe that the Congress recognized this when it amended the Gramm-Rudman Budget Deficit Reduction Act in 1986 to exempt the COLAs of Federal retirees from sequestration in the same way that Social Security COLAs are exempt.

Moreover, I understand that Sen. Domenici is now contemplating the use of a formula more restrictive than that proposed in the President's budget. I am advised that the use of a smaller and declining percentage allowance—2 percent for FY 1993, 1.5 percent in FY 1994, 1 percent in FY 1995, 0.5 percent in FY 1996 and zero percent in FY 1997, would result in estimated sequestrations of $3.3 billion in FY 1993, $5.3 billion in FY 1994, $11.4 billion in FY 1995, $20.8 billion in FY 1996, and $50.9 billion in FY 1997.

From the standpoint of Civil Service retirement, these sequestrations would mean significant and totally unfair cuts in retiree inflation protection. In the last Congress, Sen. Domenici introduced S. 416 which was referred to the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee. That measure stated that Federal civilian and military retirees would receive their full cost-of-living adjustments in Fiscal Years 1990 and 1991. I do not understand what has changed so dramatically that these same retirees should now have their COLAs subject to sequestration.

Sincerely,

JOHN GLENN,
Chairman.

AARP,
Washington, DC, March 27, 1992.

Hon. JIM SASSER,
Chairman, Senate Budget Committee,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: The President's FY 1993 budget includes a number of proposals to change the budget process. Of special concern is the proposal to put a cap on the growth of mandatory (entitlement) spending. This type of proposal calls for growth in entitlement spending to be limited to a specific arbitrary level. If spending in any entitlement program exceeds this arbitrary ceiling, reconciliation is triggered. If reconciliation fails to bring spending into line, a sequester of entitlements results.

Any proposal to place an arbitrary cap on mandatory spending is a direct attack on Medicare and Medicaid because the growth in health care costs generally and in the federal budget has far exceeded general rates of inflation. These types of proposals do nothing to control ever-increasing health care costs. Since the early 1980's, Congress has subjected Medicare to a series of cuts. These efforts have slowed the rate of growth in Medicare. But, despite these efforts, it has not been possible to keep the rate of growth in federal health programs near the general inflation rate.

A mandatory cap would simply require ever deeper cuts in Medicare without any regard for the overall effectiveness of the program. The attached chart shows the magnitude of cuts required over the next five years (FY 93-FY 97) if the President's proposal (limiting growth to the consumer price index plus 2.5 percent) were to be adopted. Almost $33 billion in cuts would be necessary, over and above the $43 billion through FY 95 required by the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1990. Other proposals with lower caps would only make these cuts worse. Cuts of this severity would endanger access and quality care for all Medicare beneficiaries.

AARP urges you to oppose any proposal to arbitrarily limit entitlement spending. They are nothing less than a thinly veiled attack on Medicare. Further, mechanistic budget "reforms" do nothing to address the real need for systemic health care reform.

Sincerely,

HORACE B. DEETS.

NATIONAL COUNCIL OF SENIOR CITIZENS,
Washington, DC, April 2, 1992.

Hon. JIM SASSER,
Chairman, Committee on the Budget,
U.S. Senate, Dirksen Senate Office Building,
Washington, DC.

DEAR CHAIRMAN SASSER: The National Council of senior Citizens (NCSC), on behalf of our five million members and 5,000 clubs and Councils nationwide, urges you to oppose Senator Domenici's proposal to place a budget cap on entitlement programs. We find this to be the most outrageous attack on the elderly we have seen in years.

This proposal could do serious harm to such critical programs as Medicare, Medicaid, veterans' benefits, civil service, military and railroad retirement, food stamps and SSI. All of these are vital programs for the elderly which NCSC has long worked to defend. Moreover, once Congress has acted to cap trust fund financed programs, such as Medicare and railroad retirement, we foresee targeting Social Security for the next cap.

Senator, the National Council of Senior Citizens urges you to do all that is in your power to stop this assault on the elderly, the poor and the most vulnerable of our society. Thank you.

Sincerely,

LAWRENCE T. SMEDLEY,
Executive Director.

NATIONAL COMMITTEE TO PRESERVE,
SOCIAL SECURITY AND MEDICARE,
Washington, DC, April 9, 1992.

Hon. JIM SASSER,
Chairman, Senate Committee on the Budget,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR SASSER: On behalf of the nearly five million members and supporters of the National Committee to Preserve Social Security and Medicare, I urge you to vigorously oppose the proposal to impose a cap on entitlement spending which will apparently be offered by Senators Domenici, Rudman, Nunn and Robb during Senate consideration of the budget resolution.

An entitlement cap would be simple another attempt, like the unsuccessful automatic sequestration procedures under Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, and the procedures enacted in the Budget Enforcement Act of 1990, to somehow bring the budget under control without addressing the real underlying causes of the budget deficit.

The notion that entitlement spending is responsible for the deficit turns out to be wrong when the issue is carefully considered. The Congressional Budget Office concluded in this year's report to the Budget Committees that total spending on entitlements grew rapidly as a percent of Gross Domestic Product (GDP) from the early 1960's but "most of the increase occurred by 1975." In fact over the past decade, all of the components of entitlement spending, except for Medicare and Medicaid during the 1990's is attributable primarily to spiraling health care costs and increases in the beneficiary population and merely mirrors trends in the entire health care sector. If a cap were imposed on entitlements, uncontrolled increases in medical costs will force cuts in benefits to seniors and the disabled and some of the additional costs of uncompensated care will be shifted to the private sector.

America's seniors have made many sacrifices over the years for the goal of fiscal responsibility. I strongly urge you to oppose arbitrary spending caps for entitlement programs. Congress must address this nation's health care crisis in a comprehensive and fair manner.

Sincerely,

MARTHA A. MCSTEEN,
President.

CHILDREN'S DEFENSE FUND,
Washington, DC, April 1, 1992.

Hon. JIM SASSER,
Chair, Senate Budget Committee, U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I am writing to express my dismay that some members of the Senate are considering placing a cap upon entitlement programs. Children, our nation's future, will be the primary victims of such an arbitrary rule. Children already face enormous burdens and obstacles in our country, and the entitlement programs for them are already the stingiest and most limited. Placing a cap upon entitlement programs will only exacerbate these problems. At a time when we have opportunities to make a real difference for our children, it is unacceptable, both morally and politically, for Congress to pass such an arbitrary rule.

The Congressional Budget Office lists the following programs which benefit children and their families as covered by an entitlement cap: Foster Care and Adoption Assistance; Medicaid, Unemployment Compensation, Food Stamps, Family Support (AFDC); Child Nutrition programs, Supplemental Security Income (SSI); and guaranteed student loans. These are the very same programs which are rescuing children and their families during this current recession. It is the very fact that they are not capped which has provided the much-needed, if wholly inadequate, "safety net."

The costs of health care are the source of the large entitlement spending increases. But capping Medicare and Medicaid is the wrong answer at a time when access to health care for the elderly and the poor is becoming harder. The nation needs a national strategy to guarantee access to health care while restraining costs in the entire health sector. Capping just Medicare and Medicaid without attacking the problems of the health care system will not control health care inflation, but it will shift costs and reduce access to quality care for the most vulnerable part of the population. Including an across-the-board cap on other entitlements that have not been growing except when driven up by recession or other crises will mean that basic programs desperately needed by children and their families, those listed above, would be cut simply by rising health costs. This is illogical and inhumane. It effectively undermines all of the very laudatory purposes which the Congress has in mind when it created these programs.

I repeat, the plight of children in America is worsening. There are now over 13 million children in our country living in poverty. Over 100,000 of our children go to sleep each night homeless. An entitlement cap will arbitrarily wreak additional havoc in vulnerable lives which need support and stability from their government. For all the same reasons that you do not want Social Security under the cap, children's programs should not be subject to a cap.

If I or my staff can be of assistance to you, please do not hesitate to contact me.

Sincerely,

MARIAN WRIGHT EDELMAN,
President.

COMMITTEE FOR EDUCATION FUNDING,
Washington, DC, April 2, 1992.

DEAR SENATOR: It is our understanding that some of the budget proposals that will be offered today in the Budget Committee would not only cut funding for all domestic discretionary programs, including education, but would further jeopardize the future of this nation by imposing another set of arbitrary mechanisms to take the place of responsible prioritizing.

The education, nutrition and health needs of our nation's children cannot continue to take a backseat to arbitrary budget caps that are used as a substitute for political will. Therefore, the member organizations of the Committee for Education Funding (CEF) urge you to reject: (1) any budget plan or amendment that would place child nutrition and student loan programs at risk by setting a cap on all entitlement spending; (2) any proposal that cuts education or that extends the current separate budget caps on defense and nondefense spending that would result in future education cuts; and (3) any amendment that would strike a reserve fund for education and children's initiatives or that would require cuts in other education programs to pay for these initiatives.

At the same time that hundreds of economists are calling for an immediate investment in education to ensure the nation's long-term economic growth, the Administration and Congress have preserved the status quo by maintaining separate caps on defense and domestic spending, negating the possibility of a substantial investment in education this year. Extending these caps beyond FY 1993 will further delay vital reinvestment in America and nullify Congress' ability to respond to ever-changing world events.

Imposing a third cap on the budget process—a cap on entitlements—would threaten to deny school lunches to our poorest children and loans to needy students to continue their education. Capping entitlements could result in a sequester on all mandatory programs—including programs that have seen little to no real growth—without regard for the overall effectiveness of the program or the needs of our children.

The Committee for Education Funding agrees that deficit reduction is a priority. However, to sacrifice our children's educational opportunity in the name of deficit reduction is not only unconscionable, but unsound economic policy. We can no longer mortgage our children's future nor can we deny them a future of their own.

We urge you to vote against any budget proposal that would adversely affect the national investment in the education of our children.

Sincerely,

THE CEF EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

Re Caps on Entitlement Programs.

Hon. JIM SASSER,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR SASSER: The American Medical Association previously expressed concern over the Administration's FY 1993 budget proposal to cap entitlement programs. Even before the editorial that appeared in the March 30 Washington Post, we pointed out that such an action would only continue an unfortunate trend of effecting arbitrary cuts in human service program funding that can only lead to reduced access to needed medical services.

The results of arbitrary caps are seen each year in state Medicaid programs that simply stop paying for health care services provided at the end of the year. This type of action undercuts the very foundation of entitlement programs that are designed to address human needs and to assure that funds will be available to meet those needs.

While we certainly recognize that there are aspects of entitlement programs that need change, a cap only delays the essential step of careful examination of each program and action to redirect these programs so they truly operate to aid those individuals in need of government support. The American Medical Association urges adoption of a rational approach to address the growth of entitlement programs, rather than adoption of an arbitrary and potentially harmful cap. We are eager to work with the Congress and the Administration in the process of a realistic review of entitlement programs to determine if current format should be retained. Such careful examination and studied action will prove to be the only effective and humanitarian way to reduce entitlement spending.

Sincerely,

JAMES S. TODD, M.D.

Hon. PETE V. DOMENICI,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR DOMENICI: As organizations representing health care providers, we strongly urge you to reject any attempt to place caps on Medicare, Medicaid, or other entitlement spending during your consideration of the fiscal year (FY) 1993 budget resolution.

Imposing caps on Medicare and Medicaid spending, as well as other entitlements, would arbitrarily restrict spending on health care without any rational basis and avoids dealing with the reasons for health care cost inflation. By failing to address the underlying causes for the growth in health spending, this proposal would aggravate, rather than relieve, the defects inherent in our health care system. Spending caps would not spur necessary fundamental change in the health delivery system so that it is more patient-centered, but would simply lock in the status quo without any real reform.

Over the years, Medicare and Medicaid have seriously underpaid most of America's providers for the care they render. Further cutbacks could only have an adverse impact on the ability of providers to continue offering the same level of high quality care.

Furthermore, placing caps on Medicare and Medicaid spending would force providers to shift more costs to privately insured patients in order to break even.

While we recognize the difficulties of achieving meaningful deficit reduction, we do not believe that placing arbitrary caps on entitlement spending should be a basis for accomplishing this end. Neither will it result in sound health policy. We, therefore, strongly urge you to oppose any effort to place caps on entitlement spending as you develop your FY 1993 budget resolution.

Sincerely,

FOOD RESEARCH & ACTION CENTER,
Washington, DC, April 1, 1992.

Hon. JAMES SASSER,
Chairman, Senate Budget Committee, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: We are writing to express our opposition to proposed annual caps on entitlement spending. As an organization dedicated to alleviating hunger and poverty in this country, these entitlement caps will have devastating implications on our agricultural and nutrition programs. The Congressional Budget Office estimates that the Domenici entitlement cap proposal will prevent approximately 12 million children currently receiving nutritional benefits from getting a nutritionally adequate diet. We urge you to defeat all attempts to cripple vital anti-hunger programs by placing entitlement caps on them.

A cap on entitlement programs is not the answer to growing program costs. Most experts agree that the root cause of the increased costs lies in the area of health care. Health care costs are spiralling at such alarming rates that even if caps are proposed, health care costs will exceed their cap. The answer is health care cost containment, not caps on nutrition programs for low income, vulnerable populations.

In a year when reports documenting childhood hunger continue to demonstrate the need for stronger anti-hunger programs, we feel the direction that the administration and some supporters of a cap are taking is ill-advised. Families facing hard times must be able to depend upon strong and viable food assistance programs. A cap on the food stamp and child nutrition programs would inevitably lead to program cuts resulting in the exclusion of eligible participants and benefit reductions.

We urge you and the members of your Committee to vigorously oppose all efforts to place these egregious caps on entitlement programs. We appreciate and applaud your continuing efforts to safeguard our nation's anti-hunger and poverty programs. Thank you.

Sincerely,

EDWARD M. COONEY,
Deputy Director.

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES, AFL-CIO,
Washington, DC, April 1, 1992.

Hon. JIM SASSER,
Chairman, Senate Budget Committee, Washington, DC.

DEAR CHAIRMAN SASSER: On behalf of the 700,000 federal workers represented by the American Federation of Government Employees, AFL-CIO, and the millions of U.S. citizens served through the federal programs we administer, I urge you to reject outright any and all attempts to impose a cap on entitlement spending during the Senate Budget Committee deliberation of the fiscal year 1993 budget resolution.

Most of the citizens who would be affected by such a cap are among the poorest and most disadvantaged in our society. Medicare, Supplemental Security Income, and Aid to Families with Dependent Children would be placed under the proposed cap. In addition, veterans, military and federal civilian retirement programs would be subject to reductions. Many of these retirees receive minimal benefits. If the proposed entitlement cap is enacted, soon lawmakers will argue that in the interest of fairness, we must cap social security as well. The administrative budgets of all these entitlement programs could also be cut under this proposal. In many federal agencies where AFGE members work such as the Health Care Financing Administration, the Department of Veterans Affairs, and the Social Security Administration, to name only a few, we are already laboring under crushing workloads. Reductions in spending for entitlement programs will serve only to stifle the delivery of benefits which American citizens need and deserve. In addition, cuts in Medicare and Medicaid will only lead to cost shifting to another sector of the health care payment pool. What America needs is genuine health care reform, not entitlement caps.

Americans depend on these vital federal programs for their basic support. It is unfair and unconscionable to demand that they continue to sacrifice. At the same time, the entitlement cap proposal would provide for additional tax cuts of $27 billion in 1993—increasing by $27 billion the amount that would have to be cut from entitlement programs.

AFGE members too are worried about the deficit. But we recommend that it be reduced not by cutting benefits and earned entitlements to the needy, unfortunate and average working and middle class citizens, but by reforming the nation's health care system, reducing defense expenditures in a rational, thoughtful manner and by increasing federal revenues through higher and more progressive taxes on corporations and the wealthy. If you have any questions, please contact Beth Moten or Chapin Wilson in AFGE's Legislative Department at (202) 639-6413.

Sincerely,

JOHN N. STURDIVANT,
National President.

THE NATIONAL TREASURY
EMPLOYEES UNION,
April 2, 1992.

Hon. JIM SASSER,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR SASSER: It has come to our attention that proposals may be offered in the Budget Committee to cap entitlement spending. We ask you to oppose such amendments.

NTEU, as the exclusive representative of 150,000 active and retired federal employees, is particularly concerned about the impact of entitlement caps on federal retirees' cost of living adjustments, which would fall under such a cap. We are also very concerned that if an entitlement cap is adopted, but not met, sequestration will be the result. Federal employees have spent too much time already under furlough and RIF threats because of the possibility of sequestration. We urge you not to set up sequestration stand-offs for the future by enacting entitlement caps.

We look forward to working with you to fashion a fair and workable budget resolution.

Sincerely,

ROBERT M. TOBIAS,
National President.

NATIONAL FEDERATION OF FEDERAL EMPLOYEES,
Washington, DC, April 3, 1992.

Senator JIM SASSER,
Chairman, Senate Budget Committee, Washington, DC.

DEAR CHAIRMAN SASSER: It has come to our attention that proposals may be offered this week in the Senate Budget Committee to place caps on entitlement spending. On behalf of the nearly 150,000 federal employees that we represent, we ask that you and your colleagues oppose these amendments.

The National Federation of Federal Employees (NFFEE) has felt the brunt of budget blows over the past eleven years. In fact a recent GAO report indicated that federal employees have taken more than $119 billion in cuts through the 1988 budget cycle. NFFEE is particularly concerned that entitlement caps would adversely affect federal retirees' cost of living adjustments. We are also concerned that entitlement cuts that are not met will be followed by sequestration. We urge you and your colleagues to reject any proposals that would impose entitlement caps and create a system that will inevitably result in sequestration.

Sincerely,

SHEILA K. VELAZCO,
National President.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF LETTER CARRIERS,
Washington, DC, April 1, 1992.

Hon. JAMES SASSER,
Chairman, Senate Budget Committee, Washington, DC.

DEAR CHAIRMAN SASSER: It has been brought to our attention that an amendment will be offered to your budget resolution mark, which is designed to cap entitlements.

In reviewing the amendment it appears to us that the proposal would slash entitlements resulting in cuts to active and retired letter carriers' benefits.

As a Member of the Governmental Affairs Committee you are better aware than most, that, historically, every time Congress has ventured down the road to cap entitlements, they reach the end of that road with only us; federal/postal active and retired employees, on board. All the brave talk aside, the political conclusion has always been federal/postal employees and retirees are "gettable." Members of Congress have shown themselves to be timid, if not downright frightened, about taking on other so-called entitlement programs.

Federal/postal employees and retirees have endured institutional, pay and benefits cuts, amounting to over $1 trillion over the last 13 years. As a former President of the United States once said, "Here we go again!"

We are, therefore, asking the Members of the Budget Committee to reject this amendment and work for a solution to the budget problem that is equitable.

Sincerely,

VINCENT R. SOMBROTTO,
President.

VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS
OF THE UNITED STATES,
April 1, 1992.

Hon. PETE DOMENICI,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR DOMENICI: This is written to express the shock and outrage of the 2.2 million member Veterans of Foreign Wars at your announced program to reduce VA Compensation and Pension payments to America's sick and disabled veterans by including them in a program of direct spending caps to be imposed on all mandatory federal spending with the exception of Social Security benefits.

Your proposal would seem to be based upon an Office of Management and Budget concept which was contained in the introduction to the President's FY 1993 budget—and later expressed in legislative form in title XLVI of S. 2217, a bill Senator Dole and you introduced on February 7—to cap aggregate mandatory spending so as not to exceed an annually adjusted figure based on the beneficiary population plus the CPI together with a specified percentage allowance. Your proposal would enforce those caps through sequestration.

This would constitute a grievous injustice to our disabled veterans. These sequestrations would necessitate large and totally unfair cuts in service-connected-disability and survivor's compensation, needs-based disability and death pensions for wartime veterans and their survivors, vocational rehabilitation for service-disabled veterans, and GI

Bill educational benefits. It is inconceivable to us that either you or the President would countenance and put forward this plan to subject veterans programs to automatic reductions.

Adding a note of painful irony to this plan is the fact that through the years veteran's programs have grown at a much slower rate than is even called for under your proposal's annual indexing formula. But by treating all mandatory spending as an aggregate you would lump veterans together with those non-veteran programs whose costs have far outpaced inflation, and funding for sick and disabled veterans would be sequestered as well. Veterans lose twice under this scenario, first, because unlike others they have done their part through the years by accepting COLAs that were in line with the CPI; and now, secondly, because their already meager compensation and pension payments would be subject to additional sequestration cuts under your proposal. This would be totally unjust and is at odds with our nation's moral commitment to care for those who suffered and sacrificed so much in order that we might all remain free.

Thus I urge you in the strongest terms, on behalf of the entire VFW membership as well as all of America's veterans, to refrain from pursuing this proposal which would greatly harm America's disabled veterans.

Sincerely,

ROBERT E. WALLACE,
Commander in Chief.

DISABLED AMERICAN VETERANS,
Washington, DC, April 6, 1992.

Hon. ALAN CRANSTON,
Chairman, Committee on Veterans' Affairs, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: The Disabled American Veterans (DAV) shares your deep concern that should Senator Pete Domenici's proposed program of direct spending caps on mandatory spending become law, it would subject certain veterans' entitlement programs to sequestration as a result of growth in other direct spending programs.

Senator Cranston, as you are well aware, VA entitlements are not a major contributing factor in the every increasing federal deficit. Quite to the contrary. The number of veterans and their survivors who receive service-connected disability and death compensation payments has been on the decline for the past several years. Additionally, the percentage of federal outlays spent on VA benefits and services has been cut in half from 4.4 percent in 1977 to 2.2 percent in 1991.

I also wish to point out that the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1990 (OBRA) required VA to reduce spending on veterans' entitlements by $620 million in Fiscal Year 1991 and a total of $3.35 billion through Fiscal Year 1995. To meet these spending reduction requirements, VA was required to: suspend payments to certain incompetent veterans; institute a $2.00 copayment for prescriptions; repeal provisions which permitted re-entitlement to survivors' benefits upon termination of a former spouse's or child's marriage; limit vocational rehabilitation to certain service-connected disabled veterans; limit burial benefits to wartime veterans and delay a COLA for service-connected disability and death benefit recipients.

While veterans' benefits were being reduced or eliminated, other federal entitlements were being enhanced. The remarriage provisions for CIA surviving spouses was liberalized and increased protection was being afforded to incompetent Social Security beneficiaries. Suffice it to say, that veterans were not treated fairly under OBRA.

To repeal current sequestration protections afforded veterans' entitlements and once again reduce veterans' benefits—especially as a result of increased spending by other federal entitlement programs—is unconscionable.

Senator Cranston, DAV certainly appreciates your efforts to point out the inequities contained in Senator Domenici's proposed program of direct spending caps and we look forward to your continuing advocacy on behalf of America's services-connected disabled veteran population.

Sincerely,

CLEVELAND JORDAN,
National Commander.

THE AMERICAN LEGION,
Washington, DC, March 31, 1992.

Hon. JIM SASSER,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR SASSER: The American Legion has learned that the Senate Budget Committee is expected to consider within the next several days a proposal which would impose enforceable caps on mandatory spending. It is our understanding that the proposal could lead to cuts in various entitlements, including such veterans benefits as disability compensation, needs-based pension, vocational rehabilitation and GI Bill educational assistance.

Our organization strongly opposes this idea. It appears that the pending plan to impose mandatory spending restraints is the 1992 version of similar initiatives in recent years to control budgetary growth by applying across-the-board cuts. As our organization has stated repeatedly, such cuts fail to consider the merit of individual entitlements. Also, they fail to consider which of those entitlements have contributed most to the burgeoning federal budget. You can be sure that veterans benefit entitlements are not within the budget-busting group.

In particular, we find it incredible one year after Operation Desert Storm that a proposal is being offered to potentially cut GI Bill benefits. This comes on the heels of (1) an administration budget which would make the "up front" cost of those benefits more expensive for the active duty member and (2) an overwhelming Senate vote several weeks ago to increase educational assistance for non-veterans by raising the maximum Pell Grant benefit by 50 percent.

Your attention to The American Legion's views on this matter is deeply appreciated.

Sincerely,

PHILIP RIGGIN,
National Legislative Director, Commission.

PARALYZED VETERANS OF AMERICA
Washington, DC, April 2, 1992.

Hon. JIM SASSER,
Chairman, Committee on the Budget, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR CHAIRMAN SASSER: On behalf of the members of Paralyzed Veterans of America (PVA), I urge your strong opposition to an effort which would impose direct spending caps under which overall limits on mandatory spending would be enforced through sequestration. While PVA recognizes the importance of controlling growth in federal spending and reducing the growing national deficit, this proposal arbitrarily would subject entitlement programs for the nation's disabled and poorest veterans to sequestration; sequestration that is the result of growth in other direct spending programs. Additionally, this proposal exempts Social Security benefits thereby establishing a gross inequity in the treatment of America's veterans.

The proposal, which we understand will be sponsored by Senator Domenici, Ranking Member of the Budget Committee, is based upon the earlier OMB proposal contained in the President's Fiscal Year 1993 Budget. This earlier proposal would cap combined mandatory spending based on a "population plus CPI" with an established percentage allowance. The newer proposal would establish the cap using a smaller allowance factor.

Both these approaches to controlling mandatory spending are inherently unfair to veterans. Both would force reductions in veterans' benefits due to uncontrollable growth in other programs. To force cuts in compensation for service-connected disabilities and survivors benefits, disability pensions for wartime veterans, vocational rehabilitation and educational benefits is to abrogate the Nation's commitment to the men and women who have served in the Armed Forces.

Again, I urge your opposition to any proposal to establish mandatory spending caps which targets veterans' benefits for reduction while exempting other mandatory programs or which would cut funding of veterans' programs due to growth in other entitlement areas.

Thank you.

Sincerely,

VICTOR S. MCCOY, Sr.,
National President.

NATIONAL COTTON COUNCIL OF AMERICA,
Washington, DC, April 1, 1992.

Hon. JIM SASSER,
Chairman, Budget Committee, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: We understand that an amendment will be offered tomorrow during the mark-up on the budget resolution. It would place a cap on total entitlement spending.

The amendment assumes a mandatory cap, effective with Fiscal Year 1994, calculated to permit caseload growth, inflation growth and an additional 2 percent growth. The additional 2 percent growth would phase out to zero by 1997, permitting entitlement programs to grow for caseload and inflation only. Social security would be excluded.

The National Cotton Council is concerned about the impact this proposal would have on agricultural programs. Compared to other entitlement programs agriculture programs differ significantly. They are fluid and respond to changes in weather patterns and global economies. Also, effective farm program operation is contingent on sufficient participation by producers. Upon sign-up each year farm program participants must comply with specific program regulations and planting restrictions including environmental requirements. Spending caps result in further uncertainty about program benefits while strict compliance for eligibility must be met.

Furthermore, economic factors as well as budget obligations are forcing farm program spending to decline while spending on other entitlement programs such as health care has been steadily increasing. With the proposed "spending cap" agriculture programs would be forced to compensate for this increase. This would result in significant reductions in important programs. Furthermore, when projected spending exceeds the "spending cap" the budget committees would be forced to reconcile and cut further to achieve a designated level required by the cap.

During the 1990 budget compromise agricultural programs were forced to assume a disproportionate share of spending cuts. Agriculture programs are unique, and differ significantly from other programs. They cannot afford any further cutbacks and many are unable to achieve their goals because of under-funding. It is unfair to place them under a specific cap or to ask for further cuts in these programs when the entire agriculture community is already assuming more than its share in deficit reduction.

We believe in reasonable and fair approaches toward deficit reduction, but the "spending cap" proposal is neither. American farmers cannot afford to assume the burden of further cuts nor should they be forced to compensate for runaway spending in other entitlement programs. The "spending cap" singles them out and asks them to give much more than their share. Please consider this when you vote in the Budget Committee tomorrow.

Sincerely,

JOHN MAGUIRE,

Vice President—Washington Operations.

U.S. RICE PRODUCERS' GROUP,

Washington, DC, April 1, 1992.

Hon. TRENT LOTT,

Senate Committee on the Budget, SD-621 Dirksen Senate Office Building, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR LOTT: We understand that an amendment may be offered tomorrow during the mark-up on the budget resolution that would place a cap on total entitlement spending.

As we understand the proposal, it would impose a mandatory cap, effective with fiscal year 1994, calculated to permit caseload growth, inflation growth and an additional 2 percent growth. The additional 2 percent growth would phase out to zero by 1997, permitting entitlement programs to grow thereafter for caseload and inflation only. Social security would be excluded under the proposal. We further understand that cuts in agriculture (function 350) would be made beginning in 1993.

We are concerned about the impact this proposal would have on the agriculture programs. Farm program spending has been declining since 1986 because of changes in legislation that froze the yield on which payments could be made, reduced the target price by 10%, and disqualified 15% of the eligible acreage from receiving any payments. On the other hand, spending on other entitlement programs such as health care programs has been steadily increasing. Under the proposed spending cap, agriculture programs would be forced to compensate for this increase. When projected spending over-all for the entitlement programs (after eliminating social security) exceeds the spending cap, the budget committees would be forced to reconcile and order cuts in all entitlement programs to achieve the designated level required by the cap. Agriculture would be included, even though it has been cut substantially since 1986 and may not have contributed at all to the increased spending.

During the 1990 budget compromise and previously, the agriculture programs were forced to assume a disproportionate share of spending cuts. Agriculture programs cannot afford any further cutbacks. In fact, most rice producers are barely scraping by and rely on the farm program to continue in business. Their costs of production have been increasing while program benefits have been declining. It is unfair to ask for further cuts in the farm programs when the entire agriculture community is assuming more than its share in deficit reduction.

We believe in reasonable and fair approaches towards deficit reduction, but the proposed amendment is not the means towards that end. American farmers should not be asked to assume the burden of further cuts nor be forced to compensate for spending increases in other entitlement programs.

Sincerely yours,

ROBERT M. BOR,
Washington Counsel,
U.S. Rice Producers' Group.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF

WHEAT GROWERS,

Washington, DC, April 1, 1992.

Hon. JIM SASSER,

Chairman, Committee on the Budget,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR SASSER: On behalf of the National Association of Wheat Growers (NAWG) I would like to apprise you of our concern regarding the budget decisions you will be asked to make in the next few days.

As you may know, those of us within the agriculture arena believe our sector of the economy bore a disproportionate share of the budget cuts in the 1990 budget agreement. A majority of the $13.6 billion in agriculture cuts fell squarely on the shoulders of program commodities such as wheat. Wheat producers saw their income support slashed via a 15 percent reduction in support acreage from 1990 through 1995. Furthermore, wheat and feed grains producers are slated for a further erosion in income in 1994 and 1995 when the budget agreement will change the way in which deficiency payments are calculated. With this as a backdrop, you can understand why our industry views budget deliberations with a great deal of anxiety.

While wheat growers recognize the need to curb federal spending, we are also adamant that spending decisions be made fairly and equitably. The NAWG is concerned about the specter of an entitlement spending cap as proposed in the President's budget. Our concern is that unless significant reforms are made in the health care arena; spending on those entitlements will force deep cuts in all entitlement areas including agriculture. In essence, farm programs may become the funding mechanism for medicare and medic-aid cost overruns.

We thank you for the opportunity to express our views. As a member of the budget committee, we urge you to carefully consider the equity impact of any entitlement cap proposal which may come before you. Agricultural spending bore a disproportionate share of the budget burden in 1990—we fear a spending cap would only serve to ratify rather than rectify the equity problem.

Sincerely,

MADISON ANGELL,
President.

NATIONAL MILK PRODUCERS

FEDERATION,

Arlington, VA, April 1, 1992.

Hon. JAMES RALPH SASSER,

U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: As a member of the Budget Committee, you may soon be asked to vote on a proposal that would cap total entitlement program growth, with the exception of Social Security spending. Both the White House and Senator Domenici are developing proposals along these lines.

The National Milk Producers Federation asks you to vote against these proposals, should they come up for a vote before the committee. Adoption of such measures as part of the budget, though non-binding at this time, would establish a precedent that could seriously threaten the public policy goal of the nation's commodity programs—providing all Americans with an adequate supply of reasonably priced, nutritious, wholesome food.

If the Domenici and Administration proposals succeed, politics—not public policy—will dictate the division of the entitlement pie. Health care, the most voracious of these programs, will grow in this constrained environment by consuming dollars normally earmarked for food stamp, child nutrition and agricultural programs.

But food stamp and child nutrition programs have large numbers of powerful and vocal advocates both inside and outside the federal legislature. The political reality is that these programs will be protected. That leaves agricultural programs as the prime source of funding for these other programs. It also means additional assessments on dairy farmers who are already paying a fair share of program costs.

There is a misconception that commodity programs, like the dairy price support program, exist specifically to help producers and are totally funded at taxpayer expense. Dairy farmers also help fund their price support program. Milk producers pay some 25 percent of the $670 million cost of the current dairy program. Sales of dairy products from government stocks further reduce the cost of this program to taxpayers by another 20 percent.

The dairy price support program was designed to guarantee Americans a wholesome supply of affordable, nutritious, wholesome milk and dairy products and provide farmers a fair return on their labors. It only takes a trip to the dairy case of the local grocery store to prove the program works.

As business people recently faced with the lowest prices for their product in a decade, dairy farmers understand how difficult it is to operate when revenues shrink and costs climb. But balancing the budget on the backs of farmers, and destroying the programs that ensure the food Americans eat is available in adequate supply at reasonable cost, is not the solution.

For these reasons, the National Milk Producers Federation asks that you vote against efforts to cap entitlement growth at the expense of the public policies that feed the nation.

Sincerely,

JAMES C. BARR, CAE,
Chief Executive Officer.

NATIONAL FARMERS ORGANIZATION,

Washington, DC, April 2, 1992.

Hon. JIM SASSER,

Chairman, Senate Budget Committee, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: We understand that an amendment will be offered today on the mark up on budget resolution that would place an additional cap on entitlement spending.

It is our understanding that effective with the fiscal year 1994, entitlement spending would be limited to case load growth, inflation growth and an additional 2% growth. The additional 2% growth would be phased out to zero by 1997 permitting entitlement programs to increase for case load and inflation only. Social security would be excluded.

The National Farmers Organization and National Farmers Union are opposed to this proposal as it would affect agriculture programs. During the 1990 budget compromise farm programs took a very significant and disproportionate cut in comparison to other entitlement programs. As you are aware, the food stamp program and other nutrition programs administered by USDA have been increasing significantly while farm program spending has decreased by 40% to 50%.

This across the board cap on entitlement spending will result in agriculture taking a further disproportionate share of spending cuts. It is unfair to ask for further cuts in these farm programs when the entire agricultural community is already assuming more than its share in deficit reduction.

American farmers cannot afford to assume the burden of further cuts nor should they be forced to compensate for increased spending in other entitlement programs. The spending cap, in effect, singles them out and asks them to give more than their share. Please give this your consideration as you proceed with the budget resolution.

Sincerely,

NATIONAL FARMERS ORGANIZATION,
GRANT B. BUNTROCK,
Director, Washington
Office.

MIKE DUNN,

islative Services.

ATTENTION: OPPOSE DOMENICI AMENDMENT TO BUDGET RESOLUTION

DEAR SENATOR: I am writing to urge that you oppose the ill-conceived amendment to cap entitlements.

An entitlement cap would bludgeon programs that are not responsible for the deficit. For instance, the Federal civilian employee retirement programs are estimated to have a surplus of $27.8 billion for Fiscal Year 1993. This surplus will be used to finance the deficit in other Federal programs. In fact, over the past decade, all Federal retirement and disability programs declined as a percentage of Gross Domestic Product from 1.3 to 1.1 percent. In part, this reflects the fact that the Congress took action in the 1980's to control costs in Federal employee retirement programs.

In contrast, spending for Medicare and Medicaid will continue to increase. A vote to cap entitlement spending therefore, will really mean that the Congress wants to cut programs like Federal employee retirement that are under control because it is unwilling to tackle the reforms needed in the health care system. An entitlement cap is an irresponsible, simple-minded effort to cut programs that are not part of the problem.

The American Postal Workers Union strongly urges you to vote NO on the Domenici amendment.

Sincerely,

MOE BILLER,
President.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF STATE LEGISLATURES,
Washington, DC, April 9, 1992.

HON. JIM SASSER,
Chairman, Senate Budget Committee,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR SASSER: I am writing on behalf of the National Conference of State Legislatures to express our concern regarding the entitlement cap provision in the Domenici, Nunn, Rudman and Robb substitute budget resolution. While NCSL recognizes the impact that mandatory spending is having on the federal budget deficit, we would like to voice our concern that any limit on such spending must not result in state and local governments being required to increase our expenditures. We are especially concerned about any approach that would cap means-tested entitlement programs.

With more than 30 states now facing extremely difficult budgetary situations, state legislatures strongly feel that the federal government should not attempt to address its budget problems by imposing additional costs on already tight state budgets. If Congress desires to address the mandatory spending problem, NCSL respectfully requests that discussion take place between Congress, states, and local governments to ensure that any future spending controls do not adversely affect state and local finances.

NCSL looks forward to working with Congress on this important issue, and please do not hesitate to contact us if we can provide any assistance. Thank you for your consideration of our concerns.

Sincerely,

WILLIAM T. POUND,
Executive Director.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. MITCHELL. I yield 1 minute to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, in trying to discuss this in the framework that this is not a cut in veterans' benefits is just not telling the American public, veterans, or our colleagues here, what is really a fact. I have served on the Committee on Veterans' Affairs more than 10 years. If we do not exempt them, there will be over $1 billion cut in future years, as pointed out by the Senator from Tennessee. And if you want to show how brave you are, what a great veteran you are, and want to cut the benefits provided to disabled veterans, now is the time to vote for it. It is as simple as that. You can demagog it and pretend all you want, but you are going to cut the most vulnerable veterans and their survivors.

We will go down the list. Why do we have entitlement programs? Because we do not set priorities on raising enough revenue to run our own Government. Rightfully so, with disabled American veterans, we said, "You are entitled to something because we do not have the courage to fund it." That is why I am going to vote in favor of this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico has 1 minute.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I will yield to no one else. The majority leader will yield me 1 minute, and I yield 1 minute off of the resolution, giving me 2 minutes.

Mr. DOMENICI. I want to read a quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 26, 1992: "It is true that entitlements and mandatories are swallowing us whole. They are going to swallow us like the whale swallowed Jonah. But, unhappily, we will not be able to emerge from the mammoth fish as well as did Jonah. It is going to take a long, long time for our country to emerge from the octopus that is inhaling and destroying us little by little at first, but surely, in the final analysis, it will get us."

The distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee made that statement in the RECORD.

Mr. President, I believe the disabled veterans of America are worried about whether our children have any economic future and whether theirs do. This whole proposal is to save our children from poverty. I believe the Disabled American Veterans would like us to treat them as fairly as all other people on entitlement, and we are going to. We are suggesting that they all be looked at once a year to see whether, together, they are breaking this target, which gives tremendous room for expansion.

But we will look at all of them every year to see if they are breaching that target. Probably they will not get cut and anyone that says this will cut them has not read the amendment, does not understand what we are doing because the committees will decide year by year whether we have breached the target and, if we have, they will determine how we reduce spending.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I yield 30 seconds to the Senator from California.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I believe that this proposal would lead in the first year to cuts of $92 million and before long, possibly within 3 years, cuts of over $1 billion in programs that are essential to the well-being of disabled veterans. We owe them a tremendous debt that can never be fully repaid. Cutting now our obligation to them is, I believe, a very grave and unfortunate mistake.

Mr. President, I rise in support of the majority leader's second-degree amendment to exempt veterans compensation from the arbitrary direct-spending caps that otherwise would be imposed as a result of the proposal of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. DOMENICI]. As chairman of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, I am deeply concerned that, without the exemption in this amendment, the Domenici proposal would expose veterans entitlements to reductions as the result of growth in other direct-spending programs. The major veterans organizations oppose the Domenici proposal and, in letters to the chairman of the Budget Committee, to Senator DOMENICI, and to me, have strongly expressed their opposition to direct-spending caps. They are alarmed at the effect this could have on compensation for service-disabled veterans and the survivors of those who died from service-connected causes and on education and other benefits that veterans earned through service to their country.

Mr. President, this proposal is derived from the OMB Director's Introduction to the President's fiscal year 1993 budget, which proposed to cap aggregate mandatory spending at population-plus-CPI, plus a specified percentage allowance—either 2.5 percent or, if comprehensive health reform has been enacted, 1.6 percent. That proposal was included in title 46 of S. 2217, a bill introduced by Senators DOLE and DOMENICI on February 7, 1992, at the request of the administration.

The Domenici amendment is similar, but contains smaller, and declining, percentage allowances: starting at 2 percent for fiscal year 1994 and declining to zero percent for fiscal year 1997. CBO has estimated that these percentages would force sequestrations of $3.4 billion in fiscal year 1995, $10 billion in fiscal year 1996, and $39.5 billion in fiscal year 1997.

From the standpoint of veterans programs, these caps would require totally unfair cuts in—

Service-connected-disability and survivors compensation;

Needs-based disability and death pensions for wartime veterans and their survivors;

Vocational rehabilitation for service-disabled veterans; and GI Bill educational benefits.

The Domenici proposal would force cuts of $92 million in veterans' service-connected disability and death compensation and $26 million in pensions for fiscal year 1995, rising to $1.26 billion in compensation and $338 million in pensions for fiscal year 1997, according to CBO data.

Mr. President, as I noted earlier, veterans organizations strongly oppose entitlement-cap proposals such as the one contained in the Domenici proposal.

The American Legion in a March 31 letter to the chairman of the Budget Committee, Senator SASSER, has stated:

Our organization strongly opposes this idea  [We find it incredible one year after Operation Desert Storm that a proposal is being offered to potentially cut GI Bill benefits.

In an April 1 letter to Senator DOMENICI, the Veterans of Foreign Wars has stated:

This is written to express the shock and outrage of the 2.2 million member Veterans of Foreign Wars  This would constitute a grievous injustice to our disabled veterans. These sequestrations would necessitate large and totally unfair cuts in service-connected-disability and survivor's compensation, needs-based disability and death pensions for wartime veterans and their survivors, vocational rehabilitation for service-disabled veterans, and GI Bill educational benefits. The Disabled American Veterans, in an April 6 letter to me, said:

To repeal current sequestration protections afforded veterans' entitlements and once again reduce veterans' benefits—especially as a result of increased spending by other federal entitlement programs—is unconscionable.

Finally, in an April 2 letter to Senator SASSER, the Paralyzed Veterans of America said:

[T]his proposal arbitrarily would subject entitlement programs for the nation's disabled and poorest veterans to sequestration.  To force cuts in compensation for service-connected disabilities and survivors benefits, disability pensions for wartime veterans, vocational rehabilitation and educational benefits is to abrogate the Nation's commitment to the men and women who have served in the Armed Forces.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that copies of these letters be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, veterans know that threats of sequestration are not mere bluffs. They are not empty threats of a doomsday that never occurs. Sequestrations have occurred and they have resulted in cuts in veterans programs. In fiscal year 1986, the VA medical care account appropriation was reduced by $118 million under sequestration. The fiscal year 1990 sequestration, which was 1.4 percent for nondefense accounts, reduced that appropriation by $159 million. These sequestrations were very harmful. The entitlement-cap sequestrations that would occur under the Domenici proposal would be far greater than the fiscal year 1986 and fiscal year 1990 sequestrations.

Mr. President, even granting that the purpose of sequestration is to force the action necessary to avoid a sequester, history teaches us that this proposal is extremely dangerous to veterans. In 1990, in order to avoid a sequester, Congress adopted reconciliation instructions that required veterans program cuts totaling $620 million in fiscal 1991 and $3.35 billion over the 5-year period fiscal year 1991 through 1995. The resulting reconciliation legislation enacted in November 1990 inflicted some serious, very painful cuts. Additional cuts resulting from this entitlement cap necessarily would be extremely painful.

Mr. President, that pain would be much more than financial hardship. It also would be the sting of a slap in veterans' faces—an extremely hard and unfair slap coming so soon after the congressional praise of our Armed Forces that we all heard last year as our troops came back from the gulf. Many of those troops are now veterans, and they and veterans of all wars deserve the benefits that this amendment puts in jeopardy.

Mr. President, I cannot imagine why the advocates of direct-spending caps believe that exposing these top priority veterans programs to automatic reductions is good policy. The proposal is grossly unfair and would run the risk of defaulting on this nation's most fundamental obligations to those who made great sacrifices in answering the nation's call throughout a century marked by frequent armed conflicts.

Mr. President, a CBO analysis of the direct spending programs that would be aggregated under the Domenici caps shows that costs of health care programs—Medicare and Medicaid—would cause the caps to be exceeded. The costs of veterans' entitlements would stay fairly constant.

Mr. President, it is extremely important that skyrocketing health care costs be restrained. That issue must be faced head on. Every responsible national health care proposal must address it.

What is particularly ironic about the Domenici proposal is that it is not accompanied by a serious proposal to restrain health care costs. Likewise, the President's spending cap legislation, in S. 2217, was not accompanied by a proposal to control health care spending.

If the Senator from New Mexico has a workable solution to the problem of inflation in Medicare and Medicaid, he should bring it forward for consideration. The need for responsible, effective proposals is clear. He should make one.

But, Mr. President, the Senator should not avoid that task himself and, instead, take veterans' entitlements and other mandatory programs hostage and threaten deep cuts in them if no one else produces a workable solution. Rather than proposing a real solution to the health care crisis in this country, the President and other supporters of entitlement caps have decided to avoid the issue: they accept the status quo—huge increases in health care costs and millions of Americans shut out of health care—and pay for the increases with real and painful across the board cuts in all entitlement programs that serve veterans and other deserving and needy individuals.

Ultimately, Federal deficits must be reduced and strong and creative efforts must be made to control health care costs that are driving up the costs of Medicare and Medicaid and placing adequate health care beyond the reach of millions of Americans. However, we should not try to accomplish these goals through budget gimmicks that threaten arbitrary cuts in programs that address our solemn commitments to veterans and their families and basic needs of other Americans.

Mr. President, I hope the Senate will reject the Domenici proposal—but, in case it does not, I urge my colleagues to support this second-degree amendment to exempt veterans disability compensation from the unfair cuts that the Domenici plan would produce.

EXHIBIT 1

THE AMERICAN LEGION,

Washington, DC, March 31, 1992.

Hon. JIM SASSER,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR SASSER: The American Legion has learned that the Senate Budget Committee is expected to consider within the next several days a proposal which would impose enforceable caps on mandatory spending. It is our understanding that the proposal could lead to cuts in various entitiements, including such veterans benefits as disability compensation, need-based pension, vocational rehabilitation and GI Bill educational assistance.

Our organization strongly opposes this idea. It appears that the pending plan to impose mandatory spending restraints is the 1992 version of similar initiatives in recent years to control budgetary growth by applying across-the-board cuts. As our organization has stated repeatedly, such cuts fail to consider the merit of individual entitlements. Also, they fail to consider which of those entitlements have contributed most to the burgeoning federal budget. You can be sure that veterans benefit entitlements are not within the budget-busting group.

In particular, we find it incredible one year after Operation Desert Storm that a proposal is being offered to potentially cut GI Bill benefits. This comes on the heels of (1) an administration budget which would make the "up front" cost of those benefits more expensive for the active duty member and (2) an overwhelming Senate vote several weeks ago to increase educational assistance for non-veterans by raising the maximum Pell Grant benefit by 50 percent.

Your attention to The American Legion's views on this matter is deeply appreciated.

Sincerely,

PHILIP RIGGIN,

Director, National Legislative Commission.

VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS
OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, April 1, 1992.

Hon. PETE DOMENICI,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR DOMENICI: This is written to express the shock and outrage of the 2.2 million member Veterans of Foreign Wars at your announced program to reduce VA Compensation and Pension payments to America's sick and disabled veterans by including them in a program of direct spending caps to be imposed on all mandatory federal spending with the exception of Social Security benefits.

Your proposal would seem to be based upon an Office of Management and Budget concept which was contained in the introduction to the President's FY 1993 budget—and later expressed in legislative form in title XLVI of S. 2217, a bill Senator Dole and you introduced on February 7—to cap aggregate mandatory spending so as not to exceed an annually adjusted figure based on the beneficiary population plus the CPI together with a specified percentage allowance. Your proposal would enforce these caps through sequestration.

This would constitute a grievous injustice to our disabled veterans. These sequestrations would necessitate large and totally unfair cuts in service-connected-disability and survivor's compensation, needs-based disability and death pensions for wartime veterans and their survivors, vocational rehabilitation for service-disabled veterans, and GI Bill educational benefits. It is inconceivable to us that either you or the President would countenance and put forward this plan to subject veterans programs to automatic reductions.

Adding a note of painful irony to this plan is the fact that through the years veteran's programs have grown at a much slower rate than is even called for under your proposal's annual indexing formula. But by treating all mandatory spending as an aggregate you would lump veterans together with those non-veteran programs whose costs have far outpaced inflation, and funding for sick and disabled veterans would be sequestered as well. Veterans lose twice under this scenario, first, because unlike others they have done their part through the years by accepting COLAs that were in line with the CPI; and now, secondly, because their already meager compensation and pension payments would be subject to additional sequestration cuts under your proposal. This would be totally unjust and is at odds with our nation's moral commitment to care for those who suffered and sacrificed so much in order that we might all remain free.

Thus I urge you in the strongest terms, on behalf of the entire VFW membership as well as all of America's veterans, to refrain from pursuing this proposal which would greatly harm America's disabled veterans.

Sincerely,

ROBERT E. WALLACE,
Commander-In-Chief.

DISABLED AMERICAN VETERANS,
Washington DC, April 6, 1992.

Hon. ALAN CRANSTON,
Chairman, Committee on Veterans Affairs, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: The Disabled American Veterans [DAV] shares your deep concern that should Senator Pete Domenici's proposed program of direct spending caps on mandatory spending become law, it would subject certain veterans' entitlement programs to sequestration as a result of growth in other direct spending programs.

Senator Cranston, as you are well aware, VA entitlements are not a major contributing factor in the ever increasing federal deficit. Quite to the contrary. The number of veterans and their survivors who receive service-connected disability and death compensation payments has been on the decline for the past several years. Additionally, the percentage of federal outlays spent on VA benefits and services has been cut in half from 4.4 percent in 1977 to 2.2 percent in 1991.

I also wish to point out that the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1990 (OBRA) required VA to reduce spending on veterans' entitlements by $620 million in Fiscal Year 1991 and a total of $3.35 billion through Fiscal Year 1995. To meet these spending reduction requirements, VA was required to: suspend payments to certain incompetent veterans; institute a $2.00 copayment for prescriptions; repeal provisions which permitted re-entitlement to survivors' benefits upon termination of a former spouse's or child's marriage; limit vocational rehabilitation to certain service-connected disabled veterans; limit burial benefits to wartime veterans and delay a COLA for service-connected disability and death benefit recipients.

While veterans' benefits were being reduced or eliminated, other federal entitlements were being enhanced. The remarriage provisions for CIA surviving spouses was liberalized and increased protection was being afforded to incompetent Social Security beneficiaries. Suffice it to say, that veterans were not treated fairly under OBRA.

To repeal current sequestration protections afforded veterans' entitlements and once again reduce veterans' benefits—especially as a result of increased spending by other federal entitlement programs—is unconscionable.

Senator Cranston, DAV certainly appreciates your efforts to point out the inequities contained in Senator Domenici's proposed program of direct spending caps and we look forward to your continuing advocacy on behalf of America's service-connected disabled veteran population.

Sincerely,

CLEVELAND JORDAN,
National Commander.

PARALYZED VETERANS OF AMERICA,
Washington, DC, April 2, 1992.

Hon. JIM SASSER,
Chairman, Committee on the Budget, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR CHAIRMAN SASSER: On behalf of the members of Paralyzed Veterans of America [PVA], I urge your strong opposition to an effort which would impose direct spending caps under which overall limits on mandatory spending would be enforced through sequestration. While PVA recognizes the importance of controlling growth in federal spending and reducing the growing national deficit, this proposal arbitrarily would subject entitlement programs for the nation's disabled and poorest veterans to sequestration; sequestration that is the result of growth in other direct spending programs. Additionally, this proposal exempts Social Security benefits thereby establishing a gross inequity in the treatment of America's veterans.

The proposal, which we understand will be sponsored by Senator Domenici, Ranking Member of the Budget Committee, is based upon the earlier OMB proposal contained in the President's Fiscal Year 1993 Budget. This earlier proposal would cap combined mandatory spending based on a "population plus CPI" with an established percentage allowance. The newer proposal would establish the cap using a smaller allowance factor.

Both these approaches to controlling mandatory spending are inherently unfair to veterans, both would force reductions in veterans' benefits due to uncontrollable growth in other programs. To force cuts in compensation for service-connected disabilities and survivors benefits, disability pensions for wartime veterans, vocational rehabilitation and educational benefits is to abrogate the Nation's commitment to the men and women who have served in the Armed Forces.

Again, I urge your opposition to any proposal to establish mandatory spending caps which targets veterans' benefits for reduction while exempting other mandatory programs or which would cut funding of veterans' programs due to growth in other entitlement areas.

Thank you.

Sincerely,

VICTOR S. MCCOY, Sr.,
National President.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. President, the debate on entitlement growth has been excellent. We all agree that health care costs are out of control. I support serious reform that will hold down health care costs and provide affordable health care for everyone. Health care inflation accounts for most of the growth in entitlement programs and those entitlement programs not causing the problem should not be penalized because health care costs are out of control. We need major health care reform, and I will support a sound proposal to bring health care entitlement costs down. But penalizing entitlements that are not part of the problem is not the best approach. We need a plan first that will control the entitlement growth that is taking place.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I rise in opposition to Senator DOMENICI's substitute amendment to the budget resolution.

The Domenici-Nunn amendment does focus our attention on an issue of great importance, the need to get our deficit under control. Our deficit for the next fiscal year is approaching $400 billion, and in the next fiscal year we will spend $316 billion in interest on the national debt.

Despite my support for reducing the deficit, the kind of entitlement cap contained in the Domenici-Nunn amendment is not the answer. This proposal would establish a limit on entitlement spending, beginning in fiscal year 1994. Entitlement spending would be allowed to increase to accommodate population increases, inflation, and an additional 2 percent in fiscal year 1994. This additional amount would be phased out by fiscal year 1997.

If entitlement spending breached these caps, a legislative reconciliation process or a sequestration process would be triggered, forcing across the board reductions in important entitlement programs. The programs which would be cut across the board include food stamps, child nutrition, supplemental security income, veterans' benefits, guaranteed student loans, housing assistance, and on and on. This would be a disaster for our country. According to the Senate Budget Committee, this proposal would force more than $50 billion in entitlement cuts over 5 years. These kinds of reductions would occur in programs which benefit those in our society most in need of help.

We need to take a closer look at entitlement spending. When we do that, we can see clearly that the large increases in entitlement spending are concentrated in two programs: Medicare and Medicaid. But under this entitlement cap, all entitlement programs would be cut across the board. We should not accept across the board sequestrations in all entitlement programs, because the costs of health care causes large increase in two entitlement programs.

Let's look at some specifics: The Secretary of Health and Human Services, in the 1993 budget, states that we will expend 10 percent more on Medicare in 1993 than in 1992. This is similar to the rate of growth in the recent past—and similar to current growth in health care spending generally.

According to CRS, for more than 20 years Medicare costs, part A, have grown at a faster rate than inflation. From the mid 1970's to the early 1980's, the CPI rose by a cumulative 85 percent and Medicare hospital insurance payments rose 242 percent. Between 1983 and 1990, hospital payments rose by 57 percent while the CPI rose 30 percent.

These numbers reflect the overall increases in the costs of providing health care nationally, particularly hospital care, which is such a large part of the health care needed by the elderly.

What we need is leadership from the President and Congress. We need to consider comprehensive health care reform. That's the way we should begin to address the large spending increases in Medicare and Medicaid.

I want to discuss, in real terms, what this proposal would mean to one entitlement program which I care a great deal about: Vocational rehabilitation. This entitlement cap proposal would reduce an already capped entitlement and deny employment related services to millions of Americans with disabilities.

The Rehabilitation Act State Grant Program is an entitlement to States, not to individuals. It is an already capped entitlement. It is capped at the level of the annual cost of living increase. There is no entitlement for the Rehabilitation Act that allows for growth in number of eligible individuals.

The effect of including the Rehabilitation Act under the umbrella cap for all entitlement programs is to make annual reductions in this program to allow for the continued casework load in programs that include entitlements to the individuals. The cuts could be a couple hundred million dollars in the next 5 years.

There is a great deal of sentiment among advocates for persons with disabilities for making the Rehabilitation Act State Grant Program an entitlement based on eligible individuals. That clearly is not going to happen in the near future. So it is ironic and frustrating that the program is being penalized for not being an entitlement to individuals.

I would remind my colleagues that the Rehabilitation Act State Grant Program is the only federally funded program that provides comprehensive services designed specifically to place individuals with disabilities into competitive employment. Some years ago, I asked CBO for a written statement on whether this program actually produces revenues for the Federal Government because of the pay-back from making independent taxpayers out of persons who are otherwise on other entitlement programs. The answer was a resounding yes. Expenditures on vocational rehabilitation are repaid within 4 years as a result of reductions in welfare, food stamps, and other social support programs. State estimates on the dollars saved per dollar invested for vocational rehabilitation are generally in the neighborhood of $10 saved for $1 spent on services.

Persons with disabilities have unemployment rates above 66 percent, the highest of any group in our Nation. We enacted the Americans with Disabilities Act to end the discrimination keeping many of these individuals out of jobs. But the reality is that unless we provide the rehabilitation services to accompany these new rights, the impact on employment of persons with disabilities will be minor.

The program at currently funded levels serves an estimated 1 out of 20 eligible persons with a disability. That percentage would be significantly cut if the proposed entitlement cap were enacted. I ask my colleagues to consider these issues. I am sure that not one of them wants these drastic cuts in a program that helps put persons with disabilities to work.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I shall vote against the amendment. It is clear disabled veterans' pensions are not going to be affected one iota under the Domenici proposal. The real question is: Are we going to make any effort to control the deficits of this Nation, which are going to have to be paid by our children?

Everyone says we must do something about the deficits as long as our efforts are guaranteed not to affect anyone. Currently, deficits are at the rate of $400 billion a year. The net interest on the Federal debt is $200 billion per year and increasing every year. That $200 billion per year is payment on interest. None of those dollars go for principal payments, but all is solely for interest.

If we are going to deal with the entitlements, we cannot exempt every program thereunder, even though some programs, such as disabled veterans, would be unaffected.

The Domenici approach is not perfect and, I hope, will be improved as we go through the legislative process. Nonetheless, it is an honest attempt to deal with the deficits.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER. Mr. President, I oppose the Domenici-Rudman substitute amendment.

An entitlement cap is not an effective or fair way to deal with our budget deficit. I believe we must tackle the deficit. We must face the hard choices. But we should not shy away from choices by hiding behind a defective mechanism—an across the board entitlement cap.

We have made real progress in reducing the costs in the Medicare Program. The rate of growth is less than in the private sector, so that Medicare is not the real culprit. Capping Medicare without doing anything to the private sector will result in further cost shifting and only exacerbate the situation. If I have learned anything from reforming health care these last years, it is that you cannot just treat the symptoms—you have to treat the disease. To reduce further growth in health care costs, we need comprehensive reform, not a strategy that attacks our most vulnerable citizens.

Further cuts in Medicare and Medicaid programs will mean closing vulnerable rural hospitals. Further cuts in these programs will result in more physicians turning away millions of Medicare and Medicaid patients. We will inflict real hardship on older and disabled Americans. We should have learned by now that this piecemeal approach will not work—it will not solve the problems of health care inflation. The real solution is comprehensive, systemwide health care reform.

While health care programs will sustain the biggest cuts, other valuable programs will be reduced. Veterans, including those injured in the line of duty, will face cutbacks. We would be callously turning our backs on men and women who literally risked their lives and deny them benefits that they and their families depend upon.

Foster care is an entitlement program. A cap on entitlement could mean that a battered child would have to live in an abusive home if funding ran out.

Nearly 25 million Americans—117,610 in West Virginia—depend on food stamps, an entitlement program. It would not be fair to impose a cap on such a basic nutrition program during a recession when parents are struggling to feed their child.

We must face our responsibility and find effective ways to reduce the deficit. We need a fair and reasonable cure, not a quick fix that masks the symptoms and attacks our most vulnerable and deserving citizens.

Mr. BOND. Mr. President, we have heard quite a few things from the other side of the aisle that imply there is some set of rules one must comply with before one's credentials are sufficient to talk about cutting the deficit.

So I decided to see how many of us have been putting our money where our mouths are and reviewed several votes cast just in the past month.

The first, offered by Senator LEVIN on March 12, 1992, would have eliminated the election year gimmick tax cut in the Democrats tax bill, and instead used the revenues raised by raising taxes on the wealthy and small businesses for two purposes:

First, deficit reduction, 75 percent; and Second, infrastructure.

This obviously should have been supported by all who believe the deficit is vital—but it lost 57 to 38, with 33 Republicans and only 5 Democrats supporting it.

Thus vote No. 1, to use increased taxes to cut the deficit, rather than provide for other tax cuts was defeated.

Vote No. 2, March 13, 1992, Kasten amendment to freeze for 5 years in domestic and international spending, using the President's defense number—and then using some of the savings to pay for economic growth package, the rest for deficit reduction.

This loses as well, 61 to 36—35 Republicans, 1 Democrat support.

Thus vote 2, cutting spending to cut taxes and reduce the deficit also loses.

Vote No. 3, March 26, 1992, remove the walls between defense and non-defense—or in other words save the peace dividend and apply it to reducing the deficit, or spend the defense cuts by removing the walls. Surprisingly the amendment falls on a procedural vote 48 to 50, with 40 Republicans and 8 Democrats defeating motion to invoke cloture. Thus the cut the deficit reduction crowd wins, but only because opponents needed 60 votes.

Vote No. 4, April 9, 1992, Exon amendment to cut defense in the first year more than President's request. Defeated 45 to 50, with 37 Republicans and 13 Democrats opposed. However, of those supporting the bigger cut, 42 of the 45 were already on record as supporting spending the peace dividend, so really only 3 were serious about using additional defense cuts to reduce the deficit. They were Senators EXON, GRASSLEY, and JEFFORDS.

The other 42 obviously only care about defense cuts because they want to spend them, in fact during the debate the phrase was used "we'll park these funds until we can get at them later."

Thus, only three Senators can claim deficit reduction glory on this vote.

Vote No. 5, April 8, 1992: Motion to waive the Budget Act so the Senate can pass amendment calling on Congress to pass a balanced budget amendment. The motion to waive wins by a vote of 63 to 32.

Vote No. 6, April 9, 1992: Senator SEYMOUR wants to cut Congress by 25 percent over 2 years. Senator SASSER adds in similar cuts for executive branch and White House. Amendment passes 52 to 42, thus another vote truly to cut something real is actually successful.

So what's the scorecard?

Of my friends who have been the most vocal on the other side of the aisle about how we need credentials before entering this debate, most could only find it in their heart to vote for one of the six, and that was to cut defense. And even that vote was only after they had first voted to allow those funds to be spent. So who is really serious and who is status quo?

But what are we to conclude: Almost half the Senate would rather raise taxes and then give away the new revenues rather than reduce the deficit. They don't want to cut Congress or the executive agencies by 25 percent over 2 years. They oppose freezing discretionary spending for 5 years; they oppose a balanced amendment; and while they want to cut defense, all but a few want to spend it on something else.

Is it any wonder we have $400 billion deficits?

And now we have the ultimate test. The Domenici-Nunn-Rudman-Robb proposal. It cuts everything. Defense, $35 billion below the President; domestic $70 billion, 5-year cut; freeze international spending for 5 years, saving nearly $10 billion. And then it assumes a cap on the rate of growth, beginning in 1994, on all mandatory spending except Social Security.

Naturally, this proposal also failed, as the test vote garnered only 28 votes. If I would have been a betting man I would have bet the house on this outcome, but Mr. President, I want to express my support, my admiration but also my disappointment with the Domenici-Nunn-Rudman-Robb substitute.

I support it because I believe it is the most serious budget deficit reduction proposal on the horizon. And while I realize it was a vain hope that those who have been preaching about cutting the deficit would have put their money where their mouth is, if you don't have some hope you don't belong in public service.

But, Mr. President, I do wish to express my admiration for the courage of this gang of four who have decided that the good of the country is more important than the siren call of the interest groups. All who support this proposal should at a minimum get a red badge for political courage.

But I must also point out my disappointment with the proposal, for while it retains the 5-year freeze on foreign aid, it abandons the freeze in domestic spending. Instead, nearly all the additional defense savings above the President's defense cuts are spent.

I think this misses a real opportunity to balance the budget by the turn of the century, but I will certainly not oppose this otherwise ambitious plan because of it.

Mr. KERREY. Mr. President, I rise in strong opposition to this amendment. There is no question that the soaring deficit is an enormous problem that must be addressed—but this amendment is the wrong solution.

Health care costs are skyrocketing. This year our Nation will spend nearly $800 billion on health care. At a time when U.S. firms face stiff international competition and a lingering recession, they will also face 20- to 30-percent increases in employer health insurance premium costs. Families, already coping with economic problems caused by a recession, will see their coverage decline, their out-of-pocket spending on health care rise, and their insecurity grow as they fear a loss or change of jobs will plummet their families into medical indigency.

The Bush response to this crisis is to give it a little lip service, then hope it goes away quietly. Today we debate an equally useless response in the form of a proposed cap on entitlement spending.

We all know what the problem is here. The health entitlements, namely Medicare and Medicaid, are driving the deficit. Between 1993 and 1997, 85 percent of the growth in entitlement programs is expected to come from the health care entitlements. CBO predicts that health care will consume 22 percent of all Federal spending by 1997. As health care costs continue to go up, the chances of our controlling the deficit go down.

Simply capping the entitlements is not a solution. Capping the entitlements requires that our most vulnerable citizens, seniors, low income women, infants and children, and others, to bear the brunt of health care costs over which they have absolutely no control. Capping entitlements will wreak havoc on the private side of our health care system as the costs of the cap are shifted irrationally to private payers of health care. Capping entitlements is a backdoor and fraudulent attempt to sidestep the serious problems with our current health care system.

This proposal illustrates the need for a comprehensive reform of our Nation's health care financing system. Unless we have a comprehensive solution, the fragmented nature of our current system will result in continued cost-shifting and inequities in payment and coverage. It illustrates the need for a comprehensive solution, such as the Health USA Act of 1991, which I introduced last year, that restructures how we finance health care. The bill will eliminate the inequities imposed by cost-shifting, cover all Americans regardless of their health or employment status, and, most importantly for this debate, control costs in a comprehensive fashion. Creating a national health care budget and methods to control health care costs within that budget for our entire system is the best thing we can do to solve the problem of exploding health entitlement spending and the Federal deficit.

Under the guise of forcing needed discipline on entitlement spending the Domenici amendment would incite internecine warfare among entitlements including farm price support programs, veterans programs, student loan programs, and Medicare and Medicaid. For example, if health costs continue to escalate at two and three times the rate of inflation, this growth in outlays could force offsetting reductions in farm program price support costs, even though farm price support rates have been either frozen or reduced under existing law. Such a result would needlessly pit farmers against those whose health is at risk. It would force rural States like Nebraska to square off against the largely urban areas of the country where most of the Medicaid costs are incurred.

Mr. President, we do need to get our deficit under control. It is literally dragging our Nation down as we speak here today. We do need to get a handle on entitlement spending under the budget. But, Mr. President, placing a cap on the entitlement programs will not address the deficit in a constructive manner. I strongly urge that we defeat this amendment and move onto a thorough and constructive debate on our Nation's health care crisis.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, the vote we are taking today is not a vote about whether a specific group of disabled Americans deserves Federal assistance. This is a vote about whether or not Congress will reign in those programs which are bankrupting this country and putting future generations economic well being at risk.

The Domenici substitute amendment to the budget resolution is an attempt to get this country's deficit spending patterns under control. Contrary to the opponents allegations, the Senator from New Mexico's amendment does not cut spending on entitlements, it only slows the growth of entitlement programs.

Here is how Senator DOMENICI's amendments slows the growth of these programs. First, it allows entitlements to grow at a rate which accommodates increases in the population eligible for the program. In addition, the Domenici amendment allows all of these entitlement programs an inflationary adjustment equal to the underlying rate of inflation in the country. And, on top of the increases for caseload growth and inflation, in the first several years of this agreement the Domenici amendment allows all of these programs to grow an additional percentage point or two. In other words, the Domenici amendment will not reduce spending in any entitlement program $1.

The disabled veterans program, which the Mitchell amendment exempts from scrutiny, is not increasing at a rate higher than inflation. This program will not bankrupt this country. The Domenici amendment does not require lower spending in this program. I do not anticipate Congress reducing spending in this program $1.

I will, however, vote against the distinguished majority leader's amendment. The problem is that the Mitchell amendment starts the Senate down the path of excluding programs, and, as Senator MITCHELL knows, if we exempt one program, we will end up exempting all programs.

Everyone here today realizes that this is a vote about whether or not the Senate will come to grips with what is eroding the economic power of this country, the uncontrolled growth of the Federal debt.

Fundamentally, this is a vote about my children and grandchild and the children and grandchildren of every veteran and nonveteran American. It is not a vote about whether or not disabled veterans deserve assistance from the Federal Government. This is a vote about whether or not America will live within its economic means.

Mr. President, I cannot standby in this body and vote for any one subset of Americans at the expense of all future generations of Americans. I will vote today for the economic future of American's children.

Mr. WOFFORD. Mr. President, the sponsors of this substitute have got the problem right. They rightly recognize that health care costs are out of control—that these costs are driving up Federal spending and the Federal deficit. But, the proposed solution is wrong. It is simple. It is easy. And it pretends to be a painless solution. But it is wrong. This substitute addresses the symptom, and ignores the underlying sickness.

Let there be no mistake. This vote is the first vote on comprehensive health care reform this year. And contrary to my colleague from New Mexico—I believe that if you genuinely support health care reform, and if you are serious about bringing real cost containment to the American people, you will vote against this substitute.

You will vote against it because you recognize that the substitute is only a gesture, another way to avoid acting on a real problem driving our budget deficits.

You will vote against it because you refuse to shift this national problem onto the backs of the less fortunate—the elderly and the poor.

And you will vote against the substitute because you know that the people of America will not be able to avoid the costs of this move. People will end up paying for cuts to Medicare and Medicaid with bigger hospital bills and higher medical premiums. Hospitals and doctors will compensate for the cuts by charging their private patients more.

Meanwhile, the cost of health care will continue to mount. More businesses will be unable to provide health benefits. The ranks of the uninsured will swell.

Although I will vote against the proposed substitute, I am delighted that this debate has occurred. It has unveiled the effects of health care costs on the Federal deficit. It has made clear the urgent need for comprehensive health care reform.

And I am glad to hear that the sponsors of this substitute are ready to sit at the table and help us hammer out an agreement that reforms the health care system and effectively controls health care costs. I look forward to beginning this work, to passing legislation that stops the rising tide of health costs.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I urge Senators to vote for this amendment to help us defeat this resolution.

This resolution avoids the real problem which is dealing with the skyrocketing cost of health care in our society. It would lump the increases in medical care with all the other so-called mandatory programs and cut all of them, even though the growth is occurring in the health care programs, Medicare and Medicaid.

This is a way of avoiding accountability. This is a way of avoiding dealing with the principal problem, which is the cost of health care, and there is no logic whatsoever to this proposal.

Why are we going to cut the compensation of a disabled veteran because health care costs are out of control? The disabled veterans will ask why do not you deal with the health care costs? Why do not the proponents of this amendment join in doing something about health care costs instead of cutting the disabled veteran's pension. That is the problem. It is admitted; it is undisputed.

The increase is in health care. The cost is in health care. Let us deal with health care. Let us not ask disabled veterans to pay the price for something that they are not contributing to and they are not the cause of.

The root cause is health care costs and that is what we should be addressing. This resolution does not do that. There have been no hearings and no discussion, just a last minute resolution that has a profound effect upon millions of Americans who are not the cause of the problem and avoids that which is the cause of the problem.

It is exactly the wrong way to legislate, and it is exactly the wrong way to deal with something as serious as our budget resolution.

I urge the adoption of this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has expired.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the majority leader, No. 1779. On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

NOT VOTING—6

Bradley	Garn	Wallop
Dixon	Gramm	Wirth

So the amendment (No. 1779) was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote.

Mr. DOMENICI. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I have permission of the Senate to withdraw the underlying amendment, the substitute, and I am going to do that in a minute.

I wonder if the parliamentary inquiry might be made with reference to the time that is left? How much time is left on the resolution, and how much under our control?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Three hours remain on the resolution, and 1 hour and 39 minutes remain under the control of the Senator from New Mexico. The remainder is under the control of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. DOMENICI. I thank the Chair.

Does the majority leader have anything further?

I wonder if I might yield Senator RUDMAN 3 minutes. I think he would like to explain or make his observations with reference to the vote?

Mr. RUDMAN. Could I inquire from my friend from New Mexico, has he now withdrawn the amendment?

Mr. DOMENICI. I have not, but I am going to.

Why do we not just do that before the Senator speaks.

I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator has that right.

The Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, as I understood it, under the most recent previous order, the distinguished majority leader propounded a request that the Senator make that request at the time he intends to withdraw his amendment. The previous unanimous-consent request I think was obviated to a considerable degree by the majority leader's request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, so there can be no misunderstanding, I made that request of the Senator from New Mexico, but he did not respond. Therefore, there was no agreement to that effect.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I wonder if it would help the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee if I did what the majority leader asked of me a while ago and ask unanimous consent that it be in order to withdraw the amendment, as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object. I, of course, will not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. BYRD. I had thought the Chair had earlier put the majority leader's request.

Let me say, Mr. President, I think I must challenge, again, the Chair's previous response to my parliamentary question. The request early-on that the distinguished Senator from New Mexico made, to wit, was that he be permitted to withdraw—

Mr. President, may we have order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

The Senator will suspend until we have order.

Those conducting conversation in the aisles, please retire to the Cloakroom.

The Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. BYRD. That he be permitted to withdraw his substitute amendment. The Senate granted that request.

Then there was the parliamentary inquiry by the offerer of the amendment as to whether or not after an amendment or amendments were adopted he could still have, under the previously granted request, the authority to remove his amendment. And the Chair responded in the affirmative.

That was the wrong response, and I do not say this in criticism of the Chair or of the Parliamentarian who apparently so advised the Chair. If this Senator had been in the chair I would have disregarded such advice from the Parliamentarian. Of course, I know that not all Senators feel that they have the liberty to do that, and for good reason.

That was a bad response from the Chair because we cannot allow Senators—I do not make this statement in derogation of the Senator from New Mexico—we cannot allow Senators to have a testing of the wind by getting previous consent that they might be permitted to later withdraw an amendment and then, after action by the Senate has occurred on that amendment be allowed to exercise the previously granted request concerning withdrawal of the amendment. That is not the way to do business. In fact, if I had known in the beginning that we were going to allow amendments to the Senator's amendment and yet let his previously granted request to withdraw still obtain. I would have objected in the first place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that this occupant was not in the chair at the time that the ruling was made and, therefore, was operating on the information received from the Parliamentarian as to what the unanimous-consent request was.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, this Senator does not need that explanation from the Chair. I am fully aware as to who is in the chair now and as to who was in the chair at that time. I do not intend to belabor this point, but I think the RECORD should show that the Chair, with all due respect to the occupant at that time—this has nothing to do with the identity of the occupant—the response of the Chair to a parliamentary inquiry which was made at that time was, in my opinion, wrong, and I say that for the RECORD. The event did not establish a precedent because a response by the Chair to a parliamentary inquiry is a very thin precedent, if it even be denominated such. I do not consider it such.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader had previously sought the floor. Is he seeking the floor now?

Mr. DOMENICI. I wanted to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BYRD. I have no objection.

Mr. COATS. Reserving the right to object. Mr. President, I will do so for the purpose of asking a parliamentary inquiry. I am new to the Senate, and I do not pretend to understand all the procedures. I would like clarification of the statement of the Senator from West Virginia relative to the Parliamentarian's ruling so that if this situation arises again in the future, I will have some understanding as to what the correct parliamentary procedure is relative to the request that was made by the Senator from New Mexico.

There seems to be some confusion as to whether the Parliamentarian's advice to the Chair, whoever was in the Chair at that particular time, was the correct advice.

The Senator from West Virginia indicated that it was not the correct advice. Obviously, it conflicts with the advice that was given by the Parliamentarian. For those of us who may find themselves in that situation in the future, I would appreciate a clarification as to what is the correct ruling.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair inquired when he came to the occupancy of the chair. The correct ruling is that if a Senator has offered an amendment, the Senator has the right to withdraw that amendment until such time action has been taken upon that amendment. When action has been taken upon the amendment, as has been pointed out by the Senator from West Virginia, then the Senator loses the right to withdraw that amendment as a matter of right.

What occurred is during that period of time, there was a series of unanimous-consent requests. One was made first by the Senator from New Mexico, the occupant of the chair is informed, and that he had the right to withdraw his amendment. It is my understanding there was maybe some confusion, but the majority leader was then granted the right to make that same request. But the true parliamentary situation would be that he needed unanimous consent in order to withdraw his amendment once the vote had occurred on the second-degree amendment.

I might state that the pending business at the moment is the first-degree amendment to his amendment. Have I made that clear to the Senator?

Mr. COATS. Mr. President, I further inquire—

Mr. MITCHELL addressed the Chair.

Mr. COATS. I yield to the majority leader.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, in good faith, the Senator from New Mexico has sought unanimous consent now to withdraw the amendment which renders moot the question of the force of the prior agreement. And I would suggest that since we are now in the middle of a Friday afternoon with Senators wanting to leave and continuing the budget, and we have to complete action on the budget resolution, the Senate acted in response to my request. I would suggest that the Senator now renew that request, and if the request now granting unanimous consent is made, the prior discussion is moot because the withdrawal will have been based upon the current consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that it be in order to withdraw my substitute, as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Hearing no objection, it is so ordered. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn.

The amendment (No. 1777), was withdrawn.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I want to know if Senator RUDMAN would like to speak? I want to yield him time off the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire is recognized.

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield 3 minutes to the Senator.

Mr. RUDMAN. Mr. President, I probably will not take the 3 minutes. The majority leader is right. It is late. I believe this has been a very instructive discussion. I am sorry that it was necessary to pull this down. The handwriting is on the wall. The political consultants, the media consultants, the pollsters, the strategists upon whom everyone in this Congress bestows millions of dollars every 2 years are already in their rabbit warrens with their editing machines crafting the next set of negative commercials to those who voted their conscience on this amendment.

I do not claim for a moment that those on the other side did not vote theirs. I am never one to suspect peoples' motives. But I will simply say that there are a lot of people in America today, including a number of disabled veterans who care deeply about where we are going.

And I have one other thing to say which I am going to research and get into the press in the next week or 10 days. There is a very interesting letter, not from a Senator, but from the majority staff of the Senate Agriculture Committee. I have never seen anything like this before. It is addressed: To: Interested Parties. From: The majority Staff, Senate Agriculture. It was faxed to farmers and farm organizations all over America. It is shot full of inaccuracies, distortions, and untruths, and it was put out for one reason: To generate opposition to a proposal by the Senator from New Mexico. The proposal may be flawed, maybe it could have been improved—I was part of it—but, all it did was to say that in 2 years we would look at all of the entitlements.

The letter says:

"The administration has proposed a cap on total entitlement spending that could have serious implications to agriculture and nutrition. Senator DOMENICI is developing a proposal similar," et cetera.

Then you get down to page 3 and its says:

"If proportional sequestration-type reductions"—I never heard anybody talk about sequestrators around here. "If proportional sequestration-type reductions are made in spending for all entitlement categories, nutrition spending would be cut by $208 million in fiscal year 1993—with the cuts increasing to $2.9 billion in '97". I mean it is absolute sophistry of the worst kind. It is not worth the paper it is printed on. It is used by a staff of this Senate to intimidate. It is exactly what is wrong with this place. I yield the floor.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I have the greatest respect and personal affection for the Senator from New Hampshire, and I have often felt the way that he has when a proposal of mine has been decisively rejected by the Senate. But I just want to say first, so there can be no misunderstanding, this substitute resolution was a resolution of vast implications for this country and for millions of people in this country. It was submitted at the last minute. It was not subjected to the hearing process. We did not have the regular legislative process to go through it and examine it fully.

The notion that persons in the Senate, Senators, their aides, and supporters and opponents on both sides go out and marshal support for their position in opposition to those on the other side, as though that is something new is, of course, incredible. The Senator from New Hampshire has been here for a long time. He knows very well that that is a regular course of action in this place. We may deplore it, but any suggestion or implication that comes out of this that this is unique to this situation is, of course, without any factual or historic basis.

I do not have the slightest idea about the letter to which the Senator referred. I have not seen it. I have not heard of it. I do not know anything about the accuracy or inaccuracy of its statements. But let us not attempt to create an implication that Senators and supporting organizations and individuals marshaling support for one or another position in the Senate is a new development. It happens often.

Mr. RUDMAN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. MITCHELL. Certainly.

Mr. RUDMAN. I say to my friend, I do not challenge anything the majority leader just said. Everyone in this body has every right, as do their aides, to send out information to marshal support. Nor am I particularly chagrined in losing a vote. It has happened many times before. My concern with this letter, which the majority leader will learn more of in the next week or two when we get it all researched, is it was typical of scare tactics used, I might say, on both sides of this aisle in the last 10 years to scare the living daylights out of interest groups with information that is factually incorrect. I believe that the dignity of this body is such that, if a letter goes out on the letterhead of the U.S. Senate, there ought to be an effort toward accuracy, and if I gave any other impression I apologize for it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I certainly endorse that statement. I think all of us ought to reject and deplore any inaccuracy in the presentation of our positions, whether here on the Senate floor or in written or other communications with others. But I do not want anyone to come out of this with any suggestion that what occurred in this case—and the Senator from New Hampshire has readily acknowledged it—is not a commonplace practice on both sides.

Mr. President, I just want to say, repeat really, something I said earlier. I believe it has been an extremely useful debate. It has brought into focus and made more clear for me personally, and I think for many Senators and many Americans, that the root cause of the problem we have here is rising health care costs, and it is a problem that afflicts everyone in our society. I hope, if nothing else comes out of this, it is a determination on the part of every Senator to address that issue because that is the fundamental problem we are confronting.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. RIEGLE. Will the Senator yield—

Mr. MITCHELL. I am going to yield the floor.

Mr. RIEGLE. For one observation? The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will yield for a brief moment.

Mr. RIEGLE. Fine. I will be brief.

I agree with the majority leader with respect to looking ahead at expenditures in the future and the need to control health costs. He is exactly right. But the other half of this debate today has to do with how this huge deficit accumulated over the last decade, principally since 1980, and I want to just insert into the RECORD for the sake of completing something from when I engaged in a colloquy with the Senator from New Hampshire, and that is I want to put into the RECORD the revenue loss from the income tax cuts of the Reagan tax cut just through the early years of the 1980's.

The source of this data is the 1981 Congressional Quarterly Almanac, and they have a chart from the Joint Committee on Taxation that shows the revenue losses because of the individual tax cuts mounting up through the years—1983, for example, $71 billion disappeared; 1984, $114 billion disappeared; 1985, $148 billion; 1986, $196 billion. Just for the years 1981 through 1986, $547 billion.

Now, most of those tax cuts, as another item I want to put into the RECORD will indicate, went to the wealthiest people in this country. I want to put into the RECORD a story from the New York Times of March 5, the headline of which is: "Even Among the Well-Off, the Richest Get Richer." the subheadline: "Data Show Top 1%"—1 percent of income earners—"Got 60% of the Gain in the 80's Boom."

So when we talk about where the deficit came from that we are trying to dig out of, we have to look backward at that Reaganomics strategy and those huge tax cuts, most of which went to the wealthiest people in our country and have tipped the whole balance, the whole equity balance, off in the Nation. And so health care costs, looking forward—unconscionable tax cuts stacked toward the wealthy, looking behind us—this problem has come from those two directions.

I ask unanimous consent that these items be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EVEN AMONG THE WELL-OFF, THE RICHEST GET RICHER
(By Sylvia Nasar)

Populist politicians, economists and ordinary citizens have long suspected that the rich have been getting richer. What is making people sit up now is recent evidence that the richest 1 percent of American families appears to have reaped most of the gains from the prosperity of the last decade and a half.

An outsized 60 percent of the growth in after-tax income of all American families between 1977 and 1989—and an even heftier three-fourths of the gain in pretax income—went to the wealthiest 660,000 families, each of which had an annual income of at least $310,000 a year, for a household of four.

While total income for all 66 million American families expanded by about $740 billion in inflation-adjusted dollars during the Carter-Reagan years, the slice belonging to the top 1 percent grew to 13 percent of all family income, up from 9 percent.

BIG JUMP IN INCOME

The average pretax income of families in the top percent swelled to $560,000 from $315,000, for a 77 percent gain in a dozen years, again in constant dollars. At the same time, the typical American family—smack in the middle, or at the median, of the income distribution—saw its income edge up only 4 percent, to $36,000. And the bottom 40 percent of families had actual declines in income.

"We know that productivity has increased since 1977 and that more people are working," said Paul Krugman, an economist at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and the author of "The Age of Diminished Expectations," a book that is critical of Reaganomics. "Where did all that extra income go? The answer is that it all went to the very top."

FINE-SIFTING THE DATA

The data were compiled by the Congressional Budget Office, the research arm of Congress, which uses the estimates to project tax revenues; the figures were released in final form in December. The census data that most economists use track incomes by broad categories like the top 20 percent, called the top quintile. The C.B.O. data, by building on figures from tax returns, let analysts focus on narrow income strata with microscopic precision.

"If changes are going on at the top, you don't pick it up in the census data," said Robert Reischauer, director of the Congressional Budget Office.

The broad pattern disclosed by the latest data is not in dispute, but the reasons for the shift are. Potential explanations range from the trend toward lower taxes on the wealthy to an explosion of executive pay to higher returns on capital.

It was not until economists started to analyze the figures that it became clear what a large share of the income gains in recent years was accounted for by the very rich. "The number that no one had seen was how much of the growth went to a few people," said Mr. Krugman, who focused on the numbers in testimony before Congress several weeks ago.

That funding is already supplying fresh ammunition for those eager to reverse the upward tilt in income distribution or searching for new ways to raise Government revenue.

The tax bills wending their way through Congress include an increase in the top tax rate and a surtax on millionaires. And the Democratic party is honing "fairness" as an issue it can run with.

As it happens, the trend seems to have begun 30 years ago and parallels shifts in other rich countries, including Germany and Britain.

"It's been going on since the 1960's," said Robert Avery, an economist at Cornell University who conducted two Federal Reserve surveys of the wealthy in the 1980's. "It shows up in many different sets of data. And it's consistent with different explanations, healthy and unhealthy."

In fact, a growing tilt toward the top has characterized other periods in American history. Economic historians say that industrial America through the 1800's and early 1900's experienced a growing concentration of riches at the top. But that was partly reversed by the Depression and World War II.

"We have a couple of periods when we've seen especially rapid changes," said Claudia Goldin, an economic historian at Harvard University.

The latest data on income distribution do not provide any easy explanation of the trend. One explanation given by some tax experts is that the rich are simply reporting more of their income and taking advantage of fewer loopholes, now that tax rates have been trimmed substantially. The top tax rate on personal income was cut to 31 percent during the Reagan tenure from more than 90 percent during the Kennedy years.

The reason is that suddenly you can keep most of the money you report," said Lawrence Lindsay, a Federal Reserve governor who has written a book, "The Growth Experiment," that defends the supply-side tax cuts of the Reagan era.

THE ADVANTAGES OF TIMING

Most economists find the explanation plausible. Unlike steelworkers or secretaries, business owners and executives often have a lot of discretion over the timing and form of their income. They can decide when, say, to sell a business or whether to take their compensation in a paycheck or a bunch of stock options.

"Inequality has increased back to where it was before the New Deal," Mr. Krugman said. "But maybe the New Deal only drove the rich underground."

Still, few economists are convinced that the reporting factors are the only explanation.

For one thing, wage and salary income for the top 1 percent of families exploded between 1977 and 1989. At least two studies have shown that the rich—wealthy wives, in particular—actually worked more after taxes were cut. More important, the pay of chief executives rocketed during the 1980's. By the end of the decade, according to Graef Crystal, a compensation consultant, the bosses were making 120 times as much as the average worker, compared with about 35 times as much as in the mid-1970's.

Before these new data showed how much of the gains really went to the very top, economists knew of the growing inequality and explained some of it by pointing to the rise in two-earner couples and the faster wage growth of highly educated workers, especially ones with computer skills. But the surge in pay at the top is just too large to be explained solely by working wives and M.B.A. degrees.

Another theory is that inhibitions against pay inequality crumbled during the Reagan 80's, a period in which unions were put down and getting rich through enterprise was seen as heroic.

The families at the top of the top quintile include lawyers married to other lawyers and a sprinkling of rock and baseball stars. But the majority probably own closely held businesses or manage Fortune 500 companies. Another thing that makes these families different from the merely well heeled, said Joel Slemrod, a tax economist at the University of Michigan, is that they get about half their income from their wealth—capital gains, dividends and interest. And income from assets owned by the wealthy, like real estate, stocks and bonds, also surged in the 1980's.

For most of the 1980's at least, interest rates were high, the stock market appreciated some 16 percent a year and the price of real estate on the East and West Coasts soared. The value of small-business assets also grew, Mr. Avery said. "The argument that the rise in top incomes was partly driven by entrepreneurial income is fairly persuasive," he said.

In fact, there is new evidence that net worth—assets minus debt—at the very top also grew disproportionately. The Federal Reserve has yet to release data with breakdowns, but a recent Fed study suggests that that was the case.

While some view the greater concentration of income at the top as a problem, many economists do not agree. "The probability that you're looking at the same people at the start or end of a decade is very small," Mr. Lindsay said. "If the top 1 percent is getting richer, it means that there was a lot of upward mobility in America during this period."

Mr. Lindsay cites tax data that show that of the families in the top 1 percent at the beginning of a decade, fewer than half are in the top 1 percent 10 years later. From year to year, he said, between a quarter and a third of families move from one broad income group, like the top 20 percent, to another.

Keep in mind, moreover, that 1989, the last year for which Congressional Budget Office numbers are available, represented the peak of the 1980's financial boom. The early 1990's have already clipped the wings of a lot of high-fliers as corporations have shed executives, law firms have downsized, businesses have failed and real estate values have collapsed.

But it is easy to exaggerate fluidity at the very top, some economists say. For one thing, the rich may get knocked off their perches from time to time, but the fall for most is not usually all that far. Then too, an income drop is as likely as not to reflect a decision to take a one-time loss than it is a permanent change in the ability to generate income.

Besides, said Frank Sammartino, an economist at the C.B.O.: "People complain that the income distribution is just a snapshot of one year. But after all, taxes get paid on one year's income."

THE TAX FACTOR

Although families in the top 1 percent paid slightly less than 27 percent of their income in taxes in 1989, compared with more than 35 percent in 1977, their payments amounted to a somewhat bigger share of the total Federal tax bill than in 1977. The reason, of course, is because their incomes grew so much.

With incomes that total near half a trillion dollars—about the same amount, coincidentally, as total Federal tax revenues—the top 1 percent of American families have a lot of financial heft.

"If you're talking about the income tax bubble or capital gains, it's not the top 5 percent or the top 10 percent, but the top 1 percent," Mr. Avery said. "If they're taxed at 100 percent, everybody else can be taxed at zero," he added jokingly.

The data are going to keep economists busy for years and should pay fat dividends for Americans' understanding of how the freewheeling United States economy really works. But, for the present, the numbers are bound to provide yet another battleground for politicians arguing over which tax policy will produce the best combination of growth and "fairness."

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee is the manager of the bill. The Senator from Tennessee is recognized.

Mr. SASSER. I just inquired of my friend from New Mexico—time is moving fast on us. We have had a good debate on the Senator's initiative. I am wondering if we could make some progress now on disposing of the rest of these amendments. The distinguished Senator from Arizona is on the floor ready to take up his amendment. I am told it can be disposed of in 10 minutes. Is the Senator going to request a roll-call vote?

Mr. DECONCINI. Yes, I am.

Mr. SASSER. Ten minutes for a roll-call, and then we can dispose of that one.

Mr. DOMENICI addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. DOMENICI. I am going to yield to my friend very shortly. I want everyone to know we have Senator D'AMATO ready to follow so we ought to move along rather quickly.

Mr. President, I want to make just three points. One, I do not think anyone should really be misled that we are going to solve the problem of burgeoning entitlements, mandatories, that we discussed here today by imposing taxes on the American people or American business in any proportion that will get rid of that entitlement deficit. It is preposterous from the standpoint of economic growth to think that we are going to impose taxes to do that. It just is not going to work.

Now, I want to thank Senator DOLE for assisting us with this underlying amendment, which we have withdrawn. He wants to appear as an original cosponsor even though we have withdrawn it. I ask unanimous consent that he be so shown.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, if the debate was satisfactory and successful, then one of two things will occur. We will either resolve this issue in the near future—that is No. 1—or if we do not, then at least the debate will have left the burden right where it belongs. If we in Congress do not find a way to control this, then today's debate is notice to everyone, to Americans, to disabled veterans, to those who are collecting Medicare and Medicaid and, yes, to that three-fourths of Americans who get entitlements who are not poor, until we fix this, there is no real future for our children. That is what this debate should do. If it has done that, it has been successful. If not, we have wasted a lot of time discussing important things obviously to no end.

I yield the floor.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. COATS. Mr. President, before the Senator yields the floor, I wonder if I might just—I know the Senator from Arizona is waiting to offer an amendment. I will take no more than 2 minutes. If the Senator will yield me 2 minutes on the resolution, I would like to speak.

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield 2 minutes off the resolution.

Mr. COATS. Mr. President, I commend the Senator from New Mexico for raising before this body a subject that everyone in this room knows needs to be discussed and debated. He did an excellent job. The majority leader said it needs to go through a more lengthy process. It probably does. It does deserve hearings. It does deserve serious discussion. But every one of us, or at least anyone who has given serious thought to the future of this country, knows we have to deal with this issue and deal with it sooner rather than later.

I regret we were not able to deal with it as a package and do it in a way that the decision made by this body would become policy. That will, hopefully happen at some point in the near future, and I am prepared to do that today, this weekend, next week, next month, whenever.

The problem is so serious, the need is so great that all of us have to find a way in which to address it in a responsible manner or the entire Republic is in jeopardy. I wish we could stop playing the games, stop playing the political games of "we are going to put you on the spot" or "we will put you on the spot" and step back and do what we all know we need to do. Whether this is the right vehicle, whether there is a difference procedure, I really cannot say.

I commend the Senator for raising the issue. We had an instructive debate. I think we are moving in the right direction. Obviously, voting on exempting one piece of the puzzle was purely a political vote, particularly whenever one knew that the resolution was going to be withdrawn.

Obviously doing it on the budget resolution is a free shot because it does not have the force and effect of law. But if we are willing to make decisions that do have the force and effect of law, I want the people that I represent and I want the Members of this body to know that this Senator is ready to make those tougher decisions and make those tough votes if it really counts.

I yield the floor.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. COATS. I do not have control of the time.

Mr. SASSER. I yield to the Senator 1 minute.

Mr. SARBANES. I say to the managers, I do not know whether we will reopen the debate on this amendment. We are perfectly happy to do it. If they want to talk about a game being played, it is offering a far-reaching amendment of this sort without ever having hearings on it, offering it in the committee, having it considered in any of the forums that prepare the legislation, and then bringing it out here on the floor of the Senate. If they want to talk about a game being played, which was the expression that the Senator used, if we want to reopen this debate,

I am happy to do it. I thought we had finished the debate, and were ready to move on and try to finish the bill to accommodate a lot of Members.

Mr. COATS. I would simply—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has yielded the floor.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona is recognized. He has been seeking recognition, unless the manager has requested recognition, which I did not hear.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, the Senator has been seeking recognition. I was under the impression there had been a conversation between my distinguished colleagues, Senator SIMPSON and Senator DECONCINI, in which there had been an agreement Senator SIMPSON might proceed for 2 minutes.

Mr. DECONCINI. The chairman is correct.

Mr. SASSER. I assume Senator GORTON will yield Senator SIMPSON some time.

Mr. President, Senator SIMPSON will be yielded 2 minutes, as I understand it, off the time of the ranking member of the Budget Committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. SIMPSON. I thank my friend from Arizona, Mr. President. I thank Senator SASSER.

I have listened to the debate. I speak for 2 minutes simply to say that I have chaired the Veterans' Affairs Committee. It is a very tough situation. Senator CRANSTON chaired it before me.

I think it is so important to realize that this is not some antiveteran vote. I have been here long enough to see the easy vote is cast often by people in this Chamber who are not veterans. A non-veteran finds this a very attractive vote always. Those of us who served in the military try to play up front and correctly with it.

I can only tell you that in my time as chairman one realizes how many veterans there are who are disabled, service-connected disabled veterans who have nothing to do with the combat-connected disabled veterans who have nothing to do with the combat situation. That seems to be forgotten continually in this debate. Non-service-connected veterans are being limited by their care because other veterans with no priority are crowding them out. It is becoming an absurd situation.

We need to pay close attention to that. Realize that the veterans number under this budget is $34.5 billion. That is taking care of the veterans very well. There are 27 million of us.

I commend the Senator from New Mexico. This debate has to take place. It will take place. And thoughtful Democrats and thoughtful Republicans will help get it done or in the year 2030 this country will be in dramatic decline.

AMENDMENT NO. 1780

(Purpose: To express the sense of the Senate with respect to funding for the Special Supplemental Food Program for Women, Infants, and Children)

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Arizona [Mr. DECONCINI], for himself, Mr. CHAFEE, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. SPECTER, Mr. JOHNSTON, Mr. LUGAR, Mr. BRADLEY, Mr. DOLE, Mr. GRAHAM, Mr. MCCONNELL, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. WARNER, Mr. AKAKA, Mr. MURKOWSKI, Mr. SIMON, Mr. DANFORTH, Mr. WELLSTONE, Mr. DURENBERGER, and Mr. DODD, proposes an amendment numbered 1780.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the end of the resolution, add the following:

SEC. . SENSE OF THE SENATE ON WIC.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Senate finds that—
(1) the Special Supplemental Food Program for Women, Infants and Children (WIC) has been invaluable to millions of needy pregnant and nursing women, infants and children at nutritional risk for nearly 20 years;

(2) President Bush has commendably recommended an increase in the WIC program for fiscal year 1993, continuing the strong bipartisan support for expanding the program to serve more of those eligible;

(3) the chairmen of five major American corporations testified last year on WIC, declaring that an increased investment in WIC is essential to the Nation's future economic growth and that "WIC can make an important contribution to ensuring that * * * we have the productive workforce we need";

(4) the CEOs called WIC "the health-care equivalent of a triple-A rated investment. * * * one of the most reliable ways that Government can invest its resources," and recommended that to achieve the national educational goal established by the President and Governors that by the year 2000 all children should start school ready to learn, "* * * we need to set a related goal: Every woman, infant, and child who is eligible for WIC in 1995 and later years will be served by the program";

(5) less than 60 percent of the eligible women, infants, and children are served by the program due to funding limitations;

(6) a funding level of $3,000,000,000 in fiscal year 1993 is needed to remain on the 5-year path embarked upon by the Congress last year to reach full funding consistent with the CEO's recommendations; and

(7) a recent United States Department of Agriculture study has demonstrated that the prenatal component of WIC reduces Medicaid costs by between $1.92 and $4.21 for each dollar invested in it, and studies issued by the National Bureau of Economic Research have found WIC to be one of the most cost-effective means of reducing infant mortality and indicate WIC also may produce long-term savings in special educational costs.

(b) SENSE OF THE SENATE.—It is the sense of the Senate that the WIC program should be funded at $3,000,000,000 for fiscal year 1993.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, this is a simple amendment. I am not going to go on about how long and how frustrated I am to finally get the floor, through no fault of the chairman of the committee. We have listened to a lot of debates here. I am sorry to have to say, yes, it was a political vote that we just had. However, it was a very good political vote because if demonstrated the people do not want to take an action to cut veterans programs.

I believe we have a program here that everybody will want to add money to. That is the WIC Program. It is a simple commitment here by this body to reinforce the existing commitment to fully fund the WIC Program by 1996.

There is no question that the WIC Program is one of the finest, more cost effective programs that the Federal Government has ever had. Both Houses have passed budget resolutions which include this commitment to fully fund by 1996. But each House each year has had a problem adding enough money to get there.

Mr. President, I want to show you quickly just the problems we have faced. We are here now going into 1993. The amendment I am offering today would express that it is the sense of the Senate to increase the fiscal year 1993 expenditure for WIC by $400 million above the fiscal year 1992 level of $2.6 billion.

Mr. President, the effectiveness of this program is no secret. For every dollar that is spent on the prenatal component of the WIC Program, there is a Medicaid savings of between $1.77 and $3.13. Unlike the prior amendment by my friend from New Mexico this amendment seeks to save Federal dollars by investing in Americans, the Women, Infants, and Children Programs.

This indicates where we are. It shows we are only serving about 55 percent of the eligible WIC populations. You can see that steady progress has been made since 1984, but in the 1989 chart behind me progress ended because the economy went into the doldrums. Mr. President, this is a real shame. We cannot even take care of the most precious resource of this country, our infants.

Mr. President, it is time that we go on the record. Even though this amendment carries no weight of law the DeConcini-Chafee amendment will help us in the Appropriations Committee process to try to get the full funding. The amendment merely calls for another $400 million for the WIC Program in fiscal year 1993. That level is $160 million more than the amount requested in the President's budget.

Mr. President, in the interest of time I will yield at this point to the Senator from Rhode Island. I thank him for his cooperation, and support of this amendment.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I want to commend the distinguished Senator from Arizona. He and I have worked together on this for many years. Each year we have been able to increase the funding for the WIC Program. Everything he says about the WIC Program is absolutely right. The only problem is, as he points out now, it is covering about 55 percent of those eligible.

This asks for a modest step up to $3 billion a year. We have some 86 colleagues joining us in connection with this entreaty to the Appropriations Committee, and I do hope that we will get a very solid vote in favor of this amendment.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I rise today to offer a sense-of-the-Senate amendment to the fiscal year 1993 budget resolution, Senate Concurrent Resolution 106. This amendment expresses the sense of the Senate that the Special Supplemental Food Program for Women, Infants, and Children be funded at $3 billion for fiscal year 1993. I am pleased that this amendment has been cosponsored by 18 of my distinguished colleagues: Senators CHAFEE, LEAHY, SPECTER, JOHNSTON, LUGAR, BRADLEY, DOLE, GRAHAM, MCCONNELL, RIEGLE, WARNER, AKAKA, MURKOWSKI, SIMON, DANFORTH, WELLSTONE, DURENBERGER, and DODD.

Mr. President, for the past several years my friend from Rhode Island, Senator CHAFEE, and I, together with the distinguished chairman and ranking member of the Agriculture Committee, Senator LEAHY and Senator LUGAR, have led efforts in the Senate to increase appropriations for the WIC Program. As my colleagues will recall, last year we sought to increase WIC funding by $250 million over the prior year's current services level in order to maintain the schedule for full funding of WIC by 1996.

Despite a record number of cosponsors last year for the DeConcini-Chafee annual WIC appropriations request, WIC's enacted level was a full $100 million short of the fiscal year 1992 target of $2.7 billion. While it is very hard to imagine that 88 Senators can agree on anything these days, it is even harder to imagine that such a consensus could be formed and fail to achieve its goal. But that is exactly what occurred.

Mr. President, I do not find fault in any way with any of the Senate or House conferees on last year's agriculture appropriations bill. Their task was nearly impossible given an insufficient subcommittee allocation to meet all the demands placed upon them. Continuing crop disaster insurance problems and other problems made their decisions all the more difficult. I sincerely applaud the efforts of the Senate Agriculture Subcommittee chairman and ranking member. Chairman BURDICK and Senator COCHRAN have consistently done whatever they could on behalf of WIC. Their efforts last year were no less than exceptional.

However, the fact remains that we could not enact an appropriations level of $2.7 billion. As a result, this year's and the next 3 year's efforts will be all the more difficult if the Members of both the House and Senate sincerely intend to keep our pledges for full funding of WIC by fiscal 1996. For myself, I remain committed despite recent setbacks. WIC is too important and, whatever the cost, we are going to have to find the money.

Mr. President, my reasons are simple. WIC is a Federal domestic program that clearly works. That is why I have been an advocate for WIC since its inception. It is the right thing to do. WIC not only prevents infant mortality and low birthweight, study after study has also shown that WIC is the most cost-effective method to do so. WIC reduces Medicaid costs: Each dollar invested in WIC's prenatal component saves between $1.77 and $3.13 in Medicaid costs. In addition, studies show that future special education costs are reduced through WIC's early nutrition intervention.

Despite this remarkable record, WIC has yet to achieve its full potential. Current funding levels support less than 60 percent of the eligible women, infants, and children nationwide. My home State of Arizona currently receives funding that enables the WIC Program to assist about 60 percent of the eligibles statewide, but serves barely 40 percent of those eligible in the urban areas.

Yes, the Federal taxpayer does, indeed, pay quite a bit already for WIC. WIC currently provides critical nutrition and health benefits to an estimated 5.3 million low-income pregnant women and young children at risk of diet-related health problems. Yet almost as many other needy women and children are unserved. Tragically, America ranks 19th in the world in infant mortality. Every year 40,000 infants die in the United States and another 11,000 babies are born with long-term disabilities that result from their weakened condition.

Mr. President, the sad truth is, unless we act—and act soon—to provide full funding for WIC, we will lose more American infants in the next 13 years than we have lost soldiers in all the wars fought by this country in this century. Let me say that again, without full funding for WIC, America will lose more infants in the next 13 years than we have lost soldiers in all the wars fought by this country since the turn of the century.

The magnitude of this loss of life is certainly compelling. It should be reason enough to act. Failure to fully fund WIC is also irrational from a purely fiscal perspective. WIC has been shown over and over to be among the best, if not the best, means to prevent infant mortality and low birthweight. Today, the lifetime costs of caring for just one low birthweight infant can total $400,000. The cost of prenatal care—care that might prevent the low birthweight condition in the first place—can be as little as $400. As a nation we have a clear choice. We can pay more now, or we will pay far more later.

Congressional efforts to date have also failed to keep pace with the WIC full funding schedule by 1996 for other reasons. The most important of which is that the number of new poor at nutritional risk is growing faster than our ability to serve them. The deep recession and a small increase in the birthrate have all but halted our progress toward WIC full funding. As shown here on a chart depicting actual Federal funding of the WIC Program from 1984 through 1992, Congress and the President have increased funding for WIC since 1984. In fact, WIC funding has almost doubled since 1984 faster than any other nondefense, domestic program. However, high unemployment and rising poverty rates, together with an increase in the birthrate, have all but stalled the rate of growth in terms of percentage of eligibles served.

The other chart I have here today tracks the percentage of the eligible WIC population served. Despite a record funding increase of $779 million over the last three fiscal year, the percentage of eligibles served has remained virtually constant. We are certainly serving more individuals, but the number of eligible women, infants, and children simply has risen much faster.

The chart on annual Federal expenditures for WIC also shows the increases needed to achieve full funding in fiscal 1996. Given the most recent Congressional Budget Office estimate for full funding by fiscal 1996, the WIC Program would require an additional $412.5 million in funding every year for the next 4 years to achieve a full funding level of $4.25 billion.

Mr. President, I know that it sounds like full funding will be an impossible task. However, Senators CHAFEE, LEAHY, LUGAR, and I have gone too far to turn back now. The House and the Senate are now on record in support of full-funding of WIC by fiscal 1996. But, we have a long way to go. For myself, I am committed to pressing the issue as hard as I can and as often as it is required to achieve that goal. That is why I have offered this amendment at this time. While I am certain that the floor managers would accept this sense-of-the-Senate resolution given their longstanding support for WIC full funding, I am insisting on a recorded vote to dispel any doubt that the Senate is not firmly committed to full funding of WIC by fiscal year 1996.

Mr. President, the bottom line is: WIC is a Federal initiative that works and we should work to make it a reality for the millions of women and children whose health will continue to suffer without it. I haven't given up all hope that we can achieve full funding by fiscal 1996. However, we can't get there without making some tough choices. I urge my colleagues to make the right choice at this time and support the DeConcini-Chafee WIC amendment to the fiscal year 1993 budget resolution.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I am pleased to cosponsor this sense-of-the-Senate resolution which affirms the longstanding position of the Senate that funding for WIC should be increased by amounts that will put us on a path to achieve full participation of all eligible women and children.

Few programs have enjoyed the consistent bipartisan support and consistent grassroots support that WIC has. Few programs have been shown to be as effective as WIC. Even fewer programs have been shown to be as cost-efficient as WIC.

We've all heard the statistics many times, but some bear repeating. USDA has found, for example, that the prenatal portion of WIC reduces Medicaid costs by between roughly $2 and $4 for each dollar we invest by reducing the incidence of low birthweight births and premature births. Other studies have found similar long term savings in special educational costs and other programs by helping reduce the incidence of disabilities related to deficient nutrition in pregnant women and young children.

Louisiana has one of the youngest populations in the United States: About 29 percent of Louisiana's population is composed of children. Some 30 percent of these children live in poverty. We have the dubious distinction of ranking second from the bottom—49th—in low birthweight, and experience one of the highest infant mortality rates in the Nation—11 percent. Almost 7 percent of babies in Louisiana are born to mothers receiving no or late prenatal care, ranking us seventh from the bottom in terms of adequacy of prenatal care.

Since its beginning in Louisiana in 1974, WIC has been an integral and key part of preventive health services. This program currently serves 132,000 participants each month—33,000 women, 37,000 infants, and 62,000 children. Yet, projecting from 1980 census data, Louisiana's Office of Public Health estimates that 203,000 women, infants, and children are eligible for and need the critical assistance which WIC provides.

The funding level recommended by this resolution, $3 billion, will not enable us to reach the 71,000 women and children who are eligible but do not participate in Louisiana this year. But the increase recommended will help us reach more, and put us on the right track to assuring that all those from this vulnerable population—pregnant and post partum women and children under the age of 5 who are at nutritional risk—receive critical nutrition and preventive assistance. We should do no less.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I want to thank the Senator from Tennessee for making this expeditious arrangement to offer this amendment. The poor man, I am surprised he can even stand up after what he has been through in the last 3 or 4 days. I appreciate his courtesy.

Mr. SASSER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleague from Arizona, Senator DECONCINI, in offering this amendment regarding fiscal year 1993 funding for the Special Supplemental Food Program for Women, Infants, and Children [WIC]. Simply stated, the amendment expresses the sense of the Senate that WIC should be funded at $3 billion in fiscal year 1993.

Last year, 86 of our colleagues joined Senator DECONCINI and myself in requesting a full $2.7 billion for WIC in fiscal year 1992. I was pleased that the Appropriations Committee gave us $2.6 billion—an increase of $250 million over the 1991 appropriation, and the single largest increase in funding in WIC's history. What good news.

I also am pleased that President Bush recommended $2.86 billion for WIC in fiscal year 1993. While this figure represents a real boost, I believe we must go a little further if we intend to reach those children and women now in need. The funding level of $3 billion called for in the amendment builds on last year's accomplishments and will keep the momentum going toward fully funding WIC within the next few years.

Mr. President, 2 weeks ago, I voted against the amendment to take down the so-called firewall governing the limits on military and domestic spending in the Federal budget for fiscal year 1993. This amendment would have allowed reductions in defense spending to be used for domestic programs, rather than to reduce the deficit as called for by the Budget Enforcement Act of 1990. Both the House and Senate have now reaffirmed support for the discipline imposed by that budget agreement, refusing to remove the firewall.

This is not an easy choice since it is clear that we need to resolve urgent domestic problems such as the lack of adequate health care, housing, and education. But the budget agreement does not prevent us from working within the domestic discretionary cap to identify programs that have proven to be effective and deserve priority during the appropriations process.

As the Appropriations Committee begins to assign priorities within the domestic discretionary cap for the coming fiscal year, this amendment sends an important signal. For Senator DECONCINI and myself, increased funding for WIC has long been a priority.

The WIC Program provides food to low-income mothers and their children who are at risk of serious nutritional deficiencies. It sounds simple, but making sure that mothers and children receive good, basic, nutritious foods and avoid nutritional deficiencies is remarkably effective.

We know beyond a shadow of a doubt that for every $1 invested, WIC saves about $3 in long-term health care costs and developmental problems. A USDA study has documented that for every pregnant woman who participated in WIC, the Government saved between $277 and $598 more in Medicaid costs in the first 60 days after birth than for a pregnant woman who did not participate.

The savings are important; but that is not all we should thank WIC for. WIC reaches infants and children at the most critical stage in their physical and mental development. Without proper nourishment, the cognitive development of a young child can be severely impaired and can mean impairment of cognitive functions. That child is then behind the curve in terms of learning ability. And he or she isn't even 5.

WIC also helps mothers. It helps them understand more about good nutrition, and it eases their entry into the health care system. A mother who is used to going by the community health center to pick up the WIC foods feels more comfortable going back to the center for medical care, or for referrals to other agencies that can help her.

Sadly, however, this worthwhile program serves only about half of the eligible population. In Rhode Island, for example, an estimated 32,000 women, infants, and children are eligible for WIC benefits, but funding levels permit only 17,550 to be served. Rising food costs, especially in these difficult economic times, also have diminished the purchasing power of WIC dollars and have forced States to limit their WIC caseloads. This gap in coverage represents a considerable missed opportunity, considering WIC's proven effectiveness for an especially vulnerable population.

Of course I am preaching to the choir: Congress knows of WIC's benefits, and has given the program considerable support, and for good reason: WIC means healthy children, and healthy children can learn, and eventually become productive members of tomorrow's work force.

Increasing funding for WIC is the right thing to do—not only from the hard-nosed, cost versus benefit point of view. WIC is one Federal program that saves more than it spends, and deserves every bit of support we can give it. I urge my colleagues to join us in supporting this amendment.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I am proud to cosponsor this resolution to increase funding in fiscal year 1993 for the Women, Infants, and Children [WIC] program, and I applaud the foresight of Senators CHAFEE and DECONCINI for introducing this amendment. This resolution will allow us to remain on the 5-year path to reach full funding by fiscal year 1996.

The WIC Program has been in existence for well over a dozen years, and was created for the purpose of supplementing the special nutritional needs of pregnant women, nursing mothers, their infants, and small children. On any given day, my colleagues and I could visit a WIC recipient in our respective States and see first-hand the impact that it is having on the lives of millions of women and their children. But without the need for closer examination, you would also see a multitude of reasons to increase the Federal commitment to the WIC Program.

Mr. President, according to a study done by the U.S. Department of Agriculture, WIC sharply reduces future Medicaid health costs for the mother and child and also results in improved birthweights. The study found in its sample of States that when mothers received program foods before birth, the Government's Medicaid spending averaged between $277 and $598 less for health care of the mother and child in the first 60 days after birth than in cases where the mothers did not receive special prenatal foods.

This study is further evidence that in addition to the programs proven importance to low-income families, it is also a fiscally responsible program that has demonstrated itself to be a worthwhile public investment. For every dollar spent on WIC, the Federal Government saves up to $4.21 on future program expenses. This is a return investment that is not often found in programs administered by the Federal Government.

My support of this resolution, Mr. President, is not to be taken as critical of the budget request by President Bush. The President deserves great credit for his commitment to WIC, which is demonstrated in his fiscal year 1993 request for a $237 million increase over fiscal year 1992. However, the benefits of this program and the needs of today's low-income families require an even greater investment. In 1991, we were only able to serve about 52 percent or 4.5 million, of eligible low-income pregnant women and children.

Mr. President, lately, many of my colleagues have echoed the concern which I share about the monstrosity that we call the Federal debt. In votes and remarks that I have made, I have indicated that this is truly one of the gravest situations that this Nation has ever faced, and that an examination of our budget priorities is necessary in order to begin significant efforts to deal with it. It is unnerving to me that we have chosen to bankrupt the treasury and spend beyond our means, while expecting future generations to pick up the tab. In examining the WIC program, though, it is important to note that in the long run, WIC not only saves the taxpayer money, but is an investment in the future well-being of America.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to show overwhelming support for the WIC Program by voting for this important amendment.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I am pleased to add my name to the list of cosponsors of this amendment. In this time of budget crisis, we'd better have pretty good justification for increasing any Government program. We need to know the program works, and we need to know that its benefits are well-targeted. WIC passes this test with flying colors. Numerous Government studies have documented WIC's effectiveness. And the poor, nutritionally at-risk women, infants, and children who participate in WIC are among the most vulnerable members of our society.

The additional funding we are calling for isn't for adding frills to the program. It's simply to extend basic WIC benefits to more of the women, infants, and children whose income and nutritional status make them eligible for the program, but who now go unserved. And I would note that the distinguished chairman of the Budget Committee indicated earlier that the budget resolution could accommodate such an increase.

I want to commend the President for again requesting a sizable increase for WIC in his budget. I hope we will be able to do even more, and I encourage my colleagues to aid this effort by supporting this amendment.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I am pleased to support this amendment offered by my distinguished colleague, Senator DECONCINI, to encourage increased funding for the WIC Program, which provides critically important nutritional assistance to millions of low-income pregnant women and children.

The President has recommended in his budget request to Congress an increase in the WIC Program for fiscal year 1993, and I am hopeful that the Senate Appropriations Committee will be able to achieve the $3 billion funding level necessary to achieve full funding of WIC within 5 years.

Mr. President, there are few programs that are so effective as WIC in helping truly needy people in this country, by significantly reducing infant mortality, averting low-weight births, and improving prenatal care. At a time when so much attention is being focused on our Nation's health care system and the need to cut health care costs, WIC is proven to reduce medical costs not only in the short term, but in the long term, by increasing the productivity of our children.

The statistics for the WIC Program are both remarkable and heartwarming. In fact, a 1990 U.S. Department of Agriculture study demonstrated that for each dollar invested in WIC prenatal care, anywhere from $1.92 to $4.21 is saved in Medicaid costs in the first 60 days after birth. For every pregnant woman who participated in WIC, this investment translates into Medicaid cost savings of anywhere from $277 to $598.

According to a recent Congressional Budget Office report, it is estimated that participation in WIC by pregnant women on Medicaid increased average birthweight anywhere between 51 grams and 117 grams. For preterm infants, the increase was even greater: From 138 grams to 259 grams, a significant figure given that low birthweight is one of the leading causes of infant mortality. In addition, Mr. President, WIC participants are far less likely to receive inadequate prenatal care and averaged one or two more prenatal visits than non-WIC women with similar demographic characteristics.

Mr. President, according to the Pennsylvania Department of Health, the WIC Program in Pennsylvania has made significant progress, with 350 facilities serving nearly 260,000 participants, which represents 76 percent of the eligible population. However, many women and children fall through the cracks, in Pennsylvania, and in the Nation at large, where the latest CBO report indicates that less than 60 percent of the eligible population is being served through WIC.

Last year, 86 Senators signed onto a joint Senate letter to the chairman and ranking members of the Agriculture Appropriations Subcommittee, requesting them to support increased funding for WIC in fiscal year 1992. I ask that my colleagues continue to show such overwhelming support for this worthwhile and effective program, to enable all eligible pregnant women, infants and children to receive the vital nutrition and health care assistance provided by WIC.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate on the amendment? Is all time yielded back? All time has been yielded back.

So the amendment (No. 1780) was agreed to.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROTH. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, could we have order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order. Senators will kindly take their conversations from the Chamber.

The Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, we have only a few remaining amendments. We are going to work our way through these diligently, and as speedily as possible.

The distinguished Senator from Delaware has an amendment which will be accepted, but the distinguished Senator, as I understand, wishes 2 minutes to address the body on his amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. ROTH].

AMENDMENT NO. 1781

(Purpose: To express the sense of the Congress to establish a Commission on Federal Government Reform)

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows: The Senator from Delaware [Mr. ROTH] proposes an amendment numbered 1781.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the end of the resolution, add the following:

SEC. . COMMISSION ON FEDERAL GOVERNMENT REFORM.

(a) FINDINGS.—THE CONGRESS FINDS THAT—

(1) The American people face a crisis of confidence in the Federal Government, which cannot be remedied without dramatic and fundamental reform;

(2) Recent polls indicate that an all-time low of only 17 percent of the public approves of Congress, that 78 percent are dissatisfied or angry about the Federal Government, and that Americans think an average of 48 cents out of every dollar in federal taxes is wasted;

(3) While the American people are demanding more performance from their government for the taxes they pay, Congress and the Executive branch still debate the same old options of fewer services or higher taxes;

(4) The public wants governmental institutions that respond quickly to citizens' needs, with high-quality services delivered at the minimum necessary cost;

(5) The Federal Government has many talented and hardworking employees whose effectiveness is hindered by existing organizational structures and operations;

(6) Some governmental organizations have become inefficient and have structures and missions not reflecting current domestic and international priorities;

(7) Some of these organizations were developed during the industrial era, and have large, centralized bureaucracies, a preoccupation with rules and regulations, and a hierarchical chain of command;

(8) Such governmental organizations are so obsessed with regulating processes and procedures, that they have ignored the outcomes of their programs;

(9) Unlike the Federal Government, American corporations and State and local governments are making revolutionary changes by streamlining their organizations, decentralizing authority, flattening hierarchies, focusing on quality, and emphasizing responsiveness to the customer; and

(10) There is now a crucial need for a serious examination of how the Federal Government might apply such organizational and operational reforms to its own institutions.

(b) SENSE OF THE CONGRESS.—It is the sense of the Congress that:

(1) a Commission on Federal Government Reform should be established to examine the organization and operations of the Federal government. In developing recommendations to improve governmental performance while minimizing costs, the Commission should consider ways to:

(A) define program missions in terms of measurable outcomes, emphasizing quality of service, customer satisfaction, and results-oriented accountability;

(B) reform personnel systems so as to improve morale, inspire initiative, maximize productivity and effectiveness, and reward excellence;

(C) increase program responsiveness, by eliminating unnecessary paperwork and procedural requirements and increasing managerial discretion, in return for greater accountability for achieving results;

(D) consolidate and streamline departments, agencies, and programs where possible so as to reduce costs, minimize hierarchy, and focus responsibility;

(E) control the payroll costs of government while providing appropriate levels of staffing to meet program needs;

(F) promote the application of new information technologies, to improve management and reduce administrative costs; and

(G) develop mechanisms to promote greater cooperation and coordination between the legislative and executive branches, and greater attention to the long-term impacts of budgetary and policy decisions.

(2) Congress should be mandated to consider the recommendations of the National Commission.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, this amendment expresses the sense of the Congress that a national commission should be established to examine the organization and operation of the Federal Government. The primary focus of the commission should be to develop recommendations to improve governmental performance while minimizing costs to the taxpayer.

As we debate the budget resolution, this is an appropriate time to take stock. Our constituents are expressing an enormous amount of frustration with the Congress and the Government in general. The American people have probably never been more angrier with the Federal Government. The American people deserve an economy that promotes jobs, opportunity and growth. And the American people deserve a Government that provides an environment for economic competitiveness.

The No. 2 challenge facing our Nation is economic competitiveness. During the next several years leading into the 21st century, America is going to be challenged with an increasing global competition that will test our strongest, most competitive businesses. We need a Government which will provide an environment to meet this challenge. Instead, we have a Government which is virtually incapable to helping our Nation compete internationally. The American people, unfortunately, see Government as the problem, not the solution. We need to make Government more responsive to the needs of our Nation, and bring Government back to the people.

Earlier this week, I introduced S. 2531, legislation that will allow us to break the political gridlock that has stifled any real Government reform—legislation that will enable both sides of the aisle to work together to reenvision and then reinvent not only the Federal Government, but Congress as well. Clearly, a complete reexamination of the organization and operations of the executive and legislative branch is now required. The ranking member of the Budget Committee and the senior Senator from Oklahoma have introduced legislation to study the legislative branch. This sense of the Congress states that we should establish a national commission to study and make recommendations concerning the entire Federal Government.

Can anyone among us say today that the Federal Government is operating as effectively, as efficiently, as productively and responsibly as possible in meeting the complex needs of modern America? Can anyone among us say that our Government is adequately preparing our Nation—the men, women, families (the manufacturers, farmers, and businesses of America)—for a bright and a prosperous future? A future in which we, as a Nation, will continue to be first among equals? A Nation which leads by example? Can anyone say even that our taxpayers—the hard-working men and women who support the Government—are getting their money's worth? Unfortunately, the answer to the questions is a resounding "no."

Political gridlock in the Congress and the White House has reached an untenable level. In the increasing global competition that we face, the Congress, administration, and the private sector must work together to meet this challenge. We need to establish a mechanism which will allow us to rise above the political fray and do what's best for our Nation. Several years ago, the Congress faced a very similar situation concerning the decision as to which domestic military bases to close. We establish a very active, powerful commission to present Congress with a list of bases to be closed—and for the first time in more than 15 years, bases are being closed as our Nation's defense is being restructured.

Who among us could argue against a commission which would:

Define program missions in terms of measurable outcomes, emphasizing quality of service, customer satisfaction, and results-oriented accountability;

Consolidate and streamline departments, agencies, and programs, so as to reduce costs, minimize hierarchy, and focus responsibility;

Reduce the size of the Federal work force through attrition and redirect funding toward improved training and rewarding excellence; and Develop mechanisms to promote greater attention to the long-term impacts of budgetary and policy decisions.

Make no mistake, Mr. President, I am not singling out Federal employees for criticism. In truth, the Federal Government has many talented and hard-working employees, but their effectiveness is seriously handicapped by existing organizational structures and operations. The real problem is with the bureaucracy—not the so-called bureaucrats. Too many Federal institutions have become bloated and inefficient, with structures and missions not reflecting current domestic and international priorities. They are slow and unresponsive. And they cost far too much for what they accomplish.

The budget resolution we are considering includes a number of recommendations for Government efficiencies—Federal work force attrition—80 percent replacement, legislative branch 5 percent across the board reduction, Executive Office of the President—5 percent across the board reduction, the offices of the Secretary in all executive departments 5 percent across the board reduction, 2 percent reduction in travel and communications, 10 percent reduction in consulting services, and a 10-percent reduction in agency aircraft use. I strongly support all of these efforts to reduce administrative expenses of Government. But we should develop a more rational approach. This is best accomplished through a national commission—a commission powerful enough like the Base Closure Commission to rise above the political fray and special interests and do what's best for all of our country.

The public's confidence will return only when we are successful in getting governmental institutions to respond quickly and effectively, with high-quality services delivered at the minimum necessary cost. In other words, it will be when the people are satisfied that the Federal Government is squeezing maximum value out of each tax dollar. Clearly, we have a long way to go to achieve that. But this sense-of-the-Congress resolution is a resolute first step.

The legislation I introduced, S. 2531, establishes such a national commission. The commission's powers are modeled after the Base Closure Commission. Its recommendations would be sent to the President. If approved by the President, the recommendations would go into effect unless disapproved by the Congress. Those recommendations pertaining to either House of Congress would only be voted on by that body. This process will allow the Congress to rise above the political gridlock, stifle special interests, and return Government to the people.

This is a tall order, Mr. President. But it must be done. At the moment there are four conditions that make this proposal ripe: Federal Government institutions are failing to meet basic service needs; there are new sets of management principles and modern technologies that can be employed; and at the moment our Nation literally cannot afford to service the deficit; let alone continue to spend money it does not have on programs that aren't working. Last, the government must be prepared to meet the challenge of global competition during this decade and into the 21st century.

We should promise the American people that we will consider a package of major reforms of the Federal Government before the next election, 2 years from now. We can turn this frustration and crisis in confidence into an opportunity for significant improvement of Government services and efficiency.

We owe Americans and the future of America nothing less. I urge the adoption of this amendment.

I yield the floor.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, all time has been yielded back on the Roth amendment on both sides.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time having been yielded back, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. ROTH].

The amendment (No. 1781) was agreed to.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SASSER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, on the amendment that the Senate acted upon favorably a moment ago, the amendment of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. DECONCINI], dealing with the Women, Infants, and Children's Program, I ask unanimous consent that the distinguished Senator from New Jersey [Mr. LAUTENBERG] be added as a cosponsor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, we are alternating and there is an amendment to be offered here by the distinguished Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WELLSTONE]. It is my understanding that this amendment has been worked out to the satisfaction of all Senators.

I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

AMENDMENT NO. 1782

(Purpose: To recommend increased budget authority and outlay levels for certain defense industry conversion-related activities)

Mr. WELLSTONE. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WELLSTONE] proposes an amendment numbered 1782.

Mr. WELLSTONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the end of the bill, add the following:

SEC. . DEFENSE INDUSTRY CONVERSION.

It is the sense of Congress that no less than $1,000,000,000 in budget authority provided in this resolution for the defense function 050 for fiscal year 1993 should be made available for defense industry conversion-related activities such as those within the following programs:

(1) DEFENSE INDUSTRY WORKERS, JTPA-EDWAA.

(2) COMMUNITIES.—

(A) Economic Development Administration.

(B) Community Development Block Grants.

(C) Small Business Administration.

(D) Impact aid grants to school districts.

(3) TECHNOLOGY.—

(A) NSF education grants to engineers.

(B) DOE technology transfer.

(C) National Institutes of Standards and Technology.

(D) Intelligent vehicle highway system 1.

Mr. WELLSTONE. Mr. President, let me first of all, in just a minute or 2, refer to a chart that the distinguished Senator BYRD from West Virginia, President pro tempore, has been kind enough to let me use. These are projections about manpower reductions—I could say womanpower—reductions, as well.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, the Senate is not in order, and the Senator from Minnesota deserves to be heard. This is an important amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. WELLSTONE. I thank the Senator from Tennessee. I think what I will do is I will wait until all conversation ceases.

Mr. President, I have waited 3 days to propose this amendment. I only propose the amendment because I think it is important, like everybody else in here, and I would like to have the respect.

Thank you very much.

Mr. President, let me refer to this chart that Senator BYRD was kind enough to let me use. Projections between the years 1993 and 1997—this is reductions—for military personnel, 237,000; DOD civilian personnel 54,000; and defense industry workers, 500,000 to 1 million.

And I thank the Senator from Georgia, Senator NUNN, for his cooperation. He certainly is somebody that I want to work with. What this amendment does is it is a sense-of-the-Congress that no less than $1 billion in budget authority within the Department of Defense be dedicated to conversion activities.

Now, there are many different kinds of programs that we could talk about. But I think the main point—and this is a very small amount of money; it is only a sense-of-the-Congress resolution, and it is only a matter of our giving some direction to steps that I know all of us are committed to—is many people are going to lose their jobs, and they ought to have the opportunity to be able to make the transition. And so we talk about such programs as JTPA the Economic Development Administration, the Small Business Administration, technology transfers.

And the whole impact of this amendment, Mr. President, is that we certainly have to get serious as a nation about conversion. We have to make a commitment to the many men and women who have done so much within our defense industry. We cannot just throw people out in the cold. We have to do the planning.

I am very confident, with the leadership of Senator PRYOR and the whole commission that he is chairing, that we will make those steps.

Mr. President, let me just conclude by saying this is an amendment that takes us, I think, in the right direction. It is just a signal for the Congress. I look forward to the work of Senator PRYOR, Senator NUNN, and many others in here, to make sure that we go through with the authorization and the appropriation.

Mr. President, I yield back all my time, if the other side wishes.

Mr. DOMENICI. We have no objection, and we yield back any time we have in opposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time having been yielded back, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WELLSTONE].

The amendment (No. 1782) was agreed to.

Mr. WELLSTONE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOMENICI. I move to lay that motion on the table. The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. WELLSTONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter from the National Commission on Economic Conversion and Disarmament, which was so helpful in disseminating information to every Senator and helping build support for this amendment.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL COMMISSION FOR ECONOMIC CONVERSION & DISARMAMENT,
Washington, DC, April 9, 1992.

DEAR SENATOR: We strongly urge you to support Senator Wellstone's amendment to the Senate Budget Resolution. The amendment recommends that $1.3 billion in budget authority and over $600 million in outlays be used to fund a variety of programs related to minimizing the economic dislocation associated with cutting the defense budget. It is critical that Congress enact a comprehensive conversion policy this year, as the Bush-Cheney budget plan for FY 1992-1997 calls for discharging almost 350,000 active-duty troops and laying off nearly 150,000 civilian DoD personnel. The plan would also eliminate over 800,000 defense industry jobs and close scores of bases. The impact of these cuts will be felt dramatically in 1992 and 1993. If Congress further cuts the Pentagon budget, a step we support, the need for comprehensive conversion policies becomes greater.

The amendment recommends that $500 million in budget authority and $30 million in outlays be targeted to defense industry worker retraining and community adjustment and community block grants. Another provision that would help communities is the $415 million in budget authority and $340 million in outlays called for by the amendment for Impact Aid Grants. Together these provisions, if actually enacted, would provide much needed assistance for laid-off workers seeking to acquire skills necessary to find new work, and for communities hard hit by major defense contract reductions or base closures. The $200 million that Congress authorized and appropriated for worker retraining and community adjustment as part of the 1991 Defense Authorization Act is insufficient to deal with the current dislocation. In fact, the EDA only received its share of these funds in February 1992, primarily because the White House opposed the entire program.

Another important provision of the amendment that would encourage creation of new businesses and jobs is the call for additional funding for the Small Business Administration. This would help make funds available to subcontractors, who are often the first to be affected by DoD project cutbacks. The health of these firms is often crucial to the economic well-being of surrounding communities.

The Wellstone amendment also recommends that $300 million in budget authority and over $180 million in outlays be used to encourage development and dissemination of technologies essential for the health of our economy and infrastructure.

Finally, and perhaps most importantly, the Wellstone amendment calls for these programs to be funded, but not administered by the Defense Department. DoD should not be the final recipient of these funds because it is not competent to administer programs for minimizing economic dislocation. DoD has every reason not to spend the money for this purpose, as any funds that they do not obligate for adjustment reverts to their general budget. The Pentagon's aforementioned delays in transferring funds in the past demonstrate its opposition to conversion and adjustment. At the very least, a conversion program must involve the federal agencies competent to carry out this mission. Assigning the DoD responsibility for the program could set a dangerous precedent and lead to a difficult transition and further resistance to cuts.

For over 45 years, we have pursued an industrial policy designed to make this nation militarily second to none. Today, we need industrial policies geared to restoring our nation's economy. Economic conversion policies should be at the forefront of efforts to rebuild the U.S. economy after the Cold War. The Wellstone amendment recognizes these realities and deserves your support.

Sincerely yours,

GREGORY A. BISCHAK, Ph.D.,
Executive Director.

Mr. SEYMOUR addressed the Chair.

Mr. DOMENICI. How much time does the Senator desire?

Mr. SEYMOUR. Two minutes.

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from California.

AMENDMENT NO. 1783

(Purpose: To express the sense of the Congress relating to the use of defense-relating savings in the Federal budget to retrain and reemploy individuals who are involuntarily separated from the Armed Forces or become unemployed as a result of reductions in defense spending)

Mr. SEYMOUR. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from California [Mr. SEYMOUR] proposes an amendment numbered 1783.

Mr. SEYMOUR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the end of the resolution add the following new section:

SEC. 11. SENSE OF CONGRESS RELATING TO THE USE OF DEFENSE-RELATED SAVINGS IN THE FEDERAL BUDGET FOR RETRAINING AND REEMPLOYMENT OF CERTAIN INDIVIDUALS.

(a) FINDINGS.—Congress finds the following:

(1) In relation to the total amount of anticipated Federal spending in fiscal year 1993 and to the anticipated gross national product of the United States in that fiscal year, the percentage of the fiscal year 1993 budget submitted to Congress by the President that is committed to defense spending is the smallest percentage committed to that purpose since before the entry of the United States into World War II.

(2) In each fiscal year from fiscal year 1993 to fiscal year 1997, real growth in programmed Federal spending for national defense purposes will decline at a rate of four percent per year.

(3) During the ten-year period beginning in 1987 and ending in 1997, approximately 708,000 active duty members of the Armed Forces and civilian employees of the Department of Defense will be involuntarily separated from active duty or become unemployed as a result of reductions in Federal defense spending.

(4) The Office of Technology Assessment estimates that, during the period beginning in 1991 and ending in 1995, between 530,000 and 620,000 employees of private, defense-related industries in the United States will become unemployed as a result of reductions in such spending.

(5) The retraining and re-employment of such members, civilian employees, and employees of private industry is critical to the capability of the private aerospace and defense industries of the United States to develop, commercialize, and market non-defense products and technologies.

(6) The capability of such industries to develop, commercialize, and market such non-defense products and technologies will play a critical role in ensuring the long-term economic prosperity of such industries and the United States.

(b) SENSE OF CONGRESS.—It is the sense of Congress that a meaningful percentage of the savings in Federal defense spending in fiscal years 1993 through 1997 be made available for the establishment of programs to retrain and re-employ active duty members of the Armed Forces, civilian employees of the Department of Defense, and employees of private, defense-related industries who are involuntarily separated from such duty or become unemployed as a result of reductions in Federal spending for national defense.

Mr. SEYMOUR. Mr. President, I rise to offer an amendment to the pending Federal budget resolution expressing the sense of the Congress that a meaningful percentage of the savings achieved in U.S. defense spending from fiscal years 1993 through 1997 be made available to retrain and reemploy both active duty members of the Armed Forces and private sector employees who face involuntary separation or unemployment as a result of the programmed reductions in defense spending that will inevitably occur over this period of time.

The short-term economic dislocations caused by the dramatic reductions in defense spending during this decade require a constructive and coherent response from the Federal Government. While we cannot engineer a new industrial policy controlled exclusively by Washington, Congress should identify an appropriate amount of military cost savings to assist both the citizens in uniform and those in the defense industry who face the loss of their jobs because of the budget decisions imposed from Washington.

During the next 5 fiscal years, the defense budget will go down by at least 5 percent per year. The fiscal year 1993 Department of Defense submission by the President alone represents the smallest percentage of total Federal expenditures since the United States entered World War II. These numbers translate into more than 100 separate weapons program terminations beyond the deep cuts made in personnel, training, and operations and maintenance accounts.

In the meantime, well over 1 million jobs will be eliminated because no one foresees the national security requirement to rebuild our forces and the industrial base that supports them to the levels at which they existed before the demise of the Soviet Union.

I agree with many of my colleagues that private sector-driven changes in management, production, and marketing techniques will ultimately determine the economic future of most defense industries. But a prudent investment of military budget savings into effective retraining programs will assist in the preservation of a highly skilled and experienced work force of former active duty and manufacturing personnel.

And let no one question the value of the investment proposed by this resolution. Last year, the President's National Critical Technologies Panel maintained that 75 percent of the technologies originally developed within the Nation's defense and aerospace sector remained vital to the future economic competitiveness of the United States.

Yet this conclusion, Mr. President, should come as no surprise.

Even during these difficult times of market contraction, the aerospace industry accounts for 10 percent of all American sales to overseas customers—making it the Nation's No. 1 exporter.

The policy of this resolution, therefore, does not embrace a short-term approach to subsidize displaced colonels or aircraft engineers. Rather, it urges an investment in the most promising resources of our economic future—the leaders, managers, technology producers, and exporters who during the 1980's made the most effective contribution to the rebuilding of America's national security posture since the birth of the Soviet Union in 1917.

Mr. President, very briefly this is an amendment that has been agreed to by both sides.

I know time is drawing very short now. We have been working long hours on the budget resolution. This is yet another approach to the defense conversion, conversion of our defense industries, particularly in California, where defense industries are so important.

This is a broader proposal, provides more flexibility, and goes over a longer period of time, I believe, than the previous amendment.

I urge its adoption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate?

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, the Seymour amendment is acceptable to us.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Has all time been yielded back?

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield any time I might have.

Mr. SASSER. I yield back all time in opposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time having been yielded back, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. SEYMOUR].

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, may I inquire of my friend from New York: He had two pending amendments; may I ask which amendment he is offering?

Mr. D'AMATO. This is the amendment dealing with welfare reform, welfare shopping.

Mr. SASSER. I thank the Senator. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, that is exactly what this amendment is. It is an amendment to close a gaping loophole in the current welfare system that permits, and indeed encourages, welfare shopping.

For many years, we have had situations where some social service agencies, some county administrators in various counties in various States, will actually direct people to other States, to States that pay higher benefits. That is absolutely absurd. It is wrong. It is wrong to encourage people to move for higher benefits and out of one's community to avoid the social responsibility that belongs there. I believe that is a problem we can and should deal with, and this amendment does it.

Simply put, my amendment states that if you come into a community and you go on to welfare within that year, you will receive the benefits at the lower amount from the State that you came from. We hope it will stop that abhorrent policy that some have engaged in officially and unofficially, to steer people to higher benefit States.

Let me suggest there are many different types of welfare services that families can receive in social services assistance. In New Jersey, a family of three can receive as much as $9,000 a year, or $750 a month, in welfare payments. If they move to New York, that same family can receive as much as $14,000 a year simply by crossing the river. Indeed, we have had situations where that has taken place.

We have one county in New York, the county of Niagara, a small county, that has had to deal, literally with hundreds and hundreds of people who have come across the border simply for the purposes of obtaining higher benefits.

Let me say, this has an economic impact that brings about a savings to the budget over the next 5 years of some $150 million, according to preliminary scoring by CBO. We are talking about a savings to the taxpayers of this Nation. We are attempting to deal with a situation that will keep us from what I consider to be a totally abhorrent policy, that is shifting the welfare burden from one State to another and inducing people to leave their State because they can get higher benefits. I am not suggesting this is a panacea. It will not be a cure-all of the ills of social services and the problems attendant thereto. But it is a start.

I offer this amendment on behalf of myself, Senators KASTEN, NICKLES, and SEYMOUR.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate?

The Senator from New York [Mr. MOYNIHAN] is recognized.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, it is a rare occasion when I find myself at odds with my colleague and friend from New York, Mr. D'AMATO. As chairman of the Subcommittee on Social Security, which has jurisdiction in this matter, needless to say, the Aid to Families with Dependent Children, AFDC, as it is better known—welfare, as it is inherently known—we have a long experience with this subject, and I think a very clear one with respect to the constitutional rights of Americans involved here. I will come to that in just a moment.

However, may I say that 30 years of experience with this subject have led most observers to agree that there is little, if any, movement by individuals, families, from one State to another in search of more generous welfare benefits. People move around in our country all the time. They always have. And they usually move from one place to another in expectation that they will improve their circumstances, in one sense, in one way or another. Often they do not. That is life.

It is the case, however, that the movements are very rarely, if ever, in any significant sense associated with the desire to go into a new State and become dependent on public welfare in that State. As a matter of fact, just within the last 3 weeks we have had hearings in the Finance Committee, Subcommittee on Social Security and Family Policy, hearing from a welfare commissioner from the State of Oregon about the legislation we adopted so nearly unanimously in 1988, the Family Support Act. He described families that had moved from California to Oregon, north; from the State of Washington, south, to be in Oregon where the work training programs were more visibly in place, more effective, were having better results, even though the AFDC benefit in Oregon is lower than in its neighboring California and Washington.

We have testimony before our committee that indeed people move in search of better circumstances, and that is in the context of the AFDC Program, but they move looking for work opportunities. That has been our history, internal migration, from the first time a family crossed the Appalachians looking for land on the other side; people coming from the South to the North where agriculture was declining in the one region to where industry was expanding in the other.

It is simply not the case that there is any significant—I am not even aware of any organized inquiry that has ever demonstrated a movement in search of higher welfare benefits, particularly in a time when, for the last 25 years, welfare benefits have been declining.

But in any event, this has nothing, or ought to have nothing, to do with our judgment. Our judgment here turns on the constitutionality. Repeatedly, the Supreme Court of the United States has said that State enactments to inhibit eligibility under Federal law of persons who have moved into one State from another violate the constitutional right to travel. These findings go back a long way.

In Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618, 1969, the U.S. Supreme Court found that a State residency requirement designed to discourage welfare families from coming into the State is unconstitutional. You cannot do that to American citizens. The Supreme Court has so held. States even, pursuing this delusion that somehow or other welfare dependency at a given level in a given State reflects the level of benefits—it does not. Some of the highest rates of welfare dependency are in States with some of the lowest levels of AFDC treatment. I just remark there are States where, with the present welfare legislation beginning to take hold, the Family Support Act—When we adopted it in 1988, I said on this floor it will not change our affairs overnight.

We will get a feeling for this matter in perhaps the year 2000. We have now been for some time in the most protracted recession of a postwar period, or nearly thereto, and we have seen welfare cases go up, just as we have seen unemployment cases go up. They are clearly in response to a shortage of job opportunities.

Very well, but let us be clear, there are twice as many AFDC cases extant today as there are persons receiving unemployment benefits. And let it be understood, if I can, we are not talking here about a marginal group of people, people you do not know, people who do not live near you. We can show, Mr. President, that almost one American child in three will be on welfare before they reach age 18. We can show that of the children born in the years 1967, 1968, and 1969, almost three-quarters of minority children were on welfare before they reached age 18. We are talking about one American child in three, and we are talking about depriving them of a constitutional right which is not a theoretical one, but rather one that has been upheld by the Supreme Court in emphatic decisions.

I stated that in Shapiro versus Thompson in 1969 the Court found a State residency requirement unconstitutional. Then, Mr. President, in 1982, 10 years ago, in Zobel v. Williams, that is 457 U.S. 55, 60 and Note 6, as if the Court had to spell it out a second time, a yet more detailed finding. I do not want to characterize Justices, but I could say in a near exasperated finding, the Court said did we not tell you this strips constitutional rights from Americans? And so it said that the constitutional right to travel "protects new residents of a State from being disadvantaged because of their recent migration or from otherwise being treated differently from longer term residents."

The Court said the right to travel is a constitutional right. It adheres in citizenship and to restrict it in any way is unconstitutional.

Accordingly, Mr. President, in order that we might avoid the question of so much of the emotions that surround this subject and have done with increasing anger and frustration, this, Mr. President, is the first Presidential election campaign in our history in which the issue of welfare dependency has been at the top of the Presidential campaign debate. President Bush raised it in the State of the Union Message. He has repeated it. Some statements have been very seriously questioned by commentators. The President returns to this issue on his weekly Saturday broadcast tomorrow, and I will respond on behalf of the Senate majority leader who asked me very generously to do that, and I will.

Mr. President, in these circumstances, and asking the Senate to understand where our first responsibility lies, which is with the Constitution that created us and which we are sworn to uphold and protect against all enemies foreign or domestic, including State legislatures which might enact such measures—and I remind Senators, we come in here on January 3, we march down this aisle, we go right over to that corner, we put our hands on a Bible if we so choose, and swear to uphold and protect the Constitution of the United States against all enemies foreign and domestic—that being the case, Mr. President, the Supreme Court, having twice declared any such State measures to be unconstitutional, I propose to make a point of order that the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York impinges upon the right of citizens to travel freely from State to State and under the Constitution this is not in order.

I will make that point of order, a constitutional point of order, when all time has been yielded back.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, if I might, I am going to take several minutes. Several of my colleagues would like to speak to this amendment. Let me first indicate the senior Senator, my good friend from New York, Senator MOYNIHAN, is absolutely correct. There have been very few times we find ourselves certainly in opposition and this comes from our own beliefs and convictions and I respect him and I respect his scholarship and his studies and his advocacy of the rights of families which have done so much for so many over the years.

As it relates to the particular constitutional cases that have been cited by my learned colleague, they really center around the total denial of benefits that a State attempted to bring about by bringing in residency requirements. There is a very real distinction between limiting and cutting benefits for those moving from a State, and limiting them. And particularly where people who are on social services in another State move in for higher benefits, clearly, they are bringing a clear prima facie case that a person is coming simply to get higher benefits.

A State, we argue, would have a right and we do have the right to say that this is not in the national policy, this is not a goal that should be preserved. This is not a right, but rather that States have a right to say that we will give you that help that you are entitled to but at the level that you were receiving so that not one State that may have higher benefits becomes the magnet. This is unacceptable, and that is why we are here.

We are here as a Congress to determine what kind of conduct is acceptable. Social services, yes, should never be totally denied to anyone, but what about level of social service? Does the State have a right to say, look, we have established a level for those who live here, but we do not want to have a situation where people deliberately come to our State to receive higher benefits. That becomes injurious to our State, to our people, and to our taxpayers and, by the way, is self-defeating and hurts the taxpayer.

To the extent the Congressional Budget Office indicated that between March 1989 and March 1990, out of 100,000 welfare recipients who, during that period of time, crossed borders, 65,000 did so in pursuit of higher benefits. We are talking about stopping what I consider to be an evil practice because we have had situations where people have said to the welfare case officer, I was told to come right up here and to get on to the welfare role and I could do that. We have cases that go back years where people would purchase bus tickets to come into New York and to other States so that they could receive higher benefits.

Now, if it is unconstitutional to treat it in this manner—and I do not believe so—I do not think the courts have ever ruled on this situation. Maybe it is about time that they revisit this situation since the case goes back 20-plus years. But, again, I think there is a distinction that can be made and should be made and I do not think it is correct.

I have some more facts to give as to how it impacts local counties and one county in New York in particular, Niagara County which is one of our border counties.

I am going to yield the floor to my good friend from California for a few minutes.

Mr. DOMENICI. Before the Senator does that, I wonder if I might ask the Senator a question.

Mr. D'AMATO. Certainly.

Mr. DOMENICI. On the Senator's time. The Senator has time on the amendment.

Mr. D'AMATO. Certainly.

Mr. DOMENICI. I have the amendment before me. I heard the distinguished Senator say that this amendment was unconstitutional. This amendment is all numbers, dollars. How can $30 million be unconstitutional? The Senator has just reduced expenditures by $30 million from what I can tell.

Mr. D'AMATO. That is correct. It is anticipated by CBO, if we were first to take this budget action, then to be followed by legislation. And so it would be the underlying legislation which would be a constitutional matter. I do not know if a constitutional point even lies here. It would seem to me that when the actual legislation were put to the test, that is where a point of order might lie but not one as it relates to the relevance of shifting numbers by way of a budget action, a budget act; that that would not be a proper place for a point of order to lie. I hope that the Chair would so rule.

Mr. DOMENICI. I might say because it is going to take a lot of time for a vote on constitutionality, that in this case even the Chair review this amendment. It is inconceivable that this amendment is unconstitutional. There is no language in it. The only language is on page 3. That could not be unconstitutional. Line 3 would not be unconstitutional; it will reduce the amount by $30 million. So how could that be unconstitutional?

I do not know why we would want to have a vote. I wish the Senator from New York would review the amendment. From what I understand the Senator has reduced outlays in a function of the budget that the Senator assumes will lend itself to a law change but there is no law change here.

Mr. D'AMATO. That is correct. We would still have to enact that legislation. I would move to do that. And we received these figures from CBO.

Mr. DOMENICI. And the constitutionality, if there be an attack, would certainly be some other time on legislation, it seems to me.

Mr. D'AMATO. That is correct.

Mr. DOMENICI. I hope we do not have to have a vote on that. I urge that the senior Senator from New York take a look at that.

I yield the floor. I thank the Senator from New York.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. D'AMATO. I yield the Senator from California such time as he may require.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. the Senator from California [Mr. SEYMOUR.]

Mr. SEYMOUR. I thank the Chair. I thank my distinguished colleague from New York, Senator D'AMATO, and applaud him for his courage, his foresight, and his leadership in beginning to seek some change and reform in a welfare system that has gone out of control.

I cannot speak for the State of New York or many other States, but, Mr. President, I think I can speak for what is happening in my State, the largest State in the Union, the State of California. Mr. President, in 1964, 1 in every 18 children under the age of 18 in my State received AFDC, welfare. By 1989, Mr. President, the number of AFDC-dependent children had increased to 1 in 6. That is 1 in 18 to 1 in 6. California's AFDC grants, the amount that is paid, are currently the second highest in the continental United States at an average of $663 a month for a family of three.

Now, how does that compare? Mr. President, the AFDC payment corollary in the State of Texas is not $663 a month but $184, and in Florida it is $294, not $663, and in the State of Pennsylvania it is $403, not $663, a difference of $260 per month. In fact, the average AFDC payment in the Nation's 10 most populous States is $382; California $663.

Now, the senior Senator from New York indicated that he was not aware of welfare families moving from one State to another. I do not have any evidence that they are all flocking to California, but, Mr. President, I can share with you that 7 percent, 7 percent of California's present welfare recipients did not live in the State 1 year ago.

As a matter of fact, between 1978 and 1988, in that decade, welfare grants in California rose nearly twice as fast—that is 9.4 percent—as the real family income of Californians who are paying the taxes that rose at 5.1 percent.

California is a big State. In fact, California represents 12 percent of the population of our Nation, but California has 26 percent, 26 percent of all of the costs of welfare paid in this country. So you see, Mr. President, the statistics that we face in California are grim, and it is bankrupting our State. The welfare case load in our State is projected to grow by 47 percent from 1988-89 to 1992-93. That is 4 years, a 47-percent increase, almost 12 percent per year, and nearly four times as fast as the rate of our population growth.

The benefits are such on welfare in California that a family of three would have to earn $1,400 a month to make more than they would if they remained on welfare. How does that compare to the minimum wage? The minimum wage would make $737 a month if they working full time. And so what we have in California is a system that benefits people to not work.

So clearly this system cries out for reform. Let me give you the bottom line, Mr. President. There are so many people in society who pay taxes, and then there are so many people in society who need taxes in the form of a subsidy, one or the other.

In my State, a critical change is taking place. Today we have six taxpayers for every five tax takers, and by 1995, as a matter of fact, they will be equal. What is more fearful is that by the year 2000, Mr. President, we are going to have four taxpayers for every five tax takers. We simply cannot afford that burden anymore. We are driving our taxpayers out of the State. They just cannot afford to carry the load.

Mr. President, I stand in strong support of Senator D'AMATO's effort and in support of the amendment.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I would like to say to my friend from California that on March 30, the director of the Oregon Department of Human Services, Mr. Kevin Concannon testified before our subcommittee on Social Security—we are tampering with Social Security here among other things—that what the jobs program in Oregon has created is such an attractive working operation now under the Family Support Act that people, indeed, move from California to Oregon even though benefits in Oregon are lower.

I am not disputing the proportion of welfare recipients who will not behave that way, but neither do I want to see it denied to those who are really trying to get out of the situation they are in.

I just had a message from the commissioner of social welfare in the State of New York, recently professor at the Kennedy School of Government, and one of the authorities in the Nation on this matter.

I quote the commissioner.

There is no evidence that people move from one State to another for the purpose of getting welfare, and in particular no evidence that people move into the State of New York for that purpose.

What one appeals to are the facts but the facts will never be accepted. People will think what they wish to think.

So when all time is yielded back, I will appeal to the Constitution, that I ask Senators to remember their oaths. Remember that the Supreme Court has twice held on legislation which this measure anticipates, absent which it would have no effect. This legislation could only be meaningful if the Congress enacted an unconstitutional measure or if the States did.

The underlying purpose, as avowed by the ranking member of the Budget Committee, is to see the enactment of legislation which will clearly be held unconstitutional. We do not take an oath to balance the budget, and we do not take an oath to bring about universal peace, but we do take an oath to protect and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign or domestic, be they State legislatures or whatever.

Mr. D'AMATO addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBB). The Senator from New York, Senator D'AMATO.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I want to do two things: First, I am going to refer to one of our counties, Niagara County, a county of about 220,000 people, in which, in 1990, a record number of new residents, 378, moved to and joined the social service rolls.

The following year 1991, up until October 1991, a higher record number, 491 residents, projected out to 600, again came into the county and joined the welfare rolls.

I would suggest that county and other counties cannot absorb that kind of situation where people are coming in, obviously, to get higher welfare benefits.

Second, in closing, let me say that my very learned friend described well a potential problem, and I understand that. This Senator is trying to help frame a partial solution to this problem. I am not talking about creating some constitutional disincentive to travel, but what I am doing is trying to remove incentives to welfare shopping, to game the system—we should stop that—and instead help foster a system that is fair, that will work, and that taxpayers who are already unhappy about the unreasonable burdens being placed on them will be more willing to support.

So this Senator is trying to ensure, not to deny, rights.

I believe this will form, hopefully, a consensus so that we can pass legislation later that will accomplish this. I wish to point out that the Senate has previously voted on and passed this legislation. I will offer this bill again.

Indeed, if there is a constitutional question, I believe that the courts will resolve it in time, given the distinction which is not a cutoff of benefits, but rather saying that we will not encourage people to come and welfare shop. Benefits, yes. But we are not going to contribute to a system that fosters an inequity for those States who are meeting their social responsibility. That is the goal of this Senator.

I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California, Senator SEYMOUR.

Mr. SEYMOUR. Thank you, Mr. President. I will be very brief.

I just wanted to comment to the Senator from New York relative to what he heard, I believe, from the State of Oregon in Social Security recipients leaving California for Oregon. That is a phenomena that is taking place, but I do not believe that to be welfare recipients. I believe that to be the folks who have retired. They built up equity in their home, and they sold their home for a rather substantial price. They looked to Oregon, to a little lower cost of living.

So they go up and pay cash for their home in Oregon and live happily ever after. But it is not welfare recipients. The welfare recipients are coming the other way.

I yield my time.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, a gentleman from the Oregon Department of Human Services was before our committee speaking for the State. He was speaking for the national association. He said that they have some good programs, such as the Family Support Act, that is getting underway. The word is going around that they can get you into shape to get a job, and people leave high-benefit States—Washington to the north, and California to the south—to come in for the job training.

I am not trying to ascribe anybody as morally superior, or particularly virtuous. They are making a wise economic decision. But the economic decision that motivates them is to get job training and education, and get out of welfare.

Is everyone on welfare of that disposition? Certainly not. But we have some testimony about people who are doing that.

So, Mr. President, has time been yielded back on the Republican side?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time has not been yielded back at this point.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. If time is yielded back by my colleague, I will do the same.

Mr. D'AMATO. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time is yielded back by the Senator from New York.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I make a point of order that the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York proposes to impinge upon the rights of citizens to travel freely from State to State. Under the Constitution, this is not in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the precedents available to the Chair, the Chair has no authority to rule on a constitutional question and must submit such questions to the full Senate.

Is the point of order well taken?

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I know we are running out of time. I do not want to deny other Senators who have the few remaining amendments an opportunity to debate their proposals. I want to make sure that the Senators that are interested in what we are voting on—

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, a constitutional point of order has been made. No debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is debatable. The Chair just checked with the Parliamentarian.

Mr. DOMENICI. I offer time off the resolution.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I apologize.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The floor is under the control of the Senator from New Mexico, Senator DOMENICI.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask every Senator that walks in if they are going to vote on this, if they would just go up to the desk and look at the amendment. They cannot be unconstitutional. There is nothing in it that even directs anyone, orders anyone, says they can do something.

It has dollar numbers, and page numbers, and three other words "reduce the amount." That is all that is in this.

I have nothing further to say. I hope that we do not declare it an unconstitutional amount. That would be in itself a tragedy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate on the point of order raised by the Senator from New York, Senator MOYNIHAN.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. DOMENICI. Sure.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I would seek the advice of my friend, the senior Senator from New York, to tell me in what way this is unconstitutional. I have examined it. As the Senator from New Mexico said there are 27 lines that say reduce a certain amount by $30 million.

This legislation is a reduction of $30 million out of a whole series of line items, and that cannot be unconstitutional. I would be pleased to listen to my friend from New York, if he would respond. Why is this unconstitutional when it simply reduces a money figure?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I answer in the words that the distinguished Senator from New Mexico stated earlier: These budget outlay reductions could only take place in consequence and in the aftermath of our enacting legislation, which, in the view of this Senator—and we will soon find out from the body—would be held unconstitutional by the Supreme Court, exactly as it has been twice in as recently as 1982; the court held that such legislation impinges the right of Americans to travel.

We are not talking about welfare here. We are talking about the rights of Americans. When we start diminishing the rights of Americans in any way, in my view, we fail in our oath. And the Supreme Court could not have put it more clearly on record in Shapiro versus Thompson and Zobel versus Williams, that the right to travel is an American's right; it adheres to citizenship. That, sir, is my answer. It may be held inadequate or insufficient from the body.

Mr. STEVENS. I thank the Senator for that response. I respectfully say that we are not dealing with the rights of anybody here. We are dealing with the amount of money we might spend under a particular function, and that is based upon a series of assumptions made by the people who offer the amendments. Those assumptions are not binding upon the body. They certainly could not be litigated in any court that would yield to a finding of unconstitutionality or a ruling of unconstitutionality. I hope that my friend from New York would permit us to voice vote this matter, because I think he made his point in raising his objection, but I cannot see how this can be a valid point of order.

Will my friend from New York agree to a voice vote in this matter?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Sir, the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate?

The question occurs on the point of order raised by the senior Senator from New York. Is the point of order well taken?

The yeas and nays are ordered.

The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. FORD. I announce that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRADLEY], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIXON], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. FOWLER], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. KERREY], and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WIRTH] are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WALLOP] would vote "nay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber desiring to vote?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas are 45, the nays are 45, the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote.

Mr. DOMENICI. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I support the point of order raised against the D'Amato amendment.

In the strictest sense, the amendment offered by the Senator from New York was constitutional; it merely cut $30 million from the income security function in the budget resolution. However, the funding cut had a clearly unconstitutional premise—that States could pay new residents lower welfare benefits than residents who had lived in the State at least 1 year.

In 1969, the Supreme Court ruled in Shapiro versus Thompson that a 1-year waiting period before new State residents became eligible for welfare benefits violated the personal right of interstate travel under the Constitution. The Court further ruled that Congress could not alter this fact either through the authorization process or through direct congressional enactment for the District of Columbia.

So, Mr. President, although the amendment to the budget resolution itself was constitutional, I voted for the point of order because the premise underlying the amendment was unconstitutional.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question occurs on the amendment No. 1784.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There appears to be a sufficient second.

So the amendment (No. 1784) was rejected.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LEVIN. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, the next amendment to be considered will be a Grassley amendment, and I ask unanimous consent that there be 20 minutes on the amendment equally divided; that in the event a point of order is made, there be no further discussion on the motion to waive.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Iowa.

AMENDMENT NO. 1785

(Purpose: To express the sense of the Senate regarding the use of defense related cuts made in both defense and domestic programs)

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I yield myself such time as I might consume, and I send the amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the amendment.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRASSLEY] proposes an amendment numbered 1785.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the appropriate place, insert the following:

SEC. . SENSE OF THE SENATE REGARDING THE USE OF DEFENSE RELATED CUTS MADE IN BOTH DEFENSE AND DOMESTIC PROGRAMS.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Senate finds that—

(1) fairness and propriety dictate that the "Fourth Arm of Defense", better known as the U.S.-flag Merchant Marine, share the burden of defense cuts in this post-cold war era;

(2) the justification for maritime programs and policies such as the Jones Act, cargo preference, and Operating Differential Subsidies has been to maintain a U.S.-flag fleet to supply vessels and manning for sealift needs during overseas military conflicts;

(3) these programs support approximately 9,000 to 10,000 seafaring billets or jobs, with cargo preference supporting approximately 2,000 billets, Operating Differential Subsidies supporting approximately 2,300 billets, and the Jones Act supporting the remaining 5,000 billets.

(4) the U.S. International Trade Commission study concluded that the Jones Act costs American consumers and businesses more than $10 billion per year, and destroys 2,000 jobs in mining, forestry, agriculture and other industries. This translates into a cost of $2 million per seafaring billet.

(5) the Office of Management and Budget reports that it estimates the cost of cargo preference for fiscal year 1993 to run over $500 million. This translates into a cost to the taxpayer of $250,000 per seafaring billet.

(6) the Office of Management and Budget reports that it estimates Operating Differential Subsidies for fiscal year 1993 to cost $225 million. This translates into a cost to the taxpayer of about $100,000 per seafaring billet to subsidize the difference of wages and benefits between U.S.-flag seafarers and their world competitors.

(7) the Department of Defense reports the average cost of salary and benefits for the military's 1.9 million enlisted and officers from E-1 to O-6 captain rank averages $32,125 per year, with captains of navy vessels costing $101,069. The cost of reservists would average one-sixth of these costs.

(8) the Maritime Administration reports the cost of salary and benefits for a captain of a commercial merchant marine class A-3 vessel costs $312,000 per year.

(9) the cost of one commercial merchant marine captain could pay for the cost of three active duty or eighteen reservist captains who face unemployment because of defense reductions in force.

(10) the effort to eliminate unwise defense spending must reach all areas, including the "Fourth Arm of Defense" meaning the U.S. commercial merchant marine.

(1) savings from merchant marine programs can and should be used to invest in programs critical to the welfare and education of our children, as well as to improve our military sealift needs.

(12) these savings can be achieved and directed this fiscal year to children programs without eliminating the budget firewalls.

(b) SENSE OF THE SENATE.—It is the sense of the Senate, that cargo preference and operating differential subsidies for our merchant marine be eliminated by Congress and that the $416 million domestic savings per year be distributed among children welfare and education programs including: Chapter I, Head Start, Special Education, Impact Aid, Immunizations, Maternal and Child Health, Child Care Block Grant, Child Abuse Prevention, and WIC. Furthermore, the $310 million defense savings from eliminating cargo preference should be dedicated toward establishing a merchant marine reserve paid at the same rate as regular military reservists, and that any remaining defense savings be used to minimize the number of active duty and reserve military personnel from being released into the unemployment lines. If additional savings are available, they should be devoted to deficit reduction.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, this is a cargo preference amendment, so everybody knows what we are dealing with. We are talking about using the money for other domestic programs.

Last night, we voted on a proposal that if the budget firewalls are ever eliminated, we could cut defense by several billions of dollars and spend it on very important programs such as those involving the welfare and education of children.

I share my colleagues' concern about the need to cut defense in the post-cold-war era and direct it to deficit reduction, as we voted to do yesterday with an amendment offered by Senator EXON, as well as to devote some of the peace dividend to programs for welfare and the education of our children.

But we are losing a real opportunity if we think we have to worry about the firewalls being down to accomplish that. The amendment yesterday dealt with that point. We do not need to break down the firewalls to go after defense waste and still have a peace dividend worthy of use somewhere else. We can increase children's education programs, child welfare programs, by simply requiring the fourth arm of the defense—and that happens to be the U.S. merchant marines—to also share in defense cuts.

OMB has found $411 million used for cargo preference and for operating differential subsidies under the domestic category which can be diverted immediately to children's programs without eliminating firewalls.

This leaves $310 million in cargo preference under the defense category to improve in a very cost-effective way, our sealift mission and, just as important, to save some of the jobs of our active-duty and reserve men and women who face the unemployment line.

This could save jobs for reservists and national guards from Iowa or any other State, and of course, in my State, we have 20,000 men and women proudly serving on active duty.

So I say, as this amendment does, let us not wring our hands about firewalls. Let us go after the goldplated defense programs—and cargo preference and operating differential subsidies fall into this category—and use this money not for inordinate subsidies in that area but to put it into our children's future.

I want my colleagues to realize, as I have said so many times on the floor over the last 2 years, because we debate this issue once or twice a year, I am prepared to show anybody just the inordinate subsidy there is to these maritime jobs that can be better spent somewhere else, or if still spent there, to share in some of the costs when we are talking about forcing men and women out of military uniform.

I reserve the remainder of my time, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. BREAU. Mr. President, I yield myself such time as I may consume on this amendment.

Mr. President, here we go again. This is probably about the 12th time this body has considered this approach to do away with something that the majority of the Senate and a majority of the House and the administration solidly supports, and they do that because it is a good provision to try to help promote an American industry that is in desperate need of assistance.

I am always enthralled by the fact that the Senator from Iowa points out, well, we could save a couple hundred million dollars if we did away with the cargo preference program. In 1989, we could have saved about $7 billion to $8 billion if we did away with all the farm programs. Is anybody suggesting that? I doubt it. It helps United States agriculture. It helps farmers. It helps this country. We could send a lot more to starving nations if we bought all foreign wheat, or if we bought all foreign corn. It is a lot cheaper than American corn because of our programs. Is that good policy? Of course not. This Government has an obligation to support industries in this country that need help and assistance. The way to do that is to design programs which actually allow these industries to compete against other competitors in the international community.

Mr. President, that is exactly what the cargo preference bill says. It simply says that when we carry our military, we would like to carry it on American ships. I do not want to see our military equipment going to the Persian Gulf on Libyan vessels or Liberian ships. It ought to go in American vessels.

Is it more expensive? Of course it is. Is it good policy? Of course it is. I do not want our agricultural products going to other countries on foreign flagships. Countries will soon think it is some other country giving the donation to food assistance programs. That is not in the interest of this country.

Another point I think needs to be made, Mr. President, is the fact that some people think this will save us a ton. The actual fact is that only about 3 percent of all the food we ship overseas goes under the cargo preference programs. The reason is because under cargo preference it is only the aid programs that are affected by the requirement. The vast bulk, 97 percent of all the food we send overseas, as the Presiding Officer knows very well, goes under regular, normal, commercial transactions. It does not go under assistance programs like the Public Law 480 program.

It goes on a normal commerce transaction, and they send those on the cheapest ships they can possibly find. They put it out for bid. Whoever gets the cheapest bid gets to carry the product. Only 3 percent of food that is sold from the United States goes under preferential programs.

The other point I make is I was looking over some of the items that the author of the amendment has in his little fact sheet. You know, if you read facts, you can read them a number of different ways. He says the Maritime Administration says that the cost of a captain on a ship is $312,000 a year. That is interesting, but it is not the total picture. As they say, the other side of the picture is these captains only work about half a year, 6 months. So immediately you divide the cost of a year's salary in half because they do not work for a year. I would not want to be at sea for an entire year. I would like to get back every now and again. They do not work the whole year. The figure is misleading at the very best.

Mr. SARBANES. The captains at sea and working, how many hours a day do they work?

Mr. BREAU. It is almost as much as the Members of the U.S. Senate have been working. It is 24 hours a day. They are responsible for that ship.

Mr. SARBANES. He is in charge of that ship.

Mr. BREAU. He is responsible 24 hours a day under very trying conditions. They work only 6 months. So you can start by dividing the salary in half. And if you talk about the number of hours he works in a 6-month period, we are talking about some very serious and difficult conditions.

Mr. SARBANES. For a very highly responsible position. Is he not responsible for that ship?

Mr. BREAU. He is responsible for the cargo, the ship, the contents, and the crew that is serving with him.

The Senator makes an excellent point. We have debated this. We talked about it. We voted on it on a number of times. I say to my colleagues, in addition to all of the merits as to why the amendment should not be adopted, it is also nongermane.

At an appropriate time I will make a point of order that the amendment is nongermane, and should be struck down on a point of germaneness under section 305(b) of the Budget Act.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. GRASSLEY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. GRASSLEY. I yield myself such time as I might consume.

Mr. President, I think the point that the Senator from Louisiana ended on is making my point because it is a matter of fairness and propriety that fourth arm of defense—this is better known as the U.S.-flag merchant marine—shares the burden of defense cuts in this post-cold war era.

Whether the Senator from Louisiana speaks about the $300,000 salary and benefits for a year or divides it by two and comes out of $150,000 a year, whether the guy is working 24 hours a day or whether he works just an 8-hour day, if you compare that to what we pay our Navy captains in the U.S. Navy, they would get $101,069 in salary and benefits. So what we are talking about here is an organization and subsidies that exist for defense purposes that are not serving the purpose that they were intended to do. Yet we forget all about those when we are talking about cutting military expenditures.

The thousands and thousands of people who are our constituents from every State in the Nation are going to get hit in a very difficult way as we reduce our military—and we should reduce our military now that the threat of a superpower war is over.

But the first point is, as a matter of fairness, this amendment should be adopted. The justification for maritime programs and policies such as the Jones Act, cargo preference, the operation differential subsidies, has been to maintain a U.S.-flag fleet to supply vessels and manning for sealift needs during overseas military conflicts.

These programs support approximately 9,000 to 10,000 seafaring billets, or jobs. The cargo preference is supporting approximately 2,000 billets. Operating differential subsidies are supporting approximately 2,300 billets, and the Jones Act is supporting roughly the remaining 5,000 billets.

The U.S. International Trade Commission—this is our own Government agency—had a study concluding that the Jones Act cost American consumers and businesses more than $10 billion per year and destroys 2,000 jobs in mining, forestry, agriculture, and other industries. This subsidy, the cost to the consumer, translates into the cost of $2 million per seafaring billet as a subsidy.

The Office of Management and Budget estimates the cost of cargo preference for fiscal year 1993 to run over $500 million. So this translates into a cost to the taxpayer of $250,000 per billet. The Office of Management and Budget reports that it estimates operating differential subsidies for fiscal year 1993 to cost $225 million. This translates into the cost to the taxpayer of about $100,000 per seafaring billet to subsidize the difference of wages and benefits between U.S.-flag seafarers and their world competitors.

The Department of Defense reports the average cost of salary and benefits for the military's 1.9 million enlisted and officers, from E-1 to O-6 captain rank, averages $32,125 per year, with captains of the Navy vessels, as I have already said getting $101,069. The cost of reservists would average about one-sixth of this cost.

The Maritime Administration reports the cost of salaries and benefits for a captain of a commercial merchant marine class A-3 vessel costs at $312,000 per year. The cost of one commercial merchant marine captain could pay for the cost of three active duty or 18 reservist captains who face unemployment because of defense reduction in force.

The effect to eliminate unwise defense spending must reach all areas, including the fourth arm of defense, our U.S. commercial merchant marine. Savings from merchant marine programs can and should be used to invest in programs critical to the welfare and education of children as well as to improve our military sealift needs, and this amendment allows both of that to happen. These savings can be achieved and directed this fiscal year to children's programs without eliminating the budget firewalls.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator from Louisiana yield a couple of minutes to me?

Mr. BREAUX. I am happy to yield whatever time he needs to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator for yielding time.

I first want to say there is no Senator in this body I respect more than the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRASSLEY] and it troubles me that I am compelled to rise to oppose the amendment he offered because I do not know of anyone who brings to a debate any more thorough work and preparation and knowledge of a subject than he does. The depth on this issue is no different from that which we usually find him prepared to deliver.

I respect the fact that we disagree on this subject, not because of any personal differences, but simply because of the belief that from different points of view people can differ. I, frankly, have a strong view that our merchant marine, Mr. President, is one of our most valuable national assets. No clearer was that brought home to those of us who observed the Persian Gulf war than the performance that was turned in as the sealift capacity was brought to bear and used to help protect our national security interests in that conflict.

I point out that, while I think we could debate this for a long time, today is probably not the time to go into all of the details. But I would like to ask unanimous consent to put in the RECORD some facts and figures that would support the notion that this is a national asset, and it certainly pulled its weight in the Persian Gulf conflict. So I make that unanimous-consent request at this time.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEALIFT IN OPERATION DESERT SHIELD/DESERT STORM

In Operation Desert Shield/Desert Storm, our country confronted one of the largest and most heavily armored ground forces in the world, in an area about as far away from the United States as one could get on land and still find vital interests at stake, in a region where we had no forward-deployed ground forces and limited prepositioned equipment, under circumstances that called for rapid force buildup.

During the early stages, there was a "window of vulnerability" when we were concerned about the ability of U.S. and allied forces to defend against a possible Iraqi attack. Fast action was necessary, and a massive airlift began August 8.

Never before had any nation airlifted as many tons over as many miles in as short a time. On some days, more than 120 strategic airlifters landed in the Persian Gulf region.

That initial airlift was unparalleled, but the first two sealift ships to arrive in Saudi Arabia carried more tonnage than the entire airlift up to that point. It was sealift that moved the vast majority of the supplies and equipment.

On one day, December 31, there was literally a steel bridge across the ocean, with 132 ships enroute to Saudi Arabia and 47 returning to the United States: one ship every 50 miles from Savannah to the Persian Gulf.

More cargo was sealifted more quickly than ever before, equivalent to a couple of medium-sized cities, 95 percent of all supplies sent to the Persian Gulf: over 10 million tons of dry cargo (tanks, trucks, ammunition, foodstuffs); 2.8 million tons of unit equipment; 6.5 million tons of refined petroleum products; and 825,000 tons of sustenance cargo.

Had this operation been attempted years ago, the United States would have had much less military sealift at its disposal.

A total of almost $7 billion was spent on sealift during the 1980s, more money than was spent on military sealift from the end of World War II until 1980. This expenditure dramatically increased the Nation's sealift capability.

Despite inevitable problems, by any standard America's defense transportation system achieved a great success in Operation Desert Shield/Desert Storm. It was a team success in the truest sense. Our uniformed forces, active duty, guard, and reserve; our commercial air carriers; our rail and trucking industries; our ports; and the merchant marine—the bedrock of America's defense transportation system—all worked together to support our national interests.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I hope that Senators will go along with the point that will be made by the distinguished Senator from Louisiana, support the notion that this is not a germane amendment, and it should not be approved by the Senate at this time.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. I want to make two quick observations. First of all, there are a number of other countries that use the cargo preference requirement in order to sustain a merchant marine. So they recognize the validity of this approach in order to sustain their merchant marine. The French and a number of other countries did it. The Soviets did it. I do not know how they will handle it now that they are breaking up. The French continue to do it, and a number of other countries do this as a way of sustaining a merchant marine capacity.

You have to ask the basic question, is the United States as the world's leading power to be bereft of a ship building, ship-maintaining, and a ship-operating capacity? That is really the sort of question we get. Are we going to be totally independent on others for carriage by sea?

I can think of a lot of economic reasons why that should not happen, but on the security side, it is clear that there is the argument that if we need a sealift capacity, we can call on these so-called contract ships under other flags to do it; but that did not happen at the time of the Persian Gulf situation. They refused to take the assignment. So we had to come back on our own people. I am informed that 52 out of 55 seafaring nations have some form of cargo preference.

So the real question is going to come down to whether the United States is going to continue to be in any respect—it certainly has considerably diminished—a seafaring Nation. I think we should be. Furthermore, I certainly think that question ought not to be decided on the basis of an amendment offered to a budget resolution at this point in the process, when the basic issue has not been fundamentally considered. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BREAUX. I thank the Chair. I will make a closing comment. I think we already have less than 300 U.S.-flag vessels in the United States. That is it. The promotional programs that we have are two. That is it. Every other nation around the world knows the importance of having a merchant fleet that they can depend on.

The Senator from Maryland made a very key point. If we did not have our own flagships, there are some countries that would not allow their ships to be utilized to take troops, equipment, and manpower to the Persian Gulf. These are the last two programs we have left. I suggest that it only affects about 3 percent of the cargo agricultural products that we ship overseas; 97 percent of the products are never touched. Every agriculture commodity in America practically has a promotional program that aids and assists them. I support that. It is the American way, and we need to continue that.

So, Mr. President, at the appropriate time, when the author of the amendment yields his time, I will be happy to yield mine and make my point at that time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time under the control of the Senator from Louisiana has expired.

The Senator from Iowa has 1 minute 6 seconds.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I will make just a few quick points here. The Senator from Louisiana is probably doing what I would do if I lived in his State. I would be defending an industry that is very important there. He has to defend that industry on some basis other than it has been good for our national security, because the 300-ship figure he quoted tells the whole story.

In 1950, we had 2,000 ships. In the meantime, in all those years in between, we have had cargo preference. That says better than anything I can say. Those statistics reflect that cargo preference is not working to help our national defense.

Those 300 ships shipped just 15 percent of all of the cargo that we had to ship to the Persian Gulf war. So we are not relying upon cargo preference to give us a strong merchant marine fleet to meet the needs of our military, because they cannot do it.

Mr. President, I would like to share with my colleagues an article entitled, "America's Welfare Queen Fleet, the Need for Maritime Policy Reform." This article was written by Rob Quartel, a former commissioner at the Federal Maritime Commission and was included in the recent publication of Regulation, The CATO Review of Business and Government.

The title speaks volumes. Our Nation's maritime policies and programs, notwithstanding their good intentions, have transformed our once mighty, proud U.S.-flag commercial merchant marine into a pitiful, helpless ward of the state, not just dependent upon welfare from American taxpayers and consumers, but actually addicted to its drugs—the next taxpayer fix, or protectionist shipment of goods.

Our U.S.-flag merchant marine can no longer fend for itself in the real world. It cannot compete. Even if all the unfair foreign subsidies and policies were eliminated, the U.S.-flag merchant marine could not compete. This is why America's maritime unions and shipowners, and their allies in Congress, worked so hard to lobby the Bush administration to keep any discussion of maritime policies off the GATT table.

Unfortunately, our administration agreed to this nonsense. And when the Nordic countries wanted to put shipping restrictions on the GATT table, an administration which advocates free trade embarrasses itself by leading the opposition to the Nordic proposal.

Why can the U.S.-flag fleet not compete? There are many reasons, which Commissioner Quartel points out. But a very large part of the reason is that U.S. union crews cost way too much.

The former commander of the Military Sealift Command, Vice Admiral Carroll, hit the nail on the head nearly 10 years ago when he testified, and I quote, "Why are we in such a mess? One of the reasons is that U.S. crew costs continue to be the highest in the world. Monthly crew costs of U.S.-flag ships are as much as three times higher than those of countries with comparable standards of living, such as Norway."

Commissioner Quartel delineates other programs and policies which have contributed to the decline of America's merchant marine. This includes policies such as the Jones Act and cargo preference which in essence serve as entitlement programs allowing U.S.-flags to charge Uncle Sam and American business and consumers basically what they wish. Shipyard policies, antitrust exemptions, direct subsidies, manpower requirements, and conflicting national defense requirements all contribute to the demise of our merchant marine. Commissioner Quartel also outlines reforms that must be implemented if we hope to revive the U.S.-flag fleet.

Mr. President, I hope my colleagues will take a moment to read Commissioner Quartel's article in its entirety which I will soon ask unanimous consent to be printed in the RECORD.

But I would like to also share a few quotes from the Commissioner as follows:

Only the S&L debacle represents a bigger government-industry-special interest scam than that which today passes for a national merchant marine policy.

By the end of the Gulf War, America's subsidized merchant fleet had directly contributed only 6 aging ships to the armada of more than 460 that transported military materials into Saudi ports. Some eighty U.S. merchant marine ships carried hundreds of thousands of tons of military goods to the vicinity of the war zone—Singapore, and the United Arab Emirates, and Haifa. But many relied on foreign-flag feeders with their foreign crews to complete the runs to Saudi Arabia and thus exposed the bankruptcy of the main-American argument that underpins much of U.S. maritime policy.

In short, the success of the military sealift—a brilliant feat of logistics—occurred despite (rather than because of) 75 years of government subsidies, protectionism, regulation, and entry and management controls promoted as necessary for maintaining this so-called "fourth arm" of the nation's defense.

Commissioner Quartel continues by stating that:

U.S. maritime policies should be based on more than emotion and the narrow parochial interest of dying labor unions, debilitated companies, and congressional PAC contributions. The needs of ocean transportation users (not just the needs of the carriers), real national security requirements (not empty rhetoric), and a realistic appraisal of the tough federal budget limits that will exist into the foreseeable future should drive decisionmaking.

Mr. President, those are tough words, but we have a tough problem. Sticking our head in the sand, allowing business as usual, seeking more drugs for the addiction, such as the recent efforts to siphon off the life-blood of other programs such as food assistance to the former Soviet Union or expanding cargo preference into the commercial trade arena through the foreign aid authorization bill, will do nothing to save our merchant marine.

I would also like to share with my colleagues an article printed in the Wall Street Journal written by James Bovard. He, too, pulls no punches, and I would like to read some of his quotes as well.

Mr. Bovard states that:

Since Congress has given U.S.-flag ships a captive market, congressmen feel entitled to force American shippers to hire American workers, and strong unions guarantee exorbitant salaries. U.S. ship crews cost six times more than third World crews; American shipmasters routinely cost shipping companies $300,000 a year. The high pay breeds corruption: An FBI sting operation recently discovered that shipping jobs are illegally being sold by one maritime union.

Mr. Bovard continues:

The Jones Act engenders a chain reaction of extortion—allowing American shipyards to charge stratospheric prices to American shipbuyers, allowing American-flag ships to charge shakedown shipping rates to American businesses, and allowing American congressmen to demand lavish campaign contributions from the American maritime industry (more than $1 million a year).

Mr. President, our Nation's maritime policies and programs have been justified on the basis of two objectives—to enhance America's foreign commerce and to maintain fleets of vessels and crews necessary for military sealift needs.

These policies and programs have failed miserably in meeting either of these objectives and therefore should be abolished and replaced. Everyone knows this is true. The facts don't lie. Simply look at the fruits of our maritime policies during the last 40 years.

At the end of World War II, America had the largest fleet—over 2,000 vessels. By 1950, our U.S.-flag fleet consisted of 1,050 vessels. Today there are only about 360 vessels, and fewer than 100 remain in the oceangoing fleet.

In 1950, we had 56,629 seafaring jobs sailing under U.S.-flags. Today, we have fewer than 10,000.

In 1950, U.S.-flag vessels carried 43 percent of America's foreign trade. Today, U.S.-flags carry less than 4 percent of our foreign commerce.

Has America's foreign commerce depended upon the policies and programs supporting our U.S.-flag merchant marine? Obviously not. And in fact, our foreign commerce has thrived in spite of our wasteful merchant marine policies. From 1950 to 1985, our foreign trade skyrocketed from 117 million metric tons to 641 million metric tons.

So it is clear our merchant marine policies can no longer be defended and justified based upon our foreign trade interests. And, in fact, maritime policies such as the Jones Act which artificially increases the cost of water-borne transportation, actually makes our foreign trade less competitive.

So this leaves our U.S.-flag merchant marine programs and policies dangling precariously on the national defense justification, a justification which was exposed as a complete failure, a complete myth, by our recent Persian Gulf war.

That is one reason I think we saw last fall, Warren Leback, the U.S. Maritime Administrator arguing that we must now shift back to the economic argument. It was reported in the Journal of Commerce on November 14, 1991, that Mr. Leback said that "Maritime support advocates must take their military argument and 'turn it toward the economic defense of our country.'" Mr. Leback goes on to complain about free traders who would repeal the Jones Act and other maritime subsidies pointing out that there is no level playing field when it comes to global shipping because other nations support their maritime industries.

But what Mr. Leback did not mention is the fact that it is the United States, at the strong, vocal insistence of U.S. maritime unions and companies, refuses to attack these so-called unfair foreign subsidies and policies at the GATT table.

You cannot have it both ways, although granted, the U.S. maritime industry has enjoyed having it both ways in the past. I think the party is about over, however.

Mr. President, what are we getting for our money? One of the most overused defense arguments is that we must maintain a commercial seafaring force able to man our vessels during time of war. I say that's nonsense. I say we either devote a certain number of Navy personnel, or create a reserve, to handle cargo sealift needs. It could be done at a fraction of the cost.

I discussed earlier what it costs us to maintain those 10,000 seafaring jobs now working under the U.S. flag based upon new OMB estimates.

But, the Congressional Budget Office had also determined for Senator DOMENICI and I that cargo preference cost American taxpayers $825 million in fiscal year 1991, and operating differential subsidies cost $225 million.

Based on those estimates cargo preference, therefore, forces American taxpayers to spend over $400,000 per job for our high priced commercial seafarers.

Operating differential subsidies force American taxpayers to spend about $120,000 per job, according to Commissioner Quartel.

So what do those 5,000 jobs supported by the Jones Act cost Americans. The United States International Trade Commission released a study which showed that the Jones Act is costing American consumers and businesses over $10 billion per year. Commissioner Quartel estimates that this figure could be as high as $20 billion.

Using the ITC's figures, that translates into $2 million per billet per year! Using Commissioner Quartel's estimates, it costs $4 million per job!

But for U.S.-flag maritime supporters, price is no object. Americans, however, concerned about deficit spending are concerned.

And Americans concerned about revitalizing the economy certainly care about a $10 or $20 billion drag on the economy that destroys 2,000 jobs in agriculture, forestry, mining, and other industries.

Mr. President, one last note about the military need to spend up to $4 million per year to maintain one seafaring job for that day in the future when we need to man cargo vessels for a military sealift operation.

Here is some food for thought. Military Sealift Command officials told my office that at the outbreak of the Persian Gulf war effort, the union contracts for our seafarers contained no provision for war zone bonuses. So these high-priced union seafarers which have been living high off the hog thanks to Uncle Sam all these years, rush to add war zone bonuses to their contracts requiring that they get double pay while in the war zone.

Therefore, as an example, if captain of a commercial U.S.-flag vessel makes $14,000 per month, and served a month in the war zone, he would have received a war zone bonus of $14,000.

If a U.S.-flag commercial captain got $14,000 in a war bonus, what did a Navy captain get? $150.

I have said it earlier this year, I do not question the patriotism of our U.S.-flag merchant marine.

I just do not know, however, if we can afford this kind of patriotism.

It is time to stop this nonsense and use these funds for the sake of our children.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article I mentioned by Rob Quartel be printed in the RECORD, along with some other material.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICA'S WELFARE QUEEN FLEET: THE NEED FOR MARITIME POLICY REFORM

(By Rob Quartel)

When Saddam Hussein invaded Kuwait, the United States responded just days later with a military sealift, the success of which is unparalleled. In just 45 days the United States moved to Saudi Arabia the equivalent of a city the size of Alexandria, Virginia—lock, stock, and barrel. Hussein's threat was met by a vast armada of American commercial ships crewed by thousands of young, well-trained Americans, on the world's fastest, most modern ships. The American merchant marine threaded its way through the dangers of the naval mines laid off Saudi shores. The military was able to call on the services of this private fleet at only a moment's notice and paid no more than market rates. This success story was made possible by a far-sighted competitive merchant marine policy set in place years ago by the U.S. Congress. And with the exception of the first two sentences, this scenario is a myth. Only the S&L debacle represents a bigger government-industry-special interest scam than that which today passes for a national merchant marine policy.

By the end of the Gulf War, America's subsidized merchant fleet had directly contributed only six aging ships to the armada of more than 460 that transported military materials into Saudi ports. Some eighty U.S. merchant marine ships carried hundreds of thousands of tons of military goods to the vicinity of the war zone—Singapore, the United Arab Emirates, and Haifa. But many relied on foreign-flag feeders with their foreign crews to complete the runs to Saudi Arabia and thus exposed the bankruptcy of the man-American argument that underpins much of U.S. maritime policy. No Jones Act vessels participated at all, and the Jones Act, that most sacred of sacred cows, had to be partially suspended to ensure adequate fuel for the nation's defense. In short, the success of the military sealift—a brilliant feat of logistics—occurred despite (rather than because of) 75 years of government subsidies, protectionism, regulation, and entry and management controls promoted as necessary for maintaining this so-called "fourth arm" of the nation's defense.

The problems inherent in existing maritime policy are not limited to issues of utility in the recent war effort, however. The various regulatory policies and subsidies that have grown up over more than 200 years, often by historical accident, are simply counterproductive. Once the largest private commercial fleet in history, the U.S. merchant marine is now a shadow of its former self, dependent on federal welfare for its marginal survival.

Unrecognized by government policy, a fundamental change is taking place in the underlying economics of ocean shipping. It is not just, as many in the industry argue, that profit levels are excessively low and markets overtonnaged; the changes taking place are far more basic. Although carriers have spent considerable time, money, and management effort to differentiate their markets and services, ocean carriage itself has become an increasingly fungible product. Each day the line between high- and low-value ocean carriage services becomes less distinguishable in the principal U.S. trades and product markets. When that line finally disappears, several difficult questions will face both nations and corporations that now own and finance relatively high-cost ocean carriers: Why own ships? Why maintain a flag fleet? Why not simply purchase ocean space, as the intermodal shipper now hires services from the trucking, airline, and railroad industries?

Federal maritime policy is divided into two distinct yet intertwined parts. Promotional (read "protectionist") policies are managed by the Department of Transportation's Maritime Administration (MarAd), and regulatory policy is promulgated by the independent five-member Federal Maritime Commission (FMC).

This article examines the network of promotional and regulatory policies and suggests dramatic departures from the themes that have motivated more than two centuries of government intervention in the maritime industry. But to understand the need for change, it is important to appreciate the state of the industry today.

THE AMERICAN MERCHANT FLEET: WHERE WE ARE

The most effective measure of a policy's success can often be found in the numbers its supporters would hide. In the case of the American merchant marine, the decline of the U.S. flag fleet offers unmistakable and conclusive evidence of the extent of the policy failure.

At the end of World War II, America had the largest fleet in world history—more than 2,000 vessels. By 1970, however, there were only 893 U.S. flag ships, and by the end of 1990, the fleet had declined to 371 active vessels. Fewer than 100 ships remain in the oceangoing fleet, and although some observers note that the tonnage of these vessels has remained constant since 1970, the market share of the U.S. merchant marine continues to drop. In 1970 U.S. flag vessels carried 24 percent of all goods arriving at or leaving U.S. shores. Today less than 4 percent of those goods are carried in U.S. flag ships.

The labor picture is equally grim. Between 1979 and 1989 average monthly maritime employment fell more than 30 percent. Seafaring jobs alone declined 80 percent, down from a high of 56,000 billets in 1950 to about 11,000 today—reflecting in part better technology, but more significantly the basic decline in the American fleet's economic viability. Although subsidized merchant marine academies continue to chum out graduates, few entry jobs exist in the oceangoing flag fleet. The average unlicensed sailor is now 50 years old, the average officer 44. Meanwhile, through the operating differential subsidy, American taxpayers subsidize some 2,200 seagoing slots to the tune of nearly $120,000 per year each.

THE POLICIES BEHIND THE GREEN DOOR

How did an industry supposedly so vital to our nation's trading success arrive at such a state? To a large extent, the U.S. flag fleet is a victim of attempts to save it. The ins and outs of maritime economics and regulation often appear complex and forbidding to the uninitiated, but its essential—the programs that govern the maritime industry and its markets—can be summarized in seven programmatic themes repeated throughout all of the legal and regulatory elements.

Cabotage policies are designed to protect domestic shipping from foreign competition. The Jones Act (the Merchant Marine Act of 1920) requires shipments between U.S. ports (Los Angeles and Honolulu, for example) to be carried on U.S.-owned operated, build, and manned carriers. The United States, almost alone among the major trading nations of the world, applies cabotage protection not only to its sailors, but also to its shipbuilders. International U.S. flag ship also face restrictions regarding the required mix of American ownership, labor, and repair work.

Shipyard policies protect domestic yards from foreign competition by proscribing the use of foreign-built or repaired vessels in domestic operation and in certain U.S. flag international trade operations. Although direct construction differential subsidies (designed to offset higher U.S. costs) are no longer funded, U.S. shipyards continue to be subsidized through federal mortgage and tax set-aside programs as well as through direct barriers to entry to foreign competitors.

Virtually blanket antitrust exemption for international ocean cartels or "conferences" is combined with federal (FMC) government enforcement of the resulting price-fixing agreements through mandatory tariff filing and antirebating policies—all falsely in the name of common carriage, price stability, and international practice and comity.

Direct government subsidies are provided to certain U.S. flag carriers. The so-called operating differential subsidies of over $200 million a year, paid to four U.S. firms operating American-built vessels, are considered necessary to offset the cost differentials created by flag restrictions on labor, ownership, capital investment, and management. But the subsidy comes with a price—regulatory constraints regarding terms of trade, routes, and asset sales. The government also restricts competition among U.S. ships in domestic Jones Act markets and through access to price-subsidized government preference cargoes.

Indirect subsidies include: U.S. flag cargo preferences for military, agricultural, and other U.S. government goods; entry barriers and utility rate regulation in protected Jones Act markets; and tax subsidies for funds set aside for ship construction.

Manpower requirements include shipboard labor pool restrictions and rigid crewing requirements, both in numbers of billets and in types of positions (radio operators, for example, akin to coal tenders on railroads) and archaic labor-management restrictions in U.S. shipyards. The demands of an aging fleet, caused largely by build-U.S. restrictions, cause further labor inefficiencies.

A national defense requirement overlays all the other programs and requirements.

The law requires that the commercial fleet be in a position to be a useful auxiliary to military operations, whether military commanders want them or not.

U.S. maritime policy has been over 200 years in the making. The first legislation to protect U.S. shipping interests was passed in 1789 by the first Congress. A tariff placed on imported goods was reduced by 10 percent if the imports were carried on vessels built in the United States and wholly owned by Americans. Other policies and regulations have been added to the mix since 1789, but despite efforts to address problems through periodic adjustments to the subsidies and restrictions, the state of the maritime industry continues to deteriorate.

NEW MARKETS, NEW PLAYERS, AND A NEW WORLD ORDER

Conditions today are very different from those that existed when America's maritime laws were first written. In 1789 America was a developing country with a tiny fraction of the world's trade. Today the United States represents nearly 26 percent of world GNP, almost 12 percent of world exports. Nearly a trillion dollars (or approximately 95 percent) of U.S. foreign trade moves by ship. The world's economy simply cannot exist without either the products we sell or the markets we provide.

Dramatic changes in international markets also continue to alter the mix. The advent of European market integration, new political systems in Eastern Europe, new markets and aggressive new producers in the Pacific Rim, the potential for a new GATT and various free-trade agreements, and numerous other events—both noteworthy and minor—all contribute to major changes in the fundamental economics and consequent market relationships in the maritime sector. Innovation, entrepreneurship, and competition in transportation logistics only increase the uncertainty surrounding market outcomes. But maritime law and policy have been slow to recognize, let alone adapt to, these rapidly changing realities, including our evolving position in world markets.

The second fundamental economic change is in the character and structure of ocean carriage itself. The ocean shipping business no longer consists simply of ships on the ocean. Today's industry leaders provide intermodal docks that accommodate trucks and rail, as well as ships, door-to-door pickup, packaging, and delivery, and electronic tracking, customs documentation, and billing.

Furthermore, the ocean leg, which accounts for 70 to 80 percent of the intermodal bill is itself an increasingly fungible market of ocean space and movements. Today the competitive advantage goes to modern foreign (frequently Asian) fleets manned by smaller, less highly paid crews, who ride on cheaper foreign-built, foreign-financed ships than their American counterparts. The competitive disadvantage of the high-cost American flag fleet leaves no future for an industry penalized by both flag and Jones Act restrictions. Policymakers cannot continue to treat the merchant marine as simply an ocean service. It is increasingly an international, intermodal service industry.

A NEW MARITIME PARADIGM

It is well past time for a fundamental rethinking of the maritime world order and what many suppose to be its universal laws. It is time for the development of what might be called a new maritime paradigm. Three points represent the essential pillars on which this new strategy must be built.

First, the new paradigm should represent a commitment to reforming policy, not just restructuring current programs. That requires both a commitment to dig down to the roots of the industry's productivity and competitiveness problems and the resolve to get from where we are today to where we want to be in clear, decisive steps.

Second, the new paradigm should encompass a broad policy outlook with a detached, analytical view of international shipping as a link in the trade network of an increasingly globalized economy. U.S. maritime policies should be based on more than emotion and the narrow parochial interests of dying labor unions, debilitated companies, and congressional PAC contributions. The needs of ocean transportation users (not just the needs of the carriers), real national security requirements (not empty rhetoric), and a realistic appraisal of the tough federal budget limits that will exist into the foreseeable future should drive decisionmaking.

Finally, the new paradigm will require a high degree of boldness and imagination. The greatest obstacle to maritime reform today is political timidity and lack of imagination and vision.

Although most observers within the industry and inside the government bureaucracies that promote and regulate U.S. shipping know that the current policy has failed, few seem able to visualize conditions under which the U.S. flag fleet could compete. In part, that stems from the inability to consider either rearranging or eliminating the self-inflicted penalties of current flag and Jones Act policies. But just five key policy changes would radically alter the state of this industry by allowing it to reorganize itself along more competitive lines and by freeing industry participants from both government largess and the associated government entanglement and interference.

First, we must sever the linkage among shipbuilding, commercial shipping, and military planning and develop independent strategies in a stand-alone context for each. To the extent that each policy is independently successful, all will be served.

Second, we must eliminate the industrial welfare mindset by deliberately reducing and phasing out operating subsidies as well as the restrictions applying to labor, ownership, and assets of U.S. flag and Jones Act vessels. In addition, we need to carefully restructure and eliminate indirect subsidies, from tax deferrals to cargo preference.

Third, we should directly address military manpower and sealift requirements. To the extent the U.S. commercial fleet represents a real national defense asset, budget decisions should be consolidated with all other defense-related maritime programs under Defense Department control.

Fourth, we need to jump-start a true, internationally competitive shipping industry. Eliminating the shipping cartel's anti-trust exemption, tariff-filing requirements, and extensive government oversight of internal market practices would start the process.

Fifth, we must create an aggressive, internationally focused program within the multilateral trade framework to systematically eliminate foreign subsidies, restrictions, and antimarket practices.

THE LESSONS OF DESERT SHIELD AND DESERT STORM

The recent war effort should expose the national defense underpinning of current maritime policy for what it is—largely a myth. The maritime aspects of the Desert Shield/Desert Storm operation clearly demonstrated the importance of a fully integrated, intermodal system of transportation, including a comprehensive maritime leg, but they did not demonstrate the need for a merchant marine, particularly one as inefficiently maintained as the one we have today.

Military goods sent to the Persian Gulf were moved by rail, air, and truck to ocean ports, and a variety of ships were used, both U.S. flag and foreign, with American and foreign crews alike. The most highly valued cargo—the troops—were moved to the Gulf almost entirely by air, as was certain other high-value, high-force, time-sensitive weaponry.

Although there was an undeniable, urgent need for ocean transportation, Desert Shield/Desert Storm established beyond the shadow of a doubt that the military can efficiently execute its mission even without an American-built, American-crewed commercial fleet. Ninety-one percent of dry cargoes were moved on military prepositioned fast sealift vessels, U.S. and effectively U.S.-controlled ships, and foreign (largely NATO countries) charter vessels. Only six of the fifty-nine ships specifically subsidized for the purposes of national defense actually moved through the minefields with their all-American crews directly into the war zone in Saudi Arabia. Thirty-eight other subsidized vessels transported goods on their regular liner service routes but used foreign-flag feeders, with foreign crews, to move the military goods to their final Persian Gulf destinations.

Many ships were simply unavailable to the military. Shipowners and military officials were concerned that any diversion of these ships for military purposes would lead to a permanent disruption of service and the loss of market share. In other cases the technical needs of military shipping coincided to only a limited degree with the needs of the merchant fleet. The container ships that dominate international shipping and the U.S. merchant fleet are virtually useless for the short-notice transport of tanks and other military equipment that must be rolled aboard. Prepositioned ships operated by the military—Roll-on-Roll-off (or "Ro-Ro") and fast sealift vessels, for example—and a well-maintained, standby reserve fleet structured to meet changing defense needs would be more useful in providing rapid response and deployment. Continuing to tie the military to the viability of the commercial fleet today benefits neither party and, in fact, may harm both. Eliminating the already severed national defense linkage from civilian maritime policy is thus a necessary first step toward a rational consideration of the future of the U.S. commercial fleet.

The first casualty of this new policy would be the operating differential subsidy. The question is no longer how to save or reform this subsidy, but how to eliminate it in a way that maximizes the probability that the U.S. flag fleet can be saved and even expanded. Although the subsidy could be capped as a start, a more effective policy would entail a phased elimination of the subsidy in a way that allows U.S. carriers to adjust. One option would be simply to eliminate the subsidy as contracts expire and simultaneously to eliminate labor, market, and other flag restrictions.

Another alternative would be to incorporate a build-abroad option, combined with a per ship operating differential subsidy cap based on Coast Guard-derived manpower requirements and a phased-out of subsidy payments using a formula based on existing contract expiration dates. Given, in addition, the authorization to build and seek greater ownership or financing abroad and to use mixed crews, U.S. carriers would thus have an opportunity to become strong competitors in the international trades.

Reducing or eliminating the personnel restrictions applied to U.S. flag carriers is as critical a piece of the puzzle as any other. The most cost-effective course would be full authorization for the use of international or mixed crewing. If the Defense Department identifies an actual wartime manpower requirement, then this could be met with a minimum American manpower commitment to, for example, two or three jobs on each ship on the basis of high-need, low-availability national defense categories. The subsidy would follow the specific jobs and would be limited to the incremental cost of maintaining the billet as American. Thus, national defense manpower requirements, if they really exist, need not be jeopardized.

A merchant marine reserve offers comparable advantages, and it would quantify and specify the military manpower requirement in a way that allows the military to advertise for and train individuals for availability in wartime—just as we now do in the other military reserves. This merchant marine reserve, with manpower requirements tied to specific reserve vessel billets and skill requirements, could be phased in as the operating differential subsidy is phased out. The Navy could, as another alternative, simply redirect a small portion of its existing naval reserve program to this purpose, at only the net cost of the transition.

The final and most potent element in reforming the commercial sector would be the consolidation of oversight and control of defense-related maritime programs in the Department of Defense. If defense is the skirt behind which maritime promotional programs are hidden, then let the defense planners decide when to lift it. Defense planning and budgeting would be better served under Defense Department control, and taxpayers would be better protected under a system where maritime budget allocation decisions had to compete with defense programs that realistically serve as substitutes or complements.

SHIPYARD POLICY

The fate of American commercial shipyards occupies a crucial place in the policy arena. Although the shipyards have historically driven much of the debate regarding maritime policy—certainly the modern build-American requirement—today the yards are almost universally viewed as an albatross around every other sector's neck. Over the past decade, the industry has lost a third of its capacity and more than 7,000 jobs, and today only one major oceangoing vessel is under construction in an American commercial yard. This has led to considerable political anxiety, but—despite rhetoric to the contrary, it is not at all clear that the anxiety is generated by defense concerns.

From the national defense standpoint, two questions about U.S. shipyards are relevant. Is there any foreseeable military circumstances in which the United States will have the time or luxury to wait the one-and-a-half to two years necessary to build a ship for use in supplying troops at war? If not, is there a special policy requiring the maintenance of ship repair facilities for ship combatants in need of repair or breakout?

In response to the first question, regional or isolated wars of the sort we have seen over the past ten years are generally viewed as the most likely types of conflicts in the foreseeable future. The speed of those wars would preclude the construction or use of any vessels not in the fleet at the outset of the conflict. If a global war should break out, it is not likely to involve extended conventional warfare. There is little military justification for subsidizing commercial shipyards to build supply ships for a type of war we are unlikely to fight. This is independent, of course, from the naval shipbuilding programs that respond to longer-term defense needs.

On the other hand, reliable, U.S.-based repair facilities would be needed if the United States were involved in another war. But shifting the emphasis to repair facilities also suggests a much lower-level policy response than the industrial policy that is in place today.

In fact, commercial shipbuilding may well be able to stand on its own, but a variety of policy changes are required to give shipyards the flexibility and the marketing mindset needed to compete effectively. First, competition itself is necessary to promote a competitive shipbuilding industry. Current restrictions on the use of foreign-built or foreign-repaired ships in either international or domestic commerce should be removed. Second, restrictions on the sale of U.S.-made, noncombat military vessels should be eliminated. Third, a limited, temporary, OECD-acceptable export credit program should be instituted to legitimately promote sales of U.S. ship products overseas. Fourth, federal R&D assistance to shipyards could be increased. Finally, there must be a serious commitment to pursuing government-to-government efforts—through GATT and other international forums—to reduce unfair practices, subsidies (both direct and indirect), and market impediments.

These approaches are aimed at three things: creating a competitive environment, benefitting from any comparative advantage that may exist in American shipbuilding, and creating a cash flow that leads to the renovation of aging yards. No policy can guarantee a competitive industry that no longer lives on federal handouts, but continuing current policies, notably the build-and-charter programs or reviving the construction differential subsidies, would without doubt perpetuate an uncompetitive dependence on taxpayer largess. And that largess is reaching its limits.

THE NEED FOR REGULATORY REFORM

If the promotional programs described herein are tied to arguably legitimate (although perhaps misguided) policy objectives, the FMC's regulatory mandate is far more tenuous, for it is based on the notion that a free fleet cannot compete in subsidized, cartelized, noncompetitive world markets.

The FMC operates under four basic statutes—the 1916 and 1936 Shipping Acts, the 1984 Shipping Act, and the 1988 Trade Act. These statutes constitute the basic regulatory regime covering roughly half of ocean trade—the ocean liner or regularly scheduled common carrier portion of ocean shipping. The other half of ocean trade—that which carries bulk commodities such as oil and grain—is virtually unregulated from an economic standpoint.

A recent FMC study noted that the commission's regulatory focus has been on enforcing "requirements that international shipping practices be just, reasonable, and nondiscriminatory" and that international liner shipping regulation has "never" controlled entry or prices. The study also reported, "A second major difference between the regulation of ocean shipping and the regulation of other domestic transportation industries is the international scope of the activities involved." These statements, which are disingenuous at best, nevertheless articulate two key flaws embedded in maritime regulatory policy: first, that the international scope of the activities involved is more significant than those of other transportation sectors (the aviation industry would no doubt disagree), and second, that there are no barriers to entry.

Although the FMC administers no direct carriage barriers, significant barriers to both entry and exit, to financial innovation, and to management flexibility clearly exist in the network of federal policies from which regulatory policy cannot be divorced. The purpose of the flag restrictions and the Jones Act is, after all, to limit entry. Furthermore, the FMC itself enforces several indirect entry barriers. Bonding and tariff requirements for transportation middlemen, the enforcement of cartel pricing through the FMC's tariff-filing requirements and antidiscipline rules, and the administration of other programs, including rate determination for domestic offshore (Jones Act) shipping, all serve to discourage new entrants.

There are modest genuflections to competition contained in the 1984 Shipping Act (which serves as the guidepost to the current commission). The 1984 changes have led casual observers to suppose that ocean carriage has been deregulated just as other transportation sectors have been. The reality, however, is that the adjustments introduced in 1984 merely provided protective cover from the Justice Department's Antitrust Division. Despite the limited nature of the changes, however, mandatory independent action (which allows a carrier to break from cartel pricing on one day's notice) and service contracting (which allows carriers and shippers to write public contracts outside the tariff, the terms of which must be made available to all who are willing and able to take them) provide at least a glimpse of what could happen in a competitive market. True deregulation will have occurred, however, only when policy reforms are aimed at encouraging market-based competition, increasing customer/shipper options, and increasing benefits to American consumers. No such emphasis appeared in the 1984 act which is, at bottom, really designed to protect ocean carriers and the carrier cartels.

The century-old ocean carrier cartel (or conference) is one of the most defining and tenacious characteristics of the liner trade. At the turn of the century, the conferences were closed and thus met the test of a true cartel. Today, conferences in the American trades must be open—they must allow any carrier that meet their conditions to enter—but their ratemaking and market-restricting practices not only remain but are strengthened and enforced by government action. The conferences enjoy virtually blanket antitrust immunity, and the FMC enforces the tariffs. The commission's ability to intervene in conference actions is also limited to a few narrowly defined findings of unreasonable increases in price and decreases in service.

It is time for the American trading community to ask why the maritime industry should be treated differently from other international businesses. Are ratemaking cartels, revenue pools, restrictions on the right to contract with shippers, and so-called stabilization agreements that keep 10 and 20 percent of capacity off the market any more appropriate here than in trucking, rail transportation, retail sales, or the oil industry? If we oppose such practices in other industries, why not in ocean shipping?

Those who defend the cartel structure argue that modern ratemaking groups bear little resemblance to the early conferences. Proponents argue that the conferences are evolving from rate-setting cartels to efficiency-oriented organizations that help "rationalize" the ever-changing interactions between the supply of and demand for ocean carriage space. If the conferences are, in fact, undergoing such a metamorphosis, the U.S. government should be taking steps to speed the process. The reduction or elimination of antitrust immunity for ocean conferences, the removal of impediments created by the tariff-filing and enforcement process, and the removal of restrictions on the ability of individual shippers and carriers to write individualized contracts would all be steps in the right direction. Taken together, these reforms would create a revolution in shipping and would set a benchmark much of the international community would have to follow. There are three defining needs in regulatory reform.

ANTITRUST IMMUNITY

The 1984 Shipping Act gives virtually blanket antitrust immunity to the ocean conferences. The bulk of this immunity can and should be removed. Carrier antitrust protection for all rate-setting activities, including the authority to discuss, fix, or regulate transportation rates, should be eliminated. Similarly, antitrust immunity applying to pooling (revenue-sharing) agreements should be removed. Successful pooling agreements are a significant impediment to flexible service, to technological and structural innovation, and to price competition. Because pooling agreements are usually effective only in trades where government support for them exists (the South American trades, for example), prohibiting these arrangements would not only improve ocean transportation services but would also provide a disincentive for bilateral agreements restricting ocean trade.

Ocean carriers should, however, be allowed to continue to establish efficiency-enhancing, cost-reducing rationalization agreements. Rationalization agreements that work—space chartering and facilities sharing, for example—often increase the ability of the carrier to compete and enhance its level of service. These types of agreements closely resemble joint ventures, and the Justice Department should be asked to determine whether this type of agreement even needs antitrust immunity. But worthwhile rationalization agreements also need to be distinguished from the capacity-reduction pacts that are simply agreements to restrict the use of vessel space and provide no benefits to shippers. Antitrust immunity for these capacity-reduction pacts should be eliminated.

TARIFF FILINGS

The FMC administers the tariff-filing and enforcement program. All import and export rates must be filed, and a thirty-day wait is required for rate increases to take effect. If antitrust immunity for the conferences were eliminated, tariff- and contract-filing requirements would probably go too, although tariff and contract filings are viewed by many as necessary to the notion of common carriage.

It is frequently argued that the tariff system protects small shippers by giving them access to the same rates the large shippers receive, but it is actually small shippers who are most bound by the tariff rates and requirements. As much as 60 percent of ocean shipping occurs through special service contracts outside the tariff, and these contracts allow shippers with market power to negotiate rates below the tariffs. There is nothing wrong with larger shippers' receiving volume discounts, but the existing tariff system tends to stymie possible deals for smaller ocean carriage users by discouraging rate reductions. In practice, tariffs generally provide few, if any, of the theoretical benefits of common carriage said to justify the system.

Enforcement by the FMC centers on eliminating discounts or, as they are sometimes called, rebates. Under the tariff system a carrier cannot reward loyalty through a tailored customer discount as it could in any other line of business. Where most would see a legitimate market practice, many in the ocean trades wrongly see unfair competition.

When the common carriage—unfair competition myth is set aside, the combination of tariff filing and enforcement is nothing more or less than interference with the ability of shippers and carriers to arrive at mutually agreeable contracts. Tariff-filing requirements drive competitive ratemaking under the table and turn a legitimate rate discount into an illegal rebate. Shippers and their customers end up paying more for ocean transportation than they would under a more liberal system.

Current tariff-filing and antirebate rules should be eliminated, or if tariff filing is retained, the thirty-day advance filing requirement should be replaced by a same-day filing requirement that would let rates move up and down as market forces dictate.

SERVICE CONTRACTS

In 1984, 459 specialized service contracts (the essential terms of which are made public) were filed with the FMC. In 1989 the number of contracts had increased by more than ten times to 5,250. Both shippers and carriers clearly view service contracts as beneficial.

The ability of carriers to write independent service contracts should be expanded, if not completely deregulated. If the conference system is retained, then the FMC's power to regulate or prohibit the use of service contracts should be eliminated. Furthermore, the contracting parties should be allowed to keep the essential terms of their agreements secret. Such privacy, which is afforded most other contracts, would accelerate the pace of the transaction and thus would increase competition.

THE FUTURE

Shipping interests and farming interests fight over cargo preference requirements. Gulf Coast seaports battle Great Lake ports over set-aside provisions. MarAd has been hauled into court by one maritime union that feels a recent subsidy decision will unfairly benefit a rival union. Various U.S. flag companies are involved in protracted legal battles over whether there is excessive competition in the protected West Coast-to-Hawaii trade. Is this any way to run a merchant marine?

It is no wonder that the U.S. merchant marine is in trouble. It is time to recognize that the U.S. flag fleet is in serious trouble because of the programs established to save it. Jones Act requirements, protective conferences, regulatory restrictions, and subsidies encourage, indeed often require, highly uncompetitive cost structures. Attempts to salvage these programs drain resources from the battle against the ultimate culprits—unfair practices abroad and labor and management lethargy at home.

The heart of our maritime policy has always been industry protectionism. Although some observers view maritime laws as the major part of the problem, others have come to live by them. Seamen and shipyard workers, bankers and vessel owners, and government regulatory officials and civil service maritime planners worry about what would happen if subsidies were cut, cargo preferences limited, or cabotage laws revised. The key differences between those who favor continuing these programs and those who favor more market-based reform are the fears of the former that the U.S. shipping and shipbuilding industries simply cannot compete effectively. But the industry is in serious trouble now, and the only hope for turning it around over the long term is through procompetitive reform.

It cannot be true that the best this nation can do in terms of maritime policy is to increase the taxpayer and consumer burden through continued subsidies and economic protectionism while maintaining the government flag penalties that create the problem. Fundamental economic questions must be tackled directly, and changes that reflect the real interplay of markets and competition must be considered and implemented. It is time to set aside the perceived limitations arising from both industry mythology and nationally self-inflicted restrictions.

If the maritime industry wants to be a competitive trade position by the end of the century, then we must realize that other economic actors will increasingly lay by the rules of markets and competition. The limits we place on our ability to play by these rules will be reflected in our shippers' inability to innovate and compete. And the limitations themselves will only be a mirror of our own inability to play on the world stage.

MARAD officials state that a "Master" typically works six months of the year, while collecting over $142,000. There are other "Masters" that earn an even greater amount.

Note.—The cost to the taxpayer of all wages and fringe benefits for the selected representative vessel types on a monthly basis ranges between $218,000 and $172,000. Measured as a daily average cost per job, and ignoring the variation between high paid and low paid job categories, the range for the selected types is $346 to $229. While vessel types "A3" and "B" are representative of a broad cross-section of the privately-owned U.S.-flag merchant fleet, there are both larger and smaller vessels in the fleet. No allowance has been made for either employer payroll taxes or employee income taxes. Take-home pay is substantially less than the "W-2 Wages" (gross pay). The amounts shown in the last column, "Total Cost to Employer," are reduced, on average, by the amount of operating-differential subsidy shown in the response to question five ($8,800).

TORPEDO SHIPPING PROTECTIONISM
(By James Bovard)

The Jones Act of 1920 requires all shipping between U.S. ports to be carried on American-built, American-owned, and American-crewed ships. Though this trade restriction effectively dates back to 1817, a recent proposal by the Nordic countries to include shipping restrictions under the proposed GATT Services Code has sparked hope of abolishing this costly burden on American consumers. (The Bush administration, the world's premier free-trade theoreticians, opposes the Nordic proposal).

Shipping has long been one of America's leakiest industries. In the year the Jones Act was enacted, it cost twice as much to build a ship in the U.S. as in Britain. By 1959, American shipping costs were seven times higher than some competitors'. The Congressional Budget Office reported in 1984 that American shipyards charged three times the price of Japanese and Korean yards and were slower in delivery. Naturally, the less competitive a U.S. industry, the more vigilant Congress is to dragoon customers for it.

Since Congress has given U.S.-flag ships a captive market, congressmen feel entitled to force American shippers to hire American workers, and strong unions guarantee exorbitant salaries. U.S. ship crews cost six times more than Third World crews; American shipmasters routinely cost shipping companies $300,000 at year. The high pay breeds corruption: An FBI sting operation recently discovered that shipping jobs are illegally being sold by one maritime union.

A recent U.S. International Trade Commission study concluded that abolishing the Jones Act would save consumers as much as $10.5 billion as a result of lower shipping costs, while U.S. maritime operators would lose only $630 million in profits. Thus, the Jones Act could be costing consumers $17 for every $1 of domestic shippers' profits. Federal Maritime Commissioner Rob Quartel, who is championing the repeal of the Jones Act, estimates that the total savings from repeal could actually be $20 billion or more, as the ITC estimate did not include the costs of shipping restrictions on Great Lakes trade, forgone tax revenue, indirect effects on smaller industries, etc.

The Jones Act, by making water-borne transport far more expensive than it otherwise would be, partially nullifies the benefits of the Panama Canal for transporting goods from coast to coast. This makes it more difficult for Pennsylvania steel producers to compete against Japanese steel in California, or for West Coast lumber to compete with Canadian products in the eastern U.S. The ITC estimated that Jones Act restrictions destroyed over 2,000 jobs in agriculture, forestry, mining, and other industries.

Sean Connaughton of the American Petroleum Institute notes, "We are seeing more and more oil imports in the Northeast, and imports have driven out a lot of the previous coastwise oil trade from the Gulf Coast. The Jones Act is a very significant factor in this." U.S. oil shippers cannot compete with foreign tankers with far lower operating costs. According to the General Accounting Office, the Jones Act restrictions on oil shipping helped cause a serious shortage of heating fuels on the East Coast during a severe cold snap in December 1989.

Americans also have minimal opportunities to travel domestically on passenger ships, largely because of the Passenger Services Act of 1886, a Jones Act equivalent for the passenger cruise industry. In a free market, foreign cruise ships would offer pleasure trips from New York to Baltimore, Savannah, and Miami, and from San Diego to San Francisco. But cruise ships are prohibitively expensive because of federal buy-American and crew-American mandates. Seattle is especially victimized, as each year, hundreds of thousands of tourists fly to Seattle for cruises to Alaska—but then cross over to Vancouver, Canada, in order to catch the cruise ships. Mark Sullivan of the Port of Seattle estimates that the restrictions cost Seattle a minimum of $30 million a year in lost tourist business.

Shipping protectionism has been extended to dozens of types of boats over the years, including Hovercraft, sewer sludge carriers, and dredging ships. The Customs Service has even banned whitewater tour companies from using foreign-made inflatable rubber rafts on American rivers.

The Jones Act is often defended as providing a reserve fleet for military emergencies. But Commissioner Quartel notes that of the 400 ships used in Desert Shield by the Military Sealift Command, only one ship subsidized by the Jones Act was used. (Jones Act ships tend to be too old or of the wrong type to aid a war effort).

The Jones Act is supposed to stimulate U.S. shipbuilding. But, as New York shipping consultant Michael McCarthy observes, "There is only one commercial ship being built in the United States today—a fairly small container ship, at about twice the price of what it would cost to build abroad." Thomas Crowley, chairman of Crowley Maritime Corp., believes that the performance of American shipyards has been ruined largely by their reliance on government contracts: "Any shipyard that does Navy work isn't worth a damn for commercial work."

Though the Bush administration is demanding that foreign governments end their shipbuilding subsidies, it refuses to recognize the implicit subsidy the Jones Act provides to U.S. shipyards. Deputy U.S. Trade Representative Linn Williams declared last February that the act does not amount to a "hill of beans in terms of subsidies" and is a "commercially meaningless program" because so few commercial ships have been built in the U.S. in recent years. But, as the American Petroleum Institute's Mr. Connaughton observes, "That's kind of like saying that because we have destroyed an industry, let's make sure it never rises again."

The Jones Act engenders a chain reaction of extortion—allowing American shipyards to charge stratospheric prices to American ship buyers, allowing American-flag ships to charge shakedown shipping rates to American businesses, and allowing American congressmen to demand lavish campaign contributions from the American maritime industry (more than $1 million a year).

U.S. maritime lobbies have been so generous that three of the past five chairmen of the House Merchant Marine Subcommittee have been indicted for criminal links to the maritime industry, as Congressional Quarterly reported. (A fourth chairman was indicted for other reasons.) Former Rep. Thomas Ashley declared that the House Merchant Marine Committee "sucks from the taxpayer; it sucks from anything that isn't nailed down."

While the Jones Act fleet is relatively small and old, there are 300 U.S.-owned ships flying foreign flags. If Congress actually wanted a large U.S.-flag fleet, it could easily create one almost overnight by abolishing the build-American and crew-American requirements on U.S. owners of foreign-flagged vessels who might otherwise choose to fly the Stars and Stripes. But Congress is more interested in perpetuating maritime campaign contributions—and those contributions can be garnered only by federal policies that continue sabotaging U.S. maritime competitiveness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On this vote, the yeas are 29, the nays are 61. Three-fifths of the Senators duly chosen and sworn not having voted in the affirmative, the motion is rejected.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote.

Mr. HOLLINGS. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I cannot hear the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

The Chair is prepared to rule on the amendment.

The amendment of the Senator from Iowa contains nonbinding language outside the jurisdiction of the Budget Committee and it is, therefore, not germane to the budget resolution.

The point of order is sustained. The amendment falls.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, before yielding to the majority leader and going to the final adoption mode of this resolution, I want to tell my colleagues that the underlying resolution is the House budget resolution. If this resolution that we are going to vote on here in just a few moments fails, then we are back on the House budget resolution and another 50 hours to dispose of it.

So I hope all of our colleagues will understand that when they cast their vote.

Mr. MITCHELL addressed the Chair. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, we have devoted so much time and effort and energy to this process that it is easy to lose sight of the fact that the budget resolution is not a statute. What we are voting on does not and cannot become law. It is a procedure by which we are enabled to move to enacting law.

The only binding things in this resolution are the aggregate numbers and the allocation to committees. Let us not lose sight of that. We have to pass this resolution. If we do not, we are right back here. We are going to stay here until we pass a resolution because we cannot proceed to enact laws unless we pass a budget resolution that enables us to move to that next step under our procedures.

So I encourage all Senators to join us in supporting this resolution to permit us to proceed and to permit Senators to leave for the forthcoming Easter recess.

If this does not pass, we are not going anywhere.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I just wanted to say to everyone, I do not think you really would want to put up with me for 50 more hours. And, frankly, I would not want to put up with you either. But I think we have a responsibility here to pass this. It is more on the majority to pass the budget resolution but, without going into detail, a lot of this has things in it that we on this side want. In fact to be honest about it, we, but for a few things here and there that are hard to find, it is kind of, our resolution. But we are going to make sure we wait around to see how many on the other side vote for it.

I yield to the leader.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I just make one quick point. The majority leader has already said we are going to stay here if it does not pass, so I would not get in too big a hurry to line up there.

In any event, it does maintain the discipline. We are still living by the caps. There are no new taxes. We protect Social Security—the Bentsen amendment. There are a lot of good things in this budget resolution. And a lot of things none of us like. Some of us do not like the defense numbers; others of us do. We do not like the numbers. But in the final analysis we need the discipline. We need to move on to the appropriations process. The distinguished Senator from West Virginia and the Senator from Oregon want to do that. So I urge my colleagues on this side to vote for the budget resolution.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I would like to make one announcement. Immediately after disposition of this resolution I am going to propound a unanimous-consent request to deal with the handling of the so-called coin legislation, which I hope to get to when we return—the coin legislation. Any Senator who has an interest in that should remain because we are going to set up a procedure—we are going to try to get an agreement to set up a procedure for moving to and disposing of that legislation.

Mr. CONRAD. Mr. President, I wish to be recorded as voting no on final adoption of Senate Concurrent Resolution 106, the fiscal year 1993 budget resolution. It is time to address the fiscal crisis facing this Nation. This resolution does not do enough to reduce the deficit, nor does it make the policy decisions necessary to address our changing world. It does not acknowledge that the cold war is over and the Soviet Union no longer exists. We must tell our allies that we can no longer pay their bills. We must move beyond burden sharing to burden shedding. The Senate budget resolution does not do enough to make our country more productive by investing sufficiently in education and training, technology and infrastructure. We must come out of our partisan political trenches and make the decisions necessary to set this Nation on the right track.

Mr. KERREY. Mr. President, I oppose the pending budget resolution.

I believe that our defense reductions can be larger than those in the pending resolution. I believe we can and must rearrange our domestic spending priorities and I believe we must deal effectively with the deficit. I do not see this in the pending resolution.

The resolution before us reflects the priorities of the cold war. It says that we will stay with the spending priorities included in the 1990 budget agreement, negotiated before many of the recent dramatic changes in the world had unfolded, and recommending spending allocations that reflect the needs of a cold war economy.

I agree with those who contend that the world is still not a safe place. I agree that new threats require new contingencies. I agree that changes in Eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union are fragile; that they contain the seeds of historic failure as well as the seeds of historic change. But, I would also argue that the threat has changed in such a way that to return to the previous status quo is simply unrealistic.

The resolution before us says that we will continue spending for a defense program based on the threat of the cold war rather than the altered threat we now face. I was happy to support the amendment of the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. EXON] which would reduce defense spending by $8.8 billion below the President's figure and allocate the savings to deficit reduction. I was disappointed that his amendment, a better response to our changed defense needs, did not pass.

The resolution before us says that we will stay within the 1990 budget agreement's domestic spending limits despite a number of pressing human and physical needs in our country. It says nothing new about the child born into poverty, the drugs and gangs on our streets, our lagging manufacturing base, the thousands of middle-aged Americans who face increasing job insecurity and our young people whose economic futures are so bleak and uncertain. I was also disappointed that Senator BRADLEY's amendment reducing defense spending and allocating the savings to high priority domestic programs and deficit reduction did not prevail. It offered us the opportunity to look beyond the upcoming fiscal year, to plan on a longer term basis and to address both the need for deficit reduction and increased domestic needs.

The resolution before us says that we will live with continuing soaring budget deficits. It projects the second highest deficit in history, second only to this year's record deficit, currently projected in the area of $400 billion.

However, it is important to point out that this resolution has as its starting point the President's fiscal year 1993 budget recommendations. As the chairman of the Finance Committee, Senator BENTSEN, pointed out in an excellent oped piece in the April 5 Washington Post, making a significant dent in the deficit requires leadership from the White House—and we're not getting that leadership. I share that view and would add that the lack of leadership hinders our ability to restructure our economy and reset our domestic priorities to meet the requirements of the next century and the needs of our children and grandchildren.

The bottom line for me is that this budget resolution, designed as it perhaps must be for passage, is budgeting as usual.

It is budgeting as usual when the map of Europe has been redrawn. It is budgeting of $280 billion of our resources for threats which have dramatically changed.

It is budgeting as usual when 7.3 percent of our work force—some 9.2 million Americans—remain unemployed. It is budgeting as usual when 3.2 million of those people have been unemployed longer than 15 weeks and when two out of three Americans are worried about job security. It is budgeting as usual when we need growth and conversion plans, increased research and development and additional attention to critical and emerging technologies, new processes and applications. It is budgeting as usual when we continue to fail to fully fund Head Start and other human resource programs which represent investments contributing to great productivity in the future.

It is budgeting as usual when our Federal debt stands at $3.7 trillion. If that were handled as a 30-year mortgage, it means that every family of four in this country would have a monthly payment of $505 for the next 30 years. It means that I can hand my children and every other American in the work force a debt of $84,000 when they graduate from college. It means, as we have seen, that our ability to respond to economic slowdowns and other difficulties is severely limited, perhaps more limited than at any time in our history.

The immediate task is to move this year's budget process along. But, the resolution does not serve us well. The resolution does not force us to look at our economy and to determine how to maximize economic growth in our country. It does not force us to come to grips with the escalating cost of health care entitlements, the fastest growing portion of the Federal budget. It does not force us to deal with our lagging competitiveness, our low productivity and their impact on our standard of living.

I know that the chairman of the Senate Budget Committee labored long and hard to develop a resolution. Early this year, he and the chairman of the Joint Economic Committee held hearings on the state of the U.S. economy. He then worked to develop a realistic response to the testimony received. He has been thwarted on several fronts, both in committee and on the Senate floor.

I regret that I cannot support the resolution because I understand the need to advance the budget/appropriations process. It is April and we need to get our work done.

But, I believe we need a new agenda. We need an agenda based on new world order and new economic realities. We need an understanding of where we are and where we must go. And, we need tax, budget and fiscal policies which will take us there.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, during the course of this week, we have debated and decided on measures to limit increases in the deficit between what we will spend and what we will raise to pay for it. We even were fortunate enough to pass a resolution calling for a vote-certain this year on a constitutional amendment requiring a balanced budget.

But none of these votes will do as much as simply withholding my vote for the $1.208 trillion 5-year budget deficit increase in this budget resolution. So I will vote no and urge my colleagues to do the same.

This is a budget that stands for doing business-as-usual in America. It is a budget that tells the American people that everything is fine in Washington; we will continue to take money from your children and your grandchildren to pay for our current consumption.

All a Member of this body has to do is look at the revenue and spending numbers projected for the next 5 years and you will see why the American public is so angry with their Government.

Under this budget, in 1993 we will spend $1.5 trillion. In 1994, we will spend $1.526 trillion. In 1995, $1.539 trillion. In 1996, $1.598 trillion. And in 1997, $1.722 trillion. That's $7.88 trillion that we will spend over the next 5 years.

But Mr. President, there's one thing missing from this budget. And that is the revenue to pay for this spending. This budget represents a promise that cannot be fulfilled without borrowing from our children. For this budget is $1.208 trillion short of revenue. In other words, this budget guarantees that we will add $1.208 trillion to the $4 trillion national debt.

Under this budget, by 1997, net interest paid on the national debt—after deducting all trust fund interest income of more than $100 billion—will be nearly identical to what is projected to be spent on national defense—$280 billion. From what I know from my 14 years in the Senate, the spending projections in this budget are too low, and the revenue projections are too high. The end result is that by 1997, if we maintain this course, the debt will not be $1.2 trillion higher, but $2 trillion higher. And net interest payments will be over $300 billion.

Mr. President, we cannot maintain this course any longer without bankrupting our Nation. We are being consumed by debt and deficits. Interest payments and debt are strangling our capability to govern and meet the challenges of the 21st century. And if we are ever going to do anything that will reverse this course, we must look at all government spending including spending entitlements and tax entitlements.

In 1960, we spent $92 billion for the entire Federal Government; 52 percent of the 1960 budget was devoted to national defense; 8 percent went to pay interest; and 26 percent of that budget was mandatory entitlement spending. The remainder of Federal spending, 20 percent, was domestic discretionary spending.

Where are we today—33 years later? We're spending 1,600 percent more money under this budget—$1.5 trillion. And where is Federal spending going? Fifty-one percent is for mandatory entitlement spending. Fourteen percent is for interest. Defense and foreign affairs makes up only 20 percent. And domestic discretionary spending is down to 15 percent.

In other words, Mr. President, in the budget we have before us today, 65 cents of every dollar of Federal spending is for entitlements and interest. Put another way, what the Federal Government is fast becoming is an income transfer program that merely sends out checks to pay for services and loans.

Earlier today, we debated a bipartisan amendment offered by the distinguished ranking member of the Budget Committee, Senator DOMENICI and the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, Senator NUNN. That amendment would have capped all of the entitlement programs in this budget with the exception of Social Security.

An across-the-board cut in entitlements does not provide a rational way to achieve programmatic reform. Each of the entitlement programs that would have been capped—Medicare, Medicaid, unemployment compensation, food stamps, AFDC, veterans benefits, agriculture, Federal retirement—need to be closely examined to determine how they can be streamlined and reformed.

In many senses, it would be unfair to cut all of these programs because each of them is not an equal contributor to the problem of Federal spending. Growth in the Federal retirement programs was 6.7 percent a year between 1980 and 1992. Growth in veterans benefits was 2.5 percent. Growth in AFDC was 6.3 percent. By contrast, growth in Medicaid was 15 percent annually during this period and 11.8 percent in Medicare.

Each of these programs needs fundamental reform. An across-the-board approach merely pits one group against the other and in the end, those with the greatest political clout will retain their special benefits while those without a political voice—the poor and children will be left behind.

More importantly, Mr. President, what is lost in the debate about entitlements is that another type of entitlement—tax entitlements are never addressed. What I am referring to are the subsidies we provide through the Tax Code for all types of activities. In 1992, we are providing a $39 billion non-needs-related subsidy to home owners—that's 300 percent more than we spent to subsidize owner-occupied housing in 1980. We've seen an 1,100 percent increase in the subsidy we provide home owners who sell their houses and pay no tax on the gain because they move into a more expensive home.

Mr. President, in 1992, we will provide $108 billion in non-needs-related tax subsidies to individuals and corporations for health insurance. And, if we don't do anything about that entitlement, by 1995, the tax subsidy under health insurance will reach $146 billion in just 1 year, as much as we will spend on the entire Medicaid Program.

Mr. President, many of us are unwilling to stand up and say what we are willing to change; what programs we are willing to slow the growth in; what revenues we are willing to raise. So we come to the point where we are forced to propose across-the-board percentage reductions in the growth of out-of-control programs. We are left with no other voice.

Had the Domenici-Nunn amendment become law, this Congress, and this President would be forced to reform not the budget process, but the value systems that prevent us from voting the courage of convictions.

I commend Senators DOMENICI and NUNN for their leadership in this body. Unfortunately, what we learned earlier today is that we choose to ignore such leaders because the voices of organized constituencies are so much louder.

We could have taken a first step toward gaining control over this country's fiscal future. We could have resolved to give our children a promise of a better future unsaddled by the weight of our debts. But we were outmaneuvered. We were placed in the position of appearing to vote for or against one of the most important groups in our country—veterans. Men and women who have sacrificed for the greater interests of our country.

Mr. President, the veterans of our country, the elderly, the truly needy, the middle class, all of us know that we cannot maintain an economically secure future if we continue to ignore the $4 trillion debt.

My vote earlier today was not a vote against veterans, as some will suggest, but a vote for fiscal sanity. My vote was a vote for veterans because unless we gain control over Federal spending, in less than 10 years there will no longer be money available to provide adequate and decent health and long-term care coverage for our Nation's veterans.

We took a first step today, Mr. President. I, and my 27 colleagues who voted to begin to control entitlements, did not lose. Today America lost. We lost the chance to make a difference and do the right thing.

But for as long as this Senator represents the people of Minnesota, I will continue to vote for those measures that restore fiscal balance to our country.

Measured against that test, Mr. President, I will vote against this budget resolution. It does not address the cancer that is eroding the soul of our Nation. It does nothing to restrain spending. It does nothing to restrain borrowing. It does nothing to change this Nation's direction.

I can no longer go on with business as usual and ask my children and grandchildren to pay for fiscal irresponsibility.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, today we are determining the spending priorities of Congress for the next fiscal year. The budget before us, however, is based on the flawed spending path that we set ourselves on when Congress passed the budget agreement of 1990. This agreement constrains every fiscal policy decision we will make this year, and in future years, through 1995.

The stated goal of the budget agreement was to reduce the deficit by almost $500 billion over 5 years by increasing taxes by $160 billion, cutting projected spending growth by $281 billion, and reducing by $68 billion the net interest expended due to lower deficit financing. The deficit for fiscal year 1993, under the projections made at the time of the budget agreement, was supposed to be $236 billion. The budget before us, however, projects the deficit for fiscal year 1993 to be $327.4 billion. What happened, Mr. President? Why did it not work?

In theory, a good way to control runaway spending is to put a cap on it. However, the spending cuts contained in the budget agreement were just an illusion. The cuts were based on a baseline that was considerably higher than any previously projected spending path, so much higher that even after the so-called spending cuts, Congress essentially gave itself a $27 billion gift and Mr. President, we wasted no time in spending it. This and new automatic adjustments to the spending caps for economic and technical considerations have made the caps ineffective and virtually meaningless. Although the budget resolution before us today would set spending at levels below these escalating caps, it cannot be said to control future spending.

Mr. President, in terms of its stated goal of deficit reduction, the budget agreement of 1990 has been a total failure. Under the agreement, the deficit was to be reduced by $42.5 billion in fiscal year 1991. Instead, we saw the total deficit grow from $220 billion in fiscal year 1990 to $269 billion in fiscal year 1991, and an estimated $399 billion in fiscal year 1992 and an estimated $327.4 billion for fiscal year 1993. It is tragic that in the President's budget proposal for fiscal year 1991, prior to the 1990 budget agreement, a surplus of $5.7 billion was projected for fiscal year 1993.

The spending restraint promised by the agreement never appeared, and over the first 2 fiscal years since its enactment, Federal outlays have grown by 18 percent. Spending growth ate up all of the taxes raised by that agreement, and more besides. This budget agreement was just a green light for Congress to continue its tax and spend policies of the past.

Despite all its promises, the budget agreement has allowed Congress to engage in tax-and-spend business as usual. The $160 billion in new taxes that we passed in 1990 were justified as necessary bitter medicine to reduce the budget deficit. We were told that if we bite the bullet now with these new taxes, we would later yield the benefit of a lower deficit. Unfortunately, Mr. President, this turned out to be an empty promise. Congress has a tendency to spend additional taxes rather than devote them to deficit reduction and this tendency is at an all-time high. The historic correlation proves that since 1947, every $1 in new taxes results in $1.59 in new spending. This figure is even higher if you look only at the time frame from the 1990 budget agreement until now. True to form, Congress actually accelerated Federal spending after the 1990 tax increases were enacted, and budget deficits have hit record levels.

Mr. President, this problem is only exacerbated by the adverse effects that these new taxes have had on the economy and on Federal revenues. The total tax revenue expected following the budget agreement of 1990 has not met projections and was, in fact, down by $83.3 billion for the first year alone. This trend has continued beyond the first year of the budget agreement, with fiscal year 1992 tax revenues estimated to be $145.2 billion lower than projections. The cumulative amount of this revenue loss is expected to be an astounding $630.4 billion through fiscal year 1995. Part of the blame for this is the static forecasting method utilized in projecting expected tax revenues. This method ignores the fact that higher taxes often lead to lower levels of employment or growth which would in turn change the baseline conditions. The drop in revenues can also be blamed on the recession, a recession Congress helped create by raising taxes and constricting economic growth. When coupling lower revenues with the spending increases of Congress, we can see how the deficit has grown to its present size.

The fastest growing portion of the Federal budget is that of entitlement or mandatory spending. Mandatory spending—excluding interest—had grown to nearly 45 percent of Federal Government spending in 1991. If you add interest costs, mandatory spending accounted for nearly 65 percent of the budget. This is not acceptable. Mandatory spending grew at a rate of 23.9 percent in 1992, more than twice the rate of domestic discretionary spending growth, and 10 times the rate of growth of international spending.

Over the past 25 years, entitlement programs have roughly doubled in size relative to GNP, and now comprise approximately 11 percent of GNP. These programs are projected to grow at an average of 7.2 percent over each of the next 5 years, comprising 59 percent of the budget in fiscal year 1996.

Mandatory spending is often considered the portion of the Federal budget that is uncontrollable because Congress has chosen to provide continuing funding for these types of activities outside of the normal appropriations process. Once a program is an entitlement, Congress seems to consider itself off the hook with respect to controlling expenditures and spending grows unchecked. This must be stopped.

We must gain some control over the tax and spend habits of Congress and the unbridled growth of mandatory spending. The deficit is becoming a millstone around the neck of this legislative body—it is impeding our ability to pass legislation that would spur the economy, increase our saving rate, ease the tax burden on American families, and improve American competitiveness in a global economy. Controlling spending growth must be our No. 1 priority. We have already proved that increasing taxes is not an effective way to lower the deficit.

Mr. President, 2 short years ago this Nation stood at a crossroads as to how to handle the deficit. Under the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings law, we were facing a deficit target of $64 billion for fiscal year 1991. If we did not meet this target, we would face a sequester that would automatically cut spending and meet the target for us. The Gramm-Rudman-Hollings law was not perfect. I am the first to admit that the sequester we faced 2 years ago would have been a bitter pill for all of us to swallow. But if we had taken our medicine then, we could have had a balanced budget now. Instead, we took the easy way out. We passed the budget agreement that promised a balanced budget in just a few years, without pain or suffering. I submit, Mr. President, that this was a major mistake, and as a result of this mistake, we have not only delayed the pain, we have made it far worse.

So what are we to do, Mr. President? Delaying the difficult decisions will buy us some time, and possibly some political cover. But every day that we delay in making the difficult decisions of restraining spending will mean the ultimate price we pay will be that much more difficult.

I suggest that there is a solution still available to us. Unfortunately, the budget resolution before us is not it. We need to decide collectively to make the hard choices this year. For several years now, the more conservative Members of this body have sponsored bills to require a balanced budget and legislation to hold the growth of spending to the level of inflation. As we all know, these have been unsuccessful. While this would involve making the hard choices, it would help spread the pain evenly over all spending categories and all constituencies. It is time to pass a balanced budget amendment. If we cannot do this, then let us at least pass a budget resolution that limits all spending, including entitlement spending, to the rate of inflation.

Mr. President, I assert that this is the only way to control the voracious spending appetite of Congress. The people of Utah are demanding action to control spending. The deficit is the number one economic concern in my State. We cannot continue to put off the difficult decisions. It is time to face this problem with courage and determination. I urge my colleagues to make the hard choices necessary and take a strong stand against the deficit and support legislation to provide stringent control over spending.

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, I want to commend what I believe to be the intent of the senior Senator from New Mexico, the senior Senator from Georgia, and the senior Senator from New Hampshire in offering their amendment earlier today.

I am interpreting the intent of those Senators, and others who developed that amendment, to be confronting that portion of the responsibility for the growth in our deficit which is attributable to entitlement programs. I could not agree with them more that we must confront and resolve this problem.

I might not get agreement from them that the Reagan and Bush administrations have an absolutely dismal record in confronting the real cause of entitlement growth. But it is true. I might receive their agreement that the Congress has quite apparently not successfully stepped in to fill the leadership gap at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue.

Mr. President, I am persuaded that time has run out on the absence of fiscal discipline evidence by our Government. Two Presidents, for 12 years, have delayed and procrastinated, and pandered the American people—and the Congress—to the point that we now are seeing deficits of $400 billion a year. The national debt is projected to hit $7 trillion within 5 years. It is self-evident that the Congress has not on its own accord demonstrated the courage, leadership, and vision to solve this problem.

There has been a great deal of discussion about the fear of many Americans today that the next generation of Americans is going to have a lower standard of living than its predecessor—that our children will not be able to enjoy a standard of living that we, their parents, have enjoyed. Mr. President, the unwillingness of the Reagan and Bush administrations to effectively lead this Government to a solution of the wildly mounting deficit problem, and the acquiescence of this Congress to that failure of leadership, is contributing more to the likelihood this fear is real than any other single ingredient.

We are borrowing our children's way to the poorhouse. We are borrowing from their future—at a dizzying rate.

Within only another year or two, according to current projections, service of the national debt—the interest the Government must pay for the multiple trillions of dollars it has borrowed—will pass the entire budget for national defense and security, and become the second largest expenditure in the Federal Government's annual budget.

And what do the Nation's taxpayers get for that? What can our children expect to get for those tax dollars that increasingly go to debt service? Not a damn thing, Mr. President. Nothing.

At a time when we have more families living below the poverty level than at any time in the last 20 years, we get nothing for this annual expenditure that will pass $300 billion a year next year, and is expected to pass $350 billion by 1995. At a time when our highways and bridges and railroads and public buildings are crumbling, we are spending—we have no choice but to spend—$300 billion for debt service.

At a time when the Republics of the former Soviet Union and its former Warsaw Pact allies in Eastern Europe are struggling to convert themselves into democracies and free market economies—which, if successful, could make our world a far, far safer place for all of us to live—we are hamstrung in our efforts to help them. Aiding them in their transitions is profoundly in the best interests of our Nation and the American people, and yet we cannot respond satisfactorily because we are spending over $350 billion a year for debt service.

At a time when our economy is suffering from a long and persistent recession, we find ourselves incapable of providing real assistance—because we have spent our Nation into catastrophic debt.

We cannot go back and undo what we have already done, Mr. President. We have no real choice but to service the debt we have incurred, until we can pay it off. But we absolutely must halt it from growing further.

To the extent this was the objective of those who offered the Domenici-Rudman-Nunn amendment, I believe they have the correct general goal in mind.

But the amendment, and the logic behind it were flawed.

They were not flawed per se, Mr. President, just because they are addressing entitlement programs. But the amendment advocated and contemplated imposing artificial caps on entitlement programs which are not the cause of the tremendous growth in the cost of the entitlement portion of the budget. Worse yet, the amendment would have artificially constrained the ability of some of those programs to provide the minimal safety net for the most disadvantaged among us: child nutrition programs; foster care and adoption assistance; aid for the aged, blind, and disabled impoverished; food stamps for the lowest income 10 percent of our national population; and others.

Mr. President, the dramatic—frightening—increases in health care costs, which are primarily reflected in two entitlement programs, Medicare and Medicaid, are the chief culprits in the rapid growth of entitlement spending.

But the amendment treated Medicare and Medicaid—where far and away the greatest growth in expenditures is occurring—precisely the same as it treated such programs as foster care and adoption and child nutrition, where little growth is occurring.

So, Mr. President, regardless of the good intentions of the sponsors of this amendment, their amendment was fatally flawed. I am relieved they chose to withdraw it.

We must address the deficit problem, Mr. President. One component of our response must be to gain control over entitlement program growth. But it is absolutely essential that we do so fairly and effectively, and the Domenici-Rudman-Nunn amendment was neither.

As others have said previously, the single most important step we must take to control entitlement growth is to reform our health care and medical care financing systems. Despite repeated promises and claims, President Bush has yet to send legislation to do this to the Congress, and there is none in sight. While Presidential leadership on this issue is badly needed, Democrats in the Senate are prepared to begin this debate without him if he insists on absenting himself and shirking his responsibility in this respect. It is through this route that we can and should—fairly—gain control over health care costs and, thusly, over what is unquestionably the most significant contributor to entitlement growth.

We must get serious about the deficit. We must make tough choices. But our responsibility to this Nation does not stop there by any means. What we must do, we must do fairly. We must protect those who cannot protect themselves. And we surely must assure that the tough medicine we prescribe—and let there be no doubt about it, the only way to treat the deficit is with tough medicine—is designed to cure the illness and not just spread misery wantonly.

Let me go on to say, Mr. President, that I will oppose final passage of the budget resolution.

It is, sadly, just another business-as-usual budget at a time when circumstances in this world, in our nation, and in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts cry for something much more.

On amendments considered yesterday and the day before—real amendments that made real adjustments in dollar amounts, unlike the Domenici amendment—repeatedly a majority, primarily on the other side of the aisle, was unwilling to recognize the desperate need of our communities and cities, the grave need for investment in our future. The majority was unwilling to recognize the fact that our world has changed miraculously in the past 3 years and it is not only possible but necessary, while preserving a fully sufficient defense to ensure our national security, to reduce defense spending and apply the savings to deficit reduction or to pressing domestic needs.

As I said earlier in my remarks, I judge the deficit and debt situation to be critical. We are past the point of being able to just muddle along. We are now expropriating and cavalierly spending the savings of our grandchildren. This has got to stop. We are crying for leadership from a President who seems incapable of deciding what he believes, what he stands for, or what is important to the Nation.

This budget almost certainly will become the Congress' measure for budgetary action for 1993. I can only hope and struggle to assure that next January there will be an occupant in the White House who will provide courageous, realistic leadership to begin eliminating the deficit and facing up to our long-ignored national responsibilities. And, of course, I will struggle to have the Congress come to grips with the totality of this monumental problem whether or not the President provides leadership.

The chairman and members of the Budget Committee labored diligently, and in good faith, to produce this budget and bring it to the floor. They were forced to labor within the constraints of the so-called Andrews Air Force Base summit agreement, which was enacted into law last year. I opposed that agreement at the time. It has become even more out of touch with reality—and even less responsive to the real needs of this Nation—than it was then.

I sympathize with the committee. I sympathize with the conscientious and long-suffering chairman of the committee, the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SASSER], who is managing this bill. His efforts are earnest, but the burdens he has been forced to carry are too great.

I cannot in good conscience, and will not, vote for this budget which falls so far short of any reasonable mark. I profoundly hope for—and will diligently work toward—a budget for 1994 that does correctly identify and set about to meet the pressing needs of this Nation and its citizens.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, the budget is an encapsulation of our Nation's vision of the future. I am afraid this year, stalemate is all the eye can see on the horizon.

On the one hand, our Nation has pressing needs. After 12 years of ignoring the homefront at the instigation of the Reagan and Bush administrations, we need to invest in America's future.

We need to invest, for example, in our Nation's crumbling cities. The unlimited potential of millions of Americans continues to be held hostage by the poverty, violence, and despair found throughout our Nation's urban areas. It is ludicrous to think we can compete internationally when the talents of these Americans go untapped.

We need to invest in education. We will certainly not be able to compete so long as high school graduates can't read a newspaper, write a grammatically correct sentence, or solve a basic algebra problem.

We need to invest in our children. One in five lives in poverty today in America, and that is completely unacceptable. We must give all children the opportunity to unlock their potential, unconstrained by economic deprivation.

We need to ensure that the American dream is attainable. If Americans can no longer afford to buy a home or send their kids to college, we are at risk of losing something that is unique about America.

But it is hard to invest in America when the cupboard is bare. The Federal Government is flat broke, and we cannot afford to pile more debt on the shoulders of our posterity.

Mr. President, the budget resolution before us today makes the best of a bad situation. It freezes most outlays for domestic discretionary spending at 1992 levels. It does achieve some deficit reduction through Government downsizing and through elimination of waste, fraud, and abuse.

On the defense side of the ledger, the budget resolution continues the spending reductions of the past 5 years. Between 1985 and 1992, defense expenditures in real dollars have declined by 25 percent, and the figure included in the resolution for 1993 is 5 percent below the level necessary to keep pace with inflation.

Mr. President, some proposed further cuts in next year's defense budget. I opposed those proposals, however, because I believed that further cuts would jeopardize our national security.

We must not kid ourselves into believing that everyone suddenly loves America now that the Soviet Union has fallen apart. With regional instability throughout the globe, and the continuing proliferation of nuclear weapons, the world is still a dangerous place.

Deeper cuts could also harm our defense industrial base. After past conflicts, we have all too often followed a feast-or-famine approach to our defense industrial base. In the future, it will be our technological advantages that give us a military advantage, and so shutting down critical industries would be unilateral disarmament of the worst sort.

We must also remember that we are in a recession. At such a time, it makes little sense to add to the problem by throwing thousands of defense workers and GIs onto the unemployment rolls.

For all of these reasons, cuts in the military budget below the level incorporated in the resolution would be unwise.

Mr. President, we would not be facing the current budget stalemate if we had more leadership from the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue. The President cannot avoid his share of responsibility for the deficit. The plain truth is that neither President Bush or his predecessor have once submitted a balanced budget to Congress.

They have talked a lot about gimmicks like line item vetoes, but when it really came time to make tough choices, they punted. They have continued to tell the American people they can have it all without paying for it. As Paul Tsongas might say, they have tried to play Santa Claus the whole year round.

And then, when it comes to addressing our pressing domestic needs, President Bush's only plan has been to use his veto plan. He vetoed the tax bill, which included almost all of what he wanted. He would have vetoed the anti-crime bill, which was a tough law and order bill. Instead of leading by negotiating compromises that move our Nation forward, he chooses to nyet and nay-say and contribute to the stalemate.

Mr. President, I hope that next year when we consider a budget resolution on the Senate floor, we will see more leadership from the Executive branch, whether it is headed by a Democrat or a Republican. I hope the President will send us a balanced budget and work to make the tough choices that must be made. I hope the President will sit down with Congress and negotiate solutions to our Nation's domestic problems.

But again, there is certainly no leadership coming from downtown at the moment. And that makes passage of the budget resolution before us today more of an achievement than it otherwise would be. It makes the best of a bad situation, and I urge my colleagues to join with me in supporting its passage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I yield back all time on the resolution.

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield back all time on the resolution.

COMMENDATION OF SENATORS

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I want to thank my colleagues for their assistance during the course of the pendency of this resolution, particularly the majority leader, Mr. MITCHELL, for his help and support; also the support given by the distinguished Senator from Maryland [Mr. SARBANES], at some very critical times during the course of the consideration; also the support and the counsel given by the distinguished President pro tempore during the pendency of this budget resolution here this afternoon.

COMMENDATION OF STAFF

I also want to express my appreciation to the majority staff of the U.S. Senate, the very able staff director, Mr. Larry Stein; Dr. John Callahan, deputy staff director of the Budget Committee; Bill Dauster, our general counsel; Kathy Deignan, who was extraordinarily helpful to us in a number of areas, one of our senior analysts; Randy DeValck, our senior analyst on military affairs; Chuck Marr, the chief economist of the Senate Budget Committee; and Sue Nelson.

Without their support, and their untiring efforts, Mr. President, we would have been unable to bring this resolution to a successful conclusion here this afternoon.

I yield the floor.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I want to add to that list of persons the distinguished chairman of the Budget Committee, Senator SASSER, whose skill, perseverance, patience, and determination are more than anything responsible for the Senate having acted to complete action on the resolution today. I thank Senator SASSER very much, for it has been a very difficult period.

COMMENDATION OF SENATORS

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I want to add my compliments and my thanks to those that have been expressed by others with regard to the good work that has been done by the two managers of the budget resolution, Senator SASSER and Senator DOMENICI. These are two of the brightest Senators in this body. They are highly dedicated, very hard-working, and the product of which they have brought to fruition today is a demonstration of their skill and their devotion to duty.

We on the Appropriations Committee will, as soon as the conference is completed on the budget resolution, do our work as expeditiously as possible on the various appropriations bills.

Mr. President, I do not want to un-duly hold the Senate but I see the two Senators are about to conduct some morning business. I will just impose on the Senate a couple of minutes.

A MEMORIAL

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, one characteristic among the many that distinguish our species from others is Memory.

Not by instinct do we celebrate the Fourth of July, Christmas, Yom Kippur, or the other days of our cultural calendars.

No, we celebrate those days because of memories that we want to keep alive and because of memories that define who we are and who we want to be and become.

But Memory serves perhaps no greater role in our lives than as a means of renewing and revitalizing our relationship to those nearest to our hearts whom we have lost.

Anyone who has lost someone beloved knows the experience of which I speak.

A wife, a husband, a son, a daughter, a unique friend, an incomparable teacher or mentor, a close colleague—how blessed are the memories that we have of those whom we have loved and lost to the often incomprehensible destiny of which we all partake.

Ten years ago this weekend—April 12, 1982—I lost my grandson, Jon Michael Moore, in a tragic accident—an accident whose ultimate purpose I cannot fathom and an accident that cut into my heart more deeply than anything that had befallen me before or that has befallen me since.

Michael was only 17 at the time, and was preparing to set out onto the crest of life with more gifts and talents than most young men of that age are graced.

Then, incomprehensively, Michael's life was cut short.

Once merciful Numbness has lent its service to helping the mourner to bear the unbearable, Memory attends the bereft and, like a guardian angel, stands at hand forever.

Memory can be bittersweet, and tears oftentimes accompany even the brightest recollections of that one who is beyond our sight.

But, in time, memories can become more sweet than painful. And in moments clouded even by unbidden tears, we are moved to give thanks to have been privileged to know and to love—even but for a fraction of our time upon this earth—that one who has gone before us into Eternity to meet God.

So, Mr. President, I share the insights of my heart on the 10th anniversary of the passing of a young man whom Erma and I deeply admired and loved, and in whom we took grandparents' understandable pride—a pride in all that Jon Michael Moore had become in his brief 17 years and a pride in the promise that Michael embodied for the future that was denied to us in his death.

And to those among us who have felt and endured such a loss in their own lives, I leave these words by William F. Floyd—words of which I believe Michael in his own real and youthful faith could proclaim:

My times are in Thy hand;
My God, I wish them there;
My life, my friends, my soul I leave
Entirely to Thy care.

Mr. SYMMS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I am sure that every Member of the Senate, on this sad anniversary, extends their deepest love, respect, admiration, and sympathy to our esteemed President pro tempore and wish him a peaceful two weeks while we are on vacation.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I join in that expression of sentiment and sympathy and high regard for the President pro tempore of the Senate.

LAUDING THE REPUBLICAN STAFF

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I want to pay my thanks to the fine Republican staff under the leadership of Bill Hoagland, and others, for their efforts to bring this Budget Committee forward, and especially to our distinguished ranking member, Senator DOMENICI.

We are often very unhappy with the results of what happens from the Budget Committee, but I say that the Budget Committee does stimulate some of the very best debate that we see in the Senate. I think Senator DOMENICI quite excelled himself and presented an excellent point of view on this side of the aisle, and I pass complements to all of my colleagues, including the chairman of the committee. I offer a special thanks to our fine Republican leader, Senator DOLE, for his efforts in the coordination to help the members of the committee accomplish this task.

Mr. DOLE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Republican leader.

GOOD LUCK TO CINDY MANNUCCI

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I want to take a minute to say a few words about a departing staff member in the Republican Cloakroom. I am talking about Cindy Mannucci, a valued member of one of the hardest working groups in Capitol Hill. As one of the Cloakroom assistants, Cindy is one of the few people who really does know what is going on around here. She works long hours, keeps track of floor action—and inaction—advises Senators and staff on legislation and helps to wade through the mountain of bills, amendments and resolutions we are faced with each session.

Why she would want to give all that up to move to Florida with all that sun and sand, I do not know. But I guess joining her husband and beginning a new career with the Customs Service is a pretty good reason.

I know I speak for a lot of people when I say thanks, Cindy, for all your good work, for making our job easier and good luck to you as you start your new life.

MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that their now be a period for morning business with Senators permitted to speak therein.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONFRONTING THE GLOBAL ECOLOGICAL CRISIS

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, throughout this week I have stood in this Chamber and spoken to what I firmly believe is the most serious problem our Nation and every nation must confront: A global ecological crisis more serious, with more devastating consequences than any other we have ever experienced in humankind's time on Earth.

Earlier this week, the entire Senate debated these issues, voting by an overwhelming and bipartisan margin of 87-11 on a resolution aimed at moving U.S. policy and especially President Bush to recognize the urgency of these issues, the importance of the upcoming Earth Summit in Rio de Janeiro, and the need to move forward on key international negotiations to stop global warming, the loss of forestland and the devastation of record numbers of living species.

It is impossible to state too strongly the importance of the Rio conference. It is equally impossible to protest too loudly the President's stubborn, shortsighted policy that is threatening to undermine this historic meeting. At every opportunity, President Bush and his representatives have thrown up the barricades and blocked progress. At every hint of agreement, the White House has found a reason to disagree.

As a result of the President's intransigence, principally because of U.S. opposition, none of the major negotiations has produced an agreement. There is no agreement on climate change. The biodiversity talks have broken down. The deforestation agreement has been so watered down that Canada, New Zealand, and others have said it is not even worth submitting to their ministers for approval. Agenda 21—which was to be a plan for actions in the 21st century—is unfinished. The only agreement the United States permitted can still be rejected—it is simply a chairman's draft, accepted as a working text and still subject to editing.

I do not today want to repeat my strong opposition to the President's policy. I have made that opposition absolutely clear this week and in many days and speeches that have come before, and I expect, in many days and speeches to follow. Instead, today I want to speak directly to the policies we should be adopting—at the Earth Summit, as a nation and, as a nation among nations.

We must take bold and unequivocal action: We must make the rescue of the environments the central organizing principle for civilization. Whether we realize it or not, we are now engaged in an epic battle to right the balance of our Earth, and the tide of this battle will turn only when the majority of people in the world become sufficiently aroused by a shared sense of urgent danger to join an all-out effort.

There is no doubt that with sufficient agreement on our goals, we can achieve the victory we are seeking. Although very difficult changes in established patterns of thought and action will be required, the task of restoring the natural balance of the Earth's ecological system is both within our capacity and desirable for other reasons—including our interest in social justice, democratic governments, and free market economics. Ultimately, a commitment to healing the environment represents a renewed dedication to what Jefferson believed were not merely American but universal, inalienable rights: life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

Nowhere is that more clearly defined than in the debate around the Earth Summit where the concerns of the developing nations and the developed nations provide such contrast. In fact, we are working for the same goals: For a better quality of life; for a brighter future for our children, for a safe, clean and sustainable environment. There are steps we should be taking at the Earth Summit:

We must reach agreement on a strong and effective climate change convention that, at a minimum, calls for stabilization of carbon dioxide emissions at 1990 levels by the year 2000 and a mechanism to ensure that the parties to the convention will meet regularly to strengthen their commitments in light of new scientific developments—as the Montreal protocol on ozone-depleting chemicals has been strengthened with new scientific evidence.

In addition, in the atmosphere text of agenda 21 that also puts forward measures to address climate change, we need to support, rather than oppose as we have done to date, calls for increased energy efficiency and conservation and for increased reliance and renewable sources of energy.

The opportunity for a legally binding convention on forests has been missed, first, because the United States would not agree that U.S. forests also should be protected and now, because the developing countries feel that a convention could threaten their sovereignty. At a minimum, we need to leave Rio with a strong statement of principles on forests that protects sovereign rights but nonetheless lays the groundwork for a binding convention that will ensure that our forests are protected and that, for those forests that will be developed, they are managed in a truly sustainable manner. If that is going to happen, then the agreement reached cannot simply call for tree plantations to be established, instead, we must preserve native species and ecosystems.

We need to establish a strong and effective mechanism to carry forward the agreements reached at the Earth summit. For example, I have suggested that the United Nations might consider establishing a stewardship council to deal with matters relating to the global environment, just as the Security Council now deals with matters of war and peace. Or, we could establish a tradition of annual environmental summit meetings, similar to the annual economic summits of today, which only rarely find time to consider the environment. Alternatively, an existing U.N. body, such as the U.N. Economic and Social Council could be charged with monitoring success in implementing agenda 21 and carrying forward the principles of the Earth charter. The important point is that we must make sure that we have a mechanism through which heads of government will remain committed to pursuing a path of sustainable economic development.

And finally, heads of nations must commit at the Earth summit to work to improve bilateral and multilateral overseas development practices to ensure that the projects that are funded are truly sustainable. One of the best ways to ensure that this is the case is to increase the transparency of lending practices so that local communities and nongovernmental groups are aware of and have the opportunity to comment on project proposals the United States has been a leader in this regard and it is important for us to achieve a commitment from other world leaders at the Earth summit so they also will call for opening and access in the lending process.

But we must look beyond the Earth summit. Adopting a central organizing principle—one agreed to voluntarily—means embarking on an all-out effort to use every policy and program, every law and institution, every treaty and alliance, every tactic and strategy, every plan and course of action—to use, in short, every means to halt the destruction of the environment and to preserve and nurture our ecological system.

What is needed is a plan—call it a global Marshall plan for the environment—that combines large-scale, long-term, carefully targeted financial aid to developing nations; massive efforts to design and then transfer to poor nations the new technologies needed for sustained economic progress, a worldwide program to stabilize world population and binding commitments by the industrial nations to accelerate their transition to an environmentally responsible pattern of life.

To work, however, any such effort will also require wealthy nations to make a transition that in some ways will be more wrenching than that of the Third World, simply because powerful established patterns will be disrupted. It must emphasize cooperation—in the different regions of the world and globally—while carefully respecting the integrity of individual nation states.

But with the original Marshall plan serving as both a model and an inspiration, we can now begin to chart a course of action. The world's effort to save the environment must be organized around strategic goals that simultaneously represent the most important changes and allow us to recognize, measure, and assess our progress toward making those changes. Each goal must be supported by a set of policies that will enable world civilization to reach it as quickly, efficiently, and justly as possible.

In my view, five strategic goals must direct and inform our efforts to save the global environment.

The first strategic goal should be the stabilizing of world population, with policies designed to create in every nation of the world the conditions necessary for the so-called demographic transition—the historical and well-documented change from a dynamic equilibrium of high birth rates and death rates to a stable equilibrium of low birth rates and death rates. This change has taken place in most of the industrial nations—which have low rates of infant mortality and high rates of literacy and education—and in virtually none of the developing nations—where the reverse is true.

The second strategic goal should be the rapid creation and development of environmentally appropriate technologies—especially in the fields of energy, transportation, agriculture, building construction, and manufacturing—capable of accommodating sustainable economic progress without the concurrent degradation of the environment. These new technologies must then be quickly transferred to all nations—especially those in the Third World, which should be allowed to pay for them by discharging the various obligations they incur as participants in the global Marshall plan.

I have proposed the worldwide development of a Strategic Environment Initiative [SEI] a program that would discourage and phase out older, inappropriate technologies and at the same time develop and disseminate a new generation of sophisticated and environmentally benign substitutes. As soon as possible the SEI should be the subject of intensive international discussions, first among the industrial nations and then between them and the developing world.

The third strategic goal should be a comprehensive and ubiquitous change in the economic rules of the road by which we measure the impact of our decisions on the environment. We must establish—by global agreement—a system of economic accounting that assigns appropriate values to the ecological consequences of both routine choices in the marketplace by individuals and companies and larger, macroeconomic choices by nations. For example, the definition of GNP should be changed to include environmental costs and benefits, and the definition of productivity should be changed to reflect calculations of environmental improvement or decline.

The fourth strategic goal should be the negotiation and approval of a new generation of international agreements that will embody the regulatory frameworks, specific prohibitions, enforcement mechanisms, cooperative planning, sharing arrangements, incentives, penalties, and mutual obligations necessary to make the overall plan a success. These agreements must be especially sensitive to the vast differences of capability and need between developed and undeveloped nations.

The fifth strategic goal should be the establishment of a cooperative plan for educating the world's citizens about our global environment—first by the establishment of a comprehensive program for researching and monitoring the changes now under way in the environment in a manner that involves the people of all nations, especially students; and second, through a massive effort to disseminate information about local, regional, and strategic threats to the environment. The ultimate goal of this effort would be to foster new patterns of thinking about the relations of civilization to the global environment.

Each of these goals is closely related to all the others, and all should be pursued simultaneously within the larger framework of the global Marshall plan. Finally, the plan should have as its more general, integrating goal, the establishment, especially in the developing world—of the social and political considerations most conducive to the emerging of sustainable societies—such as social justice—including equitable patterns of land ownership; a commitment to human rights; adequate nutrition, health care, and shelter; high literacy rates; and greater political freedom, participation, and accountability. Of course, all specific policies should be chosen as part of serving the central organizing of saving the global environment.

When considering a problem as large as the degradation of the global environment, it is easy to feel overwhelmed, utterly helpless to effect any change whatsoever. But we must resist that response because this crisis will be resolved only if individuals take some responsibility for it. By educating ourselves and others, by doing our part to minimize our use and waste of resources, by becoming more active politically and demanding change—in these ways and many others, each one of us can make a difference.

TRIBUTE TO ARTHUR ASHE

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I rise today to pay tribute to Arthur Ashe.

Mr. President, Arthur Ashe and I have known each other since 1972. We have worked together in political campaigns and in the civil rights movement. I am greatly saddened by his recent revelation that he has contracted AIDS.

Mr. President, Arthur Ashe has been a role model for all Americans since he first rose to tennis fame in the mid-1960's. He is a former U.S. Open and Wimbledon champion. He has represented our country overseas in international tennis tournaments. He has truly been a champion both on the court and off the court. Since his retirement, he has dedicated his life to teaching the game of tennis and the game of life to poor youth all over the world.

Arthur Ashe has also been a leader in the civil rights movement. He was working for sanctions against South Africa long before the Congress finally took action. He successfully had South Africa banned from the 1970 Davis Cup because of its inhumane policy of apartheid. I know he must be encouraged by the recent developments in South Africa because he has worked so hard to free its black majority.

Mr. President, Arthur Ashe's revelation once again shows us that anyone can contract AIDS. Unfortunately, it takes a basketball or tennis star to bring this epidemic to the forefront of our consciousness. We need to show compassion for the victims of AIDS and unite in an effort to find a cure for this disease.

The National Institutes of Health are conducting intensive research on treatment and therapies for AIDS and the Ryan White Care Act is providing counseling and care to AIDS victims and their families. These programs are helping us prevent this epidemic from spiraling out of control. Now we need to put more resources into these programs, not less.

Mr. President, AIDS is tragically striking down people from all segments of our society. Young, old, male, female, black, white, and brown. We need to put our Nation's resources into fighting this epidemic before it claims more and more lives. Today, one in every 250 people has contracted the AIDS virus. As a result, people are dying all over this country. We need to pull together and find a cure for AIDS like we did with polio and tuberculosis. We need to show tolerance and respect for those who are victims of this deadly virus.

As a tribute to Arthur Ashe and those who are not as well-known, let's pull together as a nation and beat this tragic disease.

CONDOLENCES TO THE FAMILY OF A DISTINGUISHED FRIEND

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank our friend and colleague, the junior Senator from Wyoming, Senator SIMPSON, for the expeditious and sensitive fashion in which he brought to the Senate's attention yesterday the passing of one of my longtime friends and distinguished former colleagues, Senator Gale McGee from Wyoming.

Senator McGee and I were members of that extraordinary class of Senators elected in 1958.

That class included such men as Philip Hart from Michigan, Hugh Scott from Pennsylvania, Edmund Muskie from Maine, Eugene McCarthy from Minnesota, Jennings Randolph from West Virginia, Thomas Dodd from Connecticut, and other distinguished men, many of whom left a lasting mark on our history and have now also passed on to the farther shore.

I felt a particular kinship with Gale McGee. Senator McGee was 1 of only 5 nonlawyers among the 16 new Members elected to the Senate in 1958, and I had not yet won my own law degree at that juncture. Senator McGee had been an American history professor at the University of Wyoming and had cut his political teeth as a legislative assistant to Senator Joseph O'Mahoney.

Erma and I especially enjoyed our friendship with Senator McGee and his wife, Loraine. I know that I speak for Erma, as well as for all of our colleagues, in extending to Senator McGee's family our condolences on the death of this uniquely decent, level-headed, brilliant, and patriotic man of whom all of the people of Wyoming can be justly proud.

CONGRATULATIONS TO THE DISTINGUISHED SENIOR SENATOR FROM THE OLD DOMINION

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I was gratified the day before yesterday that our friend and colleague, the distinguished Senior Senator from Virginia, JOHN WARNER, announced his decision to remain in the Senate.

Certainly, the mystique and romance of the Old Dominion would be sufficient to tantalize any citizen of that State into wanting to be her Governor.

With such a magnificent heritage and tradition, one can understand the loyalty and love of men like George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, Robert E. Lee, and JOHN WARNER for the "Mother of Presidents."

I can further understand, then, the struggle that must have been Senator WARNER's in deciding not to become a candidate for Virginia's highest State office.

But I particularly commend Senator WARNER, not just as a friend and colleague, but as a patriot as well, for his decision to continue his service here in the Senate.

As Democrats and Republicans alike, we face momentous choices at this point in our history. I especially applaud Senator WARNER's choice because I believe that we need men of his broad public experience and perspective as we serve together in the Senate right now. For our purposes as Americans and as Senators representing neighboring States with multiple and countless common concerns and mutual interests, I congratulate Senator WARNER for his decision and I look forward to working many more years together in warm cooperation and friendship.

Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. President, one of the sad duties of a U.S. Senator is to take to the floor and comment upon the life, and the passing, of distinguished constituents. Today I rise in sorrow to inform my colleagues that Carmen Turner, Under Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution and former general manager of the Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Authority [WMATA] passed away on Thursday.

Carmen Turner, a lifelong resident of Washington, DC, was not in the strictest sense a constituent of mine. But the outstanding transit system she leaves behind, which serves our Nation's Capital and its Maryland and Virginia suburbs so well, is a legacy that will benefit my constituents for generations to come.

Carmen Turner worked for Washington's Metro system from 1977 to 1990, the last 7 years as general manager. Perhaps the crowning achievement of her tenure at Metro was the passage in 1990 in this body and in the House of Representatives of the $1.3 billion authorization which will allow Metro to complete its entire 103-mile system. This important legislation will finally bring Metro service to those neighborhoods most dependent upon public transportation.

Toward the end of her career, Carmen chose to devote her energy and talents to the Smithsonian Institution, that great showcase of our Nation's history, culture, scholarship, and diversity. She oversaw the day-to-day operations of this gigantic museum enterprise, and guided it through a period of significant financial difficulties, but also of important growth and change.

Those who worked with Carmen, as I did, will never forget her spirit, her dignity, her dedication to Metro and to this region, and her sense of humor. I was proud to consider her a colleague. She was a role model to professional women, and to the African-American community.

Mr. President, I truly admired Carmen Turner. Her passing is a great loss to all of us.

IRRESPONSIBLE CONGRESS? HERE IS TODAY'S BOX SCORE

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, the Federal debt run up by the U.S. Congress stood at $3,893,440,313,164.95, as of the close of business on Wednesday, April 8, 1992.

As anybody familiar with the U.S. Constitution knows, no President can spend a dime that has not first been authorized and appropriated by the Congress of the United States.

During the past fiscal year, it cost the American taxpayers $286,022,000,000 just to pay the interest on spending approved by Congress—over and above what the Federal Government collected in taxes and other income. Averaged out, this amounts to $5.5 billion every week, or $785 million every day.

What would America be like today if there had been a Congress that had the courage and the integrity to operate on a balanced budget?

HELEN CYNTHIA BROOKE'S FIRST 100 YEARS

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, on April 19, Helen Cynthia Brooke will celebrate her centennial birthday. Helen is well known to many in the Senate as one of Washington's grande dames and matriarchs, and as the mother of our former colleague from Massachusetts, Edward Brooke. Senator Brooke came to the Senate the same year I did, 1967. During Ed's two terms in this body, Helen very capably represented him on the Ladies of the Senate Red Cross. She was always proud and willing to share stories of her grandchildren and great grandchildren, and reminiscences of summers at Cape Cod.

Mr. President, Helen Brooke remains a proud member of the Ladies of the Senate, the Republican Club, and the Massachusetts Society. And she is a devoted member of St. Luke's Episcopal parish. I know that the entire Senate joins me in congratulating Helen on her 100th birthday. We all wish her the very best.

RTC FUNDING

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, as Congress prepares to leave town for a 2-week recess, we are repeating our prior brilliant acts of procrastination by failing to act responsibly and fund the RTC.

While I was pleased that the Senate was able to take action on this important issue over 2 weeks ago, the House has been gridlocked in seemingly endless rounds of political posturing and showdowns. The end result is that while a few may score some cheap political points, the American taxpayer loses and depositors who are waiting for the Federal Government to honor its promise to insure their accounts are left hanging.

We all know that the RTC is everyone's favorite punching bag. On occasion, I have come to the floor and pointed out some of the mistakes of the agency like when the Kansas City regional office used taxpayer funds to buy original artwork or when checks were bounced in connection with the resolution of Home Federal Savings Association.

But the fact that one can always find something good to criticize—and certainly good politics encourages it—has nothing to do with the fact that Congress needs to fulfill its obligation to depositors to keep the RTC funded so that it can continue to do its very difficult job.

DELAY DOES NOT PAY

When Congress took a walk on the issue in the fall of 1990 until March 1991, and last winter, it cost American taxpayers another $400 to $500 million. And for what, Mr. President?

I certainly do not think our constituents would be satisfied with the explanation that it helped Members avoid a difficult vote for a few months.

The situation we are now facing is identical to that we faced last November and in the fall of 1990.

As of midnight on March 31, the RTC was cut off from funds. And without money, it cannot unload the public treasury of the many insolvent thrifts and their assets that simply add to the cost of the bailout. It is that simple. Without funding, no business gets transacted.

RTC President Albert Casey has said that a 3-month delay in resolutions would result in unrecoverable costs of approximately $200 million to $250 million, while 6 months of delay would result in unrecoverable costs of approximately $600 million to $900 million. This all translates into a daily cost of roughly $2.8 million.

That is $2.8 million that began 9 days ago, and will continue today, tomorrow, and the day after that, and the day after that until Congress does a reality check with the American people and steps up to the plate.

RTC IS DOING ITS JOB

Mr. President, it is also important to note that the RTC is completing the job it was established to do.

In fact, announcements were recently made that the RTC will be significantly down-scaling the size of its operation.

Since its establishment in August 1989 and through March 31, 1992, the RTC has taken over 690 thrifts, resolved 640 of these thrifts, and maintained control over the remaining 50 institutions in its conservatorship program. Through January 31, 1992, the RTC had disposed of roughly 66 percent of its over $375 billion inventory of failed thrift assets.

While one can always say there is room for improvement, it looks like a pretty respectable track record for an organization that did not even exist 32 months ago.

In addition, recognition should be made of the role that the RTC has played in assisting the Justice Department in prosecuting those savings and loan crooks who have ripped off the American public to the tune of billions of dollars. Through February 29, 1992, the Department of Justice had obtained 797 convictions, with 78 percent of the 628 individuals who have been sentenced receiving a jail term.

CONGRESS HAS AN OBLIGATION TO THE AMERICAN PEOPLE

Mr. President, today there are 50 thrifts in the RTC's conservatorship program awaiting disposition. Those institutions represent 2.3 million accounts holding $24 billion. The RTC tells me that in my State of Kansas, there are roughly 110,000 conservatorship accounts containing over $2 billion waiting for resolution.

I do not want to keep these depositors waiting any longer than is absolutely necessary, and that point in time occurred over 1 week ago.

The U.S. Government has an obligation to stand behind the Federal deposit insurance system it established.

Certainly, no one likes voting money to bail out the savings and loan debacle. It is not an easy vote. It does not make for great press releases.

But it is essential that funding action being taken for delay only adds to the already staggering costs of the bailout. And in that connection, the American people have only Congress to blame.

Since the House went home last night for the Easter recess without taking the responsible course of action, I shall do everything I can to ensure that the first matter of business when Congress returns is to work out its differences and to fund the RTC.

The President has recognized his obligation to depositors and to the American taxpayer on this issue. It is now time for Congress to do the same.

DEATH OF EINAR OTTESEN

Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, a lifelong resident and business leader of Wrangell, AK, Einar Ottesen, died February 22.

Mr. Ottesen came to Wrangell as an infant and helped the community grow as he grew.

For many years Mr. Ottesen was a cannery superintendent at the Far West Cannery and also worked aboard fish tenders, as well. He operated a machine shop in Wrangell and later opened a retail grocery store in the early 1960's. He started a hardware store in 1970 and retired in 1978.

For 39 years he served on the board of National Bank of Alaska.

For over 75 years he contributed to the community in a thoughtful and generous manner. As one of the pioneer families of Wrangell, he was always involved in community activities as well as hunting and outdoor activities on the Stikine River. His three sons, Mike, Eric, and Chris and his wife of 52 years, Dorothy, continue his example of devotion and dedication to the community of Wrangell.

ANGER AND ERODING CONFIDENCE IN GOVERNMENT

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, this is a time of great turbulence in the Nation's political life. The American people are unhappy with their political leaders and institutions. More than that, they are angry; they are angry at the men and women who serve in Government.

The reports of misuse of the House of Representatives bank and scandal at the House post office have crystallized and given shape to this anger and frustration.

If there is any silver lining to this very large black cloud, it is that these incidents have placed this problem in front of us and provide an opportunity to address them forthrightly.

Mr. President, I came into Government after a long career in the private sector. After devoting most of my life to starting and building a highly successful data processing firm in New Jersey employing over 20,000 persons, I wanted to make a contribution in another forum.

I chaired one of the largest charitable organizations in the world and helped lead several others. I made significant personal philanthropic donations to causes I thought were important to our future: cancer research, the environment, opportunity for disadvantaged kids. During my chairmanship of ADP, I also served pro bono as a commissioner of the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey and on the New Jersey Economic Development Authority.

But to really make my State and country a better place, there seemed no better way than to seek an elective office to serve where decisions are made that affect the direction of our country; that shape our future. I believed that my experience in the community, and in management and technology, could perhaps be of value in the U.S. Senate. I truly sought to serve the public interest by seeking office.

I do not claim to be unique in that respect. And yet, despite the best intentions of so many, something is seriously wrong.

At a time when the Nation is struggling with enormous challenges, little appears to get done. Our economy is in the longest recession since the Great Depression. There is almost unanimous agreement that our health care system needs a major overhaul and our educational system needs reform. The cold war has ended and we need to decide how to capitalize on that victory for the benefit of our people. We need to regain our economic competitiveness and world leadership. The list of challenges goes on.

Yet, Mr. President, while our Nation cries out for help, little appears to get done. We seem paralyzed, unable to move. Unable to make a difference.

Mr. President, it is critical to the Nation that we break this gridlock. The leadership of this Nation is not a game. It is serious business. With high stakes. We have to get beyond conflict and partisanship, and do something about the problems of this great country of ours.

Mr. President, at the same time we are frozen in a policy gridlock, our constituents have focused their attention on the various prerequisites—or perks—provided to Government officials.

When real problems go unsolved, when people are hurting, when anger is high, it is natural that scrutiny of public officials intensifies. And, as it has intensified, the public does not like what it sees. And I do not blame them.

Americans get angry when they see bureaucrats being driven around in chauffeured limousines. They are disgusted when they see Congressmen and Senators treated like some type of royalty. And they are outraged when they learn that Government leaders enjoy, for free, services that other Americans have to pay for; services that are unrelated to the exercise of their official duties. Understandably, it leaves the impression that Government leers are in office more to serve themselves than to serve the people they were elected to represent and work for.

These privileges or perks distance elected representatives from the people they are serving. They insulate officials from the day-to-day problems of ordinary Americans. And, perhaps because of this distancing, they can sap the ethic of public service that is so essential to Government. Certainly, they erode public confidence in Government, which is fatal to a democracy.

Mr. President, Americans are upset about perks for good reason. They're not just being swept up by a wave of sensationalistic news stories. They are concerned about perks because they're concerned about the state of our Government.

And, Mr. President, that is why it was way past time to examine the special perks available to Members of both the legislative and executive branches—and do away with them.

There is absolutely no reason in the world why Members of Congress should have their meals or haircuts subsidized. They should pay the full price, just like other American workers do. There is no reason why Deputy Secretaries need a chauffeured limousine to get to work. And there's absolutely no reason why the taxpayers should be paying outrageous sums for Cabinet members or the Vice President or the President's Chief of Staff to take personal trips on military jets at the taxpayer's expense.

Mr. President, we need to clean house and get rid of these unwarranted perks. Members of Congress should have to pay for all services that are not job-related, just like every other American does.

I personally do not use the Senate barber shop. I still go back to my birthplace of Paterson, NJ, to have Pete cut my hair, like he has for years. I do not use the Senate gym. I jog along the Potomac instead, when in Washington, and along the Hackensack River on the weekend. I do not often eat in the Senate dining room. I usually eat lunch at my desk, if I eat at all, and dinner on the fly, if we adjourn in time.

But, regardless of our personal habits, we should make a strong and clear statement that Members of Congress and employees of the executive branch should be stripped of perks. I certainly want to make my position clear: Members of Congress and the executive branch should pay a commercially fair rate for all services available to them which are unrelated to the discharge of their official duties.

This includes the Senate dining room, gym, barber shop, the Capitol doctor, who also treats visitors to our Nation's Capital, any health care services or prescriptions, and any other services unrelated to official business that may exist of which I am unaware.

We are here for one reason, and one reason only: To serve the public. And we need to remove any vestiges of privilege that obscure that fact or cause the public to doubt our integrity.

I am pleased that the Senate leadership of both parties has moved to address these issues. Last week, the Senate majority leader, Senator MITCHELL, and Senate minority leader, Senator DOLE, ordered a review of all Senate practices and operations. They pledged to discontinue any practice or method of operation that is unrelated to the discharge of our official responsibilities. They have already moved to address some of the unwarranted perks associated with the Senate dining room, gym, stationery store, and health services.

Mr. President, for a democracy to function, we must restore faith in our Government.

Other sources of cynicism by the public include honoraria, or the taking of speaking fees from special interest groups, the state of campaign fundraising, and the Senate pay raise.

Mr. President, the pay raise for the Senate was, I believe, unjustified and untimely. I voted against it and am donating my pay raise to New Jersey charities.

Throughout my tenure in the Senate—from the start—in 1983—I refused to accept honoraria or speaking fees and have donated any such fees offered, when I speak to groups in New Jersey or Washington, to charities in New Jersey. When a Member of Congress accepts payments for speeches from special interest groups, there is at least an appearance of a conflict of interest and, at worst, a weakening of his or her independence. It's a real improvement that these fees are now banned.

Mr. President, at the time of my reelection in 1988, I pledged to the people of New Jersey that I would continue to keep their needs, their pain and their joy with me everyday. I was humbled by their approval and I restated that I would never breach their trust nor forget that I am here to serve them.

I have done that, to the best of my ability, everyday I have served. As I said earlier, I chose to leave a successful business career, at some personal sacrifice, because, as the son of poor immigrant parents, I wanted to give something back to my State and country, which offered me such opportunity. I still feel an intense sense of responsibility when I enter the Senate Chamber to vote, when I chair a committee hearing, draft a bill, or fight for New Jersey and its people.

It truly pains me that our people are so frustrated and angry, that they just want to kick the bums out and have lost faith in their Government. That is poison for a free people. Our great vibrant democracy has flourished for more than 200 years because the people trust their Government and participate fully in their own governance. More and more, they mistrust politicians and stay home, rather than voting. Mr. President, we must earn back their trust by cleaning up our act.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, before we adjourn for the Easter recess, I would like to take just a minute to inform my colleagues that when we return, the Environment and Public Works Committee will be marking up the reauthorization of the Resource Conservation and Recovery Act.

For the past year, my Subcommittee on Environmental Protection has been conducting a thorough examination of our solid waste problems. We held 11 hearings on various aspects of the issue, including recycling, waste reduction, interstate transport, and waste management planning, among others. The testimony we heard has given us a sound basis for modifications in the original bill Senator CHAFEE and I introduced last year.

The bill the committee will mark up will focus on three major issues. The centerpiece of it will create markets for recycling by asking larger companies to take responsibility for recovering and reusing some of the paper, glass, metal, and plastic products they sell.

This will create a market for recovered materials, which is the major missing link today in thousands of community recycling programs. It will also help share the burden with the cities and towns across the country which today bear the full burden of disposing of our mounting garbage piles.

Since we will never get ahead of our waste problem by focusing only on recycling and disposal, however, the bill will also encourage companies to think about how they can reduce the amount of waste they generate. I have seen lots of examples of how companies have cut waste and ended up with more efficient operations.

And the bill will propose a solution to the vexing problem of interstate shipment of solid waste. We will let the local communities, those most affected by landfills, to choose whether they want to accept waste from another State in their landfill. I have talked with many of the Senators on both sides of this issue and believe that the committee's bill will be a fair resolution of this very complex and emotional issue.

Finally, the bill will set standards for States to develop comprehensive waste planning and management plans.

Mr. President, I hope that after the committee reports this legislation, which I hope to be around April 29, Wednesday after we get back, my colleagues will closely examine it. I believe it will be a major boost to recycling efforts across the country and help resolve some of our most pressing solid waste problems.

I have discussed this bill with the majority leader, and it is my hope the Senate will consider it soon after it is reported from the committee.

I thank my colleagues.

FREEDOM OF CHOICE ACT

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I am today adding my name to the cosponsors of the Freedom of Choice Act because I believe that it is important to move ahead with such legislation in light of the potential overruling of Roe v. Wade in the immediate future.

I had declined to sponsor this bill since its introduction on November 17, 1989, because I felt it was untimely. In light of the Supreme Court's decision to accelerate consideration of the constitutionality of the Pennsylvania Abortion Control Act and the Court's granting of argument to the Solicitor General, I think it is now important to try to move this legislation forward for consideration by the Congress. A growing list of cosponsors will lend support toward that end.

In joining as cosponsor, I note the Freedom of Choice Act goes beyond the decision of the Supreme Court in Roe v. Wade and does not have any of the limitations on abortion which have been imposed by some States and upheld by the U.S. Supreme Court. For example, Roe recognizes the State's "important and legitimate" interest in protecting the fetus after the first trimester.

This bill goes beyond Roe in that regard. The bill may be amended on that subject and other limitations on abortion may be added by amendments. It may be that there would be so many amendments as to make the bill not very meaningful. It may be that the preferable course, ultimately, will be to proceed with a constitutional amendment even though that would take longer.

In any event, it is my judgment that adding cosponsors to the Freedom of Choice Act would move such legislation forward to protect the principles of Roe v. Wade, which now appear to be in imminent jeopardy.

CARMEN TURNER: AN APPRECIATION

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, it is with sadness that I note the passing yesterday of Mrs. Carmen Turner. At the time of her death, this remarkable individual was serving as undersecretary of the Smithsonian Institution, on the Board of Regents of which I have the honor to serve. For some years prior to that, Mrs. Turner served with distinction as the general manager of the Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Authority, overseeing one of its most significant periods of growth.

A longtime Washington resident, Mrs. Turner received her undergraduate degree from Howard University and a masters degree from the American University here. She was Deputy Director of Civil Rights for the Urban Mass Transit Administration, and then, Acting Director of Civil Rights for the U.S. Department of Transportation. In 1977, she joined the Washington Metro as its first assistant general manager for administration, and in July 1983 became its general manager, the chief executive position at Metro.

During Mrs. Turner's stewardship, the Washington Metrorail System expanded from 42 miles and 47 stations to 70 miles and 64 stations. Because Metro is reliant upon a capital funding agreement among eight different State and local government in the Washington Area, the coordination of its operations requires considerable skills of negotiation and leadership. Mrs. Turner met this challenge with energy success while overseeing an operating budget of over half a billion dollars and a work force of 8,500 people.

Due in no small part to Carmen Turner's efforts, the Washington Met-rail System has become the object of admiration and earned the nickname, "America's subway." The transit authority provides a million rail and bus trips every weekday and is invaluable not just to Federal and private workers, but to the 20 million people who visit our Nation's Capital each year. It is no surprise that the American Public Transit Association honored the Washington Metro Authority as the outstanding transit agency in North America in 1988.

One of Mrs. Turner's legacies is the Federal commitment to completion of the full 103-mile Metrorail System, authorized by Congress and planned in the 1960's. Two years ago I had the pleasure of inviting Mrs. Turner to testify before my Subcommittee on General Services, Federalism, and the District of Columbia. Her fervid advocacy of S. 612, the bill to extend the authority for Federal-State funding of the balance of the Metrorail System, impressed the subcommittee and contributed substantially to the signing of this legislation into law.

The regents, staffs, and all friends and admirers of the Smithsonian Institution appreciated Carmen Turner's wisdom and experience during her tenure there. We can only regret that we will not have the benefit of them in future years. On behalf of my colleagues, let me extend our heartfelt condolences to her husband, Mr. Frederick B. Turner, Jr., and to her two sons and grandchildren, but at the same time our deep appreciation for her distinguished service to the public and our Nation's Capital.

CARMEN TURNER

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I rise today to express by deep sorrow at the passing of Carmen Turner, the former general manager of the Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Authority. The Washington area has lost a beloved public servant.

As she was a native of my home State and very involved in transportation issues, I was fortunate to have the opportunity to work closely with this remarkable woman. Carmen Turner was a dynamic woman who was able to overcome racial prejudice during an era when African-Americans were forced to attend segregated schools. While Carmen was a student at Howard University, she married her classmate, Frederick Turner. They had two sons, Frederick and Douglas.

While working for her master's degree in public administration, Carmen joined the Department of Transportation's Urban Mass Transportation in 1974. A year after the Metrorail trains began running in 1977, she was offered a job as chief of administration. When Metro's general manager retired, Metro executives asked her to serve as acting general manager while they searched for a replacement. Carmen made the transition so smoothly that the executives offered her the job permanently. By doing so, she became the first black woman to manage a major transit system in the United States.

During Carmen's tenure as general manager for the Metro, the system grew as a tourist attraction and became an example of what mass transit could become.

Mr. President, Carmen Turner was a respected and dedicated professional who was a role model for women and minorities. I am proud to have known her, and I extend my deepest sympathy to her family.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. PRESSLER:

S. 2613. A bill to prevent and deter auto theft; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ANTI-CAR THEFT ACT OF 1992

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, last year, over 1.6 million vehicles were reported stolen in the Nation, making car theft America's No. 1 personal property crime. Auto theft will affect 1 in 50 American families this year, at a cost of over $8 billion. In my home State of South Dakota, there were 696 auto thefts last year, resulting in property losses of over $2.7 million.

In response to this growing crime epidemic, I am joining the efforts initiated by Congressman CHARLES SCHUMER and Congressman JAMES SENSENBRENNER 2 weeks ago. Today, I am introducing the Anti-Car Theft Act of 1992. I believe this legislation would give America's law enforcement officials the tools needed to stem the increase in auto thefts.

Title I of this bill establishes a new Federal crime for a twisted innovation in car theft: armed carjacking. Nationwide, there has been a marked increase in instances in which criminals approach a driver in a car, and with gun or knife drawn, forcibly remove the driver, and steal the car. This bill would impose up to a 20-year jail sentence for armed carjacking. Furthermore, my legislation would double the penalties for all other auto theft crimes.

Title II of this bill addresses the problem of automobile title fraud. The bill creates a nationwide data base for the titling of motor vehicles. This data base will allow Federal, State, or local law enforcement officials, insurance carriers, and potential automobile purchasers the ability to access general title status information, odometer readings, and whether the individual automobile is a junked or salvaged vehicle. To accomplish this, the bill establishes reporting requirements for junkyards, salvage yards, and insurance companies.

I have personal experience with this problem. Last fall, I purchased a 1988 model year car at an auction. I later discovered that the entire front chassis of this car was put together with parts from a 1985 vehicle. Had this bill been law, prior to my purchase, both the auctioneer and I could have verified whether this vehicle was salvaged, junked, or made from parts stolen from another car.

In another warped innovation, some car thieves have created a multibillion-dollar industry through the resale of parts from stolen automobiles. Criminals take a stolen car to a chopshop that dismantles the major parts of the car in 10 minutes. The thieves then turn around and sell these parts for a value greater than that of the original whole vehicle. To put an end to this practice, title III of this bill requires that the car's vehicle identification number [VIN] be placed on all major parts of new automobiles.

The bill creates a national stolen auto parts data base that would include the VIN's of stolen automobiles and stolen parts. Car mechanics or auto parts dealers would be required to call a toll-free number to check the ID numbers of auto parts against the national data base of stolen vehicles and parts before installing or buying major auto parts. The bill establishes civil penalties for failure to label parts, keep required records, provide certification of compliance, and for failure to supply to the national data base the required information if selling, transferring, or installing a major part.

Another method criminals use to profit from auto theft is the export of stolen vehicles for sale overseas. Auto thieves simply hide the stolen car in a container being shipped abroad. To address this problem, the bill establishes random Customs Service inspections of automobiles being exported. It further requires exporters to notify Customs officials of the VIN's of used automobiles 72 hours before the export of the vehicles.

Mr. President, we need the Anti-Car Theft Act of 1992 to help our local law enforcement officials rollback the growing wave of auto theft. I ask unanimous consent that this legislation be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2613

By Mr. WOFFORD:

S. 2614. A bill to reform the Federal-State unemployment compensation system to provide greater opportunity for reemployment and fairness, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION, REEMPLOYMENT, AND FAIRNESS ACT

Mr. WOFFORD. Mr. President, today I'm introducing the Unemployment Compensation, Reemployment and Fairness Act of 1992.

Before coming to the Senate almost a year ago, I served as Pennsylvania's secretary of labor and industry for 4½ years. One of my responsibilities was to administer our State's unemployment compensation program. So I'm well aware of its strengths and weaknesses from the ground up.

It's an important program, a complex program, a program which I believe can be improved and strengthened. That's the purpose of the legislation I'm offering today.

In time of recession and economic hardship, the Federal-State Unemployment Compensation Program is essential to maintaining the well-being of millions of American families, but it's a system under real stress.

Back in 1935 when Franklin Roosevelt and the Congress together created our present Unemployment Compensation System, he wanted a program that would be flexible—a program that would reflect and adjust to changing employer and worker needs and economic circumstances. That's the idea behind this effort to continue and improve on Roosevelt's experiment in Federal-State cooperation and innovation.

Based on experience, and in close consultation with the Pennsylvania department of labor and industry under my successor TOM FOLEY and our Governor, Robert Casey, I've developed a series of ideas for strengthening the assistance to workers, providing procedural fairness for employers, and bolstering the fiscal integrity of the overall system. Let me be specific:

First, improvements in worker reemployment. The problems of today's continuing high unemployment challenge American business, workers and governments to strengthen their cooperative efforts. This bill will:

Enhance employer and worker cooperation and job retention, by encouraging States to voluntarily implement short-time compensation programs;

Expand economic opportunities by allowing States to pay benefits to those who are seeking to start their own business under a State approved self-employment plan; and Require States to review the reemployment prospects of workers soon after they have lost their jobs so that they can receive necessary services and training before they exhaust their benefits.

Second, improvements in employer fairness. Neither the Social Security Act nor the Federal unemployment tax act now guarantees employers the right to State administrative hearing on disputes involving unemployment taxes. This bill will require States to provide for such a hearing;

Third, budget treatment of unemployment trust fund. Mr. President, I've pressed the point repeatedly since my very first days in this body that we should use the taxes employers have already paid into the unemployment trust fund for their intended purpose. It was a scandal that the President for months refused to sign legislation extending unemployment compensation during the depths of this recession. A scandal that the President took so long to come to agreement with the Congress, as he finally did late last autumn.

We should not have to raise new revenues in the middle of a recession to fund emergency benefits when funds for that exact purpose are already available. My bill will:

Remove the unemployment trust fund from the Federal budget at the beginning of the 1993 fiscal year. This will ensure these funds will in fact be treated as a trust—and be available as they were intended, for unemployed workers and families.

In conclusion, Mr. President, our primary goal in government should be action that builds our Nation's economic vitality and creates jobs for all Americans. We should always keep our eyes on that prize.

But one of the things we must do when our economy is stagnant, when millions of workers lose their jobs, and families are in danger of losing their homes, their health and their quality of life, is to have an effective unemployment compensation system. A system that gives people the support they need to stay in the economic mainstream, to have effective retraining and to find new jobs as quickly as possible.

I'm committed to that kind of unemployment compensation system. That's why I have offered this bill to improve the reemployment prospects for working Americans, provide fair treatment to employers, and ensure that unemployment benefits will be available to workers and their families when they need them most.

Over the coming months I intend to discuss other ideas on employment security. I ask my colleagues to help advance this discussion by cosponsoring this legislation.

In June 1934, President Roosevelt told Congress that "Among our objectives, I place the security of men, women, and children of the Nation's first." We should still work to achieve that objective. This legislation will help us do it.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the legislation be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2614

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

(C) during the 4 months prior to the approval or annual review of such plan the work force in the affected unit or units has not been reduced by temporary layoffs of more than 10 percent;

(D) the employer continues to provide health benefits and retirement benefits under a defined benefit pension plan (as defined in section 3(35) of the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974) to any employee whose workweek is reduced under such plan as though such employee's workweek had not been reduced; and

By Mr. LEVIN (for himself and Mr. RIEGLE):

S. 2615. A bill to amend title XVIII of the Social Security Act to clarify that medically necessary procedures related to atrophic and weakened jaws are covered under such title, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

CLARIFICATION OF DENTAL EXCLUSIONARY ACT

• Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, today I am introducing, along with Senator RIEGLE, legislation which provides the necessary clarification of the Dental Exclusionary Act that medically necessary jaw reconstruction surgery is a covered service under the Medicare Program.

The Health Care Financing Administration [HCFA] has been denying claims for this surgery, citing the Dental Exclusionary Act which excludes services in connection with care or treatment of teeth or structures directly supporting teeth. HCFA has maintained its position despite the findings of a 1986 HCFA physicians panel that the jaw reconstructive surgical procedure is not dental and that the primary reason for performing the surgery is to relieve pain.

Jaw reconstruction is a one-time, surgical procedure conducted to the jaw bone and not the teeth. In fact, the teeth and supporting structure have deteriorated before the underlying jaw bone becomes atrophied. This medically necessary surgery will prevent the malnutrition and starvation that are associated with this deteriorating illness. It will enhance the quality of life for those seniors who suffer severe depression because of their inability to provide their own nourishment.

Mr. President, Congress never intended for this surgical procedure to be subject to the exclusion. Our proposal would clarify this interpretation. It would establish that oral and maxillo-facial surgery be a covered service under the Medicare Program. The costs of this procedure would be offset by the reduction in other health care costs for the aged, as restoring the proper function of the jaw and the ability to chew will reduce illness and prevent hospitalization. In order to ensure that these Medicare covered procedures not be used for dental or cosmetic purposes, our proposal provides that the medical condition requiring surgical attention is a matter of medical necessity. Specifically, the legislation provides for Medicare coverage of—

 Surgical and prosthodontic procedures following oral cancer  jaw reconstruction performed with respect to an individual suffering from generalized atrophy (as evidenced by loss of maxillary or mandibular basal bone) or nerve dehiscence, or localized weakness of the jaw muscle or bone caused by tumor, trauma, infection, systemic disease, or congenital abnormality (as supported by specific x-ray or laboratory evidence or by a clinical examination).

We have sought an administrative remedy in this matter. However, HCFA has not been responsive to the appeals to provide uniform coverage of this humane, lifesaving surgical procedure. Therefore, legislative action is necessary. Mr. President, this proposal merits the immediate attention of the Senate. I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. INOUE (for himself and Mr. AKAKA):

S. 2616. A bill to require the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency to conduct a study of algal blooms off the coast of Maui, HI, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

STUDY OF ALGAL BLOOMS OFF THE COAST OF MAUI, HI

• Mr. INOUE. Mr. President, I am introducing legislation today with Senator AKAKA, which will enable the Environmental Protection Agency to establish a grant program to investigate the unexplained occurrence of algal blooms off the northwestern coast of Maui, Hawaii.

Twice since 1989, portions of Hawaii's most treasured coastal areas have been plagued with massive algal blooms. Although the specific causes of the algal blooms are uncertain, algal growth is proportionally stimulated by the injection of treated waste water and concentrations of chemicals such as fertilizers and insecticides which enter the ocean through fresh water runoff.

Mr. President, I feel it is my duty to act in an efficient and timely manner to ensure that the affected coastal areas do not suffer further environmental damage. Already, coral reefs which have been exposed to the algal blooms have died; this is an occurrence that holds far-reaching effects for fish and other wildlife who depend on the reefs for survival.

In addition to solving the specific problem of the algal blooms, it is my sincere hope that this legislation will encourage the State of Hawaii to research alternative methods of managing the presence of chemicals in waste water effluent and fresh water runoff.

I am confident that this pledge of support for an inquiry into the causes of the algal blooms will complement the efforts of the State of Hawaii to eradicate this environmental hazard. My endeavor to obtain funding for this important legislation has been buttressed by my understanding that the State of Hawaii has already pledged substantial funding to coincide with the Federal effort on its behalf. Our immediate action and additional assistance are crucial if we are to halt the further deterioration of the affected coastal areas.

Mr. President, I request unanimous consent that the text of this bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2616

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, SECTION 1. FINDINGS.

The Congress finds the following:

(1) Twice since 1989, the northwestern coast of Maui, Hawaii, has been plagued with massive blooms of the green alga, Cladophora sericea, and blooms of the red alga, Hypnea musciformis, have also occurred in the area and in the Kihel area.

(2) The algal blooms have destroyed corals and other reefbuilding organisms, and have washed up on beaches and severely impeded the recreational use of affected coastal areas.

(3) The algal blooms are particularly detrimental to the natural ecological balance of the near-shore reef environment.

(4) Although the specific causes of the algal blooms are uncertain, algal growth is stimulated in a proportional manner by concentrations of chemicals such as fertilizers and insecticides, which enter the ocean through freshwater runoff.

(5) The Department of Health of the State of Hawaii has indicated that the department does not have the resources at this time to determine the cause of the algal blooms.

(6) Extensive research will be required to determine the factors that contribute to algal growth.

(7) Potential sources of nutrients that may contribute to algal growth include the near-shore disposal of sewage in injection wells from the Lahaina Wastewater Treatment Plant, surface runoff from agricultural lands and urban resort areas, and subsurface point sources in such areas.

(8) The long-term environmental impacts of the algal blooms are unknown, but in the short term, reefs exposed to the algal are being destroyed and the deterioration of the coral has detrimental effects on fish and other wildlife that depend on the reefs for survival.

(9) The algal blooms are generating negative economic impacts as well as negative biological impacts, as additional reports indicate that the algae is decreasing the intake of fish caught by local fishermen in the affected marine waters.

(10) The Maui Algae Task Force is comprised of community environmental activists and has been assembled to address the problem of algal blooms.

(11) The Maui Algae Task Force hopes to work in cooperation with the Department of Health of the State of Hawaii and the Environmental Protection Agency to identify and eradicate the causes of the algal blooms.

SEC. 2. STUDY.

(a) IN GENERAL.—The Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency (hereafter in this Act referred to as the "Administrator") shall conduct a study to determine the causes of recent legal algal blooms off the northwestern coast of Maui, Hawaii, and to research alternatives for the improved management of chemicals present in wastewater treatment and fresh water runoff.

(b) STUDY REQUIREMENTS.—In carrying out the study under this section, the Administrator shall—

(1) survey and monitor—
(A) seaweed populations and animals for which the seaweed is a food source;
(B) surface water runoff sediments in the study area;

(2) inputs into the study area from subsurface point sources, including any such inputs from the Lahaina wastewater treatment plant; and

(3) in addition, study the responses of—
(A) the seaweed populations to different concentrations of nutrients; and
(B) the animals (for which the seaweed is a food source) to pesticides and other biological toxins.

(c) EQUIPMENT, GRANTS.—

(1) ACQUISITION OF EQUIPMENT.—In carrying out the study under this section, the Administrator is authorized to acquire such monitoring and testing equipment as is necessary.

(2) GRANTS.—In carrying out the study under this section, the Administrator is authorized to establish a grant program to provide grants to eligible entities that submit approved applications to the Administrator. The following entities may submit an application to conduct study activities under this section:

(A) the Department of Health of the State of Hawaii.

(B) The Maui Algae Task Force.

(C) Appropriate Federal, State, or county departments or agencies.

(D) Any other entity that the Administrator determines to be appropriate.

(d) DEMONSTRATION PROJECTS.—In carrying out the study under this section, the Administrator is authorized to establish demonstration projects to identify and implement best management practices for the control of nonpoint source pollution from erosion and agricultural runoff.

(e) REPORTS.—

(1) INTERIM REPORT.—Not later than 1 year after the date of enactment of this Act, the Administrator shall submit to the Congress a report that includes interim results of the study conducted under this section, and such recommendations as the Administrator determines to be appropriate.

(2) FINAL REPORT.—Not later than January 31, 1995, the Administrator shall submit to the Congress a final report that summarizes the results of the study conducted under this section and includes such recommendations as the Administrator determines to be appropriate.

(f) AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.—For each of the fiscal years 1993 and 1994, there are authorized to be appropriated $500,000 to the Environmental Protection Agency to carry out this section.●

By Mr. BINGAMAN:

S. 2617. A bill to provide for the maintenance of dams located on Indian lands in New Mexico by the Bureau of Indian Affairs or through contracts with Indian tribes; to the Select Committee on Indian Affairs,

MAINTENANCE OF CERTAIN DAMS BY THE BUREAU OF INDIAN AFFAIRS

● Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce a bill which addresses critical safety issues at a number of dams located on American Indian lands within the State of New Mexico. Many of these dams have problems with the integrity of dam structures, increasing seepage, and accelerated bank erosion. These problems could lead to a failure of the dam and the loss of lives and property on several Indian reservations throughout the State.

A dam safety program on Department of the Interior lands was originally mandated by a secretarial order in February 1980. This order established and assigned responsibilities for agencies within the Department to carry out a program of dam safety inspections, using Bureau of Reclamation classification standards, and further mandated that the agencies take whatever measures were necessary to prevent dam failures which threatened the loss of life or property. Despite this, the BIA had no program or administrative organization in place until 1991 to provide for the maintenance of dams, even though additional Federal guidelines and BIA policy require that agency officials ensure that dams are properly maintained.

Due to the lack of a comprehensive dam safety program, the Bureau of Indian Affairs has not carried out a timely program of correcting the serious deficiencies revealed in a 1989 report prepared by the Department's inspector general. Today, at least 7 of the 22 BIA-administered dams in New Mexico have been identified as containing structural problems which classifies them as presenting high or significant hazards to human life and property in the event of failure. Mr. President, it is of deep concern to me that these dams have not been repaired nor sufficient measures taken by the BIA to initiate this repair.

This dangerous situation has three basic causes. First, the Secretary's Dam Safety Program has not been given a sufficiently high priority within the Bureau of Indian Affairs. Second, BIA continues to allow the unrestricted use of unsafe dams. And, third, BIA either doesn't have, or has not used, available engineering and fiscal resources to work on problem dams.

In addition to threats to human safety and property, BIA inaction has resulted in increased maintenance costs for the current inventory of dams, as well as increasing the costs of correcting critical problems.

To correct this situation and hopefully avert a human and material tragedy, I am introducing legislation which will provide for the immediate inventory of dams on Indian lands within New Mexico, the classification of all dams using Bureau of Reclamation safety standards, and the timely repair of unsafe conditions at targeted dams.

Equally important, this legislation calls for the establishment of a dam safety, operation, and maintenance program within the Bureau of Indian Affairs. The goal of this measure is to create, within the BIA, a long-term dam safety management program similar to programs currently in place within the Bureau of Reclamation and the Army Corps of Engineers. Once the immediate life threatening problems at a dam has been identified and repaired, that dam will be monitored to ensure its continued safety.

My bill also permits the Secretary of the Interior to enter into memoranda of understanding with other appropriate Federal agencies, including the Bureau of Reclamation and the Army Corps of Engineers, to provide any technical expertise needed to implement an effective dam safety program.

It is also important to note that the work authorized under this act will be for the purpose of responding to problems of dam safety, and not to increase the conservation storage capacity of dams or otherwise increase the benefits of the original dams and reservoirs.

In order to promote increased involvement of American Indians in the management of dams on their own lands, this legislation authorizes the Secretary to contract with appropriate Indian tribes to carry out elements of the dam safety operation and maintenance program.

Mr. President, I realize that the scope of this problem will undoubtedly extend beyond the boundaries of New Mexico into our neighboring States. The inspector general's report revealing major problems with New Mexico dams indicated at least 19 dams in neighboring States have similar problems. I remain open to requests from my colleagues to add language to this bill which includes them within its scope.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of this bill be placed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2617

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Indian Dams Safety Act of 1992".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS.

The Congress finds that—

(1) in 1980, the Secretary of the Interior established a dam safety program to correct deficiencies identified by inspections of dams;

(2) the Bureau of Indian Affairs (hereafter referred to in this Act as the "BIA") has not made timely progress toward accomplishing the objectives of the dam safety program and, as a result, people are in jeopardy;

(3) the BIA has been slow to correct serious safety deficiencies at many dams under its jurisdiction that were classified in 1989 as presenting a high or significant hazard to human life and property should failure occur;

(4) there are Federal guidelines and departmental manuals which provide guidelines and directions for carrying out the dam safety program;

(5) unsafe BIA dams continue to pose an imminent threat to people and property because the dam safety program has not been given a sufficiently high priority, the BIA continues to allow the unrestricted use of unsafe dams, and the BIA has not used available engineering and fiscal resources effectively to correct the situation;

(6) until 1991, the BIA did not have a program to ensure proper periodic maintenance of dams under its jurisdiction, although a BIA manual requires that area directors, agency superintendents, and project engineers ensure that dams are properly maintained;

(7) dams are not being properly maintained because there is insufficient attention to regular dam maintenance through the proper allocation of resources and the clean definition of maintenance responsibility;

(8) the results of this inaction are that maintenance costs increase as dams are not being properly maintained on a set schedule and costs for the dam safety program increase as initial problems which could have been resolved by periodic inexpensive maintenance become dam safety issues because they remained unchecked;

(9) many dams in New Mexico have operation and maintenance deficiencies regardless of their safety condition classification, and there are additional BIA dams in New Mexico not being maintained under the dam safety program; and

(10) it is necessary to take action to have these dams repaired and maintained, utilizing expertise either within the BIA or provided to the BIA through other agencies, in an operation and maintenance program for dams.

SEC. 3. DEFINITIONS.

For the purposes of this Act.

(1) INDIAN TRIBES.—The term "Indian tribes" has the meaning given such term in section 4(e) of the Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act (25 U.S.C. 450b(e)).

(2) SECRETARY.—The term "Secretary" means the Secretary of the Interior.

(3) DAM SAFETY PROGRAM.—The term "dam safety program" means the program established by the Secretary of Interior by order dated February 28, 1980, to prevent dam failure and the resulting loss of life or serious property damage.

(4) DAM SAFETY OPERATION AND MAINTENANCE PROGRAM.—The term "dam safety operation and maintenance program" means a program of regular, recurring, routine maintenance, examination, and monitoring of the condition of dams identified pursuant to section 4(c) necessary to maintain the dam in a safe condition on a long-term basis.

(5) DAM SAFETY CONDITIONS CLASSIFICATIONS.—The term "dam safety condition classifications" means the following classifications cited in the Bureau of Reclamation glossary of dam safety terms:

(A) SATISFACTORY.—No existing or potential dam safety deficiencies are recognized. Safe performance is expected under all anticipated conditions.

(B) FAIR.—No existing dam safety deficiencies are recognized for normal loading conditions. Infrequent hydrologic or seismic events would probably result in a dam safety deficiency.

(C) CONDITIONALLY POOR.—A potential dam safety deficiency is recognized for unusual loading conditions that may realistically occur during the expected life of the structure.

(D) POOR.—A potential dam safety deficiency is clearly recognized for normal loading conditions. Immediate actions to resolve the deficiency are recommended; reservoir restrictions may be necessary until resolution of the problem.

(E) UNSATISFACTORY.—A dam safety deficiency exists for normal loading conditions. Immediate remedial action is required for resolution of the problem.

SEC. 4. ACTIONS BY SECRETARY.

(a) ESTABLISHMENT OF DAM SAFETY OPERATION AND MAINTENANCE PROGRAM.—The Secretary shall establish a dam safety operation and maintenance program within the BIA to ensure the regular, recurring, routine maintenance, examination, and monitoring of the condition of each dam identified pursuant to subsection (c) necessary to maintain the dam in a satisfactory condition on a long-term basis.

(b) REHABILITATION.—The Secretary is directed to perform such rehabilitation work as is necessary to bring the dams identified pursuant to subsection (c) to a satisfactory condition. Upon the completion of rehabilitation work on each dam, the dam shall be placed under the dam safety operation and maintenance program established pursuant to subsection (a) and shall be regularly maintained under the guidelines of such program.

(c) LIST OF DAMS.—The Secretary shall develop a comprehensive list of dams located on Indian lands in New Mexico that are in a fair, conditionally poor, poor, or unsatisfactory condition, as such terms are defined in section 3(5).

(d) PURPOSE.—Work authorized by this Act shall be for the purposes of dam safety operation and maintenance and not for the purposes of providing additional conservation storage capacity or developing benefits beyond those provided by the original dams and reservoirs.

(e) TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE.—To carry out the purposes of this Act, the Secretary may obtain technical assistance from agencies other than the BIA under his jurisdiction, such as the Bureau of Reclamation, or from other departments through memoranda of understanding, such as the Department of Defense. Notwithstanding any such technical assistance, the safety of dams program and the dam safety operation and maintenance program shall remain under the direction of the BIA.

(f) CONTRACT AUTHORITY.—In addition to any other authority established by law, the Secretary is authorized to contract with appropriate Indian tribes to carry out the dam safety operation and maintenance program established pursuant to this Act.

SEC. 5. AUTHORIZATION

There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act.●

By Mr. SEYMOUR:

S. 2618. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Service Code of 1986 to exempt vessels of 100 gross tons or less from the tax on transportation of persons by water; to the Committee on Finance.

EXEMPTION OF SMALL VESSELS FROM PASSENGER TAX

● Mr. SEYMOUR. Mr. President, I rise to introduce legislation that will clarify a provision of the Internal Revenue Code. During consideration of the 1989 Budget Reconciliation Act, Congress included a provision placing a $3 per-passenger fee on vessels headed for international waters. The purpose of this tax was to target those ships offering unrestricted gambling on the high seas, and traditional cruise vessels. This is similar to the tax levied on airline passengers departing for international destinations.

Unfortunately, small passenger vessels offering such activities as sport fishing, whale watching, and recreational diving are being jeopardized because the Internal Revenue Service [IRS] has misinterpreted the intentions of Congress. As of April 1990, the IRS required the operators of these small vessels to pay the $3 per-passenger fee. However, a final ruling on this matter has not been issued by the IRS.

Small vessel operators charge their passengers much less than traditional cruise lines. Subjecting these vessels to the passenger tax could very possibly put many operators out of business. Therefore, I am introducing today legislation to clarify congressional intent, and protect small operators from this unfairness. My bill will exempt small vessels from the fee by requiring only vessels over 100 gross tons to be subject to the tax.

Mr. President, I hope my colleagues will join me in supporting this important corrective legislation. We all can agree that there are certain occasions in the Senate to clarify the intentions of Congress. Clearly, this is one of those occasions.●

By Mr. GLENN:

S. 2619, a bill to amend the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 to enact provisions governing the negotiation and award of contracts under the Multiple Award Schedule Program of the General Services Administration; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

MULTIPLE AWARD SCHEDULE PROGRAM REFORM ACT

● Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, today I introduce the Multiple Award Schedule Program Reform Act of 1992. This bill will, for the first time, establish a statutory procedure to specifically govern a Federal contracting program worth in excess of $4 billion per year.

Under the Multiple Award Schedule Contract Program, the General Services Administration, acting as a central agent for the Federal Government, awards contracts to multiple offerors for a large variety of commercial products and services. These products range from standard office supplies to complex computer equipment and services. Executive agencies authorized to use these contracts simply place orders at prenegotiated prices which are intended to reflect the Government's volume purchasing power.

The schedules program has been the subject of recurring debate regarding whether the Government actually receives a good deal on the products and services acquired. We have heard complaints, as well, that agencies fail to follow existing procedures when using schedule contracts, resulting in their making purchases at other than the lowest cost. Schedule contractors complain that GSA makes unreasonable pricing demands which conflict with established commercial selling practices and thus drive up costs to the Government.

At the heart of these issues, is, I believe, the lack of any clear statutory provisions to govern the process. In particular, I am concerned that GSA's imposition of a vague policy requirement to receive an offeror's most favored commercial customer pricing may actually result in increased costs to the Government. Indeed, there have been reported cases of companies being denied schedule contracts solely for failure to offer GSA their most favored commercial customer pricing, despite the fact that their competitors had been awarded contracts for similar products at higher prices. As a result, executive agencies, for whose benefit the program is intended, are left to pay the difference. This bill would cure that problem by making fair and reasonable prices the objective in schedule contract negotiations. It is also my belief that this bill will have the effect of increasing the number of offerors participating in the schedules program. That increase in offerors will translate into more schedule contracts. With an increase in schedule contracts, the government will enjoy a ripple of benefits, specifically an increase in competitive pressure on prices and in the variety of products and services for agencies to choose from.

Section 2 of the bill would amend the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 to add a new section defining the procedures of the Multiple Award Schedule Contract Program. The fundamental objective of the program is stated at the outset: to provide executive agencies with a simplified means to acquire limited quantities of commercial products and services at fair and reasonable prices. The new section then sets forth procedural provisions regarding the award and administration of schedule contracts to meet that objective.

With respect to the award of schedule contracts, the section provides that among other things:

GSA's pricing objective will be to obtain fair and reasonable prices. Negotiation of fair and reasonable prices is the paramount requirement applicable to every acquisition by the government. This well-established requirement would replace the existing vague and often counter-productive policy objective of GSA to obtain "most favored customer" pricing.

The determination of fair and reasonable prices would be made using either price or cost analysis under applicable procurement regulations. Since commercial products and services are solicited under the schedules program, price analysis, which essentially involves the consideration of comparable commercial catalog and market prices for the items involved, would ordinarily be used.

The determination of fair and reasonable prices would take into consideration the unique features of the schedules program, such as the total aggregate volume of purchases to be expected under a schedule contract and the existence of multiple ordering and delivery sites to be administered.

Only the minimum amount of data necessary to conduct effective negotiations would be required from schedule offerors. This restriction is intended to make the schedules program disclosure requirements consistent with the Paperwork Reduction Act.

Prices under awarded schedule contracts would be subject to adjustment as necessary to assure that they remain fair and reasonable. An appropriate implementing clause must be included in every contract for this purpose.

Disappointed offerors would be able to protest decisions of the contracting officer in connection with the award of schedule contracts to the GSA Board of Contract Appeals, a forum with established expertise in this area.

With respect to administration of schedule contracts, the section includes certain agency justification and reporting requirements. Orders in excess of $2,500, at other than the lowest deliverable price, would have to be reported to the advocate for competition of the agency who will be responsible for policing the agency's compliance with the procedures governing the use of schedule contracts. The intent here is to respond to complaints we have heard that agencies are ignoring or failing to follow those procedures. While I am very disturbed by such complaints, the sensible answer does not lie in burdening agencies with additional procedures, but in more effectively policing compliance with the procedures which already exist and have not been proven ineffective.

The section would also require that a senior procurement executive be appointed within GSA to manage the schedules program and interface with executive agencies and industry. A program of this magnitude certainly warrants the existence of a single responsible official who can account for its proper management. The section would also require the development of a training program within GSA for the appropriate training of agency personnel responsible for the negotiation and award of schedule contracts.

Section 3 of the bill would require GSA to revise its existing procedures to conform to the provisions of the bill by no later than their effective date.

Section 4 of the bill would make the provisions of the bill effective 120 days after its enactment.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I believe that this bill contains needed reform which will substantially benefit the procurement system. I look forward to working with you and my other colleagues toward its enactment.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a more detailed section-by-section analysis be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the analysis was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MULTIPLE AWARD SCHEDULE PROGRAM REFORM ACT OF 1992 SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

This bill, the Multiple Award Schedule Program Reform Act of 1992, will improve the multiple award schedule program, administered by the General Services Administration, by giving it clear statutory basis and setting forth needed provisions to govern the award and administration of schedule contracts.

Section 1. Section 1 provides that the title of the bill is the "Multiple Award Schedule Program Reform Act of 1992".

Section 2. Section 2 of the bill adds a new section 113 to Title 1 of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 to define the objective and scope of the procedures used by the Administrator of the General Services Administration in the negotiation and award of contracts under the multiple award schedule program.

New subsection 113(a) contains definitions of the terms "multiple award schedule program" and "multiple award schedule contracts".

New subsection 113(b) states generally that the procedures shall be intended to provide Federal agencies with a simplified means to acquire limited quantities of commercially available items and services at fair and reasonable prices.

Paragraph (1) of the new subsection provides that the pricing objective of the General Services Administration in negotiating multiple award schedule contracts shall be to obtain fair and reasonable prices. This paragraph further prohibits the award of a scheduled contract absent a written determination that this objective has been achieved. This paragraph also provides that no award may be withheld unless a supportable determination of fair and reasonable prices cannot be made.

Paragraph (2) of the new subsection provides that schedule contract prices ordinarily shall be negotiated based upon established catalog or market prices for the offered items. The basis for price negotiations shall be cost or pricing data when such data is required by applicable law.

Paragraph (3) of the new subsection provides that the determination of fair and reasonable prices under multiple award schedule contracts shall be made in accordance with either price or cost analysis, whichever applies. Subparagraph (3)(A) provides that when price analysis is used, all relevant and reasonably available information called for by regulation shall be considered, inclusive of the offeror's discount and pricing policies for those commercial buyers purchasing in substantial quantities under terms and conditions similar to the government, and the prices offered by other schedule offerors for similar items.

Subparagraph (3)(B) provides that the fair and reasonable price determination shall take into consideration the aggregate volume of purchases to be expected under the schedule contract, as well as the lack of any minimum quantity commitments. This subparagraph also requires that appropriate consideration be given to the existence of multiple agency ordering and delivery sites to be administered under the contract.

Subparagraph (3)(C) provides that the government shall be considered an end-user buyer for purposes of conducting negotiations. This subparagraph also provides that primary consideration in determining fair and reasonable prices, using price analysis, shall be given to the offeror's discount and pricing policies relative to its large volume, end-user commercial buyers.

Paragraph (4) of the new subsection restricts the amount of discount and sales information to be submitted by schedule offerors to the minimum information necessary to support a fair and reasonable price determination. Thus, information concerning an offeror's non-end user commercial buyers operating under different terms and conditions ordinarily should not be required. This restriction is intended to make the disclosure requirements consistent with the provisions of the Paperwork Reduction Act.

Paragraph (5)(A) of the new subsection provides that prices under awarded schedule contracts shall be subject to adjustment whenever necessary to remain fair and reasonable. Paragraph (5)(B) identifies those circumstances which would provide a basis for a schedule price adjustment.

Paragraph (5)(C) restricts the amount of any schedule price adjustment to that which is necessary to make the price fair and reasonable in the determination of the contracting officer.

Paragraph (5)(D) provides that reduced price sales to Federal agencies shall not be the basis for schedule price adjustments where such sales are in excess of the schedule contract maximum order limitation and are made using competitive procedures.

Paragraph (5)(E) requires that all multiple award schedule contracts include appropriate reporting requirements in order to implement required schedule price adjustments.

New subsection 113(c) includes certain provisions regarding the use of multiple award schedule contracts by authorized agencies. Paragraph (1) of the new subsection reaffirms the requirement in existing law that orders under multiple award schedule contracts be placed so as to obtain the lowest overall cost alternative to meet the needs of the agency.

Paragraph (2) of the new subsection imposes a justification and reporting requirement on user agencies when placing orders under schedule contracts in excess of $2,500 at greater than the lowest deliverable price under any such contract. Such orders would have to be reported to the advocate for competition of the agency for consideration in connection with performance of the advocate's duties and responsibilities set forth in the Office of Federal Procurement Policy Act.

New subsection 113(d) includes certain miscellaneous provisions. Paragraph (1) of the new subsection requires that all schedule contracts for periods in excess of one year provide for at least annual "open seasons" for solicitation of additional offerors.

Paragraph (2) of the new subsection requires that a procedure exist within the General Services Administration for appeals by schedule offerors of contracting officer decisions on preaward pricing matters. Such appeals would be made to the head of the cognizant contracting office or an appropriate designee at a level above the contracting officer.

Paragraph (3) of the new subsection requires that the Administrator appoint a senior procurement executive to be responsible for management direction of the multiple award schedule program in order to assure that the objectives and provisions of this section are achieved. This paragraph also requires that the appointed individual implement procedures to assure the timely award and administration of schedule contracts, and serve as the Administrator's liaison to executive agencies and industry.

Paragraph (4) of the new subsection requires that the Administrator develop and maintain a training program for personnel involved in the negotiation and award of multiple award schedule contracts to assure that they have adequate knowledge of the program, basic commercial business practices and price and cost analysis techniques.

Paragraph (5) of the new subsection provides that user agencies shall be provided access to all multiple award schedule contracts which are awarded, as well as appropriate guidance concerning the use of such contracts in accordance with applicable procurement regulations.

New subsection 113(e) provides that offerors for multiple award schedule contracts may protest decisions of a contracting officer or an individual designated under subsection 113(d)(2), in connection with the award or failure to award a schedule contract, to the board of contract appeals of the General Services Administration. The subsection further provides that the board shall review such protests using the standard applicable to review of contracting officer final decisions. The subsection also provides that such protests shall be subject to the procedures which govern protests filed under the authority of section 111(f) of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act.

Subsection (b) of Section 2 of the bill conforms the Table of Contents in the first section of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 to add a new item referencing "Sec. 113. Multiple Award Schedule Program procedures."

Subsection (c) of Section 2 of the bill amends Section 20(b) of the Office of Federal Procurement Policy Act to require that agency advocates for competition review the compliance of their respective agencies with the regulations governing the use of multiple award schedule contracts.

Section 3. Section 3 of the bill requires that the Administrator revise the existing procedures for the negotiation and award of multiple award schedule contracts to reflect the provisions of this bill. Such revised provisions are to be finalized by the effective date of the Act and shall apply to all schedule contracts awarded after such date.

Section 4. Section 4 of the bill provides that the amendments made by the bill will become effective 120 days after enactment.●

By Mr. KENNEDY:

S. 2621 A bill to improve the administrative provisions and make technical corrections in the National Community Services Act of 1990; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

NATIONAL AND COMMUNITY SERVICE TECHNICAL AMENDMENT ACT

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, today I am introducing the National and Community Service Technical Amendments Act of 1992. This legislation makes minor technical and administrative changes in the National and Community Service Act of 1990. These modifications will help the Commission on National Service, the independent agency created to administer the act, to do a more effective job of carrying out its mission of involving more Americans in service to their community and their country.

These amendments have the support of the National Service Commission, the Bush administration, and Senators HATCH and MIKULSKI. These changes will improve the Commission's ability to expand the numbers of citizens involved in addressing the most pressing problems facing communities across the Nation, such as illiteracy, homelessness, drug abuse, and poverty.

These amendments will enhance implementation of the act in several ways. They will allow the Commission to perform better evaluations of programs it funds, thereby improving the efficiency and effectiveness of the act. The amendments clarify Congress' intent that the Commission has the ability to appoint an executive director, bring in outside experts from the community service field to provide the best technical assistance possible, and hire such staff as is necessary to handle day-to-day administration.

Also, the amendments made explicit the Commission's authority to hire consultants, accept donations of services and property, and enter into agreements with other Federal agencies in order to share information or personnel. Finally, the amendments raise the authorization level for the Commission from $2 million to $3 million a year. The budgetary increase is essential for the Commission to fulfill its numerous statutory mandates, monitor the grants awarded in the first year of implementation, and distribute an anticipated increased number of grants in the second year.

The National Service Commission is guided by an extraordinarily diverse and talented Board of Directors. It has shown commendable energy and dedication throughout the implementation process. In 6 months' time, they have issued preliminary rules and regulations, held hearings across the country to receive public comments, promulgated final regulations, and accepted grant applications. This week, they began evaluating and reviewing the several hundred proposals received. The Commission and its staff deserves great credit for these tireless efforts. These technical amendments will facilitate this important work, and I look forward to prompt approval of the amendments by Congress.

By Mr. ROBB:

S. 2622. A bill to establish an Office of Cambodian Genocide Investigation, to support efforts to bring to justice national Khmer Rouge leaders who committed crimes against humanity on Cambodia, and to exclude the national leadership of the Khmer Rouge from the United States; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

KHMER ROUGE PROSECUTION AND EXCLUSION ACT

• Mr. ROBB. Mr. President, a longtime scholar of Cambodia, recently observed that it is common to hear the view expressed among Cambodians about the Khmer Rouge that "Pol Pot massacred his own Khmer People". Auto-genocide, the killing of one's own people doesn't appear in Webster's dictionary, but the "word" aptly describes what happened to the Cambodian people during the Khmer Rouge's 3½ year reign of terror between 1975 and early 1979. Sadder yet, the international community passes the autogenocide issue by as if nothing happened.

Mr. President, diplomacy, in part, entails understanding a foreign country's history, and applying that wisdom in the future. How can the international community help build a better future for Cambodia, if it fails to help remedy the psychological wounds from that country's genocidal past?

During his recent visit to Washington, I spoke privately, with Cambodian Prime Minister Hun Sen about the genocidal Khmer Rouge, and the current challenges facing his nation. Hun Sen expressed to me his moral outrage about the slaughter of over a million innocent Cambodians, at Pol Pot's behest in the 1970's, but he despaired when I asked what could be done about pursuing the issue of genocide. On such a difficult question, I realize there are few easy answers. When I travel back to Phnom Penh in less than 2 weeks, I will raise the matter again with the Prime Minister, and others in hopes of reminding Cambodians that we have not forgotten about Pol Pot's atrocities.

Mr. President, more than a decade after the killing fields, the presence of the Khmer Rouge still haunts this war-ravaged nation. We're in the midst of a massive U.N. peacekeeping operation that points toward elections, presumably sometime next year, with no assurance that the Khmer Rouge, who have been dealt a hand at the table as part of a calculated gamble to restore lasting peace in Cambodia, will not be returned to power.

Mr. President, I believe pressure must be brought to bear, now, on the national military, and political leadership of the Khmer Rouge within the parameters of the Paris Peace Accord, and the legislation I am introducing today, accomplishes this feat.

The Khmer Rouge Prosecution and Exclusion Act, establishes a State Department office located in Cambodia to investigate crimes against humanity, committed by national Khmer Rouge leaders, in the period beginning April 17, 1975, and ending January 7, 1979, provides the people of Cambodia with access to documents, records, and other evidence, held by this newly created office, and requires that the relevant data accumulated be submitted to an international tribunal, that hopefully, will be convened at a later date to formally hear and judge the genocidal acts committed by the Khmer Rouge.

Mr. President, the legislation is quite simple. It is aimed directly at the national leadership of the Khmer Rouge. Establishment of an investigative office is in no way designed to affect the interim U.N. administration of Cambodia, or the eventual conduct of elections. Our administration should in no way interpret this measure as an obstacle to current United States and United Nations efforts, to create a framework for elections in Cambodia, which I strongly support. In fact, if anything the legislation could create a more informed electorate in Cambodia, singling out certain Khmer Rouge leaders as the lawless hoodlums they pretend not to be.

Mr. President, those of us interested in bringing to justice, the national military and political leadership of the Khmer Rouge, find ourselves, in an awkward position. Literally, what steps can be taken to prosecute Pol Pot, Khieu Samphan, Son Sen, Leng Sary, Nuon Chea, Ke Pauk, Mok, Leng Thirith, Yun Yat, and others for their past actions?

Applying the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide holds some promise, since the Senate has ratified it and Cambodia abides by it, but unfortunately language in the Convention suggests, at least to me, conditional jurisdiction.

Specifically, let me quote from the report issued by the Foreign Relations Committee in 1985 when the Convention was considered and ratified:

Article II limits the crime of Genocide to acts aimed at the destruction of national, ethnical, racial, or religious groups. The terms are meant to extend coverage of the convention to as many groups as possible. The principal group excluded from article II is a group that is identifiable on the basis of its political beliefs alone. A group defined solely by its opposition to an occupying power, for example, is not protected by the Convention.

Khmer Rouge leaders, who I understand have read provisions of the Genocide Convention with an eye for detail, view article II as a potential loophole. And they may be right. Pol Pot and his cohorts, might claim that it was their political beliefs alone that caused the opposition to be joined, which would fortuitously rule out their being defined as genocide offenders under article II.

Additionally, Mr. President, article VI of the Genocide Convention states that:

Persons charged with genocide or any other acts * * * shall be tried by a competent tribunal of the State in the territory of which the act was committed, or by such international penal tribunal as may have jurisdiction with respect to those Contracting Parties which shall have accepted its jurisdiction.

In other words, consent from Cambodian leaders, whomever they may be when elected, will be necessary in order to prosecute Pol Pot and other national leaders. Thus, understanding the conditionality involved in pursuing the matter, I urge the international community to gather itself to challenge the Khmer Rouge leadership's convoluted arguments, justifications, and denials for not being put on trial. This legislation can serve as a useful means for achieving that end. And while I understand there has not yet been an instance where the Genocide Convention has been successfully invoked, this should not deter us from attempting to apply its provisions to the Khmer Rouge.

Mr. President, this legislation seeks to create momentum now so that we may prosecute Pol Pot and his henchmen later. The bill casts proper light on these wanton killers of the Cambodian people, and begin the effort to establish an official and conclusive record of the crimes against humanity committed by the Khmer Rouge.

Mr. President, on the subject of genocide, I've been struck recently by the acute interest in the plight of the Kurds. Notable figures, such as Jeanne Kirkpatrick and Senator Dole, have termed what happened in Kurdistan as genocide, and I have no quarrel with their characterizations. Regarding the Kurdish population in Iraq, 3 weeks ago the minority leader asked, "where is the outrage? Have we not learned from Hitler's holocaust, from the killing fields of Cambodia?" Unfortunately, the factual record on the killing fields in Cambodia is incomplete, and as the years slip by it becomes more difficult to establish in any comprehensive fashion, exactly what happened during those years of terror. History is being whitewashed, much to the delight and satisfaction of Pol Pot.

However, the legislation I am introducing today, will vastly expand our base of knowledge by documenting, collecting, organizing, and evaluating information on the atrocities committed by national Khmer Rouge leaders against Cham Moslems, Khmer peasants, Buddhist Monks, ethnic Chinese, and scores of others. It will also make clear, this body's abhorrence of such mass extermination campaigns, and demonstrate what can be done in the aftermath to prevent them from ever happening, again.

Mr. President, if someone were to suggest that initiating a broad scale investigation of these renegades, sounds good but is far-fetched, there is a modern day precedent for such fact gathering and documentation to consider relating to war crimes committed in Kuwait, by Iraqi occupiers. In August, 1990, the State Department, and Department of Defense began to pursue Iraqi war criminals. Dozens of officials at State and DOD were tasked to collect information, interview victims and eyewitnesses, track media reports, debrief Iraqi defectors, cultivate foreign sources, and establish an overall data base, of evidence, in order to prosecute, at some later date, those individuals responsible for committing war crimes. A War Crimes Documentation Center, was established to serve as the point of control and direction, for the operation. Significant expenditures were made, to gather the information, and I understand the accumulation of evidence is continuing.

Mr. President, in order to make the strongest case possible against Pol Pot and his collaborators, we need to establish a similar type of operation on the ground in Cambodia. While some may argue that a statute of limitations exists, I simply don't believe that's the case. Too many Cambodians died, horrible senseless deaths for us to let this slip from our memories, and the future of this country is too important for us to move ahead without properly reflecting on what's happened.

At the signing of the Paris Peace Accord, Secretary of State Baker committed the United States to supporting "efforts to bring to justice, those responsible for the mass murders of the 1970's, if the new Cambodian government, chooses, to pursue this path," but that places a heavy burden on future Cambodian leaders. We need to begin providing strong incentives, now, not later, to the future leadership of the country to choose to prosecute the national Khmer Rouge leaders, and this legislation will provide factual grounds for going that route.

Mr. President, a U.S. initiated, U.S. funded, and U.S. operated investigative office will increase the likelihood that an airtight case is made against specific perpetrators when and if a penal tribunal is convened, while keeping the spotlight on these common law criminals in the interim. Any Cambodian, will be able to learn about his or her country's grisly history, and we can hope specific information about how and when and where a relative was executed.

Make no mistake, Mr. President, being held accountable is what national Khmer Rouge leaders fear most. An Office of Cambodian Genocide Investigation will allow the international community, led by the United States, to take the first tentative steps toward hunting down these individuals for their crimes against humanity. It will tighten the noose on the Khmer Rouge, and I believe, every Member would agree on the worthiness of that goal.●

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, today, I am submitting a concurrent resolution which deals with Thomas Paine. Thomas Paine wrote Common Sense, The American Crisis, The Rights of Man. He converted the Colonial discontent into action. He was the first Founding Father to publicly advocate the abolition of slavery in North America. Yet he has not yet been honored with even a plague in our Nation's Capitol, although there is a small painting of his profile on a ceiling on the House Side, thanks to Senator Max Mathias and Representatives Augustus Hawkins and Fred Schwengel.

This legislation I am submitting today will allow the private sector to construct a modest memorial in the form of a heroic statue, to Thomas Paine on publicly owned land at the intersection of Pennsylvania and Constitution Avenues on the grounds of the Capitol. This memorial will be constructed entirely with volunteer contributions at no cost to the taxpayer, and visitors to Washington will no longer wonder why we have overlooked one of the most important figures in American history.

Under the terms of the legislation, the Architect of the Capitol has total authority to ensure the memorial is consistent with our Capitol's design and beauty.

Paine emigrated from England to Pennsylvania at the urging of Ben Franklin. Immediately after arriving Paine published attacks on slavery and the subjugation of women, followed by the first call to separate from England and create the United States of America as a free and sovereign democratic nation with a written constitution for the purpose of: "securing freedom and property to all men, and above all things, the free exercise of religion, according to the dictates of conscience."

Paine's most important works were published in Pennsylvania, so not surprisingly, he influenced the authors of the Pennsylvania Constitution, which contains many of the limits on Government power which first appeared in "Common Sense" and now are in our U.S. Constitution and Bill of Rights. As early as 1776 Paine published arguments for a representative, democratically elected government. Additionally, he successfully advocated the protection of individual and States rights while reconciling them with the need for a strong union for defense and to facilitate trade.

Mr. President, imagine with me if you will what might have happened had Ben Franklin not asked Thomas Paine to leave his birthplace in England and move to North America.

Imagine that Thomas Paine had not written "African Slavery in America," in 1774 which inspired the establishment of the first abolitionist society in North America.

Imagine that Paine had not written "Common Sense," and that it had not sold well over 100,000 copies to the few million people living here at that time.

Imagine that Paine's work, "The American Crisis," had not been available for General George Washington to have read to his troops, resulting in the victory at the Battle of Trenton in the closing moments of 1776.

Mr. President, suffice it to say that without Thomas Paine, the history of our Nation would have been a lot different.

I am not saying that we would still be a colony of England, simply that Thomas Paine was the catalyst who converted colonial angst into concrete action, and lifted the spirits of our retreating army, on the verge of defeat and converted their frustration, hunger and discontent into a bold and decisive victory.

Mr. President, like I have been, I am sure many of our colleagues have been asked by their constituents why there has never been a monument erected here in Washington, DC to Thomas Paine, for families to see that visit here to recognize this great American, one of the Founding Fathers.

Incidentally, our schoolchildren are taught that he was a principal force in founding the United States of America, a term that he made popular, "the United States of America."

In "African Slavery in America," Paine identified the despicable nature of slavery, and the fundamental human rights it violated.

In "Common Sense," Paine laid the blueprint for freedom for our Nation, including a call for independence and written, constitutional protection of religious and property rights.

In "The American Crisis," Paine challenged the tired, cold, hungry, retreating troops to stand for freedom. He insisted, that indeed:

There are the times that try men's souls, The Summer Soldier and the Sunshine Patriot will, in this crisis, shrink from the service of their country; but he who stands now deserves the love and thanks of men and women.

And they won. It was the battle of Trenton, George Washington's first victory in the Revolution.

Mr. President, I want to see a monument to Thomas Paine erected here on Capitol Hill. Families visiting Washington, DC, have wondered too long why Thomas Paine is not memorialized in the Nation's Capital even though their children are taught he was a principal force in the founding of the United States of America, incidentally, a term he made popular.

Many of our colleagues, representing very diverse States and political philosophies have joined professors department chairs, and presidents of more than 80 of our Nation's colleges, universities, and respected organizations to finally accord Thomas Paine the honor he deserves as a Founder of our Nation.

As many of our colleagues may know, Thomas Paine called for revolution and independence while many patriotic leaders were still advocating reconciliation with the British monarchy. In essence Thomas Paine started the American Revolution by publishing "Common Sense."

His accomplishments are truly amazing. He wrote the best-selling publication written during his lifetime, yet he never got beyond grammar school. He was raised in poverty with tremendous respect for individual effort and liberty.

Prior to emigrating to America from England, Paine was a stay maker, a British exciseman, a schoolteacher, tobacconist, and grocer. In November 1774, he arrived in America with a letter of introduction from his friend, Benjamin Franklin who characterized him an "ingenious, worthy young man."

Paine's adult life was as difficult his childhood. His first wife, Mary, died almost 1 year after they married. His second wife, Elizabeth, separated from him after 3 years of marriage. Paine never had children.

Though poverty forced him to leave school at a young age, Paine educated himself. His deep understanding of current events and the sciences came strictly through his own desire, hard work, and discipline.

Thomas Paine came to Philadelphia on the November 30, 1774 to become what he would go down as in history: a journalist. He began by writing a broad range of articles for a publication called Pennsylvania magazine.

Even though Paine championed the abolition of slavery his first writings in America, it was "Common Sense" published in 1776 which enshrined him as a forefather of the American Revolution.

"Common Sense" stands as one of the great writings of all time. In this landmark publication of American history, Paine demonstrated that the Colonies had not only a practical, but also a moral obligation to immediately declare total Independence.

If Independence was embraced while American society was young, relatively pure and without corruption, Americans could demonstrate that indeed: "we have the power to make the world over again." Americans could show that if government respected private property, equal rights, religious freedom and individual liberty our society has the power to create opportunity and to advance society more than any other time in history. How right he was Mr. President.

He was a visionary who knew we had a mission. Paine was the first journalist to recognize that Americans could alter history and be a beacon for freedom.

Paine's political ideology blended a belief in limited government to protect individuals' rights while maintaining a strong Federal union for national defense and development of trade. He explained these complementary values in "Common Sense," the Crisis papers and later in the pamphlet, Public Good.

When there were only a few million people in the Colonies, "Common Sense" sold more than 100,000 copies—that must certainly be a record in per capita readership. Maintaining his austere existence, Paine gave all profits from "Common Sense" to buy mittens and shoes for the soldiers of the Northern Continental Army, incidentally led by General Montgomery and Ethan Allen—who I have heard is, a relative of our distinguished colleague, the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. PELL].

In 1776, Paine enlisted in the army. The situation was bleak, the enlistments of the Continental Army were expiring and its soldiers had known only retreat. With the large British army within striking distance of Philadelphia, Paine wrote the first "Crisis" paper, called the "American Crisis I."

The piece was so striking and motivational that General Washington ordered it read to the soldiers. The words galvanized them to action. Led by Washington, they crossed the Delaware and inflicted an important defeat on the better armed, and larger British and Hessian forces in New Jersey.

If you can picture this, Mr. President, it was cold, miserable and they were hungry. They had never seen victory. They had been chased and chased all the way from New York down through New Jersey to Pennsylvania. On the banks of the Delaware River—here were Paine's inspirational words from American Crisis I, that General Washington ordered read to the troops:

These are the times that try men's souls. The summer soldier and the sunshine patriot will, in this crisis, shrink from the service of their country; but he that stands it now, deserves the love and thanks of man and women. Tyranny, like hell, is not easily conquered; yet we have this consolation with us, that the harder the conflict, the more glorious the triumph. What we obtain too cheap, we esteem too lightly; it is dearness only that gives everything its value.

In April 1777, at the suggestion of John Adams, Thomas Paine was appointed by the Continental Congress to be Secretary to its Committee on Foreign Affairs in America, while his friend Ben Franklin was stationed in France serving Americans as his counterpart.

Many of the French oppressed under the monarchy, had read translated copies of Paine's defenses of freedom. They found the arguments so compelling that he also is credited with an important role in the French Revolution, prior to the reign of terror, during which he was imprisoned for attempting to ensure the rights of individuals to control their government. He was even honored with 4 seats in the new French national constitutional convention, one of which he accepted.

October 16, 1789, Paine wrote to George Washington and said, "A share in two revolutions is living to some purpose."

In the spring of 1791, Paine published the first part of "The Rights of Man" which he designed to carry the principles of the American revolution to Europe.

In the "The Rights of Man" Paine wrote:

Government exists to guarantee to the individual that portion of his natural rights of which unaided he could not ensure himself. These rights, with respect to which all men are equal, are liberty, property, security, and resistance to oppression. Only a republican form of government can be trusted to maintain these rights; and the republic must have a written constitution, including a bill of rights; manhood suffrage, executive orders chosen for short terms and subjected to rotation in office, a judiciary not beyond ultimate control by the people, a legislative body popularly elected at regular intervals, and a citizenry undivided by artificial distinctions of birth and rank, by religious intolerance, by shocking economic inequalities.

What a great statement, Mr. President. "Such a republic," he argued, "will be well and cheaply governed for government is no farther necessary than to supply the few cases to which society and civilization are not conveniently competent."

Additionally, Thomas Paine always defended the right of men and women to worship and practice religion freely and in any form. Paine was raised a Quaker. However, throughout his adult life he was a devout Deist, like his peers George Washington, Ben Franklin and Thomas Jefferson. Paine affected the very founding of the United States of America. He was a fiery, head strong agitator, committed to the rights of individuals and the basic glory of the common man.

Paine gave American independence its rationale; he inspired a torn, cold army on the brink of defeat; he wrote to abolish slavery; he held the first post which later evolved into the Secretary of State; he participated in two revolutions defending the principles of liberty, nearly losing his life in the second, as well as risking his life in battle in the first. For Paine, human dignity was a natural right, not a privilege.

Maintaining his involvement in our Nation, Thomas Paine actively corresponded with his peers, like Thomas Jefferson and James Monroe, until he died in New York on June 8, 1809. His contribution to the founding and development of our country cannot be overstated. In truth, it is horribly understated. It is for this reason that Thomas Paine should be remembered with a monument to let us never forget this agitator for freedom. I want to quote President Kennedy, who in 1963 in then-West Berlin said Benjamin Franklin once said to Thomas Paine, the great American revolutionary, "Where freedom is, there is where I live." And Paine replied, "Where freedom is not, there is where I live, because no man or country can be really free unless all men and all countries are free."

Mr. President, I hope my colleagues in the Senate who have been so generous with their support will help us, and I know they will, in an effort to authorize the private sector to construct a fitting but modest memorial to this great patriot at no cost to the taxpayer.

Mr. President, I send to the desk the resolution on behalf of myself, Senators ADAMS, AKAKA, BOND, BOREN, BREAUX, BROWN, BURDICK, BURNS, COATS, COCHRAN, COHEN, CONRAD, CRAIG, CRANSTON, D'AMATO, DANFORTH, DASCHLE, DECONCINI, DODD, DOLE, DOMENICI, DURENBERGER, FOWLER, GARN, GORTON, GRASSLEY, HARKIN, HATCH, HATFIELD, HEFLIN, HELMS, HOLLINGS, INOUE, JEFFORDS, KASSEBAUM, KASTEN, KENNEDY, LEVIN, LIEBERMAN, LOTT, LUGAR, MACK, MCCAIN, MCCONNELL, MIKULSKI, MURKOWSKI, NICKLES, NUNN, PACKWOOD, PELL, PRESSLER, REID, RIEGLE, ROBB, ROCKEFELLER, ROTH, RUDMAN, SANFORD, SARBANES, SEYMOUR, SHELBY, SIMON, SIMPSON, SMITH, SPECTER, STEVENS, THURMOND, WARNER, WELLSTONE, and WOFFORD.

Mr. President, these 71 Senators include 12 of the 16 members of the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration. I would like to pay special thanks to the distinguished Presiding Officer for adding his name to this effort.

Mr. SYMMS, I might say to my distinguished colleague in the chair, that probably what will happen once this is passed is that the Thomas Paine Association will be around for a contribution to help build this heroic statue.

I would like to thank the Hon. Nita Lowey of New York for her support and hard work on the House side. They have a very diverse, broad-based bipartisan support over there, I am told there are over 225 members.

There are some differences in the two bills, although the Paine Association has now asked, with the overwhelming support of the historical community that both houses support the Senate version.

Essentially, the thrust of the efforts in both houses is to build a private sector memorial in recognition of Thomas Paine. Ours is site specific to have it here on the grounds at the crossroads of Pennsylvania and Constitution Avenues.

I might say for those who are watching or listening or will read this RECORD, the reason for that is Thomas Paine was a primary influence on the authors of the Constitution of the State of Pennsylvania, and made the first call for our written Constitution. Additionally he published his most important work in Pennsylvania.

We have selected a very appropriate location on the Capitol grounds that would be under the jurisdiction of the Architect of the Capitol, as directed by Congress upon the adoption of this concurrent resolution. Also it will make it much easier to raise these private sector funds to build this monument if the Senate and House agree to place it at the junction of Constitution and Pennsylvania Avenues.

I also would like to say special thanks to David Henley, the local representative of the Thomas Paine Association for his endless research and volunteer lobbying efforts; Doug Cooper, President of the Thomas Paine National Memorial Association of New Rochelle, NY for his commitment to complete the project and keep the ideas of freedom alive; to Florence Stapleton, the past President of the Association, and current head of the Thomas Paine Readers Club, without whose vision and commitment the Paine Association would not be flourishing today; and to Dr. Chuck Howarth, from Boise, ID, who is the person who originally brought this to my attention over the years of our friendship that goes clear back to the early sixties and his personal interest, and scholarship of Paine. He is an ophthalmologist in practice, but he often lectures at local colleges and universities in my State and in that region on the importance in our history of this great American. Additionally, Mr. President, Trevor Norris of my staff has taken on this project with the "zeal of a convert", and I appreciate his effort in securing so much support of our colleagues and the academic community.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a packet of letters from institutions, from professors, chairs or presidents endorsing the Thomas Paine memorial legislation, coming from some 80 universities, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE AMERICAN UNIVERSITY,
Washington, DC, February 7, 1992.

Senator STEVE SYMMS,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR SYMMS: I endorse your proposed legislation to authorize the Thomas Paine Memorial Foundation to place a statue of Paine on Capitol grounds at the intersection of Pennsylvania and Constitution Avenues.

Paine deserves special recognition for his authorship of the revolutionary pamphlet Common Sense. Common Sense was the first major call for independence and a republic. As such, it was a remarkably progressive and forward-looking message for its day. Written and published in January, 1776, Common Sense helped galvanize the decision to turn resistance into a movement for independence and a republican system of popularly elected confederated state governments.

For this alone, Paine deserves to be remembered by the statue you propose.

Sincerely,

ROGER H. BROWN,
Chair and Professor,
Department of History.

AMHERST, MA, April 4, 1992.

Senator STEVE SYMMS,
Hart Senate Building, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR SYMMS: I take great pleasure in endorsing your legislation to allow the construction of a monument to Thomas Paine.

Amidst your laboring to gather endorsements for the project I take the liberty to remind you of the most powerful endorsement of Paine and his contributions to America's founding:

"It will be your glory to have steadily labored, and with as much effect as any man living, to bring about the greatest of revolutions." (Thomas Jefferson.)

Best Wishes.

HENRY STEELE COMMAGER.

ARIZONA STATE UNIVERSITY,
DEPARTMENT OF HISTORY,
Tempe, AZ, February 12, 1992.

Senator STEVE SYMMS,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR SYMMS: I would like to offer my support for your efforts to establish a memorial to Thomas Paine in Washington, D.C. His pamphlet, Common Sense, was a catalyst for bringing colonial public opinion to the Patriot cause. Its importance can hardly be underestimated. Paine was truly one of our great revolutionary figures and, along with Jefferson, one of leading spokesmen defending Americans and American rights against British tyranny. He deserves to be honored in the capital of the nation he helped create.

Your proposal to erect a statue of Paine at the intersection of Constitution and Pennsylvania Avenues will be a worthy memorial to a great revolutionary leader.

Sincerely,

B.R. BURG,
Professor of Early
American History.

ARIZONA STATE UNIVERSITY,
Tempe, AZ, March 31, 1992.

Senator DENNIS D. DECONCINI,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR DECONCINI: This letter is to endorse Senator Symms' proposal to erect a statue memorializing Thomas Paine in Washington, DC., to be paid for by private subscription.

As editor of the scholarly history journal with the largest number of individual subscribers in the world today, with editorial offices at Arizona State University, I believe this historical recognition is meritorious.

This message will be conveyed to you by the hand of Trevor Norris, assistant to Senator Symms.

With best wishes to you in your current deliberations, I am,
Yours sincerely,

ROGER ADELSON,
Editor.

UNIVERSITY OF ARIZONA,
Tucson AZ, March 31, 1992.

Senator STEVE SYMMS,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR SYMMS: This letter is to register my support of proposed legislation to allow the Thomas Paine Memorial Foundation to place a memorial statue of Paine on the U.S. Capitol grounds near the intersection of Pennsylvania and Constitution avenues. That is a beautiful part of the Capitol grounds and a modest memorial to Paine there seems fitting given his role in the achievement of American independence.

Paine should have been recognized long before this. His Common Sense was of major significance in rousing American support for independence. While he denounced monarchy and urged the colonists to action, others debated the shape of our government to come. His ideas and stirring rhetoric helped persuaded many citizens to support the revolutionary movement. His other writings, The American Crisis and The Rights, of Man, developed his earlier ideas and added to the debate over independence and the sort of government the new nation should develop. Of all the significant figures of the revolutionary era, he is probably the least well-remembered, and he certainly deserves some recognition.

Sincerely yours,

ROGER L. NICHOLS,
Acting Department Head.

BROWN UNIVERSITY,
Providence, RI, February 14, 1992.

Senator STEVE SYMMS,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR SYMMS: I am happy to support legislation allowed private groups to erect a memorial to Thomas Paine. It is embarrassing to us as a nation to have delayed so long such a commemoration. Paine's Common Sense and his other writings were important to the American revolutionary cause. Because his contributions were entirely literary honoring Paine may get us to think again about the deplorable decay of our public rhetoric that has overspread us.

Sincerely,

GORDON WOOD,
Professor of History.

UNIVERSITY AT BUFFALO,
Buffalo, NY, February 13, 1992.

Senator DANIEL PATRICK MOYNIHAN,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR MOYNIHAN: This is to indicate my very strong support to establish a memorial to Thomas Paine on the grounds of the Capitol.

Paine was among the eighteenth century's most forceful advocate of democratic ideals. He played a decisive role in our history, and—far more than most of the founding fathers—his ideas continue to resonate today.
Sincerely,

JONATHAN DEWALD,
Professor and Chair.

BRIGHAM YOUNG UNIVERSITY,

Senator STEVE SYMMS,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR SYMMS: Please include my name among those endorsing your proposal that the intersection of constitution and Pennsylvania avenues be reserved for a privately funded memorial to Thomas Paine. In the courses that I have been teaching here for the past fifteen years, from the U.S. history survey to a graduate seminar on Revolutionary America, I stress Paine's importance and have my students read Common Sense. We need to leave behind those provincial years when Paine was dismissed as a filthy little atheist". He helped to turn a rebellion into a revolution; he expressed, in gritty and yet graceful prose, ideas that should stir anyone interested in fundamental rights and the necessity of representative government.

Sincerely,

NEIL L. YORK,
Associate Professor of History.

P.S.—I have sent notes to Senators Garn and Hatch, asking them to join you as cosponsors.

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA,
Los Angeles, March 6, 1992.

Senator ALAN CRANSTON,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR CRANSTON: A memorial statue of Thomas Paine on the Capitol grounds of Washington, D.C. would be a most appropriate tribute to a man who embodies the revolutionary spirit which fired America's first patriots. Most contemporaries recognized that it was Paine who acted as the catalyst in turning colonial leaders from resistance to revolution in 1776. His stirring rhetoric in "Common Sense" bridged the gulf between social ranks and geographic regions and united the disparate peoples of the colonies behind a shared desire for independence. It was a quite remarkable achievement for a man who had been in the colonies less than three years. In the "Rights of Man" and the "Age of Reason" Paine produced compelling arguments for humane reform which have enthralled readers ever since. With a statue in our Nation's Capital, many young people will be stirred to learn who Paine was and to read the words that thrilled their nation's founders.

I hope very much that you will become a cosponsor of the bill which Senator Steve Symms will soon be re-introducing.

Yours sincerely,

JOYCE APPLEBY,
Professor of History.

CASE WESTERN RESERVE UNIVERSITY,
March 16, 1992.

Senator STEVE SYMMS,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR SYMMS: As an American historian for over thirty-five years I heartily support the long overdue recognition of the role of Thomas Paine in the American Revolution on the site that you are projecting. Virtually all of the most prominent founders of our country are honored near or on the mall, such as Washington and Jefferson, with the glaring exception of Thomas Paine who merits a memorial at the corner of Pennsylvania and Constitution Avenues.

Last year this omission was brought home to me. I am President of National History Day Incorporated which is a program for promoting the study of history in the schools. Over 500,000 students participate annually in the fifty states and the top winners of local and state contests come to College Park in Maryland to compete for prizes and awards in a variety of categories in June of each year. This last year the theme of the contests was "Rights in History" to celebrate the bicentennial of the Bill of Rights. Students in this contest while touring Washington looked in vain for a monument, statue or a plaque honoring the author of the American Crisis, Common Sense, The Rights of Man, and The Age of Reason. The author, who in 1776 galvanized Americans with electric phrases such as "These are the times that try men's souls * * * the summer soldier and the sunshine patriot will, in this crisis, shrink from the service of their country," it seems is not remembered.

Carl Becker, a historian who wrote a history of the Declaration of Independence, also wrote a famous biographical article on Thomas Paine in the Dictionary of American Biography at the end of which he said that "conceivably the United States of America might have become a free nation had Common Sense never been written. But even those who see history determined by economic and other physical, concrete forces can hardly deny that Common Sense helped to humanize and to concentrate such forces."

I applaud your efforts to give this recognition to Thomas Paine on the Capitol grounds and I am sure that every senator and every representative will feel the same.

Sincerely yours,

DAVID D. VAN TASSEL,
Benton Professor and Chair,
President, National History Day, Inc.

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO,
Chicago, IL, March 18, 1991.

Senator PAUL SIMON,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR SIMON: I am writing in support of a proposal by the Thomas Paine National Historical Association to place a memorial to Thomas Paine on the Capitol grounds. The memorial would be paid for by private funds. I understand that the proposal has the sponsorship of more than half of the membership of the House of Representatives and that your support is important because of your membership on a key committee.

Thomas Paine was a crucial figure in the American Revolution, and it is surprising that no appropriate memorial to him stands in Washington. Paine's pamphlet, Common Sense was a key influence on the decision of both Congress and the American public to support independence in 1776, and his influence was felt at major turning points in the war with Britain.

Common Sense is a document I assign regularly to classes on the Revolution. I can tell you from personal experience that its ideas retain their force and immediacy to this day.

I urge you to give serious consideration to this proposal.

Sincerely,

EDWARD M. COOK, Jr.,
Associate Professor of
American History,
Dean of Students in the University.

UNIVERSITY OF CINCINNATI,
CINCINNATI, OH, April 3, 1992.

Senator JOHN GLENN,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR GLENN: On behalf of the Department of History I heartily endorse the legislation to authorize the Thomas Paine Memorial Foundation to place a statue of Paine on Capitol grounds at the intersection of Pennsylvania and Constitution Avenue. I hope you will join Senator Symms of Idaho and assist in gaining Senate approval of this long overdue recognition of an individual whose impact in his pamphlet "Common Sense" on the American Revolution was comparable to "Uncle Tom's Cabin" on the American Civil War.

I wish to note also that Thomas Paine was rediscovered by a Cincinnati minister in the late nineteenth century. Paine had almost been forgotten until Moncure Conway wrote a biography of him in 1892. Today, Americans could honor him by erection of this memorial to the individual who issued the first major call for independence and the establishment of a republic.

Please do not hesitate to contact me for further information on this important historical figure.

Sincerely yours,

GENE D. LEWIS,
Professor and Head.

THE GRADUATE SCHOOL AND UNIVERSITY CENTER OF THE CITY UNIVERSITY OF NEW YORK,

Hon. DANIEL PATRICK MOYNIHAN,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR PAT: Like every other historian, I am astonished that there is no memorial for Thomas Paine in the nation's capital; and I trust that Congress will take action in the near future to remedy this glaring omission.

Tom Paine, as you well know, was in effect an honorary Founding Father. He played a brilliant and vital role in awakening popular support for independence and thereafter in propagating the rights of man as a universal doctrine; and he deserves to be remembered by an age whose great animating forces are national independence and human rights.

The proposed site, which I understand to be on the Capitol grounds at the intersection of Pennsylvania and Constitution Avenues, seems eminently appropriate. After all, Paine wrote "Common Sense" while living in Pennsylvania, and the Constitution can be considered one of the fruits of his work.

As the preeminent scholar in the Senate, you are a natural to lead the fight to educate a new generation about Paine. The historical community hopes very much that you will join in co-sponsoring the Symms bill.

Yours ever,

ARTHUR SCHLESINGER, Jr.

COLGATE UNIVERSITY,

DEAR Senator Symms: The following letter was sent to Senators Moynihan and D'Amato.

Hon. ALBERT D'AMATO
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR D'AMATO: I write to support the proposed legislation for a monument honoring revolutionary American war hero Thomas Paine to be placed at the corner of Pennsylvania and Constitution Avenues on the capitol grounds.

As an historian and teacher of early American history, I use Thomas Paine's work frequently and I'm often chagrined to find that students know little of this important figure. I believe that the proposed monument would go far to educating all Americans about Paine's importance.

I urge you strongly to support this measure.

Sincerely,

GRAHAM HODGES,
Associate Professor.

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA,
Los Angeles, March 6, 1992.

DEAR SENATOR MOYNIHAN: Despite the letterhead above, I am one of your constituents, since I normally live in New York City and teach at Columbia University. I am writing to urge you to support the proposal to place a statue of Thomas Paine on the Capitol grounds. As the author of a book on Paine's role in the American Revolution, I am perhaps more interested than most in this issue, but I hardly need to explain to you Paine's central importance in the struggle for American independence. More than any other individual, Paine galvanized the movement for separation from Britain, and in Common Sense and other writings, did so in a new political language, accessible to a far broader audience than eighteenth-century pamphleteers ordinarily addressed. Although he never held public office after independence was won, Paine ought to be viewed as one of our most important founding fathers, and as one of the few who pressed forward the democratization of American society as well as national independence. To me, it seems inexcusable that it has taken so long to memorialize him in Washington, and placing his bust near the Capitol would be an entirely appropriate way of honoring him, given his central role in the American Revolution.

I very much hope that you will be able to support this measure, and I think you for taking the time to consider this letter.

Sincerely,

ERIC FONER,
DeWitt Clinton Professor of History
Columbia University,
Visiting Professor of History UCLA.

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY,
New York, NY, March 28, 1992.

Senator AL D'AMATO,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR D'AMATO: I write to urge you support the initiative of Senator Steve Symms in the matter of erecting a memorial to Tom Paine on the Capitol Grounds site in Washington, D.C. I cannot imagine that you will fail to back this excellent piece of legislation.

Yours sincerely,

WILLIAM V. HARRIS,
Department Chairman.

UNIVERSITY OF CONNECTICUT,

Senator CHRISTOPHER DODD,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR DODD: I write to urge you to support legislation to permit a statue honoring Thomas Paine to be constructed—with private funding—somewhere in the District. The junction of Pennsylvania and Constitution Avenues has been suggested as an appropriate site because Paine did most of his most important work in Pennsylvania and was a very early proponent of federal constitution.

Paine's principal contribution was in articulating in popular language the egalitarian and liberation theories that underlie so much of our nation's political thought and structure. He was, perhaps, our foremost political educator. A statute calling attention to him will cause thousands of students and adults to investigate his message and help renew America's commitment to the principles that inform our Revolution and Constitution.

I know I am joined by many of the leading scholars of the Revolutionary Era in urging enthusiastic support for this legislation, and trust you will give the matter serious consideration.

Sincerely,

CHRISTOPHER COLLIER,
Professor of History,

CORNELL UNIVERSITY,
Ithaca, NY, February 13, 1992.

Senator STEVE SYMMS,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR SYMMS: I want you to know that I strongly support your bill to commission a monument to Tom Paine, and I also happen to feel that the site where a Constitution and Pennsylvania Avenues meet would be a splendid location.

Tom Paine was a remarkable visionary and activist. He did as much as anyone to help make U.S. independence possible. He has long deserved this honor.

Sincerely your,

MICHAEL KAMMEN,
Professor of American History and Culture.

THE COLLEGE OF DEMOCRACY,
Arlington, VA, March 11, 1992.

Hon. STEVE SYMMS,
U.S. Senator from Idaho, Senate Hart Building,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR SYMMS: This is to inform you that we consider Thomas Paine to be one of our heroes of democracy. I strongly support the endeavor to construct an appropriate memorial to Thomas Paine on the ground of the United States Capitol at no cost to the taxpayer. It really should have been done long ago.

As we stated in our book, "The Evolution of a Democracy: This is Our Country, the United States of America," "in January 1776, Thomas Paine published arguments for separating the colonies from England in 100,000 copies of the pamphlet 'Common Sense.' He told his fellow Americans that the Colonies could become a great nation stretching across a continent and it made no sense to be in complete rebellion while professing full loyalty to the king." Less than six months later, the Continental Congress declared the Colonies free from England and dissolved all political relations.

This book is used in citizenship courses here as well as a means for people to increase their understanding and appreciation of our history. Similarly, it is beginning to be used in the developing democracies by people desiring to learn about democracy. Therefore, through it, the message of Paine's contribution to our country is reaching more people in the United States as well as in other countries.

A monument to Paine here would remind visitors to our capital city of the enduring significance of the written worked in a free society.

Sincerely,
WALTER E. BOEK, PH.D.,
President (and President of the Washington Academy of Sciences).

EMORY UNIVERSITY,

Senator STEVE SYMMS,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR SYMMS: Thank you for all your efforts on behalf of the proposed Tom Paine Memorial. It is hard to believe that someone as important to the history of our country as Tom Paine has failed to earn some commemoration. Common Sense alone deserves the recognition of this nation. That he also helped to rally America in its darkest hour with the "Crisis" series and saved the State of Pennsylvania from near collapse added to his significance. His was a tireless voice for freedom and the dignity of the individual. He battled the evils of his age with fervor, intelligence, and devastating wit. And at every turn he rejected opportunities for personal aggrandizement in favor of the public good. He certainly is a model for our own age.

I must admit to being moderately surprised that any member of the Senate would want to build a memorial to this inveterate opponent of an upper house. Paine consistently battled what he saw as an undemocratic and aristocratic institution in favor of a unicameral legislature. But I am delighted that you don't hold these views against him. I have faxed Senators Nunn and Fowler—and thanks for sending their fax number—and written my Representative, Ben Jones. I wish you the very best of luck in correcting this historic error.

Thank you for your time and attention.
Sincerely,

MICHAEL BELLESILES.

DEAR MR. WHITE: It is my privilege to write to you to inform you that the Board of Trustees of the First Unitarian Church of Cleveland, located in Shaker Heights, wishes to be recorded as favoring the placement of a memorial honoring Thomas Paine at the intersection of Pennsylvania and Constitution Avenues in Washington, DC.

I might add that you are remembered fondly as the architect of our west wing, the Peterson Wing, which it is my understanding was dedicated in 1960 when you were with Dalton and Dalton. You may remember, too, that Mr. Calvin Dalton was on our Board in those years.

Thank you most sincerely for your favor of consideration.

Senator DANIEL P. MOYNIHAN,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR MOYNIHAN: I am writing to ask you to support the proposed legislation of Senator Symms to authorize a statue of Thomas Paine on the grounds of the United States Capitol in Washington.

There can be little doubt that Paine was instrumental in the success of the movement for independence. His pamphlet Common Sense, designed to reach the "middling" folk as well as the highly educated elite, was a brilliant exercise in political rhetoric.

Moreover, Paine was one of the very few eighteenth-century thinkers who recognized that American women were second class citizens in a society that espoused egalitarian values—at least in theory. He spoke to his time and he speaks to ours, and I believe he should be honored in the manner that Sen. Symms proposes.

Sincerely yours,
ELAINE FORMAN CRANE,
Professor of History.

Senator PATRICK MOYNIHAN,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR MOYNIHAN: Senator Steve Symms of Idaho is sponsoring a bill to permit the construction, using only private funds, of a memorial to Thomas Paine at the intersection of Pennsylvania Avenue and Constitution Avenue in our nation's capital. He has asked for my support for his project, and I am pleased to give it. I urge you to support it as well.

As a historian I am very much aware of the importance of memorials in terms of "giving messages" about what a people "stands for." For example, I am a historian of the French Revolution (in which Paine was involved, to some extent). I think that it is significant that in Paris there are statues of Revolutionary moderates such as Lafayette and charismatic patriots such as Danton, but there are none to the extreme radicals such as Robespierre. I believe that it would be good for the American people to give the message that we support Paine: as a figure in our Revolution but especially as "the first public advocate for the abolition of slavery in North America" (to quote Senator Symms).

Thank you for considering my appeal to you. I hope that you will, indeed, support the efforts of Senator Symms.

Sincerely,
CHARLES R. BAILEY,
Professor and Chair.

DEAR HONORABLE MR. SYMMS: Thank you very much for your letter of December 11 regarding the proposed initiative to construct a memorial to Thomas Paine on the grounds of the United States Capitol. Senator STEVE SYMMS,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR SYMMS: No figure in our early history as deserving as Thomas Paine remains without public recognition in the nation's capital. Without the publication of his Common Sense in 1776 it is hard to conceive how the American Revolution could have come when and how it did. Perhaps the erection of an appropriate statue in Washington by a private organization will serve to remind some how words put at the service of a noble cause can transform the field for political action.

Sincerely yours,
W.W. ABBOT,

As an American historian I wholeheartedly support the effort to honor Thomas Paine with a statue in our Nation's Capital. The site your letter suggests across from the Labor Department seems particularly appropriate given Paine's own origins and beliefs. If my endorsement is useful please share it with our Senator from Kentucky, The Honorable Wendell Ford.

STATE OF NEW YORK,

Hon. PATRICK DANIEL MOYNIHAN,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR PAT: I am writing to express my strong support for proposed legislation to authorize construction of a monument to Thomas Paine in the District of Columbia.

Along with Washington, Jefferson and Lincoln, Thomas Paine left his imprint on the values that are America. The first to call for an end to slavery and a declaration of independence, Paine shared a vision of freedom and human rights with the world that continues to be the standard today.

Senate legislation similar to that sponsored by Nita Lowey in the House of Representatives will provide Thomas Paine with a fitting tribute that will remind all Americans of his vast contribution to the creation of our country.

Sincerely,
MARIO M. CUOMO.

Hon. STEVE SYMMS,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR SYMMS: I am happy to endorse your proposal to build a memorial to Tom Paine. A modest edifice on public land at Pennsylvania and Constitution Avenues in Washington, and built with private funds, seems entirely appropriate.

Tom Paine played a pivotal role in turning American colonials—they had begun to call themselves "Americans"—away from the institution of monarchy as well as George III and his policies. As you know, the natural rights Paine asserted are just as important today as when he enunciated them in the eighteenth century.

I am happy also that Nita Lowey's bill has broad bipartisan support in the House and assume that will be the case in the Senate as well.

Sincerely,
CEDRIC B. COWING,

Senator ALPHONSE D'AMATO,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR D'AMATO: I enthusiastically support the creation of a memorial in Washington D.C. to the great eighteenth century patriot Thomas Paine. Paine was a great figure, not only in the United States where his pamphlet "Common Sense" helped crystallize public conviction of the need for American independence from Great Britain, but he was a great figure in the democratic movements in both England and France. In England his pamphlet "The Rights of Man," parts one and two, publicized the advantage of a written constitution and probably constituted one of the foremost influences on the creation of a democratic political movement in England. On all scores a public tribute to Thomas Paine is long overdue. I urge support of Senator Symms' bill.

Sincerely,

NAOMI C. MILLER,

INDIANA HISTORICAL SOCIETY,
Indianapolis, IN, March 6, 1992.

Senator RICHARD LUGAR,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR LUGAR: Your Senate colleague, Steve Symms of Idaho (a state where I taught for a decade), has asked for my support and endorsement for the erection of a memorial to Tom Paine on the grounds of the U.S. Capitol. The modest memorial which he proposes is to be funded by private money so there is to be no cost to the taxpayer.

What is needed is legislation allowing this to take place with certain "protections" built in.

There are, of course, many strands to the heritage of this nation. Tom Paine is a legitimate part of our national heritage. He represents a point on the political spectrum that not all of the citizens of this nation are comfortable with. Yet, all fair-minded Americans must conclude that he played an important role in the collective decision for independence.

Many of Paine's phrases roll off the tongue in the political dialogues even of our own day. For me, the importance of Tom Paine resides in the use of logic and language in the cause of American Independence and in asserting the basic rights of man. The simple question, "Should an island rule a continent?" is hard to cast off as irrelevant.

A monument to Thomas Paine on the grounds of our nation's Capitol would be a fitting tribute to the man and what he stood for.

Sincerely yours,

PETER T. HARSTAD,
Executive Director.

IRISH NATIONAL CAUCUS, INC.,
December 10, 1991.

Hon. (Name),

House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR: On behalf of its many members in the State of Pennsylvania, the Irish National Caucus urges you to cosponsor H.R. 1628—the Thomas Paine monument legislation.

The Bill is introduced by Representative Nita M. Lowey (D-NY) (contact David Seldin at x6506 for further information).

To date 172 Members have cosponsored this legislation.

As you know, Thomas Paine did some of his finest work while he lived in Pennsylvania.

Not only was Thomas Paine a great advocate of American freedom, liberty and democracy, but he also championed the same causes for Ireland.

That is why the Irish National Caucus is in total support of H.R. 1628.

Can we tell our members that they can count on your support?

Please let us know at your earliest convenience.

Sincerely,

Father SEAN MCMANUS,
President.

Hon. JOHN WARNER,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR WARNER: As you may know, a concerted effort is being made to establish a permanent memorial on the Capitol grounds in honor of Thomas Paine. Senator Symms is sponsoring the appropriate legislation, and as a Virginian and historian of the American Revolution I hope you will assist him in the endeavor.

You are doubtless aware that Paine came to this country at the urging of Benjamin Franklin, and his great essay, "Common Sense," was one of the most influential pamphlets in history. At a critical time, the Paine essay made thousands of Americans see the futility of a connection with Great Britain (Washington saw this and commented on it early in 1776). For that alone, he deserves recognition of the highest order.

Please join Senator Symms to make this memorial a reality.

Senator STEVE SYMMS,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR SYMMS: Let me strongly endorse the proposed legislation to authorize placing a statue of Thomas Paine on Capitol grounds at the intersection of Pennsylvania and Constitution Avenues.

It is a shame that the author of "Common Sense," the pivotal document in the clarion call for independence in 1776, has so little public recognition. Paine's courageous words and ideas provided nothing less than the motive force for the decision to seek independence in 1776. It would be a great—and long overdue—public service to commemorate in this way Paine's enormously important role in the revolutionary struggle.

I wish this project all the success in the world.

DANIEL BLAKE SMITH,
Associate Professor of History.

ROYAL HOLLOWAY AND BEDFORD NEW COLLEGE,
March 6, 1992.

DEAR SENATOR BOND: As a Missouri resident temporarily overseas, I am writing to you about legislation for the proposed memorial to Thomas Paine which Senator Steve Symms is about to introduce before Congress.

As a historian and the author of a book on Thomas Paine, and editor of a forthcoming new edition of his famous "Right of Man," I am excited at the prospect that one of the most important creators of American independence will finally be honored in this way. Thomas Paine's "Common Sense" (1776) was the main pamphlet to rouse the colonists on the side of independence. Paine became close friends with Washington; Jefferson and other founding fathers. He fought during the Revolutionary War, when his letters known as "The American Crisis" had a tremendous effect in rallying the colonial army. Paine was one of independent America's first advocates for the abolition of slavery and for equal rights for women and men alike. Moreover, he was the most important popularizer of the American constitutional model in nineteenth century Europe, through the "Rights of Man."

Despite these great contributions to America's heritage, Paine has lacked the recognition he deserves. I urge you to support Senator Symms' efforts to have a monument to Paine erected on the grounds of the Capitol. There are statues of him already in both England and France, and it is time that we too acknowledged his efforts on our behalf.

Yours sincerely,

DEAR SENATOR FORD: I write on behalf of legislation to authorize the construction of a privately funded memorial to Thomas Paine on public land located at the intersection of Pennsylvania and Constitution Avenues in Washington, DC. Such an authorization would appropriately acknowledge Paine's important contribution to the creation of the United States of America. I have discussed this topic with other individuals in Louisville, and everyone with whom I have spoken also supports the project. I hope that you will co-sponsor or otherwise support it as well.

DEAR SENATOR SYMMS: In reply to your letter of 16 March 1992, just let me say that I do enthusiastically support a modest memorial to Thomas Paine to be built on the grounds of the U.S. Capitol. I have always been intrigued with Paine and with his contribution to our republican experiment, for reasons spelled out in more detail in the hand-written letters I have today sent to Senators Kohl and Kasten of Wisconsin. (Copies of these letters are attached hereto.) Over the chasm of the years, Tom Paine still teaches us, and a memorial in his honor would serve to remind us as Americans of important lessons that we have as yet only imperfectly learned. With every good wish, I am

Yours very truly,

Hon. BARBARA MIKULSKI,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR MIKULSKI: I am writing to urge you to become an original co-sponsor of legislation that Senator Steve Symms will soon introduce to allow the Thomas Paine USA Memorial Association to erect a statue of one of American history's seminal heroes.

Thomas Paine is rightfully judged an eloquent spokesman for human rights, a cause that I know ranks high on your list of priorities. Although Paine authored the American Revolution's most important pamphlet, "Common Sense," published early in 1776, he is perhaps best remembered for the stirring language he used to rally the Continental army during the darkest moments of the War for Independence: "These are the times that try men's souls. The summer soldier and the sunshine patriot will, in this crisis, shrink from the service of their country." Paine's ringing words so moved the commanders of the Revolutionary forces that they ordered them read to the troops in every encampment. Nor did Thomas Paine's championship of human rights end with the signing of the treaty of Paris in 1783. He later went to France to support that nation's struggle against monarchy, and it was there in 1791-1792 that he wrote his inspiring defense of republican government, "The Rights of Man."

It is my understanding that the Thomas Paine USA Memorial Association proposes to pay for the cost of erecting a monument near the Capitol of the United States. I cannot imagine a more appropriate setting for commemorating a man who surely ranks as one of the greatest advocates of republican government in modern history.

Sincerely yours,

RONALD HOFFMAN,
Associate Professor.

MARYLAND STATE ARCHIVES,

Hon. PAUL SARBANES,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR SARBANES: Senator Steve Symms has written about his bill to provide for the construction of a memorial to Thomas Paine on the grounds of the U.S. Capitol. The bill Senator Symms plans to introduce purportedly provides for the monument to be funded from the private sector and permits the Architect of the Capitol to approve the design.

Senator Symms has asked for my enforcement of this project to memorialize Thomas Paine. While I cannot speak to the merits of the monument's design or its placement on the Capitol grounds, I can testify to the importance of Paine in our nation's history.

When Thomas Paine's "Common Sense" appeared in January 1776, it served as a catalyst for changing colonial disaffection with Britain into a concerted movement for independence. His consistent defense of the rights of the individual—from his advocacy of the abolition of slavery to his authorship of "The Rights of Man"—distinguish him as a man of exceptional liberality for his generation.

A memorial to Thomas Paine would help remind visitors to the U.S. Capitol of the great debt this country owes to this impecunious, immigrant stay-maker who changed history not because of his wealth, power, or position, but because of his firm conviction in the value of human freedom, which he expressed with force and originality through the printed word.

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD C. PAPPENFUSE,

DEAR SENATOR SYMMS: I have, as suggested in your letter of February 12, written to Senators Kennedy and Kerry asking their support for the Paine memorial. I enclose a copy of my letter.

DEAR SENATOR SYMMS: I am glad to endorse your proposed legislation to place a memorial to Thomas Paine on Capitol grounds at the intersection of Pennsylvania and Constitution Avenues. I was surprised to learn that there is no memorial to him in Washington; he did so much to further the idea of American independence that it is entirely fitting that the nation's capital should have a memorial to him.

I am writing to Senators Gore and Sasser to urge them to support your proposed legislation.

Yours sincerely,

Hon. HOWARD METZENBAUM,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR METZENBAUM: I write to endorse enthusiastically the legislation proposed by Senator Steve Symms of Idaho to authorize the construction of a statue of Thomas Paine at the intersection of Pennsylvania and Constitution Avenues.

Paine is perhaps the most neglected of the men who took a leading part in establishing our democratic republic. He deserves a memorial, if only for writing "Common Sense," one of the most eloquent and influential explanations of the assumptions underlying the American form of government. Here is a man who was truly of the people; to honor him is to honor the working men and women whose efforts were as important to the success of the American Revolution as those of gentleman such as Washington and Jefferson. Nothing could be more in keeping with the spirit of our revolution than a memorial to a man of relatively humble background in the midst of our great monuments to the aristocrats of his age.

I trust that you will join with Senator Symms in sponsoring this important legislation.

Sincerely,

ANDREW CAYTON,
Associate Professor.

MURRAY STATE UNIVERSITY,

Senator STEVE SYMMS,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR SYMMS: I enthusiastically support your proposed legislation to authorize the Thomas Paine Memorial Foundation to erect a statue of Paine on Capitol grounds at the intersection of Pennsylvania and Constitution.

Thomas Paine is eminently deserving of recognition for the critical role he played in arousing and giving direction to popular support for the American Revolution. "Common Sense" and "The Crisis" gave focus and renewed purpose to a cause that was at the time faltering. Without Paine's contributions, the outcome of the Revolution might well have been quite different.

Together with other historians, I applaud your efforts to press this project to completion.

Sincerely yours,

DEAR SENATOR SYMMS: I am pleased to enclose copies of my correspondence to New Jersey Senators Bradley and Lautenberg in support of your proposed legislation to erect a memorial to Thomas Paine on the Capitol grounds.

Paine's role in the struggle for American independence was critically important to New Jersey's revolutionary leaders, citizens, and soldiers. I hope that my letters to our Senators convey that message adequately.

I wish you all success in your effort to recognize Paine in this important way.

Sincerely yours,

KARL J. NIEDERER,

STATE OF NEW JERSEY,

Hon. BILL BRADLEY,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR BRADLEY: I urge you to join Idaho Senator Steve Symms in cosponsoring legislation that will authorize the construction of a memorial honoring Thomas Paine on the Capitol grounds in Washington.

Although British-born, Thomas Paine's political philosophy and writings exerted a tremendous influence on the founders of the United States, including preeminent New Jersey advocates for independence such as William Livingston, our first state Governor; and William Paterson, Governor, U.S. Senator, and U.S. Supreme Court Justice. But Paine's ideas about the proper function and purpose of government equally inspired many common citizens and soldiers in revolutionary New Jersey. His words energized the Continental Army precisely when their fortunes had reached low ebb; in December 1776, just prior to the Battle of Trenton, now regarded by many as the turning point in the war for independence.

As Paine himself would have appreciated, the memorial envisaged by Senator Symms will be built at no cost to the taxpayers.

Your favorable consideration of this legislation will be appreciated, I am sure, by all citizens of New Jersey and of the United States.

Sincerely yours,

KARL J. NIEDERER,
Chief of Archives.

Hon. STEVE SYMMS,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR SYMMS: I endorse your proposed legislation to authorize the Thomas Paine Memorial Foundation to place a statue of Paine on Capitol grounds at the intersection of Pennsylvania and Constitution Avenues.

Paine deserves special recognition for his authorship of the revolutionary pamphlet "Common Sense." "Common Sense" was the first major call for independence and a republic. As such, it was a remarkably progressive and forward-looking message for its day. Written and published in January 1776, "Common Sense" helped galvanize the decision to turn resistance into a movement for independence and a republican system of popularly elected confederated state governments.

For this alone, Paine deserves to be remembered by the statue you propose.

Sincerely,

DOROTHY ANN KELLY, O.S.U.,

Hon. DANIEL P. MOYNIHAN,

DEAR SENATOR MOYNIHAN: I have been informed that Senator Steve Symms, of Idaho, has introduced legislation to permit the private sector to construct a memorial to Thomas Paine on publicly-owned land at the intersection of Pennsylvania and Constitution Avenues in Washington, near the Capitol.

Under terms of the legislation the memorial is to be in accord with the area's beauty and design. It is to be made possible through voluntary contributions at no expense to the taxpayers.

As an educator, a student of history and a respected public official, I need not review for you the many contributions Paine made, not only to the revolutionary cause but to the rights of man in general.

I hope earnestly, therefore, that you along with Senator D'Amato will find it expedient to co-sponsor necessary legislation in the Senate to make possible significant recognition of Thomas Paine in the Nation's capital.

Sincerely yours,

Senator STEVEN SYMMS: Yesterday I sent the following telegram to my Senator, Daniel Patrick Moynihan (I am a permanent resident of New York, here on academic leave until June, 1992): I endorse proposal for memorial statue of Tom Paine to be located at intersection Pennsylvania and Constitution Avenues on Capitol grounds—a fitting location for an advocate of democratic revolution, constitutional government and human rights.

May I express my enthusiastic support to you as well for proposing and promoting this long overdue tribute to a man of high ideals, inspired principles, and a powerful pen.

With best wishes for the success of your project,

DEAR SENATOR SYMMS: Paine deserves better than he has received. John Adams predicted no statues would be erected to him; he was wrong, of course, but one is still due to Thomas Paine. DEAR SENATOR HATFIELD: Knowing of your interest in American history, I ask that you become a co-sponsor of legislation proposed by Senator Steve Symms to permit the Thomas Paine Memorial Foundation to place a statue of Paine on Capitol grounds at the intersection of Pennsylvania and Constitution Avenues.

I was surprised to learn that there is no memorial to Paine in our nation's capital. I am a Burkean myself! But there is no doubt that Paine deserves recognition for his historic championing and philosophical defense of liberty and of a written constitution. The suggested site for a memorial, at Pennsylvania and Constitution, is certainly an appropriate location.

I am sending a copy of this letter to my former student and your long-time legislative assistant, Dean Lon Fendall. Lon may wish to add his endorsement to those of many distinguished historians who support the proposed action.

DEAR SENATOR HATFIELD, I am writing to ask you to support the proposed legislation of Senator SYMMS of Idaho to authorize the Thomas Paine Memorial Foundation to place a statue of Thomas Paine on Capitol grounds at the intersection of Pennsylvania and Constitution Avenues.

As you know Thomas Paine deserves special recognition for authorship of the Revolutionary pamphlet Common Sense, which was the first major call for independence and a republic. A pivotal figure in the years leading up to the Declaration of Independence from Great Britain, Paine deserves to be honored in some form. I am surprised that it has not been done before.

Please help this cause in any way that you can.

Hon. DANIEL PATRICK MOYNIHAN,
U.S. Senate, Washington DC.

DEAR SENATOR MOYNIHAN, I am writing to encourage you to support the proposed memorial to Thomas Paine on the Capitol grounds. As a former resident of Bethesda, I am well aware that monument space in the District is scarce and that only the most significant figures in American history deserve such a prominent place. From my knowledge of colonial and revolutionary American history, I can attest that Tom Paine is worthy of such recognition.

Paine's life reflected a commitment to democratic principles as well as a talent for translating the disembodied political rhetoric of the era into a language that convinced and mobilized the ordinary man. His pamphlet Common Sense not only altered the attitudes of ordinary tradesmen and artisans in favor of independence but also helped generate the political momentum that produced the highly democratic Pennsylvania Constitution of 1776. His political thought continued to advance even after this seminal contribution, as 1780s saw him opposing price controls, promoting a national bank, and advocating The Rights of Man in the French Revolution. Paine's contribution was so significant that I assign Columbia professor Eric Foner's Tom Paine and Revolutionary America for my seminar on the American Revolution, the book from which much of this paragraph is drawn.

Before you became a Senator, you were a scholar; I remember as a high school debater reading the Moynihan and Mosteller report on equal educational opportunity. As a politician, you have consistently raised the level of debate. Therefore, it would be most fitting for you to support a memorial to a democrat whose contributions to America scholars recognize and to an author whose rhetoric changed the political debate forever.

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM M. OFFUTT,
Assistant Professor of History.

Hon. STEVEN SYMMS,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR SYMMS: I would like to express my support for the placement of a modest memorial to Thomas Paine on the grounds of the national Capitol in Washington, D.C. Paine played a crucial role in the struggle for American independence from Great Britain, and I believe such a memorial would be entirely consistent with other monuments to revolutionary era figures in Washington.

It is my understanding that such a monument currently is under consideration—and that it would be funded entirely by private monies and subject to approval by the Architect of the Capitol. I hope you will look favorably on this project.

Sincerely yours,

GARY W. GALLAGHER,

Senator STEVEN SYMMS,
509 Senate Hart Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR SYMMS: I am pleased to respond to your request for support for the project to construct a memorial to Tom Paine on the grounds of the U.S. Capitol. As the author of several books on the American revolutionary era and as a professor who has taught graduate and undergraduate courses on the Revolution at the University of Pennsylvania for the past twenty-three years, I have been in a reasonably good position to assess Paine's contributions to our revolutionary and democratic heritage. My appreciation of Paine's contributions to our American heritage has steadily increased over the course of my years of study and teaching.

Paine is of course most famous for his stunningly influential call for American separation from Great Britain in Common Sense. That pamphlet's devastating attack on the institution of monarchy, its chronicle of British misdeeds, and its invocation of natural rights philosophy as a justification for independence were all enormously influential in moving Americans toward the fateful step of independence. Perhaps more important, however, Common Sense provided Americans with a vision for a democratic future. When Paine wrote, in contemplation of the challenge of independence, that "The birthday of a new world is at hand, and a race of men, perhaps as numerous as all Europe contains, are to receive their portion of freedom," he began to sketch out a vision of that "new world" that was explicitly democratic and egalitarian, a vision both strikingly different from that which had governed the world in preceding centuries and strikingly similar to that hopeful vision that is sweeping over much of our world—in the former Soviet Union, in Eastern and Central Europe, and in Africa—in the late twentieth century.

Paine was a visionary and a publicist, not a politician. He would not stay on the American scene long enough to play the sort of role that Washington or Jefferson played in building our new nation. But Paine's vision was an extraordinarily hopeful and, as it turned out, an extraordinarily prescient one. His contributions to our democratic heritage do, in my judgment, make him worthy of a memorial in our nation's capital.

Sincerely,

RICHARD R. BEEMAN.

Senator STEVE SYMMS,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR SYMMS: I was delighted to learn that you have reintroduced legislation that would allow construction of a memorial to Thomas Paine on the grounds of the U.S. Capitol. As you well know, there is no appropriate memorial for Paine in Washington, D.C. That is most unfortunate. Had it not been for the timely appearance of Paine's Common Sense in the winter of 1775 the Continental Congress might never have declared American independence. Equally important is that his vision of human rights influenced and inspired generations of reformers hoping to abolish slavery, secure division of church and state, and gain political and legal equality for women. Paine, of course, had serious reservations about formal religion, but that was not unique in an age much committed to rationalism. Nor should those views preclude him being recognized appropriately, even at this late date, for his contributions to independence and human rights. For that reason, I hope that your legislative efforts are successful.

Although I am not authorized to speak for them, you may be sure that the 740 chapters of Phi Alpha Theta and its 180,000 initiates doubtlessly endorse your proposal as well.

With every good wish, I am

Hon. STEVE SYMMS,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR SYMMS: Thank you for your letter of 20 February 1992, soliciting my response to your efforts to secure a memorial honoring Thomas Paine. As the author of a book on Massachusetts politics during the 1780s, as a professor who has taught both graduates and undergraduate students about the American Revolution, as chair of the Department of History, and as secretary of our regional Historical Society of Western Pennsylvania, I have been aware of Paine's contribution to the formation of our republic for many years. Indeed, my first reaction to your request was one of surprise that no memorial to Tom Paine has yet been erected in our national capital.

His Common Sense was one of the first and certainly at the time the most effective call for independence and the creation of a new republic. His activity and influence in and on both the American and French Revolutions made him into one of the intellectual founders of our combination of democracy and republicanism that now seems to be sweeping the entire world. Paine was an extraordinary man. He belongs in our pantheon of Revolutionary heroes. His monument is long overdue.

Mr. GEORGE M. WHITE,

DEAR MR. WHITE: I spoke briefly with Barbara Wolanin when I was in Washington yesterday, and I am writing to you at her suggestion.

My inquiry is about plans which, I understand, are forming to construct a memorial statue to Thomas Paine on the Capitol grounds. I am told not only that this falls under your jurisdiction but also that, quite properly, Senators and Representatives will rely upon the advice of your office concerning the design of any such monument before giving their support.

I am sure you recognize that many professional historians will be very enthusiastic about erecting a memorial to Paine. In fact, when the Organization of American Historians meets in Chicago a few weeks from now, we will be considering making an official endorsement of the project. So, if you now have any plans or thoughts on this, whether formal or merely preliminary, could you give me an idea of them?

Thanks for taking a little time on my request.

Senator STEVE SYMMS,
U.S. Senate, 509 Senate Hart Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR SYMMS: Please consider me a wholehearted supporter of the proposed memorial to honor Thomas Paine.

I need not restate all of the reasons why such a memorial in the nation's capital is long overdue. No single patriot did as much to galvanize popular support for the American Revolution as Paine did, in Common Sense and The Crisis. And no writer did more, at the close of the eighteenth century, to proclaim the universality of human rights. He has been memorialized in Paris, as well as in Thetford, his place of birth in England. It is time for him to be honored in the capital of the nation where he did his greatest work.

It is, of course, important that the memorial will not come at any expense to the taxpayer. (Paine, who despised the ways that state parasites enriched themselves at the people's expense, would have approved.) Even more appropriate is the proposed site, at the corner of Pennsylvania and Constitution Avenues. It was, after all, in Pennsylvania that Paine was centered during his most glorious American period. And as early as 1776, he was a proponent for a strong federal union—an idea which led him to support the ratification of the U.S. Constitution, despite his misgivings about some of the framers' handiwork.

Let me congratulate you for having pushed the project this far. I am contacting Senator Bradley and Lautenberg, encouraging them to join in.

Please do not hesitate to contact me if I can be of any further assistance in this matter.

Yours sincerely,

SEAN WILENTZ,
Professor of History.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, DC, January 12, 1987.

I am delighted to send greetings to the members of The Thomas Paine National Historical Association as you celebrate the 250th anniversary of the birth of your organization's namesake.

In the bleak December of 1776, Paine wrote, "These are the times that try men's souls. The summer soldier and the sunshine patriot will, in this crisis, shrink from the service of their country; but he that stands it now, deserves the love and thanks of man and woman."

Among his many forceful and cogent writings, it is perhaps by these words that Americans best remember Paine. And with good reason. They provided invaluable inspiration for the men of the Continental Army at a time when the American Revolution seemed in danger of being crushed.

But Paine did not just talk a good fight. He labored long and tirelessly to raise funds and equipment for the colonial forces, even to the point of impoverishing himself, fulfilling his own words that, "Those who expect to reap the blessings of freedom must, like men, undergo the fatigue of supporting it."

Tom Paine deserves our tribute above all for his eloquent and timeless defense of the value of freedom. In this age in which some people question whether any value is worth great sacrifice, whether any ideal is worth fighting for, Paine reminds us that a free society is well worth whatever price must be paid to achieve and preserve it.

I commend your Association for keeping alive the spirit of this great champion of human freedom, and I join you in honoring him. You have my best wishes for a memorable celebration.

God bless you.

DEAR SENATOR PELL: I am writing to request your support of Senator Steve Symms' efforts to have a memorial to Thomas Paine built, with private funding, at the intersection of Pennsylvania and Constitution Avenues.

As an astute student and supporter of the study of American history, you know fully the importance that Paine had in our historical past. Yet, there is no public display of gratitude for his efforts in achieving American independence and liberty. I would greatly appreciate any and all support you could give to Senator Symms' legislation.

Senator STEVEN SYMMS,

DEAR SENATOR SYMMS: I endorse your proposed bill to authorize the Thomas Paine Memorial Foundation to place a statue of Tom Paine at the intersection of Pennsylvania and Constitution Avenues. Such a memorial is long overdue.

Practically every school child learns of Thomas Paine and his "Common Sense," and it is surprising that he has not been given a place in the capital of the nation he helped to create. He wrote what most historians regard as one of the truly influential political tracts in American history. We know that "Common Sense" changed the minds of many Americans because we have their testimony, beginning with George Washington himself. Although Washington was already in command of the Continental forces outside of Boston, he had not yet brought himself to support independence, a complete break with the mother country. But, when he read Paine's tract, he was converted to full independence.

Best wishes in your effort.

Sincerely,

J. STANLEY LEMONS,

Senator DANIEL PATRICK MOYNIHAN,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR MOYNIHAN: "This is the time" to try my senators' sensitivities and my country's memory to have them and it honor one of the very few original thinkers during our "Era of Independence." Rightly we remember his "Common Sense". But you paraphrase his "Rights of Man" in your call for our recognition of civil rights for all. We remember Paine as a writer of memorable prose [usually but a single brilliant opening line], a best selling pamphlet against monarchy, and as his subsequent career showed, a really independent thinker. My students still profit from reading his prose and that is unusual and high praise.

May I petition you to help support Senator Steve Symms bill as co-sponsors of legislation to erect a suitable monument in honor of Paine on the US Capitol Grounds! And it would be proper to have Paine in the line of sight of the Congress. . .

Sincerely yours,

Senator DANIEL P. MOYNIHAN,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR MOYNIHAN: I am writing to support Senator Steven D. Symms bill for the building of a memorial to Thomas Paine on the grounds of the Capitol.

I have taught courses at Rutgers on United States History, New Jersey History, and the American Revolution. Several years ago I wrote a brief biography of Thomas Paine for an biographical encyclopedia.

In each of the courses mentioned I refer to Thomas Paine; in the last I spend some time on him and his contributions to the Revolution. It is difficult to underestimate the impact of his pamphlet Common Sense written in January 1776. It made a clear case for the declaration of independence from England, convincing many Americans that the time had indeed come. During the difficult days of the war that followed Paine wrote a series of Crises letters which urged Americans to fight on. His efforts were timely and important. Certainly a monument to remind Americans of this part of their heritage is proper.

Sincerely,

Dr. MAXINE N. LURIE.

Sen. STEVE SYMMS,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR SYMMS: Please let me take this opportunity to strongly endorse the proposed legislation to authorize the erection of a statue of Thomas Paine on Capitol grounds at the intersection of Pennsylvania and Constitution Avenues.

It is a shame that the author of Common Sense, the pivotal document in the Clarion Call for Independence in 1776, has so little public recognition. Paine's courageous words and ideas provided nothing less than the motive force for the decision to seek independence in '76. It would be a great—and long overdue—public service to commemorate in this way Paine's enormously important role in the revolutionary struggle.

As a soldier who gave 40 years of his life for our country, I consider Paine a fellow patriot.

I wish this project all the success possible.

Sincerely,

JOSEPH M. CANNON, PH.D.,

DEAR SENATOR DODD: "These are the times that try men's souls, the summer soldier and the sunshine patriot will in this crisis, shrink from service to their country; but he that stands it now deserves the love and thanks of man and woman * * *"

With these words Thomas Paine began a series of pamphlets calling on the will of the patriots to stand firm. This charge could be as well adapted to our present years of political indecision.

With these words I ask you to co-sponsor a Bill introduced by Senator Symms to allow a modest memorial to Thomas Paine on the grounds of the U.S. Capitol— at no cost to the taxpayer.

Being of French heritage myself, and a direct descendant of a soldier in Rochambeau's army, I am proud of Thomas Paine's contributions to his adoptive land, The United States of America. I hope you will share my pride and act to bring this memorial into being in our Capitol by sponsoring this legislation.

Yours sincerely,

DEAR SENATOR SYMMS: Thank you for yours of 11 December 1991, soliciting my comment on the possibility of a memorial honoring Thomas Paine.

I would like to express my strongest possible support for this proposal. Frankly, as I'm sure it has to many of your correspondents, it came as quite a surprise to me to learn that there is no kind of memorial in the nation's capital at this time to Paine. He was unquestionably a figure of pivotal importance in the crystallization of sentiment that led to the formal Declaration of Independence from Great Britain in the 1770's. He was also, as you note, a key player in several other episodes of major historical interest, both in this country and in Europe. In any case, please regard this as an expression of strong endorsement of your idea. May it come to swift and elegant fruition.

Sen. HARRIS WOFFORD,

DEAR SENATOR WOFFORD: As an historian, a past president of both the Cambria County Historical Society and the Pennsylvania Historical Association, and one of your constituents, I am writing to urge your support for the Thomas Paine Capital Memorial legislation, soon to be introduced by Senator Steve Sims of Idaho. The bill will provide for the erection at the intersection of Pennsylvania and Constitution avenues in Washington of an appropriate memorial commemorating the contributions of Thomas Paine to our nation's history.

Paine's widely circulated and persuasive pamphlet, Common Sense, is generally regarded as the first important public call for America's separation from Great Britain and his advocacy contributed significantly to the decision, in Philadelphia, for independence. He also argued for a written constitution in contrast to the English practice. Despite this association with two of our nation's most treasured documents, Paine is, today, an obscure if not a forgotten figure. He deserves better as the many historians across the country who are actively supporting the proposed legislation agree. I hope that you, also, will agree and that you will give the measure your support and your vote.

Sincerely yours,

Senator Steven D. Symms,

DEAR SENATOR SYMMS: I am pleased to endorse your proposed legislation to permit the Thomas Paine Memorial Foundation to erect a statue of Paine on Capitol grounds at the intersection of Pennsylvania and Constitution Avenues.

Paine very much deserves to be memorialized in this fashion both for his authorship of Common Sense, which provided intellectual foundation for the American Revolution, and for his consistent support of human rights. It is especially commendable that this memorial will be constructed entirely with private funds.

I shall be writing to Senators Gore and Sasser on behalf of this legislation.

Sincerely,

Senator STEVE D. SYMMS,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR SYMMS: I am writing to support your legislation to honor Thomas Paine with a modest memorial to be erected within the technical boundaries of the U.S. Capitol Grounds.

I know that you are as aware as I of the contributions Paine made to the American Revolution with the publication of his pamphlet Common Sense. No less authorities than Henry Steele Commager and Richard B. Morris have written: "Doubtless the most important single influence in bringing about a change in popular sentiment was the publication, in January, 1776, of Common Sense." Paine's writings, including The Rights of Man, have placed him in the forefront of the movement for the rights of all men and women without regard to race or religion.

An impressive array of historians, including Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., and Gordon Wood, have endorsed a memorial to Thomas Paine.

As Chief Historian of the U.S. Capitol Historical Society, I am well aware of the reluctance to locate this or any memorial on Capitol Grounds. There is always the apprehension that placing any memorial would open up the process to a multitude of other memorial projects.

I believe that each proposal should be judged on its own merits. What appeals to me most about the Paine proposal is the overpowering symbolic statement made by a modest, solitary statue of Thomas Paine, citizen-soldier-writer. In one statue we would see encapsulated all the best virtues of citizenship: the individual actively involved in forging his own destiny and protecting the rights of his fellow Americans, which is the very bedrock of our democracy. In fact, one could come to see this memorial as representative of the very concept of citizenship, and that it would make a statement that no amount of other memorials or statues could improve upon.

Sincerely,

DONALD R. KENNON,
Chief Historian.

U.S. CAPITOL HISTORICAL SOCIETY,

Senator STEVE D. SYMMS,

DEAR SENATOR: I am writing to express my support for your proposal to site a memorial to Thomas Paine on a Capitol grounds site. I have long supported a proper recognition of Thomas Paine, and I am pleased to learn of your desire to locate a modest memorial in keeping with Paine's philosophy on the Capitol grounds.

After reviewing the present list of more than 220 co-sponsors for the House version of this bill, supported by the endorsements of numerous eminent American historians, I am pleased to add my voice to the chorus calling for this long overdue recognition of Thomas Paine's life and accomplishments.

I am reassured by your assurances that the proper precautions will be taken to ensure that this action does not become a precedent for the siting of other memorials on Capitol grounds. I believe this is a wise precaution to mute any possible criticism.

For all of these reasons, I am able to express my wholehearted support for your proposal.

Sincerely,

FRED SCHWENDEL,

P.S.—I also wish to express my profound gratitude for your interest in entering my statement on The Mission of America in the Post-Cold War World into the Congressional Record.

U.S. CAPITOL HISTORICAL SOCIETY,
Washington, DC, March 13, 1992.

Hon. GEORGE M. WHITE
FAIA, Architect of the Capitol,
Washington, DC.

DEAR GEORGE: I am writing to express my support for Senator Steve Symms' proposal to site a memorial to Thomas Paine on a Capitol grounds site. I have long supported a proper recognition of Thomas Paine, and I am pleased to learn from Senator Symms of his desire to locate a modest memorial in keeping with Paine's philosophy on the Capitol grounds.

As I wrote to Senator Symms in August 1991 when he first came to me to ascertain my position with respect to his proposed statue of Thomas Paine, "I shall pursue with all the intelligence and energy I have to do the appropriate honor to Thomas Paine."

After reviewing the present list of more than 220 co-sponsors of H.R. 1628, coupled with the dozens of endorsements of the Pennsylvania and Constitution Avenues site on the Capitol grounds, supported by eminent historians who are professors and chairs of history departments at prestigious universities throughout the United States, I continue to totally support this long-neglected tribute to Thomas Paine.

Senator Symms assures me that the proper precautions will be taken in the language of the legislation and in the accompanying documentation to preclude this action from becoming a precedent for the siting of other memorials on Capitol grounds.

I am convinced that criticism of this proposal would be muted by the following facts: 1. It would not create a dangerous precedent, 2. The memorial would be privately funded, 3. The memorial design would be modest in appearance, and subject to your final approval, and 4. Thomas Paine's historical significance and appeal transcends partisanship and ideological differences.

In any objective analysis of American history, Thomas Paine has always been viewed in the forefront of the movement for Independence, the rights of all men and women without regard to race or religion, and the necessity for the development of a written democratic constitution. For example, two of America's most eminent historians, Allen Nevins and Henry Steele Commager, wrote in A Short History of the United States:

"What had begun as a war for the 'rights of Englishmen' and the mere redress of grievances became in little more than a year a war for independence. . . . Earlier in 1776, Washington's army raised a distinctive American flag. At the same time a profound effect was being produced by the pamphlet Common Sense, written by a brilliant young radical, Thomas Paine, lately come from England. He argued that independence was the only remedy, that it would be harder to win the longer it was delayed, and that it alone would make American union possible.

In another work coauthored with Richard B. Morris, Professor Commager has observed: "Doubtless the most important single influence in bringing about a change in popular sentiment was the publication, in January, 1776, of Common Sense. * * * Above all, it presented arguments elementary and to be understood by all, in language that could be read by all; it appealed to the widespread popular sense of Americanism, of separation, of egalitarianism * * * The influence of Common Sense was prodigious, and from all parts of the country came testimony of the revolution. It was working in the minds and the hearts of Americans."

For all of these reasons, I am able to express my wholehearted support for Senator Symms' proposal.

Sincerely,

FRED SCHWENDEL,
President.

DEAR SENATOR GARN: I strongly support the proposal by Senator Steven Symms authorizing a memorial be erected to Thomas Paine at the junction of Constitution and Pennsylvania Avenues. As a teacher of Early American history I fully appreciate the unique and important contributions Paine made to our Revolution and early nation as well as his role abroad. It merits formal recognition and this seems a fine way to do it.

DEAR SENATOR SYMMS: Thank you for your recent letter about your proposal to construct a memorial to Thomas Paine in Washington D.C. I wish to add my voice to the chorus of historians who have endorsed your efforts to have one of the leading radical figures in the American political tradition honored.

As a historian of colonial and revolutionary America, Paine figures large in both my teaching and research. Through his political writings and the enormous impact that Common Sense had upon its audience in 1776, Paine deserves to be accorded the same status as the other founding fathers who propounded a republican system of government. Moreover, his ability to capture the mood of the times not only in America, but also in France on the eve of its revolution firmly places Paine in the trans-Atlantic radical tradition.

On a more personal note, I use Paine's Common Sense in an American history survey course and in a seminar on the American Revolution. My students find Paine's ideas and observations about political society and the need for an active citizenry as relevant today as it was during the "times that try men's souls."

I trust that your campaign will prove successful, and that Tom Paine will join the other Tom (Jefferson) in Washington D.C.

DEAR SENATOR ROBB: Senator Steve Symms of Idaho has asked me to express to you my support of the proposed memorial to Thomas Paine on the grounds of the Capitol. Such national recognition of Paine is long overdue. Curiously, there is a fine statute of Paine at his birthplace, Thetford, in Norfolk, which I have visited, and he is remembered there at every anniversary. But in this country, to which he came at the age of twenty and were he rendered his great service to mankind, he is scarcely remembered at all. The United States has an unacknowledged debt of gratitude to Paine. I warmly urge you to support the proposal of the Thomas Paine National Historical Association and hope that you will join Senator Symms as a co-sponsor of the legislation.

Sincerely yours,

Senator STEVE SYMMS,

DEAR SENATOR SYMMS: Thank you for your letter informing me of your legislation to commemorate the life and efforts of Thomas Paine. I was surprised to learn that no Paine memorial of any sort exists in our nation's capital. In view of the unmatched impact of his pamphlet, Common Sense—it was the most widely read work of its time in America—Americans ought to be re-acquainted with its powerful message of democracy and universal rights. Paine's conceptualization of a great and free society compelled him to attack slavery and inequality in that work and in many other writings. As is abundantly clear to me in the work I am now completing on the creation of a free society in America after 1776, Paine was also an early proponent of a vigorous and healthy economy that would allow the fruits of American prosperity to be enjoyed broadly and serve to benefit all sectors of the nation.

A monument in Washington would bring these ever-important founding principles to the attention of Americans; it is long overdue.

I heartily endorse your efforts, and will urge Missouri Senators Christopher S. Bond and John C. Danforth and Representatives William L. Clay and Richard A. Gephardt to support your legislation.

Mr. GEORGE WHITE,
Architect of the Capitol,
U.S. Congress, Washington, DC.

DEAR GEORGE: The proposed legislation to allow the private sector to construct a modest memorial to Thomas Paine that would be located on the grounds of the U.S. Capitol, has my full support.

I commend the efforts of the Thomas Paine National Historical Association and Senator Symms in bringing long overdue recognition to one of our nation's most important proponents of democracy. His eloquent and persuasive arguments in Common Sense, The American Crisis and The Rights of Man have had a profound influence upon American political philosophy. His achievements as a writer and thinker have been recognized well beyond our shores. It is ironic, indeed, that no lasting tribute to him currently stands in the capital of the country that he so vigorously helped to shape.

We of Ohio and the Western Reserve know of Thomas Paine's legacy through the remarkable Northwest Ordinance that was clearly influenced by his advocacy of human rights and his remarkable vision.

I very much encourage your favorable consideration of a Thomas Paine Memorial at the U.S. Capitol.

Sincerely,

DEAR SENATOR BYRD: I am writing to urge your support of legislation to allow private groups to erect a memorial to Thomas Paine. Such a memorial has been long delayed. Paine is perhaps best known for his authorship of Common Sense. It is doubtful if any other document before or since has done more to influence the course of events. In 1776, Common Sense propelled the colonies to independence.

Paine's role in sparking the rebellion is all too often ignored. It was Paine who verbalized and popularized revolutionary rhetoric for all classes in colonial society. A memorial to Paine on the Capitol grounds would be a most appropriate tribute to the man who was able to unite thirteen formerly diverse colonies in a common cause.

I strongly urge your support of this measure.

Sincerely,

MARY LOU LUSTIG,
Assistant Professor.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, January 12, 1987.

I am delighted to send greetings to the members of The Thomas Paine National Historical Association as you celebrate the 250th anniversary of the birth of your organization's namesake.

In the bleak December of 1776, Paine wrote, "These are the times that try men's souls. The summer soldier and the sunshine patriot will, in this crisis, shrink from the service of their country; but he that stands it now, deserves the love and thanks of man and woman."

Among his many forceful and cogent writings, it is perhaps by these words that Americans best remember Paine. And with good reason. They provided invaluable inspiration for the men of the Continental Army at a time when the American Revolution seemed in danger of being crushed.

But Paine did not just talk a good fight. He labored long and tirelessly to raise funds and equipment for the colonial forces, even to the point of impoverishing himself, fulfilling his own words that, "Those who expect to reap the blessings of freedom must, like men, undergo the fatigue of supporting it."

Tom Paine deserves our tribute above all for his eloquent and timeless defense of the value of freedom. In this age in which some people question whether any value is worth great sacrifice, whether any ideal is worth fighting for, Paine reminds us that a free society is well worth whatever price must be paid to achieve and preserve it.

I commend your Association for keeping alive the spirit of this great champion of human freedom, and I join you in honoring him. You have my best wishes for a memorable celebration.

God bless you.

RONALD REAGAN.

Senator ROBERT DOLE,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR DOLE: It has come to our attention that Senator Steve Symms of Idaho is introducing legislation to allow the Thomas Paine Society and the private sector to construct a modest memorial to Thomas Paine on the grounds of the U.S. Capitol. It is also our understanding that as Chairman of the Senate Rules Committee, you have a considerable role to play in the utilization of space on the capitol grounds.

We urge you to respond favorably to the Symms legislation. Surely few individuals were as important to the founding of the American Republic as Thomas Paine. As George Washington noted, Paine's publication of Common Sense in January 1776 "is working a powerful change in the minds of men," for it directly attacked the allegiance to the monarchy of George II and transformed the revolutionary controversy. His subsequent contribution of inspirational articles condemning slavery and promoting equal rights for men and women of all race and religious beliefs places him among the leading founding fathers.

It was with the greatest surprise, therefore, that we learned that there is no memorial to this great American. Such an oversight should have been corrected at the time of the Bicentennial celebration. Since it was not, it seems appropriate to do so now and it is equally appropriate that he be accorded space on the U.S. capitol grounds. Since such a modest memorial will be erected and maintained at no cost to the taxpayers, we heartily endorse such a memorial and urge you to do so as well. Thank you for your attention to this matter.

On behalf of the Department of History of Wichita State University, I remain,

Sincerely Yours,

JOHN E. DREIFORT,
Professor and Chair.

Hon. STEVEN SYMMS,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR SYMMS: I very much support your efforts to erect a monument at the corner of Constitution and Pennsylvania Avenues in Washington, D.C., honoring Thomas Paine. The recognition is well deserved, and long overdue.

Paine presents the kind of radical figure difficult for many people to understand because he resists easy categorization and mythologizing. A Deist, he knew the language of evangelical Protestantism well enough to base one of his central arguments in Common Sense on I Samuel; a one-time tax collector, he feared the power of government to extract people's property from them without their consent; a fervent democrat, he also advocated the entrepreneurial capitalism of the ascending mercantile elites; and a world-class revolutionary, he also advocated the necessity for grounding government in a constitution. One or another part of his career angers almost anyone with an ideological axe to grind, and so it is perhaps not surprising that the greatest propagandist of the American Revolution does not yet have his marker in the city of statues. He should.

Paine reminds us of the ambiguities of our past, the explosive mixture of regard for human rights and personal property that is both the Revolution's legacy and its challenge: how to reconcile liberty with the pursuit of personal gain? At this point in time, we ought to be able to salute publicly his revolutionary republicanism, and to lay aside Theodore Roosevelt's assessment of him as a "dirty little atheist." I applaud your efforts and wish them success.

Sincerely,

CHARLES L. COHEN,
Associate Chairman.

Senator EDWARD KENNEDY,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR KENNEDY: I strongly support the legislation proposed by Sen. Symms to authorize a memorial to Thomas Paine to be erected on Capitol grounds at Pennsylvania and Constitution Avenues. Paine was a crucial figure in the emergence of American republicanism, and a signal contributor to democratic thought.

The proposed statue is a fitting (and long overdue) way to acknowledge Paine's remarkable accomplishments and his legacy.

Sincerely,

NANCY F. COTT,
Woodward Professor of

Senator STEVE SYMMS,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR SYMMS: Enclosed for your information is a copy of the letter I sent to Senators Wofford and Spector of Pennsylvania in support of your proposal to erect a statue in honor of Thomas Paine.

The Department of History & Political Science appreciates your initiative in this matter and wishes you success with its completion.

Sincerely,

PHILIP J. AVILLO, Jr., Ph.D.,
Chairman.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, in closing, I think it well to remember that Thomas Paine was one of the first to publicly, unequivocally, and effectively denounce chattel slavery in America, connecting the freedoms of African-Americans to the cause of American freedom. In addition, as clerk of the Pennsylvania Assembly, he wrote the first law in the Western World regarding emancipation.

He was the first to propose and help implement through written persuasion the four cornerstones of American society and governance: First, our independence from England; second, our representative, democratic/republican form of government; third, our status as a united sovereign country with due regard for individual and States rights; and fourth, our status as world leader for universal freedom and human rights.

He was the first to specifically call for a Declaration for Independence and a Constitutional Convention, and propose an outline for our constitution.

He coined the term "Free and Independent States of America" and brought into general usage the term "United States of America".

He nurtured the Revolution through immortal words and practical deeds, such as initiating the first effective fund drive for the war effort, which resulted in his being the first subscriber to the Bank of America, which financed the Revolution; and he personally traveled to France and secured finances and critical supplies for the decisive battle of Yorktown.

He significantly contributed to the first victory of the continental Army with his immortal words, "These are the times that try men's souls * * * et cetera, which Washington ordered read to the entire Army, and Presidents have used ever since in times of crisis up to and including the present administration.

He was among the first to publish a defense of the rights of women.

He carried the concept of a new world order to Europe, resulting in the democratic reform movements of the late 18th and 19th centuries which ultimately led to the Third World and Eastern European revolutions we have just witnessed.

He was among the first to publicly call for the overthrow of the French monarchy and wrote the French Declaration of Rights, but defended the life of Louis XVI at risk to his own.

He was among the first to propose an international peace organization using sanctions as a means of enforcement of international law.

He was among the first to propose international arbitration and copyright.

He pioneered the development of the metal single span arch bridge.

In terms of per capita readership at the time of publication, he wrote two of the greatest selling works in the history of writing: "Common Sense," and the "Rights of Man" I don't know of an 18th century political writer who has more books still in print.

I thank my colleagues, the pages, the staff of the Secretary and Sergeant at Arms, who run the Senate, for their indulgence at this late hour on a Friday afternoon. But I do appreciate it. And I would also like to say a special thanks to all of my colleagues, some who are not as yet sponsors of the concurrent resolution and certainly all those who are sponsors of this concurrent resolution for making this a reality. I know there will be many people who will be looking forward to the day when the families of America come to this Nation's beautiful Capitol and there will be an appropriate memorial built here on the Capitol grounds which will pay tribute to this great American.

Mr. President, I thank the Chair.

- SEC. 6. CONTROL IN GROWTH OF MANDATORY SPENDING.
 - (a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—
 - (1) mandatory spending has increased from $32 billion in 1962 to $708 billion in 1992;
 - (2) mandatory spending now accounts for nearly half of all Federal outlays, up from 30 percent in 1962;
 - (3) over the next five years, mandatory spending will grow by $190 billion over and above inflation increases and increases for new beneficiaries;
 - (4) the Federal budget deficit, projected to exceed $400 billion in 2002, will remain too high unless the growth in mandatory spending is brought under control; and
 - (5) the current budget process does not provide adequate controls on the growth of mandatory spending.
 - (b) SENSE OF THE CONGRESS.—It is the sense of the Congress that legislation should be enacted that—
 - (1) would, beginning with fiscal year 1994, phase in a cap by fiscal year 1997 on the growth in mandatory spending for all programs except Social Security at a level that allows for beneficiary and inflation growth;
 - (2) requires mandatory funding levels in the congressional budget resolution not to exceed the mandatory cap; and

- (3) provides a mechanism to reduce the growth in spending for mandatory programs except Social Security if such mandatory spending exceeds the cap.
- SEC. 7. SOCIAL SECURITY OUTLAY AND REVENUE LEVELS.
 - (a) ACCOUNTING TREATMENT.—Notwithstanding any other provision of this resolution, for the purpose of allocations and points of order under sections 302 and 311 of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, the levels of Social Security outlays and revenues for this resolution shall be the current services levels.
 - (b) APPLICATION OF SECTION 301(i).—Notwithstanding any other rule of the Senate, in the Senate, the point of order established under section 301(i) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 shall apply to any concurrent resolution on the budget for any fiscal year (as reported and as amended), amendments thereto, or any conference report thereon.
- SEC. 8. THE PEACE DIVIDEND.
 - (a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that this concurrent resolution on the budget—
 - (1) reduces the President's budget request for function 050, National Defense, by a total of $35 billion for fiscal years 1993 through 1997; and,
 - (2) allocates $30 billion in funding above a freeze level for domestic discretionary spending to function 920, Allowances, for fiscal years 1993 through 1997 and abides by the Budget Enforcement Act's spending limitations.
 - (b) SENSE OF THE CONGRESS.—It is the sense of the Congress this budget resolution assume that—
 - (1) the defense savings associated with the President's budget request be devoted to deficit reduction; and,
 - (2) $30 billion of the additional defense savings for fiscal years 1993–1997 be devoted to additional funding above a freeze level for domestic discretionary investments for transportation, education and training, science and technology, and other economic growth enhancing initiatives that increase the nation's productivity and competitiveness.
- SEC. 9. MAXIMUM DEFICIT AMOUNT POINT OF ORDER IN THE SENATE.
 - In the Senate, an affirmative vote of three-fifths of the Members of the Senate, duly chosen and sworn, shall be required to—
 - (1) waive or suspend section 605(b) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974; or
 - (2) sustain an appeal of the ruling of the Chair on a point of order raised under section 605(b) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974.
- SEC. 10. SENSE OF THE SENATE REGARDING FOREIGN GOVERNMENT SUBSIDIES.
 - (a) FINDINGS.—The Senate finds that—
 - (1) the provision of trade distorting industrial subsidies by foreign governments puts tremendous pressure on the United States Government to provide similar subsidies to industries in the United States; and
 - (2) any ratification of foreign government industrial subsidies would so increase the pressure for industrial subsidies by the United States Government as to undermine efforts to limit the growth of government spending and reduce the federal budget deficit.
 - (b) SENSE OF THE SENATE.—It is the sense of the Senate that, consistent with the overall and principal trade negotiating objectives set forth in the Omnibus Trade and Competitiveness Act of 1988, the United States Government should not, as a matter of official policy, condone or legitimize trade distorting subsidies by foreign governments that cause material injury to industries in the United States.

SEC. 11. SENSE OF THE SENATE THAT CERTAIN GOVERNMENT SUBSIDIES SHOULD NOT GO TO THOSE WHO ARE NOT IN NEED AND THAT A STUDY SHOULD BE CONDUCTED TO IDENTIFY SUCH SUBSIDIES.

(a) FINDING.—The United States Government needs an accurate understanding of the subsidies it pays to those who are not in need.

(b) SENSE OF THE SENATE.—It is the sense of the Senate that, as part of the effort to reduce the Federal budget deficit and to set spending priorities, subsidies should not be paid to those who are not in need and that a study should be conducted, as provided in paragraph (c), to identify such subsidies.

(c) STUDY OF UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT MANDATORY SPENDING BY INCOME CATEGORIES.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—The Director of the Office of Management and Budget, and concurrently Director of the Congressional Budget Office, in consultation with the Bureau of the Census and the Internal Revenue Service (both of which would provide statistical data) and other Executive Branch departments and agencies, should prepare an estimate by agency and account of the dollar value (as measured by outlays) of assistance payments from United States Government mandatory spending programs under current law and regulations to recipients by income category for the current and five succeeding fiscal years.

(2) METHODOLOGY.—The study described in paragraph c, to establish appropriate income categories, shall use for individuals the sum of the individual's adjusted gross income plus any United States Government assistance payment not already included in such adjusted gross income and shall use for persons other than individuals the sum of the person's taxable income plus any such payment not already included in such taxable income.

(3) DEFINITIONS.—

(A) The term "assistance payments from United States Government mandatory spending programs" means any payment, including payments-in-kind and loans, made by the United States Government directly, indirectly, or through payment to another on the individual's or person's behalf from the mandatory spending programs. The term does not mean payments of Social Security benefits.

(B) The term "recipients" means the individuals or persons on whose behalf the assistance payments are made.

(4) REPORTING.—The study described in subsection c of paragraph 1 shall be submitted to the Congress, and updated annually, as part of the Budget Message of the President.

SEC. 12. SENSE OF THE SENATE REGARDING BALANCED BUDGET AMENDMENT.

(1) It is the sense of the Senate that the Senate should adopt a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution relating to a federal balanced budget, and requiring the President of the United States to annually submit a balanced budget and that the adoption of such joint resolution should occur on or before June 5, 1992.

SEC. 13. PROGRAM BUDGET EVALUATION.

(a) FINDINGS.—

(1) the current national debt stands at $3.1 trillion;

(2) the federal deficit for fiscal year 1993 is projected to add another $350 billion to that debt; and

(3) it is crucial to the well being of future generations of Americans that federal deficits be eliminated and the national debt reduced;

(b) SENSE OF THE SENATE.—

It is the Sense of the Senate that prior to the commencement of the 104th Congress, each authorizing committee of the Senate should conduct a comprehensive reexamination and evaluation of existing programs under its jurisdiction which result in the expenditure of federal dollars, and report its findings to the Senate.

Such committee reports should consider the following matters:

(1) an identification of the objectives intended for the program and the problem it was intended to address.

(2) an identification of any trends, developments, and emerging conditions which are likely to affect the future nature and extent of the problems or needs which the program is intended to address.

(3) an identification of any other program having potentially conflicting or duplicative objectives.

(4) a statement of the number and types of beneficiaries or persons served by the program.

(5) an assessment of the effectiveness of the program and the degrees to which the original objectives of the program or group of programs have been achieved.

(6) an assessment of the cost effectiveness of the program.

(7) an assessment of the relative merits of alternative methods which could be considered to achieve the purposes of the program."

SEC. 14. SENSE OF THE SENATE REGARDING INCREASING PRODUCTIVITY.

(A) FINDINGS.—The Senate finds that—

(1) failure to meet the challenge of international economic competitiveness would seriously jeopardize our national security, standard of living, and quality of life in the coming decades; and

(2) increased productivity is the key to meeting the challenge and regaining the competitive edge the United States economy enjoyed in the past.

(b) SENSE OF THE SENATE.—It is the sense of the Senate that funds should be allocated to allow this Nation to commit to an increase in productivity and international competitiveness through a program of long-term strategic investment in—

(1) the development of its human resources;

(2) the physical infrastructure that supports economic activity;

(3) the development and commercialization of technology; and

(4) productive plants and equipment.

On page 38, line 17 of the amendment, insert before the period the following: ", except that Medicaid shall be exempt from the cap and the cuts required by the mechanism described in this section".

MITCHELL AMENDMENT NO. 1779

Mr. MITCHELL proposed an amendment to amendment No. 1778 proposed by him to amendment No. 1777 proposed by Mr. DOMENICI (and others) to the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 106), supra; as follows:

At the end of the matter proposed to be inserted, insert the following: ", Veterans' Compensation shall be exempt from the cap and the cuts required by the mechanism described in this section".

DECONCINI (AND OTHERS)
AMENDMENT NO. 1780

Mr. DECONCINI (for himself, Mr. CHAFEE, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. SPECTER, Mr. JOHNSTON, Mr. LUGAR, Mr. BRADLEY, Mr. DOLE, Mr. GRAHAM, Mr. MCCONNELL, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. WARNER, Mr. AKAKA, Mr. MURKOWSKI, Mr. SIMON, Mr. DANFORTH, Mr. WELLSTONE, Mr. DURENBERGER, Mr. DODD, and Mr. LAUTENBERG) proposed an amendment to the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 106), supra, as follows:

At the end of the resolution, add the following:

SEC. . SENSE OF THE SENATE ON WIC.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Senate finds that—

(1) the Special Supplemental Food Program for Women, Infants and Children (WIC) has been invaluable to millions of needy pregnant and nursing women, infants and children at nutritional risk for nearly 20 years;

(2) President Bush has commendably recommended an increase in the WIC program for fiscal year 1993, continuing the strong bipartisan support for expanding the program to serve more of those eligible;

(3) the chairmen of five major American corporations testified last year on WIC, declaring that an increased investment in WIC is essential to the Nation's future economic growth and that "WIC can make an important contribution to ensuring that  we have the productive workforce we need";

(4) the CEOs called WIC "the health-care equivalent of a triple-A rated investment  one of the most reliable ways that Government can invest its resources," and recommended that to achieve the national education goal established by the President and Governors that by the year 2000 all children should start school ready to learn, " we need to set a related goal: Every woman, infant, and child who is eligible for WIC in 1995 and later years will be served by the program";

(5) less than 60 percent of the eligible women, infants, and children are served by the program due to funding limitations;

(6) a funding level of $3,000,000,000 in fiscal year 1993 is needed to remain on the 5-year path embarked upon by the Congress last year to reach full funding consistent with the CEO's recommendation; and

(7) a recent United States Department of Agriculture study has demonstrated that the prenatal component of WIC reduces Medicaid costs by between $1.92 and $4.21 for each dollar invested in it, and studies issued by the National Bureau of Economic Research have found WIC to be one of the most cost-effective means of reducing infant mortality and indicate WIC also may produce long-term savings in special educational costs.

(b) SENSE OF THE SENATE.—It is the sense of the Senate that the WIC program should be funded at $3,000,000,000 for fiscal year 1993.

ROTH AMENDMENT NO. 1781

Mr. ROTH proposed an amendment to the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 106), supra, as follows:

At the end of the resolution, add the following:

SEC. . COMMISSION ON FEDERAL GOVERNMENT REFORM.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—
 (1) the American people face a crisis of confidence in the Federal Government, which cannot be remedied without dramatic and fundamental reform;

(2) recent polls indicate that an all-time low of only 17 percent of the public approves of Congress, that 78 percent are dissatisfied or angry about the Federal Government, and that Americans think an average of 48 cents out of every dollar in federal taxes is wasted;

(3) while the American people are demanding more performance from their government for the taxes they pay, Congress and the Executive branch still debate the same old options of fewer services or higher taxes;

(4) the public wants governmental institutions that respond quickly to citizens needs, with high-quality services delivered at the minimum necessary cost;

(5) the Federal Government has many talented and hardworking employees whose effectiveness is hindered by existing organizational structures and operations;

(6) some governmental organizations have become inefficient and have structures and missions not reflecting current domestic and international priorities;

(7) some of these organizations were developed during the industrial era, and have large, centralized bureaucracies, a preoccupation with rules and regulations, and a hierarchical chain of command;

(8) such governmental organizations are so obsessed with regulating processes and procedures, that they have ignored the outcomes of their programs;

(9) unlike the Federal Government, American corporations and State and local governments, are making revolutionary changes by streamlining their organizations, decentralizing authority, flattening hierarchies, focusing on quality, and emphasizing responsiveness to the customer; and

(10) there is now a crucial need for a serious examination of how the Federal Government might apply such organizational and operational reforms to its own institutions.

(b) SENSE OF THE CONGRESS.—It is the sense of the Congress that:

(1) a Commission on Federal Government Reform should be established to examine the organization and operations of the Federal government. In developing recommendations to improve governmental performance while minimizing costs, the Commission should consider ways to:

(A) define program missions in terms of measurable outcomes, emphasizing quality of service, customer satisfaction, and results-oriented accountability;

(B) reform personnel systems so as to improve morale, inspire initiative, maximize productivity and effectiveness, and reward excellence;

(C) increase program responsiveness, by eliminating unnecessary paperwork and procedural requirements and increasing managerial discretion, in return for greater accountability for achieving results;

(D) consolidate and streamline departments, agencies, and programs where possible so as to reduce costs, minimize hierarchy, and focus responsibility;

(E) control the payroll costs of government while providing appropriate levels of staffing to meet program needs;

(F) promote the application of new information technologies, to improve management and reduce administrative costs; and

(G) develop mechanisms to promote greater cooperation and coordination between the legislative and executive branches, and greater attention to the long-term impacts of budgetary and policy decisions.

(2) Congress should be mandated to consider the recommendations of the National Commission.

WELLSTONE (AND DODD)
 AMENDMENT NO. 1782

Mr. WELLSTONE (for himself and Mr. DODD) proposed an amendment to the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 106), supra, as follows:

At the end of the bill, add the following:

SEC. . DEFENSE INDUSTRY CONVERSION.

It is the sense of Congress that no less than $1,000,000,000 in budget authority provided in this resolution for the defense function 050 for fiscal year 1993 should be made available for defense industry conversion-related activities such as those within the following programs:

(1) DEFENSE INDUSTRY WORKERS, JTPA-EDWAA.

(2) COMMUNITIES.—

(A) Economic Development Administration.

(B) Community Development Block Grants.

(C) Small Business Administration.

(D) Impact aid grants to school districts.

(3) TECHNOLOGY.—

(A) NSF education grants to engineers.

(B) DOE technology transfer.

(C) National Institutes of Standards and Technology.

(D) Intelligent vehicle highway system.

SEYMOUR AMENDMENT NO. 1783

Mr. SEYMOUR proposed an amendment to the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 106), supra, as follows:

At the end of the resolution add the following new section:

SEC. 11. SENSE OF CONGRESS RELATING TO THE USE OF DEFENSE-RELATED SAVINGS IN THE FEDERAL BUDGET FOR RETRAINING AND REEMPLOYMENT OF CERTAIN INDIVIDUALS.

(a) FINDINGS.—Congress finds the following:

(1) In relation to the total amount of anticipated Federal spending in fiscal year 1993 and to the anticipated gross national product of the United States in that fiscal year, the percentage of the fiscal year 1993 budget submitted to Congress by the President that is committed to defense spending is the smallest percentage committed to that purpose since before the entry of the United States into World War II.

(2) In each fiscal year from fiscal year 1993 to fiscal year 1997, real growth in programmed Federal spending for national defense purposes will decline at a rate of four percent per year.

(3) During the ten-year period beginning in 1987 and ending in 1997, approximately 708,000 active duty members of the Armed Forces and civilian employees of the Department of Defense will be involuntarily separated from active duty or become unemployed as a result of reductions in Federal defense spending.

(4) The Office of Technology Assessment estimates that, during the period beginning in 1991 and ending in 1995, between 530,000 and 620,000 employees of private, defense-related industries in the United States will become unemployed as a result of reductions in such spending.

(5) The retraining and re-employment of such members, civilian employees, and employees of private industry is critical to the capability of the private aerospace and defense industries of the United States to develop, commercialize, and market non-defense products and technologies.

(6) The capability of such industries to develop, commercialize, and market non-defense products and technologies will play a critical role in ensuring the long-term economic prosperity of such industries and the United States.

(b) SENSE OF CONGRESS.—It is the sense of Congress that a meaningful percentage of the savings in Federal defense spending in fiscal years 1993 through 1997 be made available for the establishment of programs to retrain and re-employ active duty members of the Armed Forces, civilian employees of the Department of Defense, and employees of private, defense-related industries who are involuntarily separated from such duty or become unemployed as a result of reductions in Federal spending for national defense.

D'AMATO (AND OTHERS)
 AMENDMENT NO. 1784

GRASSLEY AMENDMENT NO. 1785

Mr. GRASSLEY proposed an amendment to the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 106), supra, as follows:

At the appropriate place, insert the following:

SEC. . SENSE OF THE SENATE REGARDING THE USE OF DEFENSE RELATED CUTS MADE IN BOTH DEFENSE AND DOMESTIC PROGRAMS.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Senate finds that—

(1) fairness and propriety dictate that the "Fourth Arm of Defense", better known as the U.S.-flag Merchant Marine, share the burden of defense cuts in this post-cold war era;

(2) the justification for maritime programs and policies such as the Jones Act, cargo preference, and Operating Differential Subsidies has been to maintain a U.S.-flag fleet to supply vessels and manning for sealift needs during overseas military conflicts;

(3) these programs support approximately 9-10 thousand seafaring billets or jobs, with cargo preference supporting approximately 2,000 billets, Operating Differential Subsidies supporting approximately 2,300 billets, and the Jones Act supporting the remaining 5,000 billets.

(4) the U.S. International Trade Commission study concluded that the Jones Act costs American consumers and businesses more than $10 billion per year, and destroys 2,000 jobs in mining, forestry, agriculture and other industries. This translates into a cost of $2 million per seafaring billet.

(5) the Office of Management and Budget reports that it estimates the cost of cargo preference for fiscal year 1993 to run over $500 million. This translates into a cost to the taxpayer of $250,000 per seafaring billet.

(6) the Office of Management and Budget reports that it estimates Operating Differential Subsidies for fiscal year 1993 to cost $225 million. This translates into a cost to the taxpayer of about $100,000 per seafaring billet to subsidize the difference of wages and benefits between U.S.-flag seafarers and their world competitors.

(7) the Department of Defense reports the average cost of salary and benefits for the military's 1.9 million enlisted and officers from E-1 to O-6 captain rank averages $32,125 per year, with captains of navy vessels costing $101,069. The cost of reservists would average one-sixth of these costs.

(8) the Maritime Administration reports the cost of salary and benefits for a captain of a commercial merchant marine class A-3 vessel costs $312,000 per year.

(9) the cost of one commercial merchant marine captain could pay for the cost of three active duty or eighteen reservist captains who face unemployment because of defense reductions in force.

(10) the effort to eliminate unwise defense spending must reach all areas, including the "fourth Arm of Defense" meaning the U.S. commercial merchant marine.

(11) savings from merchant marine programs can and should be used to invest in programs critical to the welfare and education of our children, as well as to improve our military sealift needs.

(12) these savings can be achieved and directed this fiscal year to children programs without eliminating the budget firewalls.

(b) SENSE OF THE SENATE.—It is the sense of the Senate, that cargo preference and operating differential subsidies for our merchant marine be eliminated by Congress and that the $416 million domestic savings per year be distributed among children's welfare and education programs including: Chapter 1, Head Start, Special Education, Impact Aid, Immunizations, Maternal & Child Health, Child Care Block Grant, Child Abuse Prevention, and WIC. Furthermore, the $310 million defense savings from eliminating cargo preference should be dedicated toward establishing a merchant marine reserve paid at the same rate regular military reservists, and that any remaining defense savings be used to minimize the number of active duty and reserve military personal from being released into the unemployment lines. If additional savings are available, they should be devoted to deficit reduction.

JOHNSTON (AND OTHERS) AMENDMENT NO. 1786

"DEBARMENT, TEMPORARY DENIAL OF APPROVAL, AND SUSPENSION

"SEC. 306. (a) MANDATORY DEBARMENT.—

"(1) CORPORATIONS, PARTNERSHIPS, AND ASSOCIATIONS.—If the Secretary finds that a person other than an individual has been convicted, after the date of the enactment of this section, of a felony under Federal law for conduct relating to the development or approval, including the process for development or approval, of any abbreviated drug application, the Secretary shall debar such person from submitting, or assisting in the submission of, any such application.

"(2) INDIVIDUALS.—If the Secretary finds that an individual has been convicted of a felony under Federal law for conduct—

"(A) relating to the development or approval, including the process for development or approval, of any drug product, or

"(B) otherwise relating to the regulation of any drug product under this Act, the Secretary shall debar such individual from providing services in any capacity to a person that has an approved or pending drug product application.

"(b) PERMISSIVE DEBARMENT.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—The Secretary, on the Secretary's own initiative or in response to a petition, may, in accordance with paragraph (2), debar—

"(A) a person other than an individual from submitting or assisting in the submission of any abbreviated drug application, or

"(B) an individual from providing services in any capacity to a person that has an approved or pending drug product application.

"(2) PERSONS SUBJECT TO PERMISSIVE DEBARMENT.—The following persons are subject to debarment under paragraph (1):

"(A) CORPORATIONS, PARTNERSHIPS, AND ASSOCIATIONS.—Any person other than an individual that the Secretary finds has been convicted—

"(i) for conduct that—

"(I) relates to the development or approval, including the process for the development or approval, of any abbreviated drug application; and

"(II) is a felony under Federal law (if the person was convicted before the date of the enactment of this section), a misdemeanor under Federal law, or a felony under State law, or

"(ii) of a conspiracy to commit, or aiding or abetting, a criminal offense described in clause (i) or a felony described in subsection (a)(1), if the Secretary finds that the type of conduct which served as the basis for such conviction undermines the process for the regulation of drugs.

"(B) INDIVIDUALS.—

"(i) Any individual whom the Secretary finds has been convicted of—

"(I) a misdemeanor under Federal law or a felony under State law for conduct relating to the development or approval, including the process for development or approval, of any drug product or otherwise relating to the regulation of drug products under this Act, or

"(II) a conspiracy to commit, or aiding or abetting, such criminal offense or a felony described in subsection (a)(2),

"(ii) Any individual whom the Secretary finds has been convicted of—

"(I) a felony which is not described in subsection (a)(2) or clause (i) of this subparagraph and which involves bribery, payment of illegal gratuities, fraud, perjury, false statement, racketeering, blackmail, extortion, falsification or destruction of records, or interference with, obstruction of an investigation into, or prosecution of, any criminal offense, or

"(II) a conspiracy to commit, or aiding or abetting, such felony,

"(iii) Any individual whom the Secretary finds materially participated in acts that were the basis for a conviction for an offense described in subsection (a) or in clause (i) or (ii) for which a conviction was obtained, if the Secretary finds, on the basis of such participation and other information, that such individual has demonstrated a pattern of conduct sufficient to find that there is reason to believe that such individual may violate requirements under this Act relating to drug products.

"(iv) Any high managerial agent whom the Secretary finds—

"(I) worked for, or worked as a consultant for, the same person as another individual during the period in which such other individual took actions for which a felony conviction was obtained and which resulted in the debarment under subsection (a)(2), or clause (i), of such other individual,

"(II) had actual knowledge of the actions described in subclause (I) of such other individual, or took action to avoid such actual knowledge, or failed to take action for the purpose of avoiding such actual knowledge,

"(IV) did not report such actions, or did not cause such actions to be reported, to an officer, employee, or agent of the Department or to an appropriate law enforcement officer, or failed to take other appropriate action that would have ensured that the process for the regulation of drugs was not undermined, within a reasonable time after such agent first knew of such actions, if the Secretary finds that the type of conduct which served as the basis for such other individual's conviction undermines the process for the regulation of drugs.

"(3) STAY OF CERTAIN ORDERS.—An order of the Secretary under clause (iii) or (iv) of paragraph (2)(B) shall not take effect until 30 days after the order has been issued.

"(c) DEBARMENT PERIOD AND CONSIDERATIONS.—

"(1) EFFECT OF DEBARMENT.—The Secretary—

"(C) shall, if the Secretary makes the finding described in paragraph (6) or (7) of section 307(a), assess a civil penalty in accordance with section 307.

"(2) DEBARMENT PERIODS.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—The Secretary shall debar a person under subsection (a) or (b) for the following periods:

"(i) The period of debarment of a person (other than an individual) under subsection (a)(1) shall not be less than 1 year or more than 10 years, but if an act leading to a subsequent debarment under subsection (a) occurs within 10 years after such person has been debarred under subsection (a)(1), the period of debarment shall be permanent.

"(ii) The debarment of an individual under subsection (a)(2) shall be permanent.

"(iii) The period of debarment of any person under subsection (b)(2) shall not be more than 5 years.

The Secretary may determine whether debarment periods shall run concurrently or consecutively in the case of a person debarred for multiple offenses.

"(B) NOTIFICATION.—Upon a conviction for an offense described in subsection (a) or (b) or upon execution of an agreement with the United States to plead guilty to such an offense, the person involved may notify the Secretary that the person acquiesces to debarment and such person's debarment shall commence upon such notification.

"(3) CONSIDERATIONS.—In determining the appropriateness and the period of a debarment of a person under subsection (b) and any period of debarment beyond the minimum specified in subparagraph (A)(i) of paragraph (2), the Secretary shall consider where applicable—

“(A) the nature and seriousness of any offense involved,

“(B) the nature and extent of management participation in any offense involved, whether corporate policies and practices encouraged the offense, including whether inadequate institutional controls contributed to the offense,

“(C) the nature and extent of voluntary steps to mitigate the impact on the public of any offense involved, including the recall or the discontinuation of the distribution of suspect drugs, full cooperation with any investigations (including the extent of disclosure to appropriate authorities of all wrongdoing), the relinquishing of profits on drug approvals fraudulently obtained, and any other actions taken to substantially limit potential or actual adverse effects on the public health,

“(D) whether the extent to which changes in ownership, management, or operations have corrected the causes of any offense involved and provide reasonable assurances that the offense will not occur in the future,

“(E) whether the person to be debarred is able to present adequate evidence that current production of drugs subject to abbreviated drug applications and all pending abbreviated drug applications are free of fraud or material false statements, and “(F) prior convictions under this Act or under other Acts involving matters within the jurisdiction of the Food and Drug Administration.

“(d) TERMINATION OF DEBARMENT.—

“(1) APPLICATION.—Any person that is debarred under subsection (a) (other than a person permanently debarred) or any person that is debarred under subsection (b) may apply to the Secretary for termination of the debarment under this subsection. Any information submitted to the Secretary under this paragraph does not constitute an amendment or supplement to pending or approved abbreviated drug applications.

“(2) DEADLINE.—The Secretary shall grant or deny any application respecting a debarment which is submitted under paragraph (1) within 180 days of the date the application is submitted.

“(3) ACTION BY THE SECRETARY.—

“(A) CORPORATIONS.—

“(i) CONVICTION REVERSAL.—If the conviction which served as the basis for the debarment of a person under subsection (a)(1) or (b)(2)(A) is reversed, the Secretary shall withdraw the order of debarment.

“(ii) APPLICATION.—Upon application submitted under paragraph (1), the Secretary shall terminate the debarment of a person if the Secretary finds that—“(I) changes in ownership, management, or operations have fully corrected the causes of the offense involved and provide reasonable assurances that the offense will not occur in the future, and

“(II) sufficient audits, conducted by the Food and Drug Administration or by independent experts acceptable to the Food and Drug Administration, demonstrate that pending applications and the development of drugs being tested before the submission of an application are free of fraud or material false statements.

In the case of persons debarred under subsection (a)(1), such termination shall take effect no earlier than the expiration of one year from the date of the debarment.

“(B) INDIVIDUALS.—

“(i) CONVICTION REVERSAL.—If the conviction which served as the basis for the debar-ment of an individual under subsection (a)(2) or clause (i), (ii), (iii), or (iv) of subsection (b)(2)(B) is reversed, the Secretary shall withdraw the order of debarment.

“(ii) APPLICATION.—Upon application submitted under paragraph (1), the Secretary shall terminate the debarment of an individual who has been debarred under subsection (b)(2)(B) if such termination serves the interests of justice and adequately protects the integrity of the drug approval process.

“(4) SPECIAL TERMINATION.—

“(A) APPLICATION.—Any person that is debarred under subsection (a)(1) (other than a person permanently debarred under subsection (c)(2)(A)(i)) or any individual who is debarred under subsection (a)(2) may apply to the Secretary for special termination of debarment under this subsection. Any information submitted to the Secretary under this subparagraph does not constitute an amendment or supplement to pending or approved abbreviated drug applications.

“(B) CORPORATIONS.—Upon an application submitted under subparagraph (A), the Secretary may take the action described in subparagraph (D) if the Secretary, after an informal hearing, finds that—“(i) the person making the application under subparagraph (A) has demonstrated that the felony conviction which was the basis for such person's debarment involved the commission of an offense which was not authorized, requested, commanded, performed, or recklessly tolerated by the board of directors or by a high managerial agent acting on behalf of the person within the scope of the board's or agent's office or employment,

“(ii) all individuals who were involved in the commission of the offense or who knew or should have known of the offense have been removed from employment involving the development or approval of any drug subject to sections 505 or 507,

“(iii) the person fully cooperated with all investigations and promptly disclosed all wrongdoing to the appropriate authorities, and

“(iv) the person acted to mitigate any impact on the public of any offense involved, including the recall, or the discontinuation of the distribution, of any drug with respect to which the Secretary requested a recall or discontinuation of distribution due to concerns about the safety or efficacy of the drug.

“(C) INDIVIDUALS.—Upon an application submitted under subparagraph (A), the Secretary may take the action described in subparagraph (D) if the Secretary, after an informal hearing, finds that such individual has provided substantial assistance in the investigations or prosecutions of offenses which are described in subsection (a) or (b) or which relate to any matter under the jurisdiction of the Food and Drug Administration.

“(D) SECRETARIAL ACTION.—The action referred to in subparagraphs (B) and (C) is—

“(i) in the case of a person other than an individual—

“(I) terminating the debarment immediately, or

“(II) limiting the period of debarment to less than one year, and “(ii) in the case of an individual, limiting the period of debarment to less than permanent but to no less than 1 year, whichever best serves the interest of justice and protects the integrity of the drug approval process.

“(e) PUBLICATION AND LIST OF DEBARRED PERSONS.—The Secretary shall publish in the Federal Register the name of any person debarred under subsection (a) or (b), the effective date of the debarment, and the period of the debarment. The Secretary shall also maintain and make available to the public a list, updated no less often than quarterly, of such persons, of the effective dates and minimum periods of such debarments, and of the termination of debarments.

“(f) TEMPORARY DENIAL OF APPROVAL.—

“(1) IN GENERAL.—The Secretary, on the Secretary's own initiative or in response to a petition, may, in accordance with paragraph (3), refuse by order, for the period prescribed by paragraph (2), to approve any abbreviated drug application submitted by any person—

“(A) if such person is under an active Federal criminal investigation in connection with an action described in subparagraph (B),

“(B) if the Secretary finds that such person—

“(i) has bribed or attempted to bribe, has paid or attempted to pay an illegal gratuity, or has induced or attempted to induce another person to bribe or pay an illegal gratuity to any officer, employee, or agent of the Department of Health and Human Services or to any other Federal, State, or local official in connection with any abbreviated drug application, or has conspired to commit, or aided or abetted, such actions, or

“(ii) has knowingly made or caused to be made a pattern or practice of false statements or misrepresentations with respect to material facts relating to any abbreviated drug application, or the production of any drug subject to an abbreviated drug application, to any officer, employee, or agent of the Department of Health and Human Services, or has conspired to commit, or aided or abetted, such actions, and

“(C) if a significant question has been raised regarding—

“(i) the integrity of the approval process with respect to such abbreviated drug application, or “(ii) the reliability of data in or concerning such person's abbreviated drug application.

Such an order may be modified or terminated at any time.

“(2) APPLICABLE PERIOD.—

“(A) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in subparagraph (B), a denial of approval of an application of a person under paragraph (1) shall be in effect for a period determined by the Secretary but not to exceed 18 months beginning on the date the Secretary finds that the conditions described in subparagraphs (A), (B), and (C) of paragraph (1) exist. The Secretary shall terminate such denial—

“(i) if the investigation with respect to which the finding was made does not result in a criminal charge against such person, if criminal charges have been brought and the charges have been dismissed, or if a judgment of acquittal has been entered, or “(ii) if the Secretary determines that such finding was in error.

“(B) EXTENSION.—If, at the end of the period described in subparagraph (A), the Secretary determines that a person has been criminally charged for an action described in subparagraph (B) of paragraph (1), the Secretary may extend the period of denial of approval of an application for a period not to exceed 18 months. The Secretary shall terminate such extension if the charges have been dismissed, if a judgment of acquittal has been entered, or if the Secretary determines that the finding described in subparagraph (A) was in error.

"(3) INFORMAL HEARING.—Within 10 days of the date an order is issued under paragraph (1), the Secretary shall provide such person with an opportunity for an informal hearing, to be held within such 10 days, on the decision of the Secretary to refuse approval of an abbreviated drug application. Within 60 days of the date on which such hearing is held, the Secretary shall notify the person given such hearing whether the Secretary's refusal of approval will be continued, terminated, or otherwise modified. Such notification shall be final agency action.

"(g) SUSPENSION AUTHORITY.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—If—

"(A) the Secretary finds—

"(i) that a person has engaged in conduct described in subparagraph (B) of subsection (f)(1) in connection with 2 or more drugs under abbreviated drug applications, or

"(ii) that a person has engaged in flagrant and repeated, material violations of good manufacturing practice or good laboratory practice in connection with the development, manufacturing, or distribution of one or more drugs approved under an abbreviated drug application during a 2-year period, and—

"(I) such violations may undermine the safety and efficacy of such drugs, and

"(II) the causes of such violations have not been corrected within a reasonable period of time following notice of such violations by the Secretary, and

"(B) such person is under an active investigation by a Federal authority in connection with a civil or criminal action involving conduct described in subparagraph (A), the Secretary shall issue an order suspending the distribution of all drugs the development or approval of which was related to such conduct described in subparagraph (A) or suspending the distribution of all drugs approved under abbreviated drug applications of such person if the Secretary finds that such conduct may have affected the development or approval of a significant number of drugs which the Secretary is unable to identify. The Secretary shall exclude a drug from such order if the Secretary determines that such conduct was not likely to have influenced the safety or efficacy of such drug.

"(2) PUBLIC HEALTH WAIVER.—The Secretary shall, on the Secretary's own initiative or in response to a petition, waive the suspension under paragraph (1) (involving an action described in paragraph (1)(A)(i)) with respect to any drug if the Secretary finds that such waiver is necessary to protect the public health because sufficient quantities of the drug would not otherwise be available. The Secretary shall act on any petition seeking action under this paragraph within 180 days of the date the petition is submitted to the Secretary.

"(h) TERMINATION OF SUSPENSION.—The Secretary shall withdraw an order of suspension of the distribution of a drug under subsection (g) if the person with respect to whom the order was issued demonstrates in a petition to the Secretary—

"(1)(A) on the basis of an audit by the Food and Drug Administration or by experts acceptable to the Food and Drug Administration, or on the basis of other information, that the development, approval, manufacturing, and distribution of such drug is in substantial compliance with the applicable requirements of this Act, and

"(B) changes in ownership, management, or operations—

"(i) fully remedy the patterns or practices with respect to which the order was issued, and

"(ii) provide reasonable assurances that such actions will not occur in the future, or

"(2) the initial determination was in error. The Secretary shall act on a submission of a petition under this subsection within 180 days of the date of its submission and the Secretary may consider the petition concurrently with the suspension proceeding. Any information submitted to the Secretary under this subsection does not constitute an amendment or supplement to a pending or approved abbreviated drug application.

"(i) PROCEDURE.—The Secretary may not take any action under subsection (a), (b), (c), (d)(3), (g), or (h) with respect to any person unless the Secretary has issued an order for such action made on the record after opportunity for an agency hearing on disputed issues of material fact. In the course of any investigation or hearing under this subsection, the Secretary may administer oaths and affirmations, examine witnesses, receive evidence, and issue subpoenas requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of evidence that relates to the matter under investigation.

"(j) JUDICIAL REVIEW.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in paragraph (2), any person that is the subject of an adverse decision under subsection (a), (b), (c), (d), (f), (g), or (h) may obtain a review of such decision by the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia or for the circuit in which the person resides, by filing in such court (within 60 days following the date the person is notified of the Secretary's decision) a petition requesting that the decision be modified or set aside.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

THE DREAM WITH ITS BACK AGAINST THE WALL

• Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, recently, I placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an open letter from Senior Judge A. Leon Higginbotham, Jr. to Justice Clarence Thomas.

It was a remarkable document, probably unique in our Nation's history.

As a result of that, I received a copy of remarks by Judge Higginbotham on the unveiling of a portrait of him at the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Philadelphia. His remarks were printed in the Yale Law Report in the spring of 1990.

What he has to say is a reminder of how far we have come, but should also remind us of how far we have yet to go, and why we should extend the hand of friendship and opportunity to others.

We also see some people in positions of prominent academic responsibility who failed and failed dramatically.

At this point, I ask that the Yale Law Report be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The report follows:

THE DREAM WITH ITS BACK AGAINST THE WALL

(By A. Leon Higginbotham, Jr.)

I cannot thank you enough for this honor. I have reason to accept it with great humility and some pride. Because I don't think I am unique, I would like to give you first an autobiographical point of view, tracing my luck and good fortune in getting into Yale Law School. How did I get here, from Trenton, New Jersey? Like everyone else: I have been the beneficiary of the significant efforts of others. We all stand on the shoulders of those who preceded us. Our success has occurred because of very special persons who walked with us when the future was uncertain, when the path was quite steep and blocked by many barriers. I'd like to recognize some of those individuals who, in a very special and intimate way, made possible my coming to Yale and this portrait.

I would like to note my late mother, Emma Lee Higginbotham, whose spirit, wisdom, decency, and indomitability were so important a part of my early life. She is a part of that portrait, not merely in a biological sense, for that is obvious, but more importantly, in an emotional sense. She was a woman who disregarded the probability curve. For if she had paid attention to it, I would have ended up working at the C.V. Hill factory in Trenton, as my father did—a laborer for forty-five years, having been late only once, and that was in the midst of a blizzard. The president of C.V. Hill used to talk about the Higginbotham boys always having jobs at his factory. My grandfather had worked there for more than four decades. My father followed that precedent, and maybe that's where I was supposed to go.

My mother had been raised in rural Virginia and was a victim of its worst racist and economic policies. She attended school for at most a few months each year and did not get past the seventh grade. When she had saved up enough money from the plot of land where she raised tobacco, she made the trip north, in fear, but in hope, in search of a life less harsh than she knew she would have if she stayed in Amherst County.

But even in the North, life was far from easy in the 1930s and '40s. I, and all of my neighbors, attended the racially segregated Ewing Park Grammar School—no, not in some southern state, but in Ewing Township, a few miles from the statehouse in Trenton, and a few miles from Princeton University. All the white children were bussed to marvelous schools, which, unlike our school, had libraries, cafeterias, gymnasiums, language teachers, science teachers. But we went to a four-room schoolhouse, where each teacher taught three grades. We did not have the superior curriculum available for all of the other students in the township: no foreign languages, no science, no hard academic options.

When we finished the eighth grade, all of the Ewing Township kids were transferred to Trenton. The whites went to the white schools, and the Ewing Park students went to Lincoln, a segregated junior high school. And no one from our grammar school in a period of forty years, had even gotten into the academic program. Why not? Because a prerequisite for the ninth grade academic program was one year of Latin. You didn't get Latin at Ewing Park. When I see students who went to Ewing Park with me now working as elevator operators, on street maintenance, or at the General Motors plant, I often wonder what their future would have been if Ewing Park had offered Latin.

But my mother worked for very wealthy people, and she was confident that with or without Latin, I was a talented as the children of her employers. And she knew that education was the sole passport to a better life. I worked, as a thirteen-year-old and fourteen-year-old boy, hustling trays at the Stacey Trent Hotel. When I was fifteen years old I committed a crime: I forged my birth certificate by moving back the year I was born in order to get a job at the Trenton Pottery, pushing a wheelbarrow up into a boxcar full of clay. I was tall; at the hotel, they didn't know I was thirteen or fourteen, and at the factory, they didn't know I was fifteen. I'd come home aching with pain. And my mother, as she rubbed me down with alcohol, would say, "Son, I don't want you to be a busboy all of your life. And I don't want you to be pushing wheelbarrows all of your life like your father. And I don't want you to do what I've done, always washing other people's dishes, cleaning other people's toilets, scrubbing other people's floors. I want you," she would look to the ceiling, sometimes, as she was rubbing my back, "I want you to be in an office, boy, wearing a white shirt and having a tie on."

So it is not surprising that this woman of such extraordinary determination made a personal visit to the ninth grade principal at Lincoln, and got me enrolled in the academic program. She talked to the principal, P.J. Hill (I never knew what his real name was; the students called him Pickle Juice), and I was registered for a second-year Latin course, though I had never had first-year Latin. It wasn't easy, not at all. But I had a very gifted teacher, Bernice Munce, and she's a part of that portrait too. She knew my disadvantage. I got a D, maybe a C-; a matter of grace, more for effort than accomplishment. She said to me, "Look, Leon, if you will ride over to my house in Hamilton Township this summer, I will tutor you."

So I rode my bike about twenty miles, two or three times a week, for about five or six weeks, never gave her even a quarter. She never knew what my future would be, but she cared about all of the kids. And with that, I was able to go on to high school, to compete effectively, and to go to a Big Ten college.

NEGATIVE MOTIVATION

I'd like to pay tribute next to the individual who forced me to recognize that I had to go to law school: Edward Charles Elliott, powerful president of Purdue University, at a time when presidents ran the universities.

There were a couple of problems at Purdue when I entered it as a sixteen-year-old freshman in 1944. There were about 6,000 white students, 12 black students. The 12 black students lived at a house that they had the temerity to call International House. We slept in an attic with no heat. And after December and January, going to bed every night with earmuffs on, sometimes wearing shoes, other times three or four pairs of socks, jackets, I decided that I should go and talk to the university president.

Monday morning at 10:00, I walked into his office by myself. And what was my radical request? Was I going to ask him to integrate the university dormitories? No. I asked if we could have a section in any dormitory, a section for 12 students, which was warm. Now if President Elliott had talked with me sympathetically, explaining his own impotence to change things but his willingness to take up the problem, perhaps to make a study, I might not have felt as I did. If he had communicated to me with some kind word or gesture, or even a sigh, that I had caused him to review his own commitment to things as they were, I might have felt that I had won a small victory, that I could go back and sleep in that attic. But he looked me in the eye, and he said, "Higginbotham, the law doesn't require us to let colored students in the dorm, we will never do it, and you either accept things as they are or leave the university immediately."

I am a lawyer today because of Dr. Elliot's negative motivation. Because, as I walked back from his office, I had a thousand thoughts. How could it be, that the law would not permit 12 good black kids to sleep in a warm dormitory? The law had been very effective in the draft. Some of my best friends had gone and died for our country. That very night, hundreds of black soldiers would run the risk of being injured in some far-off battlefields to make the world safe for democracy. And yet, the legal system that proclaimed equal justice for all would not give any semblance of dignity to a sixteen-year-old boy who had committed no wrong. I felt that I could not go into engineering, that I had to try to challenge the system.

INTEGRATING ANTIOCH

But, unlike my children today, who would have been in a sit-in in the president's office, I took my lumps—and I received quite a few. I made the Purdue debate team; we went up to Northwestern to debate. The debate coach always said, "When you're debating, be firm, speak loud, and even if you don't believe the proposition, act as if you do."

We walked into a hotel in Evanston, Illinois. The manager came up and said to me, "You can't stay here." What did my debate coach do at that moment? In a voice without any indignation or firmness he said, "Is there a colored YMCA?"

And I went to a mice-infested colored YMCA on Emerson Street. I left my classmates, got in there about 1:30 in the morning, and didn't sleep that night: there was no alarm clock. The next morning at 9:00, I was supposed to be sharp and ready.

I had the good fortune to win second place, but I also saw a professor who at a simple moment of truth wouldn't stand up. And I think it was then that I said, I'll take a football coach any time. Because two weeks earlier, my cousin, Mel Grooms, Big Ten player for Indiana University, had walked into that same hotel. No issue was raised, because Coach MacMillan had said, "If black football players can't stay here, no one from Indiana University will ever stay here again."

So I left Purdue, and I went to Antioch. I guess the major reason I feel quite comfortable in a pluralistic community, functioning with whites and blacks and others of different backgrounds, is a person by the name of Jessie Treichler, of Antioch College. She was a gifted short-story writer. She was not a faculty member; she was a special assistant to the college president, and she was white. And she felt that there was something ironic about Antioch College in 1944, which boasted of its liberalism on so many policies and educational issues, and yet had not had one black student in the college for decades. So, on her own, she created a committee to raise a race relations fund to attract black students to the college. I came there the second year the fund existed. Corretta Scott came in with me. I was the first black male to be at the college, and Corretta and I integrated that class. You may know of her as Corretta Scott King, Martin Luther King's wife and in her own right an important person in the civil rights movement. Jessie Treichler had the capacity to extend us her hand, to recognize our loneliness, and most important, to believe in us.

In 1962, when I became a commissioner on the Federal Trade Commission, I sent Jessie a letter and an airplane ticket. I was going to be the first black ever on a regulatory commission. The New York Times thought it was significant news. I wanted Jessie Treichler to be there.

CHOOSING YALE

It was a close issue as to whether I should go to Yale Law School. Burns Weston '29 was on the Antioch College Board of Trustees. Somehow or other, they told him about me. He asked to have lunch with me in my senior year. I wanted to know the difference between Harvard and Yale and Columbia. He said, "No question! Only one place to go: Yale. Don't, don't, don't get this mediocre education which Harvard will throw on you." I listened to him, and he persuaded me that Yale was the best. And I think it was, and I think it still is.

But then I went back home, and I had to talk to my father. I had gotten a partial scholarship to Yale. Jessie Treichler had found a man whom I have never met—though I have tried to see him, to thank him—Charles Noyes, a Wall Street real estate broker, who had put up a few thousand dollars from time to time, to help black students. I was a beneficiary; Eleanor Holmes Norton was also a beneficiary.

I had enough money, with what Rutgers Law School had offered me, that there would be no tuition costs. But if I came to Yale, I would have enough only for the first semester. My father and a minister talked to me. And they couldn't understand why I would choose Yale over Rutgers, when at Rutgers, everything was paid for. The minister had this clincher: "No one in Trenton who's done anything has gone to Yale!" He said, "They either go to Rutgers or to Temple, or to Trenton State Teachers' College. Nobody goes to Yale!" Nevertheless, I felt that if the mistake was going to be made, I was going to make it. I came up here with my cardboard suitcase and bellyful of determination.

When we talk these days about meritocracy, quality, and competence, we still have to think about the background from which one comes. That came home to me in my first three classes in torts, taught by the great Harry Shulman. There was a young lady next to me; her name was Alice Gilbert. The first day, he called on her; she gave an answer using nomenclature I had never heard. I had read the case, and I couldn't understand it. I thought maybe she had read a couple of cases ahead. So, next time, I read not only the case assigned but three or four other cases as well. Because there were so few black students, we weren't really in the Yale network, but I heard there was some book by Prosser. So, I went up to the law library because I couldn't afford to buy it, and started to read it, too.

The next day, Shulman called on Alice Gilbert again. She reeled off another of her spectacular answers. To be honest with you, I hadn't fully unpacked that cardboard suitcase. I was really wondering whether I should stay. The third day, the same thing happened.

Now, my mother always used to say to me, "Son, God moves in mysterious ways." I asked Alice a question, which I'm certain she has forgotten, and I don't know why I asked her. It almost borders on stupidity. I said "Alice, what's your full name? What's your full name?"

She said, "Alice Brandeis Gilbert."

Her grandfather was Justice Brandeis. Her father was a lawyer, and her mother, I believe, had her Ph.D. and also maybe a law degree. My father was a laborer, two books in the house. One we had purchased, a Bible; the other, my mother had gotten out of the trash of one of the people she worked for, an old dictionary. In a race where some start twenty yards from the starting line, they may not get to the finish line at the same time. I did not begin Yale at the same starting line as many of my contemporaries.

I persevered through the first year, and I shall never forget participating in moot court finals that year. Justice Clark, of the U.S. Supreme Court, was there; John W. Davis, considered to be America's finest appellate advocate; and Judge Edwin Lewis. In my second year, I was part of a four-person team that represented Yale in the Inter-Law School Moot Court competition. My colleagues were Louise Farr, Steve Ives, and Richard Gardner—a great devotee of Professor McDougal and a Rhodes Scholar, who later got his Ph.D. in economics at Oxford. We were fortunate enough to win the national first prize for the brief. My third year, I won the John Fletcher Caskey Award. I'm not mentioning these awards to congratulate myself, to pat myself on the back. I'm mentioning them because of what happened afterward.

THE A. LEON HIGGINBOTHAM, JR. FROM YALE

Wesley Sturges said in a letter he wrote to the Yale Alumni representative in Philadelphia, that I had won more honors in oral advocacy than anyone in the law school while he was there. This Philadelphia alumnus responded, "Your problem will be deciding to which law firm you want to go. Come down to visit me."

I went to visit him during Christmas break in 1951. I did all the things my mother told me: my shoes were polished, fingernails very clean, hair combed, suit pressed.

But let me tell you how I got that suit; it was through Wesley Sturges. When we were going down to New York to represent Yale on the Inter-Law School Moot Court Competition, he called me in. He said, "Leon, I'm proud of you. Here's a check. Why don't you buy a suit." You see, like every other black kid in my law school class, I purchased only second-hand suits, from a place on Whitney Ave. These were good-quality clothes, because on a football weekend, when the wealthy students had to entertain the girls from Wellesley and Smith on the limited allowance their fathers had given them, they could always sell some of their suits to raise extra money. The problem is that if you are 6'6", and you're buying the suit of a 6-footer, it shows a bit in the sleeves.

So I wore my new suit, one that fit, and went to see the Yale representative in Philadelphia. I walked into his office in the Girard Trust Building and said, "I'm Leon Higginbotham."

The secretary said, "Well, are you A. Leon Higginbotham, Jr.?"

I said, "Yes."

"I mean A. Leon Higginbotham, Jr. from Yale Law School."

And I said, "Yes."

I walked in, and the Yale representative looked me in the eye and said, "Marvelous record, Dean Sturges has written a great letter in your behalf. Of course you know there's nothing I can do for you, but I can give you the telephone number of two colored lawyers, and maybe they can help you."

I said to him, "Sir, if the only thing that an Eli representative can do is give me two telephone numbers, I can find those myself. Don't burden yourself."

I went down the elevator in the Girard Trust Building, and I cried. I mean it. I cried because I thought of my mother. I thought of all the dishes she had washed, all the floors she had scrubbed, all the pain she had suffered. And after seven years, I couldn't get a job.

THE YALE TRADITION

I got one, ultimately. Tom Emerson called up some people, John Frank called up some people, and I got a clerkship with Justice Bok of the Pennsylvania Supreme Court. I don't know why I was so upset. It was not as if I were unique. Bill Coleman, a black student who finished Harvard Law School magna cum laude and then clerked for Justice Frankfurter, also couldn't get a job in Philadelphia when he first applied after his Supreme Court clerkship.

But there were Yale people who did a lot for me. I want to mention one now, particularly: John Frank. I lived at 258 Star Street, because I couldn't afford to live on campus. There was a corner store where on Saturday, at 6 o'clock, I'd be there: I would get all the leftover hamburger the guy had—sometimes it was brown, sometimes it was gray—and take it home and cook it. John Frank seemed to know I was struggling. He offered me a job a job, paying me $1.50 an hour. But for John Frank, I wouldn't have been able to eat. That is one thing Yale did for me.

John Frank made a difference. And there were a lot of other people on this faculty whom I shall never forget: Myres McDougal, Boris Bittker, Charles Clark, all of whom gave me dignity. I loved them for it.

But some day you have to leave, to go back into the outside world. Do you know what was so great? The Yale tradition never abandoned me. I came to Philadelphia after the clerkship. Where could I go? I couldn't go with the law firms.

A Yale graduate by the name of Richardson Dillworth had become district attorney a year earlier. Until Dillworth became district attorney in Philadelphia, no black lawyer had been permitted to try a case as an assistant district attorney in the regular trial courts. People like Mercer Lesis, who had graduated from Harvard and spent twenty years in that office, was never allowed to get above the magistrate's court. And people who had gone to schools that were certainly no better were in eight months or a year trying major felony cases. Dillworth just said, "Look, I'm going to choose the people in my office on the basis of whether I feel they can do the job."

And he changed that whole system. At that time there was not one black judge in the state common pleas court. Dillworth brought in assistant D.A.'s who handled everything. That was then an amazing phenomenon. He put me in the appellate division.

Finally, there's one other great Yale figure: J. Austin Norris. When the High Court of History decides the great American lawyers, it will choose not merely those who informed the Supreme Court of the right direction to go; it will also choose those who gave backbone to later generations to go forward. Austin Norris used to say—and I don't mean to be disrespectful—"I don't give a damn about the big firms. We'll whip 'em, and we'll be as good as they are, even though we'll have only four or five lawyers." Norris had the capacity to take young men and force them to recognize that if you persevere, you'll make it. I've always said that he was a true and great hero.

Why have I focused, in this speech, on my humble background? Not for accolades for Leon Higginbotham. Today, on the streets of New Haven, and Philadelphia, and Chicago, and New York, there are thousands of other kids who would do the same thing as I did if they didn't get pushed out of the academic system. If we had more Bernice Munces, if we had more Jessie Treichlers, if we had more John Franks.

So, when my portrait hangs, I don't want it to be considered a portrait of a unique individual in the history of the school, or in the history of the society. I truly believe that there are many others, many who could do what I have done.

I want my portrait to stand for someone who had the opportunities, the good fortune, and the support that, ideally, our society should give to all its citizens.

The greatness of Yale is not its age but its mission. And what makes Yale even greater today is its pluralism. Yale's greatest days are not those in its past, when women and blacks were unheard of on the faculty and were barely visible in the student body. Today more than ever our students come from all states, they practice different religions, they represent all races. In this milieu of erudition and diversity the best in all of us is brought out.

I hope we give to young people today what I was given: determination and discipline, a willingness to face the odds and come up again and again in pursuit of justice. I hope they come out with a vision they would otherwise not have known.

I hope they will be competent technicians. But I ask them also to think about what Dr. Martin Luther King said and what a black poet said.

King said, "I have the audacity to believe that people everywhere can have three meals a day for their bodies, education and culture for their minds, and dignity, equality, and freedom for their spirits." And when the High Court of History looks on Yale, it will not ask small questions on forum non conveniens, or even the uniform commercial code. It will ask, "Have we been part of a system to make this world better, so that more people can have three meals a day for their bodies, education and culture for their minds, and dignity, equality, and freedom for their spirits?" That is what Yale must stand for in its finest and most noble hours.

I will close with a poem, which says to me what Yale is or what Yale should be about. It's by Langston Hughes, a great poet, who happened to be black.

There is a dream in the land
With its back against the wall
By muddled names and strange
Sometimes the dream is called.

There are those who claim
This dream for theirs alone—

A sin for which we know
They must atone.

Unless shared in common
Like sunlight and like air,
The dream will die for lack of substance anywhere.

The dream knows no frontier or tongue,
The dream, no class or race.

The dream cannot be kept secure
In any one locked place.

This dream today embattled,
With its back against the wall—

To save the dream for one
It must be saved for all.

TRIBUTE TO PRESTONSBURG COMMUNITY COLLEGE PHI THETA KAPPA

• Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, I rise today to recognize the Alpha Nu Zeta chapter of the Phi Theta Kappa International Honor Society. That chapter is located at Prestonsburg Community College in Prestonsburg, KY, and recently won several honors at the society's annual international convention.

The PCC chapter of Phi Theta Kappa received two highly competitive awards at the national convention in Washington, DC in late March. Those awards are: A Distinguished Chapter President Award and a Giles Distinguished Advisor Award. Ms. Linda Smith, a sophomore from Prestonsburg and PCC's chapter president, received the Distinguished Chapter President Award for her outstanding demonstration of leadership, involvement, friendship and enthusiasm. Prof. Hassan Saffari, PCC's chapter adviser, received the Giles Distinguished Advisor Award for his superior and dedicated involvement in chapter activities and service to Phi Theta Kappa on the local, regional and international level and for his leadership as an advocate of the local chapter.

These international awards, the first ever received by Kentuckians, were well deserved. Only 15 awards were given in each category from a candidate pool representing over a thousand chapters. In addition to promoting scholarship and honors study, the Alpha Nu Zeta chapter of Phi Theta Kappa has been very active in college and community development projects and programs, including promoting more awareness about funding issues and the legislative processes.

In addition to claiming prestigious international honors, the Prestonsburg Community College chapter received several regional honors at the 1992 regional conference in London, KY. They claimed all major regional awards, including the Chapter Service Award and the Distinguished Chapter Award. Ms. Smith received the Outstanding Officer Award and Mr. Saffari received the Horizon Award. The Alpha Nu Zeta chapter was also given the Five Star Chapter Award at the regional convention. Even more recognition came when Prestonsburg Community College President Deborah Floyd was named Kentucky's presidential ambassador to Phi Theta Kappa. That responsibility includes working with other Kentucky community college presidents to promote the scholarship and leadership goals of Phi Theta Kappa.

I commend the students, faculty and administration at Prestonsburg Community College for their commitment to higher education and scholarship. It gives me great pride to talk about the many accomplishments of PCC's Alpha Nu Zeta chapter of Phi Theta Kappa, and I congratulate all persons involved in that organization on their achievements. •

• Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, Steve Neal is the political editor of the Chicago Sun-Times and writes a column for the Chicago Sun-Times.

But perhaps his more lasting contribution will be in the field of history where he has written biographies of people like Wendell Willkie and Charles McNary. He did a superb job of pulling together some of the writing of former Senator Richard Newberger under the title, "They Never Go Back to Pocattello."

Recently, he had a column paying tribute to Senator Paul Douglas on the centennial of his birth.

It summarizes the Douglas legacy well.

I ask to insert the Steve Neal column into the RECORD at this point.

The column follows:

[From the Chicago Sun-Times, Apr. 5, 1992]

DOUGLAS LEFT ENDURING MARK

(By Steve Neal)

He was among the last of the giants.

In the U.S. Senate of the 20th century, Paul H. Douglas of Illinois left an indelible mark on American life. With his white hair and craggy features, he was born for the role.

Douglas, who represented Illinois in the Senate from 1949 through 1967, was a transplanted New Englander. The senator, who was born 100 years ago last week in Salem, Mass., grew up in a log cabin in the Maine woods. "This may help to explain some of the weaknesses and the strengths of my character," he wrote in his memoirs. He shared the values and flinty independence of his regional brethren Robert Frost and Henry David Thoreau.

He moved to his adopted state in 1920 when he became a professor of economics at the University of Chicago. Douglas soon emerged as one of the more outspoken critics of utility mogul Samuel Insull. After the Great Crash, Douglas was frequently consulted by politicians, including New York Gov. Franklin D. Roosevelt, about how to deal with unemployment. When Roosevelt became president, Douglas was among the architects of the Social Security system.

Douglas, a fighting Marine, wouldn't have much use for Vice President Dan Quayle, who used family connections to avoid serving in the Vietnam War, though Quayle was an outspoken hawk. Douglas might have had more sympathy with Democratic presidential candidate Bill Clinton, who opposed the Vietnam War but put his name into the draft because he thought it would look good politically. Douglas was a genuine war hero. In 1942, at the age of 50, he pulled strings to join the Marines, not to help him politically but because he thought it was the right thing to do. He received two Purple Hearts and a bronze star in the Pacific. His arm was shattered and permanently crippled at Okinawa. Douglas, who was a major, didn't want special treatment. He told medics that he was a private. Douglas lived the role that John Wayne played in "The Sands of Iwo Jima."

The late Col. Jacob M. Arvey, then chairman of the Cook County Democratic Central Committee, slated Douglas for the Senate in 1948 to challenge Republican Sen. Wayland Brooks. Arvey also tapped Adlai E. Stevenson II for governor. Douglas and Stevenson proved to be such attractive candidates that they overwhelmed the Republican incumbents and helped Harry Truman narrowly win Illinois and the presidential election.

In looking back on this century's notable senators, Douglas ranks high on the short list, just below Robert M. La Follette Sr. of Wisconsin and George W. Norris of Nebraska, about even with Hubert H. Humphrey of Minnesota and above Robert A. Taft of Ohio, J. William Fulbright of Arkansas, Wayne L. Morse of Oregon, Lyndon B. Johnson of Texas and Jacob K. Javits of New York.

"There is no member of the Senate who has attempted his name on more major issues, major bills and major legislation than Paul Douglas," Humphrey said, describing his colleague as "a giant of a man and a giant of a senator."

Douglas led the fight for the passage of the first civil rights legislation since Reconstruction in 1957, then, later, for the historic 1964 civil rights bill. He was among the first prominent senators to stand up to Sen. Joseph R. McCarthy in the early 1950s for his abuse of civil liberties.

He was an environmentalist long before there was such a word. Through the force of his personality, he saved the Indiana Dunes, sponsoring the legislation that made it a national shoreline.

Douglas wrote the legislation that increased the minimum wage to a dollar an hour and the law that required disclosure of union and management pension funds. "Back in the days when they had almost no chance of enactment," Humphrey recalled, "Paul Douglas was a sponsor or co-sponsor of Medicare, federal aid to elementary education and aid to higher education."

He would probably have been a great president. But like Webster, Calhoun and Clay, Paul H. Douglas showed that some legislators can leave a more enduring mark than mediocre presidents. •

REWARD DEMOCRACY IN TAIWAN

• Mr. MACK. Mr. President, it is ironic that, at a time when the United States is seriously considering strengthening diplomatic ties to North Korea and Vietnam, our relations with Taiwan remain frozen. This sends the wrong signal to emerging democracies all over the world. We can and should reward democratic reform in Taiwan by ending the de facto ban on high-level diplomatic contacts between our two governments.

As a Washington Post editorial on December 30, 1991, observed, Taiwan's democratic reforms are an important example to Communist China and "In this way Taiwan's progress serves China's people as well as its own." I agree, and we should reward Taiwan, not continue to snub them diplomatically.

It is enough that we do not have formal diplomatic relations with Taiwan; we should not send the message that their democratic reforms are being ignored by continuing to refuse to meet at high levels with the Taiwan Government.

I believe that is in our interest, in terms of addressing many important trade and other issues, to raise the level of our contacts with Taiwan and to do so now. Taiwan is one of our largest trading partners. It holds the largest foreign reserves in the world, and it is making significant investments here in this country. This means jobs and economic growth in this country at a time when it is sorely needed. The United States should not be unnecessarily limiting the potential of the warm relations between our two countries. •

TRIBUTE TO CORBIN

• Mr. MCCONNELL. Mr. President, I rise today to recognize Corbin, a town in southeastern Kentucky.

Corbin is spread over the three counties of Whitley, Knox, and Laurel. Downtown Corbin lies in a trough-shaped valley nestled by steep hillsides.

Corbin residents have a lot of pride in their area and community. Framed by the beautiful landscape of the Daniel Boone National Forest, Cumberland Falls has attracted tourists from around the world for decades. Laurel Lake offers recreation and enjoyment almost year round.

Besides the natural beauty, the real strength of Corbin is their citizens. No one better represents these hard-working, forward-looking citizens than Corbin's most famous resident, Col. Harland Sanders. Colonel Sanders, fortified with only his Social Security check, hit the road with his herbs and spices mix. By the time of the colonel's passing, Kentucky Fried Chicken franchises were worldwide.

In the 1960's, this entrepreneurial spirit rose again in Corbin. It was in the 1960's that many feared that Corbin would wither with the completion of Interstate 75. They worried that the local vendors may move away from the downtown business district. Rather than leading to conflict, the community formed an economic development group to explore opportunities to bring new business and industry into the area. These leaders put aside their own interests for those of the town and the results speak for themselves.

Today, Corbin can boast the Baptist Regional Medical Center, American Greeting, and CSX as the pillars of its economy. Corbin also has a large mining industry that employs over 1,000 workers. There can be no doubt, Corbin is a confident and viable community.

The town of Corbin is a special place in Kentucky. The town should be heralded as one of Kentucky's finest towns and genuine Hometown, USA.

Mr. President, I ask that the following Louisville Courier-Journal be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The article follows:

RAILROADERS, REPUBLICANS AND REDHOUNDS
CALL IT HOME

(By C. Ray Hall)

For a railroad town Corbin makes it fairly exasperating to keep track of things. Like, for instance, where you are, exactly. Officially, Corbin sprawls into two counties, Whitley and Knox. Unofficially, it slops over into a third, Laurel. But the part that rests on Laurel, called "North Corbin," exists only in people's heads.

Corbin's most famous citizen ran a motel and restaurant in this neverland called "North Corbin." The ham breakfast that made him famous with Florida-bound tourists was advertised thusly; "$1.70—not worth it, but mighty good." In his kitchen, he fiddled with pressure cookers and invented Kentucky Fried Chicken. Then he invented himself, Col. Harland Sanders, and his face became as recognizable as that of another American invention, Mickey Mouse.

The restaurant, restored in honor of the 100th anniversary of his birth, holds much memorabilia, including a Col. Sanders weather vane. It has an "S" on one side and an "N" on the other, and an I-shaped prong in the middle, propping up the colonel, so he appears to be standing on "SIN." Or perhaps he's stomping out "SIN," like Carrie Nation, the temperance guerrilla who supposedly came through town wielding, her ax on Saloon Street when Corbin was a young pup of a town.

The weather vane is a little like North Corbin: You've got to believe it to see it. The rest of Corbin can be seen and believed, and maybe even clucked over, a little bit, in a wistful way. It gives the appearance of a mature city that has had its days and come to terms with being bypassed. There is an enormous bustle out by Interstate 75, with cars whistling past sporting license plates from Canada and Florida. In town, they just sort of hum through, sporting license plates from Clay County to Pulaski County.

Thomas Thurston, the courtly 77-year old mayor, recalls the apprehension that gripped many people in the 1960s, when I-75 slithered past Corbin like a concrete snake.

"Everybody thought that Corbin would dry up, that it would be deserted, and thought that we'd never have over a dozen cars a day coming up Main Street," he says.

But the town didn't go away. If you drive down Center Street past the CSX overpass and take the hairpin left turn onto Main Street, you're keeping company with far more than a dozen cars. Twenty thousand cars a day pass under the CSX bridge, sort of in genuflection to the railroad, which breathed life into the town a century ago.

John Daniel, who had a clothing store in downtown Corbin 40 years before retiring says: "I think one thing that kept downtown alive is that most of the people were born and raised in Corbin and they just weren't going to let it die. The people down in this end of the state, southeast Kentucky, they've got a lot of pride."

Corbin won the state basketball championship in 1936, with a 6-foot-6 "giant" named Marion Cluggish, who transferred up from the county seat, Willamburg. ("Recruiting?" asks the mayor, with a mischievous smile.)

Even so, Corbin is most noted for football. This is perhaps astonishing, considering the school's ominous introduction to the sport in 1923. Corbin lost its first game to Pinesville 159-0 (or 142-0; accounts vary). Worse yet, a Corbin player named Willie Cadle was killed in the game. Football gave the town more lore: In the Thanksgiving Day game at Pinesville in 1930, the field was covered with snow; the yard lines were marked off with coal dust. The "Redhounds" won state Class AA championships in 1976, 1980 and 1982.

Corbin High principal Ray Tipton is actually proud of the 16th ranking the school system received in achievement tests a couple of years back. Banners in the school cafeteria salute the scholars, not the football players. The home of the Redhounds is also a congenial place for water fleas and fathead minnows—two species the Environmental Protection Agency uses to measure the purity of water. If the water is good enough for fathead minnows, it's good enough for people.

But you don't have to be a fathead minnow to enjoy Corbin's water. The most interesting store in town, surely, is the one where people stand knee-deep in Victorian elegance and whimsy and answer the phone, "Poynter's Plumbing."

The new building, a red-brick affair with swooping ceilings, is as elegant as any of those new restaurants up Lexington way, and it's a lot more fun. It's also one of the few places where you can buy a red English telephone booth (for $1,500); or an aviary stocked with finches; or statues of flying pigs or rabbits in tuxedos. You can also get a shower big enough to entertain two or three of your closest friends, and a bathtub built for two. Poynter's is an adult's garden of Earthly delights; if Victorians had had a Sharper image, this would be it. You might ask what is such a place is doing in a town of 7,419. Owner Jerry Poynter notes that 90 percent of the customers are from out of town.

Poynter and his wife, Billie, put up their plumbing-and-sugarplums place last year. "We tore down what was probably the ugliest building in Corbin," he says. (It must be said that several contenders for the title remain.)

Corbin's boisterous neighbor up north, London, is perhaps the gauge by which it measures its contentedness, or its lethargy. London keeps growing, and making noises about community colleges and leviathan shopping malls and other amenities. Some Corbinites grumble that the newspaper, the Times-Tribune ("Kentucky's Best Small Daily Newspaper"), seems to be tilting toward London. This rivalry is nothing new.

John Daniel, born in London but settled in Corbin, says: "They've had a little faster growth. . . . Laurel County is a pretty wealthy county. . . . They seem to be able to get after the politicians and maybe twist their arms a little harder than we have in Corbin on several projects."

One thing Corbin has learned—as any mature city does—is the limits of power. It hasn't been able to annex "North Corbin," with its eminently taxable stretch of motels, chain restaurants, and the American Greeting card factory. Whitley County has suffered from a paucity of friends in high places, says utilities manager George Paul Rains.

There may be subterranean forces at work, too, impossible to measure, but as black-and-white as the snow-covered football field marked by coal stripes.

"One of the most astounding things to other people I come in contact with," Rains says, "is that inside the city limits, there are no black families. . . . A community 10 miles north of here, London . . . 20 miles south of here where I came from, 15 miles east over in Barbourville, all of these communities have 10, 15 percent or so black families. . . . Inside the city limits of Corbin, there are no black families that have chosen to come to this area. That has been true during the whole 25 years I've lived here."

Fast-food restaurateur Jesse Backer, a newcomer who covets growth for Corbin, suggests: "We may have to bend over backwards to project a positive image to the rest of the nation. We may have to do what Dubuque, Iowa, did, and recruit (black families) to get rid of the 'racist' label."

Every so often, something happens to bring the issue to the surface. Recently, there was a highly publicized Ku Klux Klan non-parade. Before that, there was "Trouble Behind," a documentary film by Danville native Robby Henson that looked at a 1919 incident in which a predominantly black railroad construction crew was chased out of town in what has generally been characterized as a "race riot."

"It was not a race riot," insists longtime Corbin resident Allen Dizney, folk historian.
He notes that the evicted workers included several whites, and he questions reports that 200 shots were fired. People in those days shot too straight to fire 200 times without hitting anybody, he says. He also notes that the L&N sent another integrated crew to Corbin, and it finished the job without incident.

Whatever gives rise to Dizney's defense of Corbin, it is apparently not a desire to paint the place in the pastel hues of peace and goodwill. He is a gadfly in the ointment that otherwise soothes Corbin's self-image, a writer of letters to the editor and a campaigner for many causes, including billboards on the interstates (restrictions on them have helped keep the Cumberland Falls area from becoming another Gatlinburg, he says ruefully).

"It's a sight what Kentucky is missing simply because we've got people that belong to the garden clubs that don't want signs out on the highway," he says. "They want people to look at scenery. Well, they don't spend dollars when they look at them trees. If they want to see trees, let 'em go into a state park."

Some corners of Corbin—especially Depot Street (since renamed Lynn Avenue in a bid to exercise some grimy history)—could be rough when he was a paperboy in the 1930's.
"Those were wild times," he says. "I had three customers killed down there."

Dizney recalls the time when he had collected at a joint called the Flamingo. This exchange ensued with the owner.

Owner: "How's collections?"

Paperboy: "Not too good."

Owner: "Who owes you down here?"

Recalling that conversation of more than 50 years ago, Dizney says: "I told him. He called one of the whores and said, 'Go back there and get him some of that fresh pie and a glass of milk and set with him. I'll be back in a minute."

"They had good cooks. And the girls that were prostitutes during the Depression weren't bad girls. They were making money—probably 50 cents a time—to take money home to feed their families. . . .

"He went up the street and done my collecting, came back in a few minutes and spread the money out on the bar. He said,
'The next time anybody owes you on this street and don't pay you on Saturday morning, you let me know.'"

So there you have it: Prostitutes serving milk and apple pie to schoolboys, and bar owners shaking down people who refuse to pay the paperboy.

How bad can any place be that defends the First Amendment so fiercely?*

THE FDA DRUG APPROVAL PROCESS

* Mr. MACK. Mr. President, the tragic and shocking news that tennis great

Arthur Ashe has contracted AIDS has renewed concerns over the extensive, burdensome Government regulation involved in approving life-saving pharmaceutical drugs. Many advances have been made in recent years by America's pharmaceutical industry. However, the new drug approval process destroys the hopes of millions of Americans with life-threatening diseases who must have the right to use prescription drugs that could save their lives without Government overregulation.

The American people are tired of placing their lives, and the lives of loved ones, on hold while the Federal Government decides for someone else whether a pharmaceutical should be used. A recent poll conducted by the Gallup organization found that 70 percent of those surveyed believe the Federal Government should move more quickly in approving new drugs.

The American people are tired of being held down by Government regulation. They are tired of Government intervention in their lives. That includes the overregulated process of drug approval.

For terminally ill Americans—those with AIDS, Alzheimer's disease, or cancer—the drug approval process is cruel, and it should be an outrage to us all.
New prescription drugs have been developed to help treat patients with life-threatening diseases, but many will never make it to the shelf of their neighborhood pharmacy. This is due, in large part, to the Food and Drug Administration placing layers upon layers of bureaucracy on the process by which it approves lifesaving new drugs.

The hopes of terminally ill Americans are often tied to a remote chance that a new drug may be available to restore their health in some small way.
But even if that drug exists, the Federal Government is denying this right to Americans because of bureaucratic red-tape. It is morally wrong to answer the prayers of the terminally ill with a resounding no.

Mercifully, Mr. President, this is finally beginning to change. Vice President QUAYLE, the Council on Competitiveness, HHS Secretary Sullivan and FDA Commissioner Kessler have worked tirelessly on streamlining the process by which new drugs receive FDA approval. I commend them for the initiatives taken yesterday, which will cut the approval time for drugs to treat life-threatening illnesses by approximately half. They have also taken a bold step by permitting AIDS patients to have access to experimental therapies, even if the patient is unable to participate in an FDA clinical trial.
These actions could mean the difference between life and death for thousands of Americans.

I would like to see this same initiative taken on behalf of other terminally ill patients. I recently introduced legislation to express that it is the sense of the Senate that the FDA should revise the approval process to incorporate a means by which all terminally ill patients, following consultation with and approval from their physicians, may have access to experimental drugs awaiting FDA approval. I urge my colleagues to join me in this effort. It is also my strong hope that the Competitiveness Council will work to quickly implement the initiatives called for in my legislation.

Let's listen to the American people and find a system that works to restore the hopes of terminally ill Americans and get the Government to end this cold-hearted process that keeps potentially life-saving drugs away from those who have nothing to lose and maybe everything to gain.●

ANTI-SEMITISM

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, recently,
I spoke about the precarious situation in the Nagorno-Karabakh region, which lies in the Transcaucasian area of the former Soviet Union. The present unrest in that region has exacerbated long-held tensions between Azerbaijan and Armenia and has pushed those two nations to the very brink of an all-out war. The repercussions for ethnic minorities in each country who may literally be caught in the middle are potentially terrible.

In keeping with the focus of my past and future statements, I will explore the possible effects of the Nagorno-Karabakh conflict, as well as anti-Semitism, as they affect the Jewish population of Azerbaijan.

As has been widely reported, the battle over Nagorno-Karabakh is an ethnic conflict involving Armenian guerrillas and their corresponding Azeri forces over a small mass of land with an Armenian majority within Azerbaijan's borders. It, however, may not be as well known that in this interethnic conflict, other minority groups such as Jews are being caught and killed in the crossfire. Already there have been documented cases of Jews beaten severely and told that the Azeris will deal with their kind once the Armenians are taken care of.

Rather than being a tangential event, unrelated to the fighting over Nagorno-Karabakh, these violent expressions of anti-Jewish sentiment are an outgrowth of the present situation.
The nationalistic fervor with which each side has pursued their interests in Nagorno-Karabakh invokes intense feelings of hatred further driving the cycle of violence. In many instances, though, this deep-seated hatred is displaced from its intended victims and can be found directed at third parties.
This prospect terrifies the Jews of Azerbaijan.

In its assessment of the situation, the National Conference of Soviet Jewry [NCSJ] stated in a report earlier this year, "All reports suggest that the bulk of the anti-Semitism that has been observed thus far emanates from individuals and groups pushing nationalistic and chauvinistic themes."

A disturbing factor to the Jews in Azerbaijan is the rise of Islamic fundamentalism among the majority Moslem Azeri population. The NCSJ report expresses their fear that Moslem fundamentalist movements will give rise to rampant anti-Semitism in the Central Asian region. Widespread rumors of Azeri involvement in a confederation of Moslem states sent tremors through Baku's Jewish population. Although Azerbaijani ties to elements in Iran, Iraq, and other extremist organizations have not yet produced large-scale anti-Semitism, those same links stand as a reminder to the Jewish population of the frailty of their existence and of the extent to which their minority rights are controlled by their enraged countrymen.

Facing an uncertain future with problems at every turn, these intense nationalistic and fundamentalist undercurrents threaten to drown the freedoms of minority groups throughout the Transcaucasus region, especially in Azerbaijan. Nationalism and fundamentalism in and of themselves are not evil, but we must be careful, lest they be subverted for vile intentions.

Perhaps most ominous, though, is the possibility of state-sponsored anti-Semitism in Azerbaijan. Numerous accusations have centered on the Azerbaijani OVIR office in Baku, which controls emigration of Jews from the country. The escalation of fighting in Nagorno-Karabakh has led to increasing numbers of Jews trying to flee Azerbaijan for the safety of Israel or the United States. The OVIR office in Baku, however, has apparently placed barriers along the path of emigration. According to Miron Gordon, an Israeli diplomat charged with overseeing the issuance of visas at the Israeli consulate;

We can do our part within several weeks. But the Baku OVIR (emigration processing office) has been intermittently closed, and the Moscow office does not seem willing to process Jews from Azerbaijan.

Some claim that these new barriers are the beginning of doors closing on free emigration for Jews in Azerbaijan due to anti-Semitic sentiment in the Government. Others offering a defense of the new Government claim the delays are merely a function of inadequate manpower in the OVIR office and a paper shortage for passports.

If the U.S. Department's public and diplomatic warnings last September are accurate indications, however, there is some foundation for believing anti-Semitism may have played a role in slowing down Jewish emigration from Azerbaijan. The State Department warned the former Soviet Republics not to violate the emigration law passed by the Supreme Soviet in May of 1991; the warnings signaled our Government's response to reports that Azerbaijan and Uzbekistan had reinstated restrictive emigration laws, particularly with respect to Jews. Furthermore, the State Department included a statement in its 1991 Country Reports on Human Rights Practices that read:

Corruption in the passport and visa-issuing offices—exacerbated by a shortage of new passports—remained a major impediment to unrestricted emigration and travel abroad, especially in Azerbaijan, where it is reportedly widespread.

Whatever the case, there are two points on which there is no argument. First, no one can doubt that these delays threaten to keep Jews hostage in an acute situation that may explode at any time. Second, as documented in recent studies, the delays experienced by Azeri Jews in Baku are substantially longer than their counterparts in other cities around the former Soviet Union.

There are a few hopeful signs. In 1987, Baku became home to the first officially sanctioned Hebrew language course, outside of the universities. More recently, the Jewish organization, Alef, has begun operating a Sunday school, a newspaper, a theater and a counseling center all for Jews and all in Baku.

Nevertheless, recent events have dampened the enthusiasm these positive steps had evoked. The resignation of Azerbaijani President Ayaz Mutalibov early last month has led to fears that Azerbaijan may fall into the hands of more militant, hard-line leaders. The situation calls for our immediate attention.

As I have stated on previous occasions, self-determinism and independence are worthy goals in and of themselves, but when the freedom and rights of minority groups are disregarded for the benefit of the majority, democracy cannot ever prevail. And, if there is one thing everyone in this body must agree on, it is that now is the time when we must do all that is within our power to see that democracy prevails in the states of the former Soviet Union. For us, for them, and for future generations, we must protect the rights of minorities and ensure that the end of the cold war marks the beginning of true democracy in these newly independent states.●

THE DOMENICI-SPECTER ECONOMIC GROWTH PACKAGE

● Mr. MACK. Mr. President, last night my colleagues, Senators DOMENICI and SPECTER, brought to the floor an economic growth package which takes a large step in the direction toward the road to economic recovery. Their perseverance and dedication to this task of trying to bring forward a growth package to accommodate Senator's on both sides of the aisle is certainly commendable. I wholeheartedly applaud their efforts to respond to the continuing economic problems our country faces, and particularly those in my State of Florida. It is important to continue to try and find a set of initiatives to boost the economy up which Congress can agree.

My only caveat to their proposal is my own disapproval of Congress' artificial requirement that tax cuts be paid for by revenue increases. I believe we should provide growth incentives without raising taxes, fees or initiating other revenue raisers simply to conform to the abstract standard of revenue neutrality.

Nevertheless, I am pleased that my colleagues have put forth this package. And, I look forward to working with them on the economic growth elements.●

TRIBUTE TO BELLARMINE COLLEGE

● Mr. MCCONNELL. Mr. President, I rise today to honor an outstanding Kentucky college, recently named one of the top 20 private colleges and one of the top 10 midsize schools in the United States by Money magazine. Bellarmine College in Louisville, where I have the privilege of teaching a course each weekend, truly deserves this national recognition.

Bellarmino College has about 2,400 students. About half of them are full time, but only about 325 live on campus. The school's campus consists of 15 buildings located in the midst of several small hills where a plantation once stood. Bellarmine's small size enables it to boast of a 15 to 1 student-teacher ratio. However, that is not the only thing for which the liberal arts school should be commended.

Bellarmino College's growing national reputation is based largely upon extraordinary statistics. Ninety percent of Bellarmine's premed students get into the medical school of their choice. Seventy-four percent graduate within 5 years. Almost all Bellarmine students—99 percent—were ranked in the top half of their high school classes. In addition, 82 percent have above average ACT or SAT college entrance exam scores. And, 94 percent of Bellarmine's athletes graduate within 4 years. These factors, as well as the fact that Bellarmine is a relatively inexpensive private college—approximately $10,000 a year—led Money magazine to also name Bellarmine one of the 50 best educational values for the past 2 years.

Bellarmino College was founded in 1950. Only three presidents later, the school has built a strong base of tradition and purpose. Its first president, Msgr. Alfred Horrigan, served until 1973. His successor, Eugene Petrik, spent 17 years at Bellarmine's helm. During his tenure, Bellarmine strengthened its ties to the business community and broadened and solidified its financial base. Currently, President Jay McGowan, installed in October 1990, continues to promote Bellarmine's strengths.

Mr. McGowan says Bellarmine College is a school with a definite mission to teach students the value of a traditional liberal arts education. According to Mr. McGowan, "We want our students to be able not only to make a living, but to make a life worth living." He concedes that the national attention of Money magazine could spark a significant enrollment increase, but overall, he says Bellarmine should remain small to retain its sense of purpose.

Mr. President, I commend the students, faculty and administration at Bellarmine, as well as the Louisville community, for maintaining such a fine institution of higher learning. Please enter the following article from the Lexington Herald-Leader into the RECORD.

RANKING HELPS BELLARMINE SPREAD WORD

(By Glenn Rutherford)

LOUISVILLE.—For the last two years, Money magazine has rated Louisville's Bellarmine College one of the 50 best educational values in the country.

This year, the magazine also ranked Bellarmine among the top 20 private colleges and among the top 10 midsize schools—those with student populations between 1,600 and 4,000.

The 15 buildings that make up the Bellarmine campus sit atop a row of hills on land—once a plantation—that rolls gently westward to Beargrass Creek.

It's a beautiful campus, as motorists on Newburg Road can see. But many who pass by never realize what a jewel of a college sits on the hills.

Even the people at Bellarmine sometimes take the school's national reputation for academic excellence—and value for the dollar—for granted.

Bellarmine's president, Joseph "Jay" McGowan Jr.—only the third president in the school's 42-year history—says that when he came aboard a year and a half ago, he found that "even the people of Bellarmine didn't know how good the school was."

"Maybe it's the 'grass is always greener' syndrome," McGowan said recently. "But they didn't really know. To a large degree, part of what I've done is simply tell Bellarmine about itself."

The school's growing national reputation is based, in part, on some glowing numbers: 90 percent of its pre-med students get into the medical school of their choice.

74 percent of its students graduate within five years.

99 percent of the students rank in the top half of their high school classes.

82 percent have what Money magazine called "well-above average" ACT or SAT college entrance exam scores.

94 percent of Bellarmine's athletes graduate within four years.

All the attention in the last two years from Money magazine has helped spread the word about Bellarmine. So has a 1991 grant of $237,000 for teaching enhancement from the Knight Foundation.

McGowan recognizes that in this part of the country, a college that costs $10,000 a year is not inexpensive, regardless of what Money magazine says.

What students get for their money, however, is a student-teacher ratio of 15 to 1. The college also provides an education that will "help you think on your feet," said Bellarmine graduate Steve Magre, an accountant and member of the Louisville Board of Aldermen. "We were taught to be independent thinkers. I owe that to Bellarmine. I was taught to appreciate the real value of a liberal arts education."

Dr. Linda Gleis, president of the Jefferson County Medical Society—Bellarmine Class of '74—said the college provided her "with standards to live by, regardless of which profession you pursued."

"One of the most significant aspects of Bellarmine," she said, is that the professors there are first and foremost teachers. Because of that fundamental commitment to the liberal arts, a Bellarmine student develops a broader perspective—you learn that your role in life is not just your job, but your place in the community."

A LIFE WORTH LIVING

What they are about, he said, is providing education a firm, traditional liberal arts foundation.

"If we train an accountant, we want him to be an accountant with a soul," McGowan said. "We want our students to be able not only to make a living, but to make a life worth living."

In doing so, McGowan said, the relatively young school "stands poised to become the premier private, liberal arts college in the region."

Like the college he heads, McGowan is young—47, with a face, voice and demeanor that seem even younger than that. He came to Bellarmine from Fordham University in New York, where he was dean of students and where his son, Joe, plays for the Rams basketball team.

The chance to take the helm at Bellarmine "is an opportunity you'd wait a lifetime for," he said.

AN EDUCATIONAL VALUE

The school is small, with a student population of 2,400. About half of them are full-time students, and of those, only 325 live on campus.

By the region's standards, Bellarmine is a bit pricey, although its admissions office says its cost is still 33 percent below the average cost of private colleges nationwide.

"All those things are a nice affirmation of just what we are about here at Bellarmine."
