But the history of what occurred of that great martyrdom was written at the time and cannot be revised. It should be a matter of deep concern to all of us that in recent years an effort has developed to revise or rewrite the history of this period and to blur our understanding of the full tragedy of the massacres. However, the documentary record of the Armenian tragedy exists and there are numerous exhibits in contemporaneous newspaper accounts, the New York Times, other major newspapers as well, the British press, the French press, and so forth, of what was occurring in Anatolia. Let me relate just a sampling of the headlines from mid 1915: "More Armenian Massacres. Tales of Armenian Horrors Confirmed. 300,000 Armenians Counted Destroyed. Spare Armenians, Pope Asks Sultan. Massacres Renew, Morgenthau Reports."

These headlines alone speak volumes. Our Ambassador to the Ottoman Empire at the time was Henry Morgenthau, later a very distinguished Secretary of the Treasury under President Franklin Roosevelt. Morgenthau has written at length about the genocide visited on the Armenians. In his book he discussed the tragic events which we are talking about here today, and I quote him:

I am confident that the whole history of the human race contains no such horrible episode as this. The great massacres and persecutions of the past seem almost insignificant when compared to the sufferings of the Armenian race in 1915. The killing of the Armenian people was accompanied by a systematic destruction of churches, schools, libraries, treasures of art and of history in an attempt to eliminate all traces of a noble civilization.

What Ambassador Morgenthau wrote in the years following the great tragedy was consonant with his reporting at the time the events took place, for on July 16 of the first year of the massacres in 1915 he sent the following message by telegraph to the Secretary of State:

Deportation of and excesses against peaceful Armenians is increasing and from harrowing reports of eyewitnesses it appears that a campaign of race extermination is in progress under pretext of reprisal against rebellion.

Reports to Ambassador Morgenthau by consul generals in the field, consular dispatches substantiated the Ambassador's report of what was taking place with respect to the massacre of the Armenians.

Perhaps Elie Wiesel expressed most eloquently for us the critical importance of recognizing Armenian genocide when in April 1991 he spoke at a holocaust memorial service, The Days of Remembrance, here in the Capitol Building.

At that solemn ceremony of remembrance, a remembrance of past horror, he said, and I quote him:

Before the planning of the final solution, Hitler asked, "Who remembers the Armenians?" He was right. No one remembered them, as no one remembered the Jews. Rejected by everyone, they felt expelled from history.

Mr. President, it is incumbent upon us in order to ensure that such a tragedy never be repeated to remember each year the victims of the Armenian genocide and to pay tribute to the survivors.

As American citizens of a Nation founded on the ideals of freedom and human dignity, we must educate ourselves about the events that constituted the Armenian genocide and renew our commitment never to remain indifferent in the face of such assaults on humanity. We do not live in the past, but we cannot live without it. In the words of the great philosopher George Santayana, those who cannot remember the past are condemned to repeat it.

THE ARMENIAN GENOCIDE

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, April 24, 1992, marked 77 years since the Armenian nation came to the brink of extinction. It has been described as a genocide: It was a genocide.

Accounts differ, but it is clear that approximately 1.5 million Armenian men, women, and children were killed by forces of the Ottoman empire. Hundreds of thousands of other Armenians were forced to flee their ancestral homeland.

It was truly one of the darkest moments of the 20th century, as a matter of fact, it was one of the darkest moments in history.

Mr. President, the exact circumstances of the Armenian genocide have been debated long and hard in the halls of academe and in the Halls of Congress.

The 75th anniversary of the Armenian genocide was marked 2 years ago, in April of 1990. At that time, a resolution of commemoration was introduced in the Senate and referred to the Judiciary Committee, of which I am a senior member.

During the committee's discussion of the resolution, strong forces and strong emotions were brought to bear on both sides.

Armenian-Americans were adamant that their people's tragedy be recognized.

The Government of Turkey was equally adamant in its view that recognition of the Armenian tragedy as a genocide would be offensive to the Turkish people.

The committee itself was nearly deadlocked on how to resolve the issue.

Mr. President, I attempted to find a middle ground. I hoped that compromise language would give Armenians the recognition that they deserved without offending Turkey, an important ally and friend of the United States. Turkey is that great Nation that opened its doors in 1492 to the Jews of Spain when they were expelled from that country.

My record on this issue prior to 1990 had always been one of strong support for the Armenian position. My view had always been that the killings, the deliberate eradication of entire Armenian communities, should be unquestioned.

That view did not change, and indeed, the longer the issue was debated the more information came to light about Armenian suffering between 1915 and 1923.

But I believed then that at least an attempt at compromise was the proper thing to do.

Mr. President, the fact is that there is no room for compromise on this issue. And, in truth, there really is no reason to compromise. The systematic destruction of a culturally, religiously, or ethnically distinct people is a genocide, and there should be no quibbling about it.

I take the floor this year to mark 77 years since a genocide was attempted—against the Armenian people.

I note with thanks that the attempt, while brutally effective, was not totally successful. Refugees of this tragedy found new homes elsewhere and have flourished. Armenian-Americans in particular should be proud of their achievements and of their contributions to this country.

Mr. President, there is no joy in marking the anniversary of a genocide. Senators do not take pleasure in speaking about death; it is not fun to recall suffering on a massive scale.

But the act of remembrance is our duty nonetheless.

It honors those who died;

It honors their descendants here in the United States; and

It honors those who still live in ancient Armenian lands.

However, we remember this and other tragedies not merely to honor those who suffered and their kin. We remember because we have a sad tendency of reinventing and repeating our inhumanity to each other.

Mr. President, as we remember the Armenian genocide of 1915-23, we should also remember that similar ethnic strife engulfs so many parts of the world today in 1992.

We should remember that systematic brutality is still being used in the name of religion, and in the name of ethnic purity.

We should remember the refugees who flee from this violence and persecution. And we should remember that what was done to the Armenians 77 years ago can be done again today, in any place, and to any people.

We must be very vigilant. We must be very ready to speak out and to act if necessary.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida.

Mr. MACK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to address the Senate as if in morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order the Senator has the authority to speak for up to 15 minutes.

Mr. MACK. Thank you Mr. President.

REVITALIZATION AND JOB GROWTH ACT OF 1992

Mr. MACK. Mr. President, one of our biggest concerns today is the state of the economy. People all over America are hurting—jobs are scarce, credit is tight, asset values continue to tumble, and confidence about the future is at an all-time low.

There continue to be signs that the economy is beginning to rebound, and we all hope these signs are accurate. But there are clearly changes that need to be made that will improve U.S. economic performance. Good policy should stand on its own and not be tied to a stage of the business cycle. It is my intention to introduce a package in the coming week which I hope can gain widespread support because it represents good policy, not just a quick fix. This legislation will focus on the job-producing machine of our economy, our Nation's small businesses.

Generations of Americans before us have had the opportunity to succeed or fail by starting new businesses. That opportunity has been fundamental to the greatness of America.

We must pursue policies that provide Americans with the freedom to succeed, even if that means risking failure. The freedom to succeed is the American dream, and I want Americans to continue to have that freedom. That's what America is supposed to be about. That's what small business is supposed to be about.

The small business community can indeed be called the backbone of our economy. Small businesses employ approximately 49 percent of the work force. Between 1988 and 1990 firms with fewer than 20 employees created more than 4 million new jobs. Today, small businesses continue to generate most of the new jobs, accounting for an estimated 90 percent of net private job growth.

My legislation will address a variety of areas which adversely affect small business. Since it is a comprehensive package, I have included some good ideas that others have proposed to help small businesses.

One of the real problems small businesses have is knowing whether Congress considers them a small business. We have a wide range of definitions of the term "small business" depending upon which law we're applying. My bill would provide a clear statement from Congress that it intends to address this problem and end the confusion.

Another severe problem for small businesses today is the regulatory burden imposed by the Federal Government. Today's regulatory squeeze is not only choking existing businesses, but is deterring the formation of new small businesses. My bill will help ease this burden by creating a small business ombudsman in each Federal agency which regulates small businesses. In addition, my legislation follows recent recommendations by the SEC to eliminate some of the regulatory burdens imposed by the Federal securities laws on capital formation.

The legislation will take a major step toward expanding the amount of credit available to small businesses. The SBA has recently reported that SBA loan guarantee demand is up by nearly one-third, and both the administration and the House Committee on Small Business have recommended a sizable increase in the cap. My bill expands the Small Business Administration's 7(a) loan guarantee program by raising the authorization caps significantly through 1994.

I'm convinced that one of the best things we can do for small businesses is cut the capital gains tax. The chairman of the Small Business Committee has made a very worthwhile attempt to provide capital to new enterprises by excluding from tax half of the profits earned by those who provide initial capital for new companies, where the investor leaves the capital in the company for 5 years or longer. I have incorporated his bill in my package.

The last aspect of my comprehensive legislation is its proposals related to health insurance. In a survey conducted by the National Federation of Independent Businesses, this issue was the No. 1 concern of small business.

My legislation puts forward several initiatives in the area of health insurance. Most significantly, it would permit the self-employed to enjoy the same tax treatment given corporations by increasing the tax deduction for health insurance premiums from 25 to 100 percent. It would also provide for reform of the health insurance market for small businesses in the manner recommended by the Republican Health Care Task Force.

Since the week of May 10-16 is designated Small Business Week, it seems highly appropriate to begin this effort now to improve the economic climate for small businesses. I hope my colleagues will join me in support of this legislation.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Under the previous order the Senator from Michigan is recognized to speak for up to 5 minutes.

COMMEMORATING THE ARMENIAN GENOCIDE

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, this week marks the 77th anniversary of the 1915-23 genocide of the Armenian people. Seventy-seven years ago there began a systematic and purposeful slaughter in an attempt to eliminate the Armenian people in the lands controlled by the Ottoman Empire. The body of historical evidence is overwhelming and irrefutable, and denial will not alter the reality of history.

Genocide is a crime against all humanity, not just its intended victims. The Armenians suffered the unspeakable and unimaginable horror of genocide, and 1½ million perished. It is our obligation to work to see that such a horror never happens again, and it is our mandate to never forget that it did.

The world faces new realities and opportunities in the emerging post-cold war era. We confront a rare moment in history when we have it within our power to create a new system of international security. Nations have tried before and fallen short, but we have the opportunity if we act wisely and forcefully to succeed where those before us have failed. The United States should exercise leadership in developing a new international approach to controlling wars, and the atrocities occurring in Nagorno-Karabakh are an example of the need for such a new approach. The United States should be working with our allies in the United Nations and other international bodies to create a structure to prevent such conflicts, and if prevention fails, to move quickly and decisively to manage, limit, and then end such conflicts.

On this the 77th anniversary of the commemoration of the Armenian genocide, the United States should lead the world to find a way to eliminate such evil from ever recurring. We must never forget what happened, and we must work to prevent its recurrence. After the Armenians, Jews perished at the hands of the Nazis of the Holocaust. After the Jews, the Cambodians, Eritreans, and Kurds followed.

On this commemoration of the first genocide of the 20th century, the genocide of the Armenian people in 1915-23, let us dedicate ourselves to using the power and moral authority of the United States to lead a successful effort to structure international mechanisms to prevent such atrocities.

Today we remember the victims of the Armenian genocide. Let us pay tribute to them and their memories by finding a way to guarantee that it never happens again.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE ARMENIAN GENOCIDE

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I join my colleagues today in sad remembrance of the Armenian genocide of 1915 to 1923. Seventy-seven years ago the atrocities against the Armenian people began, ultimately leaving 1½ million dead at the hand of the Ottoman Empire. Compounding the anguish of those years has been the refusal of many individuals and governments to acknowledge the fact that the genocide occurred. As with other examples in history, people have denied what was too huge to comprehend or too painful to accept. I hope that the yeoman's work of many in this body to fight against that ignorance will serve to prevent other such disavowals.

Mr. President, we cannot recognize the sorrowful anniversary this year without mention of a very different event that occurred since we last commemorated the genocide. Since that time, of course, the former Soviet Republic of Armenia has become the free, independent nation of Armenia. Although this important step has been marked by an escalation in fighting between Armenia and Azerbaijan, I must say that I hope the establishment of an Armenian nation will soon bring peace and security to the Armenian people, which they well deserve.

REMEMBERING ARMENIAN GENOCIDE

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, today we mark the 77th anniversary of the Armenian genocide. I would like to use the time allotted to me to reflect on several things related to that tragedy and to the changes that have occurred since our comparable commemoration last year.

First, it becomes increasingly evident with each passing year that the work of the Armenian National Committee and others who have strived to ensure remembrance of the genocide has paid off. Research, testimonies, and official statements all bear witness to the historical truth and appalling inhumanity of the genocide. Throughout the latter part of the 19th century and the early part of this century, it was the policy of the Ottoman Empire to persecute brutally its Armenian minority. No serious historian can deny this.

In 1909, 21,000 Armenians were murdered in Cilicia.

And between 1914 and 1923, an estimated 1½ million Armenians were killed and another 500,000 forced into exile.

In the words of Henry Morgenthau, America's Ambassador to the Ottoman Empire at the time:

When the Turkish authorities gave the orders for these deportations, they were merely giving the death warrant to a whole race: they understood this well, and, in their conversations with me, they made no particular attempt to conceal the fact.

The genocide all but ended the 3,000-year-old presence of the Armenian population in the Turkish Near East. Survivors scattered across the Russian border, into the newly formed Arab states, into Europe, and many to the United States. It is testimony both to the humanitarian nature of the American people, and to the devastating cruelty of Ottoman policies, that 132,000 Armenian orphans came to the United States during this period for adoption or foster care.

Much has been written about the Armenian genocide, the Jewish Holocaust, and the massacres in Cambodia by the Khmer Rouge. Much has been written, but the reminders cannot come too often, nor can the cautions against forgetting ever be safely ignored. We live in a world where today's news becomes forgotten news almost immediately and where the lessons of history are studied carefully only rarely and even then by only a few.

This is a tragedy; it is also dangerous. It is said that those who forget their history are doomed to repeat it, and a glance today at the shelled ruins of Dubrovnik, the scarred streets of Sarajevo, and the fear-filled faces of children in Nagorno-Karabakh will tell us that the risk of repeating history is real and present and awful. The welcome end of the cold war has given rise to an unwelcome resurgence in ethnic violence and rivalry that has already claimed thousands of lives and that has no clear end. Thus, we celebrate the independence of Croatia and Slovenia, even as we mourn their dead. And we celebrate the independence of Armenia, while fearing for the future of its relations with neighboring Azerbaijan.

Today, as we commemorate the millions who suffered at the hands of the Ottoman empire three-quarters of a century ago, let us resolve never to allow in our time what was permitted to happen in their time. Let us resolve to strengthen the support for international recognition of minority rights and all human rights. Let us strengthen support for international institutions that are empowered to intervene diplomatically to resolve international disputes. And let us work to establish an overriding international obligation to act—whenever that is essential—to prevent the systematic persecution of people on ethnic, cultural, or racial grounds.

Elie Wiesel, chairman of the U.S. Holocaust Council, has said that Adolf Hitler had the Armenian example very much in mind when conceiving his own sick plan for exterminating the Jews. Hitler was confident that no one would care: "Who, after all, remembers the Armenians," he asked. Sadly, the answer to that question in Hitler's day was silence. But the answer today is we do; see remember the Armenians.

We remember both those who survived and those who perished and we will not allow the truth of their suffering to be obscured by distortions of history or the passage of time. We remember the terrible costs of past indifference and we will not allow the lessons learned to be forgotten. We remember because it is right to honor the past, but because it is even more important to safeguard the future; and because we must never again do less than all we can to prevent the specter of genocide from raising its bloody hand over any population on this planet.

THE 77TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE ARMENIAN GENOCIDE

Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. President, today marks the 77th anniversary of the Armenian genocide. Each April, Armenians throughout the world remember this dark period in their country's history, when one-and-a-half million Armenians lost their lives. I solemnly rise today to join them in commemorating this tragic episode in hope that the world community will learn from the past and not let history repeat itself yet again.

Beginning in 1915 with the banishment and eventual murder of Armenian religious and political leaders, the Ottoman rulers proceeded with their attempted genocide of the Armenian people for 8 long years. During this time, a deliberate and systematic annihilation of an entire country was undertaken and nearly succeeded. Armenians, whose ancestors thrived in this area of the world for thousands of years, were driven out of their homeland, faced with the inevitability of starvation. Women and children were forced to march through the desert into Syria, the vast majority unable to survive the hardships of such a journey.

And yet, for all the suffering of the Armenian people, the world still did not take notice, for just a short time after the Armenian massacre, Adolf Hitler used the experience to craft his own genocide effort against the Jewish population of Europe. And as recently as the 1970's, more than one million Cambodians suffered and were murdered at the hands of the Khmer Rouge.

It is time the world finally acknowledged these ghastly and horrifying chapters in our modern history. We must not forget. For as we pay homage today to the hundreds of thousands of innocent Armenians who lost their lives, we continue the fight for human rights worldwide to once and for all put a stop to such senseless pain and suffering.

ARMENIAN MASSACRES OF 1915-23

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I rise today to join my colleagues in commemorating the horrendous massacres of Armenians in Ottoman Turkey from 1894 to 1923.

Mr. President, the Armenians have suffered brutal persecution throughout their 3,000-year history. The most tragic of these injustices occurred within the past 100 years. In the 1890's 300,000 Armenians were killed under the Ottoman Sultan Abdul Hamid II. In 1909, 21,000 Armenians were slaughtered in Cilicia.

By World War I, the stage had been set for an organized, well-plotted massacre of the Armenian population in the Ottoman Empire: from 1915 to 1923, almost the entire Armenian population was systematically removed from their homes. One-and-a-half million people were murdered, and more than half-a-million were exiled.

About two-and-a-half million Armenians were living in the Ottoman empire on the eve of World War I. After the bloody campaigns to expel them, less than 100,000 remained in Turkey.

The U.S. Government has denounced these horrors. The American people have been generous in aiding Armenian survivors. Congress has designated days of remembrance for those who perished in the massacres.

Mr. President, I can only hope that we have learned from the lessons of the past. Today in the former Soviet Union, war has again brought suffering to the Armenian people. Armenians in Nagorno-Karabakh are faced with a blockade that deprives them of electricity, food, gas, and other necessities. Missile attacks have paralyzed the capital of Stepanakert. All this, as Armenia itself is still trying to recover from the massive earthquake in December 1988, and embark upon building a new democracy.

I am sure the American people will continue their support of the Armenians. I am pleased that an independent Armenian republic has been recognized worldwide. And I hope that with international support it can become not only a strong democracy, but also a haven to protect the victims of ages of abuse.

THE 77TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE ARMENIAN GENOCIDE

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I rise today to commemorate the 77th anniversary of the Armenian genocide.

The Armenian genocide marked a dark chapter in world history. As we commemorate the 77th anniversary of this grave injustice in Armenian history, we must resolve never to forget the terrible suffering of the Armenian people.

Today, the struggle continues for Armenian people. The Azerbaijani embargo is having devastating effects on the people of the republic of Armenia and Nagorno-Karabakh. The blockade has taken its toll on the people and the nation's industrial base. Oil supplies are short. Basic supplies are lacking. The United States has helped by providing food aid. But more must be done.

The United States needs to pressure Azerbaijan until it lifts the blockade. We need to take every opportunity to support a solution to the conflict in Nagorno-Karabakh.

Mr. President, it is essential that the Armenian people have the opportunity to live in peace. I can think of no day more appropriate than this anniversary to strengthen our resolve to work toward that goal.

COMMEMORATING THE 77TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE ARMENIAN GENOCIDE

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, today, once again, we honor the spirit, the memory, and the courage of the 1½ million Armenians who perished in the early years of this century in one of the worst episodes of human cruelty in all of recorded history.

In these tragic years, between 1915 and 1923, officials of the Ottoman Empire implemented a policy under which innocent men, women, and children of Armenian ancestry were deported from their homes and villages and forced into exile. The violent repression and persecution of the Armenians led to a brutal and bloody period of suffering that resulted in the deaths, through massacres, disease, and starvation, of a large part of the Armenian population.

Each year at this time we commemorate the tragic suffering of the Armenians. Few people in history have endured such murderous persecution with such stoicism and courage. In recognizing their strength, we commit ourselves to every possible effort to prevent the repetition of such atrocities again in any nation at any time.

All of us have been deeply concerned in recent months by the new violence directed against Armenians living in the former Soviet Union. We have also been shocked by the blockade of critical humanitarian supplies which were to have helped these people survive this past winter. These latest brutalities are additional evidence of the need for the leaders of all nations to recommit themselves to avoiding the horrors of the past.

We in America must take a leadership position within the international community to prevent further bloodshed and to halt this appalling ethnic and religious strife. Today, we make clear our firm conviction that such violence must end.

America has always stood for human rights—both for our own citizens and for all peoples throughout the world. By honoring the victims of this tragic chapter of recent history, we reemphasize our support for the fundamental rights of all peoples of all races and nationalities in all countries. In a sense, we are all Armenians. By demonstrating our common humanity, we make it less likely that such inhumanity will ever take place again.

COMMEMORATING THE ARMENIAN DAY OF REMEMBRANCE

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I rise today to commemorate the 77th anniversary of Armenian genocide and to acknowledge the commitment of groups like the Armenian National Committee of America in increasing our understanding of the region and supporting efforts to achieve a lasting peace there.

The suffering of the Armenian people at the hands of the Ottoman Turks represents a grave chapter in world history. The genocide should serve as an example for all people of the horrific consequences of policies of intolerance of religious or ethnic differences. For this reason, I strongly supported efforts to make April 24 National Day of Remembrance for the Armenian genocide and was disheartened when the bill failed.

As in the past, the region today is a patchwork of diverse communities living side by side. In an era of ever increasing interdependence, it is vitally important to establish workable ties based on mutual understanding. This will be possible when all parties accept the truth about their role in past events.

On the heels of declaring its independence on last September, Armenia has entered an uncertain chapter in its history. The United States can offer much to the republic to aid its fledgling democratic institutions and free market structures. I believe that the ties between the United States and Armenia will be strengthened through such cooperation.

Armenian American groups such as the Armenian National Committee of America, can play an important role in this process. First, they can educate Americans about the present situation in Armenia, and the importance of positive United States involvement in the region. Furthermore, they can also help inform Americans about Armenia's tragic past, and help to maintain pressure on Turkey to reject its policy of denial. Their activities keep alive the memory of those that perished in the genocide and in so doing, keep us from again bearing witness to such crimes against humanity.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE MASSACRE OF ARMENIANS IN THE OTTOMAN EMPIRE

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, for thousands of Armenian-Americans, today is a solemn day of remembrance for their relatives who died in a massacre of Armenians in the Ottoman Empire back in 1915. While the Senate has not adopted an official remembrance of this occasion, I think it is important that we do not forget the significance of this day in the hearts of many Armenian-Americans. Their memories are painful, their suffering great. What happened to their grandparents and great grandparents is indisputable. They were murdered because of their ethnicity.

The United States has always stood against such violence and brutality. We, as a beacon of freedom for the rest of the world, have a special responsibility to remind ourselves, our children, and the world, of such atrocities, in the hope that they never happen again. The Massacre of Armenians must never be forgotten.

So I stand with my Armenian-American friends on this day in remembrance of the suffering and tragedy that has befallen their parents, friends, and relatives, and pledge never to forget how cruel mankind can be to one another, and work to prevent such atrocities from happening in the future.

I thank my colleagues.

COMMEMORATION OF THE ARMENIAN GENOCIDE

Mr. SEYMOUR. Mr. President, I rise today to join my distinguished colleagues in marking this anniversary of the tragic genocide of the Armenian people between the years 1915 and 1923. The Senate appropriately takes this time to face a past that if left distorted or buried in ambiguity, will most certainly haunt us again.

This past, remarkably, still leaves us in the 20th century—one that now ends with so much hope, but one that unfolded as perhaps the bloodiest in human history. The premeditated slaughter of the Armenian people as World War One began and the Ottoman Empire entered its twilight stands as an unvarnished fact. An overwhelming body of eyewitness and documented evidence can lead us to no other conclusion.

Yet despite the Senate's ratification of the International Convention against all forms of racial and cultural genocide several years ago, we have yet to pass a resolution establishing Armenian Martyrs Day. The International Convention wedded us to the noble idea that states cannot will the massacre of individuals as a result of the cultures into which they were born, the faith they profess, or the languages they speak.

It made us accountable to timeless principles much larger and more enduring than ourselves. And for the perseverance of these principles, the Armenian people were martyred.

In a 1985 speech, President Reagan reminded the U.N. General Assembly that—

The blood of each nation courses the American vein and feeds the spirit compelling us to involve ourselves in the fate of this good earth. There is no purpose more noble than for us to celebrate the miracle of life in this turbulent world.

In its own turbulent world 77 years ago, Mr. President, the Armenian nation strived mightily to protect this miracle of life only to see it swallowed by the horror of genocide. We can redeem the suffering of these victims with an honest accounting of their agony. Let us therefore expeditiously adopt a simple resolution commemorating the dark but undeniable events of this day.

COMMEMORATE 77TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE ARMENIAN GENOCIDE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, last Friday, April 24—when the Senate was in recess—marked the 77th anniversary of the Armenian genocide. Between the years 1915-23, approximately 1½ million Armenians perished as a result of the brutal policies of the Ottoman Empire. Although the term genocide was not coined until years later, it is sadly the only accurate word to describe the terrible series of events that left a residual Armenian population of only about 100,000 in that region.

Sadly, this body has never mustered the moral courage and conviction to deal straightforwardly with Armenian genocide. Political pressure, no-holds-barred lobbying, and the expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars have prevented the Senate from passing an appropriate commemorative resolution.

But those of us who are willing to look history in the eye, and who see the danger of closing our eyes and hearts to the truth of the tragedy which took place, will not cease in our efforts to remember what happened. So this year, as in the past, I believe it is both right and essential to remember this terrible tragedy. Only in that way can we help ensure that these horrible events will never again take place.

Mr. President, while we have not passed a resolution, our past debate has not only benefited the Senate but has also brought a greater awareness to the American public about these events. Meanwhile, the mounting body of scholarly work on this issue has continued to remove any remaining skepticism about the fact of this tragedy.

Only one party continues to insist it all never happened—the Government of Turkey. I have made it clear in every statement I have made that no responsibility for the history of the genocide rests with either the Turkish people or their modern-day government. We have offered to amend and rewrite our resolution to underscore that point. But Ankara has not budged.

That is too bad, for Turkey would only enhance its own image by acknowledging these sad moments in history. That is a tragedy, because we will never be able to put the genocide issue to rest until all interested parties reach a common understanding of the past, and a common agreement to go forward into the future on the basis of an honest rendering of history.

As the Desert Storm war again demonstrated, Turkey is an important friend and partner to the United States, and we highly value our friendship with the Turkish Government and people. That friendship would not suffer from—and, in fact, could only be strengthened by—coming to terms with the past.

This 77th anniversary of the genocide comes at a time of rapid change for Armenia. With the dissolution of the Soviet Union, the newly independent Armenian state is taking bold steps to pursue democracy and a free market economy. Armenia and the other republics of the former Soviet Union are looking toward new relationships with their neighbors.

If ever the time was ripe for Armenia and Turkey to lay down their historic enmities and try to forge a new future of friendship and cooperation, that time is now.

I am convinced the Armenian Government, under the courageous leadership of President Ter Petrossian, is ready to make that attempt.

Judging by their clear commitment to democracy at home, and their warm relationship with us, I believe the Turkish Government and people are willing to try, too.

We cannot allow history to dictate our lives. But neither can we forget history, nor turn our backs on the truth. Let all of us, even as we remember the tragic events of the past, rededicate ourselves to making sure it never happens again; and to working together for the mutual benefit of all.

IN MEMORY OF THE PEOPLE OF ARMENIA

Mr. LIEBERMAN. Mr. President, I rise today to take note of one of this century's great tragedies: the death of over 1.5 million Armenians and their exile from their homeland.

The Armenian genocide, like the Nazi Holocaust, the liquidation of the kulaks in Ukraine and throughout Russia by Stalin, the killing fields of Cambodia, and more recently, the slaughter of the Kurds in Iraq are examples of the horrors that have befallen ethnic groups during this century. What can we learn from these tragedies? The first and in some ways most important step is to recognize the horror, to admit that a tragedy occurred, and that is what we are doing today.

The horror that befell the Armenian people came about during the collapse of the Ottoman Empire. The rule of law, such as it was, ceased to exist as the empire crumbled. The victims of this chaos were the Armenian people. We have a similar situation taking place in the former Soviet Union, where the implosion of the Soviet Union has created a crisis in Armenia and Nagorno-Karabagh. And although history seems to be repeating itself before our very eyes, it is not too late for us to learn from the lessons of the past and stop the bloodshed in Karabagh.

I have written to Secretary of State Baker, asking him to call for U.N. involvement in Nagorno-Karabagh to bring an end to this tragedy. U.N. special envoy, Cyrus Vance, has already gone to Karabagh to try and solve the situation. We need to push the U.N. to continue its efforts to help the suffering people of Nagorno-Karabagh.

In that same letter, I suggested to the Secretary of State that we not extend full diplomatic recognition to the Government of Azerbaijan, if it is unwilling to negotiate in good faith a peaceful settlement to this problem. We must make certain that the Azeri Government understands that there will be a consequence to further support of bloodshed in the region.

We should also look to the CSCE as a possible mediator in Nagorno-Karabagh. At a recent CSCE meeting, the Dutch suggested that we create a high commissioner on minorities, similar to the High Commissioner on Refugees. Another possibility might be to establish CSCE human rights offices in Nagorno-Karabagh and elsewhere in the CIS and Eastern Europe in order to give minority groups a place to take their grievances.

We must do whatever we can to stop the killing in Karabagh. We must use all available resources to see that the tragedy that befell Armenians in the first part of this century is not repeated as the century comes to a close. Helping to end the violence in the region would be a fitting tribute to the memory of all the Armenians who have given their lives for their nation and their heritage.

THE 77TH ANNIVERSARY OF ARMENIAN GENOCIDE

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, April 29 commemorates the 77th anniversary of the genocide suffered by the Armenian people. The struggle of Armenians for human rights and independence demands not only our sympathy and respect, but that of the entire world. It is with that thought in mind that we set aside April 29 as a tribute to Armenians and their descendants.

Between 1915 and 1923, 1.5 million Armenian citizens were killed by the Ottoman Empire in its brutal drive to end the Armenian quest for independence. Early in the First World War, the Ottoman drive to dominate the Armenian people eliminated almost half of the world's Armenian population. Battered and powerless, the Armenians were deported from cities and towns throughout Turkey and Asia Minor. Left without any alternative, countless Armenians died as they fled throughout the deserts of present day Syria and Iraq to escape the unbearable oppression.

After World War I, Armenia's hopes grew brighter. A makeshift Armenian army had marshaled considerable strength by 1918 and defeated the Turkish invaders. Following this momentous triumph, Armenia declared itself a free and independent state on May 28, 1918. Both the Soviet Union and Turkey initially pledged to honor the new state; nevertheless, both invaded Armenia in late 1918. Eastern Armenia was transformed into the Armenian Soviet Socialist Republic and Turkish forces once again extended their terror over Armenia's western half.

Despite overwhelming evidence of the deaths of more than 1 million Armenians, between 1915 and 1923, however, the world has yet to acknowledge the deliberate atrocities perpetrated against the Armenian people. Hundreds of thousands of Armenians were massacred or died of famine or disease during those 8 years, in a savage effort to stop their drive to recreate their historic nation.

In the continuing effort to deny the tragic facts of the Armenian genocide, many reject the testimony of numerous survivors and observers. But, there is no threat to our future as great as denying the past. Not to acknowledge the breadth of the pain inflicted on the Armenian people is an offense, not only against the victims of that genocide, but also to the survivors. The U.S. Government must be clear. As a party to the U.N. Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Genocide, we must align ourselves with truth and publicly recognize what happened.

It is important to note that we do not condemn the present Government of Turkey and the Turkish people for past actions. In fact, the current Government of Turkey was not even established at the time of the genocide. This effort merely seeks to commemorate the Armenian people and their steadfast courage in the face of suffering.

I am proud to say that America's sole Armenian research and publishing center calls the State of Michigan home along with some 60,000 Armenians. Not only does the center educate Americans about the close historic ties between America and Armenia, but it seeks to preserve Armenian culture and remind the world of the horrors of the genocide.

Tyrants like Adolf Hitler and the leaders of the Ottoman Empire should never be forgotten. Moreover, the victims of these despots, the Jewish people and the Armenians, should not be the only ones to recollect these gross atrocities. If the United States wants to be true to its high moral standards, it should always be mindful of these global tragedies.

Given the recent events in the Soviet Union, now more than ever is the time to honor the Armenian people. At long last they have realized their goal of an independent, peaceful Armenian state.

Acknowledging Soviet law, Armenia followed a smooth, legal secession from the Soviet Union. It held a referendum on September 21, 1991, in which an overwhelming percentage of the population expressed their desire for independence. The tale of the Armenian people in the end will be one of triumph, one that saw them rise from the depths of oppression to the height of independence.

ARMENIAN GENOCIDE

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, we pause today to commemorate the 77th anniversary of the Armenian genocide. Today, more than ever, it is vital that we remember the atrocities committed against the Armenian people by the Ottoman government between 1915 and 1923, resulting in the deaths of some 1.5 million Armenians.

We commemorate this event to acknowledge what happened, in order to prevent future genocides. We acknowledge this tragedy for this reason, not to point fingers or to breed ethnic conflict. Martin Niemoller's reflection on the Holocaust is worth repeating here:

 they came first for the Communists, and I didn't speak up because I wasn't a Communist. Then they came for the Jews, and I didn't speak up because I wasn't a Jew. Then they came for the trade unionists, and I didn't speak up because I wasn't a trade unionist. Then they came for the Catholics, and I didn't speak up because I was a Protestant. Then they came for me, and by that time no one was left to speak up.

Let us not ignore history. It is essential that our government and the international community work for peace and justice where human rights are being abused and wars are being fought. In remembering the suffering of the Armenians in those final years of the Ottoman Empire, we are telling the world that we know, in Martin Niemoller's words, how crucial it is to "speak up."

COMMEMORATING THE ARMENIAN GENOCIDE

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I rise today to join my colleagues in commemorating the 77th anniversary of the Armenian genocide. It is most fitting that on this day we pause to remember the first, but regrettably not the last, genocide of the 20th century. On April 24, 1915 some 200 Armenian religious, political, and intellectual leaders were arrested in Constantinople and exiled or taken to the interior and executed. That began a reign of terror wherein, over the next 8 years, a million and a half Armenians perished and another half million fled their homeland. In a July 16 cable to the Secretary of State, Henry Morgenthau, U.S. Ambassador to the Ottoman Empire, reported "deportation of and excesses against peaceful Armenians is increasing and from harrowing reports of eye witnesses it appears that a campaign of race extermination is in progress under a pretext of reprisal against rebellion." Later Ambassador Morgenthau wrote "I am confident that the whole history of the human race contains no such horrible episode as this. The great massacres and persecutions of the past seem almost insignificant when compared to the sufferings of the Armenian race in 1915."

It is said that Adolf Hitler, when contemplating the "final solution" asked "Who remembers the Armenians?" Thus our purpose here today is more profound than simply recalling a tragic episode of history. It is to renew our resolve to do everything we can to ensure that the scourge of genocide is never again visited upon any people anywhere on this Earth. Genocide is the extermination of people simply because of their national or racial group. Regrettably, the Armenian tragedy was followed by the horrors of the Holocaust, the massacre of Cambodians, and very recently Saddam Hussein's brutal campaign against his own Kurdish population.

We cannot simply erase or ignore history's ugly chapters. Because our century has seen such horrors is, to me, not an argument for trying to forget, rather it compels us to remember. And in remembering we renew our vow, individually and as a nation and party to the Genocide Convention, to be vigilant against any further repetitions of this most horrific example of man's inhumanity to man.

In the words of Edmund Burke, "the only thing necessary for the triumph of evil is for good men to do nothing." In solidarity with the people of free Armenia and Armenian Americans across the country, and in memory of all victims of genocide, let us pledge that never again, through our indifference or inaction, will the horrors of genocide be visited upon any of our fellow men. We are poised to enter a new century, one already ripe with promise for better relations among men and among nations. Let it also be one where the ghastly aberration genocide disappears from the lexicon of human relations.

COMMEMORATING THE ARMENIAN GENOCIDE

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, today we commemorate a loss, a loss of 2 million human beings. While even today, Turkey refuses to acknowledge their guilt in this mass murder, the memory of this tragic event lives on. We must remember that it was Hitler who said, "who remembers the Armenians." Cambodia's Pol Pot thought the same. If we fail to memorialize the senseless slaughter of nearly 2 million human beings, we will doom others to the same fate.

When a young Jewish student, Yankel Rosenbaum, was chased down a street in Crown Heights by murderers yelling "kill the Jew, kill the Jew," he was doomed. When over a million Cambodians were herded out of the cities into the countryside, they were doomed. And when 1.5 million Armenians were deported and force marched into the desert, they were doomed.

Fortunately, Armenia is now a sovereign and independent republic, free of the yoke of Soviet Communist control. Armenia is free to decide her fate and to create a land where her children can grow to learn its heritage.

Yet, as we enter a world without the Soviet Union, we face an unsure existence where ethnic hostilities have been unleashed. Once such place is in the highly disputed region of Nagorno-Karabakh.

Armenians have been subjected to endless Azeri pogroms. Innocent women and children have been slaughtered at the hands of Azeri soldiers. Those who survive have been forced to endure a brutal territorial blockade depriving Armenians of food and vital energy sources.

The world must understand that Karabakh was, is, and always will be Armenian. And it is for that reason that I demand, let Karabakh go!

THE 77TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE ARMENIAN MASSACRE

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I rise today to join with my colleagues in marking the 77th anniversary of the Armenian genocide of 1915. This horrifying massacre was the first instance of genocide in the history of the 20th century. Tragically—and in part because the world community failed to respond—it was not the last.

In the early part of World War I, the Ottoman Turkish Army, fearing disloyalty from its Armenian ranks during the struggle against Russia, began a prolonged campaign to segregate Armenian soldiers from the rest of the armed forces. On April 24, 1915, Turkish leaders decided on a more permanent settlement to the Armenian question. Two hundred Armenian religious, political, and intellectual leaders were arrested in Constantinople. Many of them were executed.

On May 27, 1915, the Armenian genocide was formally launched with the edict of deportation, which gave license to the murder of Armenian men and the forced march of women, children and the elderly to the Syrian desert. During the next 7 years, approximately 1.5 million Armenians were killed as a result of this policy.

Mr. President, our history is littered with examples where we have shortsightedly ignored the plight of an entire people, only to see events repeat themselves in another time and another place. Such is the case with the Armenian massacre. It was the world's failure to forcefully condemn this appalling tragedy that led a man named Hitler to believe the slaughter of the Jews would also go unnoticed. The horrific genocide begun 17 years ago by the Khmer Rouge in Cambodia teaches us that, sadly, ethnic violence still finds a place in this world.

Today, the Armenian people face another challenge, one they will not possibly meet without the cooperation of the world community. In the tiny enclave of Nagorno-Karabakh, an Armenian-dominated region within the former Soviet Republic of Azerbaijan, 1,500 Armenians have died in ethnic conflict since 1988.

That conflict now is being waged with the most sophisticated of weaponry, including tanks, missiles, and heavy artillery. In the city of Stepanakert, where about 50,000 Armenians make their home, heavy shelling has brought destruction and fear to the innocent civilians living there.

Mr. President, the United States and the international community must not ignore the plight of Armenians in Nagorno-Karabakh. The resolution of this bloody conflict will take a concerted effort on the part of the United Nations, the surrounding nations, and the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe. On this anniversary of the Armenian massacre, we would do well to contemplate the lesson of that tragic episode in history.

THE ARMENIAN GENOCIDE AND ETHNIC CONFLICT

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise today to note that this day has been designated a day of remembrance for the victims of one of the greatest tragedies of a brutal century. During the final years of Ottoman rule some 1.5 million ethnic Armenians were killed and several hundred thousand Armenians were deported. The U.S. Ambassador at the time, Henry Morgenthau, wrote: "I am confident that the whole history of the human race contains no such horrible episode as this."

This horrible event is perhaps more relevant today than we would like to admit. With the end of the cold war, ethnic conflict has exploded around the globe. It tore apart the Soviet Union, is tearing apart Yugoslavia, and will rip asunder many more multiethnic states. How the world community confronts this phenomenon will decide whether there are still more tragedies as that which befell the Armenian community. Now, more than ever, it is important to remember.

COMMEMORATION OF THE 77TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE ARMENIAN GENOCIDE

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. President, today, we mark the 77th anniversary of the Armenian genocide. Remembering this tragedy is essential for many reasons. First and foremost, we must honor those who died. Those who died so violently, in an absence of justice, must be remembered now; we honor them in death in recompense for the dishonorable way they were treated in life.

Yet, those who died so cruelly need not also have died in vain. As we gaze across Europe today, we see a continent in upheaval. Commemorating the Armenian genocide reminds all of us that the human heart—all human hearts—is both a heart of darkness and a heart of light. In times of transition and conflict, the best protection against new atrocities is the remembrance of old ones and the recognition that no one, no nation is immune from either the effects of evil or its perpetration. When we remember this, we can guard against darkness and choose to turn toward light. As new nations emerge in Europe, the hope of freedom and prosperity stands side by side with the fear that old animosities will lead to bloodshed. Let the remembrance of the Armenian genocide be an impetus to patience, respect for human life, and the peaceful resolution of conflicts.

In April, I had the privilege of visiting Armenia. At last Armenia is independent again, free to govern its affairs and to establish its place in the new world order. The problems for any new state are great, yet the upheaval in Europe can also be an opportunity for reconciliation. As we commemorate the 77th anniversary of the Armenian genocide, I urge Armenia and its neighbors to find a way to come to terms with the past so that the future can be one of cooperation and peace.

COMMEMORATING THE 77TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE ARMENIAN GENOCIDE

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, each April, Armenians worldwide commemorate the anniversary of the genocide that took the lives of an estimated 1.5 million Armenians from 1915 through 1923. The actual day of remembrance, April 24, occurred during the Senate recess. On that day in 1915, the Ottoman campaign against the Armenian people began in earnest when hundreds of Armenian community leaders were arrested and killed. For the next 8 years, the empire's rulers pursued a deliberate campaign based upon religious, political, and cultural intolerance, to eliminate the Armenian people through deportation and death.

This year, the day of remembrance has special significance because after decades of Soviet rule, Armenia is now a free and independent country. Regrettably, however, many Armenians—both in Armenia and the enclave of Nagorno-Karabagh—are suffering because of the ongoing conflict in the region. As Armenia embarks upon its independent course, and as attempts are made to end the bitter ethnic fight with Azerbaijan, I believe it is important to commemorate what happened to the Armenian population at the beginning of this century.

I visited Armenia for the first time in January. During that trip, I met with the country's new political leaders, with Armenian refugees from violence in Baku, and with survivors of the 1988 earthquake that leveled the city of Gumry. I was impressed by the commitment of the Armenian leadership to reform their country, and indeed, their eagerness to learn more about the United States political and economic model. I was truly saddened to learn that in Armenia, a country of nearly 3.3 million, 700,000 people are without permanent housing. I was horrified by the accounts of the brutality and violence that the refugees suffered. These incidents take on a deeper meaning in light of the genocide commemoration. It is a reminder that we cannot remain silent.

Mr. President, despite a long history of tragedy and persecution, the Armenian people possess moral strength, resilience, and a proud spirit. We join in this remembrance with American citizens of Armenian descent, whose ancestors became the victims of the first genocide of the 20th century. These crimes against humanity must never, and should never, be forgotten.

TRIBUTE TO LT. GEN. AUGUST M. CIANCIOLO

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I rise today to pay tribute to the life and career of my friend Lt. Gen. August M. Cianciolo, Military Deputy to the Assistant Secretary of the Army for Research, Development, and Acquisition. General Cianciolo's retirement from the Army is effective April 29.

In his capacity as Military Deputy, General Cianciolo supported the Assistant Secretary through decision recommendations for the Army acquisition function. He also served as chairman of the Preliminary Army Systems Acquisition Review Committee and supervised the program executive officer system. Some of my colleagues know him as the principal military witness for congressional RDA appropriations. The general held this position during a difficult period of transition, and none can deny that he represented the Army fairly, always keeping the interests of his country at the forefront of any duties he carried out or responsibilities he shouldered.

I first came to know General Cianciolo during his tenure as commander of the U.S. Army Missile Command at Redstone Arsenal, AL. Prior to becoming MICOM's commanding officer, he had been its project manager for the multiple-launch rocket system, which proved itself so effective during Desert Storm. While at MICOM, the general quickly earned the admiration and trust of the Huntsville community, and we all wish he had chosen to make this vibrant city his permanent residence upon his departure from the Army.

In addition to his outstanding work at Redstone Arsenal, General Cianciolo served as deputy commanding general for research, development, and acquisition at the Army Materiel Command. He has held several other important positions, including deputy for systems management; deputy director of materiel, plans, and programs; deputy director of weapons systems within the Office of the Deputy Chief of Staff for RDA; and project manager for the Standoff Target Acquisition/Attack System at Fort Monmouth.

General Cianciolo has received numerous awards, honors, and decorations during his illustrious Army career. He is a recipient of the Distinguished Service Medal; the Bronze Star with "V" Device and two Oak Leaf Clusters; the Meritorious Service Medal with one Oak Leaf Cluster; various Air Medals; the Army Commendation Medal with two Oak Leaf Clusters; and the Master Army Aviator Badge. Clearly, General Cianciolo has been the consummate soldier.

I commend and congratulate Lt. Gen. August M. Cianciolo on his impeccable career with the U.S. Army, and wish him and his wife all the best for a happy and healthy civilian life.

IRRESPONSIBLE CONGRESS? HERE'S TODAY'S BOXSCORE

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, the Federal debt run up by the U.S. Congress stood at $3,880,780,348,260.21, as of the close of business on Monday, April 27, 1992.

As anybody familiar with the U.S. Constitution knows, no President can spend a dime that has not first been authorized and appropriated by the Congress of the United States.

During the past fiscal year, it cost the American taxpayers $286,022,000,000 just to pay the interest on spending approved by Congress—over and above what the Federal Government collected in taxes and other income. Averaged out, this amounts to $5.5 billion every week, or $785 million every day.

On a per capita basis, every man, woman and child owes $15,108.60—thanks to the big-spenders in Congress for the past half century. Paying the interest on this massive debt, averaged out, amounts to $1,127.85 per year for each man, woman and child in America—or, to look at it another way, for each family of four, the tab—to pay the interest alone—comes to $4,511.40 per year.

What would America be like today if there had been a Congress that had the courage and the integrity to operate on a balanced budget?

A GUN FOR ALL SEASONS

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, today I rise to draw my colleagues' attention to an article in this morning's Washington Post. It tells of the widespread criminal use of the 9-millimeter pistol, a gun that is turning our streets into another Vietnam.

In seconds, a "nine," as they are known by teenagers who carry them, can fire 15 rounds. Just as quickly, the empty magazine can be removed and another one inserted loaded with 15 more 9mm bullets. Pathologists, surgeons, and police say they see victims riddled with bullets fired from these guns. More bullets do more damage: Whereas assaults with firearms in the District of Columbia have dropped, the number of fatalities continues to rise.

The crisis has taken on ominous proportions. Nine millimeter guns have become the most common weapon among street criminals in our Nation's Capital. Our police have become outgunned, and so some departments have turned to the Glock 9mm and similar guns to keep pace. But it is a losing battle to keep rearming our law enforcement officers with progressively deadlier guns to match those used by criminals. What we need instead is a way to diminish the epidemic of violence.

On January 14, 1991, I introduced S. 51, a bill to ban the importation, manufacture and transfer of .25- and .32-caliber and 9-millimeter ammunition. I support other methods of restricting the access of criminals to guns—the Brady bill, for example, which would mandate a national waiting period for the purchase of handguns. But it is the bullets that do the killing. Why not restrict access to the ammunition, and especially rounds like the 9mm associated disproportionately with crime? And why not restrict the size of magazines to curb spray of bullets from these semiautomatics? I urge my colleagues to cosponsor S. 51, and ask unanimous consent that the full text of the Washington Post article appear at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Apr. 29, 1992]

A GUN FOR ALL SEASONS—9MM PISTOLS SPAWN HIGH-TECH VIOLENCE

(By Pierre Thomas)

The number of gun assaults in the District of Columbia was down last year but the number of deaths rose, as did the number of bullets in the bodies of gunshot victims. Five years ago, it was one or two. Today, it's often eight to 10.

One reason is the easily handled and terribly lethal weapon produced daily by firearms manufacturers in the United States and over the world.

Its generic name is the 9-mm semiautomatic pistol, and it is the gun that has supplanted the .38 revolver as the preferred weapon among D.C. criminals and thus dramatically changed the local crime scene.

The "nine," as it is known on the street, is often small enough to fit in a coat pocket, yet potent enough to fire 15 staccato rounds without reloading. When reloading is necessary, a new magazine can be inserted in seconds.

Some models spray so many bullets that aim is irrelevant.

"Right now, the nine millimeter is the weapon the bad guy wants to have in his waistband," said David Troy, who heads the Washington field office of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms. "Your chances of killing with it are enhanced."

Last year, of the 102 homicide weapons confiscated by D.C. police, one out of three was a 9mm, by far the largest single category of handgun, according to federal agents. When ATF traced 845 confiscated firearms in the District during an eight-month stretch beginning in March last year, 202 were 9mms, more than any other type.

The advent of the 9mm and other semiautomatics, which make up the majority of guns seized in the District, has taxed the city's emergency medical system as never before because gunshot victims routinely sustain multiple bullet wounds.

Take David Washington, the 150th homicide victim in 1991, the bloodiest year in the city's history. One bullet from a 9mm knocked Washington, 26, out of a living room chair on Benning Road SE. Another slug ripped through his right ear, searing his brain. Still another went through his lip, knocking out teeth, while a third pierced his face, fracturing his jaw.

In all, 18 bullets riddled Washington's body during the attack last April, which officials said was the result of a drug dispute. The 9mm weapon produced so many bullet wounds it took the medical examiner eight pages to detail them in an autopsy report.

Police, forced to upgrade their handguns from revolvers to 9mms to counter the increased criminal firepower, also have seen their duties multiply in canvassing crime scenes involving 9mm attacks. Up and down city streets, police must patrol an expanded area to pick up spent bullet casings, check for damaged cars and make sure bystanders were not injured in the gunfire.

"Kids and criminals on the street know the power of a firearm," said D.C. Police Chief Isaac Fulwood Jr. "A firearm is an equalizer. They [the criminals] drove us to go to nine millimeters. We were recovering so many."

The 9mm and guns like it have "left a wide trail of devastation," said U.S. Attorney Jay B. Stephens.

This year, the mayhem caused by 9mms began on New Year's Day when 14-year-old Ricco P. Neal became the city's first homicide victim of 1992 after he and two other persons were sprayed in front of his house by 9mm bullets. A few weeks later, a card game played in a private hall on 14th Street in Northwest Washington was interrupted by the unmistakable popping of gunfire. A man was shot six times. Several 9mm shells littered the floor around the card table.

"It's scary," said Marie-Lydie Y. Pierre-Louis, a city medical examiner. "You almost don't want to acknowledge it."

The country found out last October what one man armed with two 9mm pistols could do in a few minutes: In Luby's Cafeteria in Killeen, Tex., 23 people were killed, 17 wounded.

Many criminals are riding around the District with the same firepower or more.

Flat and L-shaped, many 9mms have streamlined handles designed to fit more comfortably in the web of the hand. Unlike some of the larger, more rounded revolvers that bulge in a pocket, most 9mms are easily concealable and may be tucked in the small of the back or an underarm holster.

The weapons, which weigh between 2 and 3 pounds, retail from $139 for the single-action Stallard JS-9mm with an eight-round magazine to $1,900 for the more streamlined Sig P-210-6 imported from Switzerland, according to Gun Digest. In the District, they are purchased off the street illegally.

The primary advantages, gun experts say, is their ease of operation, increased firepower and reduced recoil. The typical .38-caliber revolver, the once-dominant form of handgun, holds six rounds. Many models of the 9mm can hold 14 or more bullets, and extended magazines can easily double the shooting capacity of some models.

The bullets are lodged in a compact magazine that may be inserted into and ejected from the butt of the weapon, as quickly and easily as the beaters slip in and out of an electric mixer.

"With a revolver, you have to open it, eject the shells, fill the holes, and close the gun before you can fire," said ATF spokesman Jack Killorin. "With a nine millimeter you push a button, the [empty] clip falls out and you slap another [loaded magazine] in."

Popular models of the 9mm include an American-made version by Smith & Western and the Beretta, many of which are assembled in a Prince George's County facility opened by the Italian firm in the late 1970s, and is now the standard sidearm of the U.S. military. Others are imported from Spain, Brazil, Germany, Austria and elsewhere. The 9mm is the official sidearm of NATO forces.

Newer versions of the 9mm were introduced in the mid-1980s, when police and military demand skyrocketed. The 9mm category also includes the Tec-9 and Uzi pistols, longer, bulkier weapons that can fire up to 32 rounds without reloading.

The 9mm is popular partly because it received "legitimacy" through its use by the American and European military, said Christopher Dolnack, a spokesman for Smith & Western.

"Criminals aren't our customers," Dolnack said. "I don't know what can be done. . . . We certainly as a manufacturer wish that our products weren't used for illegal purposes."

The growth of 9mms and semiautomatics over the last five years parallels the city's escalating homicide rate.

The number of semiautomatic pistols confiscated by D.C. police and other agencies roughly has tripled since 1986, from 485 to more than 1,500 last year. During the same period, homicides more than doubled from 194 to 489, a fact that police and health officials attribute partly to the emergence of high-capacity weapons such as the 9mm and the birth of the violent crack cocaine trade.

"The crack . . . the semiautomatic weapons," said Lt. Charles Bailey, who oversees the District police department's crime scene technicians. "It's an explosive combination."

For the criminal, the 9mm has become a common tool in the increasingly deadly street wars. In the District, where handgun sales and possession are banned, the 9mms are easy to get through a multimillion dollar black-market trade that relies heavily on smuggling from gun stores in neighboring Virginia and Maryland.

"I carried the gun [a Browning 9mm] because I was into the drug scene," said Jerome Donelson, 31, who is serving time at the D.C. corrections facility in Lorton for second-degree murder. "If you get into a situation, you want the best firepower, something that will get you out of that corner."

Shayhid Turner-Bey, 30, who is serving a 15-year-to-life sentence for second-degree murder, said he felt "safer with a 9. They [9mms] have extensive ammunition. . . . You might have more than one person that you have to shoot."

Bey bought his gun in Maryland from an acquaintance. Donelson received his in the District as a "gift."

"It seems like everybody has them [9mms]," Bailey said. Guns and drugs are usually intertwined, he said.

Convicted armed robber Darrell Smith says he developed a profitable business selling 9mms. One weekend in 1983, he said he was approached by men from Norfolk, who offered a 9mm in exchange for $200 worth of cocaine.

"They came back eight weeks in a row" and Smith bartered for about 25 9mms," he said. Smith is now serving a 12-years-to-life sentence for armed robbery, a crime he committed with a 9mm.

No one knows better the deadly power of the 9mm than the emergency medical workers who treat the wounds.

Today's gunshot wounds are "similar to that of Vietnam, war, the battlefield," said Fire Department spokesman Theodore O. Holmes, a battalion chief.

In emergency rooms, more specialists are required, straining the staff. Marvin Barnard, director of D.C. General's emergency care center, routinely fields a team of neurosurgeons, cardiovascular surgeons and others to meet arriving gunshot victims.

The public never realizes the damage a bullet can do, said Edward Cornwell III, a Howard University Hospital emergency room doctor. The bullet is hot and tends not to go in a straight line but to tumble, bouncing around, tearing and fracturing organs and bones, he said.

The people shot more than twice "don't usually make it to us," he said. They die before getting to the hospital.

The gunshot victims wheeled into the medical examiner's office at 1900 Massachusetts Ave. SE now require much more work than in the past.

"The main thing is that there are more bullets to do more damage," said Joye M. Carter, the city's chief medical examiner.

Vincent E. Hill, a medical examiner, said that while doctors are not firearms experts, they clearly see the evidence of more potent guns such as the 9mm.

"Sometimes, more than one bullet has gone through the same hole," Hill said.

Doctors are left to console the grieving survivors. Hill recalled one grandmother who could not grasp how "somebody could shoot her grandson 15 times."

EXTENSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that morning business be extended until the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE TIME FOR CAMPAIGN REFORM

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, this should be the last step toward the enactment of a long-delayed reform of our laws governing congressional elections. It has been 6 years since the Senate signaled its interest in the Boren-Goldwater reform proposals; 4 years since we surrendered to the Republican filibusters which blocked action in the 100th Congress; 2 years since we adjourned without reconciling House and Senate bills, and 1 year since the Senate passed S. 3.

Unfortunately, however, the President has already indicated his intention, to veto this very important bill. We have reached the point when we could change the current discredited system and slow down that money chase. But it looks like we will have to regroup to fight another day.

Mr. President, we need this legislation. Campaigns cost too much and they require too much time for fundraising. We need to devalue the dollar's dominant role in politics so that elections can focus on the more relevant issues of accomplishments, character, and policy choices.

Most of us in this Chamber are quite successful at politics. We have learned the existing rules. We played by them and we have won. That does not mean we like all those rules, or that we cannot set better ones.

I support this conference report, as I have supported many significant campaign reform bills in the past, because I believe we need to change those rules, especially by limiting the costs of campaigns and also the role of special interest money.

The money chase dominates our campaigns today. You spend your time on the telephone calling around the country, visiting States other than your own, and then repeatedly calling on your friends in your own State. A candidate needs several million dollars to be competitive in big States. It means we spend our days, our nights and our weekends trying to raise the necessary money from legitimate sources.

If you read those press accounts about our FEC filings, you might conclude that raising money is easy for me. I cannot deny that I have been successful. But I assure you it was not easy. And for all of us, the more time we have to spend on fundraising, the less time we have to discuss and work on the issues that are of importance and concern to this country of ours and trying to get it turned around, get it back to growing again.

Mr. President, this is not a perfect bill. Hardly any compromise is perfect. For example, I am troubled that the conferees weakened the Senate amendment attempting to limit the participation of foreign nationals. I know the hoard of lobbyists—from when I worked on this before—that have been turned loose to try to see that that is not done. What they have been able to do to campaigns in this country is far beyond anything we have ever tried in any of their countries. They would be terribly affronted by it.

I regret that requirement for certification that no foreigners were involved in PAC operations was deleted in the conference.

I am also a reluctant supporter of the partial, last resort public financing of Senate campaigns provided by this bill. I believe we should go further in reform. But I remain a supporter because I am tired of the double whammy that hits us under the current system which forces us to ask for vast sums of money in a State like Pennsylvania or Texas and then subjects us to criticism for taking it.

This bill provides voluntary spending limits on campaigns. In case of the U.S. Senate election in Texas, the limit would be $6.2 million. That is approximately two-thirds the amount spent by the most recent successful candidate. That continues to escalate. And if you extrapolate it into the future, it would be an enormous amount of money. The bill also limits the influence of political action committees both by slashing their maximum contribution, cutting it in half, and by forbidding Senate candidates from deriving more than one-fifth of their war chest in PAC's.

I have not taken a PAC contribution since the 1988 campaign. I decided I was better off.

It also provides tough limits on bundling and soft money as well as tighter restrictions on independent expenditures, all useful reforms but long overdue.

Mr. President, Congress has fallen in public esteem over the last few months. Some of the criticism has been quite justified, but a lot has been based on insignificant or really irrelevant matters. I know and you know that the vast majority of the men and women in this body and the other body are honest, sincere people trying to do what is right for their country, hoping they will be able to make a difference, and the outcome of that is debatable, as it should be, but the focus as always is on the aberration.

Whether we are talking about doctors or lawyers, dentists, laborers, there are always a few goats in the crop and those are the ones who make the evening news. The problem you are running into is the visual pounding of that night after night finally is accepted as a generalization of the institution, and that is what has given me great concern, because as people lose confidence in these institutions, democracy is threatened as people quit voting.

I believe we can do much to reestablish confidence in our political process and in this institution. The reforms in this piece of legislation are a step along the way. I strongly hope that the President of the United States changes his mind about this place of legislation and helps us put it into law.

Mr. President, I yield the floor. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CAMPAIGN FINANCE REFORM

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. Mr. President, the bill that is before us for consideration on campaign finance reform contains many provisions that I could support. Foremost among these are the spending limits that would be applied to House and Senate election campaigns. I strongly believe that spending limits are an important and necessary reform in our campaign finance laws, and I commend the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. BOREN], and others who have worked so hard to achieve this reform.

Unfortunately, this bill, Mr. President, suffers from a fundamental defect in my view and that is its provisions for taxpayer financing of congressional campaigns. I am strongly and flatly opposed to public funding of campaigns, and therefore oppose this bill.

I think we can see what has happened with public funding for campaigns with the Presidential campaigns. It was believed when that initiative was passed into law that public funding would be provided by those who would check off on their tax returns that they wished to participate, and it has continually and steadily declined. My opposition to public financing is based partially on the fact that we should not be creating a new entitlement program at a time of continuing high deficits, and clearly I think we would end up paying for these out of general revenue moneys.

We should particularly not create such a program without specifying the source of funding, as this bill would do.

Even more important to me, however, is the concern that this bill would repeat past mistakes by offering a reform that might only aggravate our present problems. Public financing could well lead to greater voter alienation from the process in and of itself and further weaken our political parties. Nobody would feel they had a stake in the process, and it would further increase the barrier between candidates and voters.

Having the Federal Treasury write checks to every congressional candidate will do nothing to bring more people into the political process, and could well cause many people to be less involved and less concerned about our elections. Stopping or reducing the flow of special interest money is a good idea. Replacing it with taxpayer money I would suggest is a bad idea.

Unfortunately, this legislation stops well short of the Senate bill in addressing special-interest money. The Senate bill eliminates contributions by political action committees. This bill, the Congress report, merely reduces the PAC contributions to Senate candidates from $5,000 to $2,500, and it leaves PAC contributions to House candidates at $5,000.

Provisions of this bill to limit use of franked mail by incumbents and to regulate or at least require disclosure of so-called soft money also are weaker than I would like to see them, and I believe were stronger in the original Senate bill.

Mr. President, I am aware that my support for spending limits and my opposition to public financing places me in a kind of constitutional limbo. According to the Supreme Court the two must be connected, though I am not certain the connection has to be made in this legislation would do it.

All of this convinces me that the first step toward real campaign finance reform is to adopt a constitutional amendment that allows Congress to pass meaningful limits on campaign spending without public financing.

I support the effort by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HOLLINGS] to pass such a constitutional amendment. And until, it seems to me, we take that step, I fear we will never be able to move forward with the reforms so clearly needed in the present system.

I yield the floor.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business is closed.

SENATE ELECTION ETHICS ACT—CONFERENCE REPORT

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KERREY). The Senate will now resume consideration of the conference report on S. 3, which the clerk will report.

The bill clerk read as follows:

Conference report to accompany S. 3, a bill to amend the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971, to provide for a voluntary system of spending limits for Senate election campaigns, and for other purposes.

The Senate resumed consideration of the conference report.

Mr. BOREN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma is recognized.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, we resume consideration today of the conference report on S. 3, the campaign finance reform bill, which would bring about sweeping changes in the way elections are financed in this country, which we have been discussing on this floor over the past several hours, and indeed through the course of much of this year.

This institution is in trouble. We all recognize it. The public recognizes it. Never have the approval ratings for Congress as an institution, or for individual Members, been as low as they are now, since records have been kept in modern times. It is clear that changes need to be made. All of us know the reasons; all of us understand the situation.

The present system is absolutely tilted in favor of incumbents as opposed to challengers. As long as spending is allowed to run out of control, as long as spending is not limited, as long as we allow money to continue to flow into the political process of this country, that process will be distorted. The confidence that the people have in their own representatives will be shaken, because they will continue to wonder whether or not it is the special interest groups that are being represented by this institution, those with the money available to pour into election campaigns, or whether these institutions belong directly to the people themselves.

Mr. President, for example, was spending allowed to run out of control and without limitation in the last election cycle in the House of Representatives? The spending by House incumbents was eight times as high as those of challengers. In the Senate, it was three times as high, $138 million raised and spent by incumbents versus $51 million by challengers.

Mr. President, I will continue with this report in a moment. At this time, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished President pro tempore, the Senator from West Virginia.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be recognized at 4:45 this afternoon, and that I may be recognized for 1½ hours beginning at 4:45 p.m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma. If there is any problem on the other side of the aisle—there is nobody on the floor at the moment representing the other side of the aisle—I will be glad to try to work something out.

I do not want to be interrupted in my statement. I want to make a speech in support of this legislation and, as I say, if there is a problem on the other side of the aisle, we can try to make some alterations.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I thank my distinguished colleague from West Virginia. When the floor manager on the other side of the aisle does come to the floor, I will take up this matter with him. I think he will understand, as do I, that the distinguished President pro tempore has been one of the most active Members of the Senate on this subject. I know that he has other appointments between now and that period of time, and he does want to participate in this debate.

The Senator from West Virginia is one of the greatest scholars of the history of this institution. He has thought long and hard about this issue and has provided unparalleled leadership on this issue over the last several years, including the time he served as majority leader in the Senate. He put great emphasis on the adoption of campaign finance reform as one of his major goals during his time as majority leader. I value his participation in this debate and look forward to hearing his remarks. I will consult with the floor leader on the Republican side to see if there is any problem with that.

If there is we will be in touch then with the Senator from West Virginia if we have to make a modification. Otherwise that certainly meets with the approval on this side of the aisle for the Senator to speak during that period of time. I have had no other requests on this side of the aisle that would conflict with that particular time period, and I understand that the Senator wants to have that amount of time in order that he might fully develop his reasons for supporting this legislation.

So I thank him for his participation in this debate. I look forward to hearing his comments, and I will consult, as obviously we want to make sure that these agreements are also acceptable to those on the other side of the aisle. We will consult as soon as the floor manager on the other side of the aisle arrives on the floor.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank my friend, the able and distinguished Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. BOREN].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, just a moment ago I was indicating a reason why it is so crucial that we have campaign finance reform, why this is a step that simply cannot wait. I mentioned that the present system not only has too much money pouring into it, but the average cost of campaigns, the average cost of successfully competing and winning a seat to the Senate has gone from $600,000 12 years ago, 14 years ago, to $4 million in this last election cycle. Too much money is pouring into the system. There is too much time, effort, energy, focus and attention on raising money instead of solving the country's problems. There is too much of the emphasis in campaigns themselves on the candidate that can raise the most money as opposed to the candidate that has the best ideas for solving the problems of the Nation.

It is not only a matter of too much money coming into the system, it is also the fact the system is dependent more and more on money and the outcome of the election is dictated more and more by money and which candidate has the most money, that the system also is tilting in favor of incumbents against challengers. It gives incumbents a huge advantage.

The absence of spending limits is the greatest single advantage that an incumbent has over a challenger, and there is absolutely no way of leveling the playing field and giving challengers an equal chance in elections unless we somehow limit this runaway spending.

Incumbents are here, they are in office. They are occupying positions where they are making policies and helping to make decisions that affect the people of the United States and affect the various economic interest groups across the United States. And, therefore, it should not be surprising that those economic interest groups are most willing to give campaign contributions to the people that are already in position to either help them or hurt them as far as their economic interests are defined. That is why sitting House Members have been able to raise eight times as much as their challenges to run for reelection. That is why sitting Senators have been able to raise three times as much as their challengers to run for reelection.

In the last election cycle in 1990, sitting House Members raised $148 million to run for reelection versus $17.4 million for challengers. It does not matter whether they are Democrats or Republicans. Incumbents have been able to outraise challengers. In the Senate, sitting Senators raised $138 million versus $51 million for challengers.

Too much money is coming into the system. The fact that money is such an important factor in winning House elections means that incumbents have unfair advantage over challengers.

And, finally, the third part of the problem is that too much of the money is not coming from small contributors back home in the home State of the Congressman or Congresswoman or Senator involved. More and more of it is coming from special interest groups that have axes to grind, that have a narrow sight of issues and interests that they use in deciding how they give out campaign contributions.

And the political action committee contributions, by the way, are adding to this problem of an advantage for incumbents.

Even more than individuals, political action committees representing the special interests give to incumbents over challengers. In the last election cycle, political action committees gave $16 to incumbents in the House for every $1 they gave to challengers. In the Senate the rate was 4 to 1.

The bill attacks that problem. It puts in place spending limits. It would bring the spending under control and, in fact, had the spending limits in this bill been in place in the 1990 election, 82 percent of the incumbents running for reelection would have exceeded those spending limits.

So we can see quite obviously that this bill would have reduced the money chase, would have reduced the flow of money in politics had it been in place, had it already been enacted in the 1990 election. In addition, it would have reduced the amount of money that candidates could have received from political action committees, from PAC's, by 53 percent. It would have squeezed more than half of the special interest money out of the process.

So this is legislation that is badly needed. The system cries out for reform. How in the world can we expect people of this country to regain confidence in this institution, which should belong to them, not to those who have lobbyists representing them in Washington, DC, not to those special interest groups that are able to pour millions and hundreds of million of dollars into campaigns. This institution is meant to belong to all of the American people on an equal basis. It should be votes and it should be effort and it should be energy and it should be ideas and it should be qualifications that decide the outcome of American elections and not money, money, and money.

It has to be changed. It cries out for change. The problem is not getting better. The problem is getting worse.

For example, the cost of campaigns from the 1988 election cycle to the 1990 election cycle went up. Again, 1988 candidates spent $1.30 per voter in terms of campaign expenditures. By 1990 it was $1.70 per voter. The contributions of political action committees, special interest to incumbents, as I mentioned awhile ago, 16 to 1, for incumbents in the House in 1990. So far, in the 1992 election cycles, PAC's are giving 25 times as much to incumbents in the House as they are to challengers, and it has gone up from 4 to 1, to 15 to 1 in the Senate. So the problem is getting worse.

The number of federally registered PAC's is continuing to grow. In 1974 there were 600; in 1990 there were 4,200.

What about where the money is coming from? In 1974, 69 percent of those elected to the House of Representatives received half or more of their funds from political action committees. Nine percent got over half of all their total campaign contributions from political action committees special interest, many of them with no connection or little connection with the home State or district to the Member of Congress. That was in 1974, 9 percent got more than half their money not from the people back home, but from the PAC's and the special interest groups.

By 1990 that figure had risen to 55 percent, more than half of the Members of Congress were receiving more than half of their funds from the political action committees in the special interest groups.

Then we have the problem of soft money. That is money that is contributed for the purpose of trying to help Federal candidates for the House or the Senate, for example to win the elections, or the Presidential candidates win the election. But to get around the $1,000 limit on how much individuals can give or the $5,000 limit on PAC's, these groups and these individuals then give additional money to the State party organizations and to other entities to run generic advertising—vote Democratic, vote Republican—in the midst of Federal elections, and using other tactics to influence the elections so they can get around the spending limits so they can pour more money into the system. It is not enough we are pouring hundreds of millions of dollars already in the system, they want to pour hundreds of million dollars more. And they want to evade not only the kind of total spending limit that we have in terms of what parties can spend directly on Federal elections—so much cents per voter—they not only want to evade that, they want to evade the individual contributions limits of $1,000 per individual or $5,000 for a political action committee.

So, we have fundraisers. Last night we had another record fundraiser. I believe it was $9 million was raised in one night in Washington, DC, last night. Money is being funneled to the State committees.

In 1991, a nonelection year, the national parties—and this is true of Democrats and Republicans alike, this is no claim on this side of the aisle that one party is more pure than the other when it comes to soft money—$24 million of soft money, often called sewer money because it is unaccounted for, was poured into the system again in 1991. The Republican National Committee raised $3.3 million in soft money during January of 1992 alone. And we are already up to $13.360 million raised by them in soft money since January 1, 1991.

So, we have too much money pouring in. We have too much money coming from special interest groups, we have too much money going to incumbents versus challengers, distorting the system making it almost impossible for new people with new ideas and qualifications to come into the public setting. And we have soft money, sewer money, getting around those modest limits that are in place.

Something has to be changed. S. 3 addresses all of these problems it puts in place spending limits. It puts in limits on the proportion of campaign contributions that can come from political action committees and special interests, and it does away with the soft money loophole. It says if you are going to contribute money to a State party, for example, or through some other mechanism for the purpose of influencing a Federal election, you fall under all of the limits in terms of how much you can contribute.

No more are we going to be able, if this bill becomes law, these fundraisers where people are giving $100,000 each in soft money contributions to party committees around the country, to get around the limit that individuals can only give $1,000 to a candidate.

And, until we do something we are not going to change the perception of Congress. Seventy-five percent of the public, in fact 80 percent in the Gallup poll last week, said they disapproved of the way Congress was doing its job. And 71 percent of the public said they thought that most Members of Congress were more interested in serving special interest groups than in serving the people.

Mr. President, that perception is not going to change unless we do something about it. And it is time for us to act. If we do not do something about it, who will? We are the people who have the votes in the U.S. Senate. Those 80 percent of the people out there who are disapproving of the job that we are doing, the 71 percent who say they believe Congress represents the special interests, there is only one way for them to get things changed and that is for us to vote to do it.

We are here. Our constituents have temporarily put us into these positions. These desks do not belong to us. Our seats in the U.S. Senate do not belong to us. They belong to the people, and we have a responsibility to the people to clean up this system. It is a rotten mess. We all know it. How long are we going to wait to do something about it? Nobody likes the system. The people do not like it because they believe that money now has more influence than the people themselves in the political process. Nor do we like it either.

I do not know of a single Member of the Senate who likes the fact that he or she has to figure out how in the world to raise $4 million, the average amount required to run a successful race for the U.S. Senate. That works out to $13,000 a week every single week for 6 years, if you are going to figure out how to raise the amount of money the average campaign is going to cost.

Some people have said oh, well, Members do not really raise it every week for 6 years, they wait until the last 2 years to raise most of the money. If you wait for the last 2 years to raise most of the money you are going to have to sit down and figure out how you are going to raise $44,000 a week every week for 2 years. However you figure it, it is a huge burden. There is no way in the world—whether you are talking about an incumbent or a challenger who has to sit down and try to figure out how to raise millions of dollars to run for election or to run for reelection—that person is not going to be influenced by the pressure of that burden placed upon them.

Members run all over the country. There are Members here trying to raise the money. There are Members here—it has actually happened—who have held their first fundraiser to either pay off the debt they have from their last election or to look forward to their next reelection campaign—new Members who have been elected to the Congress who have held their first fundraiser in Washington before they ever even cast their first vote on the floor of the House or Senate.

Mr. President, how long are we going to let this go on? You cannot raise all the money in most States, especially small States with economies going through a rough time. In most States you cannot raise $4 million. So where do you go?

You have Members of the Senate or House from States—whether it is Oklahoma, or Kansas, or Idaho, you name it, Nebraska—in the middle of the country, bumping into each other in hotels in Boston and Los Angeles and Hollywood and Dallas and Chicago—you name it. They are going to the money centers of this country so they can raise the money instead of spending time back home, listening to their constituents, constituents who may not have money to give them a huge fundraiser.

But they have problems, that small business man or business woman on the Main Street of a small community—that farmer, that hardhat who has worked for 30 years for a company that is being restructured where people are being laid off, people who expected to live out their whole lives like their parents and grandparents before them, working for one company, thrown out of work now without health insurance and worried about how they are going to educate their children. These are the people we ought to be talking to, instead of being off holding a fundraiser in a city not even in a place we represent.

And yet, where you have to raise $4 million to run successfully for the U.S. Senate, you are not going to be here if you do not take the time to go to those places to raise that amount of money. Who feels good about that? Not this Senator. Nor do I know any other Senator, Democrat or Republican, who feels good about that.

And there you are in the middle of a busy day with a lot of pressure, running from one committee to another. We all know that is another problem we have with Congress—and we need to reorganize it—301 committees and subcommittees; the average Member of the U.S. Senate belonging to 14 committees and subcommittees. Most of them all seem to meet at the same time, at the same hour.

You are running around. Constituents come to see you, maybe 10 of them wind up in the waiting room waiting to see you, as I said yesterday, and you have to decide. I have 5 minutes before that next meeting where I have to be. Which one will I see, human nature being what it is, when your secretary says, one person out there is really well-connected. He or she could probably give a fundraiser for you and maybe raise $100,000. And the person sitting next to him, they are pretty well off, husband and wife. They could give you a contribution for $2,000 when you run for election. I am sorry, there are four others, school kids. Maybe one of them would have an idea when they grow up, and might make an enormous contribution to this country, maybe sit here himself or herself, someday. They could not contribute 25 cents to your campaign.

Here you are in the middle of trying to do your work and trying to raise $4 million. Are you going to see the schoolchild, who needs to be reassured about his or her own system of government and what it is all about, if you have 5 minutes available? Are you going to see the unemployed steelworker, or the farmers who scraped together the last few dollars they had to get here to try to talk to you or a member of your staff about their problems? And you are worried about raising $4 million for the next election and somebody is out there who might be able to put on an event to raise you $100,000; who is going to get through that door for that 5 minutes?

And then we say we are shocked that the people have come to believe, 71 percent, that the institution serves special interests and not the people themselves.

Mr. President, until we stop it, until we stop the money chase, until we put limits on campaign spending and campaign fundraising, we are not going to change the perception of the U.S. Senate. We are not going to feel better about ourselves and how we do our job. And we are not going to bring our people back together as one people and one community until we stop it.

How can we stop it? We can stop it by passing this bill. And the President of the United States can help us stop it by signing his name to this landmark campaign reform legislation.

There are those who say, we want campaign reform, yes. We would like to get lower advertising rates; maybe cut the cost of television in half. That is fine. So if you have $10 million you can buy twice as many spots on TV than you did before. Because as long as you can raise an unlimited amount of money, if you cut the advertising costs all you are going to do is let people buy twice as much advertising. They are still going to spend the money. It is the rare candidate who raises the money who does not spend it, at least if he or she thinks they are in a close campaign.

Oh, yes, we will have some other areas in which we can reform the system. But the fact remains you cannot have real reform as long as you allow an unlimited amount of money to pour into the system, and as long as you burden the candidate with raising an unlimited amount of money to run his or her campaign.

Everyone is victimized. The public is victimized, the public interest is victimized, and the people who serve here, the people who came here because they wanted to do something for their country, and I think that is a vast majority, Mr. President, of the people who came to the Senate, they came here because they wanted to make a difference. They wanted to do something for their country. They did not come here because they wanted to spend their time, effort, and energy worrying about how to raise $4 million to run for office.

Let us do something about it. We all know it. We all understand it. Let us have the political will and the political courage to do something about it, and let us do it before it is too late. It affects everything that comes here.

Look at our huge budget deficits. We are robbing from our children; we are robbing from the next generation. Look at our tax policy. Look at decisions we make on spending, continuing to give more and more benefits that we cannot afford and we know we cannot afford. Writing tax policies that favor those with more clout instead of writing tax policies that would cause us to make some short-term sacrifices to rebuild the ability of this country to compete in the international marketplace.

The savings rate in this country is a disgrace when by international standards we are not saving and reinvesting in new plant and equipment and machinery. How in the world are we going to compete with the Japanese, Germans, the French, the Italians or others coming into the world marketplace? We cannot.

Mr. President, can we be surprised that we are not coming together and finding a consensus on these important issues when the way we finance our campaigns more and more fragments the American people into small, tiny isolated interest groups? Political action committees do not look at the record of the distinguished Presiding Officer and say, we are going to view the entire record of that Senator based upon his honesty, his integrity, his vision, the ideas he has for this country.

If it is the bank political action committee, they are going to look at three or four votes, the three or four votes cast on banking this year and whether or not he supported the banks. Or if they are the agricultural PAC, they will look at it from the point of view of agriculture. Or if it is the securities industry or the S&L industry, or you name it, they are not going to look at the overall record of the Senator, they are going to give that $5,000 based upon did you vote 80 or 90 or 100 percent of the time with our little group on our three or four votes this year.

When it comes time on the floor of the Senate to try to hammer out a consensus to get these budget deficits under control and to write a budget that will benefit all of us and undoubtedly call on all of us to make some sacrifice, maybe across the board, each of us doing our part, do you think it makes it easier when millions of dollars that we are dependent upon to run our campaigns is coming from groups that are judging us and handing us their money not based on the national interest but based on the interest of their little group on that particular big issue?

When we need unity in this country, the way we finance campaigns fragments this country and tears it apart and splinters it and makes it impossible for us to do our job.

Mr. President, this is not a Democratic problem and this is not a Republican problem. That is one of the other problems we have in this country today and this is one of the problems we have even in this Senate. Too often, we put on the party blinders and we try to decide what is good for this party or that party and we act like children on the playground—who is king of the mountain, who can score the most points against the other side? Can we score points against the Republicans today? Can they score points against us? We see it in our political elections.

The American people really do not care. There may be about 10 percent of the American people who are strong Democrats and they like it when Republicans get put down. There may be 10 percent of the American people who are strong Republicans and they like it once in a while when Republicans kick the Democrats around.

But a good 80 percent of the people of this country, really I think it is 100 percent when it comes to critical issues, are sick and tired of all that. They want us to be grownups, not children on the playground. They want us to see if we can find out what is in the national interest, what should be done to help the country. They are not interested in helping the Democratic Party or Republican Party. They are interested in handing over a country that is better when they hand it on to their children than it was when it was given to them. They do not want us to play games. They want us to get together and want us to solve the problems. And this should be an area where we can reach common agreement.

Frankly, the only thing that has prevented us from reaching a common agreement so far is that there are some who have said it is a matter of ideology on their part, spending limits are wrong, and we cannot be for any campaign finance reform effort that has any limit on spending. If your problem is too much money coming into the system and too much money flowing in from special interest, if the problem is too much money, how can you solve the problem when you say we will not do anything about how much money is coming into the system?

Mr. President, as I said before, that is like saying, oh, yes, we deplore the disease. We hope the doctors will do research into how we can cure this disease, but we forbid you to cure the patient. Like the mother who said to her daughter one day, "You can go swimming. Yes, you can go swimming, but I forbid you to go near the water."

That is exactly what it is like. To say we can have campaign finance reform but do nothing to stop the money chase, to do nothing to limit the flow of hundreds of millions of dollars in all forms into the political process is simply saying we do not want to have campaign finance reform.

You can throw up smoke screens about other subjects. We all know the Supreme Court decision. The Supreme Court decision says for you to have spending limits, they have to be voluntary. You cannot just pass along and say here it is, every candidate will spend no more than x dollars.

The Supreme Court tells us we cannot do that. I happen to think the Supreme Court decision is wrong. Like it or not there is the Supreme Court decision.

So we have to craft a bill that gives enough incentives to candidates that they will accept spending limits on a voluntary basis. That is what we have had to do with this bill, and we are perfectly willing to work with those on the other side of the aisle, those who have other suggestions as to how we can keep the cost of those incentives to the bare minimum. But virtually any cost is a bargain in terms of cleaning up the Government process and returning it back to the people and putting a limit on runaway spending. There are many people who are recognizing it on both sides of the aisle.

It was my privilege when Senator Goldwater, the Senator from Arizona, a person who is not a member of my party but a person for whom, since I was in college, I had enormous respect for and for his integrity, there is a person whether you agreed with him or did not—and as a Democrat I did not always agree with him—but whether you agreed with him or not, there was a person of morale courage and character. Barry Goldwater did not leave you in doubt about where he stood. It was a privilege for me to be able to work with him introducing some of the early legislation to try to stop this money chase in American politics.

It was a privilege for me to be able to work with people like John Stennis who for so many years served as the Senator from Mississippi in this body. I remember Senator Stennis with great emotion in his voice talked about the changes that he had seen in American politics. He said "When I came here it was the people back home who sent me. It was the people back home who decided whether or not I stayed. It was the people back home who, when they came into this building, they looked up with awe and felt it was theirs." And he said, "How I have seen the period of time in which more and more it does not seem to belong to anymore." It seems to belong to those people who can hold the $9 million fundraisers like last night, in one night, or even for Senate candidates several-hundred-thousand-dollar fundraisers that can be held in one night.

As I have said, it is not really that the Members want it. It is not really that those Senators who have a half-million-dollar fundraiser in one night, for the most part I bet most of them go home—I know how I feel about it—you are relieved to have raised the money because you need the money to run a successful campaign as long as our system remains as it is. But you do not feel good about it. You do not feel good about having to raise it and how you have to raise it. We all know it needs to be changed.

It is not just Democrats. I was very pleased to read a release today:

Republican congressional alumni urge Bush to sign campaign finance reform. Sixteen former Senators and Representatives say bill would reinvigorate electoral competition and restore public trust in Government.

Sixteen Republican congressional alumni. I applaud them for speaking out because this bill was not written to favor Democrats or to hurt Republicans or vice versa.

I remember the first time that Senator Goldwater and I introduced our bill. Tuesday came, and on Tuesday's when we have our caucus luncheons and all Democrats go to one room and all Republicans go to another and have lunch together to discuss what is going on, they discussed our bill, the Goldwater-Boren bill.

I saw Barry Goldwater after the lunches broke up and he was shaking his head. It never took a lot to sort of get him down. I had never seen him look so agitated and kind of downcast. I am sure he saw the same look on my face. I said, "What happened, Barry?" He said, "Well, you wouldn't believe it." He said, "They closed the doors of the Republican caucus and they just beat me over the head for an hour and a half. They said, 'How in the world could you get tricked by Boren into co-sponsoring a bill introduced by the Democrats in the way to finance campaigns?'"

I said, "Well, Senator Goldwater, it is pretty amusing; I look as beaten up as you do because when the doors closed on our caucus my colleagues jumped on me and said, 'How could you have been so naive as to let Barry Goldwater sign you on to a bill that was a Republican plot to help the Republicans?'"

We agreed that it was just too bad that we could not have piped the sound of the two caucuses into each other's room so the Republicans could have heard those Democrats who were yelling about me being for a Republican bill, that this was all a Democratic plot. At least that was the way it was presented in the Republican Cloakroom.

That is one of the problems around here. We have to find a way to start trusting each other a little more and once in a while surprising everybody. I remember President Truman had a favorite quote from Mark Twain hanging in the Oval Office the whole time he was President of the United States and that quote from Mark Twain said, "Always do right. It will gratify some people and astonish the rest." It is time for us to start astonishing some people, start trusting each other as Democrats and Republicans, and work in the national interest.

I am very grateful to these 16 Republicans, and they are people of real stature in the Republican Party and in the life of the Nation; people like former Senator Gurney; former Senator McC. Mathias, with whom so many of us had the privilege of serving; former Senator Bob Stafford, known very well to all of us; Senator Hugh Scott, who was the Republican leader of the Senate for many, many years; distinguished Members on the Republican side from the House of Representatives: John Buchanan, Paul Findley, Gilbert Gude, and many many others; Newton Steers, Tom Railsback.

I want to read to you their letter, the letter from these 16 Republican alumni of the House and Senate. They are not running for office anymore. They are not worried about scoring political points for themselves. These are 16 people who happen to be Republicans, who served in the Congress of the United States, who love their country and have but one motivation at this point in time to speak out, and that is the good of the country.

Here is their letter. Here is the letter that these 16 signed, that letter to the President. I ask unanimous consent it be placed in the RECORD, including the signatures and names of all the 16 former Members of Congress who signed it.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

APRIL 28, 1992.

HON. GEORGE BUSH,
President of the United States, The White House, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: As Republican alumni of the Congress, we urge you to sign the comprehensive campaign finance reform legislation making its way to your desk this week. Such legislation is necessary to level the playing field for credible challengers and to restore a measure of fairness and decency to our electoral process.

The public perceives that the current system isn't fair to taxpayers because special-interest campaign contributors get special treatment. And it isn't fair to voters because the overwhelming advantage incumbents have over challengers prevents competitive elections.

To address these problems, Congress has now passed comprehensive reform legislation which would establish voluntary spending limits, restrict special interest PAC contributions, provide partial public financing to credible candidates and end the "soft money" system that permits federally illegal contributions to be funnelled through state parties in order to influence federal elections.

We are aware that you have expressed concern over the use of public funds in congressional campaigns and the impact of spending limits on congressional challengers. We believe that the presidential public financing system has conferred enormous benefits on presidential politics since the Watergate era and that the public funding provisions in this reform legislation would inject an equally important source of "clean" money into today's congressional campaigns. Additionally, we are convinced that campaign spending must be brought under control and that challengers would be the principal beneficiaries of a level campaign playing field.

This legislation, while not perfect, would do much to reinvigorate electoral competition and restore public trust in government. We urge you to sign it into law when it reaches your desk.

Sincerely,

Sen. Edward J. Gurney, Sen. Charles McC. Mathias, Sen. Hugh Scott, Hon. Abner W. Sibal, Hon. John N. Erlenborn, Hon. Paul A. Fino, Hon. Robert P. Hanrahan, Hon. Ernest L. Konnyu, Hon. Thomas F. Railsback, Hon. Newton I. Steers, Sen. Robert T. Stafford, Hon. John H. Buchanan, Hon. Paul Findley, Hon. Gilbert Gude, Hon. Harry G.

Haskell, Hon. Richard W. Mallary, Hon. Charlotte T. Reid.

Mr. BOREN. I thank the Presiding Officer. I want to now read a portion of this letter from the 16 Republicans.

In addition, as I indicated yesterday, 32 past and present Republican candidates for Congress from 22 States called upon President Bush to sign landmark congressional campaign finance reform legislation recently passed by the House, according to a letter released by the citizens action group Public Citizen. I quote their press release quoting the letter.

As congressional challengers and loyal Republicans, we urge you to sign the campaign finance reform legislation making its way to your desk this year.

The challengers said:

Such legislation is necessary to level the playing field for credible challengers and to restore a measure of fairness to our legislative process.

So, Mr. President, this is not a bill about conveying an advantage on Democrats. Obviously, these Republicans who ran for Congress did not think so. They were challengers. It is not a bill to restore an advantage to Republicans either. But it is a bill that will stop the advantage, that will stop the advantage that incumbents now have.

The single biggest advantage—and we focus on some of the items—perks we call them—gives advantage to incumbents. We talk about the franking privilege, for example, the free mailing. I happen to be one of those who several years ago did away with mass mailings to my constituents. I did away with the newsletters that were nothing but paid political advertisements filled with photographs of myself, as other Members of Congress have done before, doing good deeds, campaign advertising paid for by the taxpayers sent out across the country at vast and enormous expense.

It is very interesting. I did not get a single letter of complaint. Not one citizen wrote to me when I stopped sending newsletters 8 or 9 years ago saying "Senator, we are distraught. We missed your newsletter this month. When are you going to start sending them again?" In fact, somehow it made its way into print that we had saved about $900,000 by not sending them that newsletter. It did not hurt their feelings one bit.

When we think about the things that are often talked about in terms of giving advantage—and I see the distinguished chairman of the Rules Committee, the senior Senator from Kentucky, on the floor. He has been one of those who has led the way in reducing some of those benefits to incumbents and reducing mass mailing, for example, and getting control of some of the spending by incumbents and giving them advantage. You can add up all those things that are often talked about, the mailing privileges, and all the rest.

They are very small in terms of the benefit they give to incumbents when compared to the huge advantage given to the incumbents by the absence of spending limits in campaigns, because that is where the real advantage is. When incumbents can raise 8 times as much as challengers, when incumbents can get $25 from PAC's for every $1 given to challengers, this is where the advantage is.

People have said to me, members of the press have come up to me, as they have for the last 9 years since we have been trying to pass this bill—Mr. President, I do not want it written on my tombstone: He tried to pass campaign finance reform. It has been 9 years. I want written on it: It passed.

But every year that we have tried. I have members of the press come to me and say, kind of with a smile: Oh, Senator, how do you think you are going to convince the Congress to pass a bill to change the current system when the current system gives them such an advantage? How are you going to talk a group that is able to raise eight times as much as their challengers into voting for a bill that would limit their right to that spending and that fundraising? How in the world do you think, human nature being what it is, you are going to get your colleagues to vote for real reform like that?

Mr. President, maybe it is naive to say it, but I believe there are still Members of this body that are concerned about doing something for the country and the process, that are proud to be trustees of that know that this institution is more important than the political survival or the political careers of any of us as individuals. I believe they know it.

So I am depending upon a certain element of statesmanship that I do not believe has totally vanished from the American scene. I hope not. I know enough of my colleagues who do care to know that there are a sizable number of them that will decide to vote for or against this legislation based upon what they think is right for the country.

Frankly, Mr. President, I am hoping that the people are going to be heard from, the 80 percent who, in that poll, said they think Congress is doing a poor job; the 71 percent who think we are owned and controlled by special interests because of the power of money in politics.

Mr. President, I am counting on the people to be heard from. If those 80 percent who think that Congress is doing a bad job, those 71 percent who have the impression that Congress is controlled by the special interests because of the power of money in American politics, will write the Members and call the Members of Congress, and will say, "You are going to vote tomorrow. Vote to stop the money chase; vote to limit spending; vote to cut the amount from political action committees in half; vote to close the soft-money loophole. Take action; do it." If they will add to their letters, "We are going to hold you accountable if you do not," I am confident that this democracy still works well enough that the voice of the people, if the people care, will make a difference. That is the test. That is the test.

I appeal to the American people. This is your system. Care enough to take the time to call or write the Members of Congress who should be representing you and tell them that you want campaign finance reform.

Write the President. Call the President. If we are fortunate enough to get this bill out of the U.S. Senate and send it on to the President's desk—it has already passed the House—whether you are a Democrat or a Republican, let the President know you want it signed.

If you are a Republican, join these 16 distinguished former Republican Members of Congress. They cared enough to write a letter to their President, 16 former Republican Members of Congress. They took the time to write their President urging him to sign this bill.

Whether you are a Democrat or a Republican or an independent, it is time for the American people to be heard from and say: We have had enough of the money chase. Let us stop it. Let us do something to put a stop to it.

In newspaper after newspaper across the country, editorials have come out in recent days. On April 19, in the Milwaukee Journal, for example, here is what they had to say:

Go ahead and rail at House members who until recently could bounce checks with impunity at their private bank; they deserve, the rap. But give the entire Congress credit for moving to clean up a much bigger scandal: the putrid campaign-finance system. If George Bush wanted to look truly presidential, he's sign on to the cause.

Alas, Bush threatens to veto a House-passed measure viewed as the most significant anti-corruption legislation since Watergate. The bill, the product of a House-Senate conference committee, limits spending.

It goes on to specify—the editorial describes the rest of the bill as I have previously described it. It continues:

The measure isn't perfect. The ceilings themselves are higher than many candidates already spend. And Congress cravenly failed to say where the money for expanded public financing would come from.

Still, as reforms go, this is a biggie. And the objections of Bush and other Republicans don't stand up under scrutiny. They argue, for example, that taxpayers shouldn't have to finance elections. But as Common Cause points out, Bush himself has used more than $200 million in public funds since 1980 to finance his campaigns for vice president and president. Why is what's good for a White House campaign bad for a congressional race? Why isn't the cause of cleaner elections worth a public investment?

As for the GOP claim that spending limits would only help incumbents, if anything the opposite is true. Incumbents already have a gaint fund-raising advantage. The new limits would help level the playing field.

Sad to say, if Bush makes good on his wrongheaded veto threat, there won't be enough votes in either house for an override. The president doubtless will go on making political hay out of congressional corruption. But voters oughtn't to be fooled: Bush will have had his chance to clean up the squalid fund-raising system he professes to deplore, and he will have blown it.

The Tennessean newspaper from Nashville says much the same thing.

This nation shouldn't have to wait until another scandal shames Congress to get campaign reform. The bill now on the table reduces the clout of money on the political system. Its most ardent supporters should be the people who are tired of seeing special interests get special treatment.

Its most ardent supporters should be the people themselves.

Big money is corrupting the political process. President Bush might believe that the status quo is just fine. After all, he's done just fine in the current system.

And I might add, so have most of the incumbent Members of Congress, Democrat and Republican, done fine, because incumbents were able to raise the money. The editorial concludes:

But he should know that most people think it stinks, and he should know that most people are looking for change, not excuses.

The time has come for us to act. This is a bill that does not seek to give partisan advantage; this is a bill that seeks to clean up this rotten system. It is time for us to pass it. It is time for the President to sign it so we can create a political climate in this country that will enable us to tackle those problems we desperately need to face: Reducing the budget deficits, changing our tax laws to make us more competitive, and improving our educational system to prepare our children for the challenges that face them in the next century.

Mr. President, it is time for us to pass S. 3, the campaign finance reform bill. It is time for the President of the United States to sign it into law. It is time for us to take the most important step we could possibly take: To return this institution to the control of the people, and to restore the trust of the American people back in the Congress and in their political institutions once again.

Mr. FORD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky is recognized.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, yesterday, the Senate began consideration of the conference report on campaign finance reform. I believe that the conference report makes great strides toward reaching our stated goal of establishing meaningful campaign finance reform. It is a report that deserves to be passed by this Congress and signed into law by the President.

Throughout the consideration of this issue, I have stated repeatedly that meaningful campaign finance reform must establish spending limits. We must put an end to the money chase and limit the influence of special interests.

It is clear that the money chase is not being reduced. It is getting bigger.

Mr. President, each election cycle shows that spending for Senate elections is continually rising. In the 1990 elections, the average cost for a winning Senate incumbent was $4.5 million. In the 1988 elections it was $4 million. This reflects a 12 percent increase over the 1988 elections.

It should be no surprise that successful Senate candidates were able to outspend their opponents. In the 1990 elections, incumbents outraised challengers by a ratio of nearly 3 to 1. Thirty-two incumbents raised a total $144.5 million. Senate challengers raised $49.5 million. The present system is not fair and does not present a level playing field for challengers.

Mr. President, critics of this campaign finance reform report argue that spending limits will only protect incumbents and harm challengers. But the data proves otherwise.

In the 1990 elections, in 28 races where an incumbent faced a major-party challenger, 26 of those incumbents outraised and outspent their challengers. Incumbents raised $4.9 million each, while their challengers raised $1.8 million. Incumbents received 24 percent of their contributions from PAC's while challengers only received 15 percent from PAC's. And, incumbents spent $4.5 million, while their challengers spend $1.7 million.

Mr. President, this is not an incumbent protection bill.

Opponents to campaign finance reform argue that in the 1990 elections, spending actually declined. But these critics overlook important factors. There were no Senate elections in some of the highly populated States, such as California, New York, Florida, Pennsylvania, and Ohio. Senate campaigns in these States are usually among the most expensive.

One way to look at election spending data is to compare the costs per voting age population. In the 1990 elections, the cost per voting age population was $1.70 per voter. That is almost 2½ times more than in 1980, when the cost per voting age population was 60 cents per voter.

And the facts show that the money chase is already on for the 1992 elections. Based on the FEC's year end data for 1991, receipts for congressional campaigns increased by $31.8 million compared to the same period in the 1990 elections. Senate and House candidates raised $159.9 million and spent $89.9 million in 1991, and entered the election year with cash on hand of $159.7 million.

Senate incumbents have raised a total of $43.6 million: $1.4 million each. Senate challengers have raised $17.8 million.

Now, more than ever, we need to put a cap on spending.

But that is not enough, Mr. President. Merely putting a cap on spending is not going to end the perception that our campaign finance system is seriously flawed. We must also put an end to the influence of special interests. This conference report takes important steps to minimize special interests' influence.

First, the conference report places an overall cap on the amount of PAC money that House and Senate candidates may accept. The conference report limits Senate candidates to an amount equal to 20 percent of the election cycle limit, a minimum of $375,000 and a maximum of $825,000. Moreover, the conference report reduces the amount that PAC's can give to Senate candidates from $5,000 to $2,500.

President Bush and others have called for the elimination of so-called special interest PAC's. But let's be honest. The President's own proposal did not call for the elimination of all PAC's. His proposal would permit non-connected, ideological PAC's to continue.

Mr. President, the conference report treats all PAC's alike. And I think that regardless of which side of the aisle you stand, everyone recognizes that the total elimination of PAC's raises legal and constitutional concerns. Many of the campaign finance proposals, Democratic and Republican, included some form of fallback provision.

There are other areas of reform which need to be addressed if we are going to limit the influences of contributions. These are bundling and soft money.

We need to end the practice of bundling, where an individual like a corporate executive can wield an undue influence because of the bundling of contributions.

Recently, the Washington Post ran a series of articles which highlighted the issue of bundling. These articles demonstrate very clearly that the system which permits bundling is seriously eroding the confidence of the American people in the way our Government operates.

It seems very clear that a system which encourages people to engage in fundraising activities for the purposes of seeking special treatment or influence in decisionmaking needs to be addressed.

The conference report severely restricts the practice of bundling. With a few limited exceptions, the conference report prohibits executives, lobbyists, sole proprietorships, and partnerships, from bundling contributions.

Another area that has seriously undermined the political system is soft money. If there is one particular subject on which we can all agree, it is that we must end the practice of funneling money to State and local parties as a means of evading the Federal limits.

The conference report prohibits the use of soft money to be used during the Federal election period. Under the terms of the conference report, State and local parties could only use hard money during the Federal election period. This period begins on June 1, and in a Presidential election year on April 1.

Not only does the conference report ban the use of soft money to be used to influence a Federal election, but it prohibits any Federal candidate or any Federal officeholder from raising soft money contributions.

Mr. President, this is tough medicine. As the distinguished majority leader has noted, this is one of the strongest reform bills ever considered by the Congress.

This is a bill that deserves the attention and consideration of every Member. It is a bill that deserves to be passed by the Senate. And most importantly, it is a bill that must be signed by the President.

Mr. President, as we begin this debate, there is one basic point that should not be missed. It is the point that has driven the debate on this issue. And while each side accuses the other of attempting to seek partisan advantage, it is the same fundamental point that has motivated us all.

The point is very simple: the American public is growing increasingly cynical about this institution. The American public is cynical about how we are elected, how we work to stay here, and how we spend our time once we get here. For those of us who have been here for a few years, for those of us who feel some responsibility for the image of this institution, we feel very deeply that something must be done now to address the current system of campaign finance.

The American people want us in Washington to do something about the problems confronting our Nation. Now is our chance to show them that we are listening. We must take the steps of establishing a framework for financing congressional elections that will inspire public confidence and restore our reputation as truly the representative body of the American people. This is our opportunity. Now is the time.

Mr. President, two or three things have been said on this floor during this debate that I take a little exception to. One is they did not like the way the conference committee was run. I happened to be chairman of that conference committee. I thought we did a decent job. I only did what I talked to my colleagues about.

Those on the other side said: You have enough votes to pass whatever you want to; let us go ahead and get it over with. And the President is going to veto it anyhow.

It gets a little bit frustrating around this institution when you work hard and you put something together that you believe is in the best interests of the political climate in this country, that you believe is in the best interests of improving the integrity and character of this institution, and you know it is going to be vetoed. And the 34 votes, or whatever is necessary on this side, will walk like sheep because the President is opposed to it.

We have heard two or three things today that I think are important, Mr. President. One, the President is against public financing. Yet, he will be the largest recipient of taxpayers' dollars to run a political campaign of any individual in the history of this country, $200 million by the end of this campaign.

Then, he also is concerned about the so-called soft money that we will be eliminating, what the press refers to as sewer money. I have heard that from the other side, sewer money. But yet, the President received, in 1988, 249 $100,000 individual contributions. It would be surprising, if you go look at that list of 249 names that would be there. They would be a little bit startling, I think. And hopefully, we can get all of those revealed before the vote on tomorrow afternoon.

Then we hear a lot about challengers. As my friend from Oklahoma, Senator BOREN, has said—he quoted the Republican challengers, the Republican challengers that have written the President a letter; I think 30-some-odd Republican challengers from 21 States, that have said to the President: Sign this bill. We have been there. We have been through the trials and tribulations. And they say: Sign this bill. We think it is in the best interests of challengers.

Well, you will find a few exceptions to the rules where challengers were able to win. But here is a massive group of those that have been out in the grassroots fighting for election, and they are saying to their President: Please sign this bill.

Republican candidates call on the President, and they say emphatically sign this bill.

I think that challengers have the most to gain from this legislation. They say: "Why are you going to do that? You are an incumbent." I think it is the right thing to do. Others will take the opposite view, and they feel it is the right thing to do. When you talk to your constituents, they want to limit the expenditure of funds during a campaign. We have lost that personal-issue touch with our constituents. We are raising so much money that we get on TV and hire people to go door to door. We hire telephone banks, we hire pollsters, and we hire PR firms because we have the money. As prices go up, we raise more.

I doubt seriously in this campaign, Mr. President, that I will raise more than will be authorized under this piece of legislation for my campaign this year in Kentucky. Yes, I have raised some PAC money. Yes, I have over 2,000 individual contributors so far, and I will have more.

I had a little situation in my State where we had a Governor race, and that was a very expensive race, and a lot of money was raised. They passed a bill that goes into effect on July 1. In regard to what is happening down there, the legislature did pass a bill, in my opinion, that will be helpful to the future.

I quote from the Washington Post, Mr. President, from this letter that was signed by Republican House challengers:

As congressional challengers and loyal Republicans—

I underscore that—we urge you to sign the comprehensive campaign finance reform legislation making its way to your desk—

They are the ones that have been in the fight; they are the ones that had to be out there in the challenge. So I also quote:

Such legislation is necessary to level the playing field for credible challengers and to restore a measure of fairness to our electoral process.

Restore a measure of fairness.

They say we are on the white horse and we have our eyes on the White House and that sort of thing; we are trying to look good because we know the President is not going to sign it.

Well, I hope that the President might fool us all and sign it, but those on the other side are convinced that he will not. When the Republican National Committee was asked about their response to this letter, the RNC spokesman said the challengers are off base. Off base, Mr. President, because they want some kind of level playing field and restored fairness to the political process. The President's own party members see that this bill will level the playing field, it will restore fairness, it will restore competitiveness to the election process.

I think the President is well advised by these loyal Republicans, as they say they are, to sign this legislation. I hope that he is listening—I hope that he read the letter—and, if not to this debate, then to those of his own party that admonish him to sign this piece of legislation.

Mr. President, there are a lot of editorials that you can read. But if you go back and talk to your constituency, they are the ones who feel so strongly about this. I hope that when we pass this bill tomorrow, the President will consider this letter from these 33 past and present challengers from 21 States that wrote to the President saying that such legislation as this is necessary to restore a measure of fairness to our political system.

Mr. President, I ask my colleagues to join with those of us who support this legislation. You can always find something unfair about everything. I remember a lawyer—I am not one—turned around and said, "What should we do on this?" The other lawyer said, "Go either way, and we will make one heck of a case out of it." I think that is really what you can do here; but you have to come down on the side of fairness and of trying to restore some integrity to the political process in this country, and you have to come down on the side of what I believe the constituents in my State and others want.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. McCONNELL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. McCONNELL. A couple of quick observations because we have other speakers here. In terms of views of people of my State, Kentucky, on the issues currently before us here on the Senate floor, we have a pretty good indication, because a bluegrass poll recently taken by the Courier-Journal in Kentucky indicates that 65 percent of the people in Kentucky oppose Federal funding of political campaigns; 65 percent against, only 29 percent for.

In addition to that, we have further evidence about how the people of Kentucky feel about their tax dollars being used for political campaigns. Out of all the 50 States, in terms of the taxpayers who choose to check off $1 of taxes they already owe to divert to political campaigns for the Presidential race, Kentucky is next to last. Only 10 percent of the taxpayers in Kentucky check off to divert $1 of taxes they already owe—it does not add anything to their bill—into the Presidential election campaign fund.

So it is pretty clear, not only from the bluegrass poll, but the real poll taken every April 15 when the taxpayers of Kentucky have an opportunity to check off, that they have little or no enthusiasm for having their tax dollars spent on political campaigns.

I see a number of Senators are here ready to speak.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, since Kentucky was used here—and I might just say that my good friend when he talks about the checkoff, that there is no comprehensive legislation for that money to go to as it relates to this, and he is down there and admonished the people in the Kentucky legislature not to pass their reform bill and they did overwhelmingly and most of the Republicans voted for it.

So I think when you go down to Kentucky and you look at the reception that those who are opposed to campaign finance reform have received, and then the final vote on campaign reform in our State, it reflects basically what the people have—the Mason-Dixon poll—no better than the one taken in 1984—then this one is not much better. So we cannot rely on it, a 22-point advantage on the Mason-Dixon poll.

Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, not to continue this too much longer, but to correct the Record, only one Republican in the State legislature voted for the final piece of legislation.

Mr. FORD. They voted for all the amendments.

Mr. McCONNELL. My colleague refers to—it was a straight party line vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LIEBERMAN.) The Senator from Colorado [Mr. WIRTH] is recognized.

Mr. WIRTH. Thank you very much, Mr. President.

I am very pleased the campaign finance reform legislation is finally back on the floor. This is an issue with which some of us came in and are going out.

After Watergate, in 1974, one of the most important issues facing the country was the return of integrity to the political process, return of integrity to the process of the Presidency of the United States and the Congress. The country got together and passed a very comprehensive bill to clean up how money is raised for Presidential elections—a previously scandalous system in which a handful of people had an enormous amount of influence in the White House because of ability to effectively purchase political outcomes.

That got changed in 1974. We put a limit on the amount of money we spent and set up a shared public/private way of financing Presidential campaigns. It was a right thing to do and for the most part has worked very well.

Why did we not do that for the Congress? I do not know. I was not here at the time. It was a great shame we did not, because at that point we had an opportunity to sort out the problems that are still with us today. Unfortunately, we did not do so. So all the money that used to go into Presidential campaigns fell into the vacuum still present in congressional elections.

We have seen the cost of congressional elections go up dramatically during the last 18 years. It has gotten to cancerous proportions, but now we have an opportunity to begin to eliminate it. This bill, in my opinion, does not go nearly far enough. It is sort of a faint echo of what we ought to do. At least it is a step in the right direction of admitting there is a very serious problem out there.

What kind of problem are we talking about, Mr. President? There have been lots of illustrations of this in the debate on the floor in the last 24 hours. Let me provide another one.

Today the President of the United States, George Bush, who, as has been pointed out, has received more public funding for Federal elections than anybody else in our Nation's history, followed up again on a promise that he had made in the State of the Union Address. That was somehow to get after those big, bad regulators at the Federal level whom he is boss of for the last 3½ years, obviously not watching what they were doing. He is now shocked and horrified to find out what the regulators are doing in drafting regulations to implement Federal law. So with a great deal of fanfare today the President has said we are going to have a further 90-day moratorium on regulations. I am going to be out there beating on this bureaucracy which I am the head of, by the way; I am going to beat up on the bureaucracy on behalf of the people in the United States.

On behalf of whom? Let us take a look at what the President is doing today. With this moratorium he is, for example, halting the identification of rare plants and animals under the Endangered Species Act.

We have been concerned for a long time about biodiversity. Our pharmaceutical industry is now one of the leading industries in the world, in large part because it is able to plumb the incredible richness of biodiversity. But the administration is out there saying, "Hey, we are going to halt the identification of rare plants and animals." They are going to do this in the name of some kind of regulatory reform.

Nonsense. There are interests that aren't the public's interest behind this, Mr. President, and that is why he is doing it.

He is going to delay the rules to carry out the Clean Air Act. George Bush has been out there advertising to the country that we have this Clean Air Act. He proposed one in 1989. It was a good act, by the way, when he proposed it. It went through here and all kinds of compromises, and he is going to be out boasting about the Clean Air Act for the rest of the election. Bet on that. He will not be telling the people he is delaying the rules to carry out the Clean Air Act. The act is toothless without letting people know how it should be implemented.

Why is he doing that? There is somebody behind that as well, Mr. President. He is restricting the ability to stop the ravages of our forests. We are out there all across public lands in the United States, spending tens of millions of taxpayer dollars, to subsidize the tearing down of our national forests—perhaps the single most mindless item in the Federal Government.

The program is going to shave it away so it is going to be more difficult for citizen groups to challenge the ravaging of national forests. Why is he doing that? Somebody is behind that as well, Mr. President.

The 90-day moratorium limits the ability to protect workers against the exposure to chemicals and toxics. As we are learning about toxics and chemicals, one of the things we ought to understand, it seems to me, is that these can be very, very damaging to human beings.

You get exposed to chemicals, you get exposed to heavy metals and various toxic substances. We don't know what that does to a person, so we ought to be protecting workers against these substances. That is the logical thing to do. A little bit of protection today will save an enormous amount of money in the future particularly with rapidly rising health care costs.

But the President is going to limit our ability to protect workers from this. Who is for that? Somebody's behind that as well, isn't there?

We are going to relax the biotechnology safety rules for producing living, genetically altered substances. We are in the laboratory developing a whole variety of new biotechnology, new genetically altered substances and releasing them in the environment.

Should we be careful about that and wait and make sure we know what in fact we are all exposing? Of course. Any rational individual would say we ought to be careful about that. But this moratorium is going to relax all of these rules. Somebody's behind that.

The moratorium postpones the deadline for food producers to label products with nutritional information. Presumably we are concerned in the United States about making sure that people can know what it is that they are buying and what they are consuming. More and more Americans are concerned about wellness, and with good reason. More and more persons are taking the responsibility to take better care of themselves. One of the ways to do that is to know what is in a food product. And there are requirements in the law that says those food products ought to be labeled, but we are going to postpone the deadline for that kind of labeling.

Whose interest is that? Somebody's behind that one as well, Mr. President.

The moratorium, also lifts some of the barriers between commercial banking and investment banking. And presumably this moratorium is going to make it easier for commercial bankers to get into investment banking. We have just been through the S&L scandal. I think everybody here has gone through the pain of watching this hit-or-miss runaway financial services market in which we deregulated the savings and loan industry.

Ronald Reagan told in the Garn-St Germain bill, he hit the jackpot. He hit the jackpot already for hundreds of dollars, billions of dollars the American taxpayer is paying because we relaxed the rules. We took taxpayer-subsidized money, taxpayer-guaranteed deposits and let these S&L operators run away with them in all kinds of cockamammy investments.

But now what are we going to do? We are going to do the same thing all over again, going to relax the rules between commercial banking and investment banking.

We have just been through that. We just learned that lesson. Why are we doing this? There is somebody behind that one, is there not?

In each and every one of these situations, Mr. President—in each and every one of these—there is a powerful interest group out there spending an enormous amount of money—probably at dinners like last night's, or dinners like the ones that have been held by Democrats as well—vast interests who are out there attempting to purchase political outcomes; and being very successful in doing so.

Who is trying to get rid of the Endangered Species Act? Who is trying to gut the Clean Air Act? Who is trying to stop us from tearing down the rain forests? Who is trying to say let us tear it down some more? Who is trying to continue the exposure of workers to chemicals and toxics? The whole business of biotechnology, all of these new living genetically altered substances going out into our air, land, and water, who wants to do that and not protect the public against potential abuses? Who does not want to label food for nutritional purposes? Who wants to break down the barrier between commercial banking and investment banking?

Do you think President Bush's proposals are being altered in the interest of the average individuals in the United States? Hardly. The average individuals are the ones who are increasingly alienated by a system in which some are able to come in and purchase those political outcomes.

And that is what campaign finance reform is all about. We must halt the abuse of power by interests in this country who are taking advantage of the system. They see the opportunity, so they use it. We have the chance, here, to get rid of a great deal of this abuse. Yet we hear: "Well, you cannot do that."

People in this country know what is going on and that ours is a terrible and bankrupt system. I suggest that what we are seeing today in this moratorium on regulations is simply the trough for a whole variety of interests who now have the opportunity to get in and make sure their chits are called in.

For each and every one of us as well, this is not only a terrible system, it is one that is fundamentally wrong to the political process. Those who have to go around cup in hand, city after city after city, raising phenomenal amounts of money, spending a great deal of time, vast amounts of our time, during a campaign where we ought to be talking about ideas.

We ought to be talking about differences with our opponents. We ought to be talking about a whole variety of substantive things that make the country work, or should make the country work, or limit the ability to make the country to grow. We are not doing that. We are out embarking upon this massive income-transfer program, income transfer from donors to campaigns—take the money from those donors and in effect give it to television stations.

We are out, occasioning that and being the broker in that income-transfer program. That is wrong in terms of the level of debate, as to what goes on. The people we spend most of our time with are people who are way up there, in terms of income category, who can afford to get into this game. Everybody else is effectively left out of this game.

In addition, the level of debate in this institution and elsewhere is lowered with each passing year. Members are scared of the power of money. Members are frightened to take on these interests. That is what is going on here. We all know it. Nobody will admit it but it is exactly the case.

What happens? You get out and you take on a group with an amendment or a particular piece of legislation, you take one of those groups on and what are you thinking about all the time that you do that? You are thinking, if I push too hard over here what they are going to do, maybe they are not going to give me that PAC contribution. Maybe the executives are not going to get together around the boardroom table and make contributions of $10,000, or $15,000, or $20,000 to my campaign, so maybe I should be more gentle on them because I have to, in this rush to gain money. What I have to do is get those contributions to come in. That is one level of fear.

There is another level, a second level of fear which is a bit deeper. If I really go after that group maybe not only will that contribution not come to me, maybe that contribution will go to the other guy. That sort of doubly compounds the problem of doing the aggressive public business we ought to be doing.

So the pressure of that money not only is negative, it might not come to me, it gets worse because it will go to the other guy, therefore doubling the penalty. And worst of all, the thing that can happen is maybe, oh, devilishly horrible thing, what will happen is that money will take the form of so-called independent expenditures.

The reality of the situation is this—along with not contributing to you, they may give money to the other guy, but they will go out and run these terrible negative third party campaigns that are so-called independent, unconnected from what the regular candidates are doing.

Where is a perfect example of that? Probably the most egregious example is the National Rifle Association. The NRA is probably the best example of an interest group in the country that is very narrow in size, but because it is able to generate this kind of political fear, because as a very narrow interest group it is able to go out and spend in a negative way, it has power far beyond its legitimate stake in this society. It is a perfect example.

And what happens? Here we are, where a huge percentage of the American public supports a waiting period, to buy a handgun and where you can find very few people in this society who can give you a reasonable argument as to why we ought to sell assault weapons in the hardware stores and sporting goods stores—maybe they believe someday we are going to put in, after the black powder season, and the archery season, and the hunting season, we are going to have an assaulting season so we can all go out and get an assault weapon. Legislators fear opposing the few and supporting what most of America believes because the power the NRA may have against them is so great. This is the perfect example of an enormous abuse that comes in by the ability to collect and spend money to focus on an agenda that is out of the mainstream.

The level of debate is reduced. The level of the ability of this institution to respond is reduced as well.

The final point I want to make relates this, as well, to this so-called term limitation movement. In my opinion this term limitation movement is one of the most undemocratic ideas that has ever come along. Why is it that people in one part of a State presume they can tell people in another part of the State who it is they can vote for as their Congressperson; or people in one State can tell somebody in another State who can be their Senator? That ought to be up to the people in that State to decide, who is going to be their Senator, who is going to be their Congressman, not some kind of arrogating of that responsibility by some broad group overall.

That is up to citizens to make that decision. That is what the democratic process is all about. It is not somebody else, not some anonymous group, or whatever it is, but citizens in that district, or citizens in that State who ought to be able to make the decision as to who is and who is not going to represent them.

But we have this term limitation approach. Why? Because what has happened in this whole campaign finance system is that incumbents have such an advantage, so locked in with all of the advantages of being able to raise money, all the leverage, all the values of incumbency, all the access to the boardrooms, the access to the PAC's—incumbents have such an enormous advantage that it is very difficult for challengers to run. It is very difficult for challengers out there to take on people who are already in office.

Consequently, legislative bodies become somewhat calcified. You do not have the kind of new growth, you do not have the kind of challenge coming in, you do not have the kind of competition coming in. And competition is good in politics, as it is good every place else.

So the lack of campaign finance reform leads us to this thoroughly undemocratic notion of term limitations. Term limitations is a natural, frustrated response to the fact that non-incumbents cannot run; to the fact that there is less challenge to insiders than there ought to be.

This system is a terrible, terrible system. The one we have now is remarkably undemocratic. The one we have now, like the ones I was talking about earlier in this so-called moratorium on regulations, allows pockets of power to people with very narrow concerns who have, in effect, been able to use the system and purchase their way into this, attaining outcomes much beyond, I would suggest, their legitimate stake in this society; much beyond their legitimate voice in this society. They have been able to have that megaphone because they spent and bought it. That is wrong. It ought to be changed. This bill is a first step in the right direction, a modest step, not nearly as far as I would like to see it go and not nearly as far as most of the American people would like to see it go once they understand it. But, Mr. President, it is at least a step we ought to take.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington is recognized.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, sad, sad, sad, sad it is, that our thoughtful and distinguished and hardworking colleague, the senior Senator from Oklahoma, has been reduced to defending a bill designed purely for partisan advantage and totally ineffective to deal with the crying need for reform in the American and, most particularly, the congressional campaign system.

That Senator has devoted many years and countless hours to what I consider to be a genuine attempt to bring needed reforms to this campaign election system. That he has failed seems obvious to every objective observer. That he feels bound by the actions of his party to defend the system upsets those of us who very much wish to join with him in a bipartisan attempt to meet real needs.

As unresponsive to those real needs as was the bill which passed this Senate last year, at least it did deal with the single element of the present system which most troubles and aggravates the American people: political action committees. For all practical purposes, such committees were banned by the original Senate bill and

Members and challengers were reduced, or perhaps I believe it more appropriate to say were granted the opportunity to seek direct support for their political campaigns solely from individual contributors and from the political party to which each one of them has pledged allegiance—open campaign contributions, openly disclosed with a full background as to what they meant.

And yet we see the result of a conference committee which barely wings the political action committee, which allows them to almost their present extent with candidates for the House of Representatives and only slightly limited for candidates for the Senate but which perhaps even more irrationally sets up an entirely different election system for the two Houses of Congress.

There is no justification for that distinction, Mr. President, unless one considers as a justification for the distinction the fact that those who wrote the bill in each House did so in the way most comfortable to their own political future.

And so where at least we had made some steps forward toward a restoration of the confidence of the public in the system with respect to political action committees, this proposal before us right now relapses to a distinction without a difference.

Perhaps more significant is the failure of this proposal to deal with what has often been denominated on the floor of this Senate as "sewer money." We can perhaps be a little less pejorative and use the usual term "soft money." However we term it, that is the money unaccounted for, unlimited in the amount of its sources which goes into influencing the political system indirectly rather than directly through campaigns subject to limitations and subject to reports.

What does this bill do, Mr. President?

It deals forthrightly with that form of soft money which is least harmful, that form which goes to the two major political parties and, incidentally, to any other political party, parties which are at least broad interest groups, including wide ranges of attitudes toward the political system.

In striking contrast, however, this proposal does nothing to control, to monitor, even to discover the source and use of soft money going to narrow special interest groups. Not only does that remain as easy as it is under the present system, it will almost certainly be increased by exactly the amount of money now going to political parties which those parties will no longer be able to take.

Whatever the disgust, Mr. President, of many of our citizens with the two major political parties at the present time, at least they know in general terms what those parties stand for, at least those parties include within their bounds men and women of sometimes differing views. But to call a bill campaign reform when it not only does not discourage but positively encourages the increased use of indirect money to single interest, special interest groups is, in the view of this Senator, Mr. President, the height of hypocrisy.

We should be encouraging strong and responsible political parties, not discouraging them. It is a mark of the failure of this bill that the money siphoned or funneled through Senators by Charles Keating leading to that scandal would not be affected at all by the proposal which is before us.

Mr. President, those two failings, or either one of them alone, would be sufficient to cause the rejection of this bill.

Is it all bad? No. It does something with respect to making broadcast advertising more available to candidates with limited budgets. It slightly affects the ability of incumbents to campaign on taxpayer money through the use of mass mailings in election years, and I suspect that even my very good friend, the junior Senator from Kentucky, might be able to find other minor sections in this bill which he in his wisdom finds to be constructive steps forward.

But any bill which acts in such a partisan fashion, any bill drafted by only one political party, any bill unwilling to deal with the public perception of political action committees and the very great evil of special interest group soft money does not deserve the title of campaign reform, does not deserve the time which this Senate has devoted to it and will, I trust, swiftly and effectively be put out of its misery by the President of the United States.

I hope, and I hope fervently, that the senior Senator from Oklahoma will not abandon the cause of election reform after that successful veto. I do hope, however, that on the next such occasion there is a genuine attempt to create a bill fair between the parties, one which will restore confidence of individual citizens in our political system, one supported by the academics and outsiders who have so criticized this proposal and who have such wise counsel to offer to us in the future.

I express these hopes, Mr. President, because I am firmly convinced that only when such a course of action is followed can we actually accomplish what the people of the United States wish us to accomplish: true and effective election campaign reform.

Mr. COATS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Indiana [Mr. COATS].

Mr. COATS. Mr. President, at first this debate on the so-called Campaign Finance Reform Act appears just like any other debate over the distribution of money and power, more specifically a debate about how much of both money and power the Congress is going to award itself.

My colleagues have pointed out what I think are the serious flaws of the proposal that is currently before the Senate. I will not repeat those arguments. I want to talk about something that I think is broader than the immediate question, and that is the issue of trust. Ultimately the trust of the American people in this institution and its Members is at stake. Our ability to address issues of the day with the confidence of the American people is at stake—that we are addressing those issues in the best interests of those we serve and not those of special interests or the interests of individual members intent on perpetuating their own political careers or ambitions. Ultimately restoring that trust is perhaps the more important issue that is before us today.

I think it is fair to say that level of trust has been lost, has been squandered. There are many reasons for it.

The question before us is how can we restore that level of trust. The restoration will not come with tinkering with campaign finance laws as this bill purports to do. It will not come in what some have viewed as a cynical search for partisan advantage in the name of reform.

We are all aware of the fact that each body, the House of Representatives and the Senate, has carved out for itself a set of rules not designed, in my opinion, to bring about real reform but to find a way that, in the name of reform, we continue to perpetuate the system that exists. I do not think it will restore public trust and confidence, and I do not think it is the way in which we ought to be addressing the issue that is before us.

I would like to talk briefly today about a reform that I think is far more sweeping. It is uniform, it is fair, far more dramatic, and designed to restore public trust. I hope to speak several additional times in the future on this particular issue as we discuss ways in which we can restore public trust in the institution of Congress.

This reform is a change that really is nothing more than a return to an older and, I think, superior ideal of service and accountability to the people we represent.

Before the Civil War, it was a common American conviction that the surest way to avoid the temptations of an imperial Congress was the principle of frequent rotation in office. Americans expected a Government of citizen legislators, not career politicians. And though the principle was voluntary, the public usually got what it wanted because, during the first half of the 19th century, between 40 and 50 percent of the Congress left office after every election.

The belief in a regular congressional turnover came to America from a much older tradition. Aristotle had written that democracy was only possible when there was an exchange of "ruling and being ruled in turn." The theory is very simple. Public servants will pass better laws if they expect to have to go home and live under them. One delegate to the American Constitutional Convention warned, "By remaining in the seat of government, legislators would acquire the habits of the place which might differ from those of their constituents," and that, as we have found, was a monumental understatement.

After the Civil War the average duration of congressional service doubled and then it doubled again. It has now reached the logical conclusion in our time, a Congress of entrenched professionals who are only unseated by death, scandal or, in a few isolated cases, their own disillusionment with the way the institution is run.

In the process a wall has been constructed, a wall between citizens and legislators, a wall of endless reelection a wall that has left the body isolated from the very people it seeks to serve. One observer has commented, "Members of Congress become like the non-custodial parent in a divorced family. They have visitations, they come on holidays and weekends, they send money, but they don't live with us, and over time it becomes harder and harder to really know one another very well."

Mr. President, there are exceptions to this, and we all are aware of those exceptions. Some are serving in this body today. Obviously, a system of term limitations would require those exceptional public servants to retire, and their depth and breadth of knowledge would be missed. But I have come to conclude that the benefits from a healthy, regular rotation of citizen legislators into this body would far exceed the loss of distinguished public servants—men and women—who have not allowed that wall to be constructed, who have maintained that relationship with their constituents, who have shielded themselves from the isolation that occurs from serving in this body, from the influence of special interests, who truly can represent the best interests of the Nation and its people without bowing to the pressures of perpetuating a career in office.

But the answer, I think, is as basic as term limitations. If turnover is not voluntary, we must make it mandatory. I have introduced legislation for limited terms calling for six 2-year terms in the House, or 12 years there, and two 6-year terms in the U.S. Senate.

We all know that we already limit the terms of the President. It is a fair question to ask, if limited terms are good enough for the Presidency and Vice Presidency, should they not be good enough for the Congress?

Those public servants who serve in the House of Representatives after a 12-year period of time obviously would have the option of seeking office in the U.S. Senate. It would be a winnowing out process, moving 435 down to 33 in any one particular year in terms of Senate reelection. Able public servants who have served in the House of Representatives would be able to move on to the Senate and, if the public so chose, move on to the Vice Presidency and Presidency. But it would be a limitation. It would encourage citizen legislators. Every 2 years about 16 percent of the Congress would retire.

The goal would be a slow, gradual, but effective revolution, a revolution in the attitude of Congress and in the confidence of Americans. Our Nation would find public servants who came from the real world and planned to return there. They would find public servants who expect to live much of their productive lives under the laws and regulations that they pass and under the taxes that they might raise. They would find public servants freed from the endless campaigning of career politics, and allowed to deal with the real issues facing the American public.

They would find public servants connected to their community and its needs by experience, not just by sympathy.

This is the kind of congressional reform that would do more than shift the distribution of money and power; it would restore trust. I submit that restoring trust in this institution is absolutely essential if we are to go forward and deal with the very real problems facing this country in the decade of the nineties and beyond. Without that restoration of trust, we cannot provide answers to our health care crisis, education reforms, economic reforms, issues that face the American public. Without the confidence and trust of the American people these efforts will be just so many empty words and so many empty proposals.

Author Henry James talked of "the demoralizing influence of lavish opportunity." When opportunity and power are unlimited, the potential for abuse is high. We have proven it in the Congress. This is an institution that is both demoralized and distrusted, but the restoration of its reputation could begin in one historic moment, when the Congress supports limits on its own service.

Mr. President, after a lot of reflection, I have concluded that restoration of trust in this institution by the people of the State of Indiana which I represent can only be secured if their elected Senator has pledged that he or she, whoever it might be, is willing to serve for a time and then return to live among the people that they represent, under the laws that they have passed.

As a consequence, I pledge to the people of the State of Indiana I will serve no more than two full terms if they choose to send me here to serve that amount of time. I think it gives me a different perspective on my time here in this body. I think it is something my colleagues should seriously reflect on.

I hope that we could engage in a meaningful debate about how we can restore trust in this great institution which has provided leadership for this country for more than two centuries. But I fear that confidence and trust has been seriously eroded.

Perhaps term limits is not the only way to restore that confidence and trust. I have searched for other methods. I have introduced other legislation. But ultimately I think it comes down to whether or not the public believes that we are here to serve their interests and not our own. I think we can best convey that message to the public by stating to them that, yes, we will serve for a time, but we will be back to live with you, to live with those who sent us, under the laws that we passed, and you can have confidence that while we are here, we will be serving in the best interest of the public.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. KOHL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. KOHL].

Mr. KOHL. Thank you, Mr. President.

Mr. President, it is with mixed emotions that I rise to endorse the pending conference report on campaign finance reform. On the one hand, I am pleased that this legislation will finally be approved by the Congress. But at the same time I am discouraged by the fact that it will not become law. It is possible that, campaign finance reform is too important to be left to politicians. When it is, we get what we are about to have: a bill which will be vetoed.

We know the President will veto this bill. And he will veto it, in part, because it does the one thing I believe must be done: it sets limits on how much can be raised and spent on a political campaign.

Until that is done, candidates will have to spend too much time talking to contributors and not enough time listening to constituents. Politicians will have to spend too much time raising money and not enough time raising issues. Politicians will have to pay too much attention to the special interest groups, and not enough attention to the special needs of the people they are elected to represent. They will be part time legislators and full time fundraisers.

Jerry Brown and H. Ross Perot may not share the same political philosophy. But they do have a common political appeal to many voters: Ross Perot will fund his own campaign and Jerry Brown will return any contribution over $100. As a result, both men are able to convince voters that they will be free of special interest influence.

I know something about the power of that argument.

When I ran for the Senate in 1988, I did not take money from the special interests or the PAC's. Because I had the resources to do so, I used my own money to fund the campaign. As a result, I could tell the people of Wisconsin that I would be "nobody's Senator but yours." It was that argument, that ability to use my financial independence to establish my political credibility, that helped get me elected.

The legislation we are now considering won't give every candidate the freedom that I had. But it will reduce the amount of money anyone will need to raise. It will reduce the level of public cynicism. And it will reduce the level of political servitude created by the current system.

It does that because, first, it places an absolute limit on how much people can spend on a campaign. Currently Senate candidates need to spend almost $6 million on an average race; that means that the typical Senator has to raise almost $20,000 a week, 52 weeks a year, for 6 years just to be ready to run for reelection. While this bill does not eliminate the need to raise money, it does greatly reduce the amount of money a candidate can raise and spend.

Second, the legislation restricts the role that political action committees can play in bankrolling any campaign. PAC's have become a symbol of the power of special interests to influence legislation. A recent poll indicated that roughly 80 percent of the American people—4 out of every 5 citizens—believe that Government is run by big special interests; only 1 in 5 Americans believe that our Government is motivated by a desire to serve the best interests of the people. That, Mr. President, is a frightening fact of contemporary life. This bill will, I believe, give people more reason to trust Government by giving special interest PAC's less of a role to play in elections.

This legislation does not advantage either party. It does not confer an advantage on any campaign. It does not protect incumbents or punish challengers. In fact, a group of Republicans seeking to defeat Democratic incumbents recently wrote the President and urged him to sign this bill rather than veto it. Their argument made sense: they claimed that incumbents can always raise more money than challengers. An absolute ceiling on spending, they reasoned, would reduce that financial advantage and create an even playing field for challengers. I believe they are right.

In fact, about the only people disadvantaged by this bill are people like me. Under this legislation, I will not be able to contribute as much as I want to my own campaign. I will not be able to spend as much as I want on my next campaign. There will be a strict limit on how much I can contribute to myself and a strict limit on how much I can spend. But, Mr. President, I am willing to accept that personal disadvantage. I am willing to accept it because I think it is right. It makes sense. And it will help restore some faith in the political system.

This bill is not perfect. But it is a perfectly reasonable attempt to bring some sanity to a system run amuck. It is a valid remedy for the sickness that the money chase has brought to our politics. In sum, it is what the American people want.

Let me conclude with this comment. We all know we are going through an empty ritual here. We all know this bill will not become law. But I hope, Mr. President, I hope that we will not be content with a charade. I hope we will not be willing to just score some political points and then quit the game.

This issue is too important for that. There is a crying need in this country for a real debate about the issues we face. The function of a campaign is more than to elect someone—campaigns also ought to help us form a new consensus on basic issues of public policy. By reducing the role of special interests, by reducing the role of money in deciding elections, I believe we can come closer to realizing that goal.

That can only happen if we get together, Republicans and Democrats alike and figure out what we can do together. It is time—it is past time—for us to get on with the business of implementing meaningful campaign reforms. I hope that our action on this bill will bring us closer to that goal.

RECESS

Mr. KOHL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now stand in recess until 4 p.m.

There being no objection, the Senate, at 2:59 p.m., recessed until 3:57 p.m.; whereupon, the Senate reconvened when called to order by the Presiding Officer [Mr. CONRAD].

RECESS UNTIL 4:30 P.M.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will stand in recess until 4:30.

Thereupon, the Senate, at 3:57 and 15 seconds p.m., recessed until 4:30 p.m.; whereupon, the Senate reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer [Mr. CONRAD].

SENATE ELECTION ETHICS ACT— CONFERENCE REPORT

The Senate continued with the consideration of the conference report.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I rise today to declare my full support for the conference report on Congressional Campaign Spending Limit and Election Reform Act of 1992.

Campaign finance reform is long overdue.

Candidates—not to mention staff, national and State parties, and everyone involved in the political process—put too much time and energy into raising money.

As the cost of campaigns rises each year, more and more time and energy is consumed by raising the almighty dollars.

The pressure to amass a campaign war chest should not drive elections. Issues, such as the future course of our Nation, should drive the debate.

This maddening chase for campaign funds is discouraging and disheartening to incumbents and challengers alike.

It has forced and continues to force good people out of office. Many other good people choose not to enter politics simply because of the relentless fundraising chase. And we wonder why fewer and fewer people are entering public service.

Too often today only those candidates that have large financial resources are considered viable. Only the wealthy seem to get the opportunity to run for public office. No challenger is given a chance to win because his or her message will not be heard.

This bill will end the money chase. It will level the playing field between challengers and incumbents. It will allow people to choose to run for public office based on their beliefs. Not their bank accounts.

True reform will only occur when we have campaign spending limits. S. 3 does just that, imposing voluntary flexible spending limits that allow challengers to compete on equal footing with incumbents.

This bill includes other important reforms, such as free and reduced-cost broadcast rates, limits on PAC contributions, and an end to bundling and soft money. These, too, will play significant roles in opening up the political process to all who are interested in running for Congress.

I am certain the Senate will pass this reform bill. I am equally certain the President will veto it.

The President will veto it because he opposes spending limits. He will veto it because he opposes public financing for campaigns. Well, Mr. President, I can understand why you wouldn't want to tie the hands of the CEO's of America's major corporations who have twisted arms to give generously to your campaigns. Spending limits only hurt the fat cats.

But I can't understand why you will take more than $200 million in taxpayers money for your Presidential reelection campaign with one hand, and veto this bill with the other.

In recent years, campaign finance reform has occurred at all levels of government, except the Federal level. In my own State of Washington, the League of Women Voters is leading a petition drive to place a campaign reform initiative on the fall ballot that would limit campaign spending and the influence of special interests.

It would be a shame if the President, the leader of the Republican Party, vetoes this reform bill and kills any chance we at the Federal level have at campaign finance reform.

This bill deserves bipartisan support. I strongly urge the President not to veto this singular chance at true campaign finance reform.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I give my strong support to S. 3, the campaign finance reform bill. Passage of this legislation is essential to achieve the far-reaching reform urgently needed in campaign financing.

The American people are fed up with the current system. Excessive reliance on unlimited spending and special interest contributions have made conflict of interest a way of life in Congress. The constant hunt for campaign dollars and the questionable relationships that inevitably follow in their wake demean the process of our elections and undermine the foundation of our democracy.

This reform bill is the culmination of years of hard work by many Members of both parties, and it deserves broad bipartisan support. Voluntary spending limits are the cornerstone of any serious attempt to achieve meaningful campaign finance reform. They will give the voting public new faith in elections, and bring new integrity to Congress.

A reform without strict spending limits will fail to end the abuses that have become deeply ingrained in the present system. The spending limits in this bill are voluntary, as the Constitution requires. But the limits are made attractive to incumbents and challengers alike because of the bill's incentives to accept them, especially broadcast vouchers to help defray the high cost of television, other sensible forms of public financing, and low rates for mail and for broadcast advertising.

I support public financing of elections, and this bill should have gone further. Public financing was the right answer for Presidential elections in the Watergate reforms we enacted in the 1970's, and I believe that a similar answer would work well for Senate and House elections.

But the reforms in this bill are still a significant breakthrough. It would be hypocritical in the extreme for President Bush, who has benefited greatly from public financing of his Presidential campaigns, to veto a bill which extends that sound principle to Senate and House elections.

In addition, if we are serious about ending the arms race in campaign financing, the enactment of spending limits and partial public financing is not enough. We must also limit PAC contributions, and this reform does so in two ways—by limiting the amount of any PAC contribution to $2,500 per election, and also by limiting the total amount of PAC contributions that Senate candidates can accept to 20 percent of the spending limit.

All of us know first hand that the current campaign finance system is badly flawed. We don't have to read about the abuses in the newspaper or hear about them on television. We live them every day. It costs too much money to run for office, and the funds we raise are often incurably tainted. It is long past time to reform the current corrupt system, end the fundraising treadmill, and eliminate special interest influence.

It is preposterous to call this measure an incumbents' protection bill. Challengers will clearly benefit from these reforms, and they are likely to benefit even more than incumbents. Under the current system, any incumbents worth their salt have three major advantages over challengers. They can raise more total funds than challengers. They can raise more large contributions than challengers, and they can spend more than challengers.

These reforms will change all that. They will create a more level playing field that is fairer to all participants in the electoral process, incumbents and challengers alike.

It is time for Congress to stop talking about reform and start acting to make it happen. This bill is not perfect. But compared to the status quo, it is like night and day.

Once campaign finance reform is achieved, we will at last break the stranglehold of the fat cats and special interest groups on our elections. Candidates will spend far less time raising campaign funds, and far more time developing effective responses to the serious challenges America faces. This legislation will make it far more likely that elections will be more about issues—and less about collecting campaign cash.

The corrosive influence of the current system is unacceptable. It has been said that we have the finest Congress money can buy—and it is a disgrace to our democracy.

It is time to stop soliciting campaign contributions from those whose interests are affected by our votes. It is time to end the corruption and the appearance of corruption that shadow everything we do and every vote we cast.

By enacting this legislation, we can take Senate and House elections off the auction block. We can take them away from the special interests and give them back to the people. Above all, we can make our democracy once again worthy of its name.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I have mentioned several times the problem of soft money which enters into political campaigns as a way of evading individual contribution limits which are in present law. This is evaded on a massive scale. Tens and even hundreds-of-millions-of-dollars have poured into campaigns in violation of the intent, at least, of the individual contribution limit. I would like to just briefly explain and put into the RECORD a description of exactly how soft money operates.

In recent years, the Federal election laws have been circumvented through the raising of contributions and the expenditure of funds not subject to limits under Federal law. Party committees use the so-called soft money in support of mixed activities which affect both Federal and non-Federal elections, such as get-out-the-vote efforts, voter registration, and generic public advertising activities.

So, for example, if you have congressional races going on, Senate races, Presidential races going on at the same time that you have elections, let us say, for Governor in a State or the election of the State legislatures, you have a coordinated mixed activity, both Democratic, both Republican activity going on at the same time, the party committees have been contending it is solely to influence State elections and therefore is not to be counted as money to influence the outcome of a Federal election. That simply is not true. Once people have exhausted the limits they can give to Federal candidates under our contribution limits, they simply then give thousands of dollars to party committees, for example, in States and allow the money to be funneled that way to help Federal campaigns, phone banks, other kinds of activities that obviously are of benefit to candidates for the House and Senate but do not have to be counted then under the contribution limit laws.

Under current law, the Federal Election Commission requires party committee expenditures to support such activities be allocated between Federal and non-Federal accounts, depending upon the nature of the expenditures, and whether the party committee is a national, State, or local committee.

Under these allocation rules, substantial amounts of money are raised by Federal candidates and their agents to support activities that affect the Federal election. For example, in the 1988 Presidential election, agents of the two candidates raised tens-of-millions-of-dollars for party committees to spend on activities in support of the Presidential candidates. There were actually fundraisers held where people contributed $100,000 each. This soft money was raised directly from corporations and from labor unions, although they have been prohibited under Federal law since 1907 from making contributions or expenditures for Federal election purposes.

In addition, soft money contributions far in excess of the $1,000 per election limits for individuals were raised from individuals to support activities on behalf of Presidential candidates. The use of this soft money to support activities which affect Federal elections is clearly contrary to the intent of the Federal election laws and has resulted in the return of practices outlawed in 1974 where large individual contributions often in excess of $100,000 were being made to support the election of Presidential candidates.

Under the conference report on S. 3 now before us, political party committees would be prohibited from using soft money, not regulated under Federal law, for any activities in connection with a Federal election. Activities in connection with a Federal election, including get-out-the-vote activities, voter registration, generic and mixed election activities including public advertising, campaign materials, maintenance of voter files and other activities affecting a Federal election during a Federal election period.

Federal election period, under the conference report, is defined as beginning on April 1 in a Presidential election year and on June 1 in all other Federal election years. Activities considered not to be in connection with a Federal election campaign include spending exclusively on behalf of State and local candidates, the administrative expenses for overhead, caucus staff, party committee building funds, research pertaining to non-Federal candidates, direct contributions to non-Federal candidates and other activities solely to support non-Federal candidates. Expenditures for get-out-the-vote and voter registration activities during a Federal election period are considered to affect a Federal election regardless of whether Federal candidates are involved directly in the activity themselves.

The exempt activity provisions of current law permitting unlimited spending for volunteer activities that affect a Federal election and for get-out-the-vote drive or voter registration on behalf of Presidential candidates would be repealed and replaced with general authority for State party committees to spend approximately 10 cents per voter for activities in connection with a Federal election which do not involve the use of broadcast media. Here we are talking about volunteer activities.

Party committees spending on mixed Federal-State activities in connection with Federal elections would be subject to a 30-cent-per-voter limit. State party contributions limits for individuals and PAC's would be increased to $10,000 for each election cycle. And Federal officeholders and candidates would be prohibited from soliciting soft money contributions.

So, Mr. President, the conference report on S. 3 closes the so-called soft money loophole once and for all. Soft money has often been called the sewer money of American politics because it is given in a way where there is less accountability than is the case with any other funds—corporations, labor unions pouring this money indirectly really for the purposes of influencing Federal campaign, perhaps even for the purpose of electing and defeating a Presidential candidate, all this being siphoned through State party committees, State party organizations under the guise of helping with State activities, not being fully documented, not coming under the rules and regulations, not coming under the individual contribution limits.

So this is a loophole, a huge and glaring loophole, under the current campaign finance law. It is a loophole that should be closed. It is a loophole that is closed under the historic campaign finance reform bill that is now pending before us in the form of the conference report to S. 3.

Likewise, another abuse under the current system is the abuse of bundling where interest groups get together and collect large amounts of contributions, bundle them together and hand them on to a candidate so that while an individual is prohibited from contributing more than $1,000, that individual may go out and collect $300,000 or $400,000, bundle it together and then give it to the candidate so that that individual is being made to feel they have given $300,000 or $400,000 instead of individual contributions.

That is exactly the subject. This abuse is the subject of an editorial in the Washington Post on April 26 entitled "Bundles From Heaven". It calls upon the President to sign this bill into law because it makes a very strong step in the direction of halting the bundling process.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a description of the abuse of bundling and the Washington Post editorial on that subject be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BUNDLING

The bundling of contributions has become an often used method of avoiding the contribution limitations of the campaign finance laws. By collecting a large number of contribution checks from individuals and delivering them to a candidate, the person collecting the contributions, or "bundler", enhances his or her contribution to a candidate by effectively adding the bundled contributions to the amount he or she can contribute directly under the law.

The intent of the bundling provisions of the conference report is to stop avoidance of the contribution limits and prohibitions of current law whereby political committees, individuals, and others solicit individual campaign contributions and then bundle the contributions together or otherwise arrange for the candidate to receive the contributions in a way which allows them to be recognized as providing the contributions. In the case of a PAC, for example, this means that contributions are organized and provided by the PAC in excess of its contribution limits in a way, that makes clear that the PAC is responsible for the contributions being made.

The purpose of the contribution limits and prohibitions of current law is to prevent corruption and the appearance of corruption. The bundling provisions in the conference report are designed to prevent the existing contribution limits and prohibitions from being evaded and undermined. This is done by limiting the amount of funds that a person can bundle to the amount of the contribution limit that applies to that individual.

The conference agreement limits bundling by lobbyists; partnerships and sole proprietorships; organizations prohibited from making contributions under federal law and their officers, employees or agents acting on the organization's behalf; and individuals who are agents, employees, or officers of a political party or connected political committee.

In general, the bundling provisions are not intended to interfere with the ability of federal candidates to raise campaign funds from persons who do not present problems of corruption or the appearance of corruption. Therefore, the conference agreement does not cover individuals acting in their own capacity (other than registered lobbyists to whom special provisions apply) unless they are engaging in such efforts on behalf of another entity covered by federal contribution limits and prohibitions.

For example, the bundling provisions do not apply to individuals serving as volunteers helping raise campaign funds for candidates through fundraising receptions or by other methods. So that there is no confusion about the reach of these provisions, the conferees have adopted specific clarifications from the House bill providing that the bundling restrictions do not apply to the following: a volunteer hosting a fundraising event at the volunteer's home; representatives of the candidate occupying a significant position in the campaign, professional fundraisers working for the candidate, and individuals transmitting a contribution from the individual's spouse.

If an individual in raising contributions for a candidate for federal office is acting on behalf of another entity covered by federal campaign limits and prohibitions, such as assisting a PAC or political party in making contributions in excess of its limit, then the contributions would be treated as coming from the PAC or political party as well as the original donor in order to prevent evasion of the law.

Persons required to register as lobbyists or foreign agents would also be required to treat contributions they bundled for a federal candidate against their own contribution limit. The purpose of this provision is to ensure that lobbyists are not able to evade their contribution limits and use large sums of money beyond that which they are otherwise permitted to contribute to obtain influence with government officials.

BUNDLES FROM HEAVEN

President Bush is in an awkward position on campaign finance reform. Twice in the last few days his own fund-raising efforts have demonstrated the need for a strong reform bill that he is about to veto. He makes himself the protector of a fetid system of which he is also a leading beneficiary.

At a Bush-Quayle fund-raiser in Michigan April 14, five corporations were listed as major donors. Campaign aides called the listing "an embarrassing * * * mistake," but what embarrassed them was not what the corporations had done, only how they had described it. It's illegal for corporations, as for unions, to contribute their own funds directly to presidential or other candidates for federal office. They get around the law by contributing other funds indirectly.

One way of accomplishing that is by "bundling"; owners and/or employees of a company will be asked to make ostensibly individual contributions to a candidate, all tidily within the limits prescribed by law. But these will then be put in a sheaf and given to the candidate in the company's name as well, in a way and an amount that, if it came from the company directly, the law would ban. That's what happened here; the "mistake" was simply acknowledging it. To keep a distance between corporations, unions and campaigns, the bill that the president says he will veto would ban bundling.

Meanwhile, a co-chairman of a "President's Dinner" scheduled for next week on behalf of Republican congressional candidates has been accused by a former employee of having coerced employees to make contributions to be handed up in a bundle, and other literature from the dinner invites both direct contributions from corporations and unions and contributions from individuals in excess of what the law allows to candidates directly. The literature says "every dollar" will go "toward building a stronger Republican presence" in Congress. The money that can't go to candidates directly will simply be put in a separate account and distributed indirectly, mostly through state parties. That's called "soft money" in the trade, and the bill to be vetoed would largely ban that, too.

The president's spokesman, Marlin Fitzwater, had to defend all this on Thursday—not a pleasant task. It wasn't really the president's dinner, he said, but a congressional affair, and the president was opposed to coercion though not to the access that the invitations promised big contributors particularly to administration and congressional figures. It's okay within certain limits to use the carrot to induce contributions, just not the stick. "I don't believe it's a corrupting influence," the spokesman said.

He did better when he broke through to slightly higher ground to say that just about everyone agrees that "money is necessary" in politics, "and it is useful and * * * you do have to have ways to get it into the system. But the trick is deciding how you can best protect it, how you can prevent conflict of interest, how do you prevent corruption of the process. And if you say a dinner is not appropriate, well, you know, what is? Do you make a rule that says the only way you can give is blind?"

That's a good description of the problem, and of precisely the balance that the bill tries to preserve. It seeks to preserve the presence but reduce the oppressive importance of private money in congressional campaigns by setting voluntary spending limits, providing some public finance to candidates who comply with them, using some other rules to change the current mix of funds and barring such evasions as bundling and soft money. Eventually most of the money will still be given; that is always the way. But it will be done even more indirectly, and in the process its capacity for mischief will be diluted and reduced. That's the modest goal that Mr. Bush (while himself nominally abiding by voluntary spending limits and taking millions in public funds) now proposes to thwart.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, as you know, the time will soon be under the control of the Senator from West Virginia, who is expected on the floor momentarily. I see the Senator from Arizona has arrived, and I want to yield the floor so that he may also contribute his ideas and his experience to the course of this debate on campaign finance reform. So I yield the floor so that my colleague from Arizona might be recognized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma and also compliment him for his leadership in this effort. No one has worked longer and harder than DAVID BOREN. He came here, being a nationally recognized Governor from his State, with probably many ideals but one driving force, and that was that this political system is not good and must be changed. As some of us who came with these ideas, he realizes, that nothing moves around here fast, but everything is in such a slow motion sometimes it just absolutely drives you bonkers.

DAVID BOREN has stayed with it, and now the day is finally here when we will send to the President a comprehensive campaign reform bill. I know it is not everything the Senator from Oklahoma wants, nor everything the Senator from Arizona wants.

As one who has worked for and advocated this reform since 1977, it is almost hard to believe that Congress is about to complete action on this Bill. Unfortunately, our Republican colleagues will try to throw a wet blanket on this party. They will assure us that the President will veto this bill, that it is a dead duck. I refuse to accept that. I refuse to believe that President Bush will choose political gamesmanship over true reform.

Throughout my career in the Senate, I have cosponsored and sponsored numerous pieces of legislation to reform Senate elections: provisions to provide public financing and limit spending, to increase disclosure of PAC activity, to limit PAC contributions, to reverse Buckley versus Valeo, to end the practice of converting left-over campaign funds to personal use, to combat negative advertising, to enhance voter registration and the list goes on. Many of my colleagues and I have spoken repeatedly on the Senate floor on these same issues. We have voted again and again to pass solid, responsible reform legislation.

The conference committee bill is not perfect; no bill is ever perfect. But that must not prevent us from adopting it. No one can deny that this bill is immeasurably better than the current system. My biggest disappointment in this bill is that it does not contain sufficient public financing. When this bill was before the Senate last May, I cosponsored Senator KERRY's amendment to provide public financing. Unfortunately that amendment was defeated. My own bill, S. 53, also contains a large public financing component. Nonetheless, I am a realist. While this bill falls short of my expectations for complete reform, it is better, much better, than our current situation.

The current situation is this. When I first ran for the Senate in 1976, I spent $615,000 in a very competitive race. In 1982, I spent $2.1 million, and in 1988, I spent $2.7 million. This is ridiculous. What is more ridiculous is that in 1988 the average Senate race cost $4 million. To raise that kind of money, a Senator must spend an inordinate amount of his or her time raising money or planning how to raise money. The sad truth is we spend too little time legislating and too much time with our fundraisers. Limits on spending are the only answer.

Consider for a moment the following numbers on the cost of winning an average House or Senate seat in 1976 versus 1990.

In the House of Representatives, in 1976, $87,200; and in 1990, $410,000.

In the Senate, in 1976, $607,100; and in 1990, $3.3 million.

Some of my friends on the other side of the aisle will claim that spending limits create some kind of advantage for incumbents.

Mr. President, incumbents now have all the advantages: Name recognition, constituent service, and fundraising advantages. The facts are that incumbents raise more and spend more than their challengers. Spending limits will harm those who are most able to raise and spend money—the incumbents.

Incumbents' share of total Senate campaign spending keeps going up: In 1980 it was 44 percent; and in 1990 it was 60 percent.

In 1990 incumbents spent on average $3.5 million; and challengers spent on average $1.7 million.

In Arizona, and in more than half the States, total spending limits in this bill would be near or below $2 million. A challenger may still not be able to raise that much money. The average 1990 challenger raised $1.7 million, but the average incumbent who in 1990 raised $3.5 million would be severely restricted by the $2 million cap.

There is a popular, though inaccurate, analogy making the rounds of my colleagues who oppose spending limits. They equate a campaign with spending limits to a 100 yard dash in which the incumbent starts at the 50 yard line and the challenger can't hope to catch up. But, fundraising is not a sprint; it is a long distance race in which the incumbent is in far better shape than the challenger. With spending limits, we force the incumbent to stop and wait for the challenger to catch up, and they both finish together.

But do not take my word for it, do not take the word of my Democratic colleagues, listen to what some Republican challengers are saying. According to a story in the Washington Post of April 25, 33 Republicans from 21 States wrote President Bush a letter outlining their support for the bill we are considering. I quote:

As congressional challengers and loyal Republicans, we urge you sign the comprehensive campaign finance reform legislation making its way to your desk this year. Such legislation is necessary to level the playing field for credible challengers and to restore a measure of fairness to our electoral process.

These are not individuals intent on protecting the power of incumbents. These are not individuals whose "sole focus [is] to protect their majority in Congress" as the RNC would have us believe of all supporters of this bill. The President seems to be listening to the incumbent Republicans in the Congress. As one incumbent, let me state:

Mr. President, I am willing to give up the biases toward incumbents if we will just reform this system. Sign this bill.

Political action committee spending is another area where incumbents have a tremendous advantage, an advantage that this bill would blunt.

Total PAC contributions grew 343 percent from 1978 to 1988: 1974, $12.5 million; and 1990, $150 million. A 400-percent increase after inflation.

In 1990, as in all years, Senate incumbents received a disproportionate share of that PAC spending: Senate incumbents; $29.6 million from PAC's; and Senate challengers; $7.9 million.

This bill addresses the PAC issue in two important ways. First, it reduces contributions by PAC's to Senate candidates from the current $5,000 to $2,500 per election.

Second, and more importantly, it places an aggregate limit on PAC contributions of 20 percent of the cycle limit. The role of PAC's is effectively limited without taking the draconian step of eliminating them.

PAC's are not inherently evil as some of the political pundits would have you believe.

PAC's do empower small contributors who otherwise might never become involved in the political process. PAC's are not usually the big fat cats—those are the bundlers. No, PAC's are comprised of the average worker:

Schoolteachers where members contribute $1.15 to the NEA PAC.

Auto workers who contribute an average of $5 a year to the UAW PAC.

PAC's are not just the AMA or the bankers, or big labor. PAC's are also comprised of people banded together who are concerned about the environment, health issues, children's issues, or veterans issues.

Finally, eliminating PAC's is almost certainly unconstitutional. Those who would grandstand this issue and call for the elimination of PAC's are ignoring reality.

We will hear many arguments during this debate about public financing.

How the American people won't tolerate public funds being used to finance campaigns, how using public money is wrong and how it will be abused.

First, let me state that my biggest complaint with this bill is that there is not enough public financing, that there should be substantially more, and I think much of the American public will agree with me.

A poll conducted by Greenberg-Lake in February of last year demonstrated that a substantial portion of the electorate is willing to trade public financing for cleaner elections. Fifty-eight percent of those surveyed supported the notion of the Federal Government providing candidates a fixed amount of public money in exchange for an end to private contributions.

A June 1990 poll by the Harris organization indicated that 82 percent of those polled supported the Borden bill when it was described to them.

President Bush has been arguing that public financing of congressional elections is wrong. Is this the same President Bush who, by the end of this year, will have received over $200 million in public funds during his Presidential and Vice Presidential campaigns? Mr. President, what is good for the goose is good for the gander. He is right to take those public funds because they have succeeded in cleaning up the Presidential campaigns system.

But the same rationale should apply to public financing—and this bill's public financing is very limited—of congressional elections.

Public financing is an investment in good Government. The decline in our democratic processes is a great threat to our Nation. Homelessness, child nutrition, education—all of these vital programs are worthy of Federal support. But we cannot compare apples and oranges. We cannot say that the threat to our democracy of the cynicism, disgust, and distrust of the American people is less of a problem than the many other crises facing this country. We cannot ignore the level of dissatisfaction that exists today.

We must change the public perception. Partial public financing is not a selfish program on the part of politicians. It is a program to guarantee to the people that their government is one of integrity and honor. How can we say that partially financing elections with the people's money in an effort to combat private big money is not a worthy use of the people's funds?

Those who oppose public financing will argue that it will enable fringe candidates such as Lyndon LaRouche and David Duke to push their own private agendas at the public expense. Critics argue that candidates who would not choose to run under current circumstances would be encouraged to go for the spotlight at the public's expense, even though they have little chance of winning.

These arguments are nothing but strawmen. Candidates must prove that they are serious and viable by raising a threshold of 10 percent of their general election limit. The threshold must be made up of small contributions of $250 or less.

Competition is a critical aspect of democracy. If candidates can meet the threshold requirements, then I believe they have demonstrated that they represent ideas with which a significant number of Americans agree, whether or not we agree with them personally. Democracy means encouraging ideas, not squelching them.

If an opponent is running on a platform that is abhorrent to us, then let's get out there and make the issues the focus of the election. This is what makes the electorate confident that their representative is pursuing the people's agenda and not because of money.

To say we do not want to give challengers an equal playing field because they might espouse ideas we don't agree with is fundamentally contrary to the tenets of this great democracy. Shying away from this important element of reform—which will benefit all candidates and level the playing field for challengers—just because we are afraid of encouraging candidates we don't like, is a poor excuse for denying the American people the true reform they deserve.

It is the people we represent. There is nothing evil about financing the people's elections with the people's money, so that the people control the interests of those they elect.

Let us make 1992 the last congressional election without meaningful reform. I am hopeful that the Senate will swiftly pass this conference report and send it to the President. And then I hope that the President will put aside political gamesmanship, will put aside notions of how best to exploit campaign reform for crass political purposes, will put aside ideas of cheapshot 30 second TV spots, and will instead side with the people and sign this reform bill to clean up the system.

Mr. President, I want to thank the President pro tempore for letting me invade on his time. Again, my compliments to the Senator from Oklahoma for his leadership in this effort.

I yield the floor.

Mr. BYRD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The President pro tempore is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, how much time do I have under the order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 90 minutes under the order.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, we are enduring a time of bitter politics and bitter despair. At the very crossroads of worldwide historic change, at the moment of the seeming triumph of the ideas of freedom and American democracy around the world, the American people have been treated to a spectacle of name-calling, finger-pointing, scandal, political conspiracies, pandering, and issue-ducking that has rarely been seen in the history of our Republic. No wonder that so many voters register their disquiet with all of the candidates running for the Presidency and their anger and disenchantment with so many incumbents seeking re-election to the Senate and the House of Representatives.

If that were not cause enough to be repulsed by the political process, currently Congress, the media, and the White House seem locked in government gridlock and mired in an orgy of petty muckraking, spurred on, as it were, by the heat of an election year, each oblivious to the damage to, and the degradation of, our own democratic institutions that such conduct is wreaking.

The earthquake and aftershocks of accusation and political bloodletting that dominated much of last year promise to continue this year and to become ever more violent and intemperate, as November approaches.

With the world at this critical juncture in its history, Congress and the White House ought to be concentrating on those most important questions that national politicians can consider—namely, what is America's future for our coming generations, and what is America's place in the world? Every other country in the world is thinking especially about this latter question: What is America's place in the world? And they are all wondering, how is the United States, the world's only superpower, going to act, now that Soviet Communism has fallen? Only one country seems not to be concerned about America's role as the premier force in the world, and that country is the United States itself.

Here, the White House is more concerned with bashing Congress and finding "perks" on Capitol Hill than finding America's course in the world. Congress, in its own defense, has focused its attention on "perks" in the White House, and the press is eating it all up, loving it, turning every discovery of a new "perk" into another front-page story.

As a result, Congress and the White House have become so defensive about their respective institutions that they are in gridlock. Meanwhile, the rest of the world waits, watches, and wonders.

During this time of unequalled and unforeseen opportunities, both the White House and Congress might instead have fine-tuned our directional compass in the aftermath of the collapse of our international nemesis—the Soviet Union and Soviet communism—and reevaluated our own priorities to deal with a changed world and its radically different challenges. But, no, we—and by “we,” I mean all of us who serve, those who send us here, the White House, and the press—choose to focus instead on the delicious spectacle of the so-called “perks” of the Members of the House of Representatives. Almost as we have been collectively overwhelmed by the challenges, by the real world’s demands, we choose instead to sink our fangs into something juicier than issues, something with tabloid sexiness, if you will, something that supermarket-shopper America can understand and relate to: A whiff of petty corruption in government!

In this regard, I am reminded of the words in Matthew 23 of the New Testament: “Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! * * * Ye blind guides, which strain at a gnat and swallow a camel.”

Mr. President, the increasing “gnat straining and camel swallowing” that we are witnessing today with regard to the Senate and House—in the press, on television and radio talk shows, and even on the 1992 campaign trail—is the symptom of a nation that has lost its way, and whose leaders are embroiled in petty bickering, fault finding, and finger pointing.

On every hand, the national pastime currently appears to have become Congress-bashing. It is the make shift platform on which the current occupant of the White House is waging his campaign for reelection. That is his platform. That is it. The whole kit and caboodle. Congress bashing. With every new edition of the newspapers and the seven o’clock news, the American people are being treated to the “sins of Congress,” “Congressional outrages,” and “Congressional perks.”

Parking spaces, souvenir ashtrays in the stationery store—at cost! Haircuts in the Senate barber shop!

Incidentally, I was watching King Henry V the other night, and I was amazed at King Henry’s haircut. I realize that King Henry was young when he took over the throne in 1413—he reined until 1422—but I thought he at least had longer hair. This King Henry looked as though he had a brandnew American-made, up-to-date, modern haircut, straight from the Senate barber shop. I thought that was a little out of keeping. But, after all, I did not have anything to do with developing the picture or with King Henry’s haircut.

Take some of the other perks: A doctor on duty, in case somebody on the police force, a tourist, or somebody on the committee staffs, or somebody over at the Supreme Court building, such as a Supreme Court Justice, has a heart attack or seizure; telephones, typewriters, and computers in the members’ offices—these are so-called “perks”.

On and on this discordant chorus goes, Mr. President, as if the Republic itself were tottering in the balance on the basis of a cost-priced ashtray!

Mr. President, this is straining at gnats. Meanwhile, what about the camel? Meanwhile, campaign financing abuse is eating the heart out of the political process itself, with members being forced to run from one end of the country to another searching for every possible penny to pay for the next political campaign; with Senators and House members being distracted from the real work on the floor, the real work in committees, the real work in meeting with their constituents and federal agencies here in town, being distracted from the real work of the Congress—to do what? To raise money from special interests and moneyed people just to win in the next election. Meantime, with the leukemia of campaign money spreading through the veins and the arteries of our national political system, a national debt threatens to impoverish the next generation and the generation after that, and a burgeoning federal budget deficit is caught in a gridlock, while inflation-boosting entitlements go up and up, year after year, millions of Americans are without medical insurance, and the streets of great American cities are being turned into “no-man’s lands” by youth gangs, thugs, young toughs, drug dealers, and pistol-packing teenagers. With all of these disasters verging in upon us, across this country, the electorate is being bombarded with the message that parking spaces for Members and their staffs, and flowers from the Botanical Gardens in Members’ offices are corrupting the land and destroying the Union.

Mr. President, throughout my career in the Chamber, I have worked continually for reform—the President says we need reform—I have worked continually for reform, reform to move legislation more effectively, reform to streamline the committee system, reform to open the Senate to public scrutiny through admission of radio and television into the Senate, and reform to bring about greater public accountability in personal finances.

But on every hand, we hear this constant drumbeat—ridiculing the Congress for “perks,” and from across the country, we hear the mounting cries of disillusionment and anger rising from the hearts and throats of patriotic men and women who have allowed themselves to be convinced that “perks” are about to bring the country to ruin.

“Perks” are a problem, indeed, but that problem is a molehill compared to the mountain that is being utterly and ignominiously ignored by the scandal-mongers and the gnat-strainers.

Mr. President, tabloid journalism begets tabloid politics. The spectacle that we are witnessing currently is the fruit of the spirit of “tabloidism”—that insidious lust for scandal, rumor, innuendo, and disgrace to which irresponsible people are pandering for their own purposes, regardless of the damage being done to the country or the failure to come to grips with real issues and real crises.

There is much that is wrong in this troubled Nation. We have sky-high deficits, crumbling transportation systems, inadequate health care, little to no energy policy, hazardous-waste pollution, a failing education system, and horrendous crime and drug problems.

But none of these concerns is more serious than the malady, the creeping epidemic, the gangrene that cannot be legislated away and for which there is no easy vaccine.

That malady of which I speak, that creeping epidemic of which I speak has been carefully nurtured, fostered, and spread for close now to two decades. It has been carefully drilled into the American people—rooted and pruned and fertilized by three consecutive occupants of the White House.

That disease is cynicism—a cynicism that has been deliberately marketed to the American people since 1976 by clever media men trading on frustration, envy, and dissatisfaction, and the natural American mistrust of Government and “politicians.”

Beginning with Jimmy Carter, three American Presidents were persuaded of the political advantage of convincing the American people that all of their problems began and ended with Government—more specifically, with the Government here in Washington.

Ronald Reagan perfected this tactic to an art form. Ronald Reagan persuaded the American people that all Government—all Government—is bad, that all problems could be solved by a tax cut, and that the Government, and especially the Congress, is an encumbrance without a constructive role, without legitimacy and without purpose other than to obstruct and thwart the will of the Chief Executive who sits in the Oval Office of the White House.

To his discredit, George Bush has parroted this destructive, divisive garbage.

But, alas, the American people have bought it all—lock, stock, and barrel.

Greed was the watchword of the eighties. Make a fast buck! The message that went forth was, just eliminate the encumbrances of Government and the American people would then outproduce, outperform, and outdistance any country in the world. This message was the ultimate in political-sloganeering genius. The message said, “Just get Government off the backs of the American people and all of the Nation's problems will melt away."

There was an easily identifiable, already disliked villain: Government; against an appealing hero: the American people; the messenger being a former television huckster and former Hollywood leading man with media skills unrivaled in American political history: Ronald Reagan.

For a while, the heady rhetoric seemed to ring true. America did prosper in the 1980's. But there was a crushing, hidden cost. The massive deficits piled up during the 1980's were obscured by borrowing from foreigners and from future generations, my children, your children and their children. The American worker was given kudos from the bully pulpit, but nothing else. While we mortgaged our future to pay for massive defense buildups, we robbed this Nation of investments in education and infrastructure and declined to engage in any sort of intelligent planning about the future economic viability of our country in an increasingly competitive world.

As a nation, we have literally brainwashed ourselves—all of us, the American people, and the media. We have come to believe that all issues must be compressed into 30-second spots, that there is no problem that cannot be solved by the appointment of a commission, that the American people are too ready to kill the messenger to be told the truth, that an honest look at ourselves as a nation and at our failings is unpatriotic, that political experience is a liability, that all domestic Government spending is wasteful pork barreling, and that public service is dishonorable.

We have learned these easy lessons well. These hackneyed cliches and familiar slogans convey notions that are convenient to believe and convenient to cite as the reasons for all of the Nation's ills, and they will get applause from the gallery, they will get amens from the corner, and absolution, if you will, for all of our sins.

More recently we have witnessed day after day, via detailed press accounts, the public feeding of the red meat of the House bank scandal.

This unfortunate turn of events was like the frosting on the cake for everything that we have so carefully taught the public during the 1980's. Everything was ready and waiting, and the stage was set. The curtain goes up and, here, in the simplest, starkest terms, existed documented proof that the Congress is inept, irresponsible, and mostly downright dishonorable. Here was proof of it. The whole Congress!

Add to that the cheap haircuts, free parking, the gymnasium and its corrupting influence, and there you have it in a nutshell—the reasons for the decline of the United States of America, our standard of living, and our failing world economic power. It is just that simple.

I say these things not to make light of situations that are unfortunate here in the Congress. I am certainly not condoning behavior that constitutes a breach of public trust or unethical conduct. I say these things to point out this Nation's seeming propensity to avoid the hard questions, duck the real issues, and focus instead on tabloid fodder. Of course, it is easier to do that, so much easier to focus on that tabloid fodder. Moreover, it is entertaining. Nor is it so complicated as defining a new role for our country in the world or reducing budget deficits. It is not so complicated as rebuilding our industrial and manufacturing base, or salvaging an economic future for our children.

Too often, we in public office run campaigns on our opponent's warts and pimples, instead of on real issues. We follow our media managers' scripts—like dumb, driven cattle. Trying to educate is too tedious. Do not go out there and try to educate our constituents on the real issues. That is too tedious. Do not go out and take a difficult position. That is too hard. It is too tough to be honest, too unpopular to go against the grain. Take the line of least resistance.

We try to be all things, then, to all people.

During much of the decade of the 1980's, we never seriously challenged "Dr. Feel-Good Reagan" in his Good Morning America messages, because we were afraid of telling the people the bad news when he claimed to have only good news to proclaim. And that is what the people wanted to hear—the good news. So they got the "good news" message.

Ronald Reagan's devils were always so easy to identify—the Soviet Union, taxes, Qadhafi, big government. Without minimizing those devils, there were other demons that were real dangers, real demons that were much more subtle: illiteracy, poverty, crumbling infrastructure, failing workers' skills, people without health care, low productivity growth. These were the real demons.

The feel-good promises of the 1980's came true for only a handful of the American people—those who profited from insider trading on Wall Street, those who made temporary fortunes in the savings and loan scandals—and we are all waiting to see when they are going to go to jail, if ever—and those whose rapacious greed gutted American companies of their best assets, and threw thousands of men and women out of jobs without medical insurance and without pensions for which many had labored for decades.

Now, the American people—the American voters—are asking why? Instead of having the intestinal fortitude to tell America the truth—that this country has been on the wrong track for 12 years and that now we have to do some hard and painful things—we pander, we vacillate, we hem and haw. Instead of telling the American people to get involved, learn more about issues and candidates, stop their love affair with divided Government, and face up to our Nation's real problems, we evade those problems.

We worry about getting through the next election. Then, we rationalize, we can lead the Nation in the right direction. But the problem is that we do not lead even after the next election has come and gone.

We have become what our media managers have packaged us to be. We will not handle hot coals. We will not even stand up for our own institution here.

There are those who, in the institution itself, seem to be making a career out of running down the institution; running down the Congress. Remember that Franklin D. Roosevelt said, "If we were to eliminate the Congress, we would automatically cease to be a Republic."

I remember one of John Heywood's proverbs.

"It is a foule bird that fouleth his owne nest."

And yet, there are those, here in this Chamber, who take delight in fouling their own nest, running down their own institution. Somebody needs to stand up for the institution!

Yes, it has warts, it has pimples, it has some carbuncles. Let us do something about them. I have tried for years to put in place an ethics code; to bring television to this Chamber so that the American people could see their representatives in action. We can always deal with those things. But let us not destroy the institution. Let us not help to rip it down, that we might get a hurrah, or a bit of applause from a newspaper editor, a newspaper columnist, or from the great gallery of the American people.

What we need to do is say to the American people, "Your perceptions are wrong. You have been led down the garden path and you do not realize it. Wake up before it is too late."

We are afraid to say that perks are not the real problem in the Congress. Why not state flatly that the real problem is an inability or an unwillingness to lead. That is the real problem. And it applies to both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue: The White House and Capitol Hill.

Capitol Hill, by virtue of its institutional structure itself is not built to lead. There is only one leader, one Hannibal, one person who can speak with one voice. Only one.

One President, one leader with one bully, bully, super-bully pulpit. Indeed, everybody in this city is afraid to lead. We are afraid to stumble and get blamed for all of the failures piling up around us. The President is afraid that the truth about the national debt and the budget deficits might be blamed on him. And, like George Bush, we will not tell the American people that taxes will ultimately have to be raised, entitlements will have to be cut, and massive amounts of money will have to be spent here at home if we are to become economically strong again, cut the deficit, and increase the Nation's productivity so that our country can compete in world markets and reverse the trade deficits.

Most of us admit these things privately, but we shrink from discussing them publicly. What is wrong in America is the fault of all of us—the White House and the Congress. It is also the fault of the press for preferring to cover petty—or more than petty—scandals rather than probe the real issues and help to educate the American people as to the colossal problems that confront them so that they will understand and support the solutions that will be painful.

It is also the fault of the people for dwelling on trivia as a barometer of how well Government functions rather than demanding that Government work to solve our deep and troubling national problems. It is the fault of the White House for preferring political advantage over sound policies. And it is the fault of the Congress for being mired in distractions, terrified of an honest discussion of where we need to take this Nation, and mesmerized by the next election and the ups and downs of the latest polls.

Most Members of Congress are honest public servants, many of whom who work horrendous hours—and the same can be said of staff—and many of whom enjoy little, if any, private life. Most Members of Congress have the same morals and outlook of the hard-working, decent, law-abiding people who send them here. Most Members of Congress—the Senate and the House of Representatives alike—come to Washington, like Mr. Smith of the famous movie, with visions and ideals, and with a commitment to public service that is admirable and that would be a source of pride to their constituents if they could see their Senator or Representative in the House at work every day. In the beginning, anyway, that is the way it is.

But before long, it becomes clear that those aspirations and noble goals brought here by those good people who were so determined to serve, those aspirations and goals have to share the stage and the schedule with the other most demanding requirement for service in the institution; namely, fundraising, holding out the hand with a tin cup, saying give me, give me, give me.

Fundraising eats up a Member's time, fractures his attention, and insidiously and subtly compromises his principles. To raise the vast sums of money now required to remain in public service, a Member caters to special interest groups because the special interest groups control the bulk of the piles of money needed to pay for costly television plugs, negative campaign ads, sound bites, and sarcastic voice-over announcers who are best at attacking opponents.

Public debate of the issues has been reduced to mush, designed to avoid stepping on any toes. Negative campaigns become the rule because they trade on dissatisfaction rather than solutions, and they provide a way of avoiding a discussion of tough problems that requires unpopular solutions.

Legislation is drafted with an eye to whom we need to please and to whom we have to avoid offending. As a result, the average American is shut out of the process, and that only deepens the cynicism and gives the special interest groups even more power as a source of campaign revenue.

Here, in fact, lies one of the major problems if one is looking for what is wrong with the Congress. The problem is not chauffeur-driven cars or cheap haircuts. The problem is not even too many committee assignments or a too complex budget process—although certainly those problems should be addressed. The problem is not too many staff people or the lack of a line-item veto. The problem is too much money in political campaigns.

Plutarch tells us that Philip of Macedon's maxim was to procure empire with money and not money by empire. There was a common saying, says Plutarch, that it was not Philip but Philip's gold that conquered the cities of Greece. Philip's gold. That is what we are talking about here—Philip's gold! It conquers the legislative agendas, as Philip's gold conquered the cities of Greece. "Philip's gold" is rubbing the political palms of those of us who want to continue in public service. We have to raise that money. Campaigns are costly.

The first time I ran for office with Jennings Randolph—both on the same ticket, running for two seats in the Senate, in the same election—we had a combined war chest of about $50,000—$50,000! That was before we had all of these costly media consultants and costly television advertising. Those were the old days when we did our stump speaking in campaigns.

We went to the county courthouses. I took my fiddle, played a few tunes at the courthouse. We visited all the fraternal organizations, the Odd Fellows, the Knights of Pythias, the Moose, the Elks, the Owls and went to churches and singing conventions and county fairs and family reunions, and spoke on the street corners and the county courthouse lawns.

We do not do it that way anymore. We have to have "Philip's gold" nowadays. Too much money in political campaigns. That is the problem. The problem is, that to stay in office, Members trim their sails and vote and speak in a manner that will keep their campaign funds—"Philip's gold"—pouring in.

What may be good for the country becomes secondary. Courageous action is harder to come by. Independent thought is all but stifled. What we see is the Alcibiades syndrome at work. Alcibiades was an Athenian general and politician. He was young and handsome, a pupil of Socrates, a man of tremendous ability, but with an equally tremendous ego and ambition. He put his own interests ahead of his country's interests. He was unwilling to place the national interest above personal advantage, tended to put his own private political ambitions before the public interest.

So that is what we see today in America, a political climate in which no one is willing to take the rap for a difficult decision, in which personal and private political considerations take precedence over the public good—in short, a full-blown case of the Alcibiades syndrome: personal and party political interests first; the public be damned. How will my vote affect my reelection chances with this special interest group or that special interest group, this pressure group or that pressure group, this one-issue group or that one-issue group that will put money in the hat when it is passed around?

But there is good news today. We have on the floor here today a vehicle that can begin to address our problems if we will but take the opportunity to use it. This legislation will help to stop the endless pursuit of money by congressional candidates.

I, like most other Senators, have accepted money for political campaigns from special interest groups. Nothing unlawful about it. It is legal. I reported it, as I was required to. And as long as we are saddled with the present system, we will keep on going through this sordid and demeaning exercise unless we are filthy rich and can afford to finance our own campaigns. But within the institution I have tried to put an end to the current system. As majority leader, I tried it, time and time again. We have to keep on trying.

I said a moment ago that in my first campaign, my then colleague, Senator Randolph, and I ran on $50,000 or less—for two Senate seats. That would be a bargain basement price today, $50,000. Today, it would be a joke.

Will Rogers once said, "Politics has got so expensive that it takes a lot of money even to get beat with." And it does take a lot of money—$4 million on the average for a winning Senate seat and sometimes more than that even "to get beat with."

The legislation before the Senate will establish voluntary spending limits, provide vouchers for broadcast time, and allow challengers a better chance to compete against an incumbent.

I am rather amused at all of the No. 3 tubs full of crocodile tears that I see shed on this floor for "challengers." Yet, to tell the truth, there is not a Senator here who wants a challenger. Not one. I do not want a challenger. No other Senator wants a challenger. But it is a heart-warming spectacle to behold all the tears that are shed on this floor for challengers. Still, indeed, there is a need for a level playing field for both the challenger and the incumbent. I, too, was a challenger once, and many others who are here were challengers to incumbent Senators. If they had not been a challenger, they would not have gotten here.

This legislation will lessen the influence of PAC's and encourage cleaner, less negative campaigns.

This legislation is a good first step toward returning participation in government to the average citizen. Passing this legislation is, I believe, the most important action we can take to restore leadership and decency and integrity to the democratic process. The President makes speeches in the White House East Room about the need for reform. This is his chance for reform. If he truly believes in reform, this legislation is the reform that we must undertake if we are ever going to wrest government away from special interest groups and return it to the people where it belongs.

The spending limits in this legislation are voluntary. If a candidate feels he wishes to ignore those limits, he may do so, but a Federal matching-fund system is set up to help level the playing field if the limits are exceeded.

President Bush, who decries to the high heavens the public financing of congressional campaigns, benefits from public financing for his own Presidential campaign, and will have accepted more than $200 million in Federal matching funds by the end of this campaign. Yet, he claims he will veto this bill if it passes, in part because of these matching-funds provisions. But in truth, the use of public moneys to level the playing field for challengers and incumbents and to lessen the influence of the special interests on American political decisions would be one of the best uses of public tax moneys that could be devised.

If the American people only knew the Atlas hold that special interest groups have on the peoples' representatives in this institution, on both ends of Capitol Hill, they would be shocked beyond description.

Daniel Webster—whose speeches schoolboys memorized for years—while he was chairman of the Finance Committee, was on a retainer for the Second Bank of the United States and wrote a letter to Nicholas Biddle, president of the bank, in which Webster reminded Biddle that his retainer had not been renewed or refreshed as usual.

Imagine that! Daniel Webster, a Member of the United States Senate, chairing the Finance Committee and leading the struggle against Jackson's bank plan, being at that time on the payroll of the bank. Webster wrote a letter to Biddle reminding him of that retainer and saying, "If it is wished that my relation to the bank should be continued, it may be well to send me the usual retainer."

This surely was one of the most egregious breaches of ethics in the history of the Senate, and it was one which will forever stain the shining name and reputation of Daniel Webster.

Yet, in a sense, we Senators and House Members are all somewhat like Daniel Webster. In a sense, we are retainers for the special-interest groups that grease our political palms with "Philip's gold." Of course, Webster's retainer fees went into his own pocket. The moneys that we get go into our campaign committee's coffers.

But, nevertheless, the influence of "Philip's gold" on Members is not to be doubted. Let a bill come before this Senate that affects one of these special interest groups, and there will be Nicholas Biddles all around the Capitol. They will be standing at the elevators when Senators get on; they will be standing at the elevators when Senators get off; they will be standing in the reception room; they will be standing in the subway where Senators get on and off the subway car, reminding Senators how that particular interest group stands on that particular legislation. They will be there; Nicholas Biddles all over the Capitol. There is only a difference in degree, perhaps a small distinction.

We all join the swelling chorus that says the American people need to take back their Government. The pending legislation will provide the most direct way to do that, and simultaneously to improve the quality of that Government with one fell stroke.

The money chase and the erosion of conviction and honest debate which it fosters are the fundamental problems here on Capitol Hill. And, indeed, in this great city of Washington, the abuses that this conference report would curb in congressional and Presidential elections are cancerous—not low grade cancers, but fast growing cancers that are feeding the cynicism that is rampant in America and contributing to the gridlock, do-nothing Government that we all deplore.

If we cannot take this fundamental step in the interest of our own system of government, it will be the unmistakable evidence of total irresponsibility in this body and in the White House. We all know the problems, and in our hearts we know that letting the current abusive, corruptive campaign finance system fester any longer will rot the foundations of this representative democracy.

Mr. President, it will do something more than that. It will sear and eat away at the hearts and consciences of those of us who participate in the current campaign financing system—the consciences of those of us who accept "Philip's gold."

In Greek mythology, we read of a fountain in Caria, in ancient geography, a part of Asia Minor, the Salmacis fountain. It got its name from a nymph of the same name who attended the fountain. One day a handsome youth named Hermaphroditus stopped by to drink from the fountain. Salmacis fell in love with the youth who had come to drink at the spring. He rejected her advances and begged her to go into the woods and leave him alone.

Salmacis withdrew into the forest, but kept an eye on Hermaphroditus. Lured by the cool and refreshing waters of the spring, he plunged into the waters. Salmacis plunged in after him, and clung to him and prayed that he would never be separated from her. Her prayer was answered as their bodies were fused into one. Hermaphroditus, realizing that he no longer existed as a man, prayed that whatever man who bathed or drank from that pool would become only half a man. This accounts for the mythological tradition concerning the fountain of Salmacis. To drink from the fountain was to lose the essence of one's self.

We drink from the waters of Salmacis and are no longer our own true selves when we perpetuate the current campaign system in which we finance our campaigns through the contributions of special interest groups which naturally expect something in return. They expect to influence, at some point in time, the legislation in which the group is interested. And to the extent that they are able to influence us, they rob us of our manhood, and we emerge after drinking the waters of Salmacis not so much our own man as we were before. No longer will it be easy to wear no man's collar but our own.

Mr. President, indeed, there is something deeper, something that is more eternal, something that gets inside the core of the human spirit and soul when one allows himself to be influenced in the discharge of the people's business by money—"Philip's gold"—in the form of campaign contributions. To that degree, he subordinates the interests of the American taxpayers, he subordinates the interests of his own country, and he subordinates the interests of his own grandchildren. He has put his own personal ambitions, his own political and private interests ahead of the public interest. In short, again, a full-blown case of the Alcibiades syndrome.

John of Salisbury said that it was glory enough for Prothaonius that he was a man of whom his grandson need not be ashamed. Can we Senators, when the time comes as I said to someone earlier today, when we leave this Senate, however we leave it, whether through death, through defeat, or through retirement, can we look into the mirror and say: "I have been my own man. I wore no man's collar but my own. Was I a man of whom my grandson need not be ashamed?" Can we say that?

Failure to enact this legislation will be the real scandal in Washington this year. A veto of this landmark bill by President Bush will be the real proof that Washington is completely out of touch with the American people. I hope the American people will rise up and demand that we take this step as a beginning to a return to honest, effective government. If the American people want a change in the way their elected officials in Congress and in the White House do business, here is the real way to effect it. Someone asked the Greek philosopher, "What has philosophy given you?" Aristippus answered: "The power of speaking fearlessly to all men."

A vote to eliminate the present system of campaign financing will give us the power of speaking fearlessly to all men. No longer will we have to be "half a man," drinking from the fountain of Salmacis, going after Philip's gold, cringing before the groups that pour money into our campaigns and to that degree control our vote; but like Aristippus, we can say we have gained the power of speaking fearlessly to all men.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER. Mr. President, every Member who has held a town meeting recently, or listened to constituents, knows that voters are angry—very angry.

They feel cut off from the political process. They question if their elected representatives are too busy raising campaign funds to work on the real issues facing America. They know that our country is not on the right track, but they doubt that elected leaders understand the real problems facing families.

It is a tragedy that voter confidence is so low. Instead of believing that Government is part of the solution, too many voters believe that Government, and especially Congress, is part of the problem.

It's clear that a major contributing factor of voter distrust is our existing campaign finance system. People feel that they are shut out of the political process because of a complicated campaign finance system that they don't understand or trust.

To restore voter confidence in our system, we need to take bold action to revamp our campaign system. This conference report does that.

It curbs the money chase by providing reasonable incentives for candidates to voluntarily accept spending limits. Spending limits are the cornerstone for serious reform. Unless we enact spending limits, we'll just be reshuffling the rules rather than grappling with the real problem.

In addition to spending limits, the conference report seeks to reduce the appearance of special interest influence by cutting the amount of political action committee [PAC] contributions in half—to $2,500—for Senate candidates. The bill also establishes aggregate limits on PAC's. To close the loophole on campaign funds known as soft money, the legislation specifically requires that all political party spending that affects a Federal election will be paid with contributions raised according to Federal election law. This is balanced and fair.

Republicans have attacked this legislation with clever slogans. But the bottom line is that Republicans are unwilling to adopt voluntary spending limits. They are trying to get away with only tinkering at the edges. They focus on minor changes of Federal election law that would modify who could contribute to candidates and parties, and how much could be contributed. But they refuse to discuss voluntary spending limits and real reform. Republicans don't want to end the money chase.

But I believe voters do want to curb the money chase.

Voters are demanding real change. The conference report represents genuine reform. It is not a perfect bill, but it does respond to the overwhelming concern of American voters regarding excessive campaign spending.

Campaign finance reform is an important step toward restoring voter confidence, and I am proud to have consistently supported Democratic efforts in the Senate to enact meaningful campaign reform.

U.S. INTERNATIONAL TELECOMMUNICATIONS POLICY

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I have returned from a meeting in Geneva, Switzerland, with officials at the International Telecommunications Union [ITU]. I discussed with Deputy Secretary Jean Jiggeup and Director

Theodor Irmer the role the United States will play in developing the infrastructure of many former Communist block nations. The collapse of the Soviet Union has caused many Eastern European countries to reexamine their national telecommunications policies. East European governments no longer want to stifle open individual communication by their citizens. Rather, they now recognize the need to link their people with the outside world.

Other developing nations have realized that operating their state telephone monopolies as cash cows has resulted in a crumbling telecommunications infrastructure unable to function in the world economy. Former Communist bloc countries and developing countries are beginning to recognize that modernization of the telecommunications infrastructure creates new efficiencies in their economies.

As a result, the world is experiencing a phenomenon in communications. Never before in the history of modern telecommunications have so many government-controlled telephone monopolies opened up to foreign investment and ownership. I learned at my meeting with ITU officials that over 25 countries have completed telecommunications restructuring efforts. Another 35 countries have begun or are currently evaluating restructuring.

Privatization and restructuring of the global telecommunications industry has created unprecedented opportunities for U.S. telecommunications companies that were unimaginable even 5 years ago. At this extraordinary moment in world history, however, seven of America's preeminent telecommunications companies are hindered by U.S. law from taking full advantage of these openings.

The modified final judgment [MFJ] prohibits the regional Bell operating companies [RBOC's] from providing international interexchange telecommunications services between foreign countries and the United States through separate foreign telecommunications entities. Additionally, the RBOC's are prohibited from importing telecommunications equipment or customer premise equipment manufactured by a foreign subsidiary. Foreign companies competing with the RBOC's to establish foreign ventures frequently argue to foreign governments that the MFJ precludes the RBOC's from fully operating in foreign markets. This creates confusion, hesitation, and delay that adversely affects the efforts of U.S. companies to conduct legitimate business overseas.

When an RBOC is interested in participating in a foreign venture, it must seek a waiver from the Justice Department on a case-by-case basis. This obstacle places the RBOC at a serious disadvantage with foreign competitors.

Mr. President, last year following a visit to a NYNEX telecommunications facility in Portsmouth, Great Britain, I called for the elimination of domestic restrictions that prohibit RBOC's from carrying long distance traffic from foreign owned companies back to the United States. This past December, the RBOC's filed with the Justice Department a request for a generic waiver to the MFJ to permit them to acquire foreign telecommunication companies providing communications services to the United States.

This generic international waiver would break down a self-imposed trade barrier facing U.S. companies, and allow the RBOC's to operate freely on the global stage. Our domestic law currently restricts seven of our largest companies from participating in what truly is a global revolution. It is time for this restriction to end. It is vital to American trade policy that the Justice Department act quickly to expedite this waiver request.

Last month Ambassador Bradley Holmes wrote the Justice Department in support of this waiver request. Ambassador Holmes agrees that America's international trade and foreign policy interests would be served well by the granting of this waiver request.

Mr. President, this is another example of the excellent work being done by the State Department's Bureau of International Communications and Information Policy.

On a number of occasions, I have discussed America's international telecommunications policy with Richard Beard, the Bureau's Deputy Coordinator. I have always found Dick's analysis of the complex telecommunications policy questions to be extremely insightful. We can be proud to have a public servant of Dick's caliber, coordinating our Nation's international communications policy.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have Ambassador Holmes' letter to Justice and an article appearing in Washington Telecom Week printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD following my remarks.

(See exhibit 1).

Mr. PRESSLER. I would like to describe those articles. First of all, the Washington Telecom Week is the inside Washington to look at Federal Washington's policymaking. It states: "The State Department argues the Regional Bell Operating Companies should acquire foreign entities under generic waiver."

The State Dept. is strongly supporting a move by the Regional Bell Operating Companies (RBOCs) to lift Modified Final Judgment (MFJ) controls on foreign investment in order to take advantage of the restructuring of the telecommunications industry in Eastern Europe. In a letter seeking to enlist the help of the Justice Dept. on the matter, a top State official asserts RBOCs should be allowed to acquire foreign telecommunications entities under a generic waiver rather than the current case-by-case approach that is said to put the Bells at a serious competitive disadvantage with other U.S. and international telecommunications giants.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, BUREAU OF INTERNATIONAL COMMUNICATIONS AND INFORMATION POLICY,

Washington, DC, March 13, 1992.

Mr. JAMES F. RILL,
Assistant Attorney General, Antitrust Division,
Department of Justice, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. RILL: I am writing about the request for a generic international waiver of the Modification of Final Judgment (MFJ) filed by the seven regional Bell companies on December 31, 1991. The waiver will permit the Bell companies to acquire foreign telecommunications entities providing international telecommunications services between foreign countries and the United States. Consistent with our previous letters to the Department of Justice on specific waivers requests by the Bell companies (attached as Tabs 1 and 2), I urge the Department to recommend to the Court that no substantial anticompetitive harm will occur if the waiver authority that previously was granted on a case-by-case basis to the regional Bell companies is extended generically.

Although I understand that the position the Department of Justice takes in this matter will be determined primarily by domestic antitrust considerations, I would like to bring certain international trade and other foreign policy interests to your attention.

Until quite recently, virtually all foreign countries provided telephone services to their populations through a government monopoly. This has had deleterious consequences, not only for U.S. commercial enterprises seeking to do business abroad, but also for the ability of individual citizens to communicate freely and inexpensively. Today, business opportunities are created when foreign countries restructure their telecommunications industries by privatizing telecommunication services and by opening previously monopolistic markets. To date over 25 countries have completed some form of restructuring and restructurings are now underway or being considered in at least 25 countries. This trend is particularly pronounced in the former communist bloc and in developing countries.

As a result of these foreign telecommunications restructurings and the consequential opportunities created for the global telecommunication industry, the practical implementation of the MFJ has had effects which could not have been anticipated when the AT&T case was settled. Foremost is the case-by-case waiver procedure required before the regional Bell companies can acquire equity interests in foreign companies. This waiver procedure has created artificial barriers, both real and perceived, for the regional Bell companies and has hindered their ability to aggressively pursue foreign opportunities. Many foreign telephone administrators, for example, view the MFJ constraints as impediments to Bell company participation in privatization bids or resent what they consider to be U.S. government intrusion into their sovereign affairs.

The generic international waiver would alleviate these foreign trade barriers and advance U.S. foreign policy interests by allowing the regional Bell companies to compete on a level playing field with both their domestic and international competitors, when attempting to acquire equity interests in foreign restructurings. The international trade interests of the United States are obviously served when domestic telecommunications firms, such as the regional Bell companies, compete effectively in these foreign restructurings. The export of telecommunications products, services, and investments contributes directly to improving the U.S. balance of trade and realizing the basic human right to communicate freely.

These international trade and foreign policy considerations do not imply that the regional Bell companies necessarily would be more effective than other domestic telecommunications firms in advancing U.S. policy interests. Absent an appropriately conditioned waiver, however, seven of our largest domestic telecommunications firms would be precluded from competing in a growing number of foreign restructurings, despite the policy interests of the United States that may be served by their doing so.

I urge that the Department of Justice give appropriate consideration to the international trade and foreign policy interests I have identified in determining that the generic waiver will not constitute substantial anticompetitive harm, particularly because the opportunities created by privatization could not have been anticipated by the MFJ.

Sincerely,

Ambassador BRADLEY P. HOLMES,
U.S. Coordinator and Director.

[From Washington Telecom Week, Apr. 10, 1992]

STATE DEPT. ARGUES RBOCS SHOULD ACQUIRE FOREIGN ENTITIES UNDER GENERIC WAIVER

The State Dept. is strongly supporting a move by the Regional Bell Operating Companies (RBOCs) to lift Modified Final Judgment (MFJ) controls on foreign investment in order to take advantage of the restructuring of the telecommunications industry in Eastern Europe. In a letter seeking to enlist the help of the Justice Dept. on the matter, a top State official asserts RBOCs should be allowed to acquire foreign telecommunications entities under a generic waiver rather than the current case-by-case approach that is said to put the Bells at a serious competitive disadvantage with other U.S. and international telecommunications giants.

The RBOCs filed a request in December for a generic waiver to the Modified Final Judgment (MFJ) breaking up AT&T so that they would be permitted to acquire foreign telecommunications entities that provide services between the U.S. and foreign countries. State Dept. Ambassador Bradley Holmes told James Rill, the assistant attorney general of the antitrust division at Justice, that "no substantial anticompetitive harm" will occur if the waiver authority that was previously granted on a case-by-case basis to the RBOCs is extended generically. Holmes made this point in a March 13 letter to Rill but has not yet received a response. Holmes wants Justice to tell U.S. District Judge Harold Greene, who oversaw the breakup of AT&T, that a generic waiver should be issued. It is Greene who will make the final decision.

One industry source emphasized that every time the RBOCs want to participate in a foreign venture, they have to ask Justice for a specific waiver. This is an additional hurdle the RBOCs have to jump through before a foreign entity can consider their business proposals, and the RBOCs say the process puts them at a disadvantage compared to other U.S. firms that want to acquire foreign entities. The RBOCs apparently have not yet decided whether to press for the waiver request if Justice does not give a clear expression of support for a generic waiver.

While Justice will zero in mainly on domestic antitrust issues, Holmes urged the department to also consider the international trade and foreign policy interests surrounding the generic waiver request. He pointed out that business opportunities are created when foreign countries restructure their telecommunications industries by privatizing telecommunication services and opening monopolistic markets. Over 25 countries have completed some form of restructuring, and restructuring are underway or being considered in at least 35 countries, he said. This trend is particularly pronounced in the former communist bloc and in developing countries.

Because of this foreign telecommunications restructuring, the implementation of the MFJ has had effects that could not have been anticipated when AT&T was broken up, Holmes emphasized. He said the case-by-case waiver procedure has created artificial barriers for the RBOCs and has hindered their ability to aggressively pursue foreign business opportunities. Holmes told Rill that many foreign telephone administrators "view the MFJ constraints as impediments to Bell company participation in privatization bids or resent what they consider to be U.S. government intrusion into their sovereign affairs."

Holmes said that the generic international waiver would alleviate these foreign trade barriers and advance U.S. foreign policy interests by allowing the RBOCs to better compete domestically and internationally when attempting to acquire equity interests in foreign restructuring.

Holmes urged Justice to give "appropriate consideration" to international trade and foreign policy interests "in determining that the generic waiver will not constitute substantial anticompetitive harm, particularly because the opportunities created by privatization could not have been anticipated by the MFJ."

Justice is reviewing the original waiver request, the comments filed by various parties and the letter from Holmes. There are no deadlines for either the Justice Dept. or Judge Greene to act on the waiver request.

ARMENIAN GENOCIDE: A HISTORY WHICH MUST NOT BE FORGOTTEN

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, today we pause to remember the victims of the first genocide of this century. I wish to add my voice to others commemorating the 77th anniversary of the Armenian genocide in which 1.5 million Armenians were killed between 1915 and 1923 by forces of the Ottoman Turkish Empire.

I became interested in this issue as a student at Oxford University long before I entered public service. Since that time I have believed it important to discuss publicly the Armenian genocide often, so that this cruel lesson of history is not forgotten. Mr. President, it is important that we not ignore or forget such events in history.

It is important not only because of a moral imperative that we honor the memory of the victims of such atrocities. It is also important because when the world forgets such events, it allows future despots a freer hand in conducting genocide against other races—as occurred in both Germany and Cambodia. Therefore, Mr. President, let us consider the events of the Armenian genocide in a historical context.

In 1915, the Ottoman government, controlled by the Young Turk Committee, began to use deportation and massacre as it implemented a policy of annihilation directed at Armenians living in the empire. Because the United States remained the sole major Western state with a diplomatic presence in the Ottoman Empire, our Embassy in Constantinople became the primary contact for those reporting on the escalating violence against the Armenians. Therefore, the United States Archives hold some of the most comprehensive documentation in the world concerning the Armenian genocide.

The edict of deportation was promulgated on May 27, 1915. However, this act simply formalized a governmental policy which had its roots in the reign of the Ottoman Sultan Abdul Hamid II, under whose rule some 300,000 Armenians were massacred from 1894 to 1896. Once the edict was announced, Armenians throughout the empire were deported with little notice.

The men were often separated and killed. The women, children, and the elderly were forced to march across Asia Minor and Turkish Armenia into the Syrian desert. Most were killed or died of starvation, disease, or exposure.

Then United States Ambassador to Turkey, Henry Morgenthau, soon reached the conclusion that under the guise of a resettlement policy, the Ottoman government was engaged in a systematic effort to exterminate its Armenian population. The Ambassador relayed his findings to Washington, which authorized him to make formal protests to appropriate Ottoman officials.

Congress authorized the establishment of a private relief agency to raise funds in the United States and send aid to Armenian deportees scattered across Syria. Ambassador Morgenthau and other United States officials played key roles in disbursing aid to the Armenians in the face of regular interference from Ottoman officials. Unfortunately, this was not enough to stem the tide of tragedy.

In the end, 1.5 million Armenians perished. More than 500,000 more escaped to the north across the Russian border, south into Arab countries, to European countries, and the United States. The Armenians of the Ottoman Empire virtually were eliminated from their ancestral homeland. Today, fewer than 100,000 declared Armenians reside in Turkey.

Mr. President, I rise today for three reasons. First, to honor the memory of those who suffered and died during the Armenian genocide. They died not because of anything they did, but simply because of who they were. They must not be forgotten.

Second, as I have said in this Chamber in the past, Turkey should officially accept the historical accuracy of the Armenian genocide. So long as Turkey denies these events occurred, some Americans will be willing to join the denial effort. Turkey must accept—as most of the rest of the world has already done—the reality of the genocide. We will continue to value Turkey as a staunch ally, but it will never fully achieve its potential standing in the international community unless it accepts these facts.

Mr. President, I have said to Turkish officials during visits to that country, that I feel it would be in Turkey's interests, both internationally and historically to accept these facts.

Finally, I rise today to help ensure the world itself does not forget the tragic proportions of the Armenian genocide. If it does, I fear the daunting words of the German philosopher, Georg Hegel, will reflect a frightening reality. He said: "What experience and history teach is this—that people and governments never have learned anything from history, or acted on principles deduced from it." Mr. President, it is frightening to think of living in a world doomed to suffer the savagery of tyrants simply because it fails to remember the tragedies it already has survived.

WHY IS RUSSIA SELLING SUBMARINES TO LIBYA AND IRAN?

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, today I received shocking news from the Government of Latvia that the Government of Russia is apparently prepared to deliver a submarine to the Libyan Government using the Latvian port of Bolderaja once it is repaired by former Soviet military and Libyan technicians in a Russian-owned factory run by the Russian military. Such an action would be in direct violation of U.N. sanctions against Libya adopted on March 31. This situation is intolerable, and I call on President Bush and Secretary of State Baker to exert immediate and maximum pressure to prevent this submarine transfer to Libya from occurring.

According to the Latvian newspaper Diena, a second submarine is being retrofitted at the same factory for shipment to Iran. This, too, is something the administration should work to prevent.

The sovereign Government of Latvia has protested in the strongest possible terms the preparations for this perilous, illegal transfer of weapons technology. It is not surprising that Libyan dictator Mu'ammar Qadhafi, a notorious supporter of state-sponsored terrorism and of the Palestine Liberation Organization, will go anywhere and pay any price for new weapons capabilities.

However, it is appalling that elements of the Russian Government, which the United States is preparing to provide enormous amounts of foreign aid, is working with him to achieve this nefarious objective.

Mr. President, it appears this may be a case where the old Soviet military industrial complex is flexing its muscle in today's Russia. It is possible that continued retrofitting of the Libyan and Iranian submarines is an attempt to embarrass President Yeltsin and the reform elements of the Russian Government. Nevertheless, the submarine transfer demonstrates the continued strength of the former Soviet military and bureaucracy. It highlights the fact that with these elements of the old regime in power, unless great care is exercised, U.S. assistance efforts may be largely wasted.

The Latvian Government has appealed for United States help in stopping this action by its larger neighbor. The Latvian Government also has stated that the submarine transfers underscore the broader issue of unwanted military forces in the Baltic States. Now it appears Russia is preparing to ignore the sovereignty of Latvia by using the military and Russian owned factories in Latvia to conduct illegal activity. On April 22, Latvia protested to the Government of Russia. The Latvian Government maintains that the Libyan technicians working on the Libyan-bought submarine were invited by the Russian Foreign Economic Relations Ministry. Yesterday, the Latvians also sent a diplomatic note to the United States State Department and the United Nations.

The Russian Press Agency, has indicated that the submarines were purchased from the Soviet Government in 1988 and that the Yeltsin administration is prepared to honor the contracts made by the Soviet regime with these terrorist countries—despite the repudiation of the Communist system by the Russian people, and despite the U.N. embargo against Libya. The Russian Press Agency quoted a naval officer as saying that the plant will honor the contract made between the Libyan Government, the Soviet Armed Forces, and the shipyard.

Mr. President, President Boris Yeltsin's quick denunciation of the massacre of innocent civilians in Vilnius in January 1992 and his appeal to Russian soldiers to restrain themselves then and during August 1991, were to a large extent, responsible for ending bloodshed and preventing further deaths and injuries.

That model behavior is not reflected in the submarine transfers. As far as this Senator is concerned, all future assistance to the Government of Russia is now on the line and in question. The time has come for the Russian Government to be held accountable for the actions of its military or bureaucracy.

The Russian Government has claimed former Soviet military bases and former all-union factories in the Baltic countries. In fact, on February 10, the Central Administration of the Commonwealth Baltic Fleet Ship-Repair Factories sent a document to the ship-repair factory stating that it remained the property of the Russian Federation. It is therefore responsible for the unconscionable events taking place in Latvia.

Mr. President, I urge President Bush and Secretary Baker to take decisive action in denouncing these actions of the Russian Government. Unless President Yeltsin blocks these arms transfers, I am convinced the only responsible course is to suspend all non-humanitarian assistance to Russia that is funded, directly or indirectly, by the people of the United States.

In addition to an immediate suspension of these illegal arms transfers, the United States should take energetic and effective action to terminate the presence of over 100,000 former Soviet troops and numerous air, naval, and army bases in the so-called Baltic military district. To this end the Senator from Arizona, Mr. DECONCINI, and I will propose an amendment to the Freedom and Support Act for Russia, S. 2532. The amendment would condition United States foreign assistance to Russia on significant progress in the removal of former Soviet troops from the Baltic nations.

Although President Yeltsin has indicated Russia's eventual willingness to leave the Baltic States—his government has offered a variety of weak excuses for delaying the timetable for removing occupation forces. In my opinion, these excuses do not justify a continued military presence.

Mr. President, it now appears these bases are being used for the hostile activity, contrary to international law and American foreign policy, of providing submarines to Libya and Iran. This is all the more reason for the United States to insist on Russia's immediate departure from the Baltic States.

Until its destabilizing forces are removed, the Russian Government will continue to conduct military exercises without the approval of the Baltic governments. In truth, the Baltic States can be used as the launch site or the port of exit for sales to states hostile to United States interests and international agreements. I am disturbed to learn that the Government of Estonia recently noted that former Soviet troop levels have increased rather than decreased in recent months. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of an article entitled, "For Red Army in the Baltics, a Long Goodbye," from the Los Angeles Times be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, the problem of former Soviet bases in the Baltic States is a long-standing issue. This is not the first time bases in the Baltic States have been used for illegal activities contrary to the interests of the United States and its allies. For instance, soon after Iraq's invasion of Kuwait, Senator HELMS told the Senate that the Soviet Government was training Iraqi soldiers in Latvia. Unfortunately, his revelation was right on target.

Mr. President, we must plug the holes in the international coalition against Libya and Iran. The United States must condemn these submarine sales and support prompt departure of former Soviet troops from the territory of some of the newest European allies—Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania.

[From the Los Angeles Times, Mar. 30, 1992]
FOR RED ARMY IN BALTICS, IT MAY BE A LONG GOODBYE

(By Tamara Jones)

One afternoon last month, the Red Army cordially invited the international media to observe what was being billed as a historic occasion: the first withdrawal of former Soviet troops from this newly independent Baltic nation after 50 years of occupation.

The gates of the army compound just outside Vilnius were flung open, and seven massive trucks bearing surface-to-air missiles revved their engines. With television cameras rolling, the usually taciturn soldiers began to ham it up, waving goodbye and tracing their fingers along road maps pointing the way back to Russia.

The journalists waited. The Red Army smiled and waived some more. Eventually, the cameras were turned off. So were the truck engines. The exasperated journalists left. The Red Army did not.

Later, a sheepish commander explained that it was all basically a publicity stunt to signal the army's readiness to retreat.

But the farce is no laughing matter to the Lithuanians, Estonians and Latvians who consider themselves still occupied by an unpredictable foreign army six months after the disintegrating Soviet Union recognized Baltic independence.

Confusion, chaos and corruption dominate what is supposed to be the withdrawal of at least 120,000 ex-Soviet troops from the Baltics; tensions already have led to shootings at border posts and dark threats of starving out the occupiers. Meanwhile, officers and soldiers have been selling everything from bullets to—in at least one instance—entire bases on the sly.

Although Russia has accepted responsibility for the army and agrees that the troops must withdraw, the debate is only now heating up over how quickly they will leave, where they will go and, most important, who will pay for all of it.

Further complicating the touchy issue are reports that many officers are vehemently opposed to giving up their apartments, villas and higher standards of living in the Baltics for an uncertain future back home in the former Soviet Union, where a lack of housing already has forced many military families who have been withdrawn from Eastern Europe to live in tents.

"It is just as dangerous to take an army out into a vacuum as it is to leave it behind," said Sergei Shakhrai, the head of the Russian delegation negotiating terms of the pullout.

The Baltics have demanded that all troops leave by the end of the year, which government officials privately concede is an impossible deadline. Russian commanders say a seven-to-10-year timetable is more likely—a possibility the Baltics find chilling.

The deepest fear in the Baltics is that political instability in the Commonwealth of Independent States, particularly Russia, will lead to another coup attempt and give military hard-liners still stationed in the Baltics a chance to crack down. There is also concern that fuel and food shortages in Russia will worsen, possibly curtailing supplies to the troops here and triggering panic among the soldiers.

Soviet troops killed 14 civilians in Lithuania and seven in Latvia in bloody attempts to crush Baltic independence a year ago. The Lithuanian Parliament still keeps itself barricaded behind sandbags and barbed wire, saying the siege mentality must prevail until the last soldier leaves.

"We cannot exclude the possibility of major conflicts, but we hope to avoid them," said Toomas Puura, head of the parliamentary commission on defense in tiny Estonia, where the smallest Red Army contingent—about 36,000—is stationed.

Such warnings are unlikely to impress the military command.

With no real armies of their own, no international pressure being brought to bear on the occupying army, and weak economies still desperately dependent on Russian imports, the Baltics are virtually powerless to back up their demands.

"We can tell them to get out all we want," said Mikhail Stepicevs, head of Latvia's parliamentary commission on defense. "They're going to withdraw, but they're in no hurry. What timetable do we want? Yesterday. But the Russian side wants to stay a long, long time, as long as they can, and maybe even keep a military base here."

So far, none of the Baltic nations have indicated any willingness to allow a continued Red Army presence, and the army in turn is loath to leave behind strategic air-defense, marine and early-warning systems that would be expensive to re-create in Russia.

The Russians have rebuffed even the most basic requests, such as an inventory of personnel, equipment and military installations on Baltic territory, and Baltic inspectors are denied access to the thousands of bases, airstrips and other facilities that sit on what is now sovereign territory.

Two nuclear reactors and at least six chemical weapons depots are thought to be in Estonia alone, and a general perception of disarray in the ranks leads Stepicevs to conclude with alarming certainty. "If I wanted, I could buy nuclear weapons."

Night-vision equipment and small arms have reportedly turned up at local flea markets, and Estonian officials have discovered that an entire Soviet base—complete with barracks, a canteen, a central-heating plant and a peat farm—was sold illegally to a civilian for about $29,000. Who sold it and where the money went is anyone's guess.

"They're selling everything that isn't nailed down," said a Western diplomat in Riga, Latvia, where the Baltic forces are headquartered.

"They strip the wiring right out of the walls when they leave and take all the lights," added the diplomat, speaking on condition of anonymity. "It's one thing to sell off the occasional greatcoat or fur cap, but * * * Kalashnikovs and bullets are being sold. The real concern for the Latvian government is that all these arms are disappearing, and where are they going?"

The Commander of the Baltic forces, Gen. Valery Miranov, says only that "some small parts" of his command are "disorganized."

Miranov says there are 120,000 troops in the region, but other estimates by Western diplomats and Baltic authorities run as high as 400,000. Some troops already have left, but there are no official figures, although Estonia calculates that up to one-third of the forces there have already left without fanfare.

At least 80,000 officers also are believed to have retired in the Baltics, particularly in Latvia, where the population is almost equally divided between Russians and Latvians. Radical nationalist groups in Latvia have been demanding that the citizenship law now being drafted exclude Russians and force the deportation of all retired officers.

Miranov recently linked the citizenship question to withdrawal of the troops, much to the ire of Latvian leaders who complained that he has no right to meddle in their domestic affairs.

"We have to solve the question of citizenship of army members and pensioners and all Russian-speaking inhabitants first," Miranov said at a briefing of Western journalists who had asked when troops would withdraw.

Miranov also bitterly complained that 15 Latvian border guards had "physically assaulted" two Russian officers last January when they drove from Latvia into Lithuania. He gave no further details but stressed that such incidents could easily escalate into violence.

"It is impossible to predict what will happen if the person involved isn't calm," he said.

In Lithuania, border guards earlier this year tried in vain to shoot out the tires of a Red Army truck that roared past a checkpoint into Belarus.

There have been several other incidents viewed by the Baltics as deliberate provocations. Estonian authorities at the border angrily unhooked railroad cars carrying new cribs to Tallinn, forcing them to hitch a ride on the next train. Two trainloads of military supplies were also seized in the Estonian town of Tartu.

The question of ownership is one of the main stumbling blocks in negotiations over withdrawal, since each of the Baltic nations is trying to nationalize all or part of the military property and equipment currently in Red Army hands. They argue that this will partially compensate the Baltics for the military equipment and private property seized when the Soviet troops began their occupation and for the environmental damage they leave behind.

But the Russians are presenting their own bill to the Baltics, saying they must be reimbursed millions of dollars for the property they cannot take with them, such as postwar buildings, airstrips and military hospitals.

In addition, Moscow has indicated that the pullout might be speeded up if the Baltics follow wealthy Germany's example and pay for housing to be built for officers back home. Estonia already is exploring the possibility of using Western credits and Estonian construction workers to do just that.

"When the Soviet Union occupied Estonia, they took away all the arms and equipment of the Estonian Defense Forces—the equipment of 130,000 troops—the submarines, the airplanes, the airports * * * Everything was confiscated," recalled Puura, the Estonian lawmaker.

"We're just now beginning to calculate the environmental damage, and nobody could ever estimate the moral damage done to our people over 50 years," he said. "Tens of thousands of people were deported and killed, and our country went from a normal modern, developed country to an underdeveloped Third World country."

"And now, after all the damage they've inflicted, they're still trying to make us pay for what they did to us," he fumed.

But current hardships have imposed at least a partially symbiotic relationship, with local military commanders trading fuel for food from private farmers.

Oleg Popovitch, minister of the Russian Embassy in Estonia, agreed that his country should pay for any damages but said Russia "does not accept the nationalization of all Red Army equipment."

"If the Estonian Defense Forces are interested in arms, we'll be happy to sell to them or make deals as part of the compensation. But seizing them? That's impossible."

Popovitch estimated Soviet property in Estonia at well over $1 billion—about 30 times the entire Estonian budget.

Conscripts themselves are reluctant to discuss going back home, even when commanding officers leave the room.

"Do I consider myself an occupying force?" said Jahanger Mamaturoyev, 18, pausing for several long minutes before answering in a low voice. "Yes, I do."

A fellow soldier at the anti-aircraft missile base about 15 miles from Tallinn acknowledged that he is worried about what awaits him when he returns to his village in Kazakhstan.

"We're not very glad about our prospects," said Marat Mosik, a 19-year-old sergeant. "We have food in the army." He ticked off a typical menu: macaroni for breakfast, pilaf with a little beef for lunch, mashed potatoes for dinner.

His deputy commander is also worried about leaving. "I've served in Estonia for 16 years," said Lt. Col. Vassily Vassilyev. "Of course, I had my plans for retirement. Sixteen years is a long time, and I haven't been in my native country—Russia—for 20 years. I had been cherishing a hope of settling down in an apartment in Tallinn. My children grew up here, and the feeling deep in my soul is to stay in Estonia. But I will leave."

The brigade commander, Col. Alexander Zharenov, figures that the 2,000-man unit will not complete its withdrawal until 1999.

"As commander of this brigade, the biggest problem is finding housing for every single officer," he said, noting that 400 come under his jurisdiction. "I'd feel ashamed to look my subordinates in the eye if I can't guarantee them a decent place to live. The only thing holding us back is housing."

"The biggest problem is uncertainty and the dark future," he added.

There is no overt animosity between the soldiers with the hammer-and-sickle emblems still on their uniforms and the Baltics who have grown accustomed to seeing them in their cities and villages over the years.

"They always answer us politely and look right through us," said Lithuanian journalist Algimantas Cekuolis.

"But it's better than being shot."

NATIONAL VOLUNTEERS' WEEK AND NATIONAL VOLUNTEERS' DAY, 1992

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, today I wish to recognize the efforts of the thousands of volunteers across the Nation, including those in my home State of South Dakota, who do so much important work. It is hard to imagine what our lives would be like if we did not have so many dedicated volunteers working to improve communities throughout our Nation.

April 26-May 2, 1992 is National Volunteers' Week. I would like to take this opportunity to offer my commendation and thanks for the work accomplished by outstanding volunteers in South Dakota. These individuals were recognized with "The Governor's Volunteer of the Year Awards" on January 28, 1992. These people are outstanding examples of what it means to be a volunteer. In addition to the award winners, I know there are many other very dedicated volunteers who deserve recognition.

Mr. President, I extend my congratulations to Julie Garreau of Eagle Butte, SD. She is President Bush's Point of Light Award recipient from South Dakota. Julie, a member of the Cheyenne River Sioux Indian Tribe, has spent hundreds of volunteer hours working with young people at "The Main," a Cheyenne River youth project.

Volunteering as the supervisor of that project has not been an easy task for Julie. Funding for the Main has been and still is in a state of crisis. Vandalism has made the facility inoperable on several occasions. However, Julie is determined to overcome such obstacles.

Every year Julie Garreau spends countless hours creating and leading fundraising projects and programs for young people. This year, the Main, which is open to young people ages 5 to 17, served 6,193 children.

Julie is fully aware of the peer pressure facing youth as they battle the temptations of drugs and alcohol. Many at-risk children known that the Main is the only place where they can feel special and learn the skills to combat the pressures they face each day. Again, my congratulations to Julie Garreau for her outstanding work as a volunteer.

Other volunteers making a difference for South Dakotans include:

First, Karen Mayry of Rapid City. Her motto is "Blind, yes; handicapped, never!" Karen is actively involved as a volunteer with the National Federation of the Blind. Her efforts have helped thousands of blind diabetics.

Second, Helen Kirkeby of Sioux Falls. Since 1985, Helen has worked as a trained volunteer comforter at the Neonatal Intensive Care Nursery at Sioux Valley Hospital in Sioux Falls, SD. In addition, she has served as a volunteer at the Sioux Falls Alternative School Program and at the local veterans hospital. Her life truly is committed to serving children. She literally has touched the lives of many.

Third, Brian and James DeJong, teenage brothers, were tired of "hanging around the house" when their mother suggested they become volunteers. Their mother's suggestion led them to develop a friendship with a resident of the Sioux Vocational Services group home, located in Sioux Falls. What began as a solution to boredom turned into a lasting and beneficial friendship for everyone involved.

Fourth, over the past 16 years, students attending the Sioux Falls Whittier Middle School have made a substantial difference for many families in their community. During this time, they have held food and clothing drives, raised approximately $15,000 for social service agencies and $25,000 for the March of Dimes. More importantly, through volunteering, the students of Whittier have learned that many hands lighten the load.

Mr. President, these South Dakotans exemplify the valuable services performed by volunteers across the Nation. I commend the efforts of these and the thousands of other American volunteers. I urge all of my colleagues to do the same.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island is recognized.

THE CONFERENCE REPORT ON S. 3: A HISTORIC STEP FORWARD

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, as a sponsor of S. 3 and a consistent supporter of campaign reform over the years, I rise to express my strong support for the conference report before us.

The legislation that we act on today is a remarkable tribute to the durability of a set of ideas and to the steadfastness of one of our colleagues in particular, the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. BOREN]. It has taken 6 long years to bring the legislation to this stage, largely through his efforts, and he is to be congratulated for his energy and persistence.

I am in full support of the bill as it has come from conference because it attacks, in several creative ways, the basic problems we must address, namely the spiraling costs of elections and the corrosive effects of the present financing system.

It does this by imposing restrictive but reasonable limits on overall campaign spending for those who will accept them. And at the same time, it provides significant options for sharply reducing costs to those willing to accept the limits.

In this connection, I am particularly pleased to note that the bill recognizes that the high cost of media advertising is probably the principle component in the fourfold increase in the cost of House and Senate campaign costs since 1976.

While I endorse the concept of broadcast vouchers for qualified Senate candidates, I will be frank to say that I vastly prefer the concept imbedded in my bill S. 2076, which would require broadcasters to provide free time, at no public expense as a return payment for their monopoly of the air waves.

With respect to PAC's it seems to me that the conference versions is an improvement over the Senate bill in that while it reduces the role of PAC's, it does not outlaw them altogether. To my mind, the influence of PAC's is less pernicious than that of large contributions from individuals.

I applaud many other features of the bill, namely the closing, at long last, of the soft money loophole, and the outlawing of corporate bundling, a practice which has already reared its ugly head in this election year.

It is very regrettable that S. 3 seems to have been written off in some quarters as a casualty of policy conflict between the legislative and executive branches on the issue of public finance. This should not be, and in fact, it does an enormous disservice to our colleagues who have worked long and hard to bridge the gap by inventive and accommodating means.

The fact that the entire scheme is voluntary goes a long way, it seems to me, to meet the opponents of public expenditure. And the conferenced version, I note, eliminates all references to a funding mechanism for the limited and contingent public benefits authorized by the bill. These could not become effective until funded by separate legislation.

So the conference report on S. 3 does indeed represent a historic step forward on a long and tortuous path. It should not be dismissed as a partisan ploy. It should be approved by a resounding margin.

And it should be signed into law.

GULF OF MEXICO PRESERVATION ACT OF 1992

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, I send to the desk a revised version of S. 1715, the Gulf of Mexico Preservation Act of 1992.

The revision which I send to the desk results from work with EPA and with the Office of Management and Budget. The bill that I now have submitted is supported by EPA and the Office of Management and Budget. It represents a comprehensive effort to establish a Gulf of Mexico program which will oversee efforts to improve and protect the environmental quality of America's sea, the Gulf of Mexico.

Mr. President, we have had two flagship water quality environmental programs in America. The first is the Great Lakes Program, which has achieved great things in terms of improving the quality of the Great Lakes. It is one of our great environmental achievements, showing that you can undo tremendous environmental damage if you institute a comprehensive program based on science.

Our second great environmental program is the Chesapeake Bay Program, a program that is critically important, a program that I support, and a program that has been established in order to understand problems in the Chesapeake Bay, and to improve the quality of the bay for both recreational uses and commercial fisheries.

What this bill will do, Mr. President, is set up a comparable program for the Gulf of Mexico. The Gulf of Mexico has generated in the last few decades, in terms of oil and gas revenues, more revenues than any other part of the Tax Code, save the income tax. It is the largest port of entry and exit for goods and services coming into and going out of the United States. It is the source of the largest marine fisheries in North America. It is a major source of tourism, and is a critically important asset for States such as Texas that border on the Gulf of Mexico.

What this bill will do is set up a major new environmental program, the Gulf of Mexico Program. It establishes a funding stream of $200 million over the next 5 years, with 70 percent of that money going to a grant program to fund research and other activities by the Gulf States.

Mr. President, I am firmly convinced that good science makes for good environment. If we are to improve the quality of our environment we have to have science on which to base our actions. We, in the Gulf of Mexico region, and especially in Texas, are not about to get out of the petrochemical business. We are not about to relinquish our capacity to generate jobs, growth, and opportunity for our people. We do, however, want to create jobs and improve the quality of the environment at the same time. I believe that good science will allow us to do this.

We currently have a lot of research underway in Gulf State universities. Obviously, I am more familiar with the research we have underway in Texas. Whether we are talking about Lamar University or Texas A&M at Galveston or Corpus Christi State University, we have quality research underway to understand the relationship between regional industry and the environmental quality of the Gulf of Mexico.

I believe that this program is vitally important. I ask my colleagues to look at it, and I am hopeful that it will become the law of the land. I think it represents a responsible and well-reasoned approach to the problem, and I commend it to my colleagues.

By Mr. NUNN (for himself and Mr. WARNER) (by request):

S. 2628. A bill to authorize certain construction at military installations for fiscal year 1993, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Armed Services.

"(b) Each member of an advisory committee established under subsection (a) of this section, while serving on the business of the advisory committee away from such member's home or regular place of business, shall be allowed travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, as authorized by section 5703 of title 5, United States Code, for persons intermittently employed in the Government service.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE,
OFFICE OF GENERAL COUNSEL,
Washington, DC, April 17, 1992.

Hon. DAN QUAYLE,
President of the Senate, Washington, DC.
DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: There is forwarded herewith legislation, "To authorize appropriations for fiscal year 1993 for military functions of the Department of Defense, to prescribe military personnel levels for fiscal year 1993, and for other purposes."

This legislative proposal is part of the Department of Defense legislative program for the 102nd Congress and is needed to carry out the President's fiscal year 1993 amended budget plan. The Office of Management and Budget advises that there is no objection, from the standpoint of the Administration's program, to the presentation of this proposal for the consideration of the Congress.

Title I provides procurement authorization for the Military Departments and for the Defense Agencies in amounts equal to the new budget authority included in the President's amended budget for fiscal year 1993. It also includes a provision providing for the repeal of the requirement for a separate budget request for the procurement of Reserve equipment which is contained in section 114(e) of title 10, United States Code.

Title II provides for the authorization of the research, development, test, and evaluation appropriations for the Military Departments and Defense Agencies in amounts equal to the new budget authority included in the President's amended budget for fiscal year 1993.

Title III provides for authorization of the operation and maintenance appropriations of the Military Departments and the Defense Agencies in amounts equal to the budget authority included in the President's amended budget for fiscal year 1993. Title III also includes appropriations for the purpose of providing capital for working-capital and revolving funds of the Department of Defense in amounts equal to the budget authority included in the President's amended budget for fiscal year 1993.

In addition to the foregoing, Title III also contains the following provisions. Section 303 amends sections 127 of title 10, United States Code, pertaining to emergency and extraordinary expenses, to add provisions covering the Defense Inspector General. Section 304 repeals the ceiling on employees in headquarters and non-management headquarters support activities contained in section 194 of title 10. Section 305 repeals the requirement contained in section 1597 of title 10 for guidelines for future reductions of civilian employees of industrial-type or commercial-type activities. Section 306 repeals provisions contained in sections 3301(d) and 3302 of the fiscal year 1992 and 1993 Authorization Act which impede efficient and prudent management of the National Defense Stockpile Transaction Fund and contains provisions that will enhance the management of the Fund. Section 307 establishes the National Defense Sealift Fund to provide for the effective acquisition, maintenance, and operation of sealift for the armed forces, and for other purposes.

Title IV prescribes the personnel strengths for the active forces and the Selected Reserve of each service in the numbers provided for by the budget authority and appropriations requested for the Department of Defense in the President's amended budget for fiscal year 1993. This title also prescribes the end strengths for reserve component members on full-time active duty or full-time National Guard duty for the purpose of administering the reserve forces and provides for an increase in the number of certain enlisted and commissioned personnel who may be serving on active duty in support of the reserve components. Finally, Title IV provides for the average military training student loads in the numbers provided for this purpose in the President's amended budget for fiscal year 1993.

Title V consists of twelve general provisions. Section 501 amends section 1004 of title 10, to require physical examination for members of the ready reserve every five years rather than every four. Section 502 amends titles 10 and 32 to eliminate unnecessary restrictions on personnel procedures and to provide greater flexibility in the training, management, and mobilization of the National Guard.

Section 503 waives the adjustments of compensation requirements in section 1009 of title 37, and provides for a 3.7 percent increase in basic pay, basic allowance for quarters (BAQ), and basic allowance for subsistence (BAS) for members of the uniformed services.

Section 504 repeals section 1002(d)(2)(A) of the Department of Defense Authorization Act, 1985, Public Law 98-525, 98 Stat. 2492, which requires the Secretary of Defense to submit to Congress an annual report entitled United States Expenditures in Support of NATO. The conclusions drawn from this report are misleading in that expenditures for scenarios outside of NATO are attributed in many instances to expenditures in support of NATO. Section 505 amends section 119 of title 10 to change the special access programs reporting date from February 1 of each year to March 1 of each year. The concurrent submission of the special access report with the budget does not allow sufficient time to prepare and coordinate the report.

Section 506 amends section 2667 of title 10 to provide the Secretary of Defense flexibility in the lease of defense equipment for display or demonstration at international shows and trade exhibitions or to foreign governments. Section 507 amends Chapter 138 of title 10 to provide deployed United States Armed Forces the authority to acquire logistics support, supplies and services without geographic restriction and to remove the limitations on the amounts that may be obligated or accrued during a period of active hostilities involving United States Armed Forces. Section 508 amends section 27(c) of the Arms Export Control Act (22 U.S.C. 2767(c)) and section 2350a of title 10, to authorize the Department of Defense to share equitably the costs of claims arising out of the performance of international armaments programs.

Section 509 extends various laws that expire in fiscal year 1992.

Section 510 amends the Strategic and Critical Stockpiling Act to clarify the responsibilities and authorities of the President. Section 511 repeals sections 9110 of the Department of Defense Appropriations Act, 1987, Public Law 99-500, 100 Stat. 1783-120 and Public Law 99-591, 100 Stat. 3383, and section 3205 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 1987, Public Law 99-661, 100 Stat. 4068, to terminate the requirement to convert chromium and manganese held in the National Defense Stockpile into high carbon ferrochromium and high carbon ferromanganese. Present stocks are sufficient for future contingencies. Section 512 revises the stockpile requirements for certain strategic and critical materials in the National Defense Stockpile.

Enactment of this legislation is of great importance to the Department of Defense and the Department urges its speedy and favorable consideration.

Sincerely,

CHESTER PAUL BEACH, Jr.,
Acting General Counsel.

SECTIONAL ANALYSIS

Section 501 amends section 1004(a)(1) of title 10, United States Code, to require a physical examination for members of the Ready Reserve every five years rather than every four.

Section 1004(a)(1) currently requires each member of the Ready Reserve not on active duty to receive a physical examination every four years, or more often as the Secretary concerned considers necessary. Although there is no similar statutory requirement for active duty members, the military departments by regulation require periodic examinations. For example, the Army and the Air Force require, with some exceptions, that active duty members undergo a physical examination every five years.

The requirement that all Ready Reserve members have a physical every four years is costly and unnecessary for readiness purposes. There is no reason to impose a stricter standard on Ready Reserve members than on active duty members. Both active duty and reserve commanders have the authority to require members of their command to submit to a physical examination whenever they believe a member is physically unfit to perform duties. Also, under this proposal, the Secretary concerned could require categories of personnel to receive physical examinations more frequently than every five years.

This proposal will provide the reserve components with the flexibility that the active components now have and enable them to adopt policies consistent with the active components.

Section 502 amends titles 10 and 32, United States Code to eliminate unnecessary restrictions on personnel procedures and to provide greater flexibility in the training, management and mobilization of the National Guard.

Subsection (a) cites the short title of the bill as "The National Guard Amendments of 1992."

Subsection (b) amends section 311(a) of title 10 to insure that female warrant officers and enlisted members of the National Guard are included in the militia. Section 311(a) provides that the militia of the United States includes all able-bodied males between 17 and 45 years of age, and certain males over 45, who are or have declared their intention to become citizens, and female officers of the National Guard. Female warrant officers and enlisted members of the National Guard are not explicitly included. This exclusion leaves open the question as to whether a call to federal service of the militia can include these female members of the National Guard. Even in states which explicitly include such members in the militia, it is not clear whether such members are subject to a call to federal service. The resulting uncertainty clouds the legal status of these members and the validity of any acts performed while in federal status. It may also affect their liability and eligibility for tort protection and benefits. There are over 21,000 enlisted female members of the Army National Guard and over 12,000 enlisted female members of the Air National Guard. Units called into federal service without female enlisted and warrant officer personnel would, in varying degrees, have serious deficiencies in staffing.

Subsection (c) repeals sections 3502 and 8502 of title 10 to terminate the requirement for physical examinations for each member of the Army or Air National Guard called into and mustered out of federal service. For short periods of service, this may require two complete physicals during a period of days or weeks. In view of other statutory requirements for periodic medical examinations and physical condition certifications, such as section 1004 which requires physicals at least once every four years or as often as the Secretary concerned believes is necessary, section 3502 and 8502 examinations are administratively burdensome, expensive, and unnecessary, and could impede the rapid and efficient mobilization of the National Guard. There is no corresponding requirements for physical examinations when other reserve components are ordered to active duty.

Subsection (d) amends section 502(b) of title 32 which requires that all elements of a unit participate in a training assembly within a period of thirty consecutive days. This thirty-day window deprives commanders of flexibility in planning for specialized training opportunities that benefit individuals members or parts of units, such as officer candidate schools and team training in remote areas. It also hinders the performance of specialized staff functions such as legal or medical services. The proposed amendment would expand the training assembly window to ninety days.

Subsection (e) amends section 709(e)(6) of title 32 to eliminate the requirement that a written notice of termination of employment be given thirty days in advance to National Guard technicians who serve under temporary appointments, are serving in the trial or probationary period, or who voluntarily cease to be National Guard members. While career employees are entitled to reasonable expectations of job continuity, extension of the entitlement to the enumerated groups is contrary to sound management practices. Appointees hired to fill temporary positions are aware that the appointment may be terminated at any time for reasons such as a lack of unsatisfactory performance. Technicians who voluntarily relinquish National Guard membership are aware that in doing so they are relinquishing their employment as technicians. A thirty-day notice is unnecessary in this case because the technician controls the termination date by his voluntary action. The right to thirty days notice for technicians in these circumstances is not afforded to other federal employees, and no sound reason exists for special rights of this nature for technicians.

Subsection (f) amends section 709(h) of title 32 to repeal the statutory limit (53,100) on the number of National Guard technicians who may be employed at one time. This number has not been changed in fifteen years, is far less than anticipated future needs, and does not reflect the expansion of the National Guard's role in the total force concept. In lieu of an absolute ceiling, Congress should control technician manning through the annual authorization and appropriation process.

Subsection (g) amends subsection 710(h) of title 32 which requires that findings of unserviceability of property issued by the United States to the National Guard be made by commissioned officers of the Regular Army or Air Force. Such determinations are necessary before this property may be disposed of. There are insufficient numbers of such officers within the states adequately to perform this function and their use for this purpose is expensive and time consuming. The proposed amendment would allow a disinterested commissioned officer of the Army or Air National Guard who is also a commissioned officer of the Army National Guard of the United States or the Air National Guard of the United States to make a fair wear and tear determination. Section 508 amends section 1121 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Years 1988 and 1989, Public Law 100-180, 101 Stat. 1019, to delete the reference to the DoD Directive governing polygraph examinations, to delineate personnel for examination under the Department of Defense Counterintelligence Program and to authorize additional polygraph examinations.

Section 503 waives the adjustments of compensation requirements of section 1009, title 37, United States Code in subsection (a) and provides for a 3.7 percent increase in the rates of basic pay, basic allowance for subsistence, and basic allowance for quarters for members of the uniform services, effective January 1, 1993 in subsection (b).

Subsection 504 repeals section 1002(d)(2)(A) of the Department of Defense Authorization Act, 1985, Public Law 98-525, 98 Stat. 492, to relieve the Secretary of Defense from the requirement of relating to the Congress, on an annual basis, a report entitled United States Expenditures in Support of NATO. The Department is required to provide a detailed report to Congress by April 1 of each year of the status and cost of the United States forces for NATO as reflected in the Defense Planning Questionnaire (DPQ) response, and in the defense budget request. This report is to cover expenditures projected to be made in the current fiscal year, and in each of the following six fiscal years for forces committed to or earmarked for NATO in the DPQ in the following categories: (A) Procurement, (B) Operations and maintenance, (C) Military construction, (D) Military personnel, and (E) Research, development, test, and evaluation. Separate breakouts for all classes of the United States forces reflected in the data are also to be made for: (A) Europe deployed, (B) Early reinforcements for NATO, (C) Later reinforcements, (D) Strategic reserves, (E) Strategic forces, (F) Intelligence and communications, (G) Asia deployed, and (H) Reinforcements for Asia.

While we have sought to be responsive to the expressed Congressional requirements, these requirements dictate serious limitations and inaccuracies in the report, brought about by the incorrect assumption that United States forces and their costs can be uniquely apportioned to a single scenario or contingency, ignoring other conflict scenarios that are equally alike.

U.S. forces defend American security interests worldwide. Assigning their costs to specific geographical regions or purposes is always arbitrary, since the forces could be deployed to any region where U.S. security interests are at stake. The mandated United States Expenditures in Support of NATO report, however, compels the Department to report the full cost of all military units formally pledged to respond to a NATO contingency, without thought for other regions or duties to which those units might also be assigned. The recent deployment of forces to Operation Desert Shield/Storm illustrates the extent of this error. Almost all U.S. forces that participated in the Persian Gulf conflict also are committed to NATO in the DPQ. Indeed, the entire Army VII Corps, which permanently is stationed in Europe, was temporarily transferred to the Persian Gulf. Yet, the Department is required to assign the cost of these forces, and all their supporting costs, to a single region and purpose—NATO.

The reporting requirement was established during a decade when the threat that dominated U.S. defense planning was a Soviet attack on Western Europe that could escalate into a global war. While the specific requirements were inherently flawed, the report did address an appropriate issue. Now, in the post-Cold War era, the United States no longer sizes its forces mainly to meet a worldwide Soviet threat. Instead, regional scenarios are now the focus of U.S. defense planning.

In light of the above, the Department requests that the statutory responsibility to prepare the report required by section 1002(d)(2)(A) of the Department of Defense Authorization Act, 1985, be repealed by enactment of this section.

Section 505 amends section 119 of title 10, United States Code, to change the special access programs reporting date from February 1 of each year to March 1 of each year. The requested change makes the report follow the submission of the President's budget. The concurrent submission of the special access report with the budget does not allow sufficient time to prepare and coordinate the report.

Section 506 amends section 2667 of title 10, to provide the Secretary of Defense flexibility in the lease of defense equipment for display or demonstration at international shows and trade exhibitions or to foreign governments.

The Department of Defense considers that commonality of defense equipment among friendly foreign nations furthers the national defense. To promote this important objective through demonstration of defense equipment at international shows or trade exhibits or to foreign governments, the Secretary of Defense must have the necessary flexibility to lease defense equipment back to the manufacturers of that equipment upon such terms and conditions and for such consideration as the Secretary determines, on a case-by-case basis, will further the national defense.

However, the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Years 1992 and 1993, included a provision, section 2862, that limits the Secretary's flexibility in this area. Specifically, section 2862 amended section 2663 of title 10, United States Code, to require that any lease of real or personal property provide for the payment (in cash or in kind) of consideration in an amount not less than the fair market value of the lease interest, as determined by the Secretary. The purpose of this change was to expand upon the Department's authority to enter into leases of real property in which the lessee provided improvements to the real property in return for the lease. The language, however, is not limited to leases of real property and therefore will lead to increased leasing costs by defense equipment manufacturers, which in turn will have a detrimental impact upon the international competitiveness of U.S. defense products and thereby our national security.

Section 596 would permit the Secretary to lease defense equipment to the manufacturers for such consideration and upon such terms and conditions as the Secretary determines will further the national defense.

Section 507 amends chapter 138 of title 10 to provide deployed United States Armed Forces the authority to acquire logistics support, supplies and services without geographic restriction, to remove the limitations on the amounts that may be obligated or accrued during a period of active hostilities involving United States Armed Forces, and for other purposes.

Chapter 138 of title 10, United States Code, currently authorizes the acquisition of logistic support, supplies, and services from NATO countries and NATO subsidiaries when elements of the United States Armed Forces are deployed in Europe or its adjacent waters and, under various circumstances, from certain non-NATO countries. This proposal would remove the geographic limitation to that authority to allow United States Armed Forces located anywhere in the world to acquire logistics support from such countries.

While current law enhances international logistics cooperation and is helpful in avoiding costly duplication of logistic services, geographic deployment limitations significantly reduce its utility. Currently, acquisitions from NATO sources are authorized under section 2341(1) of title 10 only when United States forces are deployed in Europe or its adjacent waters. The benefits of this section are not available when United States forces are involved in deployments or exercise outside of Europe.

One of the lessons we learned from the Persian Gulf Conflict was that the chapter 138 authority needs to be expanded. Because NATO as an organization was not involved in the conflict and the conflict occurred outside of Europe, the geographic limitations remained in effect and logistic arrangements authorized by chapter 138 were unavailable. Section 1451 of the National Defense Authorization Act of 1991 (Public Law 101-510; 104 Stat. 1692) removed the geographic limitations for cross-servicing agreements authorized under section 2342 of chapter 138 but did not remove geographic limitations for the acquisition of logistic support.

This section would amend section 2347 of chapter 138 to remove the dollar limitations on amounts that may be obligated or accrued. These limitations, applicable to both NATO and those non-NATO nations not geographically located in the Persian Gulf region, remained in effect during the Persian Gulf conflict. The Persian Gulf conflict was relatively short with substantial logistics support provided by the allies outside the acquisition process. Had the operation been longer, the dollar and geographic limitations would have caused an increase in the deployment requirements which would have further strained the deployment schedule and been of serious concern.

The geographic restrictions and preconditions currently in sections 2341 and 2347 of title 10, United States Code, are inconsistent with anticipated scenarios for field exercises and possible United States involvement in hostilities. They also are inconsistent with efforts to encourage military cooperation with the United States Armed Forces in transit and with the efficient use of common resources. This section would correct such inconsistencies.

Section 508 amends section 27(c) of the Arms Export Control Act (22 U.S.C. 2767c) and section 2350a of title 10, United States Code, to authorize the Department of Defense to share equitably the costs of claims arising out of the performance of international armaments cooperative programs. Such programs are conducted under the authority of 22 U.S.C. 2767, 10 U.S.C. 2350a, and 10 U.S.C. 2350d. Currently, the third party claims liability provisions contained in Article VIII of the Agreement Between the Parties to the North Atlantic Treaty Regarding the Status of Their Forces (NATO SOFA) dated 19 June 1951 are applicable to such agreements. The change proposed by this section would permit the Secretary of Defense to negotiate, when in the best interests of the Department of Defense, alternative procedures for handling such third party claims.

The Department has been inhibited in finalizing some proposed armaments cooperation memoranda of understanding (MOUs) because of the objections of several of our allies to accept the application of the NATO SOFA claims provisions. Their objection is primarily based on the fact that, under Article VIII the host (receiving) country must pay a significant portion, usually 25 percent, of any claim that arises regardless of fault. The sending nation must pay 75 percent. This claims distribution formula applies regardless of the cost sharing arrangements for the programs that have been negotiated between the nations.

Our allies contend that such a claims scheme is inconsistent with the cooperative intent and cost sharing nature of such armaments cooperation programs. We agree. All other program costs are shared equitably by the participating nations generally in proportion to each nation's cost contributions to the program. This proposal would make it clear that the Department of Defense may agree to pay the cost of claims in accordance with the cost sharing formula of the program or in accordance with any other equitable formula that is negotiated by the participating nations.

The claims will continue to be processed and paid as they are now under 28 U.S.C. 2672, 10 U.S.C. 2734a, 10 U.S.C. 2734b and other appropriate claims statutes. This section authorizes equitable sharing of claims but does not require any change in the method of processing or paying claims.

Section 509 extends various laws that expire in fiscal year 1992.

Section 510 amends the Strategic and Critical Stock Piling Act (50 U.S.C. 98 to 98h-7) to clarify the responsibilities and authorities of the President. Section 510 basically is a total revision to this Act.

Subsection (a) of this section states that the short title of the section is the "Strategic and Critical Materials Stockpiling Act of 1992."

Subsection (b) amends that Strategic and Critical Materials Stock Piling Act (50 U.S.C. 98098h-7) to the following extent:

It states the purpose of the Act is to identify, acquire and retain stocks of certain strategic and critical materials.

Section 2(b) of the revision states that the quantity of material to be stockpiled shall be sufficient to meet the needs of the U.S. during a time of national emergency. It eliminates the requirement in the current statute that stockpile planning be based on a global conventional war. The full continuum of crisis possibilities—regional as well as global must be considered in arriving at National Defense Stockpile requirements.

Section 3(a) of the revision provides that the President shall determine which materials are strategic and critical and the quality, quantity and form of the material to be acquired and stored.

Section 3(b) of the revision describes the material to be included in the Stockpile. It deletes obsolete references in section 4(a) (1), (2), (3), and (8) of the current law.

Section 3(c) of the revision provides that any transfer of excess material from another Federal agency shall be made with full reimbursement to the transferring agency. The value shall be the market value at the time of the transfer. All costs necessary to effect the transfer will be borne from Stockpile funds.

Section 3 revises of current sections 3(a), 3(b) and 4.

Sections 4 (a), (b) and (c) of the revisions, dealing with the report on stockpile requirements, correspond to current section 14 with minor editorial changes.

Section 4(a) of the revision requires a biennial report to Congress on the President's recommendations for stockpile requirements.

Section 4(b) states that the report shall be based on the national security planning guidance contained in the President's annual national security strategy report and shall set forth the national emergency planning assumptions used.

Section 4(c) provides that the requirements report be accompanied by a statement of plans for meeting the new requirements.

Section 4(d) streamlines the approval process for new requirements or significant changes in stockpile requirements by permitting the changes to become effective after thirty days after written notice has been submitted to the Committees on Armed Services of the Senate and House of Representatives. Section 4(d) corresponds to current section 3(c).

Section 5(a) of the revision requires a five-year materials plan setting forth plans for the next fiscal year and the succeeding four years and an annual report detailing operations for the preceding years.

Section 5(b) sets forth the information to be included in the materials plan.

Section 5(c) sets forth the information to be included in the annual operations plan.

Section 5(b) and (c) of the revision are virtually identical to section 11 of the current law, with minor modifications to conform to other changes in the legislation.

Section 6 of the revision relates to stockpile management.

Section 6(a) sets forth the requirements to acquire, store, upgrade, maintain, and dispose of materials in the stockpile.

Section 6(b) requires that acquisitions be in accordance with Federal procurement practices to the maximum extent feasible and that disposals be made by sealed bidding or competitive proposals.

Section 6(c) encourages the use of barter in the acquisition and disposal of material when practical and in the best interest of the Government.

Section 6(d) permits the President to waive the requirements of section 6(b) for acquisition or disposal of material upon a written determination that a waiver is necessary to obtain terms more favorable to the Government than could otherwise be obtained. A summary of waivers granted shall be included in the annual operations report submitted under proposed section 5(c).

Section 6 makes editorial changes in current section 6.

Section 7 of the revision provides the authority for stockpile operations.

Section 7(a)(1) provides that funds appropriated for acquisition of any materials under this act shall remain available until expended.

Section 7(a)(2) permits the President to make significant changes in expenditures or disposals under the Materials Plan after thirty days notice has been given to the Committees on Armed Services of the Senate and House of Representatives.

Section 7(b) eliminates the ceiling on the Transaction Fund balance.

Section 7(c) authorizes appropriations for transportation, processing, refining, upgrade, storage, security, maintenance, rotation, or disposal of materials in the stockpile.

Section 7(d) permits proposed expenditures or disposals detailed in the materials plan or submitted to Congress that are not obligated or executed in the current fiscal year to be carried over to the materials plan for subsequent years.

Section 8(a) of the revision establishes the National Defense Stockpile Transaction Fund as a separate account in the Treasury.

Section 8(b)(1) provides that all funds from disposal or rotation of material be covered into the Transaction Fund.

Section 8(b)(2) identifies the purposes for which Transaction Funds monies may be used. Section 8(b)(2) (F) and (G) include provisions formerly in section 15(a) (1) and (2).

Section 8(b)(3) provides that the Transaction Fund shall be available for operations of the Defense National Stockpile.

Section 8(b)(4) provides that monies in the Transaction Fund shall remain available until expended.

Section 8(c) includes provisions for accounting for bartered materials.

Section 8(d) authorizes the use of multi-year contracts, including advance payments.

Section 8 of the revision revises section 9 of the current law.

Section 9 of the revision grants special disposal authority to the President. The President, or in time of war or national emergency, a designated officer or employer, may order release of material in the Stockpile whenever it is necessary. Any such order shall be promptly reported to the Committees on Armed Services of the Senate and House of Representatives. Section 9 corresponds to current section 7.

Section 10 of the revision authorizes a National Defense Stockpile Manager. Section 10(a) requires the President to designate a single Federal officer to perform the functions of the President under this Act.

Section 10(b) states that the individual heading that office shall be known as the National Defense Stockpile Manager.

Section 10(c) states that the President may delegate to the Defense Stockpile Manager all the functions of the President under this Act except for those enumerated under section 9.

Section 10 corresponds to current section 15.

Section 11(a) of the revision provides that the President may study development, mining, preparation, treatment, and utilization of ores and other mineral substances essential to national defense, industrial, and civilian needs but found in inadequate quantities in the U.S. in order to develop new sources, new methods of utilization or substitutes.

Section 11(b) provides for similar studies for developing domestic sources of supplies of agricultural materials.

Section 11(c) permits studies of materials other than those identified in (a) or (b) but determined under section 3(a) to be strategic and critical.

Section 11(d) permits awards of grants or contracts for research into substitutes for materials determined to be strategic and critical under section 3(a) or for more efficient methods of production or use of those materials.

Section 11 of the revision revises section 8 of the current statute.

Section 12(a) permits the President to appoint advisory committees to advise the President with respect to acquisition, transportation, processing, upgrading, refining, storage, security, maintenance, rotation and disposals of strategic and critical materials.

Section 12(b) provides for travel expenses for members of advisory committees while on advisory committee business.

Section 13(a) defines "strategic and critical materials" to be those needed to supply military, industrial and essential civilian needs of the United States and not found or produced in the United States in sufficient quantities to meet the need.

Section 13(b) defines "national emergency" as a declaration of national emergency made by the President or Congress.

Section 13(c) defines "significant change" as one resulting in an increase or decrease in the value of a requirement or in the amount of a transaction in excess of $50 million or 25 percent, whichever is less.

Section 511 repeals sections 9110 of the Department of Defense Appropriations Act, 1987 (Public Law 99-500, 100 Stat. 1783 and Public Law 99-591, 100 Stat. 3383) and section 3205 of the National Defense Authorization Act for FY 1987 (Public Law 99-661, 100 Stat. 3816) concerning the requirement to convert chromium and manganese ores held in the National Defense Stockpile into high carbon ferromanganese and high carbon ferromanganese.

We are currently in the eighth year of a ten year program to upgrade our stockpile of chromite and manganese. The project was initiated to help sustain a U.S. ferroalloy furnace and processing capability vital to the national defense. The purpose was to reduce the time needed for conversion of stockpile materials into ferroalloys in time of an emergency. The need for ferroalloys in a national emergency and the potential supplies from reliable sources indicate that the amounts already in the stockpile are more than sufficient to cover our needs. A report recently submitted to the Congress on National Defense Stockpile requirements supports this position.

Section 512 revises the stockpile requirements for certain strategic and critical materials in the National Defense Stockpile and authorizes disposals from the National Defense Stockpile, as provided in Tables A and B, respectively. •

By Mr. CRANSTON (by request):

S. 2630. A bill to amend title 38, United States Code, to clarify the authority of the Department of Veterans Affairs' Chief Medical Director or designee regarding the review of the performance of probationary title 38 health care employees; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

VIEW OF PROBATIONARY EMPLOYEES IN THE VETERANS HEALTH ADMINISTRATION

• Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, as chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, I have today introduced, by request, S. 2630, a bill to amend title 38, United States Code, to clarify the authority of the Department of Veterans Affairs' Chief Medical Director regarding the review of the performance of probationary title 38 health care employees. The Secretary of Veterans Affairs submitted this legislation by letter dated April 9, 1992.

My introduction of this measure is in keeping with the policy which I have adopted of generally introducing—so that there will be specific bills to which my colleagues and others may direct their attention and comments—all administration-proposed draft legislation referred to the Veterans' Affairs Committee. Thus, I reserve the right to support or oppose the provisions of, as well as any amendment to, this legislation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point, together with the transmittal letter and enclosed bill analysis.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2630

Be it enacted by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 7403(b) of title 38, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"(b) Appointments under section 7401(1) of this title shall be subject to a probationary period of two years. The performance of each person serving under such appointment may be reviewed at any time during that period by a board or boards appointed in accordance with regulations issued by the Secretary. Procedures governing the review of employee performance during the probationary period shall be established in regulations issued by the Secretary. The board(s) shall recommend to the Chief Medical Director, or designee, action consistent with the ability of the employee, as determined by the board(s), to perform efficiently. Such recommended actions could include retention or separation from service, reassignment to another position, or other corrective measures to enable the employee to be fully qualified and satisfactory prior to the end of the probationary period. The Chief Medical Director, or designee, may accept, reject, or modify the recommendation of the board(s). If the Chief Medical Director, or designee, takes action not recommended by the board(s), a statement of the reasons therefore shall be prepared and made part of the record."

ANALYSIS OF THE BILL

This draft bill would clarify and expand the authority of the Chief Medical Director under 38 U.S.C. §7403(b). That subsection establishes the probationary period for certain employees in the Veterans Health Administration and requires periodic review of the performance of those employees. The employees affected are physicians, dentists, podiatrists, optometrists, nurses, physician assistants, and expanded-function dental auxiliaries.

The draft bill would put in plain language the authority of the Chief Medical Director to accept, reject or modify the findings and recommendations of Professional Standards Boards appointed pursuant to this section.

The draft bill would clarify that it is the Chief Medical Director, rather than the Professional Standards Boards, who is the decision-maker. It would empower the Chief Medical Director with total discretion, based on his or her own review, to choose among an array of recommendations that course of action which best serves the interests of the employee and the Department.

The draft bill would expressly authorize reviewing Boards to choose among a range of actions to recommend so that remedies other than complete separation from service would be brought clearly within the law. Instead of separation from service, a Board could recommend any of a number of measures which the Board believes provide a capable employee desirous of satisfactorily completing the probationary period the opportunity to become fully qualified and satisfactory prior to the end of the probationary period.

Indeed, in enlarging the options available to the Board and the Chief Medical Director, the draft bill does not affect the rights of the probationary employee whose performance is being reviewed. Those rights, e.g., the right of the employee to be notified that he/she may not be fully qualified or performing satisfactorily and the right to appear personally before the Board or submit a written statement in his/her behalf before a final decision is made, were established in regulations published, pursuant to section 7403(b) in its current form, in VA Manual MP-5, Part II, chapters 4 and 9. The draft bill preserves the authority of the Secretary to establish procedures through regulations, and such regulations will maintain those rights in their current form.

THE SECRETARY OF VETERANS AFFAIRS,
Washington, April 9, 1992.

Hon. DAN QUAYLE,
President of the Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: There is transmitted herewith, a draft bill "To amend title 38, United States Code, to clarify the authority of the Chief Medical Director or designee regarding review of the performance of probationary title 38 health care employees" with the request that it be referred to the appropriate committee for prompt consideration and favorable action.

Currently, section 7403 of title 38, United States Code, provides authority to the Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) to appoint doctors, dentists, podiatrists, optometrists, nurses, physician assistants, and expanded-function dental auxiliaries. That statute also subjects these employees to a two-year probationary period to allow the Department an opportunity to train newly-hired employees and evaluate their total performance.

During the probationary period, the appointee's performance must be reviewed by a professional standards board to determine whether the probationary employee is fully qualified and satisfactory. If the board finds that the employee is not fully qualified and satisfactory, and following a review by the Chief Medical Director or designee of its recommendations and findings, the Department has no option, under the plain language of the current law, but to separate the employee from service.

Essentially, the inflexible language found in the current law has not changed since the establishment of VA's Department of Medicine & Surgery in January 1946. Then, as now, the law provides no options to the Department other than separation from service even in situations where action other than separation would give the probationary employee an opportunity to become fully qualified and satisfactory prior to the end of the probationary period. Moreover, a decision from the Federal Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit further limits the Department. That court ruled that the Chief Medical Director, the official responsible for the operation of the Veterans Health Administration, has no discretion to change a recommendation of the professional standards board.

The goal of VA's medical mission has always been to provide a medical service for the veteran that is second to none in the world. Without in any way compromising VA's mission, the draft bill would allow a professional standards board to tailor its recommendations to fit the particular circumstances of each case. It would authorize a board to recommend actions, other than separation (e.g., additional training, assignment to a mentor, reassignment to another position) where the board believes the action would give a capable employee desirous of satisfactorily completing his or her probationary period the opportunity to do so prior to the end of the probationary period. Finally, it would empower the Chief Medical Director with total discretion, based on his or her own review, to choose among an array of measures that may salvage a candidate who would have to be separated under current law. Clear authority to "salvage" potentially effective health care professionals would be particularly valuable now, while the competition in the marketplace for health-care professionals remains intense.

This proposal would also clarify the intent of Congress that the Secretary of Veterans Affairs has the power to prescribe by regulation both the procedures to be followed by the board and the circumstances in which board proceedings may be initiated and that final action in the review process should be taken by the Chief Medical Director.

There are no costs anticipated from the enactment of this proposal.

The Office of Management and Budget advises that there is no objection from the standpoint of the Administration's program to the submission of this legislative proposal to the Congress.

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD J. DERWINSKI.●

By Mr. FORD (for himself and Mr. WIRTH):

S. 2631. A bill to promote energy production from used oil; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

USED OIL ENERGY PRODUCTION ACT

● Mr. FORD, Mr. President, each year the Nation uses 60 million barrels of lubricating oil. More surprisingly, each year more than 10 million barrels of used lubricating oil is carelessly dumped into the Nation's soil and water causing substantial environmental damage. Just consider, 10 million barrels is equal to 400 million gallons, the equivalent of 35 Exxon Valdez oil spills every year.

What makes this careless disposal of oil even more troubling is that for all practical purposes used oil is the equivalent of crude oil, a valuable commodity. Used oil can be re-refined into a variety of fuels or lubricants and could therefore replace 400 million gallons of crude oil that is now imported each year. During its initial hearings on used oil, on August 2, 1990, the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources determined that there are two reasons for this peculiar situation in which the Nation each year discards 400 million gallons of a valuable commodity, and thereby causes significant environmental damage.

First, the cost of gathering used oil from its many sources requires the development of an extensive collection system.

Second, Federal law currently authorizes the Environmental Protection Agency to declare used oil a hazardous waste under the Solid Waste Disposal Act. Even though the EPA has not actually declared used oil to be a hazardous waste, just the threat of such a declaration discourages most potential collectors and reproducers from accepting used oil. The reason for this disincentive is that by accepting used oil, a collector would potentially open himself to the regulatory and legal liabilities associated with handling a hazardous waste.

Mr. President, 18 months ago the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources reported the Used Oil Energy Production Act of 1990. The purpose of this legislation was to promote the reuse of used oil as an energy resource and to reduce the widespread environmental damage which currently results from the improper dumping of over 400 million gallons of used oil each year. The act was designed to achieve this goal by meeting three objectives.

First, by requiring importers and manufacturers of lubricating oil to reuse a minimum amount of used oil each year.

Second, by establishing a system of tradable credits to facilitate compliance with the reuse requirements. Such a credit system would also provide an economic incentive for the reuse of used oil because credits would become valuable in those situations where importers and producers of lubricating oil were having difficulty in meeting their reuse requirements and could buy credits to achieve compliance.

Third, the bill would promote the reuse of used oil by eliminating the possibility that used oil might be listed as a hazardous waste. The threat of listing used oil as a hazardous waste, with all of the potential costs and liabilities associated with hazardous waste, is behind the reluctance of many potential collectors and reusers of used oil to actually engage in reuse. The resulting scarcity of used oil collection centers means that most "do-it-yourselfers," those who change oil in their own vehicles, cannot conveniently dispose of their used oil. Consequently, an estimated 400 million gallons of used oil is dumped into the Nation's water and soil each year. This provision would thus eliminate an existing regulatory disincentive to the reuse of used oil.

The environmental damage which results from improper disposal is difficult to understate. Used oil is the single largest polluter of our Nation's water resources—the volume equivalent of several major oil tanker spills per year.

Because this legislation included provisions which prohibited the listing of used oil as a hazardous waste the committee with jurisdiction over hazardous wastes, the Committee on Environment and Public Works, objected to further consideration of the bill on jurisdictional grounds. It was, and continues to be, the position of the committee that the reuse of used oil should be considered by the Senate only within the context of broader hazardous waste legislation.

Ten months ago, on June 5, 1991, the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources reported comprehensive national energy policy legislation, the National Energy Security Act of 1991, and included the provisions of the Used Oil Energy Production Act as previously and unanimously reported. The committee continued to take the position that used oil is a valuable energy resource and its reuse as a fuel should be encouraged. However, the Committee on Environment and Public Works again objected to Senate consideration of the used oil provisions outside of consideration of hazardous waste legislation. Accordingly, and the provisions were dropped.

Mr. President, today I am introducing the Used Oil Energy Production Act. This legislation is identical to the act unanimously reported by the Energy Committee 18 months ago, and reported as a part of the National Energy Security Act 10 months ago.

More recently, the Committee on Environment and Public Works has begun development of comprehensive hazardous waste legislation. However, the approach taken with respect to used oil is substantially different than that proposed by the Energy Committee. For example, the Environment and Public Works Committee draft does not directly address the issue of the listing of used oil as a hazardous waste, but instead directs the Administrator of the EPA to develop separate management standards for used oil. In addition, the E&PW draft would not establish a credit system.

I anticipate that the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources will hold another hearing on this issue to examine the merits of these two different approaches to promoting the reuse of used oil. There are several specific concerns I would like to examine. For example, I am concerned that the management standards proposed in the E&PW draft, and the pace of their implementation, may disrupt the existing used oil collection and reuse industry. Also, a credit system may be needed, particularly in the short term, in order to provide economic incentives to those interested in promoting the reuse of used oil.

I look forward to working with my colleagues on developing legislation which will encourage the reuse of used oil, and which will reduce the environmental damage caused by the careless dumping of used oil.●

By Ms. MIKULSKI:

S. 2632. A bill to establish the National Environmental Technologies Agency; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

NATIONAL ENVIRONMENTAL TECHNOLOGIES AGENCY ACT

● Ms. MIKULSKI, Mr. President, I rise today to introduce legislation to create a new independent agency that will act as the catalyst for public-private partnerships to develop environmental technologies.

These technologies will produce products and the products will produce jobs. Jobs today and jobs tomorrow.

I call this new agency the National Environmental Technologies Agency or NETA. This Agency will be created at no additional cost to the taxpayer. NETA's seed money will come from shifting some existing funds that are now being spent on Defense research.

The goal of NETA is to assist private industry, universities, and nonprofit research centers in developing environmentally safe and energy efficient technologies to help secure America's environmental security and competitiveness.

Let me tell you how this Agency will work.

NETA will reduce bureaucracy by coordinating efforts of other agencies and streamlining support for research and development.

Once formed, the Agency will identify areas that need technical solutions and that are not receiving product oriented research.

NETA will provide support for these efforts by offering loans and grants, or by entering into cooperative agreements with the private sector or the university community.

NETA will then assist in deployment of these technologies by coordinating exchange of information and providing the needed technical assistance to transfer these ideas into consumer and industrial products and equipment.

The agency will closely monitor its investments and will work to disseminate information to the private sector on the progress of these projects.

This will be a small independent agency that will have a big impact on research into environmentally sound or energy efficient technology.

The potential is endless. New technologies to clean up superfund sites. Products developed without the use of lead. More efficient engines. New products made from recyclable goods.

The time is right for NETA. We have won the war abroad, and now it is time to win the war for America's future. We need to change the way we think and the way we operate. What we are doing here is retooling Government and getting it ready to do business in the New World.

Right now, the Federal Government spends more than $76 billion on research and development. Sixty percent of that amount still goes to Defense research. It is time to flick the switch and make this Government more efficient.

Mr. President, we know this system works. The essence of NETA can be found in the very successful Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency or DARPA. DARPA was created when the Russian Sputnik threatened to overtake American technology.

We knew we were behind. We knew we had to think like entrepreneurs. To make Government flexible and responsive. And to break down the walls between the Federal Government and the private sector.

DARPA worked closely with the private sector and provided grants to develop military technologies. It was a partnership that produced the M-16 rifle. And the stealth technology. We know it works. We've seen its success.

We are getting behind again. Other countries are becoming the leaders in developing air pollution control equipment and waste water treatment technologies.

NETA will take the same spirit of DARPA and aim it at protecting our environment.

Mr. President, we have a chance here to become the Green Giant of the 21st century. I do not want to see another country steal that chance.

And you know that is what they are trying to do. The European Community has already set up agencies to study the technological future. Germany spends 23 percent of its R&D budget environmentally. And Japan is spending over $4 billion to develop its environmental research.

The future market for this research is there and is growing. Right now in this country alone, 800,000 people work in the environmental industry. The world market for environmental technologies is expected to jump to $300 billion by the year 2000. That is a lot of jobs available in a growing market.

Let's not play catch up. Let's get out in front. I do not want this country to import ideas from abroad. I want it to export American ideas, American technologies, and American products. We cannot afford to wait.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the text of the bill to be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2632

By Mr. DOLE:

S. 2633. A bill to revise the Federal vocational training system to meet the Nation's work force needs into the 21st century by establishing a network of local skill centers to serve as a common point of entry to vocational training, a certification system to ensure high quality programs, and a voucher system to enhance participant choice, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

JOB TRAINING 2000 ACT

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I am pleased to introduce the Job Training 2000 Act. This legislation, urged by the administration and prepared at the request of President Bush, would reform the Federal Vocational Training System to meet this Nation's work force needs far into the future.

It seeks to achieve this ambitious goal by overhauling the coordination of the delivery of training services presently rendered by the Federal Government. It also establishes a certification system to ensure the quality of vocational training programs and a voucher payment system to enhance participant choice.

Today, numerous programs administered by over a dozen Federal agencies offer vocational education and job training at a cost of billions of dollars each year. This investment is supposed to provide opportunities for American workers to acquire the vital skills necessary to succeed in a constantly changing economy.

Unfortunately, as programs have been created, revised, and re-revised over the years, we have ended up with a confusing maze of services whose effectiveness has been hampered by the lack of coordination and efficient administration. In short, the system is not living up to its potential.

The Job Training 2000 Act addresses this problem by establishing skill centers which would act as a one-stop entry point to provide both workers and employers with easy access to information about vocational training, labor markets, and other related services available throughout the community.

This centralization of information and services is critical for each program's success. All the answers will be in one place, such as the types of training programs available and career counseling and job placement information. Under the present system, the answers are in lots of places and the big challenge—itsself a disincentive to program utilization—is to find them.

The legislation provides that the delivery of services will be administered through private industry councils—so-called PIC's—formed under the Job Training Partnership Act. These private-public governing boards would be responsible for designating and overseeing skill centers, certifying vocational training programs, and managing the new training voucher system.

The point here is to make the delivery of services more sensitive to local needs and concerns. With the input of members of the local private sector, educational agencies, labor, community-based organizations and other interested and affected groups, programs can best be targeted to those who most need them and benefit by them.

While I suspect that this approach may need some revisions as this legislation is considered, the point is to make sure that the administration of the programs works for the community and is not some detached broad-brush approach that is a bad fit.

The Job Training 2000 Act would also establish a certification system for Federal vocational training keyed to performance. In order for a program to receive Federal vocational training funds, it would have to meet certain standards based on the program's effectiveness measured in part by job placement, retention, and earnings rates.

Not only would this work as a quality control measure, but in these days of tight budgets, it's important that we get all we can from each taxpayer dollar spent.

Finally, the legislation would provide for the implementation of a voucher system tied to vocational training provided under JTPA, the Carl D. Perkins Vocational Education Act, the Food Stamp Employment and Training Program, and the Jobs Program.

Upon entering a skill center, each eligible participant would be provided services through a voucher. By allowing program participants to select from a menu of services, they are able to tailor available resources to their own needs and developmental areas. This ensures that the system works for the participants and that funds are effectively spent to ensure successful training and job placement.

Mr. President, we have all heard the wake-up call that in order to survive in today's competitive, global economy, we need a work force that is highly skilled. In my opinion, we have two options. We can sit on the sidelines and watch events overtake us, or we can get out front and be the competitive leader we have been, need to be, and should continue to be.

President Bush has seized the initiative and drawn up a blueprint so that our work force is prepared for the future. The ball is now in Congress' court.

I urge my colleagues to carefully review this important legislation. While there are certain parts of the bill which may—and in some cases—should be modified, I believe that there is room for accommodation. The point is that a serious dialog is overdue and that action must be taken to better use our resources—and allocate new ones—so that American workers keep their edge.

By being the best at designing and manufacturing products, and by being the best at providing services, we will ensure a bright future for all Americans through more jobs and higher paying jobs.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the complete text of the Job Training 2000 Act and a section-by-section analysis of the legislation be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2633

SEC. 3. FINDINGS AND PURPOSE.

- (a) FINDINGS.—Congress finds that—
 - (1) vocational education and job training are offered by numerous Federal programs and administered by several Federal agencies;
 - (2) services are disjointed, administration is inefficient, and few individuals—especially young, low-income, unskilled people—are able to obtain useful information on program quality, job opportunities or skill requirements;

(3) eligible populations of Federal vocational training programs overlap, and business has only limited input into the programs;

(4) weak quality controls have allowed unscrupulous proprietary institutions and others to obtain Federal funds without providing effective training;

(5) Federally funded vocational training programs must be improved and service delivery streamlined to meet the demands of the changing workplace in the new world economy; and

(6) the current, incoherent complex of programs should be transformed into a vocational training system responsive to the needs of individuals, business, and the national economy by:

(A) simplifying and coordinating program services;

(B) decentralizing decision making and creating a flexible service delivery structure for public programs that reflects local labor market conditions;

(C) ensuring high standards of accountability for vocational training programs; and

(D) encouraging greater and more effective private sector involvement in vocational training programs.

(b) PURPOSE.—It is the purpose of this Act to—

(1) establish a network of local skill centers to provide a common point of entry for individuals to vocational training programs and thereby improve access, minimize duplication, and enhance the effectiveness of such programs;

(2) establish a system for certification of vocational training programs, including certification by private industry councils that such programs meet performance standards, to ensure that only high quality programs are eligible to receive Federal vocational training funds; and

(3) establish a system of vocational training vouchers to enhance participant choice and, by promoting competition among service providers, improve the quality of training.

SEC. 4. AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

There are authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary of Education $50,000,000 in fiscal year 1993 and such sums as may be necessary in each succeeding fiscal year for allocations to the States and private industry councils to assist in carrying out title III, relating to certification of vocational training programs.

Such training may include competency-based applied learning which contributes to an individual's academic knowledge, higher-order reasoning and problem-solving skills, work attitudes, general employability skills, and job placement. However, the primary purpose of such training must be attainment of the occupational-specific skills necessary for economic independence as a productive and contributing member of society.

TITLE VI—EFFECTIVE DATE AND TRANSITION

SEC. 601. EFFECTIVE DATE.

This Act and the amendments made by this Act shall take effect on July 1, 1993.

SEC. 602. TRANSITION PROVISIONS.

Each member of the Federal Council, in consultation with the Federal Council, may establish for programs under such member's jurisdiction such rules and procedures as may be necessary to provide for an orderly transition to and implementation of the requirements established under this Act and the amendments made by this Act.

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS OF THE JOB TRAINING 2000 ACT

The Job Training 2000 Act would revise the Federal vocational training system to meet the Nation's workforce needs into the 21st Century by establishing a network of local skill centers to serve as a common point of entry to vocational training, a certification system to ensure high quality vocational training programs, and a voucher system to enhance participant choice.

Currently, a myriad of programs administered by a number of Federal agencies offer vocational education and job training at a cost of billions of dollars each year. Services are disjointed, administration is inefficient, and few individuals—especially young, low-income, unskilled people—are able to obtain useful information on the quality of programs and the job opportunities or skill requirements in the field for which training is provided. Ineffective quality controls have allowed many unscrupulous proprietary institutions and others to obtain Federal funds without providing effective training.

The Job Training 2000 Act transforms this incoherent complex of programs into a vocational training system responsive to the needs of individuals, business, and the national economy. The Job Training 2000 initiative would be coordinated through the Private Industry Councils (PICs) formed under the Job Training Partnership Act (JTPA). PICs would oversee skill centers, certify (in conjunction with State agencies) Federally-funded vocational training programs, and manage the vocational training voucher system. Under this system, PICs would be accountable to Governors for their activities who, in turn, would report on performance to a Federal Coordinating Council. The Job Training 2000 Act would ensure a more rational, effective, and efficient system to meet the workforce quality needs of the Nation into the next century.

Section 1 of the bill provides that this Act is entitled the "Job Training 2000 Act."

Section 2 contains the Table of Contents.

Section 3 contains the Statement of Findings and Purpose of the Act. The purpose of the Act is threefold: first, to establish a network of local skill centers to provide a common point of entry for individuals to vocational training programs and thereby improve access, minimize duplication, and enhance the effectiveness of such programs; second, to establish a system for certification of vocational training programs, including certification by Private Industry Councils that such programs meet performance standards, to ensure that only high quality programs are eligible to receive Federal vocational training funds; and third, to establish a system of vocational training vouchers to enhance participant choice and, by promoting competition among service providers, improve the quality of training.

Section 4 authorizes appropriations to the Secretary of Education for allocation to the States and PICs to assist in carrying out their certification responsibilities. The authorization is $50,000,000 in FY 1993 and such sums as may be necessary thereafter.

Section 5 contains definitions of terms that are used in the Act. The term "Private Industry Council" is defined as the Council established under section 102 of the Job Training Partnership Act.

The term "service delivery area" is defined as the area established under section 101 of the Job Training Partnership Act.

The term "State" is defined as any of the several States, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, Guam and the Virgin Islands.

The section identifies which programs are included in the term "Veterans Vocational Training."

The term "vocational training" is defined as any program of instruction or applied learning, leading to other than a baccalaureate or advanced degree, that systematically develops the specific skills needed for employment in a current or emerging occupation or occupational cluster and leads to attaining proficiency on a pre-determined sets of skills and knowledge areas needed for such employment. Such training may include competency-based applied learning which contributes to an individual's academic knowledge, higher-order reasoning and problem-solving skills, work attitudes, general employability skills, and job placement. However, the primary purpose of such training must be attainment of the occupational-specific skills necessary for economic independence as a productive and contributing member of society. This definition builds on the definition of vocational education that is contained in the Carl D. Perkins Vocational and Applied Technology Education Act. The term vocational training is used to help identify which programs are to be certified under title III and which services are to be vouchered under title IV.

Title I contains the general provisions that are applicable to the Act. Part A of title I defines Federal responsibilities.

Section 101 establishes a Federal Vocational Training Council of Federal agency heads to oversee implementation of the Act, and promote consistent policies and information exchange among programs covered by the Act. Section 101(a) establishes the council and specifies that it shall consist of the agency heads, or their designees.

Section 101(b) specifies the composition of the Federal Council, which include the Secretaries of Labor, Education, Health and Human Services, Agriculture, and Veterans Affairs. The President may also designate other Federal agency heads to serve on the council.

Section 101(c) specifies that the position of Chair of the Federal Council must rotate among the Secretaries of Labor, Education, and Health and Human Services on a yearly basis, unless these Secretaries approve an alternative means of selection.

Section 101(d) contains the functions of the council. First, the council is to provide guidance and advice relating to the implementation of the requirements of this Act to affected Federal, State, and local agencies and organizations. Second, the Council is to ensure the application of consistent policies, practices and procedures in the operation of Federal vocational training programs, including, through waiver authority (described below), requiring the use of common terms, definitions and performance standards; the collection of common participant and program data; and the coordination (including the timing and sequence) and consolidation of required State and local plans and reports. Third, the council is to serve as a clearinghouse to exchange information relating to vocational training among Federal, State and local officials. Fourth, the council is to conduct a formal evaluation of the effect of the Act on individuals, institutions, agencies and labor markets. Fifth, the council is to oversee the implementation and administration of the Job Training 2000 Act. Finally, the council is to carry out other responsibilities as specified in the Act.

Section 101(e) authorizes the members of the Federal Council to waive regulations or provisions of law under such member's jurisdiction that would prevent the application of consistent practices and procedures relating to common terms, definitions, and performance standards; common participant and program data; and the coordination and consolidation of required State and local plans and reports. The waivers may not alter the purposes or goals of the affected program; eligibility requirements; the allocation of funds under the program; or any law respecting public health or safety, civil rights, occupational safety and health, or environmental protection. The authority for granting waivers is in effect for three years, and before the end of this period, the Federal Council must submit a report and make recommendations to the President based on these consolidation activities.

Section 101(f) authorizes the council to prescribe rules and regulations and to request and accept agency contributions of services, personnel, facilities, and information to assist the council in the performance of its functions.

Section 101(g) requires that upon request of the Council Chair Federal agencies are to make resources available to assist the Federal Council in carrying out its responsibilities.

Section 101(h) requires that, not later than five years after the effective date of the Act, the council submit a report to the President containing the results of the evaluation of the effect of the Act and such recommendations as the council deems appropriate. Not later than 30 months after the effective date of the Act, the Federal Council must submit an interim report to the President and the Congress describing the progress to date in implementing the Act.

Section 102 establishes a National Private Sector Advisory Board on Vocational Training that would provide greater private sector guidance and involvement in vocational training policy making and planning at the Federal level. The Board would advise the Federal Council regarding the carrying out of its responsibilities under the Act; increasing the involvement of the private sector in vocational training programs; and ways of ensuring that the Federal vocational training system meets labor market needs. The Advisory Board is comprised of 15 members appointed by the President. In appointing the Board, the President may consider including representatives of the private sector; representatives of educational agencies, welfare and social service agencies, labor organizations, and vocational rehabilitation, or community-based organizations; and participants in vocational training programs and other individuals who have special knowledge and qualifications with respect to vocational training. The business representatives, who may be owners of business concerns, chief executives or chief operating officers of nongovernmental employers, or other private sector executives who have substantial management or policy responsibility, are to constitute a majority of the membership of the board. Members of the Board are to serve for such terms as the President may prescribe.

The Chairman of the Private Sector Advisory Board is to be selected by the President. The time, place, and manner of meeting, as well as Board operating procedures, is to be determined by the Board. The Board is authorized to use the services, personnel, facilities, and information of the Federal Council in carrying out its functions.

Part B of title II provides for the establishment of a Human Resource Investment Council in each State. The Council would promote Statewide coordination of certain federally-assisted human resource programs by replacing separate existing State councils with a single State advisory body.

The State Human Resource Investment Council would advise the Governor regarding programs under the Adult Education Act, the Carl D. Perkins Vocational and Applied Technology Education Act, JTPA, the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, the Wagner-Peyser Act, JOBS, Food Stamp Employment and Training, student financial aid assistance under Title IV of the Higher Education Act, Veterans' Vocational Training, and other programs designated by the Federal Council. Under current law, there is no State advisory council for programs under the Rehabilitation Act, JOBS, the Higher Education Act, Veterans' Vocational Training or Food Stamp Employment and Training. There are separate State councils authorized for programs under each of the other Acts.

Section 111(a) provides that each State that receives assistance under the applicable Federal programs would establish a single State council to review the provision of services and use of resources and advise the Governor on methods of coordinating the programs. The council would also provide advice to the Governor on the development and implementation of State and local standards and measures relating to the programs.

Section 111(b) provides that the membership of the council is to be appointed by the Governor, and be comprised of representatives of business and industry (who must comprise a majority of the membership of the council), representatives of organized labor and community-based organizations, chief administrative officers in State agencies administering the applicable programs and other representatives of State entities, and representatives of local governments, local educational, and welfare agencies, and individuals with special expertise.

Subsection (c) of this section authorizes the council to obtain the services of personnel to carry out its functions. Subsection (d) provides that the State certify to the Secretary of Labor the establishment and membership of the council 90 days before the submission of a Job Training 2000 plan. Subsection (e) lists the applicable programs under the council's jurisdiction, which were described above.

Part C of title I specifies additional State responsibilities under the Act.

Section 121 requires each Governor to biennially issue a statement of goals and objectives for the Job Training 2000 system established in the State. This statement is to assist the Private Industry Councils in preparing their Job Training 2000 Plans and must be disseminated to each PIC within the State and to other interested agencies, organizations and individuals.

Section 122 specifies State reporting requirements under the Act. Each Governor must submit to the Federal Council an annual report relating to the activities undertaken within the State pursuant to this Act. The report is to include information on the achievement of the goals established by the Governor, information on the performance of skill centers in the State, data on the performance of vocational training programs, and information from the PIC reports. The Council may also request other reports from the Governors.

Section 123 describes the Governors' oversight responsibilities under the Act, which include monitoring, providing technical assistance and applying sanctions, when necessary. Each Governor must monitor the compliance of the PICs within the State with the requirements of the Act, and provide technical assistance deemed necessary to assist the PICs in carrying out their responsibilities (JTPA technical assistance funds may be used for such purpose). If the Governor determines, as a result of a financial and compliance audit or otherwise that there is a substantial violation of the requirements of this Act by a PIC and corrective action is not taken by such PIC, the Governor must issue a notice of intent to revoke all or part of the Job Training 2000 plan or impose a reorganization plan, which may include restructuring the PIC or making other changes the Governor determines to be necessary to secure compliance. Both a Governor's notice of intent to revoke a plan and a Governor's imposition of a reorganization plan may be appealed to the Secretary of Labor.

The Act assigns to PICs major new management responsibilities. PICs currently are the private/public governing board that oversees local job training programs under JTPA. A majority of PIC members must be from the private sector. Under the Job Training 2000 Act, the benefits of business community input, now available only to JTPA, would be extended to other Federal vocational training programs. Through overseeing skill centers, certifying vocational training programs, and managing the voucher system, PICs would have the key role in the local delivery of vocational training funded by the Federal Government.

The oversight authority provided to the Governors under the previous section and under the plan approval procedures described below ensure that the PICs receive assistance when needed and that if the PICs are unable to comply with the requirements of the Act, a reorganization plan or other measures are available to assure that these responsibilities will be effectively carried out.

Part D of title I specifies local planning and reporting requirements under the Act. The planning requirements are continued in section 131 and the reporting requirements in section 132. Section 131(a) provides that a Job Training 2000 plan must be submitted by each PIC to the Governor. In preparing the plan, the PIC must consult with representatives of Federal vocational training programs and local public and private providers of services to such programs. These programs include JTPA, JOBS, the Employment Service, Food Stamp Employment and Training, Vocational Education, Pell Grants, Guaranteed Student Loan, Rehabilitation Act programs, and veterans vocational training programs. The PIC must also consult with representatives of local business, labor, education and community-based organization and other interested individuals and organizations.

The PIC is responsible for preparing the Job Training 2000 plan in a manner that promotes that application of consistent policies, practices and procedures among Federal vocational training programs. It is expected that the Job Training 2000 plan will be the foundation for the preparation of the plans of other participating programs, reducing reporting requirements in these other programs.

Section 131(b) describes the contents of the Job Training 2000 plan. First, the plan must describe the procedures used to designate the skill centers authorized under title II of the Act and include a copy of the Charter designating the skill centers. Second, the plan must describe the procedures used to develop and administer the written agreement between the skill centers and participating programs and include a copy of the agreement. Third, the plan must describe the procedures to be used to monitor the performance of the skill centers and the measures to be taken to improve performance. Fourth, the plan must describe goals and objectives, in addition to the performance standards, for the operation of the skill centers. Fifth, the plan must describe the procedures for implementing the certification system authorized under title III of the Act. Sixth, the plan must describe the goals and objectives for the operation of the voucher system. Seventh, the plan must describe the procedures for implementing the voucher system authorized under title IV of the Act. Eighth, the plan must describe the goals and objectives for the operation of the voucher system. Finally, the plan must include such other planning information as the PIC (in consultation with representatives of Federal vocational training programs and local providers of services) deems appropriate and such information as the Governor deems appropriate relating to the activities carried out under the Act during the preceding two-year period.

Section 131(c) describes the review and approval process for the Job Training 2000 plan. The plan must be made available to the representatives of the programs and organizations that were consulted with in developing the plan, and to the general public for review and comment prior to submission to the Governor. The plan is to be submitted to the Governor for approval and to the State Human Resource Investment Council for review. The Governor must approve the plan unless the Governor determines that: it does not comply with the Act or other laws; the plan lacks sufficient provisions to ensure coordination or minimize the duplication of services; or the PIC did not engage in sufficient consultations with representatives of the community or Federal vocational programs in preparing the plan.

The Governor must approve or disapprove the plan within 30 days after the plan is submitted, and a disapproval may be appealed to the Federal Council, which makes the final decision of whether the Governor's disapproval complies with the conditions for disapproval. If the plan is disapproved, the PIC must be provided an opportunity to modify the plan as necessary to obtain approval. If a modification is not submitted by the PIC within 45 days after a notice of disapproval or denial of an appeal, the Governor must impose a reorganization plan, which may include restructuring the PIC or making such other changes as the Governor determines to be necessary to ensure the submission of an approvable plan. If any of these actions are taken by the Governor, they may be appealed to the Secretary of Labor, who must make a final decision on the appeal within 60 days.

If a plan is approved by the Governor, it is to be submitted to the Secretary of Labor to determine compliance with the Act and if no action is taken by the Secretary within 30 days, the plan becomes effective.

Section 132 requires each PIC to submit to the Governor and the State Human Resource Investment Council an annual report relating to the activities undertaken in the service delivery area pursuant to the Act. The report would indicate the progress that is being made toward achieving the Job Training 2000 goals and objectives established by the Governor. It is to contain operational, performance, and other information required by the Governor in consultation with the Federal Council.

Title II provides for the establishment of a network of local skill centers. Skill centers would replace the dozens of entry points to vocational training now in place in each community and provide a "one-stop shopping" point for individuals to enter the Federal job training system.

Section 201 specifies that the purpose of the skill centers is to improve access of individuals to vocational training by designating local common points of entry to vocational training programs; better inform individuals regarding employment opportunities, local labor market conditions and the performance of local vocational training programs; facilitate the matching of local employers with potential employees who meet hiring qualifications and workforce skill needs; and encourage greater coordination and minimize duplication of services between federally funded vocational training programs.

Section 202 requires each PIC to designate a network of skill centers in each service delivery area. Any entity or consortia of entities located in the service delivery area, including Employment Service offices, community colleges, community-based organizations, JTPA administrative entities, and other interested organizations or institutions, may apply for designation as a skill center.

Section 203 describes the functions of skill centers, including core services and enhanced services. Core services that skill centers must make available include preliminary assessment of skill levels and service needs; information relating to local occupations in demand and the earnings and skill requirements for such occupations; information relating to youth and adult apprenticeship opportunities; information relating to local, regional and national labor markets; career counseling and career planning; employability development; information relating to Federally funded education and job training programs; information relating to performance of vocational training programs available within the service delivery area; intake for participating programs; referrals to agencies and programs providing basic skills and adult literacy services, vocational training, and supportive services; referrals to local employment opportunities; accepting job orders submitted by employers; issuance of vocational training vouchers; and job search and placement assistance.

Enhanced services that skill centers may make available, in accordance with the written agreement, include comprehensive and specialized assessments of the skill levels and service needs, using tests and other assessment tools; development of service strategies and employability development plans; case management for individuals participating concurrently in more than one program; follow-up job counseling for individuals placed in training or employment; and other services as specified in the agreement.

Skill centers may also provide specialized services to employers on a fee-for-service basis, including customized screening and referral of individuals for employment; customized assessment of skill levels of the employer's current employees; and analysis of the employer's workforce skill needs. Program income received from the fees charged employers must be used to expand or enhance skill center services.

Section 204 lists participating programs in the skill centers. Programs that must participate include JTPA title II, Job Corps, the Employment Service, JOBS vocational training referrals, resources for Perkins Act post-secondary programs, Food Stamp Employment and Training vocational training referrals, Veterans' Employment Service, and student financial assistance programs under Title IV of the Higher Education Act. Other programs providing basic skills, support services, literacy or vocational training, such as basic skills and secondary education under the JOBS program, the JTPA Dislocated Workers Program, Trade Adjustment Assistance, Adult Education, and Vocational Rehabilitation, may participate in the operation of a skill center as a party to the agreement if the PIC and the other participating programs approve their participation.

Section 205 describes the designation procedures for skill centers. Section 205(a) requires the PIC to publish in a manner that is generally available, information to notify organizations and individuals in the service delivery area of the application procedure to seek designation as a skill center; the consultation process that will be conducted; the criteria for selection that will be used; and other information deemed relevant to the designation and administration of the skill center.

Section 205(b) requires the PIC to conduct a consultation process to obtain information and advice regarding the designation of skill centers. The consultations may include meetings, conferences, requests for written comments and other opportunities for providing views. The consultations are to be conducted with local elected officials, community and business leaders, representatives of voluntary organizations, representatives from the participating programs, service providers, and other interested organizations and individuals.

Section 205(c) contains the selection criteria for designation of skill centers. PICs, in accordance with Federal Council guidelines, must use objective criteria and methods in assessing applications for designation as a skill center. An applicant may not be designated as a skill center unless such applicant demonstrates to the satisfaction of the PIC its ability to provide skill center services; serve the general public and provide barrier free access to individuals with disabilities; utilize automated information systems; establish linkages with the State Occupational Information Coordinating Committee; provide services effectively to disadvantaged populations; and meet such other requirements as the PIC deems appropriate.

Section 205(d) provides that the PIC is to issue a charter designating the skill centers in the service delivery area. The charter, which provides the operating guidelines for the management of the skill centers, is to indicate the number and location of the skill centers; identify the entity or entities administering the skill centers; specify the term of the Charter; and include such other conditions as the PIC determines is appropriate.

Section 206 describes the written agreement that the skill centers must enter into with the PIC and participating programs concerning the operation of the centers.

Section 206(a) specifies that the Governor is responsible for overseeing the development of the agreement and ensuring the agreement meets the requirement of section 206. Participation of Higher Education Act programs (such as Pell Grants and Guaranteed Student Loans) is limited to referral of students to skill centers. Part D of title II of the Carl D. Perkins Act is also exempted from being party to the agreement because the program's participation in skill centers is limited to issuance of vouchers for vocational training.

Section 206(b) describes the contents of the agreement. The agreement must contain assurances that (except as noted below) participating programs will provide only through the skill centers all core services and those enhanced services which are specified in the agreement. The agreement must also specify methods for referral of individuals by the skill centers to appropriate services and programs; methods of administration, including provisions for monitoring and oversight of the skill centers and the agreement; a description of how services (including the methods and test instruments to be used to assess the skill levels of individuals) are to be provided by the skill centers; the procedures to be used to ensure compliance with the statutory and regulatory requirements of the participating programs; a description of how the skill center would fulfill any compliance or reporting requirements of the participating programs; the duration of the agreement and the procedures for amending the agreement during its term; and such other provisions that the parties to the agreement deem appropriate.

Funding for skill centers would come from participating programs, with the specific financial and nonfinancial contributions of each participating program to be determined locally in the agreement between the PIC and participating programs. The determination is to be based on the types of services provided and the number of participants of the respective programs that are served by the skill centers. Title V of this Act includes conforming amendments to the laws authorizing the participating programs and makes participation in the agreement and the transfer of sufficient resources to the skill centers requirements under such programs. Therefore, the measures available under each program to enforce requirements will be available to ensure that each participating program transfers sufficient resources to the skill centers at the local level.

Section 206(c) provides for exceptions to conditions covering the agreement. The agreement may allow core services relating to job listing and job placement to be carried out by the participating programs in addition to being provided by the skill centers. The agreement may also allow a participating program to directly provide one or more additional core services if the program is a voluntary participating program or the PIC determines that due to the geographic size or rural location of the service delivery area, the requirement that core services be provided only through the skill centers would unreasonably restrict access to core services by participants of the program. The requirement that services be provided through the skill centers, in the case of JOBS and Food Stamp Employment and Training, applies only to participants who have been determined by such programs to need vocational training, and only for services required subsequent to that determination.

Section 207 specifies performance standards for the skill centers. Section 207(a) requires the Secretary of Labor, in consultation with the Federal Council, to prescribe performance standards relating to skill centers, which must include placement, retention and earnings in unsubsidized employment; placement in appropriate vocational training programs; completion of training or achievement of educational objectives; and meeting the needs of the local labor market as described in the local plan. Other measures, such as the quality of services provided, may also be prescribed.

Section 207(b) allows a Governor, within parameters established by the Secretary of Labor in consultation with the Federal Council, to prescribe adjustments to the performance standards for the skill centers. Such adjustments may be based on specific economic, geographic and demographic factors in the State and in service delivery areas within the State; and the characteristics of the population to be served, including the demonstrated difficulties in serving special populations. A Governor may also prescribe additional performance standards for skill centers. The adjustments and additions prescribed by the Governor must be described in the annual report that is submitted to the Federal Council.

Section 207(c) addresses the failure of a skill center to meet performance standards. The Secretary of Labor, in consultation with the Federal Council, must establish uniform criteria for determining whether a skill center fails to meet performance standards. The PIC and the Governor must provide technical assistance to skill centers failing to meet performance standards. Each Governor must include in the report to the Federal Council the final performance standards and performance for each skill center within the State, along with the technical assistance to skill centers that was planned and provided. If a skill center continues to fail to meet performance standards for 2 consecutive program years, the Governor must notify the Secretary and the skill center of the continuing failure, and direct the PIC to rescind the Charter designating the skill center and designate another entity as a skill center in accordance with the requirements of section 205. A skill center that is the subject of a re-designation may, within 30 days after receiving notice, appeal to the Secretary of Labor. The Secretary must issue a decision on the appeal within 30 days.

Section 207(d) authorizes the Governor to use incentive funds available under the Wagner-Peyser Act and JTPA to provide incentive grants to the skill centers for exceeding the performance standards established under this Act. These incentive grants may be used by the skill centers to increase or enhance services.

Title III establishes a certification system for Federal vocational training. This new certification system would preclude ineffective vocational training programs from receiving Federal funds. It is anticipated that the certification system will greatly enhance the quality of vocational training courses offered in each local area and result in course offerings that are much more responsive to the needs of local businesses and the realities of the local labor market.

The purpose of the certification system, as described in Section 301 is to: (1) ensure that only high quality vocational training programs are eligible to receive Federal funds; (2) establish performance standards to increase the effectiveness of vocational training programs; and (3) promote the availability of information on the local level regarding the performance of vocational training programs.

Section 302 provides that the Secretary of Education is to allocate funds appropriated for carrying out the certification system to the States and PICs based on factors that the Secretary, in consultation with the Federal Council, determines are appropriate.

Section 303 specifies that only a vocational training program that has been certified as meeting the requirements of this title is eligible to receive Federal funds under the specified covered programs. This ensures that only programs meeting certain quality performance standards will be Federally funded.

Section 303(b) lists the covered programs to which the certification requirement applies. To receive Federal vocational training funds under these programs, the training program must be approved by the State agency designated under Section 304. The covered programs are titles II and III of JTPA; the Food Stamp Employment and Training Program; JOBS; Perkins post-secondary vocational education; student financial assistance programs under Title IV of the Higher Education Act; Rehabilitation Act programs; Veterans Vocational Training; Refugee Assistance; and Trade Adjustment Assistance.

Section 304 requires that the Secretary of Education, in consultation with the Federal Council, prescribe performance standards for vocational training programs provided by institutions or other service providers that address: the financial responsibility of the institution conducting the program and the reasonableness of the program's costs; the rates of withdrawal by students from the program; the rates of student loan default; the rates of licensure of graduates (if appropriate); and the rates of placement and retention in employment and the earnings of graduates of the program. The standards will be sensitive to legitimate performance differences that result in programs enrolling especially hard-to-serve populations. The Secretary of Education, in consultation with the Federal Council, may prescribe additional standards based on other measures of the effectiveness of the program in meeting the special needs of disadvantaged populations and in preparing students for employment, including (where appropriate) the preparation of students to meet relevant industry skill standards. The standards may not be revised more frequently than once every two years.

Section 304(b) allows the PIC to modify the levels of the performance standards for successful performance if such modifications are approved by the Governor and the Secretary of Education, in consultation with the Federal Council.

Section 305 requires each State to designate an entity to serve as the single State agency to certify vocational training programs. If a single State agency has been designated to approve programs for purposes of Title IV of the Higher Education Act, that agency would be the designated agency for the purposes of certifying vocational training programs. The designated State agency is required to annually collect and analyze information from vocational training programs in the State on the program's performance with respect to the standards identified in section 304. The State agency must also issue guidelines relating to the procedures to be used by the PICs for certifying vocational training programs.

Section 305(b) requires each vocational training program that wants to be certified to submit an application to the State agency.

Section 305(c) requires that the State agency notify the appropriate Private Industry Council when a vocational training program submits an application requesting to be certified. Upon receipt of the notification, the PIC must certify to the State agency whether the vocational training program meets the performance standards of section 304. The PIC would use information collected and analyzed by the State agency and other information that the PIC deems appropriate in its certification of the vocational training program.

To carry out its certification responsibilities, a PIC may utilize the staff of the skill center or the staff of other entities or establish a consortium with other PICs.

Section 305(d) requires that the State agency approve the application submitted by the vocational training program once it receives the certification from the PIC (consistent with the State agency guidelines) that the program meets the performance standards established in Section 303. The certification remains in effect for two years from the date it was issued.

The State agency must require a recertification of a vocational training program whenever the ownership of a school providing certified vocational training changes, the State becomes aware of a substantial change in operations of the program, or when other information comes to the attention of the State agency that warrants a review of certification.

Under the Secretary of Education's guidelines, the State agency has the authority to suspend program certification on an emergency basis if such action is necessary to protect students or prevent misuse of Federal or State funds. In such case, the State agency must carry out an expedited recertification.

Section 305(e) requires the Governor to establish an appeal procedure for vocational training programs to use if the PIC and the State agency deny an application for certification. The Secretary of Education is also to establish an appeal procedure to consider appeals denied by the Governor. In addition, the Secretary of Education is provided with the discretion to review certification decisions made by the PICs.

Section 305(f) requires that the Governor implement standards to ensure that no PIC engages in any conflict of interest in its certification responsibilities.

Section 305(g) requires the PIC to disseminate information relating to the performance of vocational training programs to the skill centers.

Title IV establishes a vocational training voucher system.

The purpose of the voucher system, as described in Section 401, is to enhance the choices available to participants in vocational training programs, and to promote competition among providers of vocational training, thereby enhancing the quality of training.

Section 402 identifies which services are to be vouchered. Vocational training and related services that are provided by a covered program are to be provided only through the voucher system established under this title. Related services refers to services that are provided by a single service provider as a package of services which includes vocational training. The covered programs are Titles II and III of JTPA; the Food Stamp Employment and Training Program; and Perkins Act Postsecondary Vocational Education.

In addition to vocational training and related services, covered programs may provide other services through the voucher system, as identified in the agreement required under section 403(b). In addition to the covered programs, other Federal vocational training programs may, consistent with the laws governing such programs, participate in the voucher system if the PIC approves such participation.

Section 403 requires that the PIC be responsible for overseeing the establishment and operation of the voucher system. PICs are required to consult with local providers of vocational training. After this consultation, the PIC must enter into a written agreement with the skill centers established under Title II of the Act and with the local agencies responsible for the covered programs identified in section 402(b) and any additional programs under section 403(d) specifying the conditions of the voucher system.

Section 404(a) requires that vouchers issued under this Title contain: an expiration date; the program of study for which the participant may use the voucher; the maximum dollar amount; a payment schedule and other conditions specified in the agreement reached under Section 403(b). Vouchers are only redeemable for programs certified under Title III of this Act.

Section 404(b) requires that at least twenty percent of the payment of the voucher be withheld from the service provider until the participant has successfully completed training and has been employed for at least ninety days. This will make full payment for vocational training dependent on successful performance.

Section 404(c) specifies that the amount of outstanding vouchers issued by a covered program may not exceed the amount of funds available to the program in the service delivery area under section 404(d). If a voucher is not redeemed by the expiration date, the voucher is invalid.

Section 405 contains the conditions governing on-the-job training (OJT) vouchers. An OJT voucher must contain an expiration date, a maximum dollar amount, a payment schedule, and specify a particular occupational area for which the voucher can be used. An OJT voucher is redeemable only by employers who have available positions approved by the covered program in the particular occupational area. The twenty percent withholding requirement does not apply to OJT vouchers. However, the limitation on outstanding amounts does apply.

Section 406 allows for vocational training and related services for a covered program to be provided through a contract instead of a voucher if the PIC approves a request submitted by the program. The basis for such request must be that there are insufficient providers of vocational training services in the service delivery area or that service providers are unable to provide effective services to special participant populations. The Governor may rescind the permission to contract for direct services if the Governor determines there was an insufficient basis for the PIC's findings.

Title V contains conforming amendments to legislation authorizing programs affected by the Job Training 2000 Act.

Section 501 contains conforming amendments relating to the State Human Resource Investment Council. Each of the Acts which authorize the applicable programs under the purview of the Council is amended. These amendments clarify the duties of the council with respect to each Act and provide for coordination of the programs by the council.

Section 502 contains conforming amendments to the Job Training Partnership Act.

Section 503 contains conforming amendments to the Wagner-Peyser Act.

Section 504 contains conforming amendments to the Veterans' training program under chapter 41 of Title 38, United States Code.

Section 505 contains conforming amendments to the Carl D. Perkins Vocational Education and Applied Technology Act.

Section 506 contains conforming amendments to the JOBS provisions of the Family Support Act.

Section 507 contains conforming amendments to the Food Stamp Act.

Section 508 contains conforming amendments to the Higher Education Act.

Section 509 contains conforming amendments to the Rehabilitation Act.

Section 510 contains conforming amendments to the U.S. Code relating to Refugee Assistance.

Section 511 contains conforming amendments to the relating to the Trade Adjustment Assistance provisions of the Trade Act of 1974.

Title VI provides that the effective date of the Act and the amendments made by this Act is July 1, 1993, which is the beginning of the Program Year for several Federal vocational training programs and States. This title also includes a provision that authorizes the respective Secretaries to establish transition rules for programs under their jurisdiction to facilitate the implementation of the Job Training 2000 Act.

By Mr. CRANSTON (for himself and Mr. METZENBAUM):

S. 2635. A bill to amend title II of the Social Security Act to provide that the combined earnings of a husband and wife during the period of their marriage shall be divided equally and shared between them for benefit purposes, so as to recognize the economic contribution of each spouse to the marriage and assure that each spouse will have social security protection in his or her own right; to the Committee on Finance.

SOCIAL SECURITY EQUITY ACT

• Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I am pleased to introduce this bill, the proposed Social Security Equity Act of 1992, which is identical to legislation I introduced in the past four Congresses. This measure would incorporate the concept of earning sharing into the Social Security system. I am joined in sponsoring this legislation by the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. METZENBAUM].

This bill is similar to earnings-sharing legislation which has been introduced in the House in past Congresses by Representative MARY ROSE OAKAR, who has served as the chair of that body's Select Committee on Aging's Task Force on Social Security and Women. Representative OAKAR has been a tremendous leader in the effort to reform the Social Security system in a manner that would adequately and equitably deal with the needs of older women. It is a great pleasure to continue to work with Representative OAKAR on this legislation.

Mr. President, the basic concept underlying earnings sharing is relatively simple: marriage for Social Security purposes should be and would be regarded as a partnership. In order to compute benefits, all of the earnings of a married couple would be combined and divided equally between the spouses upon retirement or divorce. Each member of the couple would then have established for him or her an individual Social Security account. Earnings acquired before or after a marriage would go into this individual account along with whatever share each member acquired during the marriage.

Mr. President, earnings sharing in Social Security would represent a major reform which obviously cannot be implemented overnight. But such an effort must begin now so that future generations of women will be adequately and equitably treated under the Social Security system. Social Security is vital to the security and well-being of millions of Americans—current retirees and disabled persons and future ones. This country has a major obligation to protect the system. But equally important is the obligation to make sure that the system remains responsive to the changing needs and roles within our population.

Over the years, the Social Security system has grown and responded to the changing needs in many ways, such as by the addition of disability coverage and the enactment of the Medicare Program. Earnings sharing is a concept that is part of that process of growth and responsiveness.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2635

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Social Security Equity Act of 1992".

SEC. 2. SHARING OF EARNINGS BY MARRIED COUPLES.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Title II of the Social Security Act is amended by adding at the end the following new section:

"SHARING OF EARNINGS BY MARRIED COUPLES.

"SEC. 234. (a)(1) For purposes of determining the eligibility of an individual and the spouse of such individual for old-age and disability benefits and the amount of such benefits to which each is or may become separately entitled, the combined earnings of such individual and such spouse shall, to the extent that such earnings are attributable to the marriage period of such individual and such spouse (as determined under paragraph (2)), be divided equally between them and shared in accordance with this section.

"(2)(A) Except as provided in subparagraph (B), for purposes of this section, the term 'marriage period' means the period—

"(i) beginning with the first day of the calendar year in which the marriage of an individual and the spouse of such individual occurs, and

"(ii) ending with the last day of the calendar year preceding the earliest calendar year in which such individual or such spouse dies, they are divorced, or one of them files application for old-age or disability insurance benefits.

"(B)(i) No marriage period shall begin for any individual and the spouse of such individual if their marriage occurs after such individual or such spouse has filed an application for old-age insurance benefits.

"(ii) No marriage period shall include a period for which such individual or such spouse is entitled to disability insurance benefits or the waiting period (as defined in section 223(c)(2)) with respect to such benefits.

"(iii) A marriage period shall include the 'earliest calendar year' referred to in clause (ii) of subparagraph (A) for purposes of recomputations for that year under section 215(f)(2), in any case where an individual or the spouse of such individual dies or they are divorced, unless the survivor (where one of them dies) or either of them (where they are divorced) is remarried later in the same year.

"(b)(1) Except to the extent otherwise provided in subsections (c), (d), and (e), an individual and the spouse of such individual shall each be credited for all of the purposes of this title with wages and self-employment income, for each calendar year for which either of them is credited with any wages and self-employment income without regard to this section during their marriage period, in an amount equal to—

"(A) 50 percent of the combined total of the wages and self-employment income otherwise credited to both of them for that year if (at the close of the month for which the benefit determinations involved are being made) they are both still living, or

"(B) 100 percent of such combined total, up to but not exceeding the maximum amount that may be counted for that year without exceeding the ceiling imposed for that year under section 215(e), if (at the close of such month) one of them has died.

"(2) Nothing in this section shall affect the crediting of wages and self-employment income to any individual for any calendar year not included in a marriage period of such individual; but to the extent that wages and self-employment income are credited pursuant to this section the other provisions of this title specifying the manner in which wages and self-employment income are to be credited shall (to the extent inconsistent with this section) not apply.

"(3) Except where the context requires otherwise, for purposes of this section, the term 'spouse' includes a divorced spouse, a surviving spouse, and a surviving divorced spouse.

"(c) Subsections (a) and (b) shall not apply with respect to the crediting of wages and self-employment income for any calendar year, in the case of any individual and the spouse of such individual, if—

"(1) as a result of the application of such subsections with respect to that year such individual or such spouse would cease to be a fully insured individual (as defined in section 214(a)); or

"(2) such individual or such spouse is applying for disability insurance benefits (or for the establishment of a period of disability) and as a result of the application of such subsections with respect to that year would cease to be insured for such benefits under section 223(c)(1) (or for such a period under section 216(i)(3)).

"(d) Subsections (a) and (b) shall not apply for purposes of determining the amount of the benefit payable to any individual for any month if—

"(1) the total amount of the wages and self-employment income credited to such individual for a marriage period, as determined without regard to this section, is higher than the total amount of the wages and self-employment income credited to such individual's spouse for that period, as so determined; and

"(2) such individual's spouse (taking subsections (a) and (b) into account) has not filed application for old-age or disability insurance benefits by the close of such month.

"(e) Notwithstanding any of the preceding provisions of this section—

"(1) benefits payable under subsection (d) or (h) of section 202 on the basis of the wages and self-employment income of any individual, and benefits payable under subsection (b), (c), (e), (f), or (g) of such section 202 (on the basis of such wages and self-employment income) to any person other than a spouse who has shared in or been credited with a part of such individual's earnings under subsections (a) and (b) of this section, shall be determined as though this section had not been enacted if—

"(A) the application of this section has changed such individual's primary insurance amount from what it would otherwise have been; and

"(B) the crediting of wages and self-employment income to such individual and the spouse of such individual without regard to this section would increase the amount of such benefits; and

"(2) in the application of section 203(a) (relating to maximum family benefits) with respect to benefits payable on the basis of the wages and self-employment income of any individual, where all or any part of the wages and self-employment income of such individual and the spouse of such individual was credited to them in accordance with this section, the primary insurance amount of such individual (and the crediting of such wages and self-employment income) shall be determined in accordance with this section but the benefits payable to any other person on the basis of the wages and self-employment income of such individual shall be determined without regard to this section.

"(f) Notwithstanding any other provision of this title, no wife's, husband's, widow's, or widower's insurance benefit shall be paid to any individual for any month under subsection (b), (c), (e), or (f) of section 202, and no individual shall be entitled to any such benefit, unless—

"(1) the period of such individual's marriage (to the spouse or former spouse on the basis of whose wages and self-employment income such benefit is payable) ended before the effective date of this section;

"(2) such individual is under the age of 62 (and is otherwise entitled to such benefit);

"(3) such benefit is payable without regard to age and solely by reason of such individual's having a child in his or her care; or

"(4) the application of this section to such individual is prevented by subsection (c) or (d) (or by clause (i) or (ii) of subsection (a)(2)(B)).

"(g) For purposes of subsections (a)(2) and (d), an individual's application for old-age or disability insurance benefits shall be deemed to have been filed on the first day of the first month for which (by reason of the operation of section 202(j) or 223(b)) such individual is entitled to such benefits."

SEC. 3. EFFECTIVE DATE.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in subsection (b), the amendments made by this Act shall apply only to wages and self-employment income payable after December 31, 1992, to an individual who has not attained age 50 on or before such date, and only if—

By Mr. THURMOND (for himself, Mr. McCAIN, Mr. SEYMOUR, and Mr. SHELBY):

S. 2636. A bill to amend title 10, United States Code, to provide the Secretary of the Army with the same employment authority regarding civilian faculty members of the Defense Institute Foreign Language Center as is provided regarding civilian faculty members of the Army War College and the U.S. Army Command and General Staff College; to the Committee on Armed Services.

EMPLOYMENT AUTHORITY WITH RESPECT TO CIVILIAN FACULTY MEMBERS OF CERTAIN DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE INSTITUTIONS

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, on behalf of Senators McCAIN, SEYMOUR, and SHELBY, I rise to introduce a bill to provide the Secretary of the Army the same employment authority regarding civilian faculty members of the Defense Language Institute Foreign Language Center as is allowed for civilian faculty members of the Army War College and the U.S. Army Command and General Staff College. The proposed bill has the support of the Department of Defense and has been agreed to by the Office of Personnel Management.

Mr. President, the Defense Language Institute Foreign Language Center is a national resource which has no counterpart in the Western World. The Secretary of the Army is the executive agent tasked with operating the institution. Its mission is to provide language training in 71 different languages or dialects to our Armed Forces. This Institute also provides support to the White House, the State Department, the Nation's intelligence agencies, NATO and the Organization of American States. The typical student attendance is 4,000 per year, supported by a faculty of 800 who provide over 2,000 hours of daily instruction.

Because of the proficiency level required to meet the Defense needs, the civilian faculty of DLI, as the Defense Language Institute is known, must be of the highest caliber. Like most Federal institutions the instructors are managed under the civil service general schedule, with an exception enabling noncitizens to be employed as full-time permanent civil servants. Unfortunately, the civil service classification standards and salaries are too low to retain the top quality teachers needed to achieve graduate proficiency. The best teachers often use DLI as a stepping stone to better paying jobs. Internally, the only way success is rewarded is by promotion from the classroom to administration, where the higher paying positions are located.

This situation is not unique to the Defense Language Institute. Similar problems were identified in the Services' senior professional schools, such as the Army War College and the Command and General Staff College. To ensure that these academic facilities maintained their outstanding caliber of professors, the Congress, in the fiscal year 1990 national defense authorization bill, authorized the Service Secretaries to prescribe the compensation for these individuals. In the case of the Army War College, the Secretary of the Army established a faculty structure that mirrored the academic environment: Professor, associate/assistant professor, instructor. Pay bands were established for each of these positions. This formula vested rank, and therefore salary, in the person rather than in the position. The result was that it created a career ladder with incentives to increase professional educational qualifications. By all accounts, the fiscal year 1990 legislation accomplished its intended purpose and is a great success.

Mr. President, the legislation we are introducing today will extend this time-tested program to the Defense Language Institute. I am advised that any cost incurred to implement the program will be provided from current operating funds and that this cost will be offset by the savings achieved as a result of reduced faculty turnover.

Mr. President, this legislation is a good Government provision, that has the support of the Department of Defense. I urge my colleagues to support it.

By Mr. MCCAIN (for himself and Mr. MURKOWSKI):

S. 2637. A bill to increase housing opportunities for Indians; to the Select Committee on Indian Affairs.

INDIAN HOUSING OPPORTUNITIES

• Mr. MCCAIN. Mr. President, I rise to introduce the Indian Housing Development Act of 1992, along with Senator MURKOWSKI.

Before I begin my remarks, I would like to publicly express my appreciation to Senator MIKULSKI, Senator GARN, and their staffs for their efforts to secure and preserve increased funding for Indian housing. I know their efforts have given Indian people a renewed sense of hope that their housing needs have not been forgotten.

Sadly our treatment of Indian people more than our treatment of any other minority is perhaps best captured by that one word: forgotten. As I have said on other occasions, it seems to me that a strategy for American Indian and Alaska Native housing issues would be a natural component of any national housing policy. Unfortunately, the history of the Indian housing programs reveals a far different story.

While the majority of our Nation has been served under the public housing program since it was first established in 1937, American Indians and Alaska Natives were not declared eligible for Federal housing programs until 1961. And, in fact, a substantial number of Indian housing units were not authorized until the early 1970's. The office of Indian housing at the Department of Housing and Urban Development was not permanently established until 1978. Given the slow evolution of the Indian housing program, it is not hard to understand why there continues to be a substantial number of Indian families in need of safe, decent, and sanitary housing. The Bureau of Indian Affairs currently estimates that there are more than 88,000 Indian families who are in need of new or substantially rehabilitated dwelling units.

Compounding the problem of demand is the fact that many of the traditional solutions to urban and rural housing problems have proven to be largely unworkable on Indian reservations and Alaska Native villages. Moreover, rather than carefully assess alternative methods which might address the housing problems unique to Indian country, the Congress and the administration have often found it easier to simply carve out a set-aside in programs designed for urban and rural areas.

It was my hope that the National Commission on American Indian, Alaska Native, and Native Hawaiian Housing would have submitted their final report by now. Unfortunately, although the committee had been previously advised that the final report would be ready by April, it now appears that the report will not be available for distribution until later this year. It remains my hope that the final report will not simply be another recitation of the dismal statistics regarding unmet Indian housing needs, but that it will offer realistic alternatives for the improvement of current services and innovative strategies for providing housing to low- and moderate-income Indian families.

The bill I am introducing today seeks to continue and expand the effort at finding ways to meet the continuing demand for safe, sanitary, and decent housing in Indian country. I would like to highlight a couple of the key provisions contained in the bill. A section-by-section analysis of the entire bill is included at the end of my statement.

First, the bill would continue the current Indian housing authorization level of 3,000 units. The primary concern of Indian tribes continues to be the authorization level for the development of new housing units. In fact, many Indian tribes have expressed to members of the Select Committee on Indian Affairs that an authorization of 6,000 units of Indian housing would be more appropriate. I am concerned, however, that an authorization of 6,000 units would only succeed in raising the hopes of Indian people to unrealistic heights in light of current budget constraints. It is my belief that our collective energies could be better spent on sustaining previously successful efforts at obtaining at or near 3,000 units of Indian housing.

Second, my bill introduces for discussion the idea of consolidating the Housing Improvement Program at the Department of the Interior with the Indian Housing Program at the Department of Housing and Urban Development. I believe it is possible that such a consolidation will avoid the duplication of efforts that currently exist between the two programs and will also result in reduced administrative costs.

Perhaps the best example of the duplication that exists between the two programs is captured in the following budget justification for the Housing Improvement Program at BIA:

 assist Indian tribes in working with the Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) and the Farmer's Home Administration (FmHA), federal agencies involved in providing Indian housing (emphasis added).

How can the administration or the Congress justify two Indian housing programs when the Indian housing program at one agency justifies its existence by helping Indian tribes take advantage of the Indian housing program at the other agency? I see no reason why the HUD Indian Housing Program cannot perform the entire job and—mark this—even save some administrative dollars in the process. I am offering this proposal for discussion, and I would hasten to point out to my friends in Indian country that while I see merit in this proposal it does not represent a general belief on my part that there needs to be a wholesale division and transfer of BIA programs to other Federal agencies as some persons will have you believe.

Lastly, section 10 of the bill authorizes $500,000 in grants to Indian tribal governments to obtain technical assistance. In the past, the Congress has seen fit to identify one organization as the repository for Indian tribes to secure such assistance. After thinking about this particular approach, I believe technical assistance is best arranged between a tribe and the service provider that can best meet their needs. The service provider is then made accountable to the tribe and is likely to deliver a higher quality of service in return. I do not believe any organization is entitled to Federal assistance which thereby establishes them as the sole provider; organizations should earn the trust of the constituency they seek to serve.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the bill and the section-by-section analysis to the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2637

(1) Indian tribes face an unprecedented crisis due to the lack of shelter for a growing number of individuals and families, including elderly persons, persons with disabilities, and families with children;

(2) the demand for Indian housing has become more severe and, in the absence of more effective efforts and consistent funding, is expected to become dramatically worse, endangering the lives and safety of Indian and Alaska Native people;

(3) the Federal Government has a historical and special legal relationship with, and resulting responsibility to, Indian tribes; and

(4) included within the relationship referred to in clause (3) is a trust responsibility to provide decent, safe, sanitary, and affordable housing to the members of Indian tribes residing on reservations.

Funds so set aside shall be in addition to any other funds authorized to be provided to such Indian housing authorities by this Act."

SEC. 9. INDIAN HOUSING AUTHORITIES.

Notwithstanding the provisions of section 201(b)(2) of the United States Housing Act of 1937, the provisions of sections 572, 573, 574, 581, and 957 of the Cranston-Gonzalez National Affordable Housing Act shall be applicable, effective on the date of enactment of this Act, in the case of public housing developed or operated pursuant to a contract between the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development and an Indian housing authority in the same manner and to the same extent as if section 201(b)(2) of the United States Housing Act of 1937 had not been enacted into law.

SEC. 10. TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE.

(a) TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE GRANTS.—The Secretary of Housing and Urban Development is authorized to make grants to Indian tribes for use by such tribes in obtaining technical assistance in connection with Indian housing programs.

(b) AUTHORIZATION.—There is authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development $500,000 to carry out the provisions of subsection (a).

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS TO THE INDIAN HOUSING DEVELOPMENT ACT OF 1992

Section 1. Short title.

Section 2. Congressional findings.

Section 3. This section increases the budget authority sufficient to provide 6,000 units of Indian housing per year through FY '96. The current authorization—which is set to expire this year—provides for 3,000 units per year.

Section 4. This section codifies current administrative practice with regard to setting aside a specific allocation of Comprehensive Improvement Assistance Program funds for Indian housing authorities.

Section 5. (a) provides that only federally-recognized Indian tribes would be eligible for the HUD Indian housing program. Currently HUD does provide services to some state-recognized tribes. This section would make the HUD Indian housing program consistent with other federal Indian programs which provide services only to members of federally recognized tribes. State-recognized tribes which are currently being served by HUD would not be terminated as a result of this section.

(b) sets forth the definitions of key terms used in this section.

(c) provides that any family currently being served will continue to be eligible for services even if they are members of a state-recognized tribe.

Section 6. (a) provides that the prevailing wage rate shall not apply to an Indian housing project with 40 units or less.

(b) provides that existing contracts, contracts signed on the date of enactment or invitations for bids issued before the date of enactment shall not be affected by this section.

Section 7. This section makes technical changes to the 1937 Housing Act. Section 6(h) of the 1937 Act requires that an IHA first demonstrate that it is unable to acquire or rehabilitate an existing unit before it can develop any new units. This section would make 6(h) inapplicable because of the virtual non-existence of private market housing available for acquisition on Indian reservations. This section would not prohibit an IHA from acquiring or rehabilitating existing units if they are available.

Section 8. This Section transfers the existing Housing Improvement Program currently within the Bureau of Indian Affairs to the Department of Housing and Urban Development.

Section 9. Sections 572, 573, 574, 581, and 957 of the Cranston-Gonzalez National Affordable Housing Act (Pub. L. No. 101-625, November 28, 1990) are not applicable to Indian housing authorities (IHAs) because the requirements of Section 201(b)(2) of the U.S. Housing Act of 1937 (the 1937 Act) were not met. That section states:

"No provision of title I (or of any other law specifically modifying the public housing program under title 1) that is enacted after the date of the enactment of the Indian Housing Act of 1988 shall apply to public housing developed or operated pursuant to a contract between the Secretary and an Indian housing authority unless the provision explicitly provides for such applicability."

The sections are:

573—(a) changes the definition of "family" to include single persons;

(b) states that amounts not actually received by the family may not be considered as income;

(c)(1) increases adjusted income deductions from $480 to $550;

(2) permits a medical expense deduction for non-elderly families;

(3) excludes from income calculations 10 percent of the earned income of a family and permits a deduction of the lesser of the amount of child support or maintenance or $550 for each individual for which the payor provides support.

Please note that Section 573 (b) and (c) provisions are effective only if approved in appropriations acts.

574—States that the temporary absence of a child from the family who is placed in foster care shall not affect the determination of family composition or family size under the 1937 Act.

581—Numerous amendments to the Public Housing Drug Elimination Act of 1988.

957—Subject to approval in appropriations acts, any assisted housing participant who was unemployed and subsequently becomes employed shall have any rent increase that results from such employment capped at 10 percent per year for three years.

Each section cited above is already law for the public housing program.

Section 10. This section authorized technical assistance grants to be made to Indian tribes. Tribes may then purchase technical assistance from the provider of choice.●

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 112—AUTHORIZING THE PRINTING OF THOMAS JEFFERSON'S MANUAL OF PARLIAMENTARY PRACTICE

Mr. FORD submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

S. CON. RES. 112

Whereas parliamentary bodies require written rules of order for their proceedings to be conducted fairly and efficiently;

Whereas the Senate's first code of rules provided that "every question of order shall be decided by the presiding officer, without debate";

Whereas Thomas Jefferson, serving as the Senate's second president from 1797 to 1801, prepared for his own guidance a manual of legislative practice that included, under 53 topical headings, precedents from major authorities on parliamentary conduct;

Whereas "Jefferson's Manual" set the framework for the evolution of the Senate's rules and procedures, served to inspire respect for parliamentary law in the new Nation, and stands as one of Jefferson's most enduring intellectual ventures;

Whereas "Jefferson's Manual" was first printed for the use of the Senate in 1801 and was subsequently published by the Senate on a regular basis from 1828 to 1975;

Whereas the House of Representatives in 1837 provided by rule, which still exists, that the provisions of "Jefferson's Manual" should "govern the House in all cases to which they are applicable and in which they are not inconsistent with the standing rules and orders of the House"; and

Whereas April 13, 1993, marks the 250th anniversary of the birth of Thomas Jefferson and it is fitting on this occasion to honor Jefferson and the continued development of parliamentary law: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there shall be printed as a Senate document, the book entitled "A Manual of Parliamentary Practice for the Use of the Senate of the United States" by Thomas Jefferson (with the editorial assistance of the Senate Historical Office under the supervision of the Secretary of the Senate).

SEC. 2. Such document shall include illustrations, and shall be in such style, form, manner, and binding as directed by the Joint Committee on Printing after consultation with the Secretary of the Senate.

SEC. 3. In addition to the usual number of copies, there shall be printed with suitable binding 10,000 copies for the use of the Senate and House of Representatives, to be allocated as determined jointly by the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives.

SENATE RESOLUTION 289—RELATING TO "RIGHTEOUS GENTILES" OF THE HOLOCAUST OF WORLD WAR II

Mr. D'AMATO (for himself, Mr. DECONCINI, and Mr. DURENBERGER) submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

S. RES. 289

Whereas Nazi Germany, from its birth, as a matter of policy, sought the apprehension, persecution, and death of all of Europe's Jews;

Whereas Nazi Germany brutally invaded and occupied much of Europe and engaged in the systematic destruction of Europe's Jewish population through an expansive network of concentration camps;

Whereas thousands of people risked their lives, many having been executed, only because they provided protection to innocent Jews;

Whereas over 500,000 Jews throughout Europe were rescued during the Second World War by these people, now known as "Righteous Gentiles": Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate—

(1) recognizes and honors the actions of those heroic men and women who risked their lives to protect their fellow man in so dangerous a time as the Holocaust of the Second World War;

(2) calls upon the President to issue a proclamation honoring these heroes for their actions in saving so many thousands of Jews in Europe during the Holocaust.

• Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today on the eve of the official day of the Holocaust commemoration, "Yom Hashoa," to submit a resolution honoring a group of men and women who have not received the attention they should have. All were heroes who fought to save the innocent from the greatest evil man has ever faced. Known by some as "Righteous Gentiles," these selfless people gave sanctuary and protection to thousands of Jews fleeing the Nazis as they ravaged Europe collecting Jews for the final solution.

The methods by which they saved the lives of Jews varied. Some provided shelter in their own homes, or in convents or churches. Other provided an array of false documents and passports. Still others operated underground movements, transferring Jews on an ongoing basis to safe haven outside of the reach of the Nazis. All over Europe, civilian and military alike, people risked death by saving Jews from the gas chambers.

In Denmark, the underground was able to save nearly its entire Jewish community of 8,000. In Hungary, Raoul Wallenberg saved over 100,000 Jews. In France, Capuchin monk Marie-Benoit helped hundreds escape to Switzerland and Spain. In Lithuania, Sister Anna Borkowska helped the Jewish underground by hiding them in her convent and by smuggling arms to them. In Belgium, Abbe Joseph Andre, provided safe houses for the Jewish underground. In Poland, Dr. Jan Zabinski, the head of the Warsaw parks administration hid Jews in the zoo. Italian priests Monsignor Giuseppe Nicolini and Fathers Rufino Niccaci and Aldo Brunacci provided safe passage for hundreds of Jews passing through the Apennine Mountains. The Ukrainian Witold Fomienko, hid scores of Jews in the Lutsik region of Ukraine, despite the overwhelming threat to his life.

These brave, selfless heroes gave more than could have ever been expected of them. Many made the ultimate sacrifice—their lives—to save a people that were targeted for death. Their actions will live on in the memory of those whom they saved and in the history of the 20th century. In the midst of death and destruction, these daring few risked all for their fellow man. As it says in the Talmud, "Who-soever preserves one life is as though he has preserved the entire world." Let us honor those men and women who dared to stand up to the Nazis and say no. I urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring this resolution. •

SENATE RESOLUTION 290—REGARDING THE AGGRESSION AGAINST BOSNIA-HERCEGOVINA AND CONDITIONING UNITED STATES RECOGNITION OF SERBIA

Mr. PRESSLER (for Mr. DOLE, for himself, Mr. PELL, Mr. HELMS, Mr. D'AMATO, Mr. GORE, Mr. GORTON, Mr. PRESSLER, Mr. MCCAIN, Mr. BREAU, Mr. GARN, Mr. SEYMOUR, and Mr. MACK) submitted the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

S. RES. 290

Whereas from February 29–March 1, 1992, the Republic of Bosnia-Herzegovina held a referendum in which 99.7% of the citizens who participated voted for independence from the former Yugoslavia;

Whereas on April 6, 1992, the Republic of Bosnia-Herzegovina was granted diplomatic recognition by the European Community and on April 7, 1992, was recognized by the United States;

Whereas since April of 1992 the Serb-led Yugoslav Army and Serbian militants have been engaged in brutal military action against the government and people of the Republic of Bosnia-Herzegovina resulting in the death of innocent civilians, the displacement of tens of thousands of persons, and the destruction of homes, schools, mosques, synagogues and churches;

Whereas the attack on Bosnia-Herzegovina follows aggression against the newly independent Republic of Croatia which resulted in the death of more than 10,000 people, the displacement of more than 700,000 persons, and the occupation of a significant portion of Croatia's territory;

Whereas the attacks on Bosnia-Herzegovina and Croatia by the Yugoslav Army and Serb militants constitute an attempt by the Government of the Republic of Serbia to alter borders by the use of force;

Whereas according to an official with the United Nations High Commissioner on Refugees, Serbian-led forces are delaying, diverting, and stealing humanitarian relief supplies donated to Bosnia-Herzegovina by the United States and other countries;

Whereas the Serbian government has maintained a brutal and repressive regime of martial law in Kosova and deprived the two million Albanians of Kosova of their political and human rights, including their right to self-determination;

Whereas Serbia's repressive policies in Kosova and the aggression of the Serb-led Yugoslav Army in Bosnia-Herzegovina and Croatia constitute serious violations of the Helsinki Accords and the Helsinki Final Act;

Whereas the United States, the European Community and the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe have condemned the aggression of the Serbian-led Yugoslav Army and Serbian irregulars, as well as the martial law regime in Kosova;

Whereas, on April 23, 1992, 25,000 Serbian citizens in Belgrade participated in an antiwar protest;

Whereas, extensive international diplomatic efforts, and the deployment of United Nations monitors and peacekeeping forces, have failed to achieve the withdrawal of Serbian-led forces and the restoration of peace in the Republics of Bosnia-Herzegovina and Croatia;

Whereas, the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia has ceased to exist: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That—

(1) The United States should hold accountable the Government of Serbia for the attacks on and occupation of the Republics of Bosnia-Herzegovina and Croatia, and for the extensive and systematic abuse of human rights in Kosova.

(2) The United States should withhold diplomatic recognition of Serbia and its ally Montenegro, who proclaimed themselves the "Federal Republic of Yugoslavia" on April 28, 1992, until Serbia ceases its aggression against the independent states of Bosnia-Herzegovina and Croatia; withdraws its forces from Bosnia-Herzegovina and Croatia; and halts its brutal repression of the Albanian people in Kosova and denial of the right to self-determination.

(3) The United States should actively encourage its allies to follow the same course.

PARRY CENTER FOR CHILDREN DESERVES RECOGNITION AS A POINT OF LIGHT

● Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I rise today to recommend that the people of the Parry Center for Children in Portland, OR, be awarded a point of light for their long record of outstanding service to Oregon's children. The Parry Center is an example of dedicated people who have made a difference in thousands of lives.

The organization was formed in 1867 to care for children who have no place to go. Then, the center provided for orphaned children reaching the end of the Oregon Trail with wagon trains. This year the Parry Center celebrates 125 years of service with the theme, "125 Years * * * Continuing the Promise."

The center is continuing the promise by caring for society's vulnerable children—those who are severely emotionally disturbed. These children have suffered trauma as a result of such tragedies as abuse, neglect, a dysfunctional family environment, and substance abuse by family members.

The center cares for Oregon children from infancy to 18 years of age in a treatment program developed to successfully return them to productive life in society. Most of the children have gone on to be successful adults, and many return to visit the Parry Center.

More than 500 children and their families are served each year by hundreds of volunteers and a full-time staff of 85. Services like 24-hour residential treatment for critically disturbed children and outpatient therapy for sexually abused children are provided.

Children are the Nation's future and must be provided all the love and support they need to become active, contributing members of society. The Parry Center truly offers this love and support for children who have no place to go. The service of the devoted volunteers and staff of the Parry Center deserves recognition as a point of light.●

ONE OF OUR NATION'S BEST— WAIAKEA HIGH SCHOOL

● Mr. AKAKA. Mr. President, it is with great pride that I rise today to congratulate Waiakea High School on being selected one of our Nation's best schools by Redbook magazine. Waiakea High School, located on the big island of Hawaii, was bestowed this distinction along with 139 public secondary schools throughout our country.

Accolades and awards are not new to Waiakea—it is the norm, having been honored as a blue ribbon secondary school by the U.S. Department of Education in 1989. Waiakea has all the necessary components to spell success in education: a comprehensive athletic program, a proud and active student body, involved parents and community, a challenging curriculum, dedicated and competent faculty, and strong administrative leadership. It is the kind of school that we want our children and grandchildren to attend—it is the epitome of what works in public education.

Waiakea's list of accomplishments is impressive, and no one has to look any further than the campus itself for an indication of their high standards in every regard—it is immaculate. It is an environment conducive to learning and achieving, and it is evidence of the great pride and respect the students, faculty, and administration have for their school and for each other.

I would like to congratulate Mr. Danford Sakai, principal of Waiakea, on this most prestigious honor. Although Mr. Sakai attributes much of his school's success to his outstanding faculty and parents, and is thankful for the support of the Hawaii Department of Education Superintendent Charles Toguchi and District Superintendent Alan Garson, it is Dan Sakai's directorship, foresight, and commitment to excellence that guides Waiakea on the road to success.

Waiakea sets the standard for education. In one of its commendations, it was referred to as the "flagship of the fleet." I can think of no better words to describe Waiakea High School, as Mr. Sakai commands the helm. Congratulations on a job well done.●

DIPLOMATIC RECOGNITION OF SLOVENIA, CROATIA, AND BOSNIA-HERCEGOVINA

● Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I was very pleased to hear earlier this month that the administration had, at long last, decided to recognize the independence of Slovenia, Croatia, and Bosnia-Herzegovina. I am eagerly anticipating the establishment of full diplomatic relations with the three countries, and the first stages of what I trust will be a long and fruitful international association between our respective nations. My delight at the announcement of recognition was mitigated only by my conviction that the measure comes far later than it should have, and by reflection on the months of catastrophic losses in all of these countries that might possibly have been avoided or shortened by earlier action.

I do not mean to imply that I see the U.S. recognition as a cure for the hostilities that continue even as we speak—such a notion is naive and unrealistic. However, I am very hopeful, as

I know we all are, that this recognition and all that it symbolizes will be an important contribution to current efforts to end the fighting in that troubled region, and to help to build a lasting peace.●

SUNSWEEP GROWERS OF AMERICA

● Mr. SEYMOUR. Mr. President, it is with great pleasure that I rise today to bring to your attention the 75th anniversary of Sunsweet Growers, one of California's and America's finest and most successful cooperatives. Sunsweet has made considerable progress since its inception in 1917. Starting as a small cooperative, today it represents over 600 farming families. Sunsweet is the world's largest prune producer and handler with over $200 million in annual sales in over 30 countries worldwide.

Sunsweet Growers' processing facility located in Yuba City, CA, employs more than 400 people who meet the growing demands and needs of both domestic and international markets. Sunsweet's Yuba City prune processing plant is the largest facility of its kind in the world with over 22 acres under its roof. The future indeed looks bright for another 75 years of success for Sunsweet, as more and more consumers become aware of the health benefits of a high fiber diet, and as new market opportunities develop worldwide.

I salute the dedicated members of Sunsweet Growers for their hard work and dedication on behalf of this successful cooperative. It is agricultural cooperatives such as Sunsweet Growers that deserve our recognition and respect for their years of commitment to producing a quality American product.●

HONORING MADAM MARIE ALBERT BLUM, THE HEROINE OF WEZEMBEEK, BELGIUM

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today, on the eve of the official day of the Holocaust Commemoration, "Yom Hashoa," to honor a special lady, Madam Marie Albert Blum.

Madam Blum, operated the "Home of Wezembeek," a former sanatorium, that at any given time, sheltered 50 to 100 Jewish children from the brutality of the Holocaust.

These children were housed, fed, educated, and most of all, hidden from the Gestapo. She went to great lengths to protect these innocent children, risking her life to protect them. Throughout the war, she smuggled children in and out of the home and into the hands of the underground or into other homes throughout Belgium.

If a child had reached the age of 16, he or she would be in danger of being seized by the Gestapo and shipped off to a concentration camp. She made sure that this did not happen. Her efforts in October 1942 proved this.

At that time, 58 boys and girls and 8 adults fleeing the Nazi onslaught were ordered to be deported to Auschwitz from Wezembeek. In this critical time, Madam Blum intervened, steadfastly refusing to allow the Germans to take them. With the help of Queen Elizabeth of Belgium, they were ultimately saved.

In August 1944, there was a final roundup of all of Belgium's Jews. Like the others, the children of Wezembeek were subject to the same call. Madam Blum hurriedly arranged for papers for all of the children and smuggled them out to safety.

Madam Albert Blum, now 78, has continued to watch over her children. She acts as the worldwide coordinator for Wezembeek's survivors of the Holocaust. While keeping a list of the names and addresses of these men and women, she serves as a vital coordinating link to the group's dwindling numbers.

The legacy left by this true heroine is the undying love and care one human being gave to a doomed people. She risked her life to save a people that were chased and hunted down only because they were Jewish. Madam Marie Albert Blum is a symbol of the best of humanity facing the most horrible of times.

Although long overdue, I wish to offer my thanks in behalf of the children of Wezembeek for her care and love. She will never be forgotten.●

TRIBUTE TO CALDWELL COUNTY HIGH SCHOOL

● Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, I rise today to recognize the academic and civic accomplishments of an aspiring group of Caldwell County High School students who proudly represented the Commonwealth of Kentucky during the recent national competition of "We the People . . ." the National Bicentennial program on the Constitution and Bill of Rights in Washington, DC.

In the early years of our Nation's development, Thomas Jefferson stated:

I know no safe depository of the ultimate powers of the society but the people themselves, and if we think them not enlightened enough to exercise their control with a wholesome discretion, the remedy is not to take it from them, but to inform their discretion by education.

As a national civics education program, "We the People . . ." exemplifies the belief that democracy's strength is founded on the knowledge and foresight of its citizens. The program's format teaches the tenets of our Constitution and Bill of Rights through critical analysis of democratic principles, active class discussions on current events, and community projects aimed at improving governmental participation.

Mr. Roy Rogers' Caldwell County High School student government displays the initiative and dedication upon which our Nation's pride is based. Their title as Kentucky's "We the People . . ." representative is only a small part of their accomplishments. During the 1991 fall elections, Mr. Rogers' students devoted their energies to delivering campaign literature on Republican and Democratic party candidates and to urging local citizens to register and vote. Through their tireless efforts, these students contributed to Caldwell County's ranking among Kentucky's top ten in voter turnout.

From their experiences in the "We the People . . ." program, this group of young Kentuckians developed a comprehensive view of the purpose and function of our governmental system which has better prepared them to address the future challenges of our State and country. Mr. President, it is with great pride that I present Kentucky's 1992 delegation to "We the People . . .": Suzanne Arbuthnott, Eddie Asher, Aaron Carner, David Carner, Mark Bumphus, Chris Ladd, Tracy Rogers, Shayne Haile, Jason Wilson, Brian McCormick, Whittni Cayce, Curtis Trimble, and Michael Johnson; Mr. Roy Rogers, instructor; Mr. Joe Gooch and Mr. Duane Bolin, congressional district coordinators; and Ms. Tami Dowler, State coordinator.●

TRIBUTE HONORING BRIG. GEN. JOHN O. MCFALLS III

● Mr. MCCAIN. Mr. President, on behalf of all Members of the U.S. Senate, it is my great pleasure to recognize Brig. Gen. John O. McFalls III, the deputy director of the Air Force's legislative liaison organization, for his distinguished service to the Senate, the Armed Services Committee, the U.S. Air Force, and to our Nation. For the past 2 years, the Senate has enjoyed the outstanding leadership and commitment to service demonstrated by General McFalls. During this period, the Air Force has done an outstanding job of providing complete and accurate information for use in congressional oversight of Air Force programs and has insured highly responsive replies to the many inquiries that Members of the Senate have forwarded on behalf of our constituents. In addition, General McFalls has enhanced the Air Force's understanding of congressional concerns regarding issues involving the Air Force. It has been the Senate's good fortune to have had a second generation of service from the McFalls family. General McFalls' father, Col. John O. McFalls, Jr., USAF retired, served with distinction as chief of the Air Force's Senate Liaison Office from 1967 to 1970. General McFalls is an inspiration to all who know him. My colleagues and I join in wishing General McFalls continued success in his new assignment as director of operations and plans for the Air Training Command.●

IN SUPPORT OF A UNITED STATES DENIAL OF DIPLOMATIC RECOGNITION OF THE NEW YUGOSLAVIA

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today as an original cosponsor of a resolution calling for the denial of United States diplomatic recognition to the new Yugoslavia, until certain steps are taken. Before we recognize the new entity, Serbia must end its war against its neighbors Croatia, Bosnia, and Slovenia and it must let Kosova go.

Serbia's declaration of April 28, 1992, proclaiming the new Yugoslavia is nothing more than the replacement of one Serbian terrorist regime with another. Its war of expansion and terror has resulted in the death of over 10,000 people. Serbia's treatment of Kosova's 2 million Albanians is not much better and serves as a flagrant example of tyranny at its worst.

Kosova's Albanians, still deprived of their independence, have been subjected to arbitrary shootings, summary arrests and administrative detention without charge, forced job loss, and numerous other obscene violations of their human rights. The Albanians of Yugoslavia certainly deserve better.

The Croatians and Bosnians also deserve better. Long subjugated by the Serbian junta, these brave people have fought and won the right to live their lives free of Serbian control. They should now be allowed to build their own nations. Unfortunately, Serbia continues to refuse to recognize this fact.

The only solution for peace in the Balkans is for Serbia to pull back its forces and end its war of annihilation once and for all. Serbia must stop its aggression against Croatia, Bosnia, and Slovenia, and allow Kosova to go free. Only then should we consider recognizing the new Yugoslavia.

I commend my colleague, Senator DOLE, for offering this important resolution and I encourage my colleagues to join us in cosponsoring it.●

WOMEN IN NEW MEXICO HISTORY

● Mr. DOMENICI. In my home State, we have always been very proud of our special cultural heritage, which is a potpourri of diverse races, religions, and cultures living together. Because of our uniqueness, we have always made a special effort to recognize the contributions that each group has made to our State, and I would like to take just a moment to bring to your attention a very special, and often overlooked, component of New Mexico's history—New Mexico's women.

While the women of New Mexico have a long and noteworthy list of accomplishments, uncovering their history has been a daunting task. However, thanks to the efforts of Sharon Niederman, Joan Jensen, Suzan Campbell, and numerous researchers, historians, and other scholars, we are beginning to devote some attention to the important contribution of women in New Mexico.

Frankly, this attention is well-deserved and long overdue. New Mexico's women have played a key role in shaping our State, long before New Mexico achieved statehood in 1912. Many of these women are not of any single race, culture, or ethnic group; instead, their common bond is their diversity and innovation: Women like Florence Hawley Ellis, an anthropologist and educator; Myrtle Attaway Farquhar, educator and humanitarian; Nina Otero-Warren, a politician and suffragist; and Maria Beatrice Shattuck, humanitarian activist.

Susan Loubet has written an excellent article in the Albuquerque Woman magazine that I think provides an engrossing look at women's lives and contributions, and what is being done to document and preserve that history. Clearly, this is a valuable part of our State's cultural, social, and intellectual development, and I am pleased that steps are being taken to uncover and document this fascinating and important aspect of New Mexico's history.

I ask that this article, "Documenting Our Lives," be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

[From Albuquerque Woman, Mar./Apr., 1992]

DOCUMENTING OUR LIVES

(By Susan Loubet)

New Mexico is rich in treasures of women's history. Sharon Niederman discovered this when she began looking at the lives of early women settlers of the West through their letters, published in her book, A Quilt of Words. New Mexico State University Professor Joan Jensen has long been studying everyday lives of women lives of women homesteaders and ranchers. In 1986, she and Darlis Miller collaborated on the New Mexico Women Book. The proceeds from its sales funded the Women's History Archives at New Mexico State University in Las Cruces. These archives include the papers of ranchers and local organizations, and the oral histories of tenant farmers and field workers.

Others have also begun to collect the almost forgotten stories of women who have gone before us, realizing how much we owe them, how much they have shaped the possibilities of life for us in New Mexico.

Suzan Campbell is beginning an ambitious and exciting project which will bring the lives of women artists in New Mexico to scholars, art lovers, and students. She is using a computer, which will be linked to museums and libraries, because she believes that archives should be accessible to everyone. She plans to design a data base which will include a visual display of the work of the women artists she has researched. A lead grant to start the project was partially funded by the New Mexico Women's Foundation.

Campbell, an art historian and art curator and a Santa Fe native, found when she was researching women artists who were part of the Taos art colony, that the work of women who were once fairly well known has slipped into obscurity. She cites for instance Blanche Grant, who was not a member of the famous Taos Society of Artists, but frequently joined its male members on painting trips. In an article in a recent issue of Antiques & Fine Art, Campbell recalls, "When she died, her funeral was held in Taos's Presbyterian Church whose walls she had covered with murals in 1921 Despite her accomplishments, Grant's reputation soon faded." Campbell declares that Mabel Dodge Luhan, well-known benefactor and catalyst of Taos intellectual and creative life, would be "amazed if she knew how little known most of these artists' works are today." Campbell speculates that because early women artists combined art careers with lives as housewives, hostesses, and art patrons, they were not considered as serious about their art as were the men of the colony. She decided to create the Archives of New Mexico Women Artists, in which we will find information about women's lives as well as examples of their art. She is also interested in exploring the causes of obscurity of New Mexico women artists and how they have dealt with career issues, as well as how public perceptions of their lives and art have changed. Currently under consideration is where the archives will be housed, but she anticipates that they will be valuable not only to New Mexicans but also to others outside the state.

A large part of the interest and fun of tracking down early women seems to lie in the difficulty of the hunt. New Mexico Court of Appeals Justice and former University of New Mexico Law School Professor Pamela Minzner was struck by how hard it is to find details on women's, as opposed to men's, lives, when she began to try to determine who was the first woman admitted to the bar in New Mexico. In 1989 while preparing a speech, she found a book which referred to women lawyers in America as "The Invisible Bar." Minzner remarks, "I never heard that, that women had been around for three hundred years as lawyers. This was when there was a more informal system for becoming a lawyer. After men started going to school to become lawyers, women dropped out of the picture." In the case of New Mexico, the book had the wrong information. Minzner went to the Supreme Court's roll of attorneys and in that roll was a scrap of paper with five or six names of women admitted to practice in New Mexico. For Minzner, trying to figure out who was the first led to an appreciation of just how many women have preceded us. "There were just so many. Those of us coming along in the later '60s thought of ourselves as not owing much to anybody. We thought of ourselves as pioneers to some extent. I didn't have a sense of those generations before us who had made it possible for us to go into law in the late '60s.

Minzner's research sparked interest in others, particularly Santa Fe lawyer Marcia Wilson, who has now taken up the search, compiling a list of all the women admitted to the bar in New Mexico, along with the details of their lives. It seems that hats were an important consideration in the early days of women in court. One early lawyer got money from her uncle to buy a hat for the swearing-in ceremony. Women wore hats in public; men lawyers took off their hats in court—hence the dilemma.

For Jan Dodson Barnhart, associate director of UNM's Center for Southwest Research, the spark for her interest in women's history was a 1976 exhibit, "Women in New Mexico," put together by the American Association of University Women, now archive #310 in the Center's collection. She and archivist Kathleen Ferris are constantly sending out the call for women's material. They store some of the records of women's organizations such as the League of Women Voters and the National Women's Political Caucus of New Mexico as well as papers of women writers and teachers. The ninety-one scrap books of historian Erna Fergusson are a popular resource as are the Doris Duke-funded collection of 982 American Indian oral history tapes recorded between 1967 and 1972. Many women are featured in the tapes, recounting the details of their daily lives. Some of the records are unusual, but will be important to historians; the records of Casa Angelica, for instance, and the early papers of the Santa Fe Maternal and Child Health Center which track the beginning of the birth control movement in New Mexico. Barnhart and Ferris are looking for women's diaries and the papers of everyday women. "Women tend to be more descriptive and sensitive and more careful about preserving things. The more we get out there, the more there is. Sometimes it takes ten years to get a collection." In fact, it was often women who were the records managers.

"The records of the New Mexico Legal Secretaries always come in perfect order." Ferris especially likes working with the papers in New Mexico because there were "so many personal connections between people. Everybody knew everybody else. Networking has been going on for years here." Barnhart is writing a book on women in New Mexico. She realized that there was a void in our information and that in fact some of the information is wrong. She worries about the historians of the future because there are few records anymore. People don't write letters any more; they do everything by phone.

Other women, realizing that our history is slipping away, have been collecting specialized archives. Marlon Bell has been clipping UNM's Lobo to recover women's history at UNM, especially for this month's celebration of 50 years of the Women's Center at UNM. If you've been inspired to go through your papers looking at them with an eye to future generations, or, if you would like to start an oral history project of your own, you can learn the trade at workshops conducted by the Southwest Oral History Association at UNM.

Joan Jensen explains, "Some other states with more resources and more wealthy people of public achievement have huge archival projects." If we look at the archival work being done in New Mexico, we find a focus on strong women—ranchers, farmers, artists, and others—who were drawn here by the light, the opportunities, and the freedom. With the work that's being done, we'll be able to have an idea of just what kind of women they were. ●

HONORING SOLOMON SCHECHTER DAY SCHOOL

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to honor Solomon Schechter Day School on the occasion of their 10th anniversary. Located in Suffolk County, the school is noted for its constant pursuit of excellence in all aspects of its educational program. With a current enrollment of over 160 children drawn from 25 school districts, the school takes pride in its ongoing growth, as the school endeavors to reach out and provide for the educational needs of Jewish children throughout the region.

Let me tell you a little about the school. Its program combines the best of general studies and integrates it with courses in the language and heritage of the Jewish people. Class size is small, and students are encouraged to think critically, imaginatively, and creatively. Students are also encouraged to be in tune with their respective communities and the world at large.

Ethics of the Fathers has taught us that there is no finer crown than that of a good name. Solomon Schechter Day School has strived to earn a good name. I believe that they have succeeded thus far and suspect that they will continue to keep that good name as they enter their second decade.

As the Solomon Schechter Day School completes its 10 year of operation, and kicks off its year-long anniversary celebration I wish them continued success in the future.●

PETER BAGLIO

● Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I rise today to congratulate and pay honor to Mr. Peter Baglio, the Director of the VA Medical Center, East Orange, NJ. After devoting more than 40 years of his life to serving veterans, health care needs, Mr. Baglio has announced that he will retire in May.

From the time Peter Baglio joined the U.S. Army in 1941, he never wavered in his service to his country, America's veterans and the surrounding communities.

Mr. Baglio was educated at Brooklyn College, the City College of New York, and the Johns Hopkins University. He began his long and distinguished career with the VA health care system in 1946 as an assistant manager trainee. From 1952 through 1960 he worked at the VA hospitals in Baltimore, MD, and Brooklyn, NY, as an assistant manager. In 1960, he was promoted to Assistant Director of the VA Hospital at Lyons, NJ.

Through the years, Peter Baglio continued his distinguished career at Maimonides Hospital in Brooklyn, NY, as associate administrator, later, he became vice president for planning. In 1980, Peter Baglio assumed the position of Director of the VA Medical Center at East Orange, NJ, the position from which he will retire this month.

The State and the people of New Jersey have been well served by the dedication and devotion he has shown toward providing not only the best health care possible but also true friendship and caring.

In the complex health care system of the VA it takes more than good management and administrative skills to succeed. It takes understanding and kindness. Peter Baglio has that rare ability to provide just the right amount of all of these and then some.

So it is with great pride, Mr. President, that I congratulate Mr. Peter

Baglio on his retirement, thank him and wish him well on behalf of all people from my home State of New Jersey for the illustrious years of care he has provided to us.●

MONTAUK POINT LIGHTHOUSE

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to recognize a historic landmark in my home State of New York. Two hundred years ago, by an act of Congress, President George Washington authorized the construction of a lighthouse on the tip of Long Island at Montauk Point.

On November 5, 1797, Jacob Hand lit the wicks of 13 whale oil lamps and a light shone from the Montauk Point Lighthouse for the first time. Since its first day of operation, the lighthouse at Montauk Point has undergone many changes. In 1987, the bright light on Montauk Point was replaced with a fully automated lighting apparatus. This modernization eliminated the need for a keeper altogether. However, in an effort to provide continued maintenance and preservation of the Montauk Point Lighthouse, the Coast Guard leased the lighthouse to the Montauk Historical Society. This summer will make the third year the Historical Society has opened Long Island's most famous landmark to the public.

Visitors to the lighthouse museum have enjoyed the spectacular view from the top of Turtle Hill, the museum exhibits and the climb up the tower. The highlight of the exhibits is the Fresnel lens that provided the beacon for the Montauk Point Lighthouse from 1904 until 1987. It is awe-inspiring to admire this work of art.

Mr. President, anyone who has ever navigated a vessel through the waters of Montauk knows of the potential peril that awaits them. The crushing surf is enough to destroy the most seaworthy of ships. However, through the years, it has been this courageous lighthouse, standing guard on the pristine point of Montauk, which guides sea-goers from a treacherous fate.

Mr. President, I would just like to take this opportunity to memorialize the lighthouse off the point of Montauk, and although its 200th year of existence is not until 1995, recognize its contributions throughout the years.●

WES BIRDSALL OF OSAGE, IA

● Mr. HARKIN. Mr. President, this week the city of Osage, IA, will lose its municipal utility general manager. Normally, I would not take the Senate's time to report the retirement of a municipal utility official.

But Wes Birdsall is not a typical utility general manager. Wes Birdsall, over the last 20 years, has established what has become a national model for the benefits of energy efficiency in the utility business. He has firmly established that one small community can substantially reduce energy bills, cut pollution, and reduce our dependence on imported energy by cutting down the amount of energy required to heat, cool and light our homes, and power our industry.

In 1974, soon after the first Arab oil embargo, Wes Birdsall decided that cutting down energy consumption was the best approach to avoid substantial costs to add more generating capacity. But he needed the cooperation of his customers. So he went door to door, extolling the virtues of conservation and energy efficiency. It was not easy in the beginning. Some people were skeptical of this utility manager who was encouraging customers to buy less of his product. But Wes Birdsall persevered, and most of the community became enthusiastic supporters of energy conservation, competing with each other to see who would have the lowest energy consumption.

Wes Birdsall and his staff launched an impressive, long-term program to cut energy consumption. He installed insulation blankets on home water heaters. He installed high-efficiency light bulbs, bought a tree planting machine to assist customers in planting shade trees to cut down air conditioning loads, and reduced energy rates for superinsulated homes. He bought an infrared scanner to locate heat losses in buildings and homes.

Wes Birdsall even succeeded in getting 96 percent of Osage's homeowners with central air conditioning to agree to have their compressors hooked up to central utility control. The municipal utility has the right to shut off compressors for up to 7.5 minutes per hour during the hot summer afternoons. By selectively shutting off compressors during the peak load periods, the utility avoids the need for building new power plants just to handle the peak demand.

Wes Birdsall estimates that he has invested about $250,000 in these energy efficiency projects over the years.

By delaying the need to build new power generation capacity, the utility has avoided large costs over the last 18 years. Wes Birdsall has passed these savings on to the citizens of Osage. Since 1983, Osage electrical rates have been reduced 5 times, for a total reduction of 19 percent. The residential electrical rate is 5 cents per kilowatt hour, compared to 13.5 cents per kilowatt hour 100 miles down the road in Cedar Rapids. The citizens of Osage save an estimated $1.2 million every year in their utility bills, or a savings of $300 per person. This is a five times return on the $250,000 energy efficiency investment every year.

Mr. President, the story of Osage, IA, can be repeated in every city in America. We can all learn from Wes Birdsall and the Osage experience.

We can all save energy, reduce our imported energy, cut acid rain and carbon dioxide, the main global warming greenhouse gas, while cutting down our utility bills. This is a typical win-win situation.

Our Nation needs more Wes Birdsalls. We need more leaders who have the vision to recognize the opportunities of energy efficiency investments, and the courage to educate our citizens and make the necessary investments in order to reap the benefits. Unfortunately, the present occupant of the White House does not have the vision of a Wes Birdsall.

I wish Wes Birdsall the very best in his retirement.

But somehow I do not think he will really retire from his efforts to share the Osage experience with cities around the Nation and the world. He has already left a legacy of improved quality of life in Iowa. I trust that he will have the opportunity in retirement to expand that legacy.●

BUDGET SCOREKEEPING REPORT

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I hereby submit to the Senate the budget scorekeeping report prepared by the Congressional Budget Office under section 308(b) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, as amended. This report serves as the scorekeeping report for the purposes of section 605(b) and section 311 of the Budget Act.

This report shows that current level spending exceeds the budget resolution by $6.5 billion in budget authority and by $6.1 billion in outlays. Current level is $2.9 billion above the revenue floor in 1992 and $0.7 billion below the revenue floor over the 5 years, 1992-96.

The current estimate of the deficit for purposes of calculating the maximum deficit amount is $354.4 billion, $3.2 billion above the maximum deficit amount for 1992 of $351.2 billion.

The report follows:

U.S. CONGRESS,
CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET OFFICE,
Washington, DC, April 28, 1992.

Hon. JIM SASSER,
Chairman, Committee on the Budget,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: The attached report shows the effects of Congressional action on the budget for fiscal year 1992 and is current through April 10, 1992. The estimates of budget authority, outlays, and revenues are consistent with the technical and economic assumptions of the Concurrent Resolution on the Budget (H. Con. Res. 121). This report is submitted under Section 308(b) and in aid of Section 311 of the Congressional Budget Act, as amended, and meets the requirements for Senate scorekeeping of Section 5 of S. Con. Res. 32, the 1986 First Concurrent Resolution on the Budget.

Since my last report, dated April 7, 1992, there has been no action that affects the current level of budget authority, outlays or revenues.

Sincerely,

JAMES L. BLUM,
(For Robert D. Reischauer).

MCDONNELL-DOUGLAS BAILOUT

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I suppose it was inevitable that the Army would be sucked into the McDonnell-Douglas bailout. Considering Air Force and Navy involvement, it seems only fair. Having overcharged the Government $50 million for the Apache, McDonnell's helicopter subsidiary was allowed by the Army to pay restitution of less than 5 cents on the dollar. Best of all, the Army settled unbeknownst to the Defense Contract Audit Agency [DCAA], which was preparing litigation related to the improper charges. At this point, even the see-and-hear-no-evil monkeys could discern a pattern emerging.

I ask that the full text of the Los Angeles Times article: "Army Probing Its Settlement of McDonnell Douglas Audit," be printed in the RECORD immediately after my remarks.

Secretary Cheney has repeatedly been quoted as saying the national security is not a jobs program. Apparently, for every rule, there is an exception.

The article follows:

ARMY PROBING ITS SETTLEMENT OF MCDONNELL DOUGLAS AUDIT

(By Ralph Vertabedian)

Army investigators have launched a criminal probe into the Army's own decision to settle $50.3 million in alleged overcharges by McDonnell Douglas on the AH-64 Apache helicopter for less than five cents on the dollar, government officials said Wednesday.

The Army's Criminal Investigative Division in St. Louis started the probe in recent days, according to key officials who asked not to be identified. A spokesman at the division's Washington headquarters declined comment Wednesday.

In late 1990, the Army Aviation Systems Command in St. Louis quietly agreed to settle an audit conducted by the Defense Contract Audit Agency, which found McDonnell's helicopter subsidiary in Mesa, Ariz., had overcharged the Army on production of the Apache helicopter by $50.3 million. The matter was settled for $2.4 million.

Audits of "defective pricing" are not unusual: typically, they are settled for less than the full amount of the alleged overcharging. But government procurement experts said the McDonnell settlement, amounting to just 5% of the alleged total overcharges, is highly unusual.

In addition, the settlement never was reported to audit agency officials, who continued to work on the audit in preparation for litigation. Only last month, senior audit agency leaders were astounded during a meeting in St. Louis to learn that the case had been settled more than a year earlier.

At least two House committees are looking into the audit settlement to determine whether it was part of a covert Pentagon plan to bail out McDonnell, which was suffering significant cash flow problems in late 1990 and early 1991.

The Pentagon's inspector general concluded in a confidential report earlier this year that senior procurement officials in the Air Force had devised a bailout plan for McDonnell and that at least some actions were taken to carry out the plan.

Last week, the inspector general issued a report that found the Air Force had relieved McDonnell of substantial financial risk in December, 1990, when it prematurely declared the firm's first C-17 cargo plane completed when, in fact, it was far from complete. The action was part of an overall effort to improve the firm's cash flow, the report asserted.

It remains unclear who is the subject of the Army investigation in the Apache audit case. Probes handled by the Army's Criminal Investigative Division are initiated on a criminal basis, but eventually may become civil or administrative cases, one official said.

In a statement earlier this month, Army officials said they were reviewing the settlement to determine whether it was "reasonable" and "final." If not, the Army "is prepared to pursue all available remedies," according to the statement.

The Army statement appears to be suggesting that the settlement did not go through the proper review and approval process within the Army, congressional experts said.

The Army official who settled the McDonnell overcharging claims was a low-level contracting officer who worked at the Mesa helicopter plant and has since retired, according to sources familiar with the case. But Army investigators reportedly are looking into whether a senior Army officer in Washington ordered the Mesa official to make the settlement.

The Army investigators are also said to be trying to determine who may have leaked the existence of the settlement to The Times.

APPOINTMENT BY THE PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President pro tempore be authorized to appoint a committee of Senators to join with a like committee on the part of the House of Representatives to escort the President of the Federal Republic of Germany into the House Chamber for the joint meeting to be held at 11 a.m. on Thursday, April 30, 1992.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AGGRESSION AGAINST BOSNIA-HERCEGOVINA AND CONDITIONING U.S. RECOGNITION OF SERBIA

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I send a resolution to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 290) regarding the aggression against Bosnia-Herzegovina and conditioning U.S. recognition of Serbia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 290) was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.
The resolution, with its preamble, is as follows:

S. RES. 290

Whereas from February 29–March 1, 1992, the Republic of Bosnia-Herzegovina held a referendum in which 99.7 percent of the citizens who participated voted for independence from the former Yugoslavia;

Whereas, on April 6, 1992, the Republic of Bosnia-Herzegovina was granted diplomatic recognition by the European Community and on April 7, 1992, was recognized by the United States;

Whereas, since April of 1992 the Serb-led Yugoslav Army and Serbian militants have been engaged in brutal military action against the government and people of the Republic of Bosnia-Herzegovina resulting in the death of innocent civilians, the displacement of tens of thousands of persons, and the destruction of homes, schools, mosques, synagogues and churches;

Whereas, the attack on Bosnia-Herzegovina follows aggression against the newly independent Republic of Croatia which resulted in the death of more than 10,000 people, the displacement of more than 700,000 persons, and the occupation of a significant portion of Croatia's territory;

Whereas, the attacks on Bosnia-Herzegovina and Croatia by the Yugoslav Army and Serb militants constitute an attempt by the Government of the Republic of Serbia to alter borders by the use of force;

Whereas, according to an official with the United Nations High Commissioner on Refugees, Serbian-led forces are delaying, diverting, and stealing humanitarian relief supplies donated to Bosnia-Herzegovina by the United States and other countries;

Whereas, the Serbian government has maintained a brutal and repressive regime of martial law in Kosova and deprived the two million Albanians of Kosova of their political and human rights, including their right to self-determination;

Whereas, Serbia's repressive policies in Kosova and the aggression of the Serb-led Yugoslav Army in Bosnia-Herzegovina and Croatia constitute serious violations of the Helsinki Accords and the Helsinki Final Act;

Whereas, the United States, the European Community and the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe have condemned the aggression of the Serbian-led Yugoslav Army and Serbian irregulars, as well as the martial law regime in Kosova;

Whereas, on April 23, 1992, 25,000 Serbian citizens in Belgrade participated in an anti-war protest;

Whereas, extensive international diplomatic efforts, and the deployment of United Nations monitors and peacekeeping forces, have failed to achieve the withdrawal of Serbian-led forces and the restoration of peace in the Republics of Bosnia-Herzegovina and Croatia;

Whereas, the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia has ceased to exist: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That—

(1) The United States should hold accountable the Government of Serbia for the attacks on and occupation of the Republics of Bosnia-Herzegovina and Croatia, and for the extensive and systematic abuse of human rights in Kosova.

(2) The United States should withhold diplomatic recognition of Serbia and its ally Montenegro, who proclaimed themselves the "Federal Republic of Yugoslavia" on April 28, 1992, until Serbia ceases its aggression against the independent states of Bosnia-Herzegovina and Croatia; withdraws its forces from Bosnia-Herzegovina and Croatia; and halts its brutal repression of the Albanian people in Kosova and denial of the right of self-determination.

(3) The United States should actively encourage its allies to follow the same course.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. PELL. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

NATIONAL CUSTOMER SERVICE WEEK

Mr. PRESSLER. I ask unanimous consent that the Judiciary Committee be discharged from further consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 166, National Customer Service Week, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (S.J. Res. 166) designating the week of October 4 through 10, 1992, as "National Customer Service Week."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution is before the Senate and open to amendment. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 166) and its preamble are as follows:

S.J. RES. 166

Whereas recognizing the value and importance of the customer drives the quality of customer service;

Whereas the high cost of attracting new customers today further emphasizes the need to keep existing customers through effective service;

Whereas when customer service is recognized as contributing to the profit of a company, the professional status of customer service continues to increase;

Whereas excellent customer service distinguishes successful companies that understand the importance and influence a customer has on success; and

Whereas excellent customer service contributes to the growth and success of every company: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week of October 4 through 10, 1992, is designated as "National Customer Service Week", and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling on the people of the United States to observe the week with appropriate programs, ceremonies, and activities.

Mr. PRESSLER. I move to reconsider the vote.

Mr. PELL. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

ORDERS FOR TOMORROW

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Wednesday, April 29, 1992

The House met at 2 p.m.
The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray using the words of St. Francis of Assisi:

"Lord, make us instruments of your peace. Where there is hatred, let us sow love; where there is injury, pardon; where there is discord, union; where there is doubt, faith; where there is despair, hope; where there is darkness, light; where there is sadness, joy.

"Grant that we may not so much seek to be consoled as to console; to be understood, as to understand; to be loved as to love.

"For it is in giving that we receive; it is in pardoning that we are pardoned; and it is in dying that we are born to eternal life." Amen.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 2569. An act to amend title 10, United States Code, to make the Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff; to provide joint duty credit for certain service; and to provide for the temporary continuation of the current Deputy National Security Advisor in a flag officer grade in the Navy.

REMOVAL OF NAME OF MEMBER AS COSPONSOR OF H.R. 4750

Mrs. COLLINS of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have my name removed as a cosponsor of H.R. 4750. My name was inadvertently added to this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

NEW HOUSE ETHICS MANUAL AND HIGHLIGHTS OF HOUSE ETHICS RULES

(Mr. STOKES asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, I am pleased to announce publication of two important committee documents.

The first is the "Ethics Manual for Members, Officers, and Employees of the House of Representatives."

Every effort has been made to make the "Ethics Manual" as useful a document as possible. It incorporates not only the significant rule and law changes that have occurred since enactment of the Ethics Reform Act of 1989, but also the results of House—and some Senate—conduct cases concluded over the past 5 years.

Separate chapters in the manual deal with general ethical standards; gifts and travel; outside employment and income; financial disclosure; staff rights and duties; official allowances and franking; casework considerations; campaign funds and practices; and involvement with official and unofficial organizations. Appendices in each chapter contain pertinent advisory opinions and formal committee interpretations. Important rules and statutes are also reprinted at the back of the manual.

The second document has been prepared as a quick reference for Members, officers, and employees. Entitled "Highlights of House Ethics Rules," it is the outline for a comprehensive briefing available from committee staff.

Both of the documents have been prepared by the Office of Advice and Education, created by the Ethics Reform Act of 1989 to emphasize the committee's educational role. Because the law separates the committee's advice function from its investigative work, individuals need not be concerned that they are placing themselves at risk by seeking advice about future conduct. All communications are confidential. Seeking advice from the office is also important because good faith reliance on written committee opinions can protect Members, officers, and employees from sanctions under House rules and Federal law.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend the committee staff for its work on these publications. Committee Counsel Ellen Weintraub was the lead attorney on this project. She put in many hours over the past year to make certain that the manual, which was last published in 1987, would be complete, clear, and easy to use. Linda Shealy's production assistance was also instrumental in assuring that the "Ethics Manual" meets the quality standards that committee and House Members expect.

LET'S CUT THE PORK OUT OF THE BUDGET

(Mr. BALLENGER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BALLENGER. Mr. Speaker, the American public frequently hears of pork projects slipped into large, omnibus bills in the dead of night. Most Members and the public were never aware the pork was in the bill until it becomes law.

Well, now, we have an opportunity to put the Government on a low calorie-low fat diet and reduce its bulging waistline.

The President has sent to Congress two rescission bills, totaling 197 pork projects that will cut $5.7 billion in wasteful spending. Next week, we will consider the rescission package. We will have the opportunity to cast an up or down vote and hold Congress accountable for their spending habits. Do we want or can we afford Federal spending on manure disposal or parking garages or research on the prickly pear?

My answer is no. Join me in taking a positive step to cut pork-barrel spending and save the taxpayers $5.7 billion.

PRESIDENT SHOULD SIGN THE CAMPAIGN FINANCE REFORM BILL

(Mr. MAZZOLI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, I am told the President has threatened to veto the campaign finance reform bill. The bill is a modest bill, but a good bill. It limits overall spending, it limits the role of political action committees in campaigns, it limits bundling and it does away with soft money.

I know that the President will not reconsider his threatened veto because of me, but possibly he will because of the 33 Republican challengers who wrote him last week urging him to sign the bill because it will make, overall, races more competitive. It will make them more competitive not because more money will be able to be spent in campaigns but because less will be. They know something the President may not know, Mr. Speaker, and that is that, unless you eliminate or at least limit political action committees who always give money to the incumbents, you will never make races more competitive.

So, Mr. Speaker, not because of me, or because of others who support the bill, but because of those brave 33, I hope the President reconsiders his veto threat of campaign finance reform.

NATIONAL VOLUNTEER WEEK

(Mr. LAGOMARSINO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to the thousands of individuals who donate endless hours of service as volunteers. This week marks National Volunteer Week, a time in which Americans all across the Nation are celebrating the noble efforts of individuals giving of themselves for the betterment of society.

President Woodrow Wilson once said, "The most powerful force on the Earth is the spontaneous cooperation of a free people." Beginning with the American colonists and continuing onward with subsequent generations of pioneers, our Nation has prospered from the actions of individuals coming together in order to meet the needs of society.

As a veteran of World War II, I can recall the important role volunteers played in helping with vital war efforts 50 years ago.

Today, this legacy continues as people all across this land volunteer their time and talents in areas like literacy, health, humanities, conservation, and the general well-being of our fellow man.

To the volunteers of America: Thank you for your tireless efforts and resolve to make our country a better place for all Americans to live.

MORE JOBS MOVING OVERSEAS— AND CLINTON SUPPORTS FREE TRADE WITH MEXICO

(Mr. TRAFICANT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, more American workers are hitting the bricks. Armco Steel lost $200 million in last year, and in Ashland, KY, they are now throwing 700 more American workers out on the street. The list goes on and on and on.

Mr. Speaker, let me tell my colleagues the following:

In the old days, when you got laid off, you got called back. Not today, folks. When they close the doors today, it's sayonara, goodbye. They're moving overseas.

But what bothers me is Governor Clinton says he supports the free trade agreement with Mexico, and Mr. Speaker, let me tell my colleagues:

We won't have a job left in this country if we try to compete with a country that can hire workers at 30 cents an hour.

What is going on here? Think about it. At least American workers could get their own lifetime 700 number; that is, if they could afford $7 a month to buy a phone that is now made in Singapore.

TEN STEPS THAT PROVE WE ARE READY TO REFORM

(Mr. GILLMOR asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GILLMOR. Mr. Speaker, ever since the House bank scandal erupted, a great number of our colleagues have embraced the mantle of congressional reform. Many Members are finally beginning to understand that voters want to change in the House.

But we need a real measuring stick to find out who the real reformers are, and who is just saying the right words. Here are 10 steps we could take this year that would demonstrate that we are ready for real change in the way Washington works.

First, no more exemptions from major laws for Congress.

Second, reign in committee spending.

Third, professional management in every facet of the House's operations.

Fourth, outlaw passing on our fiscal irresponsibility to the States by eliminating unfunded Federal mandates.

Fifth, save money by letting commemorative legislation be done by a commission, not by Congress.

Sixth, limit bills to a single subject.

Seventh, set the House's schedule 6 months at a time and stick to it, just as we did in the Ohio Legislature.

Eighth, pass term limitations—even with all the expected change this year, they will still be necessary.

Ninth, pass the balanced budget amendment.

Tenth, pass the line-item veto.

Mr. Speaker, there is more we can do. But these are 10 concrete steps we could take to start bringing a sense of discipline and accountability to this body.

THIRTY MILLION NEW JOBS— WHERE, MR. PRESIDENT

(Mr. SARPALIUS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SARPALIUS. Mr. Speaker, I must share with my colleagues an experience I had as I completed a series of townhall meetings throughout my district during the Easter break.

One day I went and spoke to Fannin Junior High, a class of fifth and sixth graders; 95 percent of them were on the school lunch program. They were all from low income families. I spoke to these kids, and afterwards I opened it up for questions, and their No. 1 question, their No. 1 concern which those kids expressed to me, was what we could do to try to help their parents find a job.

Mr. Speaker, I then left that grade school and drove down to the small town of Bowie, TX, where I had about 70 people who showed up in a townhall meeting. Half of them had just lost their jobs the week before; 250 people were working for Hagar slacks, and they closed their plant and moved their plant to Mexico where they can receive 46 cents an hour, no retirement benefits, no health care.

Mr. Speaker, I heard the President give us a speech that he promised us 30 million new jobs, however, Mr. Speaker, I thought he meant jobs in this country.

RIPLEY'S BELIEVE IT OR NOT

(Mr. GOSS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, if I said there is an issue about which 21 politicians consistently agree, some might think I was vying for entry into Ripley's believe it or not. But this is no hoax—every member of the Florida delegation agrees that the answer to this Nation's energy demands cannot be found off Florida's sensitive coastline. The answer rests in conservation and diversification of energy sources—a comprehensive national strategy.

So far we have been successful with our annual requests for drilling moratoria, but it's been an inefficient and uncertain piecemeal approach. Now for the first time in years as the House considers comprehensive energy legislation, we have a shot at buying enough time to truly address our Nation's energy needs in a responsible and farsighted way. Rest assured we in Florida will use every opportunity to make our case, because this is not just a matter of aesthetics or parochialism; this is about wise use of our natural resources and proper management of our economy—but most important this is about focusing on realistic abundant affordable sources of energy for our Nation's future.

WHAT A COUNTRY

(Mr. APPELEGATE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. APPELEGATE. Nine and a half million bucks. That is what the Grand Old Party took in last night at one of their big, gigantic fundraisers. It was too big for even Brinks to haul away.

Mr. Speaker, the Reagan-Bush tax breaks made all of this possible. But now that the gold rush is over, they can turn their attention to balancing the budget in their old-fashioned way: Cutting older Americans' benefits, cutting health benefits, cutting nutrition programs, cutting veterans' medical care, cutting educational loans and grants, and sending more jobs overseas.

Mr. Speaker, I tell you, It's nice to have money, and then you don't have anything to worry about, don't need any Federal assistance.

Nine and a half million bucks in one sitting? What a country.

THE HOUSE BANK SUBPOENAS

(Mr. JAMES asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I rise once again to urge Members to accept the consequences of the House check scandal.

The special counsel investigating this matter has issued subpoenas for all relevant records. We should comply.

The Speaker, and others, have repeatedly claimed that no taxpayer's money was used to cover bad checks at the bank. But when the special counsel asks for the records to find out if that's true—the Speaker breathes defiance.

Once again, this House is claiming that the same rules apply to every citizen—except Congressmen. The Speaker now says the House bank was like some kind of Swiss bank account—beyond the reach of American law.

As I said last October, sunshine, full disclosure, and individual responsibility is the only way to clear the name of this House.

Mr. Speaker, let's not be accused of a coverup; let's honor these subpoenas now and start restoring faith in what is the people's House, not just ours.

VOTE TO REPEAL THE GAG RULE

(Mrs. MORELLA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. MORELLA. Mr. Speaker, we must vote to repeal the gag rule immediately.

The gag rule is an outrageous infringement of our first amendment rights. It will lead to defensive medicine, and it will create a two-tiered health care system. The gag rule will create a class system for women's health by denying poor women full information about their legal reproductive options, while still providing complete information and access to health services for women who can afford private physician care.

The gag rule is patronizing to women, and it must be repealed. I urge my colleagues to vote for H.R. 3090, the family planning amendments, when the bill is considered on the House floor tomorrow.

A PLEA FOR THE FAMILIES OF MURDER VICTIMS

(Mr. BLACKWELL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BLACKWELL. Mr. Speaker, last week, in the city of Philadelphia, a young 15-year-old student was shot dead by some thugs who decided to kill him on the way home while he allegedly had defended his sister a few days before.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues an event that took place in my home city of Philadelphia last Sunday. It was an extremely emotional gathering, held at the Canaan Baptist Church, by a support group that no person on this Earth would ever care to join. Indeed, this candlelight vigil, conducted by the Families of Murder Victims, was a tragic memorial to those who have recently lost their lives in the obscene game of ruthless, cold-blooded violence.

Last year, 468 Philadelphians became victims of homicide, and this horrifying trend shows no sign of decline. The time has come for us to address this pressing issue at the national level, and enact legislation that will take the guns out of the hands of killers, and the cold-blooded murderers off of our city streets.

Mr. Speaker, if Congress fails to address the brutality that has become a part of our everyday lives, I fear the unfortunate fact that the supportive Families of Murder Victims group will continue to swell at an unprecedented level.

One mother, whose 18-year-old son was brutally slain with a 9-millimeter semiautomatic weapon as he returned home from a movie, was left to wonder why anybody has the right to kill our babies. Another distraught parent, Mr. Speaker, reflected on the evening she found her 17-year-old son's body in a pool of blood by stating: "The moment I saw him stretched out on the ground, I knew he was gone." The bottom line is that senseless murders occur across our Nation every day. The Families of Murder Victims group is composed of people from every color and creed. Murder transcends such simple barriers.

REPUBLICAN ADMINISTRATIONS INFINITELY MORE FAIR THAN DEMOCRATS

(Mr. ARMEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ARMEY. Mr. Speaker, in his speeches, Billy Clinton likes to cite some slick CBO figures purporting that between 1977 and 1989, the top 1 percent of Americans accounted for 60 percent of the income gains, and then criticize the Republican administrations in office during this decade for lacking fairness.

But CBO sent me a letter this month with some numbers which might surprise Billy Clinton: Between 1977 and 1980, when his party controlled the White House, the Senate, and the House of Representatives, the top 1 percent accounted for all the income gains, and the bottom 99 percent lost ground, with a result of no net income gain at all.

Numerically speaking, when you divide the top 1 percents gain by the zero net gain, the result is infinity. In other words, judging by CBO's own slippery standards, Republican administrations are infinitely more fair than Democrats. The last time a new south Governor running as a Washington outsider was elected President, the rich got richer and the poor got poorer, an interesting version of fairness.

Perhaps the good Governor can swing by CBO while he's in town and get a copy of these numbers. As I discovered, all you have to do is prod them a little.

A MAJORITY OF FOREIGN FIRMS DO NOT PAY U.S. TAXES

(Mrs. BENTLEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. BENTLEY. Mr. Speaker, recent polls show that the American public is angry, and I don't blame them. So am I. The distinguished Congressman, JAKE PICKLE, recently revealed in Ways and Means hearings that 70 percent of the 46,000 foreign firms operating in the United States do not pay taxes.

As a result of the original committee hearings, Congress gave the IRS tools to collect taxes from foreign firms. The IRS was outgunned. Foreign firms hired former IRS agents and, using their lobbyists and delaying tactics, evaded paying their fair share of taxes. Of 36 firms investigated by the committee, the avoidance of taxes got worse instead of better, Chairman PICKLE said recently. They actually paid fewer taxes than reported to the committee 2 years ago. One firm received a $600 million refund and another a $100 million refund. A company with sales in excess of $6.6 billion paid no taxes.

Trade experts tell us foreign investment is good for us, but not if the working American has to keep picking up the tax bill. Let's collect the $50 billion in unpaid foreign taxes plus interest, fines, and penalties and quit gouging the American taxpayer.

IN MEMORY OF JOHN FANG

(Ms. PELOSI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Ms. PELOSI. Mr. Speaker, yesterday a great American and a great personal friend passed away—John (Ta Chuan) Fang, who was a journalist, publisher, and community leader for San Francisco and for Asian-Americans throughout the country.

Many in San Francisco this week will remember his good works for the city, his tireless advocacy of empowerment for Asian-Americans, and his pioneering work as an Asian-American journalist through the publication of Asian Week and ownership of the Independent.

What I will remember most about John Fang, however, is his gentle spirit, his warmth and generosity and loyalty to friends, and his strength. This strength was measured by the passion of his commitment to principles rather than politics, ideals rather than ideology.

Quietly, but powerfully, John never hesitated to speak out on issues of importance to this city and his country. Shanghai-born, having fled communism in his native China in 1949, John provided inspiration and support for human rights in China because, as he said, "It is the right thing to do."

San Francisco suffers a terrible loss this week, and I offer my heartfelt condolences to Florence, his wife, and James, Ted, and Douglas, his sons.

The gentlewoman from California [Mrs. BOXER], with whom I share the representation of San Francisco, joins me in commending John. We will miss his enduring spirit, but the fire of his convictions shall always be with us as a source of comfort and strength.

AMERICANS WANT CONGRESS TO END PARTISAN BICKERING

(Mr. ZELIFF asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ZELIFF. Mr. Speaker, as I crisscrossed my district during this recess,

Mr. Speaker, one message rang out crystal clear.

The American people want their Congress to end the partisan bickering, and get back to work solving America's problems.

They want both parties to sit down at the table, and develop an economic growth package that will create good, high-paying jobs.

The American people are sick and tired of election year rhetoric. They want us to stop talking, and start taking action to get our economy back on track. We must put America back to work.

A good place to start, Mr. Speaker, would be to take up my legislation H.R. 2359, the Economic Resurgence and Jobs for America Act. This economic growth package reinstates the jobs producing, investment tax credit and reduces the capital gains tax.

Democrats will remember that it was the investment tax credit that Jack Kennedy was talking about, when he said, "A rising tide lifts all boats." Let's put Americans back to work by passing H.R. 2359.

Let us start to work together for bipartisan results.

FOCUSING OUR ANGER ON THE REAL SCANDAL

(Mr. PORTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, the Congress and many of its Members have been beset with the scandals of unpaid House restaurant bills, checks held by the House bank, and a post office dealing in drugs as well as postage.

These are serious matters that bear on the stewardship of the majority party as well as the character of individual Members. The press has correctly focused on these matters and stirred outrage among the American people.

But Mr. Speaker, as outrageous as these incidents are, they pale in significance next to the issue that should most stir the anger and disgust of the American people: a national debt that has increased from $1 to $4 trillion over the past dozen years, and huge deficits dragging our economy into stagnation, with no end in sight.

This fiscal disaster, resulting from a complete lack of courage and leadership either in Congress or the White House to either cut government spending—my choice—or raise taxes, is destroying American jobs and competitiveness, making us dependent on foreign capital and ultimately subservient to foreign interests, and undermining the futures of our children and grandchildren.

This is where the people and the press should direct their strongest fire—this is where government is most failing its basic responsibility to the people.

RESCISSION BILLS SHOULD BE VOTED ON INDIVIDUALLY

(Mr. ALLARD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ALLARD. Mr. Speaker, today I rise in support of the porkbuster rescission bills and to emphasize the importance of having each of them voted on individually.

Many people argue this is an exercise of futility—that these rescissions are peanuts and we should not be wasting our time on such an insignificant amount of money. While it is true that the $7.9 billion proposed for rescissions in our 96 bills is small relative to the $401 billion deficit expected this year, the simple fact is that we need to start somewhere. If we cannot muster the political will to cut funding for Vidalia onion storage or Hawaiian arts and crafts, we certainly will not be able to make the more difficult decisions of ordering our national priorities for domestic, defense and international programs, we certainly will never graduate to consideration of limiting the growth of entitlements.

Second, it is important for Congress to take separate votes on each of the rescission bills. Congress needs to be held accountable for supporting these individual projects. If we had an up or down vote on table grape research or the building of a poultry facility, most of these projects would not be funded. An omnibus bill just will not do.

It is time for this body to cinch up our belts and become more accountable for our insatiable need of spending more money than we have.

A CALL FOR A CUTOFF OF AID TO PERU

(Mr. GILMAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, enough is enough in Peru. An American plane has been shot down in international airspace and one of our airmen has been lost. Whether it was malice or criminal negligence, a simple apology is not enough. Now is the time to end all assistance to Peru.

It is preposterous to expect us to accept President Fujimori's cynical claim that he had to abolish democracy in order to fight the war on drugs. It is apparent that this is a President with little if any interest in fighting the drug war.

He refused U.S. assistance for more than a year. He refused to even consider eradicating coca leaf. He refuses to control municipal airports used by drug traffickers. His military shoots at police on antidrug missions. He shows up at the San Antonio drug summit to veto supply reduction goals and then slurs the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration at a press conference. When a senior United States official comes to Peru, Fujimori plays into the hands of the guerrillas and dissolves democracy.

Now Peru has adopted a shoot down policy which leaves drug traffickers alone and attacks United States aircraft after they have left Peruvian airspace. This Congress and this country should not tolerate any more outrages from Peru—it is time to cut them off from all United States aid.

THE SITUATION IN AFGHANISTAN

(Mr. DREIER of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Speaker, during the decade of the 1980's, President Ronald Reagan and on into this decade of the 1990's, President George Bush have, along with the support of our colleague, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WILSON], and the gentleman from California [Mr. LAGOMARSINO], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RITTER], and the gentleman from California [Mr. ROHRBACHER], and others have worked diligently to ensure that the Mujahidein who were fighting against the 115,000 Soviet troops in Afghanistan had the kind of assistance that was necessary to win that battle.

We all know that a couple of years ago we successfully forced the Soviet troops out of Afghanistan, and we had through that battle a very fragile seven-party coalition of factions in Afghanistan.

Now they have been battling. We have seen the successful ouster of Dr. Najibullah in Kabul, but we today are continuing to see somewhat of a struggle between Gulbiddin Hekmatayer and Ahmed Shah Masoud.

It seems to me that we need to do everything that we possibly can to try and hold this coalition together so that the United States, the new Commonwealth of Independent States and others throughout the free world can see the self-determination which the people of Afghanistan deserve.

NATIONAL AERONAUTICS AND SPACE ADMINISTRATION MULTI-YEAR AUTHORIZATION ACT OF 1992

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 432 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 432

Resolved, That at any time after the adoption of this resolution the Speaker may, pursuant to clause 1(b) of rule XXIII, declare the House resolved into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 4364) to authorize appropriations to the National Aeronautics and Space Administration for research and development, space flight, control and data communications, construction of facilities, research and program management, and Inspector General, and for other purposes, and the first reading of the bill shall be dispensed with. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and the amendment made in order by this resolution and which shall not exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Science, Space, and Technology, the bill shall be considered for amendment under the five-minute rule. It shall be in order to consider the amendment in the nature of a substitute recommended by the Committee on Science, Space, and Technology now printed in the bill as an original bill for the purpose of amendment under the five-minute rule, by title instead of by section and each title shall be considered as having been read, and all points of order against said substitute for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 7 of rule XVI are hereby waived. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House, and any Member may demand a separate vote in the House on any amendment adopted in the Committee of the Whole to the bill or to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute. The previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit with or without instructions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. McNULTY). The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GORDON] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, I yield the customary 30 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. QUILLEN], for purposes of debate only. Pending that, I yield myself such time as I may consume. During consideration of this resolution, all time yielded is for the purposes of debate only.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 432 is an open rule providing for the consideration of H.R. 4364, the National Aeronautics and Space Administration Authorization Act of 1992. The rule provides for 1 hour of general debate to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Science, Space, and Technology.

The rules also make in order the Science, Space, and Technology Committee amendment in the nature of a substitute now printed in the bill as an original text for the purpose of amendment under the 5-minute rule. The substitute shall be considered by title, and each title shall be considered as having been read.

In addition, the rule waives all points of order against the substitute for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 7 of rule XVI, pertaining to germaneness. Finally, the rule provides for one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 4364 provides multiyear authorizations for programs under the jurisdiction of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration [NASA] and related agencies. The bill provides budget authority for NASA's space and aeronautics activities and for the space activities of the Department of Transportation, Department of Commerce and the National Space Council.

I want to commend the gentleman from California, Chairman BROWN, and my colleagues on the Science and Space Committee for the excellent job they have done in bringing this bill to the House floor under an open rule request.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 4364 is the result of hearings and careful consultations. I am pleased that we have an open rule which received unanimous support in the House Rules Committee. I urge my colleagues to adopt it.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HALL].

Mr. HALL of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the gentleman from California, Chairman BROWN, and my colleagues on the Science and Space Committee for the excellent job they have done in bringing this bill to the House floor under an open rule request. In particular, I want to express my support for the funds included for the National Aerospace Plane Program.

The bill authorizes NASA funds at a level of $80 million in fiscal year 1992, $150 million in fiscal year 1993, and $175 million in fiscal year 1994 for the national aerospace plane, a joint project with the Department of Defense. The National Aerospace Plane Program is developing technology to make possible the first flight of a hypersonic aircraft that can take off from a runway and fly into orbit in space.

I am proud to say that the office coordinating this project is located at Wright-Patterson Air Force Base in the Dayton, OH area. Nearly 100 years ago, Dayton's Wright brothers ushered in the era of flight. Now, the national aerospace plane promises to be a leader in the development of the technology for the next century of flight.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. QUILLEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, today is a day of rejoicing. This is our first completely open rule of 1992. I applaud the action of the Committee on Rules very much.

During the current fiscal crisis, the task of allocating national priorities for the space program has become all the more difficult. I wish to commend the gentleman from California [Mr. BROWN] and the ranking minority member, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER], of the Committee on Science, Space, and Technology, for their work in crafting this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, in the past few years NASA has suffered a number of setbacks such as cost overruns in the space station and the malfunctioning of the Hubble space telescope. These problems have eroded confidence in the agency and have raised questions about its ability to pursue an aggressive space exploration program. However, we must also remember that our Nation's space program has become successful over the years. This open rule will allow us to examine the programs under NASA and to debate its future direction.

H.R. 4364 provides budget authority for NASA's space and aeronautics activities and for the space activities of the Department of Commerce, the National Space Council, and the Department of Transportation. The fiscal year 1993 authorization level is set at $15.3 billion, which is $693 million below the President's request.

The bill also authorizes $2.5 billion for the space station Freedom in fiscal year 1993. This is the same amount requested by the administration. When completed, the space station will be a manned, orbiting outpost for conducting scientific activities.

Mr. Speaker, this rule protects the rights of the minority by giving us an opportunity to offer a motion to recommit with or without instructions. I strongly support the rule, and I urge its adoption.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. DREIER].

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Speaker, I rise for one simple and basic reason. That is to extend congratulations to the leadership here. Sixty-four percent of the rules in the 102d Congress have been closed rules, meaning that Members have not had the opportunity to offer amendments. If they have come up with a brilliant idea while listening to the debate on the House floor, they have been preempted from offering an amendment. This NASA rule is the first open rule to be reported out of our Committee on Rules in this calendar year, that is the second session of the 102d Congress.

I happen to believe as a member of the minority, and my colleagues on the minority side consistently agree, that we would allow Members the opportunity to work their will and legislate here on the floor, and if they have an idea for an amendment they should be able to offer that.

As we begin debate on the NASA bill today, that is exactly what is going to happen. As I say, this is the first time this year, and I hope very much that as we consider further rules down the road, and I recognize that every rule cannot be open, but I certainly hope that more and more of the rules that we consider are open.

I thank the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. QUILLEN] for his fine leadership on this, the distinguished Republican chairman emeritus of the Committee on Rules, for his help.

Mr. QUILLEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER].

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I, too, want to congratulate the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HALL], the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GORDON], and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. QUILLEN] for the open rule that we have before us today. I think this is the way we ought to proceed on legislative business.

Let me say as one of the leaders of the Committee on Science, Space, and Technology bringing this bill to the floor, there are a number of amendments that are going to arrive under this open rule that I would prefer not to come to the floor. I would just as soon not have to debate some of these amendments. If we could freeze them off the floor it would be a wonderful thing.

In all honesty, that would not be the right way to proceed with this bill. It would not give us a stronger bill in the final analysis. So we are going to work our way through these amendments. It is not going to be easy. Some of the votes are likely to be fairly controversial, but that is the way the House should legislate. I am disappointed we do not do more of that. I am sorry that on many occasions we come to the floor with these rules so closed that honest, very important amendments are left out of the process because we do not have open rules.

So despite the fact that I am going to have to work here several hours fending off amendments that I do not particularly want, I thank the Committee on Rules for this open rule. I am glad for the first time this year that we are going to have an open rule under which to consider a bill, because it means that when our bill finally leaves the floor today it will in fact reflect the will of the House and not the will of a closed committee group that makes decisions and does not have the House ratify them. I, too, support the open rule.

Mr. HALL of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRAFICANT].

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I, too, want to support the rule, as the other speakers have said. It is a good rule. It is a good committee and a good bill, and there will be much debate on this bill.

I would just like to say in putting my two cents in now there will be amendments. One of those will be to cut the space station in hardship times.

I would like to say the author of that amendment is a fine young man and he is going to distinguish himself here. His efforts are noble and worthy of the consideration of the debate, but I choose to support the committee's program. Let me say this. What concerns me when we start to cut around here is we will be willing to cut American domestic programs but we do not touch certain sacred cows. I think if we are going to have to find money for some of these things we are talking about I think there are other parts of the code we could do it from. We could look at foreign aid and some of these other programs.

I think we should leave the space station alone. America stands in its leadership in space. We must continue to expand upon that, to amplify upon that particular leadership, and to start to convert some of those technological gains in space to commercial application here on Earth.

That is where I want to just talk briefly. I have two provisions in the bill. One of them is a buy America provision. I think it is good. I thank Chairman BROWN for working with me over the years to tailor it so that it would be a good measure for NASA.

But finally, I have a measure in the form of an amendment added to this bill that would call for the use of abandoned and underutilized buildings, grounds and facilities in parts of our country that are not now used by NASA and have suffered from economic collapse. What this language in the bill is, and I think it is an excellent measure from the Committee on Science, Space, and Technology, is a measure that says the NASA administrator shall investigate the use of underutilized existing facilities and resources we already have that will not cost the taxpayers anything, and instead of continuing to concentrate all of this new NASA business in the same locations, spread it around, give some people an opportunity to work, create jobs, and spread NASA out where NASA will have a good, solid base, because NASA is going to need the support of the American people. The days are over when everybody was glued to the tube when that shot went up. We had some catastrophes, and with them we have come down to Earth.

Now we get to the pragmatics of budgeting and appropriations and ensuring a long-range commitment to space, and a long-range commitment to American leadership in outer space.

I am glad to see that the committee has included and incorporated my amendments. I will not be offering any on the floor. I am sure some will stand up and cheer for that.

I want to thank the very distinguished gentleman from Ohio for yielding me the time.

Mr. QUILLEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. HALL of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I have no requests for time, I yield back the balance of my time, and I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCNULTY). The question is on the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. QUILLEN. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

Mr. WOLF and Mr. SHAYS changed their vote from "nay" to "yea."
So the resolution was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. McNULTY). Pursuant to House Resolution 432 and rule XXIII, the Chair declares the House in the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill, H.R. 4364.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 4364) to authorize appropriations to the National Aeronautics and Space Administration for research and development, space flight, control and data communications, construction of facilities, research and program management, and inspector general, and for other purposes, with Mr. HARRIS in the chair.

□ 1540

The Clerk read the title of the bill.
The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to the rule, the bill is considered as having been read the first time.

Under the rule, the gentleman from California [Mr. BROWN] will be recognized for 30 minutes, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER] will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to take up again the NASA authorization bill, H.R. 4364, the Multiyear NASA Authorization Act of 1992. The Committee on Science, Space, and Technology has worked hard in a bipartisan manner to develop this piece of legislation. I want to thank the chairmen of the two subcommittees of jurisdiction, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HALL] and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VALENTINE], and the two ranking Republicans, the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. SENSENBRENNER] and the gentleman from Florida [Mr. LEWIS], for their valuable work and contributions. I also want to thank the ranking Republican of the full committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER] for his extraordinary effort and cooperation in developing this legislation.

Mr. Chairman, I have a more extensive statement which I will include in the RECORD, but I will make just a few points about this before allowing the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER] to make his opening statement.

Mr. Chairman, this bill is an effort to face the realities that confront us today. The fact is that we are living in extremely tight budget times. We do not have enough money to fund all the programs we would like, including some very important, high-priority NASA programs. What the committee has sought to do in this bill is to recognize that fact by establishing two categories of projects; one we put in title I, which we call the core program, and the remainder in title II. And this is not to indicate they are not extremely important. They are. But we feel that they are additional programs that need to compete for any available money. The core programs in title I are actually funded or authorized at the current level of expenditure, and over the next 3 years in this bill they would only grow at the rate of inflation. If we are going to have the additional programs, they have to fight for their money against other important domestic programs.

Now fundamentally, Mr. Chairman, we are making the case that NASA funding is a vital part of our national investments in research and development, and, without these investments, the economy in this country will continue to go downhill. The chart which my colleagues see before them indicates the degree to which our lead in global trade and high technology has begun to decline over the last 10 years, and our global trade in nonhigh technology of course has dropped precipitously. We feel that the only way to rescue this country from a continued decline in productivity and standard of living is to make these long-term investments, such as those represented by the NASA budget.

Now we do not claim that every penny spent in NASA will directly contribute to national productivity. A large share of it will. The NASA program, roughly, $15 billion, represents about half of all the money we spend for civilian research and development. It provides the funding for the engineers, for the scientists, for the high-technology corporations that have the contracts to build space equipment. We have to maintain that level of spending because our competitors are spending even more.

The next chart presented here indicates the rate at which our competitors are expanding their nondefense research and development. We are talking research and development in this bill, and, as my colleagues can see very clearly from the chart, West Germany and Japan, our two major competitors, and, to a somewhat lesser degree, all of Europe, have been increasing their investments in research and development now for more than a decade at a far greater rate than we have. Their expenditures now are reaching 3 percent of gross national product while ours, represented by the yellow line at the lower part of the chart, is hovering at less than 2 percent of the GNP. In effect they are spending 50 percent more, measured in terms of their GNP, in investments in research and development than we are.

Mr. Chairman, that is the reason, in large part, for the decline in our balance of trade, the decline in productivity, our static standard of living. As my colleagues know, our average factory wages have not increased in 10 or 15 years. Average family income, adjusted for inflation, has remained static, and we believe it is because of our failure to increase our research and development investments.

So, this is the fundamental case that I have tried to make and will continue to try to make. I am going to come back to this a little bit later during the debate when we discuss the space station amendment.

Mr. Chairman, H.R. 4364 represents the culmination of a great many hearings and hours of debate within the committee. We have tried to directly address a very central question that Congress is having to deal with across the entire range of Federal programs this year. What is the appropriate approach toward providing budgetary guidance for the space program during this extraordinary period of budgetary austerity? The space program has one of the widest margins of approval with the American public of almost any Federal program. Public opinion surveys consistently show that Americans are proud of our scientific accomplishments in space, they want an active manned space program including the space shuttle and the space station, and they would like to see more spending on space. Yet, within the confines of the budget agreement, it does not seem likely that we will be able to spend more, at least over the near term.

Before I explain the approach we have taken toward these issues in our authorization process this year, I would like to describe the overall context for funding science and technology within the Federal budget. In particular, it is important to understand what these programs actually contribute to our overall national agenda and what role these programs play in our effort to regain our national competitiveness and productivity.

One principal concern shared by all Americans today is that many long-term trends in productivity, in education, in investment, and in quality of life are declining in a disturbing manner compared to our principal economic competitors. This results, in the view of many, from an ingrained cultural pattern of overconsumption that must be fundamentally reoriented toward a pattern of productive investment—investment targeted toward infrastructure, education, and training, and in technology to rebuild the economy and generate jobs in the future. With hard work and a clear sense of priorities, we can, as legislators, accomplish this reorientation.

First, it is significant that our share of the world's merchandise imports, in both low technology and high technology products, has risen steadily over the past 20 years while our share of exports has fallen. Clearly, we are not meeting the test of international markets. Our overall trade balance reached a low in 1987 but has shown some recovery over the past several years.

Over this same period, defense R&D has soared while Federal civilian R&D has scarcely managed to keep pace with inflation. With no coherent Federal technology in place, private R&D investments fell behind levels set by our competitors. Today, as a result, these competitors far outstrip the United States as a percentage of GDP devoted to civilian R&D investments. The United States is investing only about two-thirds as much as Japan or Germany on civilian R&D. This period of growing civilian R&D commitment by our competitors, which was unmatched by the United States, correlates with the decline in our industrial competitiveness and the loss of international markets.

As I will show, in those areas where U.S. R&D expenditures have remained strong such as in biotechnology and aeronautics, our competitive position has remained strong. This compelling linkage should form a basis for the development of a more focused national research and development policy and planning.

I would like now to address one very important part of this overall R&D issue, the space program. The space program not only serves as a metaphor for the overall R&D policy problem, it is a major component of the R&D budget.

First, how much do we actually spend on space? Most people don't know that the Defense Department has a far larger space program than does NASA—more than 50 percent larger. Beginning in 1980, the budget for DOD for space has increased dramatically and has far outstripped civilian space spending. Although the civilian and defense space programs have much in common and additional cost sharing could help to relieve the pressure within NASA's budget, the present walls between budget categories prevent this being done efficiently.

Since decline of the Apollo Program, NASA's budget has generally increased with inflation until 1986 at which time it increased by about 10 percent per year in real terms until last year. At that time, as you know, NASA's budget failed to keep pace with inflation and this year's request continues this flat no-growth trend.

Notwithstanding this, spending by NASA and DOD is substantially greater than the combined spending by the European Space Agency or Japan. This has provided us with a very significant world leadership position in space over the past 30 years.

Today, NASA's budget constitutes a little less than 1 percent of the Federal budget and a little over two-tenths of 1 percent of the GNP. This is only one-quarter of the level we spent on space during the Apollo period. Last year, the presidentially appointed Advisory Committee on the Future of the U.S. Space Program recommended that we build the NASA funding back up to about four-tenths of 1 percent of the GNP. In fact this panel, called the Augustine Committee, recommended that we increase NASA's budget by about 10 percent per year until we reach that level. I believe this recommendation has great merit but perhaps not achievable over the near term.

Finally, I would note that about 80 percent of NASA's spending goes directly toward jobs with the remainder going for materials. In 1993 NASA's budget will account for over 577,000 jobs. Although this is only five-tenths of 1 percent of the total civilian work force, these jobs represent the most highly skilled and productive component of the work force.

In terms of total industrial revenues, aerospace has been a major contributor to the economy. At present, total aerospace sales by U.S. companies exceeds $30 billion. This is substantially greater than European or Japanese competitors. It is generally agreed that there is some indirect amplification of this spending in terms of total impact on the economy. Some have estimated this amplification factor to be up to 7 to 1.

Another way to view this marked advantage the United States has in the aerospace market is through the balance of trade. As I have mentioned earlier, the long-term Federal investment in space and aeronautics is clearly reflected in our market share. The U.S. aerospace exports exceed imports by over $30 billion. In fact, this is one of the few areas in which we have continued to enjoy such a sustained positive balance of trade over such a long time period.

The reason why the United States has acquired such a large share of the market in aerospace is because of the long-term support the Federal Government has provided in research and development over the years. In areas ranging from aircraft sales to communications satellites, NASA spending has provided the leverage to enable the U.S. industry to gain a significant share of the international market.

The overall funding curve for Federal investment in research and development roughly follows the NASA funding curve and space has dominated these trends. In fact, one single program, the space station, has played a major role in the overall increase in civilian R&D that began in 1985.

Mr. Chairman, one of the most significant parts—in fact 50 percent—of the national research and development budget consists of NASA programs. Thus, the decisions we make today will set the direction on our overall R&D policy. This fact was uppermost on our minds when the committee drafted H.R. 4364.

Mr. Chairman, let me close by saying that it is vital for America's future that we go into space. All of us want a future where we and our children can grow and prosper. Missions of exploration and scientific inquiry have opened up new frontiers and created opportunities throughout history. We discovered answers to questions we didn't even know to ask. Achievements in space offer the opportunity to expand our knowledge, to inspire and motivate us to greater accomplishments, and to promote our economic vitality. Space challenges us to continued greatness.

This concludes my statement, Mr. Chairman. I hope that you and my colleagues can support the space program and give H.R. 4364 speedy approval.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to join the gentleman from California [Mr. BROWN] in supporting H.R. 4364. This legislation, which was reported out of the Committee on Science, Space, and Technology on a bipartisan vote, is the product of weeks of hard work and creative thinking. The chairman in particular is to be congratulated for the work that he did on this bill and the consensus that he put together in order to get it to the floor. In addition to the Chairman, I would like to congratulate subcommittee ranking Republicans, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SENSENBRENNER] and the gentleman from Florida [Mr. LEWIS] as well as subcommittee Chairmen RALPH HALL and TIM VALENTINE for their work on this bill. The result is a fiscally responsible authorization bill which funds a strong core of programs, and at the same time recognizes the reality of the spending constraints which prevent the NASA budget from expanding as much as some of us would like.

The chairman has outlined the major points of H.R. 4364 in his written statement, and I will not repeat them. I do, however, want to highlight what I believe are the more significant provisions of the legislation. The core budget includes full funding for the space station and the national aerospace plane. Space science receives an 18-percent share of the total amount in this bill. This authorization funds NASA at essentially a freeze level for fiscal year 1993. Last year's authorization assumed that the overall NASA budget would grow at a 5-percent real rate. That obviously is not going to happen. So, this bill is an even more conservative approach than what was in the President's budget.

This bill manages to balance a number of important priorities. It is quite clear that obtaining adequate appropriations for NASA this year will be an uphill battle. The Appropriations Committee has made no secret of the fact that competition for domestic discretionary funds will be very stiff.

I would like to emphasize that the two-tiered structure of the bill is not a reflection on the importance of the programs contained in title II. This structure is simply a method for delineating activities which are essential to a strong U.S. space program. The programs in title II are extensions of that core, but represent initiatives which will require substantial new funding commitments. These initiatives include the robotic lunar missions and the Earth observing system and others; however, money is available for these programs only if the entire core program is fully funded first. Any advanced solid rocket motor funding can only come out of new money, and can only be fully funded if appropriations reach $15.25 billion. This demonstrates the real choices that were made by the committee.

Let some believe that we are trying to do everything, let me point out that we did say no to an ambitious administration proposal. The $12 billion new launch system is not included in this legislation. The committee has determined that this is an unnecessary and unjustified program, with virtually no support on Capitol Hill.

We, as the authorizing committee, are serious about our responsibility for setting the priorities for the programs within our jurisdiction. We have made the difficult choices, and have, at the same time, preserved the foundation for a strong space program.

I urge my colleagues to support H.R. 4364, and I reserve the balance of my time.

□ 1550

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HALL], and ask unanimous consent to delegate the rest of my time to the gentleman from Texas to manage.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. HALL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, it is with a great deal of pleasure that I rise in support of H.R. 4364, the NASA Multiyear Authorization Act of 1992.

This is a bipartisan piece of legislation that the Subcommittee on Space has actively been working on since the President's budget proposal for fiscal year 1993 was submitted to the Congress in January.

I want to, of course, take this opportunity to thank the other members of the subcommittee who have contributed to the legislation. Also throughout this period, the gentleman from California [Mr. BROWN], the chairman of the Committee on Science, Space, and Technology, has provided the Subcommittee on Space and all of our members with excellent guidance, with excellent advice, and support as the subcommittee has worked to draft this important piece of legislation.

Finally, it has been a pleasure to work with the ranking Republican member of the full committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER], and the ranking Republican member of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SENSENBRENNER], in crafting this bill. We have worked very closely together, had very few disagreements, and I think basically have worked in harmony with the Members on both sides of the aisle in arriving at this final bill.

Mr. Chairman, you may recall that 1 year ago the central discussion within the space program revolved around the report of the Presidentially appointed Augustine Committee, a highly regarded study that would give guidance to this committee and to this Congress.

The committee was charged with bringing some stability to the space program and recommending the comprehensive management changes.

As was mentioned by the gentleman from California [Mr. BROWN], one of the most important recommendations made by the Augustine Committee was that over the next decade we should return to the level of investment in the space program that was made during the period of the Apollo Program.

Since the release of the Augustine report, this recommendation has become all but nullified by the effects of the budget agreement. Last year, NASA's budget declined in real terms and this year the administration's request for NASA represents only an inflationary increase.

The failure to achieve, even in qualitative terms, the stable and increasing budget recommended by Augustine, severely limits the applicability of much of the rest of the work done by the Augustine Committee.

In the committee's deliberations last year we recommended a long-range authorization in order to provide some stability to the NASA programs. Public Law 102-195 provided a moderate increase for NASA of about 5 percent per year, only half of what Augustine recommended. Even this, however, was overly optimistic. Thus, we have taken a new tact this year to recommend a meaningful growth path for NASA, yet also identify a core program that can be carried out even if no growth is possible.

Unfortunately, some of NASA's most visionary and popular programs were begun in an era that anticipated these increasing budgets. These programs simply cannot be carried out within a flat budget scenario.

There is no question that, lacking the guarantee of a long-term stable and increasing budget, these popular programs must compete for extra discretionary resources. The question is whether we will allow this competition to take place within an increasingly strained NASA budget and accept the annual program cancellations and stretch-outs that will inevitably occur, or whether we will try and establish a core space program and force this competition to take place with other Federal expenditures.

Mr. Chairman, H.R. 4364 is intended to address this dilemma. The bill maintains a stable base program of space activities that can be carried out within a static, no-growth budget, while also providing for a series of special initiatives that will compete for discretionary resources.

This bill is structured in three titles, two of which are the principal funding titles. I think this has already been laid out, but let me reiterate.

Title I provides for the core space program, including the space station, a balanced science program, space shuttle operations, and space and aeronautics technology development. These programs constitute the type of activities which have been carried out over the past 30 years and have been the most productive parts of the space program.

In title I we have assumed that such a core program must be structured so that it can be executed even if no real budgetary growth occurs in future years. Funding for this core program begins at $14.3 billion in fiscal year 1993—slightly less than the level appro-appropriated last year—and grows at what is approximately an inflationary rate to a level of $15.7 billion by fiscal year 1995.

I want to emphasize that this core program, including the space station and most of our science program, can be carried out within this funding envelope. It may not be the aggressive space program of space spectaculars we have been advocating over the years, but it is robust and it is affordable.

Title II contains the special initiatives which we believe can demonstrate leadership in space and provide major advances in science and human exploration. These include the Earth observing system, the space exploration initiative, the advanced solid rocket motor, and enhancements to the space shuttle.

The aggregate funding level included in titles I and II begins at $15.253 billion in fiscal year 1993 and increases at a real growth rate of about 5 percent per year until it reaches $17.886 billion in fiscal year 1995. Although I fully recognize the difficulty in achieving these full funding levels, I still regard this as a desirable and justifiable investment for the Nation.

Even though achieving these increases will be challenging, it is important to view this in the context of the present NASA request. In particular, it is important to look at the outyear budget requirements for the programs being requested. If no programs are canceled or stretched out, the budget requirements—called the runout—reach a level by fiscal year 1995 of $3.6 billion above the President's requested freeze level and $1.1 billion above the amounts authorized in H.R. 4364.

Thus, in fundamentally restructuring the budget request, we hope to avoid program cancellations and stretchouts that have characterized the NASA budget over the past several years. We have accomplished this in two ways. First, for the core programs in title I we have limited the growth of many rapidly growing activities and programs. The result, however, is what I believe to be a well-balanced and sustainable program. Second, we have placed the programs that cannot be limited in this way in title II, and then we have restricted their overall growth rate to 5 percent.

Mr. Chairman, later today the Members will likely be asked to vote on one or more amendments to cut funding from space station Freedom. I strongly believe that such amendments should not be supported.

One possible amendment would terminate funding for the station and provide part of the savings for other NASA programs and part for deficit reduction.

H.R. 4364 is intended to fund a balanced space program as judged by the committee after many hours of hearings and detailed consideration. Redistribution to other programs is, in essence, an attempt to unbalance the space program toward other more narrow purposes.

With respect to deficit reduction, proponents of terminating the station envision that in some way the money not spent would be returned to the Treasury. In reality, the congressional allocation process ensures that money not spent on one program will simply be spent on another.

Another possible amendment would shift part or all of the funding for space station from title I to title II. This would redefine the station program as one which must compete for extra discretionary resources in the future rather than being funded as a part of a core space program. The station is central to the manned space program and directly related to the shuttle program, the tracking and data relay program, major portions of the science program, and a large portion of NASA's personnel and institutional base. In essence, unlike the other programs now in title II, the core space program in title I is interdependent and cannot be carried out without the space station.

In this authorization bill, the space station does not compete with any other non-space expenditure such as the super collider, housing, veterans, and on and on. No transfers to other programs and no direct reduction in the deficit is possible by terminating the station. Nor does the space station require the budget enforcement agreement be breached or that funding must be transferred from the defense budget.

Mr. Chairman, we should remember that the House budget resolution provided funding for the space station in both plans A and B, regardless of whether or not the budget walls were removed.

The simple question that must be addressed by space station amendments is whether we should continue the development of the space station.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that there are many reasons why the continued development of the space station should be supported by the Congress. These reasons include the following:

First, the space station will be a permanent international laboratory in space and will provide for unprecedented research in life sciences, medicine, and materials research and for the peaceful exploration of space.

□ 1600

New technologies developed on the space station will create new industries in the future.

Second, with contracts in 39 States and a value to date of over $7 billion, the space station accounts for over 75,000 jobs nationwide. During this period of decline, for No. 3, in defense spending programs such as the space station will stabilize the aerospace industrial base and provide for the desired transition to other civil and commercial markets.

Next, besides being so important to the American space program, the space station is also the centerpiece for the European, Japanese, and Canadian space programs. In the face of the substantial financial contributions that these allies are making to the space station program, the United States must honor its commitments to continue this program. Next, the space station represents a model of the world order that many nations are trying to achieve in the aftermath of the cold war, and that is peaceful cooperation among nations while competing technologically.

The space station is an investment in our children's future. It is a catalyst for math and science education from grade school through graduate school.

Mr. Chairman, space station research over its 30-year lifetime will undoubtedly result in significant discoveries including treatments for diseases, new medicines, new materials, and revolutionary manufacturing technologies.

Just as the Apollo Program led to the use of integrated computer circuitry and the computer revolution, technology spinoffs are already emerging from the space station even during its development phase.

Examples that will improve our quality of life and enhance our technological competitiveness include, one, large flat video displays, nickel hydrogen batteries, environmental monitoring and control systems, and automated digital welding inspection with low x-ray hazard.

Over the past year, the space station has made significant progress and has remained within the funding guidelines set by the Congress. It is essential to continue this momentum, preserve these jobs and fulfill the investment that has already been made.

Mr. Chairman, for these and for many other reasons that I do not have the time and will not take the time to outline here, I believe that all Members should provide their full support to the space station program.

Likewise, Mr. Chairman, I would encourage all of my fellow Members to give their support to this entire authorization bill that has been so carefully crafted by the Committee on Science, Space, and Technology.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SENSENBRENNER], the ranking Republican on the Subcommittee on Space.

Mr. SENSENBRENNER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to add to the words of praise previously given to the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from California [Mr. BROWN], the chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HALL], and my ranking member, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER].

I believe that this bill presents a significant departure from previous NASA authorizations and will put America's civilian space program on target so that it will continue to enjoy the confidence of the American public as tax dollars well spent.

Mr. Chairman, H.R. 4364 addresses the most serious problem facing NASA in this decade, being able to finish what it starts. The budget submitted to Congress would have left the taxpayer holding the bag, either by canceling programs after hundreds of millions had been spent, or by adding hundreds of millions in costs to stretch out existing programs.

The beauty of this bill is that it establishes a core program in title I and fully funds that core program so that those tasks contained in title I will be finished on time and under budget, just as President Kennedy's challenge to send an American to the Moon in the 1960's was.

Title I are those programs that we cannot afford now but we wish to authorize in case more money can be found. And that includes programs such as the completion of the ASRM and the Earth observation systems. This bill sets priorities, and these are priorities that have been lacking in previous budgets as well as previous authorization bills.

H.R. 4364 ends the destructive and wasteful pattern by drawing a line between the space program America has now and the space program it cannot afford now. Under current budgetary circumstances, programs that will sharply escalate in costs, or those that have barely begun, must be put on hold until significant additional priority funding can be given to the U.S. space program.

To give an example, the fiscal year 1993 request came to us $1.7 billion below what it would cost to continue the programs authorized by this body last year for fiscal 1992. The canceled programs, including the ASRM, represent hundreds of millions of dollars already spent that would not be wasted. Such madness must stop and does stop with H.R. 4364.

We will hear later today about fiscal responsibility in the same breath we will hear "Kill the Space Station."

Killing the space station will cause the more than $7.4 billion spent to date by the American taxpayer to be utterly wasted. If throwing away $7.4 billion is not fiscally irresponsible, I do not know what is. And this is precisely the type of congressional mismanagement of the public dollar our bill seeks to end.

Instead, H.R. 4364 is constructed to provide for a core base program at or about the rate of inflation.

Several times already this session, the House has voted against tearing down the firewalls between defense and domestic spending. A vote for H.R. 4364 honors this decision shown by the House to keep the Budget Agreement. At the same time it keeps our word to the American taxpayer. H.R. 4364 gives America a robust, resilient space program that will result in a major accomplishment: the permanently manned international space station Freedom.

This is the most important feature of H.R. 4364, but I would reiterate, first, this bill keeps the budget agreement. Second, it honors the will of Congress and the desire of the American public to keep the firewalls up between defense and domestic discretionary spending.

And it also honors the decision of Congress made last year to fully fund space station Freedom.

There are some who have argued that passage of a NASA authorization bill is unnecessary because there already is an authorization in law. That authorization was passed by the House when many of us thought the firewalls would come down. That decision has been made. The firewalls will stay up.

Along with the Easter Bunny, the walls coming down is a little bit hard to believe, given the vote in the House on March 31.

The fact is that the NASA budget requested for fiscal 1993 was $608 million below what was authorized last year. More alarming is the fact that the budget requested for fiscal 1993 was $1.7 billion below the cost to continue work already in progress.

It would be irresponsible to fail to pass a new authorization because we need to bring the NASA authorization up to date with changed fiscal realities.

It seems to me that the way to do that is through the core program and the title II contained in H.R. 4364, which will allow programs already under way to be finished on time and under budget.

Mr. HALL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ENGEL].

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I thank the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee on which I serve for yielding time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I rise today in support of H.R. 4364, which is the NASA authorization bill we are considering and the provision in it which provides funding for space station Freedom. This program is an important part of our ability to compete in world markets. I am very concerned about the United States maintaining its worldwide competitive edge in technology.

As I am sure my colleagues are aware, aerospace is one of the few areas in which the United States still has a distinct competitive advantage. In 1989, the United States had a positive trade balance of $22 billion in aerospace equipment, the largest single export surplus of any industry.

The strength of the U.S. aerospace development is extremely important for our economy because it employs almost 1 million people. The space station Freedom program alone has created almost 80,000 jobs in aerospace and related fields.

The space program not only provides jobs, it has improved the lives of all Americans. The space program has been directly responsible for important breakthroughs including teflon, lasers, important medical discoveries on heredity and diabetes, and improved insulation materials. The space station will allow us to achieve even more important discoveries which will improve the everyday lives of Americans.

For the past 40 years, a great deal of our technological research and development has been driven by the defense industry. As we move into the post-cold-war era where defense spending will be diminished, it is important for us to maintain our technological edge in aerospace and related fields. If we decide to eliminate the space station, we could cause the United States to lose preeminence in an industry which is already being squeezed by both the recession and defense reductions.

The NASA authorization bill, and the space station in particular, will allow us to maintain our lead in an important part of the U.S. economy and to be a technological leader in many important fields. I urge my colleagues to support the space station and this authorization bill.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. LEWIS], the ranking Republican on the Subcommittee on Technology and Competitiveness of the Committee on Science, Space, and Technology.

Mr. LEWIS of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I would like to thank the gentleman from California [Mr. BROWN] and the ranking member of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER], for the timely movement through committee in bringing this bill to the floor.

Only about 10 percent of the funding in the bill before us, the NASA authorization legislation, is for aeronautical research. Yet this is one of the most important areas to the U.S. economic competitiveness.

In 1991, the segment with the largest positive balance of trade was aeronautics. The estimates are that the positive balance was $30 billion. This is due to U.S. leadership in aeronautical technology.

This technology, in term, is dependent, to a large degree, on the NASA long-term research programs in aeronautics.

The aeronautics portion of the budget before the House today, H.R. 4364, supports funding at the President's requested level.

The value to the Nation of this House supporting the aeronautics programs can be illustrated by a February 1992 Congressional Research Service report.

CRS concluded that for every dollar in aircraft exports, the U.S. economy increases by $2.3. And for every $1 billion in exports, nearly 35,000 jobs are created.

For my colleagues who are looking for legislation to create jobs—look no further, because the NASA aeronautics R&D programs create jobs and increase U.S. competitiveness.

Also contained in the legislation is full funding for the National Aero Space Plane [NASP].

NASP is the long-term research program that will ensure U.S. aeronautical technological competitiveness for decades to come.

The advances in new materials for withstanding high temperatures, the development of supercomputer technology to design the aircraft, the progress in new air-breathing propulsion are all areas that will push U.S. technology to the forefront globally.

Other countries—most notably Japan and joint French-Russian efforts—are trying to catch up to the United States in hypersonic technology.

Support for the NASP program in H.R. 4364, will insure that the United States maintains the lead in hypersonic research.

I urge my colleagues to support the funding levels for aeronautics and NASP research in the NASA authorization.

I also want to call attention to the GOES-NEXT Weather Satellite Program, which is discussed in the report language to H.R. 4364. This is a joint NASA-NOAA [National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration] program, in which NASA is constructing the satellite.

GOES-NEXT was originally scheduled for launch in 1989, and now it may not be launched before 1994, due to technical problems and poor management.

The satellite is vital for early warning of hurricanes and is the only NASA program on which the lives of the citizens of Florida and other coastal States depend.

Therefore, it is important that a timely and successful launch of GOES-NEXT be the highest priority program at NASA.

Mr. Chairman, I also would like to thank the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VALENTINE], the chairman of my subcommittee, for the work we have been able to accomplish during consideration of this bill.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. PACKARD].

Mr. PACKARD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of H.R. 4364, the NASA Multiyear Authorization Act of 1992. The Science, Space, and Technology Committee has had to make some hard decisions in developing this authorization.

Given the 5-year freeze on domestic discretionary spending called for by the President, it was absolutely essential that the Science Committee set priorities. We did this by restructuring the NASA budget into title I and title II programs. Through this mechanism we have been able to preserve the core space programs while also providing a way for the special initiatives in title II to be funded.

Title I provides for a balanced space program which includes: space station Freedom, space science, aeronautical and space research, and commercial space initiatives. The bill authorizes full funding for space station Freedom which is a top priority for not only the President but also for most Members of Congress. I hope to speak on the space station when Mr. ROEMER offers his amendment.

I commend both the chairman and ranking Republican of the Science, Space, and Technology Committee—Mr. BROWN and Mr. WALKER—for their diligence in crafting this bill and in bringing it to the floor in such a timely manner.

Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues to support H.R. 4364. It is a fiscally responsible authorization that represents a truly bipartisan effort.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3½ minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DELAY].

Mr. DELAY. Mr. Chairman, an essential truth of our time is technology's role as the fuel that drives the economic engines of the nations. In that sense, the space station is an exceedingly important investment. Aerospace technology represents one of this country's most critical industries, one of the few to enjoy a favorable and rising balance of trade. In 1990, that trade surplus was more than $27 billion. The space station is indeed a contributor to this trade surplus. Since 1985, the U.S. has approved data, hardware sales, technical assistance agreements, and manufacturing license agreements to support the development of the European, Canadian, and Japanese elements of space station Freedom.

Meanwhile, within our own shorelines, when the loss of 12,000 jobs at a GM plant is treated as thunderous news, I wonder how we can even begin to entertain the notion of killing a project that will generate 25,000 direct jobs, 75,000 indirect jobs, contracts for more than 2,000 businesses in most of the States of the Union, and have a multiplier effect on the dollars spent in those States which in some cases is higher than 10-to-1.

What in heaven's name, future historians will ask, were we thinking of when we contemplated dismantling such an economic engine?

And these figures in themselves do not tell the full story of how a systematic, step-by-step program of exploration and discovery works its way through the economic structure of the nation. In the January 9 issue of the British journal Nature, Roger Bezdak and Robert Wending argue that we have lost sight of "the indirect, pervasive effects of NASA expenditure throughout the economy."

"* * * we find that the economic benefits of the space programme (sic) are much more widespread than has previously been realized," they write. "Specifically, in 1987, the NASA procurement budget generated $17.8 billion in total industry sales, had a 'multiplier effect' on the economy of 210 percent, created 209,000 private-sector jobs and $2.9 billion in business profits, and generated $5.6 billion in federal, state, and local government tax revenues."

But this infusion is only the beginning. While 70 percent of NASA's spending goes directly to California, Texas, Florida, Maryland, and Alabama, there are second, third, fourth, and *n*th spinoff effects of this spending. "For example," according to Nature, "business producing the wiring, paint or valves necessary to satisfy the third or fourth round of indirect output requirements usually have no idea that their sales, profits, and jobs are being generated by the Space programme."

This analysis indicates that the major indirect beneficiaries of NASA spending are such States as New York, Illinois, Michigan, Pennsylvania, Indiana, Missouri, New Jersey, and Wisconsin. Other States with substantial benefits include Georgia, Massachusetts, Washington, North Carolina, and Tennessee. Nature cites the example of Indiana, a State with no NASA installations and no major aerospace industry, as having one of the highest multiplier effects for space program expenditures of any State in the Union. "For every dollar Indiana receives directly in space programme funds," the study concludes, "it also receives $12 indirectly in business arising from the programme."

As we consider deleting the largest portion of the NASA budget—the space station—can you deprive your State and your constituents of this important source of jobs and revenue? That is a tough thing to subject your constituents to in these difficult times.

Clearly, any suggestion that the space station is an economic debacle, pumping billions of dollars into a fiscal black hole, is a position that simply is not credible. Likewise, the notion that a manned space station is somehow at odds with our best interests in the fields of space science and robotic space exploration is highly misleading.

Support space for our future.

Mr. HALL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentlewoman from Tennessee [Mrs. LLOYD].

Mrs. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of H.R. 4364, the NASA reauthorization bill. Further, I would like to reiterate my strong support for our national space program, and in particular space station Freedom.

Mr. Chairman, I rise today with the strongest support for H.R. 4364, the NASA reauthorization bill. Further I wish to reiterate my longtime support for our national space program, in particular the space station Freedom.

My colleagues, space station Freedom should be understood as a contributor to our economic future and our technology base. Maintaining a robust industrial base incorporating the most advanced technologies and materials is the key to future stability of our economy. The experimental platforms on space station Freedom provide the type of environment that is conducive to researching and producing materials that will advance our industrial base into the 21st century. The field of pharmaceuticals and medicine in general will benefit from the experimental platforms that are part of the space station. Osteoporosis studies are already slated to be among the first experiments on the station. The space station is also good for our environment. From the platform we will be able to study the affects of global warming and acid rain and a host of other environmental problems.

Putting the actual capabilities aside, we must recognize that space station Freedom is a source of inspiration for our young people. If this country is serious about its pursuit of math and science education as well as engineering, we cannot responsibly cut a program that is representative of successes in all of these educational fields. This would in effect renege on our commitment to excellence and to the students of today and the future.

There is no doubt that this country is undergoing a difficult economic period. Efforts are being pursued by Congress to cut spending and reduce the deficit. This is clearly responsible legislation. However, some have viewed our economic state as a signal to raid the NASA budget and attempt to kill space station Freedom. I believe this is a grave mistake. I would like to remind my colleagues that our space program is yielding a 9-to-1 return on our investment. What we will get from space station Freedom is a diverse group of products, materials, and knowledge that will be important to our future economic stability.

Space Station Freedom is a vital foundation of our manned space program. It is the largest international cooperative endeavor in science and technology in the entire world. Our continued leadership is vital not only to our technological edge, but also to our commitment to improving the planet. My colleagues, let us not jeopardize our future space program by casting a vote to cut space station Freedom. Rather, let us prove that we are concerned about the future of our children and their children and get this important program off the ground.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. LAGOMARSINO].

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 4364, the NASA authorization bill, and in opposition to amendments to gut the space station Freedom.

Mr. Chairman, the NASA authorization bill before us today is a carefully balanced package, reflecting both present fiscal realities and future national economic and security needs.

The aerospace industry employs an estimated 250,000 workers in southern California, including many in my district in Santa Barbara and San Luis Obispo Counties. NASA programs and projects provide the basic foundation of research and development underlying the aerospace industry in California and the Nation.

As a result of the decline in defense spending, we have lost an estimated 60,000 aerospace-related jobs in southern California in the past 2 years. More cuts are anticipated.

These workers pay taxes and buy homes, cars, groceries, and other goods and services in their local communities. Equally important, they possess critical experience, education and technical skills which have served this country well in the past and will be needed again in the future. They are a national asset.

But the NASA authorization bill is not a job-creation program, although that may be a fortuitous secondary effect of its passage. It is a multiyear authorization for the Nation's civilian space and aeronautics programs, facilitating everything from basic scientific research to sophisticated technical applications—and authorizing programs as diverse as the space shuttle transportation system, space station Freedom, the national aerospace plane, the Earth observing system, and a raft of planetary and other space exploration programs.

NASA is both a source of national pride and an essential instrument of U.S. technological progress. It is our passport to the world markets of the 21st century. It helped us win the cold war, and now it will help us translate that victory into economic success in the future.

Clearly, in today's uncertain world, we need to maintain a strong national defense capability. Just as clearly, we need to look to our civilian and commercial aerospace sectors if we are to maintain our position as a leader in world markets. This bill will help with commercialization of space.

Space station Freedom is a multinational effort led by the United States—in concert with our allies in North America, Europe, and Asia—to assess and develop the unique scientific and commercial advantages of low-Earth orbit for the United States and for the world.

It is also the next logical step in our continued exploration of our nearest neighbors in the solar system—the Moon and Mars. President Bush has called upon us to undertake the lunar and Martian missions, just as President Kennedy called upon the Nation during the 1960's to undertake the Apollo Moon Program. It is the space goal of the next generation.

Just as our previous space programs led to unexpected medical, scientific, and commercial dividends, space station Freedom is certain to lead to as yet unknown discoveries benefiting our Nation and humankind.

Just as photos of the Earth from the Apollo spacecraft galvanized our concept of ourselves as one human race sharing one planet, so space station Freedom could be the unifying instrument leading to a cooperative world effort to preserve the ecosystems of this planet.

Mission to planet Earth, or the Earth observing system, as it is called in this bill, addresses this need even more directly, by providing a way to measure the current and future state of the atmospheric, oceanic, and terrestrial systems which make life on this planet possible.

The Earth observing system, which will be launched from Vandenberg Air Force Base in northern Santa Barbara County, will provide scientists with a whole-Earth view of these crucial systems from polar orbit. Space station Freedom will supplement that data with direct human observation of more limited areas of the Earth.

Together, they hold the hope for solving problems like global warming, ozone-layer depletion, deforestation, and global toxic pollution.

Mr. Chairman, we owe it to ourselves and to our children to take these steps to ensure the future integrity of these critical natural systems, which support all human life on Earth. To turn away from that task would be a betrayal of our responsibility and our destiny. I urge my colleagues to do the right thing, and approve this bill in its entirety.

Mr. HALL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CRAMER].

Mr. CRAMER. Mr. Chairman, I want to say in echoing the sentiments of the committee here that I have appreciated the work of Chairman HALL and Chairman BROWN. This has been a tough issue for our committee, particularly this year.

But, of course, I rise in strong support of the 1993 NASA authorization bill. The bill fully funds our civil space program, while recognizing the severe budgetary constraints we are facing.

The space program is vital to U.S. technological competitiveness. The exploration and scientific initiatives contained in this authorization will help ensure this Nation's competitiveness into the 21st century.

The bill contains an excellent balance between the manned program and space science. It increases the percentage of the NASA budget devoted to science. A robust shuttle program, space station Freedom, physics and astronomy missions, life sciences, planetary exploration, and mission to planet Earth are all authorized in this bill.

NASA continues to support science, mathematics, and engineering education. Our bill fully funds this effort, including the Centers for the Commercial Development of Space at 17 colleges and universities around the country.

Space station Freedom is fully funded in this bill. The space station is the centerpiece of our manned space effort. It will provide a research facility in space that is unparalleled. The station is vital to achieving the goal of insuring U.S. competitiveness in the 21st century and in America's continued leadership in space.

I urge my colleagues to support the 1993 NASA authorization bill that contains full funding for space station Freedom.

Mr. HALL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. BACCHUS].

Mr. BACCHUS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of this bill, of the space program and of space station Freedom.

Mr. Chairman, last month we learned for the first time that there is a hole in the ozone layer over North America. This frightening hole in the earth's atmosphere threatens the future of every American. How did we discover this alarming development? With a satellite launched from a space shuttle by NASA.

Last week we saw the beginning of time, we saw for the first time hard evidence of the Big Bang that created the universe. We saw the fingerprints of God. How did we obtain this evidence? With the space exploration probe launched by NASA.

Mr. Chairman, last Saturday I was in Titusville at the Parish Medical Center. I was there observing an operation in the operating room. Two doctors were operating on an 18-year-old girl who had an ovarian cyst. They used a technique called laparoscopy. They were able to destroy that cyst without even opening that young woman's belly, and they were able to send her home the next day when a decade ago she would have had to stay in the hospital for 2 weeks and would have had a lifelong scar across her belly. Mr. Chairman, that doctor, Dr. Zambos, told me that the techniques he used were invented by the space program and were a direct benefit of our investment in space, one of countless benefits we have derived from space.

Mr. Chairman, last Sunday night I was at home with my family. My baby daughter is teething again, so I was up late with my wife and my baby daughter, and I was reading. I was reading Plutarch. I was reading about the first century B.C. and succession of dictators who tried to rule Rome. At one point Plutarch made a wry observation that I think is appropriate today, Mr. Chairman. He said that having given up all hope of freedom, the Roman people hoped only for a milder form of slavery.

Mr. Chairman, this vote today is about freedom and our hopes for freedom in the future. Who knows what additional discoveries await in the future. Who knows what wondrous benefits will derive from our space program and from space station Freedom for ourselves, for our children, our future, for our dreams, for our destiny, for our freedom.

An investment in the space program and in space station Freedom is one of the best investments we can possibly make.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 1 minute for the purpose of engaging in a colloquy with the chairman of the full committee [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. Chairman, I would like to clarify that the $312 million authorized in this bill for space research and technology assumes funding for the funding of the SP-100 program at the requested level of $10 million for fiscal year 1993. Is that accurate?

□ 1630

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman, yes, the gentleman is correct that the committee has neither assumed nor specified any reductions in the SP-100 program.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. HALL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes, the remainder of my time, to the gentleman from California [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman, I have not heard a single person stand up here today and oppose this bill, and I, therefore, do not want to belabor the importance of passing it.

I think our major problem will be on the amendment having to do with the space station, and I recognize from prior debates that this is a target. I think it is a wrong target, but it is, nevertheless, a target.

Earlier today during 1-minute, I took advantage of the opportunity to mention that we have a new Administrator of NASA, Mr. Dan Goldin, who last night made an extremely eloquent speech which I put in the extensions of remarks earlier today.

But in his speech last night, he made some brief remarks about the space station, and I want to quote him at this point so that the Members will understand how the new Administrator feels about NASA. If the Members will read his full speech, I think they will be very pleased at the attitudes he is expressing about the needs for change in NASA. Mr. Goldin said last night.

The primary purpose of space station Freedom is to be the premier outpost in humankind's effort to learn how to live and work in space. The time our astronauts have spent in space is but the blink of an eye, a tiny fraction of what we will need to know to start a permanent presence off good old terra firma. How will the body take the stress of zero g. of prolonged hazardous radiation, of long stretches of isolation in cramped quarters? How do we assemble hardware, dock, and rendezvous, and what about how dexterity will be affected after long periods of zero or partial g? Will astronauts have the strength and agility to respond in life-threatening situations when a rescue is in progress? All this must be learned before we can ever go back to the Moon or go to Mars, and the only place to learn is the space station.

I think that this is a very good statement of why we want to go into space. It is not just a jobs program.

It is not just a scientific experiment, although there is a lot more science to this space station program than it is given credit for. It is an indispensable step if man is to learn how to survive in space, and to attempt to strike that program after, as other speakers have indicated, we have invested as much as $7 billion, and our allies have invested comparable amounts would be the worst form of misjudgment, the worst form of misuse of the taxpayers' dollars.

Mr. Chairman, I can only say in conclusion that I hope that we will be able to defeat this amendment and proceed with what we all know to be one of the foremost programs illuminating America's leadership in the world today.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 1 minute.

Mr. Chairman, I would simply like to reiterate a point made by the gentleman from California on the Administrator's support for space station.

He appeared today before the Republican whip organization and said many of the same things that the chairman has just repeated.

It is clear that this new Administrator at NASA wants to make some fundamental changes in that agency, but he does recognize that within those fundamental changes there is a need for the core program, namely, things like the space station. He said quite clearly that there was a need for us to learn about how human beings function in weightlessness over long periods of time, that that was essential to any kind of long-term program, and beyond that, the idealism of America is expressed in the space station; the ability to probe new frontiers is absolutely expressed in what we do on space station. The chairman is absolutely right, the new NASA Administrator is on record as being in full support of the space station efforts.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ZIMMER] for the purposes of a colloquy.

Mr. ZIMMER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, I am including in the RECORD the text of my amendment and a written statement of its purpose.

Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment and of my bill, H.R. 4447, is simple. It would eliminate the requirement that now exists for NASA to obtain a license to go shopping for civil space technology in the former Soviet Union. My bill has already helped change the position of the State Department from a presumption of denial to a presumption of approval for these licenses.

I appreciate the strong support for this concept from the chairman of the full committee, the gentleman from California [Mr. BROWN], the ranking Republican, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER], as well as the chairman and the ranking Republican of the Space Subcommittee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HALL], and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SENBRENNER].

Mr. Chairman, this amendment was unanimously approved by the Subcommittee on Space when it was recently considered as a separate bill. Among the bill's cosponsors are the chairman of the Science, Space, and Technology Committee, the chairman and ranking Republican of the Space Subcommittee, and several other members of the subcommittee.

This amendment will make it easier for the United States to acquire space hardware, technology, and services from the former Soviet Union. It will eliminate the requirement that NASA obtain a license from the State Department in order merely to discuss the transfer of Soviet technology and hardware to the United States. Such restrictions were prudent when the Soviet Union was our adversary, but they are now obstacles to efforts that would encourage its successor republics to develop market-based economies.

My amendment also directs the Department of Commerce to conduct a trade mission so we can become more familiar with opportunities that exist for the United States aerospace industry to benefit from hardware, technology, and services developed by the Soviet Civil Space Program. The bill calls upon the Department of Commerce to establish a central information clearinghouse and to monitor negotiations so we can promote our aerospace industry and monitor any anticompetitive behavior on the part of the republics.

This is one small step toward developing a new relationship with the former Soviet Union—a relationship based on something other than animosity or charity. I am sure that we will be seeing more comprehensive bills on this matter from the Foreign Affairs Committee before long, but we must not lose the opportunity to act now. Space technology is perhaps the best area for scientific, economic, and political cooperation between our Nation and the former Soviet Union.

The former Soviet Union is in the process of redefining itself, and America has a choice to make. Either we can engage the former Soviet Republics and help them to rebuild, as we did with Germany after the Second World War, or we can ignore them. We can either incorporate the gains made by Soviet scientists during the cold war into our own high technology endeavors, or we can ignore this opportunity and allow their scientific know-how to benefit only our adversaries and our competitors.

So far the State Department has been dragging its feet. To a large extent, NASA has been blocked from even discussing the possible acquisition of many of the items that our Nation should be trying vigorously to incorporate into our civil space and aeronautics programs.

By incorporating the Soviet's achievements into our space effort, we can avoid the enormous cost of reinventing technology already developed by our former adversaries. We can also begin to think about integrating the space programs of the former Soviet Republics with the efforts being made by the rest of the world. The new nations of that region have tremendous resources and experience which—if combined with other ongoing exploration and research efforts—will yield dramatic results in ways we are only now beginning to contemplate.

The Soviets have excelled in some key areas such as welding techniques and propulsion systems. They have the world's only operating space station, the largest and most powerful rocket, and a highly sophisticated automated docking system.

Gaining access to Soviet technology could allow the United States to achieve its space objectives more quickly and for less money. By allowing aerospace industry to tool up rapidly for the manufacture of products based on the best of both American and Soviet technology, we can put Americans back to work.

This amendment gives the American taxpayer an opportunity to get something tangible and valuable in return for the large amount of American aid going to the former Soviet Union.

The text of the amendment follows:

TITLE IV—SPACE TRADE AND COOPERATION WITH FORMER SOVIET REPUBLICS

SEC. 401. FINDINGS.

The Congress finds that—

(1) the dissolution of the political system of the former Soviet Union provides a unique, historic opportunity for the United States to achieve world peace and stability while incorporating the significant potential of the former Soviet Union to contribute to mankind's quality of life through science and technology;

(2) failure to take advantage of the opportunities presented by recent developments in the former Soviet Union could threaten United States national security anew, jeopardize the desirable migration of world capital to nonmilitary enterprises, and preclude technological advancements of common interest to humanity;

(3) the democratization of the former Soviet republics is more likely to succeed and become self-sustaining through economic trade relationships than by financial assistance alone;

(4) the desired conversion of former Soviet military and quasi-military assets, industries, and research facilities is furthered by openness in scientific collaboration, economic trade, and redeployment of capital resources; and

(5) because space trade and cooperation offer both the United States and former Soviet republics significant nonmilitary industrial growth opportunities, space trade and cooperation represent perhaps the best opportunity to encourage the transition to a market-based economy in the former Soviet republics.

SEC. 402. PURPOSE.

The purpose of this title is to authorize space trade and cooperation that—

(1) contributes to achieving the United States goals of continued democratization and economic rehabilitation of former Soviet republics;

(2) assists with the demilitarization of former Soviet society and inhibits proliferation of military assets and technologies;

(3) encourages the reallocation of former Soviet capital resources toward market-oriented investment;

(4) relies on principles of commerce and comparative advantage whereby the benefits of an efficient space market are realized everywhere; and

(5) enables the United States aerospace industry, and those citizens dependent upon it for employment, to utilize new technologies acquired from former Soviet republics to create American products and American jobs.

SEC. 403. REMOVAL OF IMPEDIMENTS TO NEGOTIATE PURCHASES OF SPACE HARDWARE, TECHNOLOGY, AND SERVICES FROM FORMER SOVIET REPUBLICS.

(a) AUTHORITY TO UNDERTAKE NEGOTIATIONS.—Subject to subsection (e), representatives of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration are authorized to undertake the negotiations described in subsection (b).

(b) NEGOTIATIONS FOR ACQUISITION OF FORMER SOVIET SPACE HARDWARE, TECHNOLOGY, AND SERVICES.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—The negotiations referred to in this section are negotiations by the representatives of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration with representatives of former Soviet republics (including representatives of former Soviet scientific production associations, research institutes, and design bureaus) regarding the technical evaluation and the acquisition by the United States of space hardware, space technology, and space services for integration into United States space projects that have been authorized by the Congress. The emphasis in such negotiations shall be to enable United States industry to undertake the acquisition (under terms the United States deems favorable) of prototype hardware, technologies, and services for carrying out space projects authorized by the Congress.

(2) EXAMPLES OF SUBJECTS OF NEGOTIATION.—The negotiations pursuant to this section may include negotiations regarding the technical characteristics and acquisition of space hardware, space technology, and space services such as spacecraft automated rendezvous and docking systems, metallurgy and welding technologies, manned spacecraft, heavy-lift launch vehicles and launch systems, space station modules and components, extravehicular mobility units (commonly referred to as "spacesuits"), propulsion systems including the RD-series engines, reaction control systems, and hypersonic technology.

(c) EXEMPTION FROM CERTAIN PROCEDURAL REQUIREMENTS.—Subject to subsections (d) and (e), any requirement for approval by another agency or for interagency review that is established under section 38 of the Arms Export Control Act or under any other Act with respect to exports of technical data shall not apply with respect to disclosures of such data by representatives of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration during negotiations described in subsection (b).

This subsection does not apply with respect to classified technical data regarding the specifications or capabilities of United States hardware or technology used or to be used in United States space projects.

(d) NOTICE OF AND REPORTS ON NEGOTIATIONS.—

(1) PRIOR NOTICE OF NEGOTIATIONS.—Subsection (c) applies to negotiations described in subsection (b) to the extent that the Administrator submits to—

(A) the agency or interagency group whose approval or review would otherwise be required,

(B) the Office of Space Commerce, and
(C) the congressional space committees, notification of the types of former Soviet space hardware, space technology, and space services that will be subjects of technical evaluation or acquisition negotiations pursuant to this section.

(2) PROGRESS REPORTS ON NEGOTIATIONS.—The Administrator shall report to the agency or interagency group referred to in paragraph (1)(A), to the Office of Space Commerce, and to the congressional space committees with regard to technical evaluations or acquisition negotiations conducted pursuant to this section.

(3) INFORMATION TO BE PROVIDED TO CONGRESS.—The information provided to the congressional space committees pursuant to this subsection shall include the information specified in subparagraphs (A) through (C) of subsection (f)(2) to the extent possible.

(e) TERMINATION OF NEGOTIATIONS BY THE PRESIDENT.—Subsections (a) and (c) shall not apply to the extent that the President—

(1) determines that negotiations pursuant to this section are not in the national security interests of the United States; and

(2) reports that determination to the Congress.

(f) LIMITATIONS ON ACQUISITIONS.—

(1) PRESIDENT'S APPROVAL.—The National Aeronautics and Space Administration or a National Aeronautics and Space Administration contractor may enter into a contract or other agreement for the acquisition of former Soviet space hardware, space technology, or space services pursuant to negotiations under this section only if such acquisition is approved by the President.

(2) NOTICE TO CONGRESS.—During the period beginning on the date of enactment of this title and ending on September 30, 1993, a contract or other agreement described in paragraph (1) may be entered into only if, at least 30 days before approval is granted by the President pursuant to paragraph (1), the Administrator submits to the congressional space committees a written report that includes—

(A) a detailed description of the space hardware, space technology, or space services to be acquired, including the quantity;

(B) a description of the terms and conditions governing such acquisition; and

(C)(i) in the case of an acquisition contract or other agreement to be entered into by the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, an identification of the program account that will be used by the National Aeronautics and Space Administration for such acquisition, or

(ii) in the case of an acquisition contract or other agreement to be entered into by a National Aeronautics and Space Administration contractor, an identification of the program account that will be used by the National Aeronautics and Space Administration for the contract payments that relate to the contractor's performance under the contract that involves utilization of the space hardware, space technology, or space services to be acquired from a former Soviet republic.

(g) REPORT TO CONGRESS.—Within one year after the date of enactment of this title, the Administrator shall prepare, in cooperation with the Secretary of Defense and the Secretary of State, and shall submit to the congressional space committees a report describing—

(1) the acquisition approach taken by the National Aeronautics and Space Administration and representatives of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration in carrying out this section;

(2) specific space hardware, space technology, and space services that have been, or could be, the subject of technical evaluation or acquisition negotiations pursuant to this section;

(3) any acquisition of space hardware, space technology, or space services that have been or could be carried out pursuant to this section in a manner that assists in the conversion of former Soviet military investments (such as hardware, facilities, and industries) to commercial research, development, and production.

SEC. 404. ACTIVITIES OF THE OFFICE OF SPACE COMMERCE.

(a) TRADE MISSIONS.—The Office of Space Commerce is authorized and encouraged to conduct one or more trade missions to appropriate former Soviet republics for the purpose of familiarizing United States aerospace industry representatives with the former Soviet space hardware, space technologies, and space services, and with the business practices and overall business climate of those republics.

(b) CENTRAL INFORMATION CLEARINGHOUSE.—The Office of Space Commerce, drawing upon all appropriate resources of the Department of Commerce, shall establish a central information clearinghouse to provide United States aerospace firms comprehensive information on former Soviet space hardware, space technology, and space services potentially available, consequent trade opportunities, applicable regulations, and other data relevant to the conduct of space-related trade under this title. In carrying out this subsection, the Office shall draw upon the expertise and knowledge of the Department of Defense, the Department of Energy, the Department of State, the Department of Transportation, and the National Aeronautics and Space Administration.

(c) MONITORING NEGOTIATIONS.—The Office of Space Commerce shall monitor the progress of negotiations provided for in section 403 and shall advise the Administrator as to the impact of each potential transaction on United States industry, specifically including any anticompetitive issues it may observe.

(d) REPORT TO CONGRESS.—Within one year after the date of enactment of this title, the Secretary of Commerce shall submit to the congressional space committees a report describing—

(1) the opportunities for increased space-related trade with former Soviet republics;

(2) the degree to which such opportunities are in keeping with the purpose of this title;

(3) the trade missions carried out pursuant to this section, including the private participation in and the results of such missions;

(4) any barriers, regulatory or practical, that inhibit space-related trade as provided for in section 403, either in the United States or in former Soviet republics; and

(5) any anticompetitive issues raised during the course of negotiations, as observed pursuant to subsection (c) of this section.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIMMER. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman, I see that the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL], has joined us. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL] is aware of the bill offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ZIMMER] which could come before the House as an amendment to the NASA bill now before us.

I strongly support the aims of the Zimmer amendment to facilitate NASA's efforts to evaluate the space products of the former Soviet Union for potential benefit to the U.S. space program. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ZIMMER] has drawn attention to this important opportunity.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIMMER. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I understand that H.R. 4364 would have an important and salutary effect on our foreign policy towards the former Soviet Union, and he, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ZIMMER], is addressing a major opportunity to help promote postcold war stability within the former Soviet Union and to improve bilateral cooperation on science and technology issues.

The intent of the bill offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ZIM-

MER] represents the approach that is needed, in my opinion, to lead NASA and the entire technology community into the postcold war era, and the Committee on Foreign Affairs will consider the space trade issue as an important part of our forthcoming legislation which will forcefully address the gentleman's concerns.

Mr. ZIMMER. I wish to thank the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs for his comments in support of my bill.

I had intended to offer it today as an amendment, but with the assurance of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL] that he will incorporate its intent, I will not offer it today.

Mr. FASCELL. I appreciate the gentleman's cooperation. The gentleman has my word that the space trade will be vigorously pursued and taken into account, and his expectations for progress in this area will have our full cooperation and concern.

Mr. ZIMMER. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. WHITTEN, Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 4364 which authorizes the Advanced Solid Rocket Motor Program. We should continue this important program which is vital to the national space program and northeast Mississippi.

That program was initiated on the recommendation of the Presidential Commission on the space shuttle Challenger accident and NASA in order to improve space shuttle safety and reliability and to increase the shuttle payload by 30 percent—12,000 pounds.

NASA selected the Yellow Creek, MS, site because of its location on the Tennessee-Tombigbee waterway and, because of roads and utilities already in place, it would save $100 million and advance first motor delivery by a full year.

Mr. Chairman, those requirements are still needed for the safe operation of the shuttle program. In addition, the Air Force/NASA baseline planning includes the advanced solid rocket motor for the Heavy Launch Lift Vehicle Program. In view of those needs it is not reasonable or responsible to discontinue the program—to do so would be shortsighted and unsound.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of H.R. 4364, the NASA authorization bill before us today.

I want especially to commend Chairmen BROWN and HALL and ranking minority members Mr. WALKER and Mr. SENSENBRENNER who have crafted a bipartisan compromise which addresses the difficult issue of setting priorities in tough budgetary times. I also want to commend Mr. NORM MINETA, a member of the subcommittee and the full committee and a strong advocate of our Nation's science, technology, and space programs, for his role in crafting this legislation. While the decisions made by the committee have not been easy, I am pleased that the committee product maintains a strong commitment to the space program within the limits set by today's fiscal climate.

The bill before us today authorizes funding for a number of vitally important programs which are major components of our national research and development program. The bill will lead to major advances in science and technology and will vitally impact our domestic economy.

Achievement in space sets the United States apart from other nations with greater distinction than almost any other endeavor. Indeed, our space program has become the very symbol of American ingenuity, daring, and innovation. It has been more than two decades since Americans walked on the moon, and no other nation today is even remotely close to duplicating that feat.

This year NASA will begin producing flight hardware for space station Freedom—elements of the station itself. The United States is on the very threshold of entering an exciting, challenging new era of space exploration and research.

While funding for space station Freedom is the cornerstone of the overall space program, it is important to note that the space station budget has been planned to ensure balance with the rest of the Federal science budget and to provide opportunities for low cost, high payoff small science projects.

The space station is the largest internationally cooperative scientific effort in which the United States has ever engaged. It will provide a national laboratory in space, promote inventions and discovery that cannot be duplicated on Earth. Space station Freedom also holds the hope of medical advances leading to more effective methods of treating and perhaps curing some of the most threatening diseases of our time.

Yes, we have social and economic problems all around us with fewer and fewer resources to address them. But we also must recognize the importance of investing in our future. For our children and grandchildren, and subsequent generations of Americans to prosper, they will require new ideas, new knowledge, new technology, new products, new jobs, and new worlds to conquer.

I urge my colleagues to continue to support our Nation's space program as envisioned by the committee and vote for this important bill as reported.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, people say that the NASA authorization provides jobs. They are right—the space station Freedom program alone supports nearly 75,000 jobs. The economies of Florida and the Nation benefit from these jobs.

I personally share the vision embodied in the U.S. space program—a vision that changes with the times and continues to guide us to our future. Thirty years ago, when President Kennedy announced his ambitious space exploration program for exploration of space, the key motivating factor was the cold war reality of the arms race. Our "friendly" competition with the Soviets in this endeavor did not mask completely the undercurrent of apprehension.

Today we enjoy the preeminent position in space exploration. Our incentive is no longer military competition, but the prospect of great economic benefit and advancement in the realm of human knowledge and understanding. Our investigation of the universe holds great promise not only for pure science, but for practical advances in areas such as health care, manufacturing, and agriculture.

On a more parochial note, funding for NASA is important to my constituency and my home State of Florida. We are proud of the work done by the space agency in our State, and of the men and women who are responsible for wonders such as the space shuttle.

Besides ensuring that our leadership of space exploration continues into the next century, programs like the space station and the Earth observing system are an investment. In the short term this investment will provide jobs and manufacturing opportunities. In the long term, utilization of the unique energy and material resources available in space will provide even greater economic rewards.

However, with this authorization as with all matters that come before this House, I must ask the questions, "How much does it cost?" and "Who pays?" These questions are not directed solely at the space program and NASA, but need to be asked of every piece of legislation which involves public funds. Our employers, the taxpayers of the Nation, are tired of Congress' insatiable and profligate spending habits.

I do not believe that this authorization is an example of irresponsible spending; I would like very much to be in a position to vote for it. But at the moment I must question if we can afford to spend $47.3 billion over the next 3 years given the truly terrifying size of the budget deficit—an estimated $400 billion for fiscal year 1993. To use a visual example of the galactic proportions of this deficit, if you were to stitch 400 billion dollar bills end to end, they would stretch 38.5 million miles, a distance greater than that between the orbits of Earth and Venus.

What I want to see, what the people of my southwest Florida district demand, is less waste and overall reform of the spending process. Our purpose as a body is the passage of laws—in effect charging the citizens of this country to act responsibly; how ironic that we do not require the same responsibility from ourselves. Until we do; until there is real reform of the way we spend the money entrusted to us, I find myself in the unfortunate position of having to put worthwhile but costly programs such as this in competition with other priorities. Given the priorities of balancing our budget, reducing the national debt, and meeting the costs of national defense and entitlement programs, there just isn't enough money to do everything.

Mr. MINETA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the NASA Multiyear Authorization Act of 1992.

I would like to congratulate Chairman BROWN, Chairman HALL, Mr. WALKER, and Mr. SENSENBRENNER, for their leadership and hard work on this landmark legislation.

This is the first time the Science, Space, and Technology Committee has drafted a bill that clearly establishes core programs for NASA and separates these from the special initiatives that are not critical to NASA's primary mission.

I have always been a strong supporter of the American space program. No matter where our efforts are focused—toward Earth, toward our solar system, or toward the universe beyond—I believe that the ultimate goals of the space program must be to improve the human condition.

To me, that means having national goals that support our resolve with serious priorities tempered only by our limited financial resources, and common sense.

I believe that the NASA Multiyear Authorization Act of 1992 does all of this in its emphasis on space station Freedom, a cornerstone of America's future in outer space.

Today, our world is at a crossroads.

We've made many sacrifices here in the United States during the last several decades, as we fought the cold war.

The United States and the cause of freedom won that war.

But now, America faces the challenge of being accountable to our legitimate expectations in this new age of peace.

Historically, developments in the defense and space industries led to spinoffs that ensured our technological and commercial superiority.

Commercial technology policy came by default, not by design.

That day has come and gone.

In today's world, economic success requires direct investment in research and development, direct investment in education and infrastructure, and direct investment in the technologies that are the keys to the future.

During the last 30 years, space exploration has served as a vehicle for investment in technology.

It is no coincidence that the growth and expansion of our Nation's high-technology industries have paralleled the years of NASA's greatest activity and accomplishment.

Mr. Chairman, as a senior member of the Science, Space, and Technology Committee, it has been my privilege for many years to work with NASA and help shape our Nation's space program.

As a member of that committee I have had the opportunity to evaluate the role of space station Freedom to our Nation's future.

Mr. Chairman, I am convinced that space station Freedom is a necessary building block to our future goals in space, which include continued manned exploration of space and eventually, a permanent manned presence in space.

Unfortunately, too many people fail to recognize the implications of space station Freedom in our economic competition with Europe, Japan, and others in the years ahead.

Make no mistake. This is not a debate about hardware. This debate is about where this Nation will go and what it will do with the resource of outer space.

I believe that we cannot be content to abandon the centerpiece of our future space program and then watch as other nations look to overtake us.

A complete space program is essential to our future—not a luxury we can do without.

We need space station Freedom to serve as an international laboratory in space for biotechnology and life-sciences research, improved medicines, and manufacturing.

And at a time when the United States is making the transition from defense to civil and commercial markets, the space station program alone accounts for more than 75,000 jobs in 39 states.

In short, the space station is good for science, good for our economy, good for international relations, and essential for the United States.

Mr. VALENTINE. Mr. Chairman, I rise to give strong support for the authorizations for aeronautical research and technology and transatmospheric research and technology in H.R. 4364. As chairman of the Technology and Competitiveness Subcommittee, I recognize that in aeronautics it has been proven time and again that technology and competitiveness are synonymous.

Our success with aeronautics as our leading international favorable balance of trade industry requires an adequate research and development funding policy since other industrial nations are gearing up to topple our leadership. The NASA aeronautical research and technology authorization of $890,200,000 is essential to assure this unique superiority through the turn of the century.

This authorization supports six important objectives: High leverage competitive technologies, critical environmental problems including those of the high speed civil transport, technology for revolutionary high performance aircraft, advanced support of X-30 derivative aircraft, further development of computational tools, and the operational maintenance of the NASA unique world class aeronautical laboratory complex. All are critical to meeting our domestic needs and the international challenge.

And what of the long-term future? The marketplace and the industrial muscle of the 21st century are going to belong to the nations who demonstrate aggressive research today. Today's research and development leaders will be the nations that are tomorrow's top industrial producers.

The National Aerospace Plan Program is an example of this necessary aggressive research that has already achieved breakthroughs in materials technology. Few peace oriented programs of memory have created the international attention, in their field, as has the NASP. Its benefits are not obscure to our competitors.

The jobs, industry, and international leadership are all at stake in the aerospace and transportation industries. Furthermore, improving the economics and benefits of Earth orbital systems are what we strive for through NASP technology and derivative aircraft. To deny future generations these foundations would be penny wise foolishness.

We have held the line in authorizing $80,000,000 as NASA's share of the national program. Some would like more. More would not be difficult to justify. Any less risks forfeiting our aerospace leadership for 21st century America.

Whatever the arguments about aeronautical and NASP funding, they must yield to duty to the future of aeronautics that we have postponed too long. I do not want to be party to the regrets of future generations. I urge, without reservation, authorization of the aeronautics and NASP Program as proposed in H.R. 4364.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to the rule, the amendment in the nature of a substitute now printed in the reported bill will be considered by titles as an original bill for the purpose of amendment and each title is considered as read.

The Clerk will designate section 1.

The text of section 1 is as follows:

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "National Aeronautics and Space Administration Multiyear Authorization Act of 1992".

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent, and I believe this has been agreed to on both sides, that I be permitted to take up my amendment out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. SCHUMER

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SCHUMER: Page 36, after line 20, insert the following new title:

TITLE IV—HIGH RISK RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT CONTRACT ADMINISTRATION

SEC. 401. FINDINGS.

(1) some leading edge research and development projects which are in the public interest to conduct have a significant chance of not achieving their desired goals due to the inherent risks in the nature of the research and development project being attempted;

(2) Federal Government-wide procurement regulations require, in such high risk research and development projects, that the National Aeronautics and Space Administration reimburse the contractor for the costs of correcting or replacing articles even when the articles are defective in materials and workmanship, or otherwise fail to conform to the contract requirements, and where the defect or failure has been within the control of the contractor;

(3) the National Aeronautics and Space Administration's procurement policies are based on the reasonable assumption that contractors would not conduct some desirable high-risk research and development projects unless the National Aeronautics and Space Administration assumes the risk for the failure of the research and development project;

(4) such procurement policies are further based on the assumption that it is significantly less expensive for the National Aeronautics and Space Administration to assume the risk of failure of high-risk research and development projects than to require the contractors to assume such risks;

(5) such procurement policies should be limited to use in true leading edge research and development contracts, where successful results are uncertain at the outset and should not apply to those aspects of such contracts where defects in materials and workmanship, or other failures to conform to contract requirements, were within the control of the contractor;

(6) a shared allocation of risk based on a competitive procurement process for research and development contracts may result in an overall cost savings to the National Aeronautics and Space Administration; and

(7) it would be beneficial to reexamine the effect of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration's procurement policies on the cost of conducting its research and development projects.

SEC. 402. ACQUISITION POLICY ASSESSMENT.

(a) ASSESSMENT.—Within 180 days after the date of enactment of this Act, the Administrator, in coordination as necessary with the Office of Federal Procurement Policy and the Federal Acquisition Regulation Council, shall carry out an assessment of the allocation of risk between the Government and its contractors for future research and development contracts in order to identify options for increasing the contractor's allocation of risk for defects in materials and workmanship or other failures to conform to contract requirements. The National Aeronautics and Space Administration is encouraged to test those options identified.

(b) CONTENTS.—In carrying out the assessment in subsection (a), the Administrator shall consider—

(1) technical uncertainty, market dynamics, and equity to both the Government and the contractor community;

(2) the use of positive fee incentives reflecting the level of cost, schedule, and performance risk accepted by the contractor;

(3) the use of negative fee incentives, including provisions for less than full cost recovery for work determined to be defective in materials or workmanship or which otherwise fail to conform to contract requirements;

(4) the appropriate use of rollovers;

(5) the appropriate use of retroactive award fee adjustments;

(6) the appropriate use of value engineering;

(7) the use of warranties to ensure that the end product or a specified sub-product of a contract meets the performance requirements of a contract; and

(8) the recovery of costs for the replacement or correction of articles which are defective in materials or workmanship, or which otherwise fail to conform to contract requirements.

SEC. 403. PROMULGATION OF REGULATIONS.

Within twelve months after the date of enactment of this Act, the Administrator, in coordination as necessary with the Office of Federal Procurement Policy and the Federal Acquisition Regulation Council, shall develop regulations for the administration of research and development contracts which propose specific changes to National Aeronautics and Space Administration Procurement Regulations and, as necessary, Federal Acquisition Regulations, in the form of mandatory and optional clauses which—

(1) establish policies and procedures for the use of performance-based contracts, incorporating positive and/or negative fee incentives to the maximum extent practicable; and

(2) establish policies and procedures—
(A) for limiting the use of clauses of the Federal Acquisition Regulations which otherwise obligate the Government to pay for the cost of correction of defects in materials and workmanship and work which otherwise fails to conform to contract requirements, and eliminating the use of such clauses where the defect or failure is within the control of the contractor; and

(B) to provide for less than full recovery for work determined to be defective in materials and workmanship or which otherwise fails to conform to contract requirements.

SEC. 404. REPORT.

Within 180 days after the date of enactment of this Act, the Administrator shall report to the Committee on Science, Space, and Technology of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation of the Senate the progress in implementing this title.

SEC. 405. DEFINITIONS.

For the purpose of this title—

(1) the term "Performance-based contracting" means structuring all aspects of an acquisition around the purpose of the work to be performed as opposed to either the manner by which the work is to be performed or broad statements of work;

(2) the term "Positive fee incentive" means that element of the potential total remuneration that a contractor may receive for contract performance over and above the allowable costs;

(3) the term "Negative fee incentive" means a rebate payable to the National Aeronautics and Space Administration by a contracting party whose deliverable item or service is not in conformance with contract requirements or otherwise deemed to be defective work; and

(4) the term "Rollover" means the act of reallocating any positive fee incentives not earned by a contractor due to less than excellent performance to subsequent opportunities for award available in the contract.

Mr. SCHUMER (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Chairman, I rise today to offer a much-needed and long-overdue amendment to NASA's contracting procedures, to protect taxpayers from ever again being forced to bear the billion-dollar costs of space projects that fail miserably due to contractor negligence.

The amendment has been massaged and fine tuned over a 15-month period, thanks to the work of the chairmen of the Science Committee and the Space Subcommittee, who corequested a GAO study with me and convened several oversight hearings.

Mr. Chairman, I introduced the first version of this amendment, H.R. 672, in January 1991—in response to the Hubble telescope fiasco. The Hubble, of course, was intended to be a state-of-the-art eagle eye in the sky. Instead, we all know what we got—something closer to a stumbling Mr. McGoo.

Although the Hubble has yielded some interesting results, they fall far short of what we would have obtained with a properly constructed telescope. The saddest part of this fiasco is that it could have been completely avoided if the contractor had followed basic scientific procedures—grinding the mirror to the correct radius or doing a simple diagnostic test prior to launch. The most outrageous part of the fiasco, however, is that the contractor, under current NASA rules, bears no financial responsibility for the screw up or for rectifying it.

That's because, incredibly, NASA routinely indemnifies contractors and agrees in advance to pay for remedial work, regardless of whether the failure is due to the contractor's own negligence. H.R. 672 was drafted to redress this problem: by removing indemnity for contractor negligence.

Last year, the House Appropriations Committee incorporated H.R. 672 into the NASA funding bill. However, Chairman TRAXLER and I agreed to withdraw it, after Chairmen BROWN and CONYERS made commitments to help perfect it so the House could address it this year. Last May, Chairman BROWN and I introduced a revised version of the bill, H.R. 2162.

Today's amendment maintains the original intent of the two previous bills, but avoids getting into the legal thicket created by trying to define negligence. Instead, the amendment requires NASA to set up a system of positive and negative financial incentives in future contracts. Excellent work would earn contractors greater profits. But defective work would cost them. And defective work like Hubble, resulting from a contractor's failure to follow sound scientific or engineering procedures, would not only reduce the contractor's profit, but trigger penalty fees that cut into the contractor's reimbursement for costs.

In this way, the amendment would finally give NASA contractors a financial deterrent for screwing up. This deterrent will not eliminate faulty work, but it unquestionably will make it much less common and—most important—guarantee that American taxpayers are never again forced to pay twice to fix something that could—and should—have been built right the first time.

In closing, Mr. Chairman, I again thank the distinguished chairmen and their staffs for their generous assistance in crafting this amendment, and I urge my colleagues to support it.

Mr. HALL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, we think this is a very good amendment and it addresses a longstanding problem that we have been discussing over the past year; that is, how to reallocate the risks between the Government and contractors in research and development contracts. We have held several hearings on this topic. It is extremely complex.

Mr. Chairman, I want to commend the gentleman from New York [Mr. SCHUMER] for taking a very deep and constructive interest in this issue. As a result of the attention that has been given to this issue, the administration is now, I understand, contemplating a regulatory change to transition to a more equitable distribution of risk between the Government and contractors. The amendment would require regulations on an expedited basis and also provide for the use of negative fee incentives. We think this is a very constructive amendment, and we urge its adoption.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALL of Texas. I yield to the chairman, the gentleman from California [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN. I thank the gentleman from Texas for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I want to reaffirm what the chairman of the Subcommittee on Space has said. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SCHUMER] acted very quickly and vigorously in response to the difficulties of the Hubble telescope and the problems with the NASA contracting process. He has been extremely zealous in pursuing the appropriation language to correct that situation. He has been cooperative and perceptive, and we want to commend him for the work that he has done, and we think the product in this amendment is a good product.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the penultimate word.

Mr. Chairman, this is an amendment on which we have worked with the gentleman from New York, and we accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SCHUMER]. The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will designate title I.

The text of title I is as follows:

TITLE I—MULTIYEAR AUTHORIZATION FOR CORE PROGRAMS

SEC. 101. FINDINGS.

Congress finds that—

(1) investments in research and development are directly linked to long-term productivity and economic growth;

(2) as a major driver of advanced technology, the space program can play a major role in the Nation's reinvestment in civilian research and development;

(3) in addition to carrying out the Nation's goals in science and exploration, the space program makes a significant and direct contribution to the national employment base and, through the development of advanced technologies, will contribute to sustaining a healthy employment base and economy in the future;

(4) the long-term health of the United States space program is critically dependent on maintaining a stable and continuously evolving core program of science, space transportation, space exploration, space technology, and space applications;

(5) such a core program must be based on a realistic projection of resources that will be available and should not exceed inflationary growth;

(6) the ending of the Cold War has brought with it the potential to impact adversely the competitive position of the United States by reducing the public's investment in aerospace technology, and the loss of highly skilled aerospace engineers, scientists, and technicians is contrary to the national interest;

(7) the Nation's space program can provide a productive environment for utilizing the skills of scientists and engineers formerly involved in the Nation's defense sector;

(8) civil space activities of the United States, whether made possible by, or in response to, Cold War strategic competition with the Soviet Union, must, in an era of declining political conflict, mature as instruments of United States foreign policy, and grow to support the national interest during the post-Cold War era;

(9) the national interest is furthered by trade and cooperation among friendly nations, and to the extent the former Soviet republics have shown themselves willing and capable of fostering a friendship with the United States, the national interest is furthered through trade and cooperation of mutual advantage between the United States and the former Soviet republics in civil aerospace, space science, and space exploration;

(10) a vigorous and coordinated effort by the United States and other spacefaring nations is needed to minimize the growth of orbital debris, and space activities should be conducted in a manner that minimizes the likelihood of additional orbital debris creation;

(11) the aerospace industry, rooted in aeronautics, is a major positive contributor to United States international influence and competitiveness;

(12) aeronautical research and development sustains our leadership in air transport and military aviation worldwide;

(13) the National Aero-Space Plane is a core technology for any national aerospace policy and will permit the United States to maintain a worldwide competitive posture into the future; and

(14) it is in the Nation's best economic interest to proceed with the National Aero-Space Plane Phase 3 in fiscal year 1994 so that we can direct our continuing investment to the actual building of the NASP/X-30 Research Airplane.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any amendments to title I?

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. ROEMER

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROEMER: Page 5, lines 11 through 21, amend paragraph (1) to read as follows:

(1) For Research and Development and Space Flight, Control, and Data Communications activities, including the Earth Observing System and other activities described in titles I and II, and for termination expenses for the Space Station Freedom, $1,100,000,000 for each of the fiscal years 1993, 1994, and 1995. Within 3 months after the date of the enactment of this Act, the Administrator shall submit to the Congress a report which describes the amount and nature of termination expenses for the Space Station Freedom, including a schedule for such anticipated expenses.

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Chairman, in explaining my amendment, very quickly, what my amendment would do would be to cut the space station, take $1.1 billion that has been asked for, requested for the space station, and put it back into NASA to support many of these worthwhile science projects, research projects, technology drivers, and take the rest, $1.15 billion, and put it toward deficit reduction.

Mr. Chairman, before I get into my explanation for why I am doing this, I would like to thank our very, very distinguished leader, the gentleman from California [Mr. BROWN], the chairman, who has always been very willing to debate these issues. I would like to thank the minority side as well, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER], for his ability to allow us to debate this important issue on the floor.

I would like to salute, in doing battle, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HALL] and two freshmen that I have the utmost respect for, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. BACCHUS] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CRAMER]. There are not two Members with more integrity than those two people. I look forward to working with the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ZIMMER] on this amendment and explaining why I would do it.

Mr. Chairman, there are three reasons for offering this amendment: Good sense, good science, and good government.

Good sense: When this space station was first devised, back in 1984, it was supposed to cost the American taxpayer about $11 billion. Now, Mr. Chairman, we are looking at between $30 and $40 billion to build this, and the General Accounting Office has said that we are looking at maybe $118 billion to maintain it over its 30-year life cycle. My colleagues might say, "Well, that's a lot of money." This is a lot of money to Hoosiers, Mr. Chairman. "What can it do?"

Mr. Chairman, back in 1984, it had about six or seven missions, including a laboratory for space science research in human adoption to space, a laboratory for material science, operations base for assembling space craft, a set of platforms on which to mount sensors, a technology driver, all kinds of things. Now, Mr. Chairman, it can do about one of those missions. So, why are we doing this?

Mr. Chairman, this is a space station in search of a mission. It is lost in space. This is not a good expenditure at this time, with the $400 billion deficit, for us to be spending money on.

Now what about good science, in addition to good sense?

Mr. Chairman, we heard the gentleman from Florida [Mr. BACCHUS] articulately talk about some of the good science programs within the NASA Program, and I just got off the phone with Mr. Golden, and I congratulated him for his new endeavor. But the good science, the Big Bang theory, the satellite that is helping us discover things, the Earth optic system, the advanced x-ray astrophysics facility, CRAF/Cassini; those are the things that are going to get squeezed out by this space station. This is an accordion going one way in this budget, and that is out, taking up the money for many, many good things that will return health care benefits, jobs, and science to our people in this country.

What about good government, Mr. Chairman? I just spent 2 weeks in Indiana. We heard the gentleman from Texas talking about Indiana. The people in my town meetings, Mr. Chairman, are saying, "When are you in Congress going to make some tough decisions? When are people in the Third District of Indiana, and in California, and Tennessee, and Florida, and New Jersey going to make some tough decisions on the budget deficit, on problems that we have here on Earth and not just up in space?"

Mr. Chairman, this is a tough vote. We will hear good arguments on both sides. On our side we have the National Taxpayers Union supporting us with a letter. We have the Friends of Earth supporting us with a letter. We have the National Physical Society supporting us with a letter.

Mr. Chairman, there are also a couple of myths that we will hear that we should discuss. What about our international partners? We have an IGA, an Intergovernmental Agreement, that is built into this agreement with our national partners. Article 27 tells them this may happen in the future. We may find that we do not have the money, that the space station does not meet the requirements.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROEMER] has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. ROEMER was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. ROEMER. So, we have built into our contract a clause that takes this into consideration.

What about the argument that we have spent $7 billion of our taxpayers' money on this and that we need to proceed? Well, Mr. Chairman, we have a saying in Indiana that goes something like this: "When you find yourself in a hole, the first rule is: Quit digging. Don't continue to throw good money after bad." Are we going to spend another $150 billion to throw it after $7 billion?

Mr. Chairman, we are going to hear arguments about jobs. As the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DELAY] argues very articulately, we just dropped, I believe, in 1991 the flight teller robotic servicer. We have dropped a host of missions from this. I do not think that it is the space station that is going to drive our economy, and our jobs, and our health, and our science, as has been said before. Those things are there. The satellite confirming, maybe, the Big Bang theory; it is up there. That is going to get squeezed out if the space station continues to expand taking up more of the budget.

Finally I will conclude because a number of my colleagues want to support and debate this very, very important topic.

Mr. Chairman, let me say that the synthesis group, a group put together by the President made up of the private sector of some of our best scientists, was tasked with the responsibility of saying how we would utilize missions to the Moon and Mars, and in their report they did not mention the space station once as a stepping stone.

Mr. Chairman, this is a tough choice. It is not an easy vote today for Members of this body. But I do not want to be in this Congress in the year 2000 after we have spent $15 billion on this and look at the next 20 years, where we probably spend another $100 billion. Not this space station, Mr. Chairman. Maybe another one. Maybe one that is designed to meet the specifications, that does not cost as much.

I am not against space. I am not against NASA. I am for the new frontier, Mr. Chairman. But this does not expand the new frontier for us, for our technology or for our children.

Let us make some tough choices today, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, as others have indicated earlier, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROEMER] and his coauthors are a very fine, dedicated, capable group of Members who feel that they must strike a blow for deficit reduction and against the further development of big projects that take an inordinate share of the budget. They have chosen to focus on the space station in order to make this kind of a statement. Beyond a shadow of a doubt this amendment reflects the views of a number of Members in the House as reflected in the vote we had last year. There was obviously considerable support for canceling the space station, but an even larger vote for keeping the space station and proceeding to take it to completion.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROEMER] made some statement about the fact that later, in better times, we might come back and rebuild it. We might, but I can assure him that there will already be other space stations up there, and there will not be much impetus for the United States to put one up because Japan and Europe, either separately or together, along with the Russians, and perhaps other nations, will have their own space stations up there. The United States will forever have lost the image of being a world leader in space.

Now there are two other points I want to make, and I think we ought to give them some weight. There is nothing in this amendment that will in any way, shape, or form reduce the deficit. We cannot reduce the deficit in an authorization bill.

What you will do, of course, is to allow the Committee on Appropriations a little greater leeway in the allocation of funds within the separate subcommittees. Those funds will be used, I can assure the gentleman, for very useful purposes, such as enhancing veterans medical care, which is very necessary, or housing for the poor, which is very necessary. But it will not go to reducing the deficit. The Committee on Appropriations will spend up to the budgetary limits, and the action taken here merely reduces the space program. It does not reduce the deficit. I regret that that is the case, but it is.

The additional point, the last point I wish to make, is that most people do not realize the connection between the space station and the other items in title I of this bill.

If you do not have a space station, you really do not need the space shuttle and you really do not need the advanced solid rocket motor which is intended to advance the efficiency of the space shuttle.

In fact, these things all hang together. You might as well say let us scrap the fundamental space program, if you are going to scrap the space station.

I do not think we are ready to do that. I think many of the people who say let us just surgically remove the space station do not realize that much of the basic or core space program is going to go down the tubes. I do not think we want to see that at the present time.

The whole purpose of the way we structured this bill was to allow people to see that we have a core space program which hangs together and has to be supported, that the elements reinforce each other, and in addition we have the programs that we can add on, very important programs, I might say.

The Earth observing system, the enhancements for the space shuttle, and a number of other programs are extremely important, but they can wait. We can restructure them. We are restructuring programs like the Earth observing system, which in its runout costs is as big as the space station. We want to do it, but we do not want to make the mistakes we might have made with the space station by putting all our eggs in one basket. We are going to have several little baskets, or space platforms, for the Earth observing station, and launch them at different times.

Mr. SENSENBRENNER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment and move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to this amendment. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROEMER] has ticked off a number of Indiana values. Let me remind the gentleman of an American value, and that is once you give your word, you keep it.

This amendment breaks the word of the United States of America to the international partners who have committed literally billions of dollars to fund their share of the international space station Freedom. If we unilaterally pull the rug out from underneath the space station, their billions of dollars of investment based upon their faith in America keeping its word will go down the drain.

Mr. Chairman, believe me, it will be a long, long time before any international financial participation will come into any science project as a result of the House of Representatives today unilaterally defunding the space station.

I wish to reiterate the words made by our chairman, the gentleman from California [Mr. BROWN], that voting for this amendment will not reduce the deficit by one cent. What it will do is allow the Committee on Appropriations to use the money that is allegedly saved through the cancellation of the space station for financing other projects within the jurisdiction of the Subcommittee on VA, HUD, and Independent Agencies.

Mr. Chairman, getting back to America giving its word, I received a letter from Jean-Marie Luton, the Director General of the European Space Agency, the agency that has already paid the equivalent of $2 billion of its $8 billion commitment for the space station. I would like to share two paragraphs of that letter with Members.

Mr. Luton says in part:

To the untiring efforts and support of the majority of Members both in the House of Representatives and in the Senate, Congress last year voted to keep funding for the space station. This action was promoted as "the definitive vote" for the program, which reflected the commitment of the U.S. to carry it through to completion in cooperation with its international partners. Europe and the other international partners in this cooperative venture were greatly encouraged by the positive outcome of this process. We in Europe are therefore surprised and concerned that the future of the program is again being called into question in the course of Congressional deliberations on the NASA budget.

While noting the concerns expressed by the critics of the space station project, I would like to point out that the international Space Station Freedom is the subject of intergovernmental agreement involving non-U.S. partners, notably 10 member states from the European Space Agency which have already made substantial investments in this project. Recently the agency's Industrial Policy Committee gave the green light for the placing of contracts with industry on the development of the Columbus manned elements at a time when Europe is faced with constrained budgets for its space programs and debating the future direction of its space cooperation.

Mr. Chairman, that says it better than I could, and that is if this amendment is adopted, a commitment that has been made will be broken, and a broken commitment will not be forgotten around the world. We will lose our preeminent role in science, not only in the space area, but also in other areas as well.

Second, I stand second to none in being opposed to wasteful spending. The National Taxpayers Union rated me tied for first in the entire Congress for votes against spending and votes against raising taxes. But I think the American public wants to see their tax dollars well spent, and this budget and the budget for the space station do provide that well spending of the tax dollars.

I would point out that the space station has passed its preliminary design review and appears to be going along much better than it was last year. A new international partner, Italy, has been added, which is contributing modules for resupply and to house a dedicated life-sciences centrifuge facility.

The space station Freedom has had no cost overruns since its restructuring. The integrated truss system will reduce assembly flights and construction work on orbits. Testing and verification procedures are under control.

Mr. Chairman, the American public is frustrated with Congress, in that Congress can never make up its mind and never stand by a decision that it has made. This is the fourth vote in the full House on space station Freedom. I hope it is the last one, because if we make a decision, we ought to stick by that decision and go ahead. That way we will not lose face with the American taxpayers in terms of how dollars are spent, as well as in terms of the international partners that have spent their own money based upon the agreements that we have made and this Congress has backed up.

Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words and I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the amendment that has been introduced by the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROEMER]. I want to commend the gentleman from Indiana for taking the leadership on this issue.

Mr. Chairman, last year, I voted against the effort to restore funding for the station and I have not changed my view that NASA's fixation on this white elephant will badly damage the agency.

Last year, I said:

Whatever the true costs of the station, they are reflective of a broader debate on the appropriate mix of big versus small scientific projects. The station—a big science project in the worst sense—will squeeze out a variety of small science projects far more valuable to the scientific endeavor, and particularly to the training of the next generation of American scientists.

Indeed, this was the only way we were able to restore station funding last year—by gutting space science programs. This year, what Dr. James Van Allen once called the slaughter of the innocents continues. You will not find funding for the comet rendezvous/asteroid flyby mission in this bill. It is already likely that next year will see the death of the Cassini mission as well. These truly interesting science missions are dying just to keep a dead end alive.

The pressure on the NASA budget can also be seen in that the committee has placed the Earth observing system in title II of this bill—those missions to be funded if the Appropriations Committee allows NASA to exceed a certain level of funding.

The nations of the world are preparing to meet in Rio de Janeiro to address the problems of a changing climate. The President of the United States is reluctant to attend because decisions will be made, he says, in the face of scientific uncertainty. And here, in order to preserve the space station, we delay for another year the centerpiece of our efforts to understand what is happening in the world because we simply do not have the budget to do both. This is priority setting of the worst kind.

The space station remains a jobs program for the aerospace industry, and that is about the sum total of its contribution to America's space program. If Freedom is ever lofted into orbit, its utility to the program will be over. It remains indisputable that the station's mission has shrunk almost to insignificance.

Space station Freedom will support only the lowest priority, go-as-you-pay mission established by the Augustine Committee. The House only encourages a schizophrenic policy by enthusiastically promoting the space station at the same time that it refuses to fund the Moon/Mars initiative, which is the only mission NASA now has that requires that we study the effect of long-duration space flight on the human body.

The Congress has refused to fully fund the Moon/Mars Program advocated by NASA's Office of Exploration because we are skeptical of NASA's cost estimate and refuse to be drawn into the agency's grandiose vision. Yet we do not complain as the camel shoves his head and hump, in the guise of space station Freedom, into the tent. It will not be long before we hear NASA arguing that Congress cannot waste the Nation's investment in space station Freedom by refusing to finance sending humans to Mars. If we are not willing to pay to go to Mars, the Augustine Committee says we should not go. If we are not going to Mars, we do not need space station Freedom.

There is no money in this budget to go to Mars, and there is likely to be none for a long time to come. By then, we will have learned that the orbital infrastructure we truly need looks very different from space station Freedom.

I strongly urge, Mr. Chairman, that the House turn from the same ill-founded course that culminated in the space shuttle. The shuttle is an impressive technical achievement. No one doubts that. But it is temperamental to operate. The costs of running this system are well beyond the level that Congress was led to expect when the program was approved, and the rest of NASA has often been sacrificed to feed its voracious appetite.

The House threatens to add a greater load to what we all know to be an already inadequate budget. I, for one, am unwilling to see the American space program shrink to the point where NASA will try to drum up something to do aboard this orbiting recreational vehicle in a desperate attempt to hide how we once more have allowed a piece of hardware to overwhelm our space strategy and to suffocate the possibility of alternative courses of action. At least this time the United States will not suffer alone. Our international partners will despair just as much, as they attempt to rid themselves of this doomed albatross.

Mr. Chairman, the arguments of station proponents have a familiar ring. We are promised jobs and incredible wonders if we only will persevere. I believe we have embarked upon a flawed course. I know my colleagues who support the station firmly believe they will turn back this challenge as they did last year. I fear, however, that they will ultimately learn that all they have won is a Pyrrhic victory, and the American taxpayer will be the poorer for it.

Mr. Chairman, I urge adoption of the Roemer amendment.

Mrs. MORELLA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 4364, the NASA authorization bill, and against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana to delete the authorization for the space station.

After the House NASA appropriations subcommittee withdrew space station funding last year, it was incumbent upon this body, in order to continue the myriad benefits which the space station offers, to restore the funding. In view of that debate, it should be clear that a significant majority of both the House and the Senate are committed to the creation of a space station because it is a vital step in allowing us to continue meeting our future space objectives.

Space station Freedom will enable us to safely continue mankind's epic journey into space. It will be an international research laboratory, advancing science and technology, as well as expanding the human presence in space.

The space station will push scientific knowledge forward. It is collectively believed by the medical research community that the station can help develop an understanding of many vitally important human medical research issues, with the very real possibility of an accelerated transfer of knowledge and technology directly benefiting the health care of millions of Americans in the very near future. This view has been supported by biomedical organizations such as the American Physiological Society and the American Institute of Biological Sciences, among others.

Also, the innovations and technologies gained from space station

Freedom will spur our international competitiveness. Processes and technologies developed for space station Freedom will generate new materials, information and communications systems, energy and environmental life support systems, biotechnology, and life sciences.

It is important to remember that space station Freedom is a United States partnership with Canada, European nations, and Japan. We have international cooperative agreements already in place. Stopping the building of the space station now could potentially endanger our ability to seek international cooperation with our space partners on any future large-scale international science and technology venture.

In addition, and perhaps most importantly, the loss of the space station would actually incur significant costs and would have a severe ripple effect upon our Nation's economy. The $7 billion that has been invested to date on the station has generated over 75,000 jobs nationwide in 39 States. I am proud to represent a large number of those workers, some of whom have committed their careers to developing a space station.

Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues to oppose the amendment from the gentleman from Indiana and ensure the retention of America's preeminence in space.

Mr. BROWDER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, we know that space exploration is a popular program. If the polls are not sufficient, just turn on your television most nights to go "where no one has gone before." The most popular exhibit at the Smithsonian Museums right now is tied to an immensely popular television and movie series about space travel.

Our children cannot have a future in space unless we do the hard work of preparing to go. This vote to preserve space station Freedom is the hard work we have to do today.

Critics say the concept is popular; the price tag isn't. I concede the point and remind them that the same is true of many government programs. Our job as Representatives requires difficult decisions on how we will get where this country wants to go. We make decisions and hope we have the wisdom to make the right ones.

Construction of space station Freedom has already produced technology spinoffs in flat screen video, improved batteries and manufacturing techniques. In flight, space station Freedom will explore new biologies, new medicines, and new materials. In the future, the life sciences we do on space station Freedom will let some generation out there look back on our television the way we look back on Jules Verne's novels. Can we turn our backs on that future? The right answer is we cannot. Support space station Freedom.

Mr. ZIMMER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment. The Committee on Science, Space, and Technology had some very difficult choices to make because of the limited resources that were available for the space program this year, and I commend the chairman of the full committee and the Subcommittee on Space and the ranking minority members for making some very difficult choices. But in doing so, I believe we are going to start down a path of starving some worthwhile programs to continue to fund the space station Freedom.

□ 1720

The choices that we see before us today are even starker than they were when we last considered this issue on the floor in connection with the appropriations bill last year. The choices will become more and more difficult as the budget vise gets tighter and tighter.

What we have to do is to look anew at what we are actually purchasing for some $30 or $40 billion or more, and ask ourselves whether we can spend that money, part of it this year and much more of it in future years, whether we can spend that money in more cost-effective ways. I believe we can.

The space station Freedom as originally conceived in 1984 was going to be a wonderful, wonderful innovation, and it was going to be a comprehensive presence in space. It was going to be an observatory for the stars, but it has lost that function. It was going to be an observatory for the Earth, performing much of the functions of the current Earth-observing system, but has lost that function. It was supposed to be a factory in space. It has lost that function. It was supposed to be a way station to assemble deep space probes to the Moon and Mars and beyond, but it has lost that function as well.

My colleague, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. BACCHUS], quoted Plutarch in his statement about space station Freedom, and I would like to quote Janis Joplin and Kris Kristofferson. After losing so many of its functions, one thing you can say about freedom is that "Freedom is just another word for nothing left to lose."

Space station Freedom no longer is the best way to move forward into space. Instead of opening the door to space, the project could lock the door to space because it will be diverting funds from much more cost-effective, much more productive and important programs. NASA is slowly starving basic science, and we saw the first indication of that when, in the appropriation bill, after the money was dropped from the space station, after the space station was zeroed out, the money to restore the funding for space station was not taken from the VA programs or the HUD programs to which it was directed by the Subcommittee on Appropriations. It was taken from other valuable functions of NASA and the space program. That I believe is a portent of things to come, and it is a very dangerous trend that we have begun.

So the choice is between the space station Freedom and a balanced, aggressive space program. The station is now only capable of performing a truncated mission, microgravity and life science research. Those are important missions, but they can be developed, and I believe they can be achieved at lower cost through other means. We could develop smaller spacecraft to conduct our research better, and have them flying sooner than the space station for less money.

NASA has already spent more on the design and redesign of the space station than was spent on the entire Skylab program from its design to construction and launch and operation.

The United States will not maintain preeminence in civil space by holding fast to programs based on outdated concepts while starving good and productive programs. The space station has now become more of a status symbol than a productive space program.

I urge my colleagues to act now, rather than later, and vote for the amendment.

Mr. GEREN of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise today as a member of the Science, Space, and Technology Committee and a member of the Space Subcommittee in opposition to the Roemer amendment to delete funding for space station Freedom. A similar amendment was offered in committee and was rejected and I urge my colleagues to do the same today.

The guiding principles of the National Aeronautics and Space Act of 1958 charged NASA to expand on human knowledge, improve airplanes and spacecraft, and learn how to fly equipment, supplies, and most importantly, life from the planet Earth, in space. The space station is the embodiment of that charge. The space station is the heart of the manned space program and is essential for advancing the human exploration of space.

The continued progress of the human exploration of space requires the development of a permanently manned space station for multiyear studies of human adaptation, testing of life support systems, and experience in building, maintaining, and operating a large manned space system. Additionally, what we learn from studying the effects of space on humans can be translated into practical experience to improve the quality of life on Earth.

But the space station is not only crucial for our space program. It is a vital component of the United States' favorable balance of trade in the space and aerospace field, now at over $30 billion. The space and aerospace field is one of the last high-technology fields that the United States continues to lead. Cancellation of the space station will narrow this lead.

And the space station is good for our economy. The space station program means 75,000 high-technology jobs, with contracts in 39 States and a current value of over $7 billion. This is particularly important as we see the decline of our defense industrial base and our continuing struggle to keep pace with the Japanese technological advances. These are hard times to explain to an American man or woman that you have arbitrarily ended their job and income and put in jeopardy the future prosperity of their children and their country. For these reasons, I urge my colleagues to oppose the Roemer amendment and support full funding for space station Freedom.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I think our chairman, the gentleman from California [Mr. BROWN], was right when he was talking about the knee bone connected to the thigh bone. Can anybody operate without an ankle bone connected to the body in some way? That is what is happening if we do not have the space station. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HALL], chairman of the Subcommittee on Space of the Committee on Science, Space, and Technology, has also talked about cancer research. I will tell the Members, if we do not keep our space station going, we are going to lose all of the research that we ever started. Space station Freedom is the centerpiece of our Nation's space program. It will be the source of countless benefits to all of us down here.

Our economy is driven by technology first developed in the early years of the space program, and to see evidence all we have to do is look around us, at everything from phones to computers to new fabrics, even to the materials used to make eyeglasses. These new eyeglasses that we have now that we can bend around, they are made out of titanium. That stuff came from the space program. It is little things like that that we do not know what is going to happen until they happen.

Do the Members know what that is? That is a little piece of wrapper, of chewing gum wrapper. We used to use aluminum foil for that. Out of the space program came a substance that covers that thing with a lightweight material that looks like aluminum but it is not, it is light as feather and it serves the purpose and it is cheaper.

During the 1960's the United States led mankind in its quest to reach the Moon. No one will ever forget Neal Armstrong's words, "One small step for man and one giant leap for mankind."

I know Buzz Aldrin and I know a couple of the other astronauts, in fact, darned near all of them. They placed a benefit to mankind ahead of all their other desires. They knew that they were working for the good of the United States of America.

Investments in the Apollo Program led directly to the advancements in fields of science, medicine, aviation, and materials. Recently, a Midwest Research Institute study indicates that every dollar spent on research and development returns about $9 to our economy.

Our investment today in space station Freedom will lead to even greater advancements in the future. We will develop an improved energy supply and storage system, life environment systems, computer hardware and software, and materials. This is just the beginning. It is money well invested, for the return to the American people will be many times greater. I urge my colleagues to show their support for the space station and vote against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROEMER].

Mr. BACCHUS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment and in support of space station Freedom. My very good friend, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROEMER], has said that his amendment to strike and kill space station Freedom is a good amendment for three reasons. He says it makes good sense, it is good science, and it is good government.

I say he is wrong on all three counts. I say space station Freedom makes good sense because it is a good investment. To me the best thing we can possibly do in spending our very limited Federal resources these days is spend them in those ways that produce the most dividend for the people. And we have heard time and again this afternoon that for every dollar we have ever spent on space we have reaped at least $7 in additional gross national product.

Yes, we need to cut the Federal budget deficit. Yes, we need to eliminate it, and I am one of the cosponsors of a constitutional amendment that would require a balanced budget, as I think is the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROEMER], as well. But to me, this is not evidence of something that needs to be cut. In truth, we need more things like the space station, we need more high-technology public works that will keep our people at work making things that make our economy grow, because if the economy grows we will have more economic prosperity, we will have more taxes, we will have more revenue, and we will have more of a future.

Space station Freedom is also something that is good science. A year ago the National Academy of Sciences expressed some reservations about space station Freedom. But now, a year has gone by and recently they praised it now that they have added a centrifuge and they have seen how it is going to work. Space station Freedom will provide a world-class laboratory in which to conduct life sciences and medical research, and microgravity materials research. Two possible benefits to be derived are the development of crystals to improve our computer technology, and the growth of large protein crystals for use in manufacturing drugs to cure illnesses here on Earth. And there are many, many more potential medical benefits, many of them unforeseen.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROEMER] said that the Synthesis Group opposed space station Freedom. That is simply not so. I have met with Gen. Stafford, and I have a copy of a letter he sent to the chairman of our committee, the gentleman from California [Mr. BROWN] last summer. I will read it in part.

Dear Mr. Chairman:

Your committee is reviewing the impact of the House Appropriations Committee's decision to terminate space station Freedom.

This was a year ago.

Because several news stories have indicated that the Synthesis Group Report does not support space station Freedom, I wanted to give you the "real story" prior to release of the report on June 11.

Space station Freedom will be an integral element in this Nation's manned space program and the knowledge gained on this research facility concerning long duration space flight and life sciences is crucial to future missions. The report endorses space station Freedom as the transition to a sustained presence in space and I strongly recommend funding be included in this important program * * *

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACCHUS. Yes, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Chairman, I believe what I said, I say to the gentleman from Florida, is that the Synthesis Group did not support the space station as a stepping stone to Mars and the Moon. I did not bring up or imply that they had a position pro/con on the space station itself.

Let me just read from a New York Times editorial on NASA's folly:

The shocking surprise is how little the station will contribute to the Nation's long-range space goals. President Bush has called for a permanent colony on the Moon by early in the next century, followed by a mission to Mars by the year 2019. To determine how to do it, he appointed a distinguished panel of experts, the Synthesis Group.

Mr. BACCHUS. Reclaiming my time, rather than relying on the Washington Post, which we can all read at our leisure, I would rather refer to the statements of Mr. Michael Griffin of NASA before our subcommittee in which he said specifically that the space station Freedom is essential, essential to the Moon/Mars proposals that have been made in terms of the space exploration initiative. Some have suggested that we could perhaps just establish a base on the Moon and do on the Moon what we might otherwise do on space station Freedom, but there is a little problem there. The Moon has gravity. There is not going to be any gravity on the way to Mars. We need space station Freedom.

Finally the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROEMER] says that it is good government to kill the space station Freedom. I say it is good government to look to the future, and space station Freedom is one of the few things we are doing in this government right now that looks to the future. We need to make tough decisions, but we need to make the right decisions, and I say killing space station Freedom is the wrong decision.

Mr. BOEHLERT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment. I think three points need to be considered.

First, the space station is not only the cornerstone of America's manned space program, but in a very real sense the cornerstone of the Earth's space program. Fifteen nations have joined the United States in the space station project—Japan, Canada, and the 13-member States of the European Space Agency. Each of them looks to the United States for leadership and vision, and together they have committed billions in support of this project because they believe in it and in our ability to deliver on our promises. By killing the space station we abandon our leadership of the manned space effort and abandon our commitments to allies and friends.

I am not a knee-jerk supporter of every big science project that comes along. The superconducting super collider is also big science, but I believe that we shouldn't spend one more tax dollar on it. Officials from the Department of Energy have been vainly searching the globe for just one foreign donor to kick in contributions to the SSC. Despite begging, pleading and political arm-twisting, DOE has only one pledge, no dollars, for less than 1 percent of the total required from prospective foreign partners. The space station in contrast, has contributions worth approximately $10 billion. Foreign governments have been able to assess the relative worth of these projects and their evaluation conforms to my own—the space station is worth the investment and the SSC is not.

Second, unilaterally abrogating the space station Freedom agreement, which has the force of an international treaty, will carry serious long-lived consequences for other international scientific efforts. A wide array of scientific problems can only be effectively addressed within the context of international cooperation. The health and prosperity of our planet, as well as that of future generations rests upon our ability to share costs and knowledge about global climate change, sustainable energy development, agriculture and biological diversity to cite just a few examples. The United States plays a critical role in wedding together these cooperative efforts—a role that would be undercut by the Roemer amendment.

I am not saying that research in these important areas would not press ahead, but I am saying that it will be nearly impossible to find partners willing to tie their scientific fates to our efforts in these areas—leaving it up to the United States to go it alone—bearing higher costs and making slower progress in these critical areas than if we could convince others to share the burdens of scientific and technological exploration.

Third, the space station program is among our most important high technology initiatives. This has long been recognized by Congress. For 8 fiscal years we have voted funds for this project. For 8 fiscal years we have reviewed, revised and insisted on changes in the program that, for the most part, made it a better program. After 8 years, approximately 100,000 jobs are now tied to this project. These are high tech jobs working on pushing the envelope in new technologies and engineering techniques. 100,000 high-technology jobs at a time when our Nation is struggling to keep pace with the technological advances of others. With the cuts in defense expenditures, with the growing technical challenges posed by others, this is not the time to be backing away from one of our most important civilian technology initiatives.

I do want to state my disappointment in some of the tradeoffs that exist in this bill. I am not pleased with the prioritization of EOS. I would prefer to see it fully funded, and that its full funding not rest on unreasonable and unrealistic funding growth projections at NASA, which is the way the bill is currently crafted. I hope that the appropriators will take into account how important EOS is in their work this year and find the money necessary to fully fund EOS. I will also work with Mr. BROWN and Mr. WALKER to reorder NASA priorities in a future authorization to protect EOS.

To support the international manned space effort, to maintain the United State's leadership in global scientific cooperation and to support the competitive position of our economy—for all these reasons I ask you to vote in support of the space station and to reject the Roemer amendment.

□ 1740

Mr. ROHRBACHER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, this is consistent with what my colleague has just said on the floor. Mr. Chairman, we have to look at the space station program within the context of what's happening in the rest of the globe. The historic changes in what was the Communist world have opened an incredible new vista for space commercialization, utilization, and exploration. We can now accomplish our goals with space station at a much lower cost than imaginable only a short time ago. A cooperative or business arrangement with the newly democratic Republics which once upon a time were part of the Soviet Union offers us tremendous opportunities. This approach is so much better than simply offering the emerging democracies grants or foreign aid. Let's hire their scientists and put their systems to work for a profitable project. Together, using the Energia rocket, we can put space station Freedom into orbit—and save billions of dollars. A boon to the Russians as well as to Americans.

In the past there were justifiable concerns about the cost of this project and whether we had the means to follow it through to completion. Now with a truly international space effort, a global project can emerge based on the cooperation of free and friendly people. Has anyone ever heard of a better, more symbolic way to promote peace and progress?

Dr. Edward Teller is an enthusiastic supporter of this strategy. He knows we have the means and the methods to work with a democratic Russia, furthering both of our interests, almost literally turning swords into plowshares. This kind of cooperation will, Dr. Teller asserts, help to solidify democracy, freedom, peace, and progress in the countries emerging from Communist tyranny. All this, at the same time that we establish an outpost for mankind and freedom in space at a significantly reduced cost. The savings come through fewer space shuttle missions. Perhaps as much as $15 billion can be saved by using five Russian heavy launchers. The jobs involved in the construction and development of space station Freedom are more secure by protecting the financial viability of the whole program. Yes, we've got to cut unjustified programs, but to cut station now when we at last can keep costs under control is ludicrous.

I would hope that those who have been talking about making hard choices will look at the NLS program instead of station. The NLS program appears to be totally duplicative. It duplicates medium-lift capabilities we already have with Delta, Atlas, and Titan. And it duplicates heavy-lift capabilities now available at a cheap rate from a democratic Russia. With space station we'll at least get something tangible, something unique and useful for our money.

Mr. Chairman, instead of funding backwaters like the NLS, we should instead be funding watersheds, like space station Freedom, like the SSTO program, and like the national aerospace plane program. These watershed technologies will keep America moving forward, energizing our industrial base, opening new potential for the private sector, for commercialization.

Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues to defeat this amendment and to look forward to what the new potentials in the world are and to make sure that we can use these potentials not only for ourselves but for all of mankind.

Mr. Chairman, I would ask my colleagues to support the space station and oppose this amendment.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I think our country is at a crossroads, and really the issue is: Do we venture for the future technologies of our people, or do we become a mediocre country that allows other countries to steal our technology?

I am very proud of the fact, and I do not make any bones about it, that I represent one of the NASA sites, Lewis Research Center, and 5,000 people go through that gate every day. They are Federal employees, very, very dedicated. We have 100 of $1 million contracts that go to our State for our small businesses, and yet there is more to the issue than just the economic future of our people.

I think the real issue relates to various technologies like research and their prevention of diseases. The space station promises to help us better understand the human body and some of the illnesses which affect us and afflict us.

For example, when humans are exposed to prolonged periods of weightlessness, the body often reacts in a way which simulates the disorders experienced on Earth, simulated osteoporosis, for example, which is a disease that affects older women. The space station will function as an excellent laboratory to study ways to offset this terrible disease.

Similarly, the circulatory problems which we have in our lifetime, the changes in our immune system created by the space environment will lead to opportunities to provide cures for a variety of diseases.

Do we not want to find a cure for cancer? Do we not want to find a cure for viruses such as AIDS and other diseases? Do we not want to find a cure for Alzheimer's disease?

I have heard Members talk about the $2.2 billion that the space station costs. Well, I want to tell the Members something. The people in this country who have families with Alzheimer's disease spend $90 billion on that disease. So I believe this investment for the future will save money and will save lives.

In a related manner, the space station will act as a long-term human base laboratory that will lead to the development of exciting new pharmaceutical products. Pharmaceuticals are often developed by studying structures of proteins associated with diseases in the human body. Proteins form crystals which are difficult to study here on Earth, but in space, you can study the protein crystal growth which is stable and orderly, and it can allow us to develop new vaccines, new drugs to prevent and cure diseases such as diabetes. Ask any person who has a loved one die or suffer from being a diabetic if you do not think this research is worth it.

The space station is designed to accommodate these investigations and develop these pharmaceutical products that are so important to arrest and cure diseases.

Another area that is very, very important is the focus on energy independence. When we develop new materials that you can only develop in a pure atmosphere such as space, we can develop lighter alloys and plastics that can be used for automobiles and aircraft which will result in tremendous fuel efficiency. So we are here talking about how we keep up with technologies in other countries, and we know that we can develop and continue to develop superconductors and semiconductors with promise to revolutionize the computer, our transportation, our energy production, our transmission, our defense production industries.

Clearly there is a vast potential for these and other new materials so that we can maintain our industrial base and our international competitiveness.

And finally, having a space station laboratory will give us the ability to truly monitor the environment in a way which complements other NASA environment monitoring projects. We should be worried about the greenhouse effect, the ozone depletion, acid rain; these kinds of problems that affect our environment are killing the Earth and can be studied best in a space station laboratory that complements the data produced by polar-orbiting satellites.

Mr. Chairman, I think we are penny-wise and pound foolish to not invest in the future, and I urge Members to defeat this amendment once and for all overwhelmingly.

Similarly, a long-term, human-based space platform is important for developing many new materials. The space station will have a microgravity module which will focus research upon new materials. The weightless environment in space allows for the purest possible production of new and exotic materials such as: stronger, lighter alloys and plastics that can be used for automobiles and aircraft which will result in greater fuel efficiency; new chemical crystals that can be grown more efficiently in a weightless environment over a period of time, and; superconductors and semiconductors which promise to revolutionize the computer, transportation, energy production/transmission and defense production industries. Clearly, there is a vast potential for these and other new materials to contribute to our industrial and international competitiveness.

Another advantage of creating an orbiting manned laboratory is the ability to monitor the environment in a way which compliments other NASA environment-monitoring projects. The space station will be placed in an equatorial orbit instead of in a polar orbit like many other environmental satellites. In addition, the space station has the advantage of providing human intervention when equipment needs adjustment or repair. This was critical to the most recent shuttle mission dedicated to studying environmental conditions which relied upon equipment used by humans who were needed to adjust and repair the equipment as it was used. Only the space station can offer the advantages of a long-term, human-based platform for monitoring the global environment in a way which compliments other space-based environmental monitoring efforts.

Again, the space station is a key investment into our Nation's technological future. It holds the promise of advancing knowledge in the medical sciences, it will provide a long-term, human-based platform for monitoring the environment, and it will be used to develop new materials for use by industry. Consequently, I urge you to vote in opposition to amendments which limit space station funding. Instead, vote in favor of investing in continued U.S. technological leadership and prosperity.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, if you set out to do long-term damage to the American economy, you could not do much better than to adopt this amendment. This is a program, a space program that pays back over a 25- to 30-year period at a rate of 7 to 1 to the gross domestic product. We have very few things that we do in our country that pay back at that kind of a ratio. And it only pays back if you take the risk, the real technological risks. It does not pay back in day-to-day operational expenses. It is where you are taking the technological risks that you are getting the biggest payback.

That is exactly what this station is all about. This is a place where we will get the ultimate payback just like we got it back from the Apollo Program. That is the reason why you get the number of jobs that are created from this kind of a technological innovation; it is the reason why a number of labor unions are opposed to the Roemer amendment, because they recognize the job implications of this particular bill.

But perhaps more important than even the economic argument is the fact that if you set out to destroy a basic tenet of the American dream, you could not do any better than this amendment. This amendment is the ultimate Luddite amendment, because what it says is that we are determined as a nation to reject our ability to speak to the future. We are determined that there is no technology that we would like to have that projects into the future. It is a case where we as a generation have an opportunity to do things technologically that no other generation has ever had. With this amendment, what we would say is "No, we don't want to do it."

Mr. Chairman, let us understand that at some point some generation is going to take a step like this. They are going to build a space station, they are going to go to the moon, they are going to go to Mars and into deep space. Some generation is going to do it because we are technically capable of doing it today. If you are capable of doing something and you refuse to do it, the fact is that you have failed. It is a failure of will, it is a failure of leadership. It is a failure to understand the essential elements of the human spirit.

You know, it is interesting that James Michener spoke yesterday before the Committee on the Budget and he said this, and I think it is something we ought to reflect on:

We risk great peril if we kill off this spirit of adventure, for we cannot predict how and in what seemingly unrelated fields it will manifest itself. A nation which loses its forward thrust is in danger, and one of the most effective ways to retain that thrust is to keep exploring possibilities. The sense of exploration is intimately bound up with human resolve, and for a nation to believe that it is still committed to forward motion is to ensure its continuance. Your challenge, the test of your leadership, and I believe the scale with which history will measure your wisdom and insight, is whether you make these achievements a part of continuum—not merely an historical oddity. To turn away from these initiatives, wholly or in part, from the point of view of a historian, is unthinkable—particularly at a time when the real dividends of space research are only just becoming within reach.

Now, what does that research tell us that we can do? We have heard a number of people tell us today that it would be impossible to justify the space station based upon science. Well, I would suggest to you that there is science going to be done aboard the space station which is absolutely essential to our future and can be done in no other place.

Let me give you just one example.

Mr. Chairman, there are dozens of them, but one example I think is useful. That example is something called the bioreactor. The bioreactor is being developed as a part of NASA's space station mission. It is one of the most exciting applications that the space station will have. It is developed as part of Johnson Space Center's biotechnology group. This device enables medical researchers to produce high-density cell cultures and many cell types that will not otherwise grow outside the body. Tissues grown in the bioreactor are larger than those grown with other technology, and exhibit many structural and chemical characteristics of normal tissue. Researchers are using the system to investigate the growth and treatment of brain and colon cancers, lung, liver, small intestine, and cartilage tissue.

A small number of bioreactors are currently in use here on Earth, but the researchers are understandably anxious to see how they operate in microgravity. A bioreactor has flown on the space shuttle, and results from that experiment are promising. The ability to operate a bioreactor in space for much longer periods of time, however, would increase our knowledge and ability to culture cells, tissue, and even organs.

The importance of this is that when you grow the tissue here on Earth, it is grown in the vessel and the problem is that eventually gravity causes it to drop to the bottom, and when it drops to the bottom, it is destroyed. When you begin to use the bioreactors in space, what you are able to do is grow this human tissue for longer periods of time and thereby grow whole tissues rather than partial tissues. That is the importance of what is going to happen here.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER] has expired.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. FRANK of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I say to the gentleman I am told that some of us have been waiting for a rather long time. There are intimations that they are planning to slow down, or shut off the debate. I would like to get some assurance that nothing is going to be done to try to cut the debate, before I could agree to any extension to any single Member. It is not the gentleman's fault, but that is the situation. If we are going to go several hours, it is not a problem. But there have been many Members waiting to speak.

Mr. Chairman, I would yield to anybody who would like to be yielded to.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRANK of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, it is certainly not this gentleman's intention to do anything to limit time.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRANK of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. BROWN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, it was not my intention to seek to cut off debate in any fashion. I encourage debate.

I just wanted to point out, however, that there is other legislative business to come up this evening and I would personally be willing to encourage Members who support the space station to curtail their remarks if the other side will.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRANK of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BROOKS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, it is so seldom that I have comity of interest with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER] that I kind of am inclined to let him go when he is speaking on the side of which I am deeply involved about a space station in my district. I am inclined to give him more time. Let us be tolerant, even though he is not always tolerant of others.

Mr. FRANK of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, you are my model in tolerance. I have always tried to be as relaxed, as flexible as yourself. But proceeding further on my reservation, I will say I will not object if we have an understanding there is not going to be any effort to curtail debate. Now, I would say, Mr. Chairman, and I will not get into substance, but it is not as if this House has overdebated itself this year. We are talking about many billions of dollars. I do not think 2 or 3 hours on $30 or $40 billion is excessive.

So, with that announcement, I would say, if there is anyone who is planning to try to limit debate, I would ask them to say now if they are. If not, on that basis I withdraw my objection. I would urge my friend from Pennsylvania, 10 minutes, when other people have been waiting a long time, is kind of long. Maybe he could take just a little more and come back later. There are a number of Members who have been held off. I will not object, but it is under the understanding that there will be no efforts to limit debate.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts for his tolerance. I would remind the gentleman that the sponsor of the amendment did take additional time when he spoke.

To continue to make my point, the fact is that in the space station, when you have long periods of time for growing the cell cultures, you will get cultures which are large enough that experimenters will be able to use them in their research work. This will mean that we will not have to use a cancer experiment for various kinds of drugs on human patients, for example. We can use it on the cultures grown within these space stations. Ultimately, this also holds the promise of growing whole new organs for human beings, growing new spinal cords, and optical nerves and lots of things that will be of immense value to the American people. One wonders whether or not they would not agree to this kind of investment with that kind of an understanding of the potential.

I think that this is the kind of research that America wants us to be doing, and it seems to me it is very much related to the basic tenet of the American dream that we move forward.

Somebody quoted some music a little bit ago. I would like to quote Bette Midler in the "Song of Rose," when she says, "The dream afraid of waking never takes the chance."

Well, that is exactly what this amendment is all about. It is not taking the chance on this particular dream.

Finally, it seems to me that if you want to make Congress appear ever more ludicrous in our policymaking function, you could not do much better than this particular amendment. This is a fight that we had last year. The situation has not changed at all from last year, and this is simply an amendment for paralysis.

□ 1800

The gentleman, when he offered the amendment, said to us, "Well, there may be some space station at some time I am willing to support." Well, you know, where and when? The point is that, if we do not support this one, there is none because we will not have the infrastructure, the space shuttle will atrophy, and we will not have the ability to go on and do a project later on. There is always something somewhere that they are willing to support, but never the project that we have before us.

Finally, we have had a lot of talk about the whole business of the fact this is going to save the taxpayer money and that NTU is in favor of this. I agree. NTU is in favor of it.

I was rather fascinated though to go and check my latest edition of the NTU ratings and find out how many of the people who are in support of space station, in fact have some of the best scores of NTU in terms of saving the taxpayers' money, because a lot of us believe that you do invest in the future, that a part of what we do is investing in the future, and how few of the people who have this amendment on the floor supposedly do something about deficits, actually rank very high with NTU. In fact, I found quite a few of them that rank among the biggest spenders in the Congress.

So, Mr. Chairman, they found this one place where they are willing to lop off some spending and claim they are doing something about the deficit, but the fact is they are among the big spenders that have gotten us into the problem in the first place, which means that we cannot afford to invest in the future.

Well, that is a tragedy, that these people have spent us bankrupt so that we now are building deficits that our kids have to pay, but we are going to give them no programs that are really valuable to them. Far better that we invest in the future; far better that we do something that is really productive for the future than this kind of nonsense.

So, Mr. Chairman, I would hope that my colleagues would not support this amendment. This amendment is backtracking from where we should be as a nation and would be a disaster to the space program.

Mr. FRANK of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of space stations.

Mr. Chairman, I will confess that the space station does have wondrous powers. It has converted some of my colleagues who have heretofore found no virtue in Government spending into latter day Franklin Roosevelts. I have never heard, Mr. Chairman, such unstinted praise for the ability of Government spending to bring about economic bounty.

Now I had thought from listening to some of my friends on the other side that the more the Government spent, the worse off we were. But, no, I was wrong. It turned out that Ludwig Vaughn Mises, and Friedrich von Hayek, and Milton Friedman and all those people never heard of space, and when some of their followers talked about how the more the Government spends, the worse off we were, they were wrong because we have just been told that, if we do not commit to spending over $100 billion in Federal taxpayers' money through the Federal Government, we will damage the economy of the United States.

Now I differ with them in specifics, Mr. Chairman. I do not think the efficiency here is as great as they say, but I welcome them to the recognition that sometimes public spending, coerced tax dollars spent through the Federal Government, can be good for economic development. They may have picked different winners than I would have picked, but what we are talking about is subsidized economic development where having people tell us that the free enterprise system on its own is not enough and that, if the Federal Government is not prepared to spend billions and billions for years and years, we will suffer economically.

I know sometimes the memories of some of my friends on the other side are episodic. I do hope this one sticks with them a while. But let me talk about why I do not think this is the best way to go.

No one has argued that it is the consensus of the scientific community that we put men in space as the best way to do the scientific things. We have been told that there are some scientific virtues here, and there are. If we compared putting people in a manned space station to flushing bricks down a toilet, putting them in the space station wins. It wins over a lot of things from the standpoint of science. But, if we said to the scientific community, "What's the best way to go," this would not rate very high.

We have been told this is good for medical research. The gentleman from Illinois, who I believe will speak later since no one is going to try and cut off this debate, had a very good hearing which he will discuss in which he, I think, can show how erroneous this is from the standpoint of the medical community. That is, if you said to medical researchers, "Here's some money; how do you want to spend it," virtually none of them would have said, "I know. Let's build a space station, and then, once we get a space station, we'll get in and do it."

Now it is true, if we do not build the space station, there are some things that will not happen up there, but do my colleagues know what will not happen if we do build it? My friend from Pennsylvania said, "If you know how to do something, and you don't do it, you've failed." Well, we know how to inoculate children against disease, and we failed to do it to our shame because the money will go here.

Remember we live under what this House voted, a limitation on domestic spending. This is a zero-sum game by a vote of the majority of this House, and every dollar we spend on the manned space station is not available to inoculate a child against disease. It is not available to put some cops on the street. We have got the ability to do that. We can go and have the spirit of adventure up there, and people have said, "Oh, well, we'll have no future in space if we don't vote for this."

Mr. Chairman, what about the present on Earth? Is there not an obligation of those of us who govern this country to try to make present on Earth tolerable for many of our fellow citizens before we explore the space? We are not saying that going in space is bad in and of itself. It is a question of priorities. Is this more important than research? And we have been told, "Well, what about cancer and diabetes?" No one has suggested to me that the best way to deal with breast cancer is to build a space station, and then go up there and look at it. Certainly not to inoculate children, not to provide police officers in the streets, not to clean up Superfund sites.

Yes; I want to do things for future generations. I think, if we educate children better, we would be doing more for them than the manned space station. Are we really contributing more to the economy of this country to put that hundred and whatever billion into the manned space station than to put it into better educating kids here at home?

And then we were told we cannot break faith with the Europeans. Yes; they might get so mad they would stop taking our money. They might get so angry with us that they would tell us to take our 200,000 troops that we give them as a present every year and take them home. They might actually tell us that we cannot do this to them anymore.

We will be putting up, by the figures that I have seen from the committee, two-thirds of this money, and our European and Asian allies will let us go ahead with that and put up one-third.

We are here at one of the critical decisionmaking points in this society. We can either spend this money on the space station, or we can put some of it into reducing the deficit, or we can inoculate kids, send policemen out to protect old ladies, clean up Superfund sites, and I think that the priorities that say, Let's send it up in the air, are dead wrong.

Mr. LEWIS of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words and I rise in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROEMER].

Mr. Chairman, I believe that the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROEMER] is unwise, and, I believe, for a number of reasons. I believe we should support the space station. It is a permanent international laboratory in space for unprecedented research in life sciences, and material sciences and for the peaceful exploration of space. Its fabrication and utilization by researchers will spawn new industries, new products, new processes, and certainly new jobs, a stabilized aerospace industrial base and sustain American technology leadership. As an investment for our children's future, it is a catalyst for math and science education from grade school through graduate school.

Mr. Chairman, this project represents the peaceful cooperation among nations while competing technologically. It is a primary essential stepping stone on the path to all future extended space exploration. With $7 billion invested in its design and prototype hardware, NASA and its contracting teams are on track to complete space station Freedom within congressional budget guidelines.

Implications of space station Freedom's cancellation will mean significant reductions in the aerospace work force. It would be added to the massive layoffs resulting from recent defense cuts. The $7 billion already invested in the space station program would be wasted, and the vital investment in the economic future of U.S. industry would be abandoned while the Federal deficit, as the chairman of this committee stated, would not be reduced one cent.

□ 1810

The international implications, scientific communities would lose confidence in the ability of the United States to fulfill its commitments on any future cooperative projects. The opportunity to share space program costs with other countries while pursuing U.S. proprietary goals would be lost. The largest international effort of a peaceful nature ever attempted would be a failure.

Leadership is involved. A wrong message would be given to youth regarding the need for studying in math, science, and engineering. By not maintaining the environment in which to push the leading edge of technology, competitiveness in the global market for U.S. high-technology goods would soon decline.

Certainly technology is involved. Space exploration would progress so slowly that the benefits might not justify the expense.

Space station Freedom does create jobs. You have heard from many speakers of the 75,000 or so jobs that could be involved. But the space station has contracts in 39 States with a value of over $7 billion and an expected value of over $23 billion for the balance of the development and deployment of the program.

Historically, each dollar appropriated for U.S. space exploration has multiplied into $7 worth of economic benefits to the Nation through the development of new technology, processes, and products.

The space station will serve as a magnet to attract and inspire America's youth to become tomorrow's scientists and engineers, and thus enhance American international competitiveness.

Based on past space projects, the space station Freedom Program will create new industries and promote new products and processes for existing companies.

Yes, space station Freedom is an affordable investment in our future. Less than 1 percent of the Federal budget supports all of NASA's programs, including space shuttle, space station, space science, aeronautics research, and education programs.

Space station funding is only one-seventh of 1 percent of the Federal budget. Space station funding is less than 3 percent of the HUD, VA, and independent agencies budget.

Government programs come in two distinct categories: Those that consume, and those that generate wealth. NASA programs have always provided major economic stimulus.

The United States cannot afford to relinquish its role as the world leader in space exploration and science. Non-defense R&D, as a percentage of the U.S. gross national product, is nearly 40 percent less than Japan.

The U.S. aerospace industry is one of the few remaining sectors of the U.S. economy to enjoy a favorable balance of trade.

Continued U.S. ability to compete in major global markets depends on developing leading edge technologies and scientific applications in areas such as electronics, materials sciences, bio-engineering, and health sciences.

Technology spinoffs, which will improve our quality of life, are already moving ahead, such as large flat video displays, nickel-hydrogen batteries, environmental monitoring and control system, and automated digital welding inspection with low x-ray hazard.

Mr. Chairman, we need this for our economics; we need it for our youth.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the space station Freedom program. We are building space station Freedom to enable human beings to safely continue mankind's epic journey into space. The space station will be valuable to us in the areas of competitiveness, education, exploration, and international cooperation. Space station Freedom is a partnership of the United States, Canada, Japan, and the European nations. We must maintain our leadership in space and continue to be a premier player in the 21st century. We have already allowed other countries to supersede us in the manufacture of automobiles, electrical equipment, farm equipment, et cetera. We cannot allow the future of our space program to fall behind other countries because we cut back on the funding. The space station will become critical in helping us to resolve important medical and biological questions about prolonged exposure to space. This knowledge can be used to combat cardiovascular diseases, hypertension, and osteoporosis. It will give us new insights into aging, anemia, diabetes, muscle atrophy, and the basic immune function. Freedom also will have laboratories for microgravity, pharmaceutical, and materials research, both new sciences. Unfortunately, many of our children lag behind other countries in the areas of math and science. This is critical to the future of our country. Space station Freedom will capture the attention and imagination of American students and motivate them to study the areas of math, science, and engineering, which are necessary to help us maintain a work force capable of competing in the global marketplace. The space station also represents thousands of jobs for Americans which help strengthen this Nation economically. If you kill the space station, you also kill our space industry. We need to secure our pride in this country. Let us keep America's leadership in space and refuse to hamstring our future by foolishly cutting funds for our space station. Vote "no" on this amendment.

Mr. PACKARD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

JOBS

There are many reasons to support space station Freedom including the fact that this program is already employing up to 75,000 hard-working Americans. In California alone, there are over 4,000 jobs connected to space station Freedom.

Furthermore, these jobs employ the skilled engineers, scientists, and technicians who are vital to the future of this Nation's competitiveness. Given the economic conditions that we are experiencing these days, cancellation of the station will deal a devastating blow to the men and women who are employed because of this program.

Compounding the problem is the fact that these individuals—the scientists, engineers, and technicians—are the very same workers who are bearing the brunt of defense downsizing. I urge my colleagues to give serious consideration to the tens of thousands of men and women who will be affected by the decision we make today.

INTERNATIONAL COOPERATION

Continuation of space station Freedom is critical not only to the United States, it is also critical to our international partners.

Space station Freedom is the largest international venture in science and technology ever undertaken. Europe, Canada, and Japan have already spent $2 billion and will ultimately pay approximately one third of all of the station's development costs. The international partners will also be responsible for paying a portion of the operating costs.

Last year we fought the very same battle over space station Freedom. The attempt by the Appropriations Committee to cancel American participation in the station sent a shockwave through the international community.

Our international partners responded loudly, and vigorously. Director-General of the European Space Agency, Jean-Marie Luton, stated that U.S. withdrawal would have "serious adverse impacts on prospects for any future transatlantic cooperation in the space field as well as other scientific and technological endeavors."

Both the Japanese and Canadian partners also stated that United States abandonment of this project would profoundly affect prospects for future international collaboration and would severely undermine international trust and confidence in America's ability to follow through on its obligations.

In order to maintain our competitive position in the global marketplace given a world that is rapidly changing and evolving, it is crucial that the United States have enough credibility to enter into cooperative ventures with our allies in the future.

The act of unilaterally canceling our participation in space station Freedom without full consultation with our international partners sends a message to all nations of the world: America is unreliable.

Our international partners are very committed to space station Freedom. They treat the space station agreements as having treaty status and they have refocused their own space programs to support the station.

This point cannot be emphasized enough. All of the international partners have increasingly made participation in this project the centerpiece of their space programs. They have even gone so far as to defer or scale back other activities to support the station's funding requirements.

We are not alone in experiencing internal budget problems. Our partners have made sacrifices in order to preserve their participation in this project. It is time for us to make space station Freedom a priority in America's space program.

Abandonment of our commitment to this vital component of the U.S. space program will signal the extinguishment of any real opportunity for manned exploration of space. It will furthermore, completely cripple any current or future opportunities for scientific international collaboration.

OTHER OPPORTUNITIES FOR INTERNATIONAL COLLABORATION

I have no doubt that the decision that we make today as to the future of the station will cast a shadow over the negotiations for international cooperation for the superconducting super collider as well as the ongoing collaboration on the international thermonuclear experimental reactor, better known as ITER.

ITER is a joint international effort involving the United States, Japan, Russia, and the European Community. The objective of ITER is to demonstrate the scientific and technological feasibility of using magnetic fusion power for the production of electricity. As you will note, this international collaboration involves many of the same partners as space station Freedom.

Mr. Chairman, it is essential that we look at the short-term and long-term implications of canceling space station Freedom. For the short term, this Nation could lose up to 75,000 jobs that are connected to the station. For the long term, abandonment of the program will severely undermine any current or future opportunities for international collaboration.

Mr. Chairman, I oppose this amendment and urge my colleagues to do the same.

□ 1820

Mr. PENNY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, today we have the opportunity to exercise fiscal responsibility when H.R. 4364, the NASA authorization bill, comes to a vote on final passage. If this amendment is adopted, this bill will be one that strikes a blow for fiscal responsibility. Without this amendment, we will be crowding many other valuable programs in the future by moving forward with space station funding.

I urge you to support the Roemer-Zimmer amendment, which cancels the space station at this time and transfers $1.1 billion in savings to other NASA programs and $1.15 billion to deficit reduction, for the following reasons:

Despite claims by proponents of the space station, it will take funds from veterans and housing programs. At an average annual cost of $4 to $6 billion for 30 years, the space station will challenge veterans and housing programs, and other NASA programs, for scarce Federal dollars.

The cost of the space station is too high. According to the National Taxpayers Union, the "cost of the space station could skyrocket to an S&L bailout-sized $180 billion" over its 30-year life.

NASA will not be weakened if the space station is canceled. According to the National Academy of Sciences, the experiments to be conducted on the space station "serve no pressing scientific need whatsoever."

The cold war and space race are over. According to the American Physical Society, "with the end of the cold war, there is an urgent need to reexamine the nation's priorities in space." The end of the cold war and the space race provide the United States with a window of opportunity to reduce spending on costly, big-ticket items such as the space station.

The space station crowds out other worthwhile NASA programs. Friends of the Earth states that without the transfer of $1.1 billion in fiscal year 1993 to other NASA programs, the Earth observing system [EOS] and other smaller NASA programs are "unlikely to ever be funded" because of the priority given to one program—the space station.

Canceling the space station will not substantially reduce America's edge in high technology. Even without the space station, NASA budgets will remain at around $15 billion or more for a number of years—providing research opportunities for thousands of our best scientists.

The space station should not be a priority at this time. According to Daniel Goldin, the Administrator of NASA, "we need human outposts in Earth's orbit, on the Moon, Mars, and beyond." I feel that we have greater priorities—balancing the Federal budget, homelessness, health care, education, veterans programs—which we as a nation should address before we worry about building outposts on Mars or in Earth's orbit.

Please support the Roemer-Zimmer amendment to cancel the space station.

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PENNY. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Chairman, I would just like to address what the gentleman from California and previously the gentleman from Wisconsin brought up, the fact about our obligations to our international partners.

In article 27, there is a withdrawal provision in the intergovernmental agreement with five, six, seven points, and in witness thereof clause and the fifth point is, "If a partner gives notice of withdrawal from this agreement, its cooperating agency shall be deemed to have withdrawn from its corresponding MOU with NASA effective the same date as its withdrawal from this agreement."

There is that provision. We have worked that out.

I want to make that clear. I think we do have an obligation, as the National Taxpayers Union has said, to our taxpayers, not to European and Japanese taxpayers.

Mr. KOPETSKI. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 4364. I rise in complete support of the space station Freedom and in opposition to the amendment offered by the distinguished gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. Chairman, yesterday, I received a letter from the new Administrator at NASA, Mr. Daniel Goldin. I want to share a passage of Mr. Goldin's letter as it defines why I believe this body must support NASA and H.R. 4364. Administrator Goldin states:

The entire mission of NASA is dedicated to our future. Today, we invest only one-fourth of one percent of our GNP and only one percent of our federal budget in NASA. Still, there are some who believe that is too much. They see it as a luxury when, in fact, a balanced space program is an investment in America's future.

America's future is really what today's debate is all about. Canceling space station Freedom is in my mind a serious threat to U.S. leadership in space. Since the days of President Kennedy, this country has proudly led the world in space exploration. This exploration has led to thousands of technological advancements here on Earth. Spinoffs from the space program include weather and applications satellites, communications satellites, computer technologies, CAT scans, and pace-makers to name a few. All totaled the American space program has generated over 30,000 spinoffs and advances in technology. Technologies developed by NASA are utilized daily but seldom do we give NASA credit for the discovery. From the compression chamber midsole on the Avia basketball shoes worn by Portland Trailblazer Clyde Drexler, to the food safety processes used by Pillsbury, to improving school bus chassis safety designs, to diagnosing and treating skin burns and disorders; NASA technology is everywhere.

Mr. Chairman, as the world's technological leader, the U.S. aerospace industry enjoys a large trade surplus. For 1990, the aerospace trade surplus was $27.2 billion, up from $22 billion in 1989. As this country continues to integrate and adjust to the global economy, it is more important than ever that we encourage and protect U.S. leadership in Aerospace. Support for H.R. 4364, NASA and space station Freedom is an important step.

It is equally important to note how NASA dollars infiltrate each and every State in this country. In 1987, NASA procurement spending totaled $8.6 billion. However, the NASA procurement budget generated $17.8 billion in total industry sales. This activity created 209,000 private sector jobs, this activity created $2.9 billion in business profit. Finally, this activity provided $5.6 billion in State, Federal and local government tax revenue.

I want to conclude with a personal experience to demonstrate the effects of a visionary space program. Last week, I visited Taft Middle School in Lincoln City, OR. Taft has constructed a model space shuttle, called Bengal Star 1. Bengal Star 1 has afforded students the opportunity to simulate space shuttle flight and operations support. Students through the leadership of their science teacher, Joe Novello, at Taft are being attracted to the sciences through this project. Taft Middle School receives no additional government support for the space shuttle project, donations come from the community and industry. This is another example of the curiosity and pride Americans have in space.

Mr. Chairman, I believe America must continue to lead the world in space exploration. The vehicle is here before us today. I urge my colleagues to support NASA, support space station Freedom and pass H.R. 4364 overwhelmingly.

Mr. DELAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, we are getting a lesson in warped economics. The gentleman from Massachusetts and others are saying that this money is taking money away from social programs, that we cannot inoculate children. We cannot put a policeman on the streets. We cannot do a whole lot of things that we need to do because we are going to build a space station.

This is a warped view of economics that is being rejected all over the world. People are rejecting this sort of view all over the world right now, understanding that it takes wealth in order to pay for these social programs, in order to inoculate children, in order to educate children, in order to put policemen on the streets. It takes wealth to do that.

We are a wealthy country, and we need to continue building a wealthy country. The only way we can build a wealthy country is to invest in research, take that research and develop it into wealth in order to pay for those kinds of programs.

Those are the kinds of views that we have of economics. By the way, I think the views that have been expressed about this economics is a contradiction to those that say, "Well, we can't spend money on the space station because we need to spend this money in better research and other science somewhere else."

If we really believe that this House is going to allow us to take the money that would have been used on the space station to spend on other programs, we do believe in the tooth fairy, because it has already been stated by many that what they want to do is take this money and spend it on programs that do not create wealth in order to propose.

What we are trying to do here is to invest in our future, and we are trying once again to decide whether or not we should fund this space station Freedom. And why are we having this discussion? In order to create this wealth, for instance, we could even claim that the Moon may very well be the Persian Gulf of the 21st century. Why? Because the energy supply of our Nation is at risk, because we must have the capability to replenish the depleting resources on Earth by finding new sources of minerals, metals and energies in space.

We must not still be standing here 30 to 40 years from now debating how and where we can get the next supply of energy. Then it will be too late.

The space station Freedom is the first important step forward sustaining life in space and as a launch platform from which we can deliver extraterrestrial exploration missions that we can ultimately find these types of resources that will create the wealth that can go to pay for the programs that the gentleman from Massachusetts wants to fund.

We in the 20th century have used more of the world's natural resources than all the previous generations. Where will we get, where would we go to find more resources after the Earth has been depleted? Do we just stand by and cross our fingers? I do not think so.

What we do is we plan for the future and we act and act now.

Down through the centuries, nations have sometimes had to go to war, and we just recently went to war to protect energy resources. We go to war to protect the vital needs of our population. As an example, energy has been one major resource that we need to survive in the modern industrial world, to drive the engine of commerce that creates the wealth and provides the American standard of living.

We have to provide for warmth, for food on our tables, for transportation needs for our families, for our children, and for our elderly.

The best estimates of the Persian Gulf area oil reserves show that we only have until about the middle of the next century to find alternative safe energy sources that will continue to sustain our lifestyle as we increase our population. In the mid-1980's we found a good energy source that would provide safe energy production with no long-term waste and a high-energy conversion efficiency. Helium-3, commonly called astrofuel, has all of those important qualities, but the supply of it on Earth is very scarce. There is enough astrofuel on the lunar surface to supply the world's needs for over 1,000 years. We need the space station mission to help extract astrofuel from the Moon.

Experiments by the Fusion Technology Institute of the University of Wisconsin have proven that the helium-3 fusion process can provide energy that is both economical and safe. These helium-3 fusion reactors produce a wide range of valuable byproducts as it is recovered from the Moon, including water and oxygen. Unfortunately, helium-3 is extremely rare on Earth.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DELAY] has expired.

Mr. DELAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. FRANK of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, reserving my right to object, I just wondered whether the gentleman from Texas planned to yield at all.

Mr. DELAY. If the gentleman will yield, I would be glad to yield to the gentleman as soon as I develop my statement.

Mr. FRANK of Massachusetts. If the gentleman will forgive me, I have been waiting for the development, I guess. I am getting discouraged.

Mr. DELAY. It takes a long time to convince the gentleman of good economics.

Mr. FRANK of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. DELAY. Mr. Chairman, continuing, while we have found enough helium-3 on Earth to provide ample research, we must develop a mechanism to retrieve it from the Moon. Without the valuable research mission planned for space station Freedom, we will not have the knowledge to sustain life in space or have an economical platform to launch missions to the Moon.

Research from the Fusion Technology Institute has shown that clean, safe energy from astrofuel can be used here on Earth, but only if we start developing the technology to sustain life in space and an orbital launching capability now. Because 99 percent of the energy released from astrofuel is in the form of nonradioactive, charged particles, the astrofuel cycle is much safer than current fission reactors. Other benefits include high efficiency—about 70 percent net conversion to electricity—easier licensing and siting requirements, potentially lower costs of electricity, a shorter time to commercialization than for the fusion cycle currently pursued around the world, and less waste heat is dumped to the environment than with fossil fuel or fission plants. Furthermore, materials for the reactors can be chosen for easier maintenance, decommissioning, and ultimate disposal of the reactor components.

The lack of any radioactivity in the fuels or exhaust products means fuel can be delivered over city streets with no more precautions than required to deliver refrigerated food today.

The cumulative effects of high efficiency, very low radioactivity, inherent safety, and urban settings should also result in lower electricity costs in the future. Even at $1 billion a ton for the astrofuel, the cost of energy from astrofuel is equivalent to oil at $7 a barrel.

The commercial attractiveness of this fuel, which can only be achieved by having the capability to reach into and to live in space, and using 1987 as an example, the United States alone spent $40 billion to buy coal, oil, natural gas, and uranium to produce electricity. That same electricity could be produced from 25 tons of astrofuel. That much astrofuel could fit into the cargo bay of the space shuttle.

One shuttle-load of fuel could supply the entire United States demand for electricity in a year and be worth $25 billion. Not only that, but there is 10 times more energy in the helium-3 on the Moon than in all of the economically recoverable coal, oil, and natural gas currently on Earth.

Astrofuel is only one example of the many ways we can replenish resources that are currently being depleted here on Earth, maintain our level of spending, and be able to create wealth that we have all enjoyed to pay for those programs.

Mr. ANDREWS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, the challenges of space have only increased since this great adventure began over a quarter century ago. But as the risks have grown, so have the rewards.

During the history of America's space program there have always been detractors—always those who have said that the space program could not or should not move ahead. But what did those detractors think as they sat in their living rooms watching Neil Armstrong step out of the Eagle and plant the United States flag on the Moon? It is important to remember that the space program is about looking ahead. It is about exploration and discovery. Killing the station would be one giant step in the wrong direction. To do so would be dangerously shortsighted.

Today, the vote is a clear one: To keep the program moving forward, to keep America No. 1 in space, or to stop our effort dead in its tracks and let someone else do it for us. Space station Freedom is the engine that will drive our Nation's space program well into the next century.

Our trading partners understand the space station's potential, but they are all preparing to follow our leadership. Without this station, the Japanese and the Europeans will turn elsewhere in this fierce competition for the future. To cancel the program would mean the United States is willing to relinquish its leadership role—just like we have in other competitive arenas like semiconductors, automobiles, land remote sensing, and digital imaging—and allow other countries to capitalize on technologies we developed. The space station is a race for technology and economics and its a race that started years ago. There will be a space station eventually, the question is whether or not it will be ours.

Furthermore, I have heard others here today deride the fact that this debate is also about jobs, and I strongly believe that derision is painfully misguided. This debate is indeed about jobs; its about new jobs, jobs of the next century, jobs that our children will hold. In testimony before the House Budget Committee Task Force on Defense, Foreign Policy and Space yesterday, the well-known author James Michener clearly identified this weighty realization. He said, "But as certainly as there are pressing needs of the day, the needs of the future will surely be far more desperate if we do not prepare for them today. To prosper, our children and grandchildren will need new jobs in new technologies, new challenges, and new worlds to conquer. We have no mechanism which transmits this legacy more effectively than our civil space program."

Space station Freedom inspires young people to excel in math and science because children understand the opportunities it offers them to apply that knowledge.

In the weightless laboratory of space men and women may build the largest and most perfect computer chips the world has ever seen. Or perhaps they may develop a cure for cancer, or at least find a way to reduce the pain of those who suffer from the disease here on the ground. Inventions and innovations we cannot possibly imagine today will likely become a commonplace reality tomorrow. The truth is, many advances, both economic and scientific, that future generations will take for granted will be developed aboard the space station in our lifetimes.

So this vote is truly an important one. It is about our future. I urge the defeat of this amendment and any other attempts to kill the space station program. Let us not be the Congress that stops the progress of our country's space program. Let us not be the Congress that says to the world that America is no longer interested in the grand adventure of space exploration.

Mrs. JOHNSON of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment and in support of the space station. One of the most important roles of the Federal Government is to develop knowledge, to develop that fundamental research that no individual company could do but which makes possible new products and new processes.

My colleagues who have spoken before me have described in some detail some of the past products that have developed from our space research, and the potential of the current research to develop benefits for us in the years ahead. Let me remind us all that our current investment is only 1 percent of our Federal budget, and the products that have sprung from this commitment and the potential for this research have paid back many times over that investment.

There is another aspect to this debate that I think is important. In my experience in the last decade no major breakthrough in manufacturing has come from a single company. More and more, new engines, breakthroughs in computer sciences, major developments in every industry are coming as a consequence of joint ventured efforts by international cooperative partnerships.

This is not only because such major developments cost a lot of money, because it is much more serious than that. They require a level of brain power and knowledge that no individual company is able to support, is able to field, and so more and more the team that is going to drive the knowledge that is going to change our world and raise the potential for a high-quality standard of living throughout the developed and underdeveloped nations is a team that requires international cooperation, the best that many nations have to offer in both dollars and human resources. And so the space station is the first of those most serious cooperative scientific and technological ventures.

Fifteen countries, thirteen in the European Space Agency, plus Japan and Canada, are working with us on this project, recognizing the international community's dedication to the goals of this project and their dollar commitment to its importance to the future not just of Americans but of all mankind.

So I think it would be a very grave mistake for us to repeal the space station authorization and to step back on that underlying commitment that a great society must make to its own future, for indeed knowledge is power. The space station is about knowledge. It will empower our economy to provide for the needs of our children and our children's children throughout the nations of the world community.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to ascertain how much more time we might need to complete debate here. Could I ask Members who wish to speak to stand and let me get a rough idea. I see about 10 Members, and I would ask unanimous consent to end debate on this amendment in half an hour, which would of course restrict the time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, some of us have waited almost 2 hours, and the thought now that our opportunity to speak on this open rule in this debate under the 5-minute rule will somehow be curtailed I think is unfair, and I would object to the gentleman's unanimous-consent request.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. BROWN. Of course, Mr. Chairman, I would not seek to enforce any restriction. I am seeking a voluntary arrangement.

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, having offered the amendment, could we get some kind of an agreement that now Members speaking in opposition could get recognized?

Mr. BROWN. If the gentleman will yield, he knows the rules would allow Members to be recognized in due course. But if the gentleman would agree to some sort of an orderly process, I would try and make a commitment that they would get at least half of the time that is remaining.

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Chairman, with all due respect, I would not agree to limiting to half an hour when I have about six or seven speakers left.

Mr. BROWN. Would the gentleman feel that 45 minutes was reasonable?

Mr. ROEMER. I would say an hour, Mr. Chairman. I have Members who have been here for 2 or 2½ hours waiting to speak.

Mr. BROWN. I am sure the gentleman knows that we have a lot of Members also waiting. But I have not heard any new arguments in the last hour.

Mr. ROEMER. Further reserving the right to object, I think the gentleman from Illinois is going to give some new arguments on much of what we have heard about how important the medical research has been.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman, I will not make any request at this time.

Mr. McMILLEN of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the Roemer amendment and in support of space station Freedom.

Space station Freedom is a fiscally responsible investment in the future quality of life for Americans and the economic competitiveness of the Nation which only costs one-tenth of 1 percent of the entire budget.

In addition, the Roemer amendment will not directly reduce the Federal deficit because this is an authorization bill and therefore any funds saved could simply be funneled to other programs.

Let me also say that space station Freedom does not need to directly jeopardize the EOS Program. Both of these important programs can be funded and complement each other.

Space station Freedom can play a significant role in assisting the development of new and emerging critical technologies.

For example, I have a particular interest in biotechnology, where the space station will provide scientists with an unprecedented environment for the study of normal or cancerous human tissues outside the body. The potential medical applications could involve the growth of tissues for transplantation, cancer and antiviral therapies, models for drug testing, and the study of disease models in human tissue.

It is also important to recognize that the space station contributes to a healthy aerospace industry which currently has a $27 billion trade surplus.

The space station alone has created 75,000 jobs and this will help NASA play a greater role in defense conversion.

We cannot let our dire budget situation hamper both our will and ability to make fiscally responsible investments in our future.

Mr. LOWERY of California. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. TRAXLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOWERY of California. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan, chairman of the VA, HUD, and Independent Agencies Appropriations Subcommittee.

Mr. TRAXLER. Mr. Chairman, I am grateful to the gentleman and I will be very brief.

Mr. Chairman, this finds me in a peculiar position. I rise in opposition to the amendment, not because I am in disagreement with the substance of it, but rather because, in my judgment, it is the wrong place and the wrong time. The amendment does nothing about focusing on the debate on the priority question of funding the space station, and where does the space station rank in the spending priorities of the Nation. At best it is, of course, a paper tiger.

Because there is no alternative funding being proposed here, it is an easy vote. Make no mistake about it, the real up or down vote on station is going to come on the appropriation bill, and I will support that. The anticipated subcommittee allocation that we are faced with and that we are now looking at will make it very difficult for us to fund a $1.1 billion increase for VA medical and a 5 percent increase for NASA which includes $2.25 billion for station. Eighty percent of the outlays in the appropriation bill I chair occur in the VA and in NASA. If the outlays for moneys in 1993 are missing, as they might be when we get our allocation, we are going to have a real debate on this floor over the priorities of station versus the human needs and the research needs, the EPA, the National Science Foundation and the NASA science and research budgets.

So I say to Members whatever happens today is rather irrelevant, because we are going to come back to this issue. We are going to confront it in the real terms of America's choices and priorities.

I do not want this amendment at this time. It does not state the issue appropriately. Therefore, I am going to vote against it, although it is the right amendment at the wrong place. And I am very grateful to my distinguished colleague for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment not because I am opposed to it in substance but rather because it's the wrong place and time.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment does nothing about focusing on the priority question of funding the space station.

At best this amendment is nothing more than a sense of the House—unless, of course, it carries.

But I doubt that it will because there is no alternative priority funding being proposed.

Make no mistake about it. The real up or down vote on space station is going to come on the appropriations bill. The anticipated subcommittee allocation that we are now looking at will make it very difficult for us to fund a $1.1-billion increase for VA medical care and a 5-percent increase for NASA which includes $2¼ billion for the space station.

Eighty percent of the outlays in the appropriations bill I chair occur in VA medical care and NASA. If those outlays for new money in 1993 are missing—as they very well may be when we get our allocation—then we are going to have a real debate on this floor over the priorities of the space station versus VA medical care and the National Science Foundation and EPA, and the balance of NASA, meaning NASA science and research.

So I would caution every Member here today who plans to vote either for or against this amendment—that they don't want to fool themselves into thinking this is the last they have heard of this issue.

The real vote is coming later and it will be a much tougher vote than this one.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOWERY of California. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to express my appreciation to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TRAXLER] for his remarks. I tried to indicate earlier that the real problem lies within the constrictions of the budget process here, and that was the reason that we structured our bill to provide a zero-growth option in title I. We were doing that, of course, so as to try to avoid making the work of the authorizing committee completely fruitless by not assuming that there were no restrictions on what could be done. We wanted to have our own set of priorities, but I have recognized, and the committee recognizes that the two priorities will have to be set in the Appropriations Committee, and again I want to thank the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TRAXLER].

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOWERY of California. I will yield to the gentleman from Maryland for 10 seconds.

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding and I just want to rise and to congratulate the gentleman from Indiana. He has raised a very good issue. He and I have talked about it.

I am going to support the position just articulated by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TRAXLER]. But I agree also with the gentleman from Michigan that we are going to have to deal with this issue, and we will deal with it at that time. And I thank the gentleman for yielding and thank the gentleman from Indiana for his amendment.

□ 1850

Mr. LOWERY of California. Mr. Chairman, I rise to express my strong support for the space station Freedom program and to urge my colleagues to oppose the Roemer-Zimmer amendment.

Space station Freedom is the centerpiece of our manned space program and must be continued. It is the essential next step for advancing human exploration of space. The Roemer amendment seeks to prevent that step from ever occurring.

This amendment is simply another attempt to cancel an excellent program that has met every test put to it. The amendment will not reduce the deficit—it does not amend the 1990 budget agreement. It does not lower spending caps, it will simply leave money on the table to be used for other programs—not necessarily NASA programs.

What the amendment would do is damage NASA's ability to carry out a balanced space program. To say that this amendment is not anti-NASA is misleading at best. Canceling space station Freedom will rip the heart out of the manned space program. NASA strongly supports space station Freedom and every Member has received a letter from the new Administrator that clearly states his support for the program. Administrator Goldin deserves an opportunity to develop his own plan to coordinate Freedom with his other priorities.

Mr. Chairman, NASA has met every goal set by Congress for the space station. In 1990, Congress directed NASA to restructure the space station program. NASA took this direction, as well as recommendations from the Augustine Commission, and produced a redesigned space station that is less expensive, smaller, easier to assemble in orbit, and will require fewer shuttle flights to build. NASA has reduced costs, simplified the design, and reduced the complexity of the project. Most importantly, it has produced a quality project.

Freedom will be a research laboratory unsurpassed in the world for life sciences and microgravity research. It is a vital stepping stone to the future. It will enable NASA to conduct research and plan for further human exploration of the solar system in cooperation with our international partners.

The opponents of the space station argue that it has less scientific capability now than it did prior to restructuring. They say it is not a perfect orbiting laboratory and therefore should be canceled. That is wrong.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California [Mr. LOWERY] has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. LOWERY of California was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. LOWERY of California. Mr. Chairman, space station Freedom's scientific capacity will be many times greater than any previous space facility—from sky lab to the Soviet Mir space station. In its man-tended phase from 1997 to 2000, space station Freedom will have over 50 percent more scientific capacity than the Mir. In its permanently manned phase, beginning in the year 2000, space station Freedom will have over 4 times the capability than the Mir station. Space station Freedom will perform more advanced experiments and gather more important and useful data than the Mir or any other previous platform.

As my colleagues will recall, we went through this process last June during consideration of the fiscal year 1992 VA-HUD appropriations bill. By a wide margin, the House voted to continue the space station program. Since that time, the men and women of NASA and the aerospace industry have made excellent progress on the program. Hardware has been tested and the man-tended capability preliminary design review has been completed.

There are over 30,000 people working directly on the program and over 75,000 in related jobs. Over 100,000 people are doing quality work on space station Freedom. These are not make-work jobs. They are scientists, engineers and technicians—the kinds of jobs we all want to promote.

Mr. Chairman, there are all kinds of sound reasons to support the space station. Support can be based on the scientific, technological, or economic benefits of the program. Yet, I always think of the future. This Nation was built by exploration, by looking to the next frontier. The new frontier is space. The space station and manned exploration are the path to that frontier. Let us not be the first generation to shy from the challenge of exploration. Let's keep reaching for the stars. I urge my colleagues to defeat the Roemer amendment and support the NASA authorization bill.

Mr. OBEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, one of the worst sins you can commit around here is to believe your own baloney, and believe you me, I have heard an awful lot of it today.

I just cannot help but swoon when I see the extent to which some people will go to express rapture at the ability of the space station to do everything from solving AIDS to solving cancer; you are going to get a cure for the common cold; you are going to be able to do everything every human being ever wanted to do.

And man, it has a wonderful monicker: "space station Freedom." Man, does that sound terrific.

But the fact is that if you take a look at reality, the reality is that we have got some very tough spending choices in this House. Last month this House voted against taking down the firewalls in the budget which would have allowed us to move money from the military budget into needed investments here at home. That vote failed 187 to 238; 162 Republicans voted against it. They were joined by 76 Democrats, in my view misguided Democrats. In my view, anybody who voted against the taking-down-of-the-walls bill 3 weeks ago has an obligation to vote for this amendment today, because the fact is that with the failure of that bill we are going to be required to reduce current services, domestic discretionary programs, by $7 billion in the coming year, and that is not going to be easy.

To me, the idea that we are going to commit ourselves to spend $40 billion or more to build this turkey while we are not meeting the day-to-day needs of the average American family for education, for health care is absolutely mindless.

I do not think here the issue is one of spending. I think the issue is one of priorities, and it seems to me that we have got to make some tough choices given the fact that that walls bill did not pass.

I do not for the life of me understand, as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TRAXLER] has said many times, how we can decide we are going to spend $40 billion to create safe habitat for a few astronauts floating around the globe when we do not provide decent habitat for people here on the surface. It just seems to me back you know what wards.

It seems to me that this bill is also typical. It is typical of the tendency of so many people in this town to get things backwards by saying in effect that we have core commitment to programs like this that supersedes our commitment to things like the Earthwatch satellite which is aimed at dealing with problems on the globe rather than problems on some other globes.

So I would urge the Members to vote for the gentleman's amendment today. I do not know how many votes this is going to get. But I tell you that when we have a $400 billion deficit, we have got to start going after the military budget, and we have got to start going after some of the big-ticket items that represent pork in the domestic budget.

We have an awful lot of politicians in this House who will pose for political holy pictures on the issue of pork, but, my God, there is no bigger pork item in the domestic budget than this item.

I get calls from my own State university, "Please, vote for it. We have got a piece of the action." Baloney. It is time we recognize that with a $400 billion deficit and with an investment deficit in education, in health care, in physical infrastructure on the surface of this globe we do not have any room in the budget for this turkey. We just do not have the room.

If you voted against taking the walls down in the budget, you have got an obligation to vote for this amendment and to vote for an awful lot of other amendments just like it, because we have got to make those choices.

When we bring the Labor-HEW bill out on this floor which will contain the real cancer research money and the real AIDS research money, where are you going to be then? Are you going to be supporting that bill or not? You know the answer to that. You know the answer to that as well as I do.

Do what is right. Vote for this amendment. Save this money and start making the kinds of choices we have got to make if we are going to bring this deficit under control and have some pennies left for some of the poorest souls in this country who do not get diddley squat from this Congress half the time.

□ 1900

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I have listened patiently to this debate for more than two hours. My responsibility on the Committee on the Budget is to serve as the chairman of the Budget Task Force on Space.

Mr. Chairman, I have been a Member of the Budget Committee for 6 years and I have tried to focus during that period of time on one area primarily, medical research. I have sat in that chair and listened to some of the most outlandish exaggerated claims on medical research that would be accomplished if we would launch space station Freedom.

Mr. Chairman, if patriotism is the last refuge of scoundrels, then claiming research breakthroughs in space is the last refuge of supporters of space station Freedom. Let me tell you why I say that.

As we stand here today and debate whether we will ultimately spend over $150 billion on space station Freedom to launch it and operate it, across town sits the National Institutes of Health.

Mr. Chairman, NIH has the premier responsibility in this Nation to find the cures for the diseases which we have discussed so cavalierly on this floor today.

Now let me tell you what is going on at the National Institutes of Health because of our deficit: Four research grants are approved, one is funded. Whether it is for cancer or AIDS or heart disease, we cannot afford to fund three-fourths of the approved applications for medical research.

In the area of cancer it is even worse. We only fund 1 out of 5 applications for research to find cures for cancer.

Yet the men and women who have taken this well today and argued that we should be launching this laboratory in space have argued that is where we are going to find the cure for cancer, that is where we will find a cure for AIDS. Well, forgive me, I am a simple liberal arts major, I am not a medical doctor nor a researcher, but I will tell you the people who have that responsibility have spoken on this issue.

My friend from Pennsylvania quoted James Michener, the preeminent author in the United States of America who testified before my budget task force yesterday. Mr. Michener is surely committed in his heart to this space program.

What my friend from Pennsylvania did not quote were the six or eight other witnesses, medical doctors who came to answer the basic question: If you are doing research to find a cure for cancer, will you spend your next dollar on space station Freedom or will you spend it at the National Institutes of Health?

Let me tell you the answers they gave because the answers should be part of the RECORD. Dr. David Rosenthal from the American Cancer Society, I quote:

Based on the information we have seen thus far we do not agree that a strong case has been made for choosing to do cancer research in space over critically-needed research here on earth.

Someone said earlier we will find a cure for arthritis. Well, Dr. Shaun Ruddy, of the Arthritis Foundation says, "Simply put there is no osteoporosis research that will be conducted in space that could not be carried out in laboratories here on earth."

And someone said earlier, you know, if we can just get this space station moving all these medical scientists will move over and start working to find these cures in space station Freedom. Not Dr. Maxine Singer of the Carnegie Institution of Washington, an NIH researcher herself. She said and I quote:

It is clear that in terms of time of trained scientists and the cost of the experiments we are many times more likely to achieve significant knowledge sooner here on the planet than in space.

Speaking for the American Federation of Clinical Research Dr. Veronica Catanese said:

At today's funding level the government could support the entire research operation of the National Institutes of Health for 10 years with that investment.

Ten years with the investment we are putting into space station Freedom.

Mr. Chairman, if you want to vote for space station Freedom because it means jobs at home or if you want to vote for it because it means a lot to you to keep the space station in operation, so be it. But do not stand here and delude the Members of this Chamber and the people of this Nation to suggest that the best medical research, the best opportunity to cure AIDS and cancer is somehow far up in space. It is right here in the laboratories of America that are underfunded today because of our budget deficit.

I will tell you, in conclusion, that I think many people believe there is a thrill in space adventure; I am one of them. I have been to a launch, I served on the Committee on Science, Space, and Technology. It is a wondrous thing to see that rocket lift off into the heavens. It is magnificent to see those pictures come back from space. But for this Member of Congress there is more thrill involved in a laboratory experiment that results in a cure that saves a child's life than there is putting $150 billion into this project.

I support the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words and I rise in opposition to this amendment.

Mr. Chairman, my distinguished colleague from Illinois is the Chairman of a Budget Committee task force that has held hearings on the medical research that can be done by the space station and the gentleman who preceded me has certainly made an extensive effort to study this issue. But I had the privilege of attending the hearing that he conducted yesterday and I would like to give perhaps a different perspective on what we heard.

The witnesses from the medical community who testified to us did not debate whether there were medical benefits that might accrue from the medical research on this space station. They did differ on how great those benefits would be, whether they were worth the expense of the program and whether taxpayers' funds could be better spent on other research.

My colleague from Illinois cited witnesses who believed that benefits were not worth the cost. However, let me tell you other witnesses at our hearing believed otherwise.

Dr. Mary Lou Ingram, a senior research scientist at the Huntington Medical Research Institute, told us yesterday about research on tissue cultures treatment for fatal malignant brain tumors. Dr. Ingram stated that "space station Freedom would offer a unique opportunity for long-term studies of tissue cultures in the micro-gravity of space."

Dr. Ronald Merrell, dean of clinical affairs at the University of Texas Health Center told us:

Another promising field is in the area of protein crystal growth. The research in this area, much of it fostered by tests already conducted aboard the space shuttle, may lead to new possibilities in the field of designer drugs.

Mr. Chairman, there are no vast promises made at that hearing yesterday, nor have there been vast promises made on the floor today of quick cures for cancer and AIDS and, nor should we ask such promises or claims of this space station project any more than we should ask the National Institutes of Health to claim that they are going to get a man to the planet Mars.

Mr. Chairman, we should remember, as we involve ourselves in this medical debate, that one of the benefits of the space station is some unique medical research, but there are many other research benefits: Materials, life signs, environmental research. The space station is also about the United States continuing to lead the world in manned exploration in space.

The space station is about international cooperation in the post-cold war era, where we are working with not only Europe and Japan on the project, but potentially Russia as well.

Mr. Chairman, James Michener testified at our hearing that space is the challenge of our age. Permit me to quote from his testimony:

Therefore, we should be most careful about retreating from the specific challenge of our age. We should be reluctant to turn our back upon the frontier of this epoch. Space is indifferent to what we do; it has no feeling, no design, no interest in whether we grapple with it or not. But we cannot be indifferent to space, because the grand slow march of our intelligence has brought us, in our generation, to a point from which we can explore and understand and utilize it. To turn back now would be to deny our history, our capabilities.

Mr. Chairman, there are dozens of reasons to support the space station with the medical research only being but one.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to see if we could agree on a limitation, a verbal agreement. It is urgent that the committee complete this in the very near future and on my part I would be willing to waive all further time for those who oppose the amendment if we could get agreement on ending all debate in say 12 minutes.

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. ROEMER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I would agree to 12 minutes to sum up.

Mr. BROWN. All of that time to go to those who support the amendment.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, there is at least one gentleman over here in support of the amendment who wants to speak.

Mr. BROWN. I heartily agree with the sentiments, but I would like to see if we cannot agree here.

Mr. ROEMER. If he requests to speak in favor of the amendment?

Mr. WALKER. No; he is supporting the space station; he is against the amendment.

1910

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman settle for 1 minute and put the rest of his remarks in the RECORD?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I have sat here and waited for about 2 hours.

Mr. BROWN. I know that is the case, and many others have done the same thing.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I will be brief and may not take 5 minutes, but I would like the opportunity to speak.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to end all debate in 12 minutes and have the time equally divided between the Members who seek additional time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. ROEMER. I would get the 12 minutes; right, Mr. Chairman? I have three speakers left.

Mr. BROWN. The gentleman from Indiana has three speakers left.

Mr. ROEMER. And the gentleman from California [Mr. BROWN] has one.

Mr. WALKER. So, nine and three.

Mr. BROWN. The problem is very simply, Mr. Chairman, if the other side insists on unduly delaying it, then those who oppose the amendment are going to want additional time also, so nothing is certain.

Mr. Chairman, it would be very helpful if we could complete this in 12 minutes and bring it to a vote. Otherwise we will be faced with the probability that we will have to go over until next week.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the time limit?

Mr. ROEMER. I would agree under those ground rules, Mr. Chairman. The gentleman from California [Mr. BROWN] has always been fair to me, and I would agree to 12 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time will be controlled by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER] and the gentleman from California [Mr. BROWN], 6 minutes each.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman object to 15 minutes?

Mr. Chairman, I will make that the unanimous-consent request, that all debate terminate in 15 minutes time, to be divided among those who are standing.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. ATKINS. Objection, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman, I would settle for 20 minutes equally divided.

Mr. WALKER. How about twenty? Thirty? Forty?

The CHAIRMAN. If we cannot have unanimous consent, then for what purpose does the gentleman from California [Mr. CUNNINGHAM] rise?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Twenty minutes is fine.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make another unanimous-consent request, that all debate cease in 20 minutes, to be equally divided.

Mr. FRANK of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. FRANK of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I was on the floor and the gentleman was on the floor, and I asked if we were limiting debate, and I was told no. I am somewhat disappointed.

Mr. BROWN. I am a little disappointed in the gentleman also, to be honest with him. I am making a voluntary request for unanimous consent, and if the gentleman wishes to object, he is free to.

Mr. FRANK of Massachusetts. Then I would object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I speak against the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROEMER], and I understand that jobs is a low priority, as far as a lot of people have spoken, but I take a look at the knowledge of the future generation, and it is not just in medical research, but the joint research that we have with our allies in different areas of high technology, and I think, Mr. Chairman, if we spend dollars for a good investment and we have a return on that investment, medical research has already been discussed as far as cancer, and, Mr. Chairman, the House is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The House will be in order.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. But can we imagine just the environmental studies that can be done? We hear about ozone depletion. We hear about global warming. And I do not know that anyone would say that our astronauts go up on boondoggles. They are hard-working, dedicated individuals, and the work that they would be conducted on space station I think would benefit this planet, not only now, but for in the future as well. If we could have a program that meets all the milestones which we have in space station, its reduced cost, and even restricted those costs for cost savings, those are the kinds of investments that this Congress wants to invest in, the unlimited research capability of the future.

Mr. Chairman, I have a vision that someday we will travel to other planets and to other stars, and I would hope that we would establish colonies on those stations as well, and those would benefit the United States, and I heard the argument or the challenge that maybe, with what the votes were going to be on HHS—well, I think this House just voted to strike and set down the earning test in the jobs that we have for space station which actually help to go to pay for those events.

So, I think this is a win-win situation. I look at what I think that our first astronauts when they said, "One giant step for mankind." Well, I think someday we will have that giant step, and with that the research, the high-technology research, we will have the benefit, not only medical, but the environment of this planet.

Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROEMER] to strike the authorization for the space station.

This debate is important. It has gone on for a long time, and it has been a very good debate, in fact. It has not been acrimonious or personalized in any way. It has been a useful debate. Perhaps, for those who may be on the losing end, it may be all that we have: the time to debate and voice our views on this subject, and so we ought to have that opportunity because this is a debate about priorities. It is a debate about choices we are making in this country for certain values that each of us and those whom we represent consider important.

I have no doubt about our ability to build the space station, the manned orbiting laboratory. I have no doubt about our capability to launch these long-term missions into outer space. It is a matter of science and physics. We have produced very well on those technical matters that result in very high-precision achievements. Mr. Chairman, we have some not so scientifically technical challenges facing us here on Earth that can be accomplished only with the application of an amount of talent and resource equal to that which we are going to be committing over a very long time to this very risky project.

I am for science in outer space, but I think we could do a lot more science for a lot less cost in outer space without having to put people in outer space to do that research. We can do all of this, or a great deal at least of the science that has been talked about this afternoon, without the necessity and the high cost of putting people out there to do it, and we have heard those arguments that we have got to do this, fund this space station, because there is this spinoff, there is that spinoff, and we have heard references to cancer, and references to a cure for AIDS and other so-called research that can be done in outer space as a spinoff.

Well, why wait for a spinoff? Why spend the $150 billion that this project will ultimately cost as the base from which to get some spinoff? Let us spend the $150 billion, invest it directly in those needs, and here is what we could do:

We could increase funding for Head Start by 40 percent, serve an additional 188,000 children instead of spending it on the space station. We could increase funding for AIDS research by 50 percent, to $2.1 billion. We could more than double the $835 million increase of the Federal aid highway program by spending on infrastructure money that we would otherwise be casting off into outer space. We could double the fiscal year 1993 funding for housing assistance and homeless aid, a $1.2 billion increase to take care of housing people on Earth instead of housing the six fit-test among us in outer space.

□ 1920

We could more than double the money available for community health centers, instead of doing this supposititious research in outer space on this proposed space station.

I have heard the argument that we may be able to find the cure for cancer. Well, I will tell you, that falls rather hollow in my case. My wife could not wait for the cure for cancer from outer space, and 40,000 women who this year, will die of breast cancer cannot wait either. They need that money invested here and now, on Earth, in those laboratories that have scientists waiting for the research funds to help them do the research they need to do right here on Earth on those problems of health and life sciences so fundamentally complex and perplexing as cancer research.

Finally, I just hope that if this thing is ever built, and I hope it will not be, that they will find some fresh water out there in outer space, because we are running out of it here on Earth. We ought to be allocating our scarce research dollars to those things that touch life on Earth here and now, now and for future generations of children, instead of appealing to this fantasy of a voyage in outer space that illuminates our imagination, but does nothing—does nothing—for the quality of life that each of us must lead daily in this early existence.

Mr. Chairman, I urge a vote for the Roemer amendment.

Mr. HOAGLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this amendment. I will not take the 5 minutes and will not make a long speech. I just want to make three points.

What I would like to do first is try to bring us back to basics when it comes to funding programs of this magnitude and the fiscal implications of a program like this.

Remember that we are running a deficit of $400 billion this fiscal year. Since 1980 our national debt has increased to nearly $4 trillion. This fiscal year two-thirds of all private savings in the country are being sucked off to pay the annual deficit.

Economists across the board, across the political spectrum, indicate that the current recession is being caused principally by excessive deficit spending, and that the decline in our standard of living and the decline in our increases of productivity nationwide are tied directly to the deficit spending and the huge national debt that we are incurring.

This fiscal year we are going to spend $212 billion on interest on the national debt alone. That is $2,000 per taxpayer. It seems to me in light of that our number one obligation has got to be to get the economy back on the right track. We are not going to get the economy back on the right track with wasteful government spending.

John Kennedy and others have said that a rising tide lifts all boats. Well, let us get all boats lifted around the country by cutting the deficit and getting the economy back on the right track.

Point number two, I know that many Members have received a letter from Friends of the Earth that discusses the environmental satellite funding that is going to be significantly cut by those who want to put all this money into the space station.

The environmental satellites can do concrete things to measure and help us with our environmental concerns and teach us how to do better. There is much more bang for the buck than this space station that we are talking about.

Finally, I do not think any of us have any objection to the space station per se or the things we might learn from it, but let us save it for the future. Maybe at some time in the future, 10 or 15 years from now, we can afford to spend $120 billion over 30 years. But the reality is we cannot afford to spend it now.

So let us say no. Let us just say no to some of this stuff. Let us all sacrifice a little bit. Let us bring the deficit under control.

Mr. GILCHREST. Mr. Chairman, I rise to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the Roemer amendment and support full authorization for space station Freedom. In a world of limited resources, it is important to draw the line between investment-oriented spending and consumption-oriented spending. Space station Freedom is an important investment in our civil space program and is the heart of the manned space program.

Mr. Chairman, space exploration is flawed without manned space flight. Space station Freedom is of major importance to our American aerospace industrial base, and will provide a transition to civil and commercial markets. Aerospace is one of the few U.S. industries to enjoy a favorable and rising balance of trade, $27.2 billion in 1990.

Furthermore, this amendment would not achieve deficit reduction. H.R. 4364 authorizes a total of $15.3 billion in core and discretionary spending, which is less than the President's request, and a slight cut from last year's budget. The cuts made by this amendment would be spent elsewhere.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a comment about the quality of life. We are hearing a lot about inoculations of disease. We are hearing about education. We are hearing about medical research.

Mr. Chairman, all of these things are vastly important. But they depend, the quality of these programs, inoculation of disease, medical research, education, all of these things depend on one fundamental human characteristic which must remain limitless, and that characteristic is the acquisition of knowledge and the limitless possibilities of human curiosity.

When we have an opportunity to bring in an international set of scientists to research the limitless possibilities of those things that are in outer space, I think we ought to go for it.

If we can discuss these things, and we have, and countless numbers of people have told me in the last several months that they are tired of Congress partisan bickering, and this debate for all intents and purposes has stayed away from partisan bickering, we need to discuss this in a nonpartisan manner. We need to understand that the foundation for human achievement is based on knowledge, curiosity, and cooperation on an international scale.

This space station will not find the cure for AIDS in 2 or 3 years. It will not find a cure for cancer in that same amount of time. But what it will do on an international scale is make us take the first correct steps, which will lead us to success in those areas.

Remember when the first men stepped on the Moon in 1969 and said "one small step for man, one giant leap for mankind." I think to a degree this is that same possibility, where we can garner a sense of enthusiasm for ourselves, for this world, for this program, for the next generation.

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I rise to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Roemer amendment and to offer a small reality check in this debate. Today's vote may be viewed as the precursor to the funding battle in the Committee on Appropriations over the space station.

Mr. Chairman, it is easy to support the space station in the abstract without viewing the enormous tradeoffs that this $40 billion expenditure is going to cost us. That is why this NASA authorization is a copout.

This authorization plays hide and seek with a $400 billion deficit. It supports virtually every single program that NASA has dreamt up, placing some in column A and others in column B.

It is painless. There are no hard choices. We can support the space station, space research and technology, gravity probe-B, the national aerospace plane, the Earth observing system, the space shuttle, Cassini, AXAF, ASRM. But we are not living in a world without limits. When the appropriation bill comes to the floor, we will be forced to make hard choices based on limits.

The Subcommittee on VA, HUD and Independent Agencies will be lucky to receive a nominal increase of 2 percent over last year's budget authority. VA medical care will almost certainly eat up the entirety of that 2 percent. So we are looking at a budget that is flat from fiscal year 1992 to fiscal year 1993.

Today, however, we can pretend that we do not have to make that choice. We can pretend that we do not need to weigh the space station against veterans health care, environmental clean-up, math and science funding, housing programs, or other NASA programs.

□ 1930

Today is fantasy day, where every NASA program is a priority and everything gets funded. Last year the chairman of the Subcommittee on VA, HUD and Independent Agencies stood before the House and warned that the space station was going to eat NASA's lunch, and that is what is happening.

In 1991, the space station Freedom took up 13 to 14 percent of the total NASA budget. By 1995, under the authorizing committee's projections, the space station will equal 17½ percent of the NASA allocation. We cannot continue to fund the space station at these levels and keep the other NASA programs going.

The worst thing that we can do is to not be honest today about limits, because 3 years from now, we are going to be back here cannibalizing all of the other NASA programs in order to keep the space station going.

There have been a lot of claims about technology, about the Apollo Program, about the wonders of space. The fact of the matter is that the space station does not provide major scientific breakthroughs. Even the strongest supporters of the space station have been surprisingly lukewarm in official testimony. Dr. Allan Bromley, who chairs the President's Office of Science and Technology Policy, has responsibility to be a chief advocate for the station, said in a hearing before the Subcommittee on VA, HUD and Independent Agencies, and I quote:

When the chips are down, you cannot make the argument to put up the space station on scientific grounds alone. It is not a science project.

It is no secret that there are great concerns about the station doing microgravity research. Indeed, the commercial interest in microgravity research has almost entirely died out. Once again, I quote from Dr. Bromley:

The great enthusiasm for commercial utilization of micro-gravity that was present in the earliest 1980's has tended to wane in recent years; there is not much enthusiasm.

Dr. Bromley even went on further to state that the life scientists believe that space station funding is not the best option. And I quote from Dr. Bromley again.

Given the choice for the same amount of money, life scientists would do it on the surface.

In 1983, space station was expected to cost $8 billion and have an energy capacity of 500 kilowatts. Today, in constant dollars, the space station is expected to cost $11.2 billion, a 40-percent cost overrun, and have a capacity of 75 kilowatts, an 85 percent reduction in power.

It is clear that cost overruns will continue throughout the life of the program, with each new estimate forcing the Congress and NASA to jettison program after program. Is that what we really want?

I hope we support the Roemer amendment.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Chairman, I rise and would just like to thank again the gentleman from California [Mr. BROWN] for his patience and graciousness, and the minority Members. And I would like to make a plea with Members in this body for 15 minutes of this next rollcall vote to not think they are in a Hall of this Chamber, this distinguished Chamber, but think instead they are in a town meeting in Indiana or Tennessee or Missouri or California and think about the expenditure of this $40 billion to build it, maybe $140 billion over 40 years to maintain it, up in space with the problems here on Earth, with the squeeze on the great NASA programs that are returning good science and health and job technology spinoffs.

When we think about that and think about what people in this country are going through right now with problems, with the $400 billion deficit, think not about what Neil Armstrong said, "One small step for man, one giant leap for mankind." We need to make tough choices here.

Think instead of one small step for Congress, one giant leap for the American voter and taxpayer.

I urge the Members to have the courage to vote with us on this motion.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, the one thing that did not come out in any of the opponents of space station's arguments here that I think needs to be understood is the fact that we do have this space station on this budget under essentially a freeze.

We have managed to be fiscally responsible in this bill.

To cut the space station will simply eliminate capacity from NASA to do its job, and it will not in any way diminish our ability to deal with the deficit.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman, I would like in conclusion of my time, this does not preclude the debate, if any Member wishes to speak, unfortunately, I would just like to say that while this debate has been lengthy, I think it has been constructive.

As the gentleman has said, it has not been a partisan debate. It has been a debate between those who had a difference of priorities as to what was good for this country. It has been bipartisan in the best use of the word.

I think the gentleman from Indiana is to be complimented because he has certainly mobilized a very strong show of support for the set of priorities that he has. And of course, that is what he was elected to do. And I think his constituents should be appreciative of the effectiveness with which he has presented his case.

Mr. Chairman, with that, I have nothing further to add, and I would hope we can come to a vote on this.

Mr. PASTOR. Mr. Chairman, today I rise in support of the amendment offered by my distinguished colleague Representative TIM ROEMER of Indiana to the NASA authorization (H.R. 4364). This amendment would delete funding for the space station Freedom, except for close-down costs. Title I of the bill authorizes $2.25 billion in fiscal year 1993, $2.5 billion in fiscal year 1994, and $2.7 billion in fiscal year 1995 for this program.

We have spent many hours in this Chamber trying to find ways to cut spending and to increase revenues. We must re-examine our priorities and the cost-benefit of our decisions. In good conscience, I cannot vote to continue to construct a $40 billion space station. This amendment is a downpayment on our budget deficit and our social deficit. Our infrastructure is in need of repair. Our children's education needs are unmet. We can't find the funds to pay for health care of our elderly. Disease and poverty continue to tear at the fabric of our society. Too many of our people are without housing. Our industries are losing market shares. All these needs and more are exacerbated by a recession that drags on and on and a budget deficit that defies control.

Mr. Chairman, I recognize the importance of science and technology to our future as an economic and military power and I am keenly aware of the impact of the space station on jobs, especially jobs in my State and my district. But, $2.25 billion in one basket when so many other baskets, including some in science and technology, are in need is not the wisest way to spend scarce funds.

Mr. HOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to this amendment.

I am not wild about the direction our space program is taking. I worry that we might face significant cost overruns as we try to put the program in place. Some of the technology involved in this effort is fragile. It seems to me that we may be putting all our eggs in one basket.

However, H.R. 4364 does not cause the Government to spend one dime on the space station or any other NASA program. No checks will be cut as a result of this bill's passage. The bill is simply a statement that we consider certain NASA programs more important than others.

Within a few months we will have the opportunity to vote on the VA, HUD, NASA appropriations bill. At that time, we will know how much is available for these programs. We may choose to spend more on NASA; we may choose to spend less. Frankly, I would prefer that we spend less on all Government activities. Every single account must take a hit if we are ever to get a handle on our $400 billion deficit. This is the real priority.

Mr. Chairman, I cannot guarantee that I will support full funding for the space station during the appropriations process. However, I accept the right of the administration and of the committee to set priorities within NASA. Let's move the process forward so we can decide whether or not to fund all these priorities. Oppose the Roemer amendment and support H.R. 4364.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the Roemer amendment to halt production of the space station.

This is the year we will truly feel the effects of the 1990 budget agreement's spending limits.

I realize that the committee has tried to craft a bill which balances all of NASA's programs and goals. However, I cannot accept the argument that we should treat this authorization bill as a wish list to be considered in a vacuum. In my opinion, this legislation will have a very real and profound impact on housing and veterans' programs.

By their very nature authorization bills set the priorities of how Congress spends money. Mr. ROEMER's amendment recognizes this fact. It recognizes that developing new technologies is important, but wasting limited resources on the ill-conceived space station is not. This amendment recognizes that other NASA research on a scale that is commensurate with today's tough economic times can lead to environmental clean-up technologies that will create jobs and restore environmentally devastated areas.

As someone who remembers the awe and wonder of the Mercury, Gemini, and Apollo missions, I cannot say I oppose the grander visions of NASA. However, there come times when we must make hard decisions. We must ask ourselves what is needed the most—housing here or stations in space? I cannot vote in good conscience to provide extraterrestrial accommodations at the expense of thousands and thousands here on earth.

Mr. Chairman, I ask my colleagues to join me in supporting this amendment.

Mr. MINETA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong opposition to the amendment offered by my colleague from Indiana, Mr. ROEMER. Our friend from Indiana would have Members believe that the space station is a luxury. But the space station is hardly a luxury, Mr. Chairman. America's space station is a necessity.

Ever since the Soviet's launched the first Sputnik 35 years ago and America's space program then came together with meaningful, long-term goals and achievements, our space program has helped educate our children, stimulate high-technology industries, and generate countless medical breakthroughs.

By the end of this decade, space station Freedom will be a permanent, world-class, international scientific laboratory, helping to develop new technologies to spur on new industries for the 21st century.

Some of our colleagues, Mr. Chairman, would have us believe that the Roemer amendment will reduce the Federal deficit. This is not so. Not one penny of the money saved will go toward deficit reduction. The budget process simply does not work that way.

Supporters of the Roemer amendment would also have us believe that an American space station will come at the expense of other science research. To that, Mr. Chairman, I'll say only that I help represent California's Silicon Valley here in the House. My support of science research and technology is both long-standing and second to no one.

So let me put this canard to rest. Other worthwhile projects are not suffering because of the space station. Not a single science program has been canceled due to the space station.

The Science, Space, and Technology Committee has always supported a mix of small and large science programs, and has maintained a balance between them. This bill maintains that balance. So, Mr. Chairman, a vote in favor of the space station is a vote in favor of America's most visionary science programs.

The space station is the centerpiece for the European, Japanese, and Canadian space programs. It is the very foundation of our leadership status in space. Cancellation of the space station will turn our partners into unnecessary competitors.

Mr. Chairman, our space program is about where this Nation will go and what we will do in the international laboratory of outer space. Our Speaker of the House, the Honorable TOM FOLEY agrees.

Mr. Chairman, I ask for unanimous consent to include in the RECORD a statement by the Speaker in strong support of space station Freedom and the NASA authorization bill, and from that statement I will quote only this:

The Space Station budget has been planned to ensure balance with the rest of the Federal science budget and to provide opportunities for low-cost, high-payoff small science projects.* * *

We must recognize the importance of investing in our future.* * * I urge my colleagues to continue to support our nation's space program as envisioned by the Committee and vote for this important bill as reported.

And Mr. Chairman, that means voting "no" on the Roemer amendment.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Chairman, as we approach the end of this century, we have an opportunity to go where no man or woman has gone before in the area of space exploration. Exploration of space will unlock not only the secrets of the heavens, but also will yield many yet undiscovered solutions to problems here in Earth, especially in areas such as the environment, medicine, and manufacturing technologies. If we fail to grasp this opportunity because of shortsighted, misplaced funding priorities, current and future generations of this planet will pay the price in a lack of knowledge and technology.

The legislation before us today, which authorizes future funding for this Nation's space agency—NASA—is the right step toward fully realizing the dream of future space exploration.

This bill fully funds space station Freedom, a permanently manned Earth orbiting research facility that will provide data on the effects of space on the human body—data that will be invaluable to future manned space flight—as well as providing an orbiting laboratory around our own blue planet to help monitor and hopefully solve persistent problems such as famine, pollution, and weather disasters. If we are to bridge the gap between Earth and space, and use space to help solve problems here on Earth, space station Freedom is vital and must be fully funded.

This legislation also provides funding for the national aerospace plane, the NASP, an experimental aircraft that like its early predecessors, the X-1, X-2, and X-15, promises to usher in a revolutionary new era of transport by challenging the hypersonic speed barrier, perhaps making global transportation a matter of minutes rather than days or hours.

I also hope that an amendment by one of my colleagues, Mr. ZIMMER, will be included in this legislation. His proposal would make available the decades of work by former-Soviet scientists for use by our own space agency. It still remains to be seen just how valuable this information may be, but this proposal will help us examine their technology and judge its value for ourselves.

Of course, as with nearly all legislation, there is a problem with this bill. Despite the efforts and wishes of the President, NASA, and our space service—the U.S. Air Force, there is not adequate funding for a new national launch system [NLS]. Therefore, we must continue to rely on a hodgepodge of 1950's ICBM's that were never originally designed to be space launch vehicles. The NLS is just the system we need, a foundation for the future. Unfortunately, without NLS, we will continue to use 1957 Edsels while others, such as the French with the Arianne, use 1990 Lamborghinis.

Despite this lack of NLS funding, H.R. 4364 is still a good bill, and I urge my colleagues to continue to support adequate space funding and allow this country to conquer the final frontier.

Mr. Chairman, I submit an important article to add to this debate titled, "Countdown to Freedom."

COUNTDOWN TO FREEDOM

"America has always been greatest when we dared to be great." President Ronald Reagan declared in his January 25, 1984, State of the Union address. "We can reach for greatness again. We can follow our dreams to distant stars, living and working in space for peaceful, economic and scientific gain." The President then proclaimed, in his best John F. Kennedy rhetoric: "Tonight, I am directing NASA to develop a permanently manned space station, and to do it within a decade."

Following Reagan's "call to station," James Beggs, then chief of NASA, testified before Congress that an orbiting outpost constituted a "next logical step" for American space prowess. Better yet, such a station could be "bought by the yard," said Beggs, meaning that the facility could be expanded over time, depending on funding NASA would receive in the future. And better still, an unembellished price tag for the initial complex was placed at $8 billion.

Congress responded by honoring NASA's 1985 budget request of $150 million for research and development of the station. Given real money, the U.S. space station at last became a reality. President Reagan later christened the orbiting complex "Space Station Freedom," selecting the name after reviewing hundreds of suggestions from NASA employees, contractors and other citizenry.

Slicing through the vacuum of space 250 miles above the Earth, a base in space, claimed supporters, would permit microgravity experiments in the life sciences in order to prepare humans for long space sojourns. Free of the one-gravity tug of Earth, space station crews could crank out made-in-space metals, glasses and lifesaving medicines of purity levels now unattainable. Earth and astronomical observations could be carried out from the station as well.

As a servicing facility, space station astronauts would become orbital mechanics. Working in a special work shed, astronauts would adjust, upgrade and repair spaceborne observatories like the Hubble Space Telescope.

Furthermore, the station could act as a spaceport, routinely discharging crews and hardware to the Moon and Mars—a task done more economically and productively from space than from the surface of Earth.

Space Station Freedom would consist of four modules, each nearly the size of a house-trailer, secured to a 508-foot-long truss. A crew of eight men and women would occupy the facility and would reside on board in three- to six-month shifts. Stuffed inside the modules, racks were to be brimming with scientific apparatus and the amenities needed for eating, sleeping, exercising and productively working in a weightless world.

Among its hardware building duties, the United States would provide a habitation module and a laboratory module. Europe and Japan would fashion station segments to carry out additional experiments. Canada would evolve its robot arm work for the space shuttle to create a Mobile Servicing System that would be critical in helping assemble the station, as well as moving equipment and supplies.

Four outstretched solar arrays at each end of the station's long support boom, along with batteries, would energize the station with 75,000 watts of electricity—enough power to run 25 all-electric homes on Earth.

Building Freedom would be no easy task. Some 20 shuttle flights over three years were manifested to haul up the requisite materials to assemble the station. Astronaut construction teams would piece linkable struts together in Tinker-Toy fashion to shape Freedom's skeleton-like truss. Much of the station would be fit together in orbit.

In 1990, NASA estimated that the initial piece of Freedom hardware would be orbited in 1995, with enough station hardware in space by 1996 to enable astronauts to visit the facility for short periods. This "shuttle-tended" capability was then to lead to permanent staffing of Freedom by July 1997, according to space agency planners.

It was all heady stuff—but headed for trouble. Over the past eight years, Space Station Freedom has been refocused, reshaped and redefined numerous times. Rising costs as well as budget slashes called for by Congress, coupled with a series of technical snags, prompted the station restructuring. Modifications to Freedom were also sparked by the tragic loss of the Challenger and its crew in 1986.

In March 1991, NASA presented its latest repackaged space station plan to Congress. The new design would be cheaper, smaller and easier to piece together in orbit and would require fewer shuttle flights to build.

The cost? Space Station Freedom's sticker price through 1999 is now estimated at $30 billion. By stretching out the program and reducing its size, over $8 billion was chopped off. But another tally, however, caught the ear of Congress. The government's own financial watchdog, the General Accounting Office, estimated that the total program cost to the U.S. for building and operating Freedom through its 30-year lifetime—to the year 2027—would ring the cash register at $118 billion.

Last year was considered by NASA to be a watershed year for Freedom. Powerful forces within Congress voted to eliminate the station's funding, attempting to short-circuit and terminate NASA's work in progress.

"The space station concept began eight years ago as a worthy symbol embodying our highest hopes for American technological accomplishment and space leadership," explained Senator Dale Bumpers (D-Ark.) who led a Senate fight against Freedom. "Sadly, the space station has veered sharply from its original course. It is a technological shadow of its former self," said the legislator.

Yet, despite the political pot-shots, Freedom survived the budget battle. With an almost audible sigh of relief, NASA rolled up its sleeves and began working on the space station in earnest.

"The train is moving pretty quick," says NASA's Richard Kohrs, director of the Space Station Freedom program. "We're cutting metal and have a lot of momentum. The morale is high." According to Kohrs, the program now employs close to 20,000 people directly and over 70,000 people indirectly.

As a product of the 1991 around-the-clock redesign of the space station, a host of changes were prescribed, Kohrs noted. Among them, the U.S. Laboratory and Habitation modules were shortened by about 40 percent from 44 feet in length to 27 feet long and 14.5 feet in diameter. The smaller size and weight allows the modules to be fully outfitted and tested on the ground prior to being launched into orbit. The number of crew members was reduced from eight to four, and the station's electrical power level was reduced to 65,000 watts, generated by three sets of solar cell-laden wings instead of four, as previously scripted.

To minimize astronaut space walks, a "preintegrated" 216 foot-long-truss will be used, lessening the time allocated for its assembly and checkout in space. "We are reporting now that we have one [space walk] every three weeks for maintenance" Kohrs says.

Weighing in at over half a million pounds, a fully assembled space station now requires 17 shuttle flights spread over four years. A target date for sending the first piece of station hardware into orbit is November 1995. By December 1996, astronauts will be able to board the station for a series of brief 13-day visits. Barring schedule delays or shuttle problems, Space Station Freedom should be ready for permanent boarding in September 1999.

Across the country, throughout a chain of NASA research centers and support contractors melded together in "work packages," aerospace firms like Boeing, McDonnell Douglas, Rocketdyne, Rockwell and Grumman are moving Space Station Freedom from blueprints to flight hardware.

"The Space Station Freedom program has come a long way," Arnold Aldrich, associate administrator for NASA's Office of Space Systems Development, said recently. "The program management is stable and we are on schedule and within cost targets. We have made real, tangible progress this past year. The program continues to make critical advances every day."

Indeed, more than 32,000 of Freedom's 64,000 solar cells that comprise the first solar array have been built and are in storage. Prototyping of Freedom's airlocks, control systems and communications hardware is also underway. "It feels good to see engineers building things, not redesigning things," Kohrs says.

In a "this taste buds for you" test program, groups of volunteers have validated the design of the station's Environmental Control and Life Support System, which reclaims drinking water and shower water from urine and sweat.

In February, two key space station facilities—the Space Station Control Center and the Space Station Training Facility—were dedicated at NASA's Johnson Space Center in Houston, Texas. The Kennedy Space Center in Florida is on schedule to activate in 1994 the Space Station Processing Facility that will prepare and check hardware before shuttle sendoff. At the Marshall Space Flight Center, based in Huntsville, Alabama, facilities are being readied to prepare experiments and monitor the scientific investigations to be carried out aboard Freedom.

Up in space, equipment such as heat rejecting radiators and carts that can help spacewalking astronauts freely move about on Freedom's exterior have already been tested during several space shuttle missions. This May, on the first flight of the space shuttle Endeavour, three back-to-back space walks will simulate procedures necessary for space station assembly.

According to NASA's Kohrs, Space Station Freedom still faces a set of challenging hurdles. "In all honesty, weight and power is still a tough problem," he says. "But all programs, be it NASA, the military, or even commercial airline programs, go through similar problems."

Another hurdle space engineers are grappling with, explains the space station director, is the threat of space debris. Critical areas of the station, such as propellant and oxygen tanks and crew areas, may receive special shielding material to thwart high velocity impacts of certain sizes of space junk. Large fragments of orbital clutter, detectable by radar, may require Freedom to adjust its orbit to avoid collision.

Yet another pricey item for the Freedom program is an Assured Crew Return Vehicle (ACRV). This is NASA's polite term for a "lifeboat" that could be used in the event of a medical emergency, a station catastrophe or problems that could force the grounding of the shuttle fleet. An ACRV is mandatory, NASA has stated, before astronauts begin to permanently reside in the station. Some estimates peg an ACRV at as much as $2 billion. This has fueled discussion of buying a less expensive ACRV, the Russian Soyuz spacecraft, that routinely ferries cosmonauts back and forth between Earth and the Mir space station.

It is NASA's ambition to expand the station after the year 2000, largely back to the original plan. For example, yet another solar array would raise the station's energy level to 75,000 watts. Provisions for four additional crew members, a second laboratory and other equipment would also be added. There would never be an "assembly complete" date for the station, but a full-circle realization of James Beggs' approach of "buying by the yard."

Kohrs envisions the eventual use of a heavy lift booster to hurl large pieces of hardware into space, either to add to Freedom, or to begin building a new space station, dedicated entirely to microgravity manufacturing.

"I've always thought if we got in orbit and had real breakthroughs in materials sciences, this country would probably go ahead with a unique microgravity lab," says Kohrs. "But, we have to grow into that. All indications are that you can grow things quicker and more pure in space. But, you have to be real careful that you don't sell something on promise, but sell something on facts."

The fact is, Space Station Freedom is fast becoming real hardware. What future hiccups, technical and political, await the project is anyone's guess.

But remember what the future used to be? Recall the 1968 movie image of a turn-of-the-century space station captured in Stanley Kubrick's epic, 2001: A Space Odyssey, replete with a Pan Am space clipper? We've clearly fallen behind schedule . . . and Pan Am's gone out of business.

"I just hope and pray," Kohrs quietly says, "we don't have to go through another major perturbation with our contractors and the team. I think we've got this ball rolling pretty good."

(Leonard Davis is former director of research for the National Commission on Space, and is now director of Space Data Resources and Information in Washington, D.C.)

Mr. OLVER. Mr. Chairman, we are faced today with a critical issue that will test our priorities, and our commitment to the future of America's space program. As a scientist, and member of the Science, Space, and Technology Committee, I believe in space research and exploration, and I believe that America can be a world leader in the sciences, here on Earth, and beyond the confines of our atmosphere.

But I must state clearly and unequivocally that the space station Freedom is a mistake.

The idea of the space station encompasses so much of what our Nation prides itself in—exploring uncharted territories; imagining what can come of hard work and bold determination; and an unrelenting desire to meet new and glorious challenges. Unfortunately, the reality of the space station is the American dream turned nightmare.

Its price tag, 8 years ago estimated at around $8 billion, now stands at an astonishing $118 billion. I ask my colleagues how we can possibly claim to believe in better education, crime control, and health care—how we can honestly say we are being fiscally responsible—if we vote to spend this amount of money on a program that is likely to give so little in return.

With our budget constraints, and with so much work needed here at home—this project is truly a misplaced priority.

Despite this extraordinary cost—the space station has not and never will live up to its potential.

The station's mission has been greatly diminished, to the point where the mission is no longer the reason for its existence. NASA now tells us the sole reason for the station is to prove America's preeminence in space. To anyone who may vote for the space station today, I ask you to first imagine how you would explain this rationale to an unemployed worker, a family without health care, or a teenager unable to afford college. My constituents can identify many other areas in which America could wisely establish world preeminence—with $118 billion.

The station's technical merit has been roundly assailed in the scientific community—no one is really sure if the planned experiments are compatible, if the facilities are adequate for long-term habitation, or if we will even be able to move astronauts to and from the station. What scientists do agree on is that nearly all of the research can be done with existing technology. If we need new technology to finish the job, surely we can do it without building the next Titanic.

To stake the future of the American space program on a fundamentally flawed and fiscally irresponsible space-bound luxury liner could, in the end, leave us and our children stranded and Earth-bound for decades to come. Perhaps more importantly, this program is an affront to the taxpayers, who are rightfully enraged when they see Government unable to define its spending priorities, and never able to meet its budgets.

I urge my colleagues to support the Roemer amendment.

Mr. HUCKABY. Mr. Chairman, I rise because I am concerned that if we cancel space station Freedom we will be closing the door to our Nation's future.

Space station Freedom has for too long been a political football. We in Congress have kicked the space station around until it bears little resemblance to the original program.

Many of the changes Congress demanded were for the better. Some of the changes we can argue about. But the basic fact remains that we in Congress took a hand in shaping space station Freedom. We have become active partners in this enterprise. NASA has accommodated our every change, and with full funding this past year the program has made tremendous progress. And yet there are those that want us to walk away from our creation.

What is it that we are walking away from?

We are walking away from our manned space program. The space station is the cornerstone for a future that takes us into our solar system. We have done about all we can without it. If you say you want to cancel it, what you are really saying is that you want to cancel the manned program.

We are walking away from global leadership. Space station Freedom is America's marker, a symbol of our determination that we will retain our technological leadership in an increasingly competitive world.

We are walking away from jobs. Space station Freedom currently provides jobs for about 75,000 Americans. And these are high-technology jobs, jobs that Americans work with pride and true craftsmanship. Just ask the United Auto Workers or the International Association of Machinists. They'll tell you. If you ask, they will tell you that the space station jobs are the kind of jobs that we here in Congress keep complaining that we are losing to our overseas competitors.

We are walking away from our responsibilities to our children—space station Freedom is a bridge between us and the next generation of Americans. The space station is a torch that we will pass to our children. It is a positive endeavor that will inspire our children and stimulate their interest in math, science, and engineering.

Cancel space station Freedom and we walk away from this. And more. We walk away from exploration. We walk away from pushing back the unknown. That is not the way of America and it should not be the way of this Congress.

Mr. DOOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise today in support of a cut in the space station. I believe we need to better prioritize our spending and our investing.

Mr. ROEMER's amendment isn't a referendum on space station Freedom. It's about spending priorities. It's about whether we as a nation can afford this investment today. The answer is no.

Like any business owner, I am faced with choices on my farm all the time about investing in equipment and other needs. I set priorities predicated upon whether I can afford these investments.

Our country and this House face investment choices, too.

In America's dire economic climate right now, an investment in the space station should be viewed as a reduction in our investment in education.

It should be seen as a reduction in our investment in health care.

And it should be seen as a reduction in our investment in helping American families.

Today's investment decision is clear. I urge my colleagues to support the Roemer amendment.

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the Roemer amendment.

I hope that my colleagues will resist the temptation to look at this amendment as a simple way to reduce the deficit. The Roemer amendment is not without its own costs—costs that will surely outweigh the benefit of a one time savings in this year's deficit calculations.

By eroding United States competitiveness and technological superiority, by sacrificing United States preeminence in the field of space exploration, and by failing to invest in America's future, the Roemer amendment will cost us far more than the savings it attempts to deliver today.

Today, U.S. industry receives stand-out performances from two areas in particular: Our aerospace industry and our computer industry. Our ability to maintain U.S. competitiveness in these two fields depends on their ability to innovate. This Government's commitment to a program like the space station ensures a trail of commercial spinoffs that will make our lives better and our industries more competitive.

One simple example is in the area of microgravity research. The space station's ability to produce crystals in a microgravity environment could lead us to a technological breakthrough in the area of computer electronics and fiberoptic telecommunications.

These areas alone form the foundation of nearly all economic activity in which we engage. The question is not "Can we afford to build the space station?" The real question is "Can we afford not to build the station—not to invest in our own future."

Space station Freedom is at the core of our manned space program. Without such a program, NASA is unlikely to garner widespread support from the American public. Neither will NASA be able to capture the imagination of America's children—tomorrow's pilots, scientists and engineers.

The exploration of space continues to fascinate Americans, young and old. It should remain a central component of a balanced space program.

We face a challenge today—in the same way that John F. Kennedy challenged an earlier generation of lawmakers to support a space program designed to put a man on the moon.

We can choose to invest in our future. We can embrace a program that promises scientific advances that will make us the technological leaders throughout the next century. And most of all, we can fire the American imagination and unleash our ability to undertake and to complete great tasks.

I urge my colleagues to defeat the Roemer amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, since Neil Armstrong made his first historic steps on the Moon, each new generation of Americans has yearned to be astronauts, to float weightless above our atmosphere, and to explore what lies beyond our known universe. Books, movies, and television excite young minds with the adventure of space travel and the joy of discovery. Are these mysteries of space only to be found in the world of make-believe, or can ingenuity and hard work make real what was once only imagined? I believe we have an opportunity to make a dream reality by voting to support the space station.

Opponents of the space station argue that we cannot afford to build it. I would argue that we can't afford not to. What value can be placed on the information and inspiration provided by the space station? How do you measure the benefit of the 75,000 jobs currently related to the station, or the thousands of future jobs sure to result from its production and deployment? Beyond these economic benefits, the station will also be a unique and unprecedented scientific research laboratory. Our space program has generated innumerable technological breakthroughs and spinoff applications that have resulted in tremendous advances in medicine, satellites, and composite materials. The permanently manned orbiting laboratory also promises a whole host of new technologies and applications, the scope and impact of which we can only imagine. An advance observation platform like the space station will be invaluable to continued research in space.

Our commercial industries have also benefited from our strong space program. The United States is the world leader in space and aerospace-related products. Aerospace products currently provide a healthy trade surplus, and the international applications of the space station will only increase our leadership in these critical industries. Slashing our space program would be a grave mistake that would have dramatic negative impacts on our trade deficit and national economy. Furthermore, in light of the predicted growth in fields such as high-speed computers, communications, and health care, a strong space science program is needed to continue our technological leadership in these areas.

Civilian aerospace also provides the most direct technology and skilled worker transfers from our currently shrinking defense industry. With our economy still suffering, a smooth transition from defense-related to civilian-related jobs is essential. The defense draw down is already costing thousands of jobs in my southern California district. To simultaneously make severe cuts in the space program is shockingly irresponsible. Growth in the satellite, composite materials, electronics or other civilian aerospace industries would greatly lessen the blow of defense cuts. A strong space program not only preserves jobs today, but it promises to ensure more jobs for the future.

The space station's wide range of capabilities make it central to our entire space program. Cutting the station would be counterproductive to much of the research and development currently underway, and would undermine the reorganization efforts of NASA's new chief, Daniel Goldin. This is a time to show support for NASA and to encourage an atmosphere of renewed vigor and efficiency, not to handcuff the new administrator with drastic funding cuts.

My views on a robust space program are shared by scientists, industry leaders, many of my colleagues on both sides of the aisle, and by the vast majority of the American people. Space station Freedom represents the centerpiece of our forward-looking program, and may be the next "giant leap" for the United States, and indeed, all mankind. I encourage my colleagues to reject the Roemer amendment and support space station Freedom.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROEMER].

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the yeas appeared to have it.

The Clerk announced the following pair:

On this vote:

Mr. AuCoin for, with Mr. Annunzio against.

Mr. McDERMOTT and Mr. BREWSTER changed their vote from "aye" to "no."

Messrs. ALLARD, GORDON, and HERGER changed their vote from "no" to "aye."

So the amendment was rejected.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

□ 2000

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman, it is my intention to move that the Committee rise and that we move on to the next bill. But before I do that, I would like to say that the Committee would like to return to this bill and complete title I but have no further rollcalls on the bill that we are presently considering, and I think the minority has approved that and the leadership has approved that.

Mr. Chairman, with that announcement, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HARRIS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 4364) to authorize appropriations to the National Aeronautics and Space Administration for research and development, space flight, control and data communications, construction of facilities, research and program management, and Inspector General, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. HOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, on rollcall vote 90, I voted "yes" on the Roemer amendment to H.R. 4364—the NASA authorization bill.

Insomuch as I had issued a statement for the RECORD stating my opposition to the Roemer amendment, I ask unanimous consent that the permanent RECORD register my opposition on rollcall vote 90.

MAKING IN ORDER TWO RESOLUTIONS ON A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGES OF THE HOUSE

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it be in order, without the intervention of any motion, to consider a resolution to be offered by the majority leader or his designee as a question of the privileges of the House, that debate on the resolution continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the majority leader and the minority leader, or their designees, that the previous question be considered as ordered on the resolution to final adoption without intervening motion, and that the resolution on final adoption not be subject to a demand for a division of the question; and further that immediately upon disposition of that resolution it shall be in order, without the intervention of any motion, to consider a resolution to be offered by the minority leader or his designee as a question of the privileges of the House, that debate on the resolution continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the minority leader and the majority leader, or their designees, that the previous question be considered as ordered on the resolution to final adoption without intervening motion, and that the resolution on final adoption not be subject to a demand for a division of the question.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

PRIVILEGES OF THE HOUSE—DIRECTING RELEASE OF CERTAIN MATERIALS RELATING TO INQUIRY OF THE OPERATION OF THE BANK OF THE SERGEANT AT ARMS

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the order of the House just agreed to, I offer a privileged resolution (H. Res. 440) directing the release of certain materials relating to the inquiry of the operation of the bank of the Sergeant at Arms pursuant to House Resolution 236 in a manner consistent with enforcement of criminal law and procedure, respect for the constitutional structure of government and the individual rights assured to all citizens, and the expectation of the public that the legal process will be impartial and fair, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. RES. 440

Directing the release of certain materials relating to the inquiry of the operation of the bank of the Sergeant at Arms pursuant to House Resolution 236 in a manner consistent with enforcement of criminal law and procedure, respect for the constitutional structure of government and the individual rights assured to all citizens, and the expectation of the public that the legal process will be impartial and fair.

Whereas, on March 27, 1992, Attorney General William Barr, appointed former federal Judge Malcolm A. Wilkey as Special Counsel to the Attorney General to conduct a preliminary inquiry into possible violations of the criminal law arising out of the operations of the former House bank; and

Whereas, shortly thereafter, employees of the former House bank were made available for interviews in accordance with Judge Wilkey's request and in the spirit of cooperation by the House of Representatives with the preliminary inquiry; and,

Whereas, on April 20, 1992, the Speaker of the House, on behalf of himself and the Republican leader, forwarded to Judge Wilkey a letter informing him that it would be inconsistent with the Rules of the House of Representatives to provide copies of the records sought by Judge Wilkey without the matter being fully considered by the entire House upon its reconvening the following week; and,

Whereas, on April 21, 1992, while the House remained in recess, Judge Wilkey caused to be issued subpoenas to the Acting Chairman of the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct and to the Sergeant at Arms of the House of Representatives calling for production by April 28, 1992, of all records of the former House bank which include all transactions of every person who used the former House bank during a 39-month period, such as Members without overdrafts, Member's spouses, employees, members of the press, and the members of the public, as well as deposit slips and monthly statements of all Members: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the House of Representatives shall comply with the subpoenas issued in connection with the preliminary inquiry of the Special Counsel, in a manner consistent with (1) enforcement of criminal law and procedure; (2) respect for the constitutional structure of government and the individual rights assured to all citizens; and (3) the expectation of the public that the legal process will be impartial and fair: Be it further

Resolved, That microfilm rolls shall be collected by the Sergeant at Arms and he shall promptly undertake to expeditiously have reproduced in documentary form, using the best available modern technology, the forty-one rolls of microfilm sought by the subpoena: Be it further

Resolved, The Sergeant at Arms shall obtain from the United States District Court a determination of the enforceability of the subpoena including its materiality and relevance and shall upon receipt of such determination notify the House of the Court's determination: Be it further

Resolved, The Sergeant at Arms, after providing notification to the House, is authorized and directed to comply with the subpoena consistent with the Court's determination: Be it further

Resolved, That the House relies upon the assurances of the Special Counsel that he will take such steps as are necessary to provide full protection for the confidentiality of the records provided: Be it further

Resolved, Consistent with this resolution that it is the will of the House to maintain such communication and cooperation with the Special Counsel as will promote the ends of justice consistent with the privileges and rights of the House and its Members.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BONIOR). The resolution states a question of privilege.

Under the unanimous-consent agreement, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GEPHARDT] will be recognized for 30 minutes and the gentleman from Utah [Mr. HANSEN] will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GEPHARDT].

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume, to begin the debate, to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FOLEY], the distinguished Speaker of the House.

□ 2010

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, this is a solemn hour, in my view, for the House of Representatives and for the rights and privileges of the House and for its Members.

By decision of the Attorney General earlier this year, Judge Malcolm Wilkey was appointed as the Attorney General's Special Counsel. Shortly after that time Judge Wilkey made a request to the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct for all the rolls of microfilm used by the committee in its review of bank operations, for the 39 months of that committee's review. In addition to that, the judge made requests for all the working papers of the committee.

Following that, and after discussion with the bipartisan leadership, I requested a meeting with the Attorney General for the purpose of discussing with him and with Judge Wilkey what I thought was the extraordinary scope and reach of this request.

At that meeting, which took place on the 13th of April, with the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BROOKS], the distinguished acting chairman of the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, the gentleman from New York [Mr. McHUGH], the majority leader, the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GEPHARDT], and myself, and representatives of the Republican leadership, I urged strongly that Judge Wilkey reconsider the scope of his demand and make more specific the purpose for which he was seeking the documents and narrow the request. At every turn of our discussion, I think it is fair to say that Judge Wilkey insisted, that while he had no interest in those Members or their accounts who had not shown any overdrafts, he needed not just the overdrafted checks of those other Members of the House, but all of their bank records, their total account records. In that position he was insistent and, I say with respect, inflexible and continuing.

I told Judge Wilkey and the Attorney General that we would consult with the Parliamentarian because it was my judgment that, notwithstanding a suggestion that I, as Speaker, could make such a delivery to the Special Counsel's office, I felt, personally, that I was not charged with, nor would I assume that right under the rules of the House.

When, with Mr. MICHEL's consent, a letter was sent to Judge Wilkey stating that the matter would have to be laid before the House when it returned from its Easter recess, and that I as Speaker could not in conscience take it upon myself to deliver this material without an order of the House, Judge Wilkey immediately sought to subpoena and the documents, the microfilm documents, were subpoenaed.

He did not subpoena the working papers of the committee.

It seems to me throughout this entire discussion with Judge Wilkey he has maintained insistence that he needs to inquire as to all the banking records of all the Members who were disclosed to have any overdrafted checks. That seems to be so sweeping, so unprecedented in its reach, that I do not find in my legal experience a comparable example where the Department of Justice has sought so far-reaching and unlimited a request for the production of papers and documents.

Indeed, with any bank of which I am aware, where there is an inquiry as to the activities of the bank, it has never been the case, or certainly not a routine matter, where all the depository information of the bank have been subpoenaed or requested.

This resolution does not fail to respond to the subpoena. The resolution offered by the majority leader does not seek to resist a proper and appropriate response to this request now in the form of a subpoena. It says that the House shall respond, but as ordered by a court, as determined by that court to be appropriate, to be material and to be relevant to the inquiry undertaken by the special counsel.

In short, this resolution says we will comply with an appropriate court order after review, not before review, but after review; and it instructs and directs the Sergeant at Arms of the House to undertake to determine from an appropriate court in the District of Columbia, a Federal court, the appropriate scope of this request and to seek its modification, and if it is modified, he is directed to comply with the order of the court.

Now, Judge Wilkey has maintained, and I say this publicly—I have said it before to the Members—he has maintained consistently that he has no interest in examining the accounts of those Members who did not overdraft any checks. But the subpoena does not limit itself to the accounts of those who have overdrafted; it seeks all the records of the bank. And the judge suggests that he has to do that because they are incorporated in microfilm. They could be separated. Indeed, he proposes to do that himself.

The resolution before us is one that I think touches upon the privileges of the House and the privileges of the membership here, not a privilege to go beyond or to go farther than any citizen would have the right to go. But every citizen in this country has the right to such a demand, that such a subpoena be reviewed by a court and to have it determined as to whether it is appropriate and proper, and that is all this resolution seeks to do. And I emphasize again that its language clearly directs the compliance, full compliance, with the consequent decision of the court.

I urge Members on both sides to proceed to adopt the Gephardt amendment, which solves the problem of protecting the rights of the House and the rights of Members, and does so through a proper adjudication by a court of competent jurisdiction. I think we have, as Members of this House, no less a right than any other citizen.

Mr. Speaker, I strongly urge the adoption of the Gephardt resolution.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL], the Republican leader.

Mr. MICHEL. I thank the distinguished gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, while I will make some comments relative to the second resolution and conceivably this one at a later point, may I just say at the very outset I appreciate so much the Speaker at the beginning of this debate laying out very forcefully not only to the Members of this House but all those who might be in the sound of our voices, observing these proceedings, what obligation we have as elected leaders of this institution to always be mindful of the prerogatives of the House and the Congress as enunciated throughout our history and in the constitutional document itself.

Now, we may have some differences, on the specifics of this resolution or the one which I intend to offer later. But basically what the Speaker has laid out for us and for all to understand is that this issue should be debated and one that I think should be determined, obviously, by the entire House. That has been tradition when subpoenas have been issued.

So I appreciate particularly the Speaker taking the time to lay it out as carefully and succinctly as he did to begin this debate.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, nearly 18 months ago, a disagreement arose between the Congress and the executive branch over the warming powers of the Constitution. The President argued that the Commander in Chief had the authority to commit service people to conflict without the expressed authorization of the Congress.

Politically, at the time, we were advised not to join this issue. Ultimately, we decided it was appropriate and necessary to assert constitutional obligations. We had a therapeutic and nationally helpful debate. We expressed our disagreements without rancor. The President prevailed.

But the citizens of this country respected us—not for doing what was popular, or what was politically pleasing, but for doing what was right. And this respect inured to us, not as Democrats or Republicans, not as advocates of sanctions or force, but as Members of Congress who acted out of conscience, balancing our responsibility as representatives of the public and custodians of our constitutional prerogatives.

It is not to be disputed that after 100 years of operation this House was presented with and accepted responsibility for evidence of a House bank that was abominably managed. And we acted as no other Congress has acted before.

We shut down the bank. We directed the Ethics Committee to take up the question of whether standards of official conduct had been violated. We disclosed all the pertinent details of the bank's overdraft practices. At the same time, we instituted other far-reaching institutional reforms.

In the end, Congress acted on a bipartisan basis to account for the conduct of individual Members and for the conduct of its institutional affairs. In that sense, we were acting as custodians of the public trust, and because the public thought that trust was violated, we took the extraordinary steps I have mentioned.

There then followed a series of events which, quite separate and apart from our conduct as individuals, commit us to act responsibly as custodians of this institution and guardians of its historic place in our Government.

The Attorney General elected to transfer from the office of the U.S. attorney to his own office a purported criminal investigation into the operations of the bank. He appointed retired judge and former Ambassador Malcolm Wilkey to direct that investigation. Mr. Wilkey then proceeded in a way which brings us to this day and to the decision we now have to make.

From the very beginning, the leadership of this House made clear to the special counsel and to the Attorney General that we were prepared to cooperate in a lawful and properly conducted investigation.

This we viewed as our responsibility and fully consistent with the steps we had taken to this date to restore public confidence in our handling of the bank and the problems that it had created. We also made it clear, however, that we expected an investigation conducted in accordance with regular procedure, and with appropriate sensitivity to the extraordinary circumstances of one branch of government examining the financial affairs of another.

We have been able to obtain only some satisfaction of these expectations. Mr. Wilkey has relinquished his request for the deliberative records of the Ethics Committee, has limited his investigation to criminal matters, and has proceeded by way of subpoena to assure that the protections afforded by grand jury proceedings and the Financial Right to Privacy Act would apply.

And on our part, we have cooperated with his request to make bank employees available to him and members of his staff for interviews so that his inquiry could proceed apace. And we are prepared to do more.

But still Mr. Wilkey resists in most extraordinary fashion any attempt to tailor his investigation in a manner consistent with standard procedure and relations between the branches.

He insists on the production of all records regardless of whether they relate to account overdrafts, all transactions of the bank, such as those involving members of the press, public, and House employees. He asks for the records of Members who did not experience overdrafts during the 39-month period investigated by the Ethics Committee. Although he could have tailored his subpoena in respect to these considerations, he chose not to do so.

His sweep extends beyond those individual studies by the committee and includes those about whom the public is not angry.

We are not merely suspecting that there is something extraordinary and unprecedented in this investigation. Legal scholars around the country have put on record in the press their belief that this is by no means an ordinary course investigation.

And surely an extraordinary one in these circumstances involving coequal branches of our Government.

Mr. Wilkey's most recent letter to all Members of the House, in which he expresses personal opinions about the limited evidence he has compiled to date, hardly conforms to the model of the tightlipped prosecutor committed to confidentiality and careful deliberation on the facts.

We are confronted now with a hard choice. It would be simple enough to do what the special counsel has asked us to do, sweeping aside all questions of institutional moment or individual rights.

Or we can seek, as I believe we should, a neutral and lawful determination of our obligations in the matter.

Accordingly, the resolution I am offering would affirm our intention to cooperate with the special counsel, subject to a determination by a U.S. district court about the appropriate response by this House to his subpoenas. The Sergeant at Arms would be authorized to seek this determination, and is directed by this resolution to comply promptly with the court's determination whatever it may be.

This is surely the most responsible course we can take, one which in no way impedes the investigation or reflects in the slightest measure on our willingness to assist in its lawful conduct. It merely gives us, as every citizen enjoys, our day in court.

We are custodians of this institution, its rights and its privileges, and there are times when we must look beyond short-term considerations to the longer term constitutional legacy we are sworn to uphold. We are also accountable to the public for our conduct, and the resolution which I am offering reflects our adherence to that responsibility as well.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker and fellow Members, I remember back in October when House Resolution 236 was passed in this House, and you directed the Subcommittee of the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct to determine if anyone abused the bank privilege. Those six Members, we worked for an awfully long time trying to determine who abused it, what the criteria would be. It was very difficult. In all candor, I wish we had come back to the House and said, "Give us something a little more concrete to work with. It's a little nebulous, a little subjective." We realize that. Whether it was right or wrong, we've done it, and we'll live with it.

Well, Mr. Speaker, that brought down Act I when we finally disclosed the names, and we all hoped it was over with. Let us get this thing behind us. Let us go do something else. Let us take care of the business of the United States of America. Let us not get caught up in this paralysis that we had during the Wright case.

However, now Act II, is upon us and the curtain is up. Judge Wilkey has entered in, and he is the new player, and he is the star of this show, and he talked to us. He came to see me. He is a very nice gentleman. And he came to see the chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. MCHUGH]. We had the opportunity to ask him questions: "What do you want? What do you want out of this House?"

Mr. Speaker, he wants it all. If I may be very candid, he wants everything, and he feels he cannot conduct an investigation unless he does, and he has surrounded himself with some of the best prosecuting attorneys in this system, and accountants, and FBI agents.

And now we are down to a point of two different options that we have. We can take the Gephardt resolution, or we can take the Michel resolution.

I must say that I have seldom found people as dedicated to this organization as the Speaker, and the majority leader, and the ranking member of the committee, dedicated, fine, decent people. It has been a pleasure to work with them.

So, now, if we get the Gephardt resolution, we will live with it. That is the way the system works, and we will see how it goes. What do we get if we get the Gephardt resolution? In all candor there is only one difference between them, and I would like to read it to my colleagues right now. It says:

Resolved, The Sergeant at Arms shall obtain from the United States District Court a determination of the enforceability of the subpoena including its materiality and relevance and shall upon receipt of such determination notify the House of the Court's determination.

So we are asking for a bit of an adversarial confrontation position. We are going to put the Sergeant at Arms in confrontation with the court, and the court is going to tell us what to do.

Well, maybe that is right to do. I do not know. I am not a prophet. I do not know how this is going to turn out.

But on the other side, I do not think we have to be too bright to see what the reaction to this is going to be.

The reaction is going to be that the press is going to go on another feeding frenzy. They are going to talk about it constantly. We are going to go through interrogatories, depositions, the whole 9 yards. And every time it comes up, someone is going to talk about it. We are going to rip that scab off every time it happens and we are going to bleed, bleed, all the way down to the first Tuesday in November.

Now, I really do not think the House wants that. I do not think the majority party wants it, I do not think the minority party wants it.

So what the difference is is that one resolving clause that we have. What is it that BOB MICHEL has been able to do? BOB MICHEL put one together that in effect is an extension of what we did on this floor on March 13. Many of you walked up to the well and you gave great talks about "We want full disclosure."

Now, let us be honest about it. We did not give them full disclosure. We gave them the names and the number of checks. If we had full disclosure we would have given insufficiencies and how many and amounts and the whole bit. We did not do that, but we gave the public what they basically want. And in effect I think if you polled our constituency, what would they be saying to you? They would say this: "You said back on March 13, that you are going to give us full disclosure. That means everything. We want it all, the whole 9 yards."

What the Michel resolution does is say, "OK, Public, we don't want to hide anything. We don't want any coverup. We don't want any whitewash. We want to get this one behind us. We don't want to live with it day after day and week after week, and every time we speak in front of the rotary or the chamber or somebody, again it hits us right between the eyeballs. Here it is, Judge Wilkey."

I agree with the distinguished majority leader. Gosh, no one likes to give up all of his privacy. But we are a kind of a different breed of cat, if I may say so, when we come up here and take this oath of office.

So I say to you, my friends, at this particular time, how do we go through the healing process? How do we settle this down? How do we go on to the more important things?

We maintain on this side that as much respect as we have for the leadership on the other side, and we have great respect for all, we really feel we are going to perpetuate this problem if we continue to have to go to court and fight it and worry about it and come to the floor and give talks on it.

I honestly feel with all my heart the smartest thing for us to do at this time is get it out, give it to them, and let us go on with the important things that are happening here in America.

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BONIOR], the distinguished majority whip.

Mr. BONIOR. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this resolution. As the Speaker and majority leader have said, it simply calls for taking this issue to court, for taking this issue out of the hotbed of partisan politics.

It asks the court to decide what is the proper scope of the investigation. Then it requires this House to comply with the decision of that court.

The distinguished minority leader has said this subpoena is, and let me quote, "a fishing expedition."

Those are not my words. Those are the words of the distinguished minority leader, "a fishing expedition."

The Washington Post warned that this could be a witch hunt. The New York Times in an editorial today called upon this House to stand up against both the panic and the partisanship.

That is what we are doing with this resolution. Of course we should comply with a reasonable and proper subpoena, and of course we should cooperate fully with any investigation which will determine once and for all if there were any laws broken at the House bank.

But let us not throw out the Constitution in the process. I am willing to have the special counsel review my records and look at any checks that have been held for overdrafts, and anything else that the court determines is proper. But there are many, many Members of this body who had no overdrafts, many members of the public who had occasion to use the bank who had no overdrafts, many employees and former employees who had no overdrafts. Should their records be called into question?

Let us remove any trace of partisanship from this issue. Let us be open, let us be fair, and let us take this issue to the court and let an impartial judge decide.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to support this resolution.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GRANDY], a member of the subcommittee of the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct.

Mr. GRANDY. Mr. Speaker, I thank the Chair and thank the distinguished ranking member for yielding.

Let me say at the outset, Mr. Speaker, I would like to be able to support the Gephardt resolution because we have tried at least as Members of the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct to bring a bipartisan resolution and conclusion to all of these matters.

I listened very carefully when the Speaker said in his remarks that he found no precedent to guide us in dealing with the subpoena. I listened very carefully when the majority leader said that the subpoena was not tailored to the investigation.

I would like nothing better than to be able to find a precedent for what we have been trying to do in the last 5 months, but we know there is none.

And although the majority leader is probably right on points of law, we are not now in a court of law. We are in a court of public opinion, whether we like it or not, and our appeal process was ended 6 weeks ago when we voted for full disclosure.

We did not know what the consequences would be. We know now they were unpleasant. I can guarantee you the consequences of this vote will be unpleasant, unfair, and in many cases cruel.

But, unfortunately, we do not have any choice left in this matter. Whether we admit it legally or not, politically we have forfeited due process and now we are not suing for our rights, we are essentially hoping for clemency.

The sad consequence of this bank scandal and the investigation is that we, the Members of the House of Representatives, have become a privileged underclass with more perks and fewer rights than any other group of citizenry in the United States.

I do not like that. That is not fair, but that is reality. That is what we hear when we go home. This is some nightmare out of Franz Kafka and George Orwell, but that is what we deal with, and the damage control, as we have learned, is probably worse than the damage.

So if we intend to put this into a court process and fend off the Special Counsel, how will we explain that? We have not been able to provide this information in its full form to the people that we accuse, and yet we are turning it over to the accusers, and now to Federal officials. This is unfair, but it is not a question of fairness any more. The choices between us tonight are between the Michel resolution, which hopefully will be a swift, expedited process, hopefully toward a merciful end, and the Gephardt resolution, which may be a long, drawn out, tedious, unfair, painful, politically defeating process, which may drag on endlessly.

So for the first time since I have addressed this House on this matter, I must deviate from my colleagues who are Democrats on the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, and support fully and enthusiastically the Michel resolution. Not because it is fair, but because it may be the more merciful of the two. I ask all of our colleagues to do the same.

This is not a partisan question. This is a difference of opinion on how to deal with the damage that has befallen us. The longer we wait, the longer we attempt to explain, the more confused we get, let alone our constituents.

Regrettably, I must oppose the Speaker and the majority leader and my friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. MCHUGH], who has been the distinguished chairman of this committee, and urge Members to reject the Gephardt resolution and support the Michel resolution.

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. NAGLE].

Mr. NAGLE. Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is anybody in this institution that does not know I am probably not the one to give this speech. But I want to talk for the 170 in this place who did not do anything wrong. I want to speak for all the Members of the minority who were needlessly wounded by a lack of due process. I want to talk for everyone here who does not have the courage to come to this well and say that you do not have to follow political hysteria, you do not have to do something merciful, you do not have to accept public opinion. You can change it. You can form it. You can shape it. You can enlighten it.

□ 2040

I do not care what our colleagues in the galleries who write about us say. I do not care what public opinion says. When I came into this House, I agreed to defend the Constitution of the United States. And if a Member of this institution does not have the right of the fourth amendment against unreasonable search and seizure, if this House is willing in a moment of political passion to set aside the very thing that we are sworn to uphold, then public opinion be damned.

This is the proper step. The court is the repository for debate between different branches of Government. It is proper because it protects the innocent as well as it ensures that any who are guilty will be prosecuted. McCarthyism, I submit to my colleagues, blind and bitter partisan attacks based on innuendo and allegations without foundation, did not stop because the Members of the other body acquiesced in it. Maybe it is foolish. Maybe it is stupid. Maybe it is dumb. But I refuse to be a leaf driven by a political wind. I came here to defend the Constitution. I came here to defend the rights of the Members. I came here to defend the right of the public. And I hope I never lose my courage to take on the burden of changing public opinion when it is misinformed and misguided. And that is the test tonight.

I do not mean to speak with anger, but at some point anger and outrage are necessary. And that is where we are now.

Support the Gephardt amendment.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GINGRICH], the distinguished minority whip.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Utah [Mr. HANSEN] for yielding time to me.

I just want to make the point that the argument is not about the individual Member's right under rule L to go to court. The Michel resolution will clearly protect every Member's individual right as an individual to have counsel, to go to court, to seek to block the subpoena as it relates to the individual.

The question tonight is whether the institution of the House as an institution should interpose itself between this investigation and the facts and should ask a judge to intervene.

Every Member's rights individually as a Member, as an American citizen, are thoroughly protected by the Michel resolution. And it is simply not accurate to suggest we are asking any Member to waive those rights. We are asking the institution to waive its rights so that the institution does not interpose itself. But we are not taking one right away from a Member, and we would certainly recognize Members' rights to file that suit.

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MCCLOSKEY].

Mr. MCCLOSKEY. Mr. Speaker, I might say I was particularly moved by the eloquent and moving statement of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GRANDY]. I think he has been one of the true leaders of the House in this regard. Unfortunately, I say to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GRANDY], I think there was a wrong conclusion. The gentleman said there was no element of law involved here. There is really a very major element of law involved, constitutional law and the future functioning with integrity of all the three branches of this Government.

So with that in mind, I am in strong support of the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GEPHARDT].

This is a difficult vote, certainly one of the most difficult ever. But if we stand for anything and are true to our oath of office, it is one that should transcend any immediate political or personal interests.

When the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. NAGLE] says this could have severe repercussions on his political career or anyone's political career, I think we all realize this. A vote for the Gephardt resolution, quite frankly, could be politically perilous. I have no doubt, however, but that ultimately pertinent records of most Members of this institution will be provided to the independent counsel. That is not the question.

I, for one, I guess, in the full run of this thing with a relatively moderate number of problem checks, have no doubt that all my transactions will be monitored and scrutinized. Indeed, I released several weeks before it was required all my information, including more than the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct released. But that is not, that is not the question. That is not what today's debate is about.

This debate is about an attempt to coerce the House of Representatives to submit an overly and unnecessarily broad subpoena which seeks the financial records of every Member of Congress without any reasonable suspicion of wrongdoing.

In Philosophy 101, I think there was such a thing as a syllogism. The syllogism involved here can boil down to a very simple statement. Congressman Doe used the House bank. Therefore, Congressman Doe is criminally suspect.

My colleagues, I submit that this is truly ridiculous. It is overly broad and invasive of privacy and unconstitutional.

When all is said and done, one of the main criticisms of Congress is that we are too concerned with our reelection campaigns to face difficult issues, but this is one difficult issue that should transcend anyone's political career.

Few issues could be more substantive than the U.S. Constitution and the historical and institutional integrity of the House of Representatives.

When I was a school kid with the nuns teaching us at St. Agatha's in west Philadelphia, one of the things they told us in every grade is, "Francis, what does it matter if the whole world is going to hell? Are you going to follow them?"

I cannot speak for divine judgment, but historical judgment will not look kindly on this vote today if we blithely avoid our individual and institutional duty as coequal members of a tripartite government.

This dispute between the Congress and the administration as to the breadth of the subpoena rightly should be referred to the Federal judiciary.

Let us not be deceived that this does not have political aspects. This is not an unpolitical year. The special counsel has requested all House records, including the checks of all Members and the checks of others. He has not waived any rights of access to the 170 Members who were in no way involved. There is no reasonable suspicion of criminal activity by the overwhelming majority of Members who used the House bank.

This raises very strong concerns that we are on a most opportunistic fishing expedition, words to that effect of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL] at one point, with a quite grisly focus, a partisan witch hunt through the legislature by what is an element of the executive branch.

Where does the Justice Department stand on a special prosecutor to investigate losses at the White House credit union, reportedly involving hundreds of thousands of dollars?

Where does the Justice Department stand on a special prosecutor to investigate the ugly chapter of compromised actions and policies toward Iraq, as has been masterfully detailed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GONZALEZ]?

Can Members imagine as we move through August, September, October, with a certain possibility, and I asked the Speaker about this today, that the names of cleared Members will be released serially. Thus, those quite innocent Members not so cleared will twist in the wind of increasing suspicion as the first Tuesday in November comes and goes.

Blanket release of more than 300 present and former Members to the special investigator unjustly imperils them and many family members involved in innocent transactions. Is it not quite possible that the Justice Department will have routine access to every personal and medical transaction that any of us made or our families made in that 39-month period?

Leaks and innuendoes with no basis in truth will be rampant.

For over 200 years, the strength of our Republic has rested on the foundation of coequal branches of government. Despite better judgment and concerns for constitutional integrity, if we vote today for blanket transfer of these records, we will have betrayed the House.

We will have betrayed the Constitution. We will have betrayed the basic governmental integrity of this Nation, which is important to all the citizens of the United States for 100 years to come.

Let us stand up and make an unpopular vote, and the special investigator will have more than good access to all the records that he needs.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes and 30 seconds to the distinguished gentleman from Florida [Mr. GOSS], a member of the subcommittee.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Speaker, we participated in the identification of the abusers, which was a very sad task. We then went on to full disclosure, which was a very sad task.

□ 2050

But we left the question of potential criminality to somebody else, the Department of Justice. Special Counsel Judge Wilkey, who has now been appointed. I, as a member of the subcommittee who was involved in these investigations, am greatly relieved that the question of potential criminality was taken, really, out of our hands.

I think there are concerns. We have talked about them at great length, safeguards we need for our Members, concerns about our institution. We have discussed them in debate. I think those who have spoken have already raised the important points.

However, we have received some very critical assurances back from the Judge. He has in fact narrowed the request of his subpoena very considerably. He has granted assurances to us about the privacy and rights of Members over his signature, which I rate as a dependable trust. He has agreed to leave the question of the working papers to other days and other procedures. The records of 170 Members, of which I am one, whose matters are not part of the insufficiency question, have been given special attention and I am told the records will be returned on the Judge's word.

These are important assurances given back to us through dialog to date. So then what are we really worrying about? What are we trying to do here? My view is that we are trying to build the credibility of this institution back at a time when we desperately need to get on with important challenges to our Nation's well-being. Perhaps, I have a simplistic view of this. I believe we should give the Judge the records: If there is no wrongdoing, nothing follows. If there is wrongdoing, it should be attended to and it will be attended to by the appropriate people.

The question of why we should take an unnecessary beating by dragging this thing out absolutely defies my understanding, and I think it defies common sense. I think most of us understand that when banging your head on a wall, the best part of that is stopping. I do not believe that the approach of the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. GEPHARDT, will pass the smell test with the people of the United States of America.

The grand jury can investigate merely on suspicion that the law is being violated, or even just because it wants assurance that it is not. That is where we are. The grand jury subpoena may issue without probable cause. The Government cannot be required to justify the issuance of a grand jury subpoena by presenting evidence sufficient to establish probable cause, because the very purpose of requesting the information is to ascertain whether probable cause exists.

This is all case law, yet the approach of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GEPHARDT] is asking us to go back over this ground. It is very legalistic. It will not satisfy the people of the United States of America, who are asking us to finish our pledge on full disclosure.

So, reluctantly tonight, I suggest that here we are one more time being asked to go back over the same ground. I would like to get through with this, as much as I think everybody else would. I think it is very important to immediately start to reestablish credibility. I think it is very important to do what we can to enhance the credibility of the institution by demonstrating full cooperation with the Department of Justice. I believe the Michel approach does that better and will pass the smell test. I think it is critical to proceed that way. Thank you.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. KYL], a member of the full committee.

Mr. KYL. Mr. Speaker, let us be very clear tonight what the Speaker and majority leader are asking in their resolution: that the Sergeant at Arms shall obtain from the U.S. District Court a determination of the enforceability of the subpoena.

Mr. Speaker, no court will render an advisory opinion. It only deals with actions that are ripe and justifiable. It will only render a determination in this case if the House opposes the subpoena, presumably with a motion to quash, arguing against its validity. So this resolution is not neutral, it is in opposition to the subpoena.

The only argument I have heard tonight is that it may be over-broad. But whatever the breadth of Judge Wilkey's original request, his subpoena has narrowed the request to just the 41 rolls of microfilm that contain the bank records; that is all, and it is very specific. We know exactly what he is asking for.

The other reason we are given for asking the court what to do is that compliance with the subpoena will somehow diminish the power of the House. But deferring to the third branch of Government—the court—will diminish the power of the House far more than deciding on our own tonight to comply or not to comply with Judge Wilkey's subpoena.

The Michel resolution says, "Comply," and I believe that we should comply. If other Members wish not to, then they are free to vote not to comply, but that is our decision. We should, therefore, preserve the House's power by making that decision ourselves rather than deferring to another branch of Government to make that decision for us. We should, therefore, oppose the Gephardt resolution, and, I would urge, support the Michel resolution to cooperate in this investigation.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX of California. Mr. Speaker, beneath the fog and the obfuscation of the high-sounding rhetoric of the majority that controls this House and controlled the House bank, the Gephardt resolution on complying with Judge Wilkey's subpoena comes down to this: Let us litigate it, let us fight it, let us take it to court.

Specifically, as my colleague, the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. KYL], has just observed, the resolution in its key provision requires that this Congress challenge the enforceability of the subpoena in Federal court, that we question its materiality, that we object to it on the grounds of relevance.

Mr. Speaker, when we fight this in court we will lose and the Special Counsel will win, and this Congress will be further embarrassed. The grand jury is entitled to this information on the House bank. Judge Wilkey has provided us with a reminder in the form of a memorandum that what he is seeking is 41 rolls of microfilm, nothing more and nothing less. These contain the records of the bank's operations, including the checks and the statements of its depositors. The depositors in this bank, Members of Congress, are in no different position than that in which they would be if they had used a failed S&L or a fraudulently operated BCCI.

All the customers' records are necessarily commingled on this microfilm, and it is necessary to have it in order to make an examination of the bank's overall operation. That is the criminal investigator's priority.

It is a shame, Mr. Speaker, a shame that it took so long for this institution to come to grips with this problem. For years, going back to 1989 when the GAO first warned the Speaker of egregious abuses in the House bank, management of the House did nothing. The Speaker of the House sought to put an end to this matter after the press broke it by closing the bank without disclosure, and management of this institution fought full disclosure until the bitter end.

It is a shame now that in the eyes of the American people this institution is once again standing in the doorway, once again appearing to cover up wrongdoing, corruption in the House, once again obstructing in this case a Justice Department investigation.

We have heard about the separation of powers in comity between the branches this evening. Not too many years ago I worked as counsel in the White House for the President of the United States, at a time when he determined to give up the most personal thing a man has, his diaries, not to a prosecutor but to this Congress as a matter of comity; not in response to a subpoena but in response to a request, because he was concerned about the integrity of the office. He was concerned about avoiding any appearance of wrongdoing.

If we care about the integrity of this institution, we will recognize that only 1 percent of the American people, according to a recent poll, trust this Congress to do the right thing most of the time. Tonight, do the right thing. Support the honor and the integrity of this institution. Support the Michel resolution.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LIVINGSTON].

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, as a former prosecutor I have to say that I am astonished that we are here tonight arguing about this issue. Thankfully I did not have any bad checks, but I still think that our records are subject to scrutiny through the special counsel.

□ 2100

The records of any other person in the United States are subject to subpoena by grand jury, and I do not see how we can wrap ourselves in the Constitution and say that we have special privilege or that we need not comply with a similar subpoena issued for our own records.

We ran for office, and we were elected to serve. It was the leadership of this elected body in the House that messed up the bank and brought about this problem. Some of us were sloppy with our accounts. Some of us may have even violated the law, and though we hope that that is not the case, we now have to pay the piper. We overwhelmingly voted for full disclosure of our bank records only a few weeks ago, and here we are saying, "Well, not quite all of them and not quite for any purpose."

That is truly astounding.

One Member got up here a few minutes ago and called this a "witch hunt," and maybe we could call it that. Or maybe it is a form of "trial by fire," a trial by fire that we agreed to. And I do not see how we can plausibly stand before the American people tonight and say, "Well, we didn't know you were going to use matches."

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GEKAS].

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, the issue before us, if laid before the American people and they had the luxury of casting a vote here tonight by use of the electronic device that might be in every home if one non-candidate would have his way, that vote would come screaming into this House tonight almost 100 percent. I would venture to say, to disclose, to end this fiasco by disclosing everything and allowing the special prosecutor to go about his duties. It is the will of the American people that their House, their Congress be open and be conducive to conducting business in a way that they can continue to have trust in the institution itself. So there is no alternative. There is no debate.

Do the American people want the disclosure, the full disclosure? Do they want these records turned over to the special prosecutor? Yes, is the overwhelming answer. Yes, and now is the time to do it.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HUNTER].

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, first we had a vote a couple of weeks ago, about 6 weeks ago in which we touted our vote here then as being for full disclosure, and we defined it as full disclosure, and it is not now in our power to redefine what "full" means. I think at least the American people, if not the media and the Department of Justice, believe what we meant when we used those very strong words that it would indeed be "full." We pulled the roof about halfway off the House bank, and I think we have to take it the rest of the way off.

I think everybody knows how they are going to vote on this vote. Let me take us a step beyond this vote.

Very few of us in this Chamber tonight with any degree of confidence know what our political future is. But one thing that we do control jointly, Republicans and Democrats, is the ability to rebuild this House. And one thing that I think we all received from the American people in our meetings with them over the last several weeks is that they want action, and that they want to have an economic growth package, they want jobs, they want Congress to work.

So let me just say to the majority leader and to the Democrat leadership that this junior Member of the Republican leadership intends to work with my leader, Mr. MICHEL, and with the leadership on the other side of the House, and with all of the Members over the next 8 months to put together an economic program that will take us out of our economic problems, our present national problems and do a good job for the American people and begin to rebuild this House of Representatives which today is in some state of disrepair. I would hope that the Democrat leadership will join wholeheartedly in helping us put together a bill that our President can sign in the next several months.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BONIOR). The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GEPHARDT] has 4½ minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Utah [Mr. HANSEN] has 5 minutes remaining.

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1½ minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, if there is a man or a woman in this body who would stand in the way of a legitimate investigation of any potential wrongdoing, I have not met that person. We are all sworn to uphold the laws of this Nation, and that is an inviolate principle, and the Gephardt resolution recognizes that.

But this vote is also a test of constitutional principle. And since Marbury versus Madison, the courts, the judicial branch have been the final arbiter of the separation of powers. We must not now wither under the heat of demagoguery and election year jitters and abdicate 200 years of precedent. We must not set aside the Constitution in an hour of debate driven by partisan posturing and fears of the media spin.

My colleagues, if ever there was a time to put principle ahead of politics, it is now. This is a moment to act not as Democrats or Republicans, but as thoughtful members of an historic institution.

I urge my colleagues to support the Gephardt resolution.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. JAMES].

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, if this is a matter of constitutionality or protection here, then what Members should do is not submit to the jurisdiction at all. You have submitted, and if you believe the prosecutor has jurisdiction and the court has jurisdiction, one of the allegations or one of the defenses was that we always had a positive balance in the so-called House bank. Unless the prosecutor has all of the records he cannot either affirm or deny that as a truthful allegation. So clearly you will lose if you challenge it, because that is significant under the Federal laws that say if you loan money interest-free that is a 10-year felony. If you embezzle, it is a 10-year felony. So he will absolutely prevail when it comes to getting the totality of the records, regardless of your motion.

So why make yourselves look ridiculous by resisting something which you know as a matter of law you have to lose if the court in fact has jurisdiction in the initial instance into the inquiry into the activities of that bank, and that the court absolutely has the right to have all of the records, not just part of the records. So why prolong the agony?

And my records will go in, even though I wrote no checks. I do not have any choice. I think we should have full disclosure. I did not have a bad check, but they will get my records and everybody else's because of the nature of the jurisdiction of this matter of the bank.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. CUNNINGHAM].

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the Michel amendment. I agree that most of our Members have no criminal activity involved in this.

But remember, Congressman SOLOMON offered an amendment just to drug-test post office and bank employees and there was the same answer, no one would be culpable. However, bingo, who was selling cocaine and using cocaine in our post office?

The judge is only looking for criminal activity. That is all people want to see. If there is any wrongdoing, justice will take care of it. If not, we build on the credibility of this House.

I ask my colleagues to cooperate fully. If you have an IRS audit, you give your records, you give your checks. I ask for full disclosure, and full disclosure means full disclosure. I support the Michel amendment.

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2½ minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. FAZIO].

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, no one wants to protect wrongdoers. The reputation of this institution requires that any violations of law related to the House bank be vigorously prosecuted. Any material relating to any Member who may be in violation of any law should be made available to the prosecutor. That I think we can all agree on.

But while we wish to be accommodating to the legitimate demands of the Justice Department, we have a responsibility to this institution and to the rights of citizens who happen to be Members of Congress who placed funds in the ill-fated House bank to be cautious in our action. We are not, those Members who are voting for this Gephardt resolution tonight, taking the political path. In fact, if you believe, as our discreditors do, that we are obstructing or acting to cover up the private banking transactions of a finite class of decidedly unpopular people, it is quite the opposite. But it is never popular, never popular to protect institutional or individual rights in the face of a mob or even the preponderance of public opinion.

It has been said let us get it behind us, and I am for that. But let us not, out of exhaustion or frustration, simply ignore real and legitimate concerns about the balance of executive and legislative power.

The majority leader's resolution allows an objective third party to sort out the equities in this broad and sweeping subpoena. In a week, and it should take no more, we could have a fair resolution of this dispute between the branches. Anyone who wants real justice can live with whatever the courts decide.

On balance, we have, as brief custodians, brief custodians of this institution's rights and responsibilities, no choice but to do what we believe is right and not be thinking solely of the next election.

Despite all we have been through as individuals and as an institution, I remain confident that acting on our fundamental beliefs is always the best politics as well in this case as the right policy.

I urge us to stand up tonight, not just for this institution this evening, but for this institution down through the years ahead of us and support our historic responsibility. Support the Gephardt resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BONIOR). The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GEPHARDT] has 30 seconds remaining, and the gentleman from Utah [Mr. HANSEN] has 3 minutes remaining.

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of our time, 30 seconds, to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. MCHUGH].

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of our time, 3 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MCHUGH].

Mr. MCHUGH. Mr. Speaker, I thank my friend, the gentleman from Utah, and the majority leader, for yielding me this time.

Mr. Speaker, I urge the Members to profoundly consider the resolution which is pending before us. I think it is an eminently reasonable and responsible one. It simply requires us to comply with whatever the court determines is relevant and material information to Judge Wilkey's inquiry.

That, it seems to me, is the ultimate question here, and the choice we have is whether we are going to comply with what Judge Wilkey has identified as the relevant information or whether a court, an independent third party in the judiciary, will make that judgment.

I think most of us, including many of the people who have spoken on the other side, recognize that this is an extraordinarily broad subpoena. It requests not only the personal records of every Member of the Congress and some former Members, but it also asks for the personal records of others who used the bank, including spouses of Members, members of the press, and employees of the Congress. It is important to know on what basis the Special Counsel justifies this kind of an extraordinarily broad subpoena.

Perhaps, as others have said, he can justify it. Perhaps a court would determine, as they have argued, that Mr. Wilkey is entitled to this broad sweep. If a court so decides, we are saying by this resolution in advance that we will comply with the court's determination. It seems to me that that is eminently fair.

I personally believe that Judge Wilkey has not yet stated in any specific way a reasonable basis for this type of extraordinary reach in a subpoena. In my judgment, if we were not Members of Congress, if we were private citizens and received this kind of subpoena, it would be subject to being quashed in court. I may be wrong. It may be that Judge Wilkey can justify this broad a subpoena. All we are saying in this resolution is that a court should decide that issue.

It seems to me, given the rather unusual nature of the issues, including the privacy of individual Members and others, as well as the institutional interests of the House vis-a-vis the executive branch, it is not unreasonable to ask the Members of this House to permit a third party in the judiciary to make this judgment.

I must say in closing that although the last 6 months have been unpleasant in many respects, one of the positive experiences for me has been to work in a very nonpartisan fashion with my friend, the gentleman from Utah [Mr. HANSEN], the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GRANDY], the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GOSS], and the Democratic members of our subcommittee, Mr. CARDIN and Mr. MCDERMOTT. It is true, as the gentleman from Utah [Mr. HANSEN] said, that this may be the first time that we have disagreed on any issue relating to the House bank. But this is a profoundly important issue. If I read the arguments of my friends on the other side correctly, I do not think they are disagreeing so much with the position that this is an extraordinarily broad subpoena but, rather, are taking the position that it is time to get this over with, that we have lost due process some weeks ago, and, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GRANDY] said, that fairness is not possible in this inquiry at this time. I would respectfully disagree.

I think that this is an issue which demands fairness, which demands due process, which demands that the privacy rights of individual Members of Congress, like other citizens, be respected. I believe that an independent judiciary can both define the appropriate reach of Mr. Wilkey's subpoena and protect these other legitimate interests.

However the court decides, we agree by this resolution to comply. I think our constituents can understand that. I think the media can understand that. I think it is a reasonable position for this House to take.

Our decision tonight may be looked upon many years from now as an important precedent for this House.

I urge Members to support this resolution.

Mrs. COLLINS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, we just got finished debating the space station here on the House floor, and I am not so sure some of us here aren't already out in orbit.

I rise to express, in no uncertain terms, my strong objections to complying with the subpoena to turn over the records of the Sergeant-at-Arms bank to the Justice Department. I believe it is time once and for all to end this politically motivated witch hunt, and to get on with the business of governing the country.

For the past 8 months, this House has languished in a morass of allegations over the mislabeled cooperative known as the House bank, and valuable time has been squandered, not discussing how to put Americans back to work or how to feed our hungry children, but arguing whether or not the names of overdrafters should be released to the public.

Because of a public perception that the House was somehow involved in a coverup, I was supportive of the effort to list the names of those Members who overdrafted their accounts. And when it came out that I too had overdrafted my account, I sincerely apologized to my constituents and made a contribution in the amount of fees that would have been charged by a bank to a 501(3)(c) organization in my congressional district.

And when we here in this body thought that we had put this unfortunate incident behind us, the administration decides to resurrect the so-called bank scandal to look for criminal activity. Mr. Speaker, you yourself said, and I wholeheartedly concur, that no laws were broken at the so-called House bank.

When I came to Congress, I took an oath to protect and uphold the Constitution of the United States, and to the best of my abilities and with God's grace I believe I have done that. But not once did I ever agree to give up my rights as a citizen—rights guaranteed by the fourth and fifth amendments of that very same Constitution which says:

The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated; and no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

And which also says in part that—

No person shall * * * be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law * * *.

Americans have fundamental rights to privacy, probable cause, and due process, and quite frankly, no job is worth having to put my personal and private affairs on a table for some politically motivated witch hunter to pass judgment upon.

Mr. Speaker, no private citizens should have to subject themselves to such undue scrutiny, and Members of Congress are citizens and are no different.

I am disturbed by the turn this country has taken in recent years with its prodding and probing into the private lives of public figures. It's a mean spiritedness which cheapens our electoral process and debilitates our governing bodies. I am not saying the Congress is free of blame in this matter. Members of Congress certainly should not be held above the law, Mr. Speaker, but they shouldn't be held below the law either.

My vote for the Gephardt resolution is made first, with the honest belief that my constituents, not some witch hunter, are the ones to decide whether my overdrafts were abusive or not and second, out of a clear conscience and strong conviction that we must uphold the right to privacy of Americans.

I urge my colleagues to vote for the Gephardt resolution because it means justice, not politics; fairness, not witch-hunting.

Mr. ORTON. Mr. Speaker, today we are considering an issue which raises several constitutional implications. The subpoena issued upon the House of Representatives by the Justice Department in the matter of the House bank is clearly overbroad and overreaching. In my opinion, it is inappropriate to subpoena complete financial records of individuals who have never issued overdrafts on their accounts at the House bank and are under no suspicion or allegation of impropriety. Therefore, I believe this subpoena would be subject to the judicial modification that would exclude from the subpoena the records of Members not directly material to an ongoing investigation.

The matter before us is symptomatic of the general lack of confidence in government by the people. However, this is not a matter of self-protection. I did not issue any overdrafts on my account at the House bank and I have offered public verification of those records. Nor is it a matter of protection of other Members of the House. My concern is in protecting the Constitution of the United States which I have sworn an oath to defend. A constitutional issue may arise under article I of the Constitution under the speech and debate clause. We must be certain that today's action does not erode the separation of powers as set forth in the Constitution. When such questions under the Constitution arise, it is appropriate to turn to the courts for interpretation rather than relying upon either the executive or legislative branch determinations. Therefore, I will vote to support the resolution to seek a judicial determination of the constitutional implications of this subpoena by a court of competent jurisdiction. I will fully support the determination of the court if it orders compliance with the subpoena to deliver the requested records to the Justice Department.

In the event the House determines or is ordered to disclose records to the Justice Department, I believe an additional constitutional issue may arise. Under the fourth and fifth amendments of the Constitution, each individual is protected from unlawful search and seizure and self-incrimination. The disclosure of personal financial records by the Sergeant at Arms under this subpoena may constitute a violation of constitutional rights of individual Members of the House. I would encourage each Member to carefully consider judicial intervention to protect their own individual rights guaranteed under the Constitution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. All time has expired.

Under the unanimous-consent agreement, the previous question is ordered.

The question is on the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 131, nays 284, answered "present" 1, not voting 19, as follows:

The Clerk announced the following pair:

On this vote:

Mr. Russo for, with Mr AuCoin against.

Messrs. POSHARD, DE LA GARZA, PASTOR, GORDON, and ESPY changed their votes from "yea" to "nay."

Mr. RUSSO. Mr. Speaker, I have a live pair with the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. AU COIN]. If he were present, he would have voted "nay." I voted "yea." I withdraw my vote and vote "present."

Mr. RUSSO changed his vote from "yea" to "present."

So the resolution was rejected.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks on House Resolution 440.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. OBERSTAR). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri? There was no objection.

PRIVILEGES OF THE HOUSE—DIRECTING RELEASE OF CERTAIN MATERIALS RELATING TO INQUIRY OF OPERATION OF BANK OF SERGEANT AT ARMS PURSUANT TO HOUSE RESOLUTION 236

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the order of the House earlier today, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL].

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution (H. Res. 441) directing the release of certain materials relating to the inquiry of the operation of the Bank of the Sergeant-at-Arms pursuant to House Resolution 236.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 441

Whereas, by letters of April 8 and 21, 1992, to the acting chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct and to the Speaker, respectively, the Honorable Malcolm R. Wilkey, Special Counsel to the Attorney General of the United States, has requested a "cooperative response" from the committee to his request for materials, specifically 41 microfilm rolls identified in the letter of April 21, in the possession of the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct relating to the inquiry of the operation of the Bank of the Sergeant-at-Arms pursuant to House Resolution 236, adopted by the House on October 3, 1991;

Whereas, the Constitution of the United States vests authority in the House of Representatives to protect and preserve materials of the House; and

Whereas, by the privileges of the House no evidence of a documentary character under the control and in the possession of the House can, either by the mandate of process of the ordinary courts of justice or pursuant to requests by appropriate Federal or State authorities, be taken from such control or possession except by the permission of the House; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the microfilm rolls shall be collected by the Sergeant-at-Arms and he shall, no later than twelve noon on May 4, 1992, provide to the Special Counsel the microfilm rolls: Be it further

Resolved, That this provision of information shall be taken without prejudice to any future consideration by the House of the Judiciary of requests for documentary or testimonial evidence from the Members, Officers or employees of the House: Be it further

Resolved, That the House relies upon the assurances of the Special Counsel that he will take such steps as are necessary to provide for protection for the confidentiality of the records provided: Be it further

Resolved, That nothing in this Resolution shall be construed to deprive, condition or waive the constitutional or legal rights applicable or available to any Member, Officer or employee of the House or any other individual; and be it Further Resolved, That it is the will of the House to maintain such communication and cooperation with the Special Counsel as will promote the ends of justice consistent with the privileges and rights of the House.

Mr. MICHEL (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The resolution constitutes a question of privilege. Pursuant to the order of the House of earlier today, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL] will be recognized for 30 minutes, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GEPHARDT] will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL].

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I will include at the conclusion of my remarks exchanges of letters between Judge Wilkey and the House and an exchange between the Speaker and the minority leader, appropriate for this discussion.

Mr. Speaker, in my view of Judge Wilkey's request for all the House bank records has been based on three principles: Justice must be served, in more ways than one; due process for Members must be followed; and the constitutional separation of powers must be maintained.

The question in my mind has never been whether Judge Wilkey would be provided with the records of the House bank. The question was and remains what is the best way to reconcile conflicting principles and to provide the special counsel with what he needs.

After deliberation and consultation, I believe we simply cannot perfectly reconcile those conflicting principles, but we cannot let the quest for perfection stop us from doing what is necessary. That is why I support this resolution to fully comply with Judge Wilkey's request for all the House bank records.

On Monday I expressed concern that this request may be too broad. I believed there could be a question involving the constitutional separation of powers and also the matter of a Member's privacy rights if there were no checks in question.

My initial response was to see if we could reach an agreement with the special counsel that would serve the interests and due process and full disclosure. I had hoped that we could have worked out an arrangement with the Justice Department, while allowing for individual Members to have access to the same records available to the Justice Department, and that Members with clean records be segregated from the others.

I said at the very outset that any decision on a formal response to the subpoena from our side would only come after consultation with our leadership and our conference. After having met with our ranking member of the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, the gentleman from Utah [Mr. HANSEN], the leadership, and our Republican conference, we feel that the only appropriate course of action is to provide the special counsel with the records of the bank.

That means providing him, meaning, of course, the special counsel, with all the microfilm, microfiche, and settlement sheets, because without those settlement sheets, one just cannot make sense of the rest necessary to reconstruct the accounts of the bank.

The Sergeant at Arms will provide to any Member who requests it copies of the documents on the microfilm which will enable them to reconstruct their own individual accounts, some of whom have not been reconstructed to their satisfaction.

I believe complying with the special counsel's request is the surest way to both protect the reputation of the House and ensure that justice is done.

Concluding my remarks, I would like to read to my colleagues, if I might, a letter which I dispatched. I had two phone conversations with Judge Wilkey today. I would like to read the letter that I addressed to him earlier this morning and his response.

DEAR JUDGE WILKEY: I would like a clarification of your intent in regards to the records of the approximately 170 accounts which had no overdrafts. I understood previous to your letter of April 21, 1992, that you were in no way interested in these accounts. In the letter of the 21st, however, you indicate that the records of the nonoverdrafted accounts would be returned to the House "without prejudice to asking for these again if this becomes necessary." I believe there needs to be some clarification here.

As you are aware, I think it important that persons representing the House be present as the records of the House are copied. Furthermore, duplicates of account holder records turned over to you should also be furnished to the account holder. Please advise me if these requests can be accommodated.

A paramount concern, of course, is the integrity and confidentiality of these records which will be in your possession. I seek your personal assurance that all necessary steps will be taken to ensure their safekeeping, free from improper disclosure.

I thank you for your attention to these matters.

His response this afternoon:

DEAR MR. MICHEL: Regarding the 170 non-involved accounts, it is evident that there is confusion both among Members and the public over our having access to the accounts of Members not involved with overdrafts. As you are aware, all of the records are commingled and thus it is necessary to have all the microfilm to review the overall operation of the bank and even to evaluate completely one account.

We have no interest in or need for the data on the 170 accounts on the facts we now know. If this changes, we would expect to make a specific showing of need at that time, after a thorough review of data previously furnished.

We have technological facilities which will enable us to separate the 170 as a group from the other accounts as a group quickly. We will return these to the House unorganized, uncollated, and unreviewed by us. The House may have its representatives present while this is being done. All of the above procedures I offered to carry out at the conference on 13 April.

We will duplicate the checks, deposit slips, and account statements (if such appear) of the Members' overdraft accounts, and return the same to the House for distribution to the individual Members.

We will meticulously guard the confidentiality and integrity of all these records, being aware that they are not only covered by grand jury secrecy but are the personal records of a coordinate branch of government.

May I simply say in conclusion, before yielding to some of my other colleagues, that I think at this juncture we frankly, in view of the last vote, have no other recourse but to adopt this resolution, hopefully unanimously.

I understand why some Members may have reservations about it. We are talking about, seriously, about some differences of opinion here. That does not question in any way the integrity or any motive on the part of any other Member. This is one of those times again where one simply has to search his conscience for what he thinks he has to do at this given time in the interest of this institution and, yes, our fellow colleagues, some of whom are more egregiously affected than some of the rest of us.

Madam Speaker, I include for the RECORD the letters to which I referred.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, April 29, 1992.

MALCOLM R. WILKEY, Esq.,
Special Counsel to the Attorney General, Office of the Attorney General, Washington, DC.

DEAR JUDGE WILKEY: I would like a clarification of your intent in regards to the records of the approximately 170 accounts which had no overdrafts. ROBERT H. MICHEL, Republican Leader.

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, DC, April 29, 1992.
Re the 170 Non-Involved Accounts.

Hon. ROBERT H. MICHEL,
Minority Leader, House of Representatives,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. MICHEL: It is evident that there is confusion both among Members and the public over our having access to the accounts of Members not involved with overdrafts. As you are aware, all of the records are commingled and thus it is necessary to have all the microfilm to review the overall operation of the bank and even to evaluate completely one account.

Cordially,

MALCOLM R. WILKEY,
Special Counsel to the Attorney General.

Madam Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. GEPHARDT. Madam Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BROOKS].

Mr. BROOKS. Madam Speaker, let me say that I am one of those Members who does have some reservations. I would say that it may be well and good for them to send the 170 that have no overdrawn checks back and not fool with those check records. Sure, he ought not to. He has no business fooling with them at all. But it is not good for them to have in their little fat, grubby hands the records of 350 other Members.

They wrote one check with insufficient funds and paid it off for 87 cents. So now they are going to have a complete set of every check they wrote for 39 months. They have no basis for that, no specific reason for that, no material, relevant evidence that needs to be brought from those documents.

I will tell my colleagues, I do not like it. It is clear to everybody in this body that Judge Wilkey, the special counsel, has repudiated all reasonable negotiations aimed at narrowing the scope of the subpoenas of the bank records. The plain language of those subpoenas is unprecedented, overbroad in the extreme, constituting what only can be called a witch-hunting expedition of purely partisan nature.

Obviously the Michel amendment should not be passed. I know that even the Michel resolution gives lip service, and the gentleman talked about the need for secrecy, confidentiality of these great records, talked about it at length.

Unfortunately, I cannot take great comfort in the thought, given Judge Wilkey's own words, nearly 20 years ago in the Nixon tapes case.

Judge Wilkey, dissenting from the majority opinion, made the following observation about secrecy.

He said:

As a member of the Federal judiciary, the writer means no disrespect to his members or staff assistants, but as the circle of secrecy widens, it will dissolve and vanish. All human experience teaches this, particularly in Washington, DC.

That is in Nixon v. Sirica, 487 F.2d 700 (1973).

Judge Wilkey was correct. If only he would remember his observation today. For once the FBI, the Justice Department, the executive branch, Lord knows who else, the typists and the translators and whatever, bookkeepers and accountants, whatever they get, have all this information, nothing but mischief, malicious mischief will be on the way for all of us in this body.

□ 2200

How will this affect the critical election of 1992? The Michel resolution will affect the campaign in precisely this way. It will submerge the need and the public discussion and the effort to solve the scourge of AIDS or funding a way to provide health care for the 30 million, the millions of people in this country who do not have it; of balancing the Federal debt; of trying to reverse the trade deficit; passing a crime bill that has been stuck in the Senate at the direction of the President.

Instead, during the closing months of the 1992 campaign, the Members will be reading, and it may have our names in it, if we are lucky, though they tell me that if they come to get us we are going to get time off for the time we served in Congress.

But instead, during this 1992 campaign we will be reading and hearing about the personal checks of individuals in this Chamber, which I am not interested in. I do not care who checks were written to. It is none of my business. If they want to look at the insufficient checks, I thought that was fairly reasonable, but the rest of the transactions are the Members' own personal business.

A "no" vote on this resolution is a vote for decency and personal privacy, long hallmarks of a democratic society.

Mr. MICHEL. Madam Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Arizona [Mr. KYL].

Mr. KYL, Madam Speaker, with all due respect to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, this is not a malicious witch hunt. This is not political. This is a criminal investigation. This is a serious matter, and Members of the Congress are not above the law.

Madam Speaker, the Michel resolution calls upon us to do what we should do, to comply with a reasonable request for cooperation in determining whether criminal laws may have been violated in connection with the operation of the House bank. Our constituents expect us to do our duty and to do what is right.

By rejecting the Gephardt resolution, we have voted to do our duty, to make this decision on our own, not to defer to another branch of Government to do it for us. Now, we must do what is right; and who can argue that we should not cooperate with the Attorney General's investigation to the maximum extent possible?

All of the original House bank records, including, I am informed, the settlement sheets, are on microfilm or microfiche requested by Judge Wilkey's subpoena. That is surely the minimum we should provide. We can and should agree tonight to provide Judge Wilkey with the 41 rolls of microfilm he has requested. We do that by adopting the Michel resolution.

It is the right thing to do because none of us want to stand in the way of a valid criminal investigation. In fact, we want to cooperate.

It is the right thing to do because there is no constitutional issue as to the release of the microfilm. Neither the speech and debate clause nor the fifth amendment are implicated by this request.

And it is the right thing to do because the American people deserve to know whether any Member of this body may have violated a law.

I urge that the Michel resolution be adopted.

Mr. GEPHARDT, Madam Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentlewoman from Washington [Mrs. UNSOELD].

Mrs. UNSOELD, Madam Speaker, of course Members of Congress are not above the law. This body has responded to valid subpoenas in the past for bank records. This is not a case of a criminal investigation. This is a diversion from getting this country back on track. This is an attempt to open this body up and put it on the plate of a Presidential monarchy and to dilute the House of Representatives of these United States.

This is a question of the balance of powers. And how are those questions resolved? When one body of this Government has a dispute with a second and equal body, we go to the third body and seek resolution, as we attempted with the Gephardt resolution. I may not like the response of the court, but that is the way that disputes between two equal bodies are decided.

Instead, what are we about to do? Dilute the House of Representatives. This whole issue, as I told my constituents in the last 2 weeks, is not about the bank. It is about diverting our attention from the real scandals of this country.

This same Justice Department that wants to paw through the copies of our cancelled checks is the same Justice Department that has failed to collect the $79.1 million in restitution against those savings and loan defendants, and has instead only collected $349,000.

The same Justice Department that wants to paw through our checks has levied fines against savings and loan, convicted criminals, convicted criminals, mind you, of $4.5 million. And do the Members know what that Justice Department has collected? $15,200. That is the Justice Department that wants to go on this fishing trip. That is the Justice Department to which we would abandon the soul of this House. And that's real scandal.

I will proudly vote "no" on the Michel resolution.

Mr. MICHEL, Madam Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HYDE].

Mr. HYDE, Madam Speaker, the interpretation of this inquiry by Judge Wilkey as an aspect of Presidential politics is, to put it kindly, off the wall, as far as I am concerned. The separation of powers which has suddenly become a theological principle was never even considered when Daniel Ortega was the object of negotiations by Members of this body, bypassing the State Department and bypassing the Executive, who has, under the doctrine of separation of powers, primacy when it comes to foreign policy.

As far as Judge Wilkey and his FBI agents pawing over the records, as I understand it the GAO has been pawing over these records for a long, long time. I am not sure they are bound by the secrecy that the grand jury is bound by, and the confidentiality. We do know there was a list out there somewhere in the possession of somebody, at least if newspaper stories are to be credited with accuracy.

Judge Wilkey has been given a mandate to explore the operation of this bank to see if there was criminal activity. Why should he have to take our word that there were 170 or any other number of people who never wrote an overdraft check? He will find out for himself. Why should he accept the word of this body, whom he is investigating? He will look at all of the records and winnow out those that have no criminal relevance whatsoever and not be bothered with them. They have enough to do taking care of those that are questionable and that are problematic.

When we run for public office we are not required to disclose our income tax returns, but if we are asked by the media, if we are asked by our opponents, we do it. We do it if we are smart and we do not want to indicate we have something to hide. We disclose. We are not compelled to do it, but we are in the public eye and we should act accordingly. I support the Michel resolution.

Mr. GEPHARDT, Madam Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLPE].

Mr. WOLPE, Madam Speaker, I rise in opposition to the resolution that is before us, offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL]. I understand the die is cast and that the Michel resolution is about to pass. But I feel an obligation to make a few brief observations.

I will not be a candidate for reelection this coming November, but I still care deeply about this institution in which I have been privileged to serve for some 14 years. And I have listened closely to the debate this evening. What I have found profoundly disturbing is how few Members who have risen in support of the Michel resolution have even attempted to justify their support on the basis of the merits. Time and time again we have heard in the course of this debate that this was the wrong thing to do, that there were serious constitutional principles at stake.

But the public, we are told, would not understand a vote based on the merits. Public opinion, we are told, demands that we vote, in effect, against the merits. That was the substance of the argument made by many of those who have risen in support of the Michel resolution.

Let me submit that that is the cruelest kind of cynicism coming from those who profess to lead this country of ours. We talk a lot these days about the cynicism of the American public that is being directed at this institute, and there are a number of us, Republicans as well as Democrats, who have risen, in very recent days in fact, in an effort to defend this institute.

We understand, all of us here, that the source of the frustration of the American people is fundamentally a policy gridlock. We have a White House going in one direction and a Congress that thinks that direction is not right and has a different set of priorities. We all understand that it is this policy impasse that underlies the pain and the frustration of the American people.

But there are some who would like their constituents to believe that it is the Congress—the Congress as an institution—that is the enemy of the American people. Because that perception serves those who have been shaping and directing national economic policy for a lot of years now, and who desperately want to avoid a debate on that policy, if we acquiesce to the cynicism that we have heard voiced by many Members of this Congress tonight, suggesting that we cannot trust the American people to understand the real issues, why should they trust us to provide leadership for them? It really is a matter of trust.

I happen to think that our constituents can understand that if Members of Congress are not prepared to defend matters of fundamental privacy and fundamental constitutional principles for themselves that there should be no reason to believe that those same rights of American citizenship are going to be any better protected for them. Moreover, why should we expect the American public to rally in defense of the Constitution and of those principles that we were elected to uphold and sworn to uphold if we are not prepared to defend that Constitution and those principles ourselves. That is really the issue. Are we prepared to dutifully act on our constitutional obligation, to make judgments based upon our sworn obligation to uphold the Constitution, or are we going to abandon that obligation and those principles?

We have had some pretty tragic moments in American history when in a moment of panic and hysteria we have abandoned the Constitution. And we have paid dearly for those periods when we have forgotten the importance of those documents that give meaning and definition to the American experience.

Let us all understand that the issue here tonight is not whether or not there should be full disclosure of anyone that has engaged in criminal conduct. We want anyone for whom there is cause to believe criminal conduct has occurred to be subject to that subpoena and to have their bank records made available. But to suggest that virtually every Member of this Congress is essentially vulnerable to having all of his or her private financial records laid out in full view of a special counsel, who many of us think is politically motivated, I think is an outrage on its face. And I submit that it is not our rights alone that are at issue here. It is the rights of each individual American citizen. Does our Constitution apply to Americans equally or does it not? That is the question that is before us tonight.

I hope that there will be some Members here who have enough faith and enough confidence in their constituents that they will feel able to speak the truth this evening.

Mr. MICHEL. Madam Speaker, I yield 2½ minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAVENEL].

Mr. RAVENEL. Madam Speaker, I have been here a little while now, and most of you folks know me, and you know I am not a real partisan person. I have never really felt too involved in this uproar that has been going on about the bank, because I never wrote a check, and I never made a deposit. But I hear all of the rhetoric here tonight about it being a question of a division of the power of the U.S. Government, and it is a bunch of baloney. It is just a question of a bank.

Now, what happens in a little bank in the country if there are some problems in the bank? The bank examiners come in, and they look through everybody's records, and if they find some wrongdoing has occurred they call on the FBI. And if the FBI confirms it, then they go to the U.S. attorney. And if the U.S. attorney says yes, there is a question, there is something bad here, then it goes to the grand jury, and you have some indictments, and then the question of guilt or innocence is settled in the court. That is the American way.

So now we get this little old Mickey Mouse bank downstairs. I never even knew what went on in there, you know, until all of this surfaced. I figured if you went in there to talk about your retirement plan or something, that was the place to do it. I never really paid much attention to it.

So anyhow, this uproar has developed about problems with the bank down there. It is not the kind of bank that most banks generally are or as we know banks, so there has been criminal activity suspected as going on down there. It is not the kind of place where the bank examiners can come in, and then the FBI comes in, and then, you know, the U.S. attorney or the Solicitor. You cannot go through the regular process, and the whole country is wondering what in the world is going on with that Congress now.

So we have the special prosecutor, and the special prosecutor comes in and he says look, we want the records of the bank. I do not see why we do not just give them everything they want and let them go through all of the checks, let them check everything. If criminal activity is suspected, then they can turn it over to the authorities, and eventually there will be indictments. Hopefully, that will not occur, but then guilt or innocence can be determined for Members of Congress, if it has occurred, in a court of law.

It would just seem to me that if you vote against making an amendment you either have something to hide or you really are expressing a political deathwish.

Madam Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. GEPHARDT. Madam Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRAFICANT].

Mr. TRAFICANT. Madam Speaker, America is really changing all right. As soon as there is a controversy, Congress runs scared.

Let us look at America today. The courts are getting stronger. Congress has allowed it. Through a legal machination called precedence, the courts now write many of our laws.

The Presidency is getting stronger. The Congress has allowed it.

I want someone to show me in the Constitution where it gives the President the power over foreign affairs. The Constitution is clear. Congress shall regulate commerce with foreign nations. Congress shall draft all laws. Congress shall establish the courts and tell them what their hours are, what days they could meet and where they will meet. The Congress shall coin money, and the Congress shall represent the last balance of power: the people. But, you see, the problem is we have allowed Congress to grow weak. In my little humble way I would just like to say this: There has never been in world history any group or nation of free people ever overthrown or toppled by a parliamentary forum of duly elected representative government, never.

□ 2020

But there have been many groups and nations of free people toppled by powerful courts who turned their backs on people and powerful individuals vested with excessive control.

Under stress, Congress has turned into a bunch of constitutional wimps. The sheriff disagrees with what you do. I am not an attorney. The Justice Department wanted me to do 23 years. The people of my district already sentenced me to 8.

But I will say one thing I will not be a part of: I will not be a part of letting the People's House be denigrated by scandal. Correct the scandal, but do not take the power away from the people. That is what we are basically doing.

So in our fever for partisanship here, and the partisanship thing could change in years to come. We are now only whittling away at the majority. We are beginning to take big chunks out of the Constitution. But who here really cares?

I think we have got an election coming up, and the trouble with our country is we are driven by elections, not by the Constitution, and we swore an oath to the Constitution, not to the damn election cycle.

Mr. MICHEL. Madam Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. SCHIFF].

Mr. SCHIFF. Madam Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Madam Speaker, I want to say to my colleagues that in the last vote what we decided was that this House would not deliberately make subservient its House to a third branch of government, the courts, which in my opinion was the correct decision. But we did not resolve the issue of what we will do with the subpoena before us.

I was a career criminal prosecutor before being elected to Congress, and I spent many years putting together cases involving checks and such instruments.

I urge a vote for the Michel amendment. We have a choice at this point. We can either cooperate, or we can resist, and we can assert the independence of the House against the subpoena. As you have seen, there are some reasons to do so.

But I do not think that that would be a wise course, and this is the reason: I think this matter has gone beyond any one account or any one individual or any group of individuals. I think this matter now gets into the operation of the House bank as a financial institution.

How is it operating? Who has raised that issue? Many of us have raised it ourselves. Many of us from this well or in public statements have questioned the operation of the bank and have said, in fact, it is the operation of the bank that there are so many people listed as having written overdrafts on the list we released recently.

Since we ourselves have raised the question of the House bank, then we owe it to the special counsel to provide every possible means to examine the House bank, and I can tell you that when an institution has to be examined, the only way that can be done properly is for the person examining, in this case the special counsel, to get possession of all the records possible and then, through sifting through, set aside those records that have no further use in the investigation. But oftentimes that cannot be established in advance.

If we want the special counsel to do his job, if we want the institution of the House bank which we ourselves have questioned publicly to be examined properly in this investigation, then we should agree to the subpoena and vote for the Michel resolution.

Mr. GEPHARDT. Madam Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WEISS].

Mr. WEISS. Madam Speaker, it is not often that we have the absolute certainty of knowing that history will, in fact, note what we do in this body at a particular moment. You can bet on it, history will note what we are doing today.

I guess it has not been bad. The Constitution of the United States has had a 200-year run, and I guess what we are saying in this body today is that that is enough, because we are certainly turning the American Revolution upside down.

That revolution was fought because the colonists decided that they would not allow such a monarch, a person, to determine what, in fact, goes, that we would have representative government.

And now, the vote that was taken on the Gephardt resolution, I can believe that a lot of Members on the minority side, the Republican side, might have agreed with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL] and against GEPHARDT. But to have every single member of the Republican Party vote in opposition to GEPHARDT, tell me that that is not political. Tell me how much you love the institution. Tell me how much you care about this body and this country and democracy. When I was going to high school, there was a noted playwright, radio playwright, called Norman Corwin, who wrote a marvelous radio drama called "The Hollow Men"; and he depicted how American democracy fell because those who were sworn to uphold it were really hollow, did not understand what democracy was all about.

Here we are. And here we are for the basest of reasons. What is going on today is the founding of the Willie Horton issue of 1992.

Shame on you. Shame on you.

Mr. MICHEL. Madam Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Just a quick observation; you know, I do not consider this to be a political issue. I noted that 123 Democrats had the good sense to vote for our side. Now, you do not have that kind of division in this House and call it politically partisan. When it is one side versus the other straight down the middle, then maybe you can call it political.

Madam Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. RIGGS].

Mr. RIGGS. Madam Speaker, I thank the gentleman, the Republican leader, for yielding me this time.

Madam Speaker, I think it is, indeed, very unfortunate that this debate has degenerated into a political football.

We have heard several speakers tonight impugn the reputation and professionalism of Judge Wilkey and his investigative team of career prosecutors and career investigators. Who are we to attribute partisan motives to those individuals, the majority of whom are career Federal civil servants, when the basis for their investigation is the public allegations of criminal wrongdoing, or potential criminal wrongdoing, in conjunction with the House bank scandal?

The whiny tone of the debate is somewhat suggestive of a jailhouse lawyer who thinks he can somehow beat the rap or at least postpone the day of reckoning by resorting to legal ploys.

I would like to set the record straight. Judge Wilkey sought a grand jury subpoena when it became clear that the House leadership would not, or could not, voluntarily surrender the records of the House bank's operations. He specifically identified the records in question as 41 rolls of microfilm in the custody of the House Committee on Standards of Official Conduct. That is very narrow and a focused request for documents.

The examination of these records, as other speakers have noted, is consistent with standard investigative procedure when a financial institution fails under a cloud of mismanagement or self-dealing.

The records, when transferred from the House of Representatives to the Justice Department, will be protected by the secrecy accorded grand jury proceedings by law and the Right to Financial Privacy Act, a fact that both Judge Wilkey and the Speaker have acknowledged publicly.

Furthermore, Judge Wilkey in his letter of April 27 and in his letter to the Republican leader today has stipulated a procedure for segregating the records of those Members with no purported overdrafts from those named by the ethics committee under House Resolutions 236 and 293.

These records are of critical importance if we are ever going to place this matter behind us and provide the public with a full accounting as to those allegations originating with the statements of members themselves of possible wrongdoing in violation of the Federal Election Campaign Act, the IRS Code, the Ethics in Government Act, and other applicable laws.

Indeed, Judge Wilkey as we have noted in this debate tonight, is on record as stating that his preliminary inquiry has "already unearthed evidence that a classic check-kiting scheme may have occurred."

Under these circumstances, are we to stand here tonight defiant and contemptuous of the very laws we are sworn to uphold? Or are we going to uphold the honor of the House, which requires that we fully, faithfully and expeditiously comply with the grand jury subpoena for records?

Madam Speaker, I urge a "yes" vote on the Michel resolution without further challenge, opposition or delay to the subpoena.

Mr. GEPHARDT. Madam Speaker, I yield myself 30 seconds.

Madam Speaker, I simply wanted to correct one statement that was made by the previous speaker. And that was that the leadership in the House could or would not turn over the materials and, therefore, a subpoena was issued. I just want to make it clear that in our meetings with Judge Wilkey we made it very clear that we intended to comply but we did say that under our rules we could not, did not, and do not have the power to hand Members' records over to anyone and that it had to be done by order of the House. That is why we are on the floor this evening.

Madam Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentlewoman from Hawaii [Mrs. MINK].

Mrs. MINK. Madam Speaker and Members of the House, I feel very much like a victim tonight, victimized because I am a Member of this Chamber composed of individuals who are not willing to stand up to defend the rights of even one single member. This institution, I think, is under challenge tonight. The minority whip said earlier this evening that all he was asking the House to do was to surrender, without regard for the Constitution, without regard for due process and to simply cave in and agree to the subpoena that has been called for. He suggested further that if Members felt aggrieved, that we could go to court, and each one of us could lay our individual claims.

I did not happen to write any overdrafts in this bank and I have no cause to be alarmed as to what will be found if my checks were to be turned over. But I have a deep sense of righteousness, a sense of privacy that I would think every member of this House would want to protect for any single Member who could be hazarded by this unfair subpoena.

The minority leader said that the special counsel was willing to look at the records and return 170 records carte blanche of people that did not write any overdrafts. If it were that simple an act for the Justice Department to do, then why not change the subpoena, to begin with, and call for only those that wrote overdrafts? The minority confesses the defects in the subpoena yet they are unwilling to have it corrected.

What I do as an individual in political life is open to challenge by my constituents. But certainly I have a right to my private life. What is happening tonight is a clear invasion and violation of my rights, and I urge this House to defend my rights of privacy and not order the subpoena against my records. Like myself 170 Members wrote no overdrafts. To seize their records without just cause, without any cause, is a gross violation of our constitutional rights. I cannot waive my rights; I would be deemed to have forfeited them contrary to my constitutional rights.

I want those who committed criminal acts to be prosecuted. It is the duty of the Justice Department to prosecute criminals. It has the ability to write a subpoena that does not violate the innocent's right to privacy.

All I want is to have the court determine the validity of this subpoena as is customary in all cases. My rights of privacy require me to defend them, as I alone am the loser if they are violated.

Mr. MICHEL. Madam Speaker, I yield 3½ minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KLUG].

Mr. KLUG. Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL].

Madam Speaker, when seven of us had the audacity last fall to stand in this well and first question about the House Bank, we had absolutely no idea where the investigation would lead and whether Members on that side of the aisle or this side of the aisle were involved. As we know now today, it has been a painful decisionmaking process and a painful discovery for many of our colleagues. But when we stood here last September, there was one fundamental question that had to be answered: Did anybody in the House of Representatives break the law in the operation of the House Bank?

When I went through a series of town hall meetings in Wisconsin over the last several months and the last several weeks, I had people at those town hall meetings stand up and ask me the question: "Did anybody in Congress break the law in the House Bank?"

And you know what? After debates through September, October, November, December, January, February, March, and April, we still do not have an answer to that fundamental question. I think we have a responsibility to answer the question for everybody who sits in this Chamber, for each one of the American people and for this institution as a whole, because the greater affront to the institution is not that we ask if our colleagues have broken the laws but that continually along the way we have refused to answer that question. And I do not blame the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, because the Ethics Committee was never charged and never asked to fulfill that responsibility. But now we have an opportunity to answer those questions, and if you want to put this issue behind you, the way to put the issue behind us is to turn those records over to the special counsel.

Now, everybody knows that many of those records involve both determinations and records for Members who had troubles and for the 170 who had no problem whatsoever. Daily logs contain the transactions of both of those, those who are completely innocent and those the Ethics Committee indicated were under suspicion.

Now, we cannot, I do not think, by any reasonable standard of criminal law or any reasonable standard of public opinion, expect those of us in the House to purge the records of those who are innocent and those who have troubles. Tonight I would like to urge my colleagues to give the records to the special counsel and allow him to proceed, and if we should have learned one lesson over these last 8 months of debate and the last 8 months of charges and countercharges and the rhetoric when we cut through it, if we should have learned one simple lesson, it is Mark Twain's old axiom, "When everything else fails, simply tell the truth."

This is not the time for the legal challenge to this kind of subpoena and it is not the time for that kind of case. It is the time to answer the fundamental question that was at the heart of the debate and really at the heart of the entire issue and controversy over full disclosure: whether or not anybody in this institution broke the criminal laws of the United States of America.

Tonight, by turning over those records, we answer that finally, that lingering and, I suspect, ultimately very painful question, whether anybody here broke the law, and that is what the debate and the fight was about last September and that is what I think ultimately the debate and the fight is about tonight in this House.

Mr. GEPHARDT. Madam Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK].

Mr. FRANK of Massachusetts. Madam Speaker, I first would make the obligatory disclaimers where relevant: I did not write any checks on the House bank during that period. I did all my overdrafting in Massachusetts to stimulate the local economy. My chief assistant did say that whoever would have thought that there would be a big noise about sloppy financial records and "you wouldn't be on the list," so I was treated like everyone else. That is all I think Members of the House ought to ask for. Members of the House have, I think, the House that is an institution in the past has overrelied on the separation of powers argument, I think we have.

Queen Elizabeth I is dead. The likelihood of our getting our tongues slit because of things we say here and being sent to Star Chamber is less than some of our people sometimes think. But if we should not have more power, neither should we have less rights. When we are talking about fundamental rights of citizens, I believe. I was a little bit disappointed when my friend from South Carolina closed by saying if you are against this you either have something to hide or a political death wish. I may have manifested the political death wish inadvertently from time to time in my past. But I do not have one anymore. And I still do not have anything to hide. I did not write any checks on this bank.

But privacy is not necessarily something to hide. If the—let me just address what the gentleman from Wisconsin said. He said he went through, and he listed all the months, and he got them all right, the order was perfect, January, February, March, I was very impressed. And he said, "We still don't know who broke the law." Nobody here has interfered with the Department of Justice from beginning a normal criminal investigation. They have had every power to do so. Under the independent counsel statute they could have appointed an independent counsel if they wanted to, which can be done at the will of the Attorney General about anybody.

No one here has impeded a criminal investigation. So no one has a right to suggest that there was any such obstruction. The question, though, is what is the reasonable scope of the subpoena? And I do not understand why Judge Wilkey has subpoenaed every check with the payees, and that is a problem. The gentleman from South Carolina asks, "What have you got to hide?" A kid who goes to a psychiatrist; a relative with AIDS; a relative who you have to help support because he or she is not making it and maybe you do not want to make that public.

□ 2130

Madam Speaker, I say to my colleagues, "Let me look at the payees of all of your checks, and I will know an awful lot about your private life." Not me. I kind of inherited growing up in Bayonne. Most of mine said "Cash." But I would guess that a look at the payees of most people's checks would tell a lot about private lives that are irrelevant to anybody. That is not something to hide. That is not a political death wish.

I say to my colleagues, "I don't think the penalty for having had an association with a Member of Congress ought to be, or that your illness, your emotional infirmity, your financial difficulties, that that ought to be made public."

And people say, "Well, we're not making it public. We're just subpoenaing it."

Yeah, and this is where we are different than the normal bank. When a normal bank goes under, I guess they might look at all the records, and the normal bank has thousands and thousands of depositors who are relatively anonymous. We are talking here about 435 very highly visible people and looking at their checks, and is it unrealistic to think that there is a danger of a leak when every payee is there?

Tell that to Bill Gray. Tell that to the former whip of this House whose reputation was unfairly tarnished by a leak that came out of the Justice Department under Attorney General Thornburgh when it was not only a leak, but an inaccurate leak, when his reputation was twice unfairly and inaccurately tarnished by the suggestion that he was involved in illegal activity, which was absolutely untrue, and that came out of leaks there.

No, I do not believe that if every payee of every check written by every Member of the House of Representatives; not me; I did not write any here; but if every payee of every check written on the House Bank goes over to be looked at by hundreds of people, because Wilkey is not going to look at it all himself, I do not believe there is no danger of a leak. I do not believe there is no danger that some 16-year-old might read in the paper about a psychiatrist or that someone might read in the paper about an illness he or she has. That is what we are worried about.

Madam Speaker, if that is whiny, then maybe it is whiny, but I do not think a respect for privacy is there, and I had always thought the basic principle was there. They got a right to get the payees in some cases, but not without a threshold showing of wrongdoing. That is what we are talking about. Give me every check, and let me in this very political atmosphere with the possibility of leaks look at the payee of every single check, and, if I get a real juicy one, then maybe it is going to get in the paper, and afterwards I am sure Members will say how sorry they are when some poor individual's life is wrecked through no fault of his or her own.

Let them come back and offer to blank out the payees, and then I will vote for it. I do not understand why the payee in every case is relative at all. If we are talking about the size of the float, I do not understand that.

Mr. RIGGS. Madam Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRANK of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. RIGGS. Madam Speaker, I appreciate the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK] yielding.

Madam Speaker, I just want to ask his opinion as to who would be the proper person, and I think it is agreed that—

Mr. FRANK of Massachusetts. Quick. I have got 5 minutes.

Mr. RIGGS. The records are commingled on this microfilm, so who then should be charged with the task of segregating the records? Our employees or the Justice Department?

Mr. FRANK of Massachusetts. The gentleman misunderstands what I said. I did not say "segregate the records." I said, "Blank out the payee." Who would blank it out? Anybody here could blank it out. We are not segregating it. The gentleman was so fixated on his argument that he has not listened. I was not talking about segregating. No payee ought to go there unless there is a surface showing that there is a wrongdoing.

Madam Speaker, I am out of time, but I do not think, however Members vote, that they ought to confuse some concern for the privacy of innocent individuals whose only crime, and it may be considered a crime by some, is to be associated with Members here, that their privacy ought to be shredded.

Mr. MICHEL. Madam Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. CUNNINGHAM].

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Madam Speaker, this is almost getting comical, but, as a very young man, if I did something wrong, my mom would tell me to go tell my dad. My dad is 6 foot 1 and 230 pounds, and I guarantee my colleagues that I did not want to disclose to him any wrongful activity. My mom was not partisan.

Madam Speaker, Judge Wilkey is only looking at wrongdoing, not personal preference. How can we call it a witch hunt when the minority leader is willing to divulge all of his records? All of our records that support the Michel amendment will support and divulge our records at the same time. It is not exclusionary.

When I was CEO of a troop, I asked my troops to take drug tests, and they objected. Each time, as their leader, I stepped forward and took the drug test ahead of them. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL] is stepping forward ahead as our leader and saying he will disclose his records. He is not expecting any other person to do anything that he is not willing to do himself.

Mr. MICHEL. Madam Speaker, I yield 1½ minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SHAYS].

Mr. SHAYS. Madam Speaker, in my judgment Congress, as an institution, is handling the bank overdraft scandal as personally and as badly as the Nixon administration handled the Watergate break-in. Congress is under investigation, and we, the organization under investigation, wants to decide what documents the investigator has a right to see. I find this absolutely mind-boggling.

We need to cooperate with the special counsel and let him do his job, and we should do our jobs. Attempts of this House to claim legislative privilege under the separation of powers doctrine is too reminiscent of White House attempts of nearly two decades ago to claim executive privilege. Both claims are wrong. In both instances the doctrine of separation of powers yields to the equally powerful doctrine, of checks and balances.

Madam Speaker, we must provide full and complete disclosure to the special counsel and do it now. We are simply not above the law. What is fair for the rest of the country is fair for us.

Mr. MICHEL. Madam Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Nevada [Mrs. VUCANOVICH].

Mrs. VUCANOVICH. Madam Speaker, tonight I rise in support of the Michel resolution to supply the special counsel to the Attorney General, Judge Malcolm R. Wilkey, with the microfilm that he has requested in order to further his inquiry into criminal wrongdoing at the now disbanded House Bank.

I feel that providing these materials to the special counsel is imperative to investigate any criminal activities that may have taken place at the House Bank, and I have previously voiced my belief that a criminal investigation should indeed take place.

It is important however to note that the resolution we are currently considering further states that the House relies upon the assurances of the special counsel that necessary steps will be taken to provide full protection and confidentiality to the records; that no constitutional rights applicable to any Member or employee shall be construed as being deprived; and that the House wishes to maintain communication and cooperation with the Special Counsel so as to promote justice that is consistent with the privileges and rights of the House.

These conditions are important to maintain the integrity and constitutional authority of the House as separate from the executive branch while also allowing the release of the information that I believe will further aid in a criminal investigation, a criminal investigation that I fully support.

Mr. MICHEL. Madam Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BURTON].

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Madam Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL] for yielding this time to me.

Madam Speaker, I find it strange that many of my colleagues are upset about this. There is no question of separation of powers. There is no constitutional problem. There is a problem, however, about some of this stuff being brought to the attention of the public. There is a problem that there may be some criminal indictments and the investigations may lead to some real problems for some people in this Chamber.

But I did not see any real concern when we had the Watergate problem on that side of the aisle. I did not see any concern when we had the Iran-Contra investigation or any questions about constitutionality when that investigation took place, and there were really no substantial convictions. Everybody was let off after a period of time. But everybody on that side of the aisle said we had to go forward. When executive privilege was claimed by President Nixon, that went by the wayside. Nobody paid any attention to that.

But now, because this body is being investigated, everybody is straining and saying, "No, no, we can't do that. We can't let that happen."

The fact of the matter is the credibility of this institution is at the lowest level in history. Seventeen percent of the people in this country believe we are doing a good job or believe that we are honorable people. We have to restore the confidence in this institution, and what we are doing tonight by trying to set up a road block to this investigation is dead wrong, and it is not going to help this institution, and it is not going to help the Members of this body.

Madam Speaker, all of this is going to come out anyhow, so we might as well get on with it, and for those of my colleagues who continue to try to stop this investigation let me just say, "Me thinks you protest too much."

□ 2250

Mr. GEPHARDT. Madam Speaker, I would inquire how much time is remaining on both sides.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mrs. KENNELLY). The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GEPHARDT] has 4½ minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL] has 1½ minutes remaining.

Mr. MICHEL. Madam Speaker, there has to be an erroneous count up there, because I have 5 minutes remaining under my count. We should check the count.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The count is being double-checked.

Mr. MICHEL. Madam Speaker, do we have the right to close?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL] has the right to close.

Mr. MICHEL. Then why do we not proceed?

Mr. GEPHARDT. Madam Speaker, I yield 4½ minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. EDWARDS].

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Madam Speaker, we should first correct some misstatements made by our colleagues on the other side. In the first place, when the FBI wants to go into a bank and look at your checks, it just cannot dance in. It would like to, and every once in a while it asks us for a particular procedure, but we never let them do it. We do not change the law that way. They have to go to a judge and describe what they are after and why they are after it, and the judge has to give them permission.

The second error that was made over here on this side was that during the Watergate hearings by the Committee on the Judiciary, and I was a member of that committee, that each and every subpoena was not challenged.

Every single subpoena that the President did not want to comply with went to court and we had the court make the decision, Judge Sirica on many occasions.

Madam Speaker, I have here before me the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL]. I feel very sad about it. I think if it is going to pass, and I am sure it is going to pass, we are going to have to live with it for a long time.

Madam Speaker, it forgets our history. It is a dismal document that we are going to be ashamed of for a long time.

We are forgetting our history. Our history was that people came over from foreign countries where the federal police could go to your home, could go to your office, could go to your farm, and, without any due process, without any warrant or anything else, they could examine or take your records.

Well, our Founders did not go along with that. They established the Constitution so that Federal police could not do that any more.

Who is Judge Wilkey? Judge Wilkey is the Federal police. He is an adjunct of the Department of Justice, the chief law enforcement officer of this land.

We are giving the Federal police in this case by this vote unlimited power, no check whatsoever. The courts are there to check power for the safety, for the enforcement of provisions of the Constitution. To give this unbridled power to Judge Wilkey, who has already indulged in a couple of outrageous leaks when he said, "I have evidence of check kiting," the day before yesterday, and going on NBC news and on public TV. He is not supposed to do that.

Madam Speaker, that is entirely wrong. It shows that he is politically motivated and not professionally inclined.

Madam Speaker, I am going to vote against this resolution, of course, and I hope as many Members who can will. It is something that we should not have. We should not have to have it in our RECORD of this great institution.

Mr. MICHEL. Madam Speaker, I yield the balance of our time to the distinguished gentleman from Florida [Mr. MCCOLLUM], to close debate on our side.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. MCCOLLUM] is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. MCCOLLUM. Madam Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Madam Speaker, I have heard some pained voices out here tonight discussing the whole question of what we should do, and I think very sincere and genuine disagreements exist among our colleagues. I can assure you from having sat in on our Republican leadership meetings yesterday that many of our Members express some of the same concerns and debated those concerns that I have heard expressed on the other side of the aisle tonight.

But the question that is before us in the Michel amendment is not one of partisan politics. It is a question of what the public thinks of the integrity of this House.

I think that despite the concerns we all share to one degree or another about some of the questions raised tonight, the public does not perceive them that way. They will perceive it as hair splitting if we do not vote for the Michel amendment. They will perceive us taking some role as special or different, because the fact is, that what Judge Wilkey has asked for and what the Michel resolution would give him in the microfilm is really nothing more than would occur in a normal grand jury investigation proceeding that would occur downtown anyway with any other case in any other court that is dealt in this land.

We do have problems with RICO statutes. We have problems with special prosecutors. I do not doubt for a minute that there are many people who have problems with the long arm of a prosecutor and lots of places getting hold of records to make that so-called grand jury investigation, and we need to go back and maybe address some of those laws in this body that we have passed that allow that to happen.

But the fact is we have an obligation. We are not the criminal investigative body. It is in the executive branch. It is in the Attorney General's Office.

We have an obligation to cooperate, just as the private citizen has that obligation, however painful that may be, and that is what we are doing tonight by voting for the Michel resolution. We are voting to give information to a prosecutor who is bound by the law not to disclose the confidential information that is there. Anybody who does down there can be prosecuted for doing that, and that is more than I can say for some of the confidential information that has been disclosed from this body from time to time.

I also want to point out that any Member individually has the right to file a motion in court if he thinks he or she is being wronged by this process. File a motion to get an order to quash all of this.

There really is no speed and debate question here. Nothing at the House Bank took place, no records involved a committee or floor action. We are really not talking about separation of power truly because we are voluntarily giving the record out by the vote tonight.

I do not think there is any doubt but what we have to do is simply go forward, for the integrity of this body tonight, to vote for the Michel amendment to disclose the microfilm. The judge says he cannot make the distinctions because of the nature of that microfilm with respect to what is down here until he gets it in his shop, and then he will take the steps to do that.

We have to trust him. I believe we should trust him. And his people, if they do wrong, they ought to be prosecuted because they violate the law. But the public demands us to treat ourselves the same way we treat them. In this case it demands that we turn the records over for criminal investigation to the prosecutor in this case to examine. That is the fair thing to do, the honest thing to do, the necessary thing to do for the integrity of this House.

Madam Speaker, I urge my colleagues to vote for the Michel resolution.

Mrs. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the Michel resolution—to comply with the Justice Department subpoena for full access to House bank records. The American public has repeatedly called for full disclosure of all information relating to the records of the House bank. They expect us to do our duty and do what is right. All Americans deserve to know whether any Member of this body violated the law. Nothing short will suffice.

We must be able to distinguish between Members who made honest mistakes, and those who blatantly misused House banking privileges.

The alternative to full compliance with the subpoena—the Gephardt resolution, merely calls for the House to respond to the subpoena after judicial review "if the courts determine it to be appropriate, material, and relevant to inquiry undertaken by special counsel." I feel this is no more than a delaying tactic, which clearly is not warranted. We need to get this issue behind us to get on with the important business of the Nation. Only full compliance with the Justice Department investigation will allow us to do so.

Members arguing against full compliance have stated that we should invoke the privileges of the House to stop Members' bank records from being examined. This is wrong. Americans are tired of what they perceive to be such congressional privilege. No Member of Congress is above the law. Let's get this information to the Justice Department expeditiously. Let the chips fall where they may and allow us to get on with the Nation's business. This is the best way to reconcile this matter and provide the special counsel with the records he needs. We must fully comply with Judge Wilkey's request for full access to all records of Members at the bank.

Full compliance with the special counsel's request is the surest way to protect the reputation of the House and make sure that justice is done.

We must rebuild the credibility of this institution. The only way to do so is by demonstrating full cooperation. If there is no wrongdoing found—the public deserves to know this. If there is wrongdoing—it should be attended to. We need to satisfy our pledge to the public for full disclosure of all available information. We have to do the right thing and comply with the subpoena.

If the American people could vote, it would be for 100 percent disclosure and full compliance with the Justice Department. I agree. I am confident that this will serve the Nation best.

It's not unreasonable to provide this information to the Justice Department. This issue demands fairness and due process.

I urge my colleagues to join with me and support full compliance with the Justice Department subpoena.

Mr. MILLER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of House Resolution 441, which calls for the immediate release, to special counsel Malcolm Wilkey, of all records pertaining to the House bank. This institution must cooperate fully with the special counsel to quickly dispel any assumption that a coverup is taking place or that Members of Congress are above the law.

We should permit Judge Wilkey to conduct a full investigation to see if any laws were violated, and if there were, we should deal with those that are guilty, swiftly and sternly. It is often stated that this institution is the people's House, well, the people of the United States deserve a thorough investigation into any possible wrongdoing. Mr. Speaker, we must continue to open up how our administrative business is conducted in this body, and I'm hopeful that this will lead to more fair and open rules when we consider our legislative business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the unanimous-consent agreement, the previous question is ordered.

The question is on the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. MICHEL. Madam Speaker, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

PROVIDING FUNDS FOR CONTINUING EXPENSES OF STANDING AND SELECT COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

Mr. GAYDOS. Madam Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration, I call up a privileged resolution (H. Res. 429) providing amounts from the contingent fund of the House for continuing expenses of investigations and studies by the standing and select committees of the House from May 1, 1992, through May 31, 1992, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 429

Resolved, That there shall be available from the contingent fund of the House such amounts as may be necessary for continuance of necessary investigations and studies by each standing committee and select committee of the House in the second session of the One Hundred Second Congress for the period beginning immediately after midnight on April 30, 1992, and ending at midnight on May 31, 1992, on the same terms and conditions as amounts were available to such committees for the period beginning at noon on January 3, 1992, and ending at midnight on March 31, 1992, pursuant to clause 5(f) of rule XI of the Rules of the House, except that the entitlement percentage shall be 8.33 percent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GAYDOS] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. GAYDOS. Madam Speaker, for purposes of debate only, I yield the customary 30 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GILLMOR] pending which I yield myself such time as I may consume, with the understanding that any additional time which I may yield will be subject to the specific limitation for debate purposes only.

This resolution provides amounts from the contingent fund of the House for continuing expenses of investigations and studies by all standing and select committees of the House with the exception of the Committees on Appropriations and Budget from May 1, 1992 through midnight May 31, 1992. During this period, each committee receiving amounts under this resolution shall be entitled to an amount equal to 8.33 percent of the total amount made available to such committee under House Resolution 92, approved by the House on March 20, 1991. Furthermore, I wish to emphasize that this entitlement percentage is at the freeze level.

The adoption of this continuing expense resolution is necessary in order that committee work can proceed uninterrupted while discussions are completed regarding the final disposition of the omnibus primary expense resolution.

Finally, I urge my colleagues to vote in favor of the resolution.

Mr. GILLMOR. Madam Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume. I rise in support of the resolution offered by my colleagues and chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GAYDOS].

This continuing resolution is being brought to the floor to continue the funding of our committees which expires at midnight tomorrow night, and continue it in an expeditious manner until May 31. The continuing resolution freezes the committee's budgets at last year's funding levels. It is 8.33 percent of the annual amount per month, which is a hard freeze.

Hopefully, this will be the last time we will be here to request a continuing resolution. I would hope that our Chamber will be able to get together and present to this body a resolution that will provide permanent funding for the year, but I do support the resolution.

Madam Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. GAYDOS. Madam Speaker, I ask that the resolution be supported.

Madam Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time, and I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered. The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. BARTON of Texas. Madam Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to clause 5 of rule I, further proceedings on this question will be postponed until some point in tomorrow's proceedings.

NATIONAL AERONAUTICS AND SPACE ADMINISTRATION MULTI-YEAR AUTHORIZATION ACT OF 1992

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to House Resolution 432 and rule

XXIII, the Chair declares the House in the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill, H.R. 4364.

□ 1127

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 4364) to authorize appropriations to the National Aeronautics and Space Administration for research and development, space flight, control and data communications, construction of facilities, research and program management, and inspector general, and for other purposes, with Mr. LAROCCHIO [Chairman pro tempore] in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill. The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. When the Committee of the Whole rose earlier today, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROEMER] had been disposed of and title I was open for amendment at any point.

Are there further amendments to title I?

□ 2330

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. DUNCAN

Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DUNCAN: Page 8, line 11, strike "$177,200,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$163,700,000".

Page 8, line 14, strike "$200,500,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$187,000,000".

Page 8, line 15, strike "$245,500,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$232,000,000".

Page 8, line 15, after "fiscal year 1995." insert "None of the funds appropriated pursuant to this Act shall be used for the Search for Extraterrestrial Intelligence (SETI)."

Mr. DUNCAN (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore (Mr. LAROCCHIO). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Chairman, my amendment is very simple. It would strike the $13.5 million authorization for NASA's so-called search for extraterrestrial intelligence or SETI Program. This is a program which the Associated Press described as a search for space aliens. This project, if completed, is expected to cost U.S. taxpayers nearly $100 million.

Already NASA has spent over $32 million on this program with nothing found so far.

With our Nation in such financial straits as at present, I find it incredible that we are continuing on with this program, this ridiculous luxury.

At a time when our country faces massive budget deficits, urgent health care needs, and inadequate educational funding, we have no business financing something as excessive as this.

In these tough times, NASA has requested $13.5 million this year, and up to $100 million over the next few years to listen for signals from intelligent life forms in space.

Mr. Chairman, this is not the first time that we have tried to stop this program. My distinguished colleague from Rhode Island, Mr. MACTLEY, offered a similar amendment 2 years ago, and the House supported his position. But the SETI Program continues.

The Associated Press reported that there have been over 50 similar searches since 1960 with nothing found so far, and I think with deficits of approximately $400 billion a year, losses of over $1 billion a day on top of a national debt of approximately $4 trillion, this is the very type of spending, this is the very type of program that the American people are demanding that we do away with.

I realize that this amendment will not make much of a difference when compared to these huge deficits and this tremendous national debt, and that it possibly could be said that it is a drop in the bucket, but if we used that justification, we would not reduce or eliminate any spending.

I think unless you believe that NASA should be given a total blank check and the Congress should never question anything that they do, then you should support this amendment.

This project really only helps just bureaucrats at NASA. It will not help the American people at all. With this much funding, this year's funding, we could pay the tuition at the University of Tennessee in my district for over 4,000 students, and just stop to think how many poor people could be helped with $100 million that is being spent on this program.

I urge support for this amendment. I think it is a worthwhile amendment, and I urge my colleagues to support it.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, let me say in advance that I recognize that the gentleman has an amendment which is, on its surface, attractive to many Members of this House. It is my expectation, based upon my experience with similar amendments of this sort, that it would probably carry. I regret that.

It is not my intention to ask for a rollcall vote on the amendment. But I do want to explain why I oppose the amendment.

I would hope that I could convert the gentleman to an understanding of the importance of this particular scientific research.

What we have here, of course, is easily parodied and is frequently parodied in the press, on radio and television as looking for E.T.'s out in space, for aliens or something of that sort, and it is ridiculed because of that.

Actually what this program encompasses is a very sophisticated radio astronomy type of research aimed at determining if there are any regularities, any anomalies in the kind of data that we pick up in our radio telescopes by doing a sophisticated analysis of all of these signals using principal investigators in the universities of this country.

One would argue that this is a fruitless search, that any intelligent person would know that all intelligent life is here on Earth, and one has only to look at the behavior of the Congress to know that we are the most intelligent form of life in the universe and that, therefore, there can be no other intelligent life in the universe.

Now, I cannot really mobilize an argument that will convince those who think that this is an irrational kind of an activity. If they think that, they generally are difficult to convince.

But this is valid science. It is at the heart of the interests of those people who think that human beings will someday explore the entire universe, and that in the cosmos, because of its size and complexity, that there must be other forms of intelligent beings which are creating an impact on the universe that can be determined.

The other side of that coin, incidentally, is that we here on Earth are sending messages out to the rest of the universe. I was taken by a speech that the Administrator of NASA made last night, because it had one paragraph referring to this, which is not to the study but our own sending of messages out to the universe, which I would like to read, because it epitomizes the spirit with which those who are interested in space are looking outward with the kind of a perspective that you cannot get in any other way.

Here is the quotation from the Administrator Golden:

Two years ago, little Voyager II, one of the most priceless hunks of metal ever assembled by NASA, flew by Neptune and headed out of our solar system carrying a copper disk, a cosmic message in a bottle from Planet Earth. From the very heart of all humanity it carries this message: "We stop out of our solar system into the universe seeking only peace and friendship, to teach if we are called upon, to be taught if we are fortunate. We know full well that we are but a small part of the immense universe, and it is with humility and hope that we take this step.

Now, that is a part of the spirit of space exploration, and it is in that humble spirit that we think that we are not the only significant creatures, that there might be others influencing the cosmos, and we are finding new revelations about the cosmos every week, every month, as was illustrated just within the last few days from the reports from the cosmic observer satellite.

I do not know that this is a rational appeal. To me it is a profoundly significant emotional appeal, and it is also, without question in my mind, something that is subject to scientific analysis using the most refined tools that we can possibly use. It is for this reason that I support this very small expenditure and hope that I can convince my friends that there is validity to this humble effort to see if there is not other intelligent life of some sort within the universe and to reach out to try and understand it.

Have I convinced the gentleman of the merits of my position? Well, I tried.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I agree with much of what the chairman of our committee has just said, and I would just like to raise a couple of other points with regard to this amendment.

Really what we have here is an amendment that represents spending for a program that is less than one-tenth of 1 percent of NASA's budget, and one might ask in a time when we are attempting to work within a freeze budget, which this really is, why we would preserve this program as a part of our effort to try to be responsible. The reason is because it goes to the core of what NASA is supposed to be all about given the basic charter.

NASA has as its job to study the origin, evolution, and distribution of life in the universe. That is really what this program is all about. It is not a program at all about UFO's. This is not a search for UFO's, and it does not matter what the Associated Press may say. They have been wrong on a lot of other things. They are terribly wrong on this one.

□ 2340

They have some ignoramus of a reporter who has not figured out yet what this is all about and writes stupid articles that cause us untold grief in an important science program. But let me tell you it goes beyond just that.

This particular program has proven to be a very useful tool in education.

If you wonder what the American people are getting out of this, it is a very useful tool in education. The SETI Institute has developed a teaching material that goes to grades third through ninth. This is one science program that over and over again has shown itself to capture the imagination of young people.

So we are gathering something in terms of our youth as a result of this work.

The inauguration of the SETI microwave observing project is scheduled for October 12, 1992, just a few months from now. This comes after 15 years of research and development.

So, if we were to do what this amendment proposes, and that is cancel this project, we will in fact abandon 15 years of work that has gone into the project.

Finally, I would say that even if no signals are ever detected under this kind of program, the fact is that the technology that has been developed as a part of that R&D, to search for these very faint signals in outer space, has been and will continue to be applied to things like medical diagnostic imaging, for resource exploration, and for aircraft safety. Those are already spin-off benefits from this. We do not know what the additional spinoff benefits may be and when we actually will begin to apply the technology.

So, I agree with the chairman. This may be one of those things where, because we do not have an ability to get the full understanding of the House, it will kind of easily be voted for by people, but it is an amendment I am afraid which undermines some very core science.

From that standpoint, it is disappointing that the House will probably go in the direction it will.

Mr. MINETA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I strongly oppose this amendment to terminate the search for extraterrestrial intelligence project, and I urge my colleagues to vote against the amendment.

NASA's SETI microwave observing project has the resounding support of the scientific community and has received very strong support from the House in past years. SETI is not a search for green men on Mars. Rather, SETI is a valuable project that will produce a number of significant benefits including technological and scientific advances and educational spin-offs.

The SEI program is designed to develop powerful, sophisticated radiotelescopes sensitive to faint radio emissions and capable of discriminating against considerable cosmic interference. The technical and engineering advances associated with the development of these monitoring devices are extraordinary.

The custom processing chip developed for SETI and fabricated by DARPA is capable of performing almost seven times faster than the common communications chip. In addition, the SETI chip enables compact spectrum analyzers to have millions of simultaneous channels. Combined with the signal detection computers developed for SETI, this technology could produce a flight unit that would allow the FAA to continuously monitor its bands, as opposed to sequentially scanning them as it must do now.

Other applications of SETI technology could prove beneficial for diagnostic medicine, fault detection in materials, and geochemical exploration.

Last, but not least, SETI has been found to be effective as a means of increasing interest in general science education among all age levels. In 1991, the SETI institute received a 3-year National Science Foundation award for developing integrated teaching materials for elementary and middle school grades.

Mr. Chairman, SETI represents a valuable and worthwhile scientific endeavor that has countless spinoff benefits. I strongly urge my colleagues to vote against this amendment to terminate the program.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore (Mr. LAROCO). The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DUNCAN].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. If there are no further amendments to title I, the Clerk will designate title II.

The text of title II is as follows:

TITLE II—MULTIYEAR AUTHORIZATION FOR SPECIAL INITIATIVES

SEC. 201. FINDINGS.

Congress finds that—

(1) in addition to carrying out a core space program, international leadership, technological advancement, and expanded scientific knowledge will be enhanced by an expanded space program based on special initiatives in science, exploration, space transportation, space technology, and space applications;

(2) special initiatives carried out under an expanded space program should compete on an annual basis with other Federal discretionary programs, but not with core space programs;

(3) the orderly and phased transfer of funding from defense research and development to civilian research and development over the next 5 years will achieve a balance between defense and civilian investments and provide the necessary resources to undertake an expanded space program;

(4) it is in the national interest and of benefit to international agreements for the Space Station Freedom to plan for the completion of a permanent manned Space Station utilizing a crew of 8 and providing 75 kilowatts of power;

(5) the successful conduct of an aggressive yet affordable Space Exploration Initiative will critically depend on precursor demonstrations of innovative cost control measures and efficient management practices;

(6) the Administrator should undertake a focused Earth Observing System program responsive to policy needs; and

(7) inasmuch as civil launch requirements and launch rates will remain reasonably static over the next decade, the incremental improvement of current vehicles and facilities will provide a low-cost means to enhance United States launch capabilities.

SEC. 202. AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

(a) LIMITATION.—Appropriations may be made under subsections (b), (c), and (d) only to the extent that appropriations are made to the National Aeronautics and Space Administration in excess of $14,300,900,000 for fiscal year 1993, $15,090,800,000 for fiscal year 1994, and $15,724,900,000 for fiscal year 1995.

(b) RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT.—There are authorized to be appropriated to the National Aeronautics and Space Administration for "Research and Development" for the following special initiatives:

(1) Space Station Freedom, $60,000,000 for fiscal year 1994, and $120,000,000 for fiscal year 1995, in order to provide for an Assured Crew Return Vehicle by fiscal year 1999, a power level of 75 kilowatts, and a crew of 8.

(2) Earth Observing System, including the Earth Observing System Data Information System, $371,000,000 for fiscal year 1993, $695,000,000 for fiscal year 1994, and $1,000,000,000 for fiscal year 1995.

(A) PROGRAM OBJECTIVES.—The Administrator shall carry out an Earth Observing System program that addresses the highest priority international climate change research goals as defined by the Committee on Earth and Environmental Sciences and the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change.

(B) REPORTS TO CONGRESS.—(i) Within 90 days after the date of enactment of this Act, the Administrator shall submit to Congress a Resiliency Plan which sets forth technical and programmatic contingencies for the Earth Observing System in the event that funding shortfalls occur, and which will ensure that the highest priority measurements are maintained on schedule to the greatest extent practicable while lower priority measurements are deferred, deleted, or obtained through other means. The report shall specifically identify what satellites and instrument complements would be launched under various funding profiles.

(ii) Within 30 days after the award of a contract for the Core System of the Earth Observing System Data and Information System, the Administrator shall submit to Congress a Development Plan which—

(I) identifies the highest risk elements of the development effort and the key advanced technologies required to significantly increase scientific productivity;

(II) provides a plan for the development of one or more prototype systems for use in reducing the development risk of critical system elements and obtaining feedback from scientific users;

(III) provides a plan for research into key advanced technologies; and

(IV) identifies sufficient resources for carrying out the Development Plan.

(C) DATA ACCESS STUDY.—Of the funds provided for in this paragraph, up to $34,100,000 in fiscal year 1993 may be made available for the Consortium for International Earth Science Information Network. As a condition of the receipt of such funds, the Consortium shall carry out a study, with the guidance of the Administrator and the Committee on Earth and Environmental Sciences, which—

(i) specifically identifies products of the Earth Observing System Data and Information System which will be directly useful to policymakers in Federal, State, and local government agencies, users in commercial firms and nonprofit institutions, and scientific users in fields other than Earth science;

(ii) identifies such users, their approximate numbers and institutional affiliations, and their specific data needs that can be satisfied by products of the Earth Observing System Data and Information System;

(iii) identifies existing and potential socio-economic data including information on land use, industrial activities, public health, and population, that are critical for understanding human interactions with the global environment, and identifies users who require such data; and

(iv) describes a range of options for making such socio-economic data and relevant products of the Earth Observing System Data and Information System easily accessible to the identified users and the relative costs associated with these options.

Such consortium shall provide a report to Congress by September 30, 1993, summarizing the findings of the study.

(3) Space Exploration, $31,800,000 for fiscal year 1993, $67,300,000 for fiscal year 1994, and $78,900,000 for fiscal year 1995, for the development and launch of the following 3 spacecraft: a robotic lunar geodetic scout spacecraft, a robotic lunar resource mapper spacecraft, and a robotic lunar lander spacecraft, as well as for the purchase of expendable launch vehicle services to launch the 3 spacecraft. The total cost of the development and launch of such missions shall not exceed $490,000,000.

(c) SPACE FLIGHT, CONTROL, AND DATA COMMUNICATIONS.—There are authorized to be appropriated to the National Aeronautics and Space Administration for "Space Flight, Control, and Data Communications" for the following special initiatives:

(1) Development of the Advanced Solid Rocket Motor, $440,000,000 for fiscal year 1993, $400,000,000 for fiscal year 1994, and $487,000,000 for fiscal year 1995. Notwithstanding the previous sentence, if less than $15,253,000,000 is appropriated to the National Aeronautics and Space Administration for fiscal year 1993, then—

(A) not more than $260,000,000 are authorized to be appropriated for the continued development of the Advanced Solid Rocket Motor; and

(B) the Administrator may not obligate in excess of $260,000,000 for the Advanced Solid Rocket Motor program.

(2) Space Transportation Enhancement, $7,000,000 for fiscal year 1993, $87,500,000 for fiscal year 1994, and $175,000,000 for fiscal year 1995 for providing for the incremental improvement in the Space Shuttle fleet including—

(A) the extension of on-orbit duration;

(B) the development of unmanned Shuttle capabilities;

(C) the increase in lift performance; and

(D) the enhancement of existent Shuttle flight reliability.

By September 30, 1993, the Administrator shall submit to Congress a full report outlining the specific actions that are planned under this paragraph.

(3) Development and procurement of second-generation Tracking and Data Relay Satellites, $200,000,000 for fiscal year 1994 and $300,000,000 for fiscal year 1995.

(d) CONSTRUCTION OF FACILITIES.—There are authorized to be appropriated to the National Aeronautics and Space Administration for fiscal year 1993 for "Construction of Facilities" for the following special initiatives:

(1) Construction of Earth Observing System Data Information System Facility at the Goddard Space Flight Center, $22,300,000.

(2) Construction of Advanced Solid Rocket Motor Facilities (various locations), $80,000,000.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman, I move the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the Committee rose, and the Speaker pro tempore (Mrs. MINK) having assumed the chair, Mr. LAROCO, the Chairman pro tempore of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 4364) to authorize appropriations to the National Aeronautics and Space Administration for research and development, space flight, control and data communications, construction of facilities, research and program management, and Inspector General, and for other purposes had come to no resolution thereon.

REMOVAL OF NAME OF MEMBER AS COSPONSOR OF H.R. 194 AND H.R. 2840

Mr. SCHIFF. Madam Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my name be removed as cosponsor of H.R. 194 and H.R. 2840.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mrs. MINK). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Mexico?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. LEHMAN of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to vacate my special order of 60 minutes for today and, in lieu thereof, I request a 5-minute special order this evening.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LAROCO). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California.

There was no objection.

WHY THE PRESIDENT IS THREATENING TO VETO CAMPAIGN FINANCE REFORM

(Mr. GEJDENSON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GEJDENSON. Mr. Speaker, can you imagine Harry Truman's press secretary saying, "We've got a $9 million dinner so Americans can buy access to the White House"?

Those are not my words, Mr. Speaker. That is Marlin Fitzwater: A $9 million dinner so Americans can buy access to the White House.

Mr. Speaker, it is not for Americans. It is for the rich, it is for the powerful, and the reason that this administration is threatening to veto campaign finance reform is because they do not want access for Americans. They want access for special interests.

□ 1440

The bill that passed this House and will shortly pass the other body limits spending, limits political action committees, and limits soft money. No, that is not what Marlin Fitzwater wants. He wants a $9 million dinner so people, American people, can buy access. What people are we talking about? Those that already have too much power and too much access. We need access for the average American, not for billionaires.

Republican opponents of comprehensive campaign finance reform legislation passed by the House and now being considered by the Senate argue that the legislation would hurt challengers by limiting their ability to outpace incumbents. This claim does not stand up.

Thirty-two Republican challengers and 17 former Republican Senators and Representatives have written the President asking him to sign this legislation because they believe it will reinvigorate electoral competition and restore the public trust in Government. The two letters follow:

APRIL 20, 1992.

HON. GEORGE BUSH,
President of the United States, The White House, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: As congressional challengers and loyal Republicans, we urge you to sign the comprehensive campaign finance reform legislation making its way to your desk this year. Such legislation is necessary to level the playing field for credible challengers and to restore a measure of fairness to our electoral process.

Our current campaign finance system is stacked against challengers. Incumbents enjoy a huge fundraising advantage and are often able to spend their way back into office. During the 1990 election cycle, for example, incumbents raised twelve times more PAC money than challengers, spent nearly four times more money overall than challengers, and won reelection an incredible 96 percent of the time.

The key to ending the "permanent" Congress and giving challengers a fighting chance is to restrict special interest PAC contributions and establish a voluntary system of spending limits with alternative campaign resources (i.e. matching funds, discounted postage, free television and radio time) for all credible congressional candidates.

Thank you for your attention to this critical and timely issue. We urge you to sign the congressional reform legislation into law when it reaches your desk.

Sincerely,

Frank Beaumont, Michigan—16th District; Howard Bell, Oklahoma—4th District; Dick Bowen, Texas—23rd District; Margaret B. Buhmaster, New York—23rd District; Gene Moore, Florida—14th District; David Morrill, Michigan—7th District; Margaret R. Mueller, Ohio—13th District; Jurij A. Podolak, Pennsylvania—11th District.

Robert Kerans, Illinois—19th District; Kenneth Kondner, Maryland—7th District; George E. Larney, Illinois—9th District; John R. Lord, Washington—3rd District; Bill Quraishi, California—14th District; John M. Ragsdale, Connecticut—2nd District; Earl Rodney, Florida—21st District; Vic Romero, California—9th District.

Smith, California—16th District; Robert A. Smith, Virginia—3rd District; Zach Wamp, Tennessee—3rd District; Ralph Williams, Delaware—At Large.

APRIL 28, 1992.

HON. GEORGE BUSH,
President of the United States, The White House, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: As Republican alumni of the Congress, we urge you to sign the comprehensive campaign finance reform legislation making its way to your desk this week. Such legislation is necessary to level the playing field for credible challengers and to restore a measure of fairness and decency to our electoral process.

The public perceives that the current system isn't fair to taxpayers because special-interest campaign contributors get special treatment. And it isn't fair to voters because the overwhelming advantage incumbents have over challengers prevents competitive elections.

To address these problems, Congress has now passed comprehensive reform legislation which would establish voluntary spending limits, restrict special interest PAC contributions, provide partial public financing to credible candidates and end the "soft money" system that permits federally illegal contributions to be funneled through state parties in order to influence federal elections.

We are aware that you have expressed concern over the use of public funds in congressional campaigns and the impact of spending limits on congressional challengers. We believe that the presidential public financing system has conferred enormous benefits on presidential politics since the Watergate era and that the public funding provisions in this reform legislation would inject an equally important source of "clean" money into today's congressional campaigns. Additionally, we are convinced that campaign spending must be brought under control and that challengers would be the principal beneficiaries of a level campaign playing field.

This legislation, while not perfect, would do much to reinvigorate electoral competition and restore public trust in government. We urge you to sign it into law when it reaches your desk.

Sincerely,

Sen. Edward J. Gurney, Sen. Charles McC. Mathias, Sen. Hugh Scott, Hon. Abner W. Sibal, Hon. John N. Erlenborn, Hon. Paul A. Fino, Hon. Robert P. Hanrahan, Hon. Ernest L. Konnyu, Hon. Thomas F. Rallsback, Hon. Newton I. Steers, Sen. Robert T. Stafford, Hon. John H. Buchanan, Hon. Paul Findley, Hon. Gilbert Gude, Hon. Harry G. Haskell, Hon. Richard W. Mallary, Hon. Charlotte T. Reid.

NASA ADMINISTRATOR DESERVES CONGRESSIONAL SUPPORT

(Mr. BROWN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Speaker, later on this afternoon the House will take up the annual NASA authorization bill and we will be having a spirited debate about the space program.

I would like to point out that NASA has a new Administrator who has been in office less than 1 month. It will behoove all of us to get better acquainted with his views. I personally have had the opportunity to meet with him several times and have developed a high regard for the direction in which he proposes to move the space program.

Mr. Speaker, I include for the RECORD a speech he made last night to the American Institute for Aeronautics and Astronautics.

REMARKS BY DANIEL GOLDIN, NASA ADMINISTRATOR

Thank you. It is both an honor and a great opportunity for me, having been NASA Administrator for less than a month, to speak to a major portion of the aerospace community at once. As a college student who took up John F. Kennedy's challenge to commit my career to space, I never dreamt I'd be standing before you as the leader of such a magnificent and magical organization with over twenty thousand extremely dedicated and talented workers. To name just the latest example—the COBE researchers whose work came close to unraveling the secrets of the very creation of the entire universe.

Today you must be wondering what's the new guy going to do with NASA. What's going to change? Well, to find out where we're going, we need to recognize how far we've come. In 66 years, we went from the sandy dunes of Kitty Hawk to the dusty plain of Tranquility Base. But to see better where we're going in 1992, I prefer to look back to 1492—and to the 500-year voyage of discovery that Columbus handed down to us to complete.

When I was born in 1940, there were about two billion people on earth. Today, that's more than doubled. And when I'm retired and Willard Scott wishes me a happy birthday, there'll be almost 10 billion. During my half-century of life people have consumed more of the world's resources than during all prior generations in human history. We've already used up more than we deserve, and now we're stealing from the future. What will earth have left in 50 to 150 years? The ¼ of one percent of GNP we invest in NASA has to be considered the most important insurance policy this planet has. That's why I came to NASA for it's the one organization in American society whose whole purpose is to make sure our future will be better than our past.

And NASA has international responsibilities as well. We have accomplished much with our international partners. Astronauts from Canada, Mexico, our European Space Agency partners, Germany, Belgium, France, Saudi Arabia, and soon Japan, have flown with us. And we plan on exchanging astronauts with Russia. The Earth Observing System and our robotic programs are now global in scope and data will be shared worldwide. And our work on Space Station Freedom with Europe, Canada, and Japan will open up a whole new world of cooperation. We can do more together with a shared vision than is possible acting alone. I soon intend to reach out to visit our partners in this great adventure and start a dialogue on how we can explore the Earth, solar system, and the universe together.

When we plan what NASA will do year-to-year, we need to consider where we want to be, not next year, but in fifty years, 100 years—yes, even 500 years. I don't know about you, but in about 500 years, I want one of my successors to be able to turn over the keys of a spacecraft to a Captain Kirk or Picard to go find out if anything is orbiting Alpha Centauri.

To those who say Apollo was a one-shot deal, never to be repeated, that we've got problems to solve here on Earth, I say: Right now we risk making the same mistake as the Chinese emperors over 500 years ago. Some of you might know this story. Consumed by other priorities at home, they banned further exploration of Africa, made leaving the country a capital offense, and burned their fleet to ensure such "wasteful" exploring would never happen again. Instead of spreading its culture and influence, China turned inward, leaving the exploration of Africa and the Americas to Columbus and other Europeans. All this is my way of saying: we cannot pretend the decisions we make today don't have historic consequences for the future.

July 20, 1989 was a historic day. For on that 20th anniversary of humanity's greatest accomplishment, President Bush said, "The Apollo astronauts left more than footprints on the moon; they left some unfinished business. America's ultimate goal was not to go there and go back, but to go there and go on." For the first time in decades, we are fortunate to have a President and Vice President who personally support a vigorous space program. We must seize that opportunity. Carpe diem.

To many Americans, NASA conjures up images of our Wonder Years—the 1960s race to the moon. Remember that day the Earth stood still as we all watched the Eagle land? Remember the shiver you got when you looked up at the moon and realized that for the first time ever someone was looking back? Tell someone you worked for NASA back then and they looked at you like you were JFK, Mickey Mantle, and Walt Disney all rolled into one. We have to restore that magical luster—restore the pride of accomplishment that comes from working here—and make the name NASA the definition of the term, "best in the world."

Many of you have been the keepers of that flame. I want to make sure that your lights aren't kept under a bushel. My first job as Administrator is to listen, because you have a lot to share. We need to examine ourselves individually and collectively to see what can be improved, what we should start doing, and what we should stop doing. We can't keep letting millions turn into billions, and years slip into decades, and not deliver what our country expects, and deserves, from its space program.

General Patton once said: "Never tell people how to do things. Tell them what you want to achieve, and they will surprise you with their ingenuity." That will be my philosophy as Administrator.

For NASA to become a more mission-driven organization, we need an agency filled with leaders—people who are empowered to act, have the resources they need, and are accountable for what they do. NASA has been entrusted with several important missions: space exploration, scientific study of the solar system and universe, monitoring Planet Earth, and cutting-edge aeronautics. To fulfill those missions, every employee, every contractor, every program, every dollar spent, must relate to those missions, and mesh together in pursuit of them. Everything in the space program, must be driven not by bureaucracy, or rules that don't make sense, or by narrowly focused programs, but by the integration of those missions.

The New NASA will work to build a consensus—to create a shared vision of how our daily work relates to our missions. We are devising an integrated plan of programs, schedules, and budgets—not just for the next few years, but 10, 20, 30 years into the future—so that our programs are no longer viewed in isolation, but support one another. Then we will work with all the space stakeholders, both here and abroad, so that they become full partners—part of the team—sharing our vision and strategy. We need to find ways to do things safer, faster, better, cheaper, and to make continuous improvement a part of everything we do. Because if you can't measure it, you can't manage it. We will set clear milestones. Only through increasing accountability, and holding ourselves and our contractors to the highest standards, can we hope to achieve our sacred missions.

In a little church in Sussex, England, there's a 250-year old inscription that says, "A vision without a task is but a dream, a task without a vision is drudgery, a vision with a task is the hope of the world."

If we do this right, if we have the courage to transform ourselves, to dig deep down and bring out our best, then NASA can face the outside world with a space program worthy of the American people. They will see a NASA transformed—a NASA that embodies what we know as the American character: clear-eyed pragmatism, tugged toward a dream big enough to fill a continent.

The American people have made a big investment in NASA and they expect, and deserve, a big return. Newsweek called Apollo: "the best return on investment since Leonardo da Vinci bought himself a sketch pad." By showing the American people we have the tools and the talent—and the right attitude—they'll give us all the support we need. You know how I know that? Because they've spent almost two billion dollars just to watch movies about space. Star Wars, Star Trek, E.T., 2001—they love this stuff. They flock to the Air & Space Museum—8 million a year. They talk to me on the street, in restaurants, cabs and airplanes. I see the sparkle in their eyes when we talk about space. And they look to us to make their dreams come true.

NASA is the leading force in U.S. civil space policy. To live up to that, we must concentrate on steering the space effort, and not get bogged down by the rowing. Imagine a rowing team with no coxswain. Not only does it look messy when the oars don't row together, the boat can end up going in circles. We must do more steering, but for the rowing we do, all of us must pull together in synchronization.

Every core mission of NASA is important. None is unimportant. Some think knocking a colleague's program means more money for themselves. That attitude is not only wrong, it's poisonous. If anyone thinks killing the Space Station is the way to get more money for other NASA endeavors, I believe you're wrong. Take away the American people's dream of being space pioneers, and NASA will end up as just another large bureaucracy. NASA has no fixed claim on the federal budget, and no part of NASA has a fixed claim on its share of the agency budget. If Congress cancels one of our programs, that money will almost certainly go to many other programs outside of NASA.

In the New NASA we'll welcome a diversity of views and ideas—from both inside and outside the organization. Democracy reigns; and there will be no retribution for anyone expressing their opinion. But employees and contractors should consider that when they run down someone else's program, a little part of NASA dies, and the whole agency suffers. Lincoln said it best: "A house divided against itself cannot stand." If we in the NASA team cannot unite behind a shared vision, we cannot expect anyone else to unite behind us.

Tomorrow the House will vote on the future of the Space Station Freedom—and I consider that vote a crucial test of this nation's commitment to any space program at all. Some say it's too small. Some say it's too big. Some even say we could do all the same research here on Earth. There are those who will always want to argue this issue. And to them I say: we put humans on the moon in less time than we've spent debating a space station!

The primary purpose of Space Station Freedom is to be the premier outpost in humankind's effort to learn how to live and work in space. The time our astronauts have spent in space is but the blink of an eye—a tiny fraction—of what we'll need to know to start a permanent presence off good old terra firma. How will the body take the stress of zero G? Prolonged hazardous radiation? Long stretches of isolation in cramped quarters? How do we assemble hardware? Dock and rendezvous? And what about how dexterity will be affected after long periods of zero or partial G? Will astronauts have the strength and agility to respond in life-threatening situations when a rescue is required? All this must be learned before we can ever go back to the moon and go on to Mars. And the only place to learn is a space station.

But there is a second purpose to the space station. For while we may talk a lot about hardware, there's a soft spot in our hearts. NASA cares. What we must learn to sustain life in space will enhance and preserve the lives of people on Earth. The miniaturized devices we'll need to invent to get remote medical telemetry from our astronauts could save lives on Earth. Imagine potential heart attack or seizure victims having a tiny sensor a distant central computer could monitor for dangerous symptoms. The robotics we develop could help the handicapped lead more fulfilling lives, just as NASA has in the past. And the lab facilities in Space Station Freedom should be thought of as a NASA research center in orbit.

Technology transfer will become a way of life at the new NASA. Whether it's medical knowledge, or industrial products conceived in microgravity, the space station will be like the old western trading post—serving the pioneers, but also sending valuable and exotic goods back to civilization.

When you think about it, after only 30 years of human and robotic missions, we have a myriad of unanswered questions about our Earth and our solar system. We don't even know what we don't know. What's out there waiting to be found? I'm not arrogant enough to tell you I know. But I remember Columbus went looking for gold and spices, and what he brought back was something totally unexpected: corn and potatoes. More valuable than gold, you ask? Yes, because those foods fueled a population explosion in Europe—many of whom are the ancestors of us Americans.

Why explore? Why bother? Because we have to. It's in our nature. And it is America's destiny. If you remember only one thing I've said here today, remember this: A child-like imagination is the most powerful force of discovery. When we get that back, there'll be no holding us back.

Two years ago, little Voyager 2—one of the most priceless hunks of metal ever assembled by NASA—flew by Neptune and headed out of our solar system carrying a copper disk—a cosmic message-in-a-bottle from Planet Earth. From the very heart of all humanity, it carries this message: "We step out of our solar system into the universe seeking only peace and friendship—to teach if we are called upon, to be taught if we are fortunate. We know full well that [we] are but a small part of the immense universe—and it is with humility and hope that we take this step."

Ladies and gentlemen, that step was part of an unstoppable march, begun 500 years ago and stretching 500 years hence. The Magellans and Vespuccis of the Space Age of Exploration are seated here today. The Lewis and Clarks will come after us, until that inevitable day when we venture out to the stars.

Will we do it, or will it remain just a fantasy? It's really up to us. Join me on this most noble of endeavors.

COMMEMORATING THE 77TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE ARMENIAN GENOCIDE

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LAROCO). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. LEHMAN] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. LEHMAN of California. Mr. Speaker, last Friday, April 24, marked the 77th anniversary of the Armenian genocide. The purpose of this special order is to pay tribute to those men and women who were brutally murdered in one of the most heinous crimes ever committed. In hopes of raising the consciousness of atrocities of the past, we are trying to prevent them in the future. I am here today because I am committed to the truth about the Armenian genocide.

On the evening of April 24, 1915, more than 200 Armenian religious, political, and intellectual leaders of the Armenian community in Istanbul were arrested, exiled from the capital city, and executed. In a single night's sweep the voice of the representatives of the Armenian nation in Turkey was silenced. This tragic event was only the beginning of an unfolding, systematic policy of deportation and extermination being implemented by the young Turk Government. Consequently, the 24th of April represents for Armenia the symbolic beginning date of the Armenian genocide.

The Armenians were targeted for extermination by the Ottoman Empire in which more than 1.5 million women, children, and men were tortured and killed during the Armenian genocide of 1915-23. Before 1914, over 2 million Armenians lived in Turkey. By the end of 1923, the entire Armenian population of Anatolia had been either killed or deported. I believe that it is of vital importance that we take the time to remember those Armenians who were brutally murdered.

The horror of the Armenian genocide is made worse by the refusal of the current Government of the Republic of Turkey to acknowledge that it ever happened. The Turks attempt to account for the vast decrease in the number of Armenians in Turkey as a consequence of war. Do the Turks expect the Armenians to forget the trauma of war and grim reminders of the atrocity simply because they have succeeded in tampering with history and denying the obvious facts?

The truth about the genocide was clearly evident to Henry Morgenthau, former Ambassador to Turkey between 1913 and 1916 when he reported back to officials in Washington that, after visiting the Armenian territories he stated:

I am confident the whole history of the human race contains no such horrible episode as this. The great massacres and persecutions of the past seem insignificant when compared to the sufferings of the Armenian race in 1915.

The Ambassador went on to state that the Armenian genocide was the "most colossal crime of all ages."

Perhaps if more people had known about the genocide of the Armenians,

Adolf Hitler would not have rallied his troops for the invasion of Poland in August 1939. Hitler was heard to have asked, "Who remembers the Armenians?" To that, 1986 Nobel Peace Prize recipient and Holocaust survivor Elie Wiesel responded, "He was right. No one remembered them."

I come to this Chamber today to not only remember those Armenians who were systematically murdered, but I also would like to focus attention on modern day Armenia. As many of my distinguished colleagues are aware, on September 21, 1991, Armenians overwhelmingly chose independence as the future course for their republic. This historic event was observed by numerous international observers, including himself. Participating in this monumental event was one of the most emotional events I have ever experienced.

The time had finally arrived for the people of Armenia to escape the claws of the Iron Curtain and forge a new beginning that was but only a dream a few years ago. However, the Armenian people are not fully able to join the world community due to the violence which has bombarded the Nagorno-Karabagh region. The Karabagh region, which is located in Azerbaijan, but populated largely by Armenians, has been plagued by violence and bloodshed that dates back to 1905.

Recently Turkey has indicated that it is under very heavy pressure from its own people to get involved in the ethnic war in Azerbaijan. There is growing support in Turkey to send weapons and troops to help the Azerbaijanis. Undoubtedly, the involvement of Turkey in this volatile conflict would only contribute to the lack of stability in the region.

On March 5, 1992, Turkish President Turgut Ozal stated that "It is necessary to put some fear into the Armenians over Karabagh." The President went on to say, "We should not hesitate to frighten, because the world understands this type of language." Turkey's provocative statements against Armenia only serve to heighten tensions in this explosive area and disturb the delicate geopolitical balance of the region.

Turkey, like Iraq, has shown disregard for human life in the past, therefore, the United States must proceed cautiously when dealing with the Republic of Turkey. Mr. Speaker, did the Persian Gulf war not teach us any lessons on the dangers of building a regional power? How can we, as a nation, consider providing military assistance to Turkey when the Turkish Government has suggested the need to frighten the Armenian people. Armenian Foreign Minister Raffi Hovanssian recently stated that the people of Armenia "had 70 years of one empire and we don't need to see a new empire."

I am hopeful that today's special order commemorating those killed during the Armenian genocide will demonstrate America's concern for Armenians all over the world. The 24th of April is a day of remembrance for all of us who care about human values and for all of us who care about the truth. A world that forgets these tragedies is a world that will see them repeated. Such denial sends the message that genocide is an acceptable form of behavior that will be tolerated by the world community.

I would like to thank all of my colleagues that will be participating with me today to help communicate that the genocide will not go unacknowledged and unmourned. The historical record is clear and irrefutable: it is our moral responsibility to acknowledge the Armenian genocide.

THE ARMENIAN GENOCIDE: CONTEXT AND LEGACY

(By Rouben Adalian)

Between 1915 and 1918 the Ottoman Empire, ruled by Muslim Turks, carried out a policy to eliminate its Christian Armenian minority. This genocide was preceded by a series of massacres in 1894-96 and in 1909, and was followed by another series of massacres beginning in 1920. By 1922 Armenians had been eradicated from their historic homeland.

There are at least two ways of looking at the Armenian experience in the final days of the Ottoman Empire. Some scholars regard the series of wholesale killings from the 1890s to the 1920s as evidence of a continuity in the deteriorating status of the Armenians in the Ottoman Empire. They maintain that, once initiated, the policy of exposing the Armenians to physical harm acquired its own momentum. Victimization escalated because it was not countermanded by prevailing outside pressure or attenuated by internal improvement and reconciliation. They argue that the process of alienation was embedded in the inequalities of the Ottoman system of government and that the massacres prepared Ottoman society for genocide.

Other scholars point out that the brutalization of disaffected elements by despotic regimes is a practice seen across the world. The repressive measures these governments use have the limited function of controlling social change and maintaining the system. In this frame of reference, genocide is viewed as radical policy because it reaches for a profound alteration of the very nature of the state and society. These scholars emphasize the decisive character of the Armenian genocide and differentiate between the periodic exploitation and occasional terrorization of the Armenians and the finality of the deliberate policy to exterminate them and eliminate them from their homeland.

Like all empires, the Ottoman Empire was a multinational state. At one time it stretched from the gates of Vienna in the north to Mecca in the south. From the sixteenth century to its collapse following World War I, the Ottoman Empire included areas of historic Armenia. By the early part of the twentieth century, it was a much shrunken state confined mostly to the middle east. Yet its rulers still governed over a heterogeneous society and maintained institutions that favored the Muslims, particularly those of Turkish background, and subordinated Christians and Jews as second-class citizens subject to a range of discriminatory laws and regulations imposed both by the state and its official religion, Islam.

The failure of the Ottoman system to prevent the further decline of the empire led to the overthrow of the government in 1908 by a group of reformists known as the Young Turks. Formally organized as the Committee of Union and Progress, the Young Turks decided to Turkify the multiethnic Ottoman society in order to preserve the Ottoman state from further disintegration and to obstruct the national aspirations of the various minorities. Resistance to this measure convinced them that the Christians, and especially the Armenians, could not be assimilated. When World War I broke out in 1914, the Young Turks saw it as an opportunity to rid the country of its Armenian population. They also envisioned the simultaneous conquest of an empire in the east, incorporating Turkish-speaking peoples in Iran, Russia, and Central Asia.

The defeat of the Ottomans in World War I and the discrediting of the Committee of Union and Progress led to the rise of the Turkish Nationalists. Their objective was to found a new and independent Turkish state. The Nationalists distanced themselves from the Ottoman government and rejected virtually all its policies, with the exception of the policy toward the Armenians.

This essay focuses on three aspects of the Armenian genocide that have broader applicability to any study of genocide: (1) distinctions between massacres and genocide; (2) use of technology in facilitating mass murder; and (3) the legacy of genocide.

DISTINGUISHING BETWEEN THE MASSACRES AND THE GENOCIDE

From 1894 to 1896, Sultan Abdul-Hamid II carried out a series of massacres of the Armenian population of the Ottoman Empire. The worst of the massacres occurred in 1895, resulting in the death of thousands of civilians (estimates run from 100,000 to 300,000) and leaving tens of thousands destitute. Most of those killed were men, in many towns, the central marketplace and other Armenian-owned businesses were destroyed, usually by conflagration. The killings were done during the day and were witnessed by the general public (Bliss 1982, 476-481).

This kind of organized and systematic brutalization of the Armenian population pointed to the coordinating hand of the central authorities. Widespread violence erupted in towns and cities hundreds of miles apart over a matter of weeks in a country devoid of mass media. At a time when the sultan rules absolutely, the evidence strongly implicated the head of state.

INTENT OF MASSACRES

The massacres were meant to undermine the growth of Armenian nationalism by frightening the Armenians with the terrible consequences of dissent. The furor of the state was directed at the behavior and the aspirations of the Armenians. The sultan was alarmed by the increasing activity of Armenian political groups and wanted to curb their growth before they gained any more influence by spreading ideas about civil rights and autonomy. Abdul-Hamid took no account, however, of the great variations in Armenian political outlook, which ranged from reformism and constitutionalism to separatism. He hoped to wipe away the Armenians' increasing sense of national awareness. He also continued to exclude the Armenians, as he did most of his other subjects, from having a role in their own government, whether individually or communally. The sultan, however, did not contemplate depriving the Armenians of their existence as a people.

Although there are similarities between Abdul-Hamid's policies and the measures taken by the Young Turks against the Armenians, there are also major distinctions.

THE 1915 MEASURES

The measures implemented in 1915 affected the entire Armenian population, men, women, and children. They included massacres and deportations. As under the sultan, they targeted the able-bodied men for annihilation. The thousands of Armenian men conscripted into the Ottoman army were eliminated first. The rest of the adult population was then placed under arrest, taken out of town, and killed in remote locations.

The treatment of women was quite different. The bulk of the deported population consisted of women, children, and older men. Countless Armenian women lost their lives in transit. Before the tragic deaths, many suffered unspeakable cruelties, most often in the form of sexual abuse. Many girls and younger women were seized from their families and taken as slave-brides (Sanasarian 1989, 449-461).

During the time of the sultan, Armenians were often given the choice of converting to Islam in order to save themselves from massacre. However, during the genocide years, this choice was usually not available. Few were given the opportunity to accept Islam as a way of avoiding deportation. Most Armenians were deported. Some lives were spared during deportation by random selection for involuntary conversion through abduction, enslavement, or the adoption of kidnapped and orphaned children.

THE COVER OF WAR

A second distinguishing feature of the genocide was the killing of the Armenians in places out of sight of the general population. The deportations made resistance or escape difficult. Most important, the removal of Armenians from their native towns was a necessary condition for maintaining as much secrecy about the genocide as possible. The Allies has warned the Ottoman government about taking arbitrary measures against the Christian minorities. The transfer of the Armenian population, therefore, was, in appearance, a more justifiable response in a time of war.

When the Ottomans entered World War I, they confined journalists to Istanbul, and since the main communications system, the telegraph, was under government control, news from the interior was censored (Sachar 1969). Nonetheless, the deportations made news as soon as they occurred, but news of the massacres was delayed because they were done in desolate regions away from places of habitation. Basically, this provided cover for the ultimate objective of destroying the Armenian population. Inevitably the massacres followed the deportations.

STATE CONFISCATION OF ARMENIAN GOODS AND PROPERTY

A third feature of the genocide was the state confiscation of Armenian goods and property. Apart from the killing, the massacres in 1895 and 1909 involved the looting and burning of Armenian neighborhoods and businesses. The objective was to strike at the financial strength of the Armenian community which controlled a significant part of the Ottoman commerce. In 1915 the objective of the Young Turks was to plunder and confiscate all Armenian means of sustenance, thereby increasing the probability of extinction.

Unlike the looting associated with the massacres under Sultan Abdul-Hamid II, the assault against the Armenians in 1915 was marked by comparatively little property damage. Thus, the genocide effortlessly transferred the goods and assets—homes, farms, bank accounts, buildings, land, and personal wealth—of the Armenians to the Turks. Since the Young Turk Party controlled the government, the seizure of the property of the Armenians by the state placed local party chiefs in powerful positions as financial brokers. This measure escalated the incentive for government officials to proceed thoroughly with the deportation of the Armenians.

The Young Turks did not rely as much on mob violence as the sultan had. They implemented the genocide as another military operation during wartime. The agencies of government were put to use, and where they did not exist, they were created. The Young Turk Party functionaries issued the instructions. The army and local gendarmerie carried out the deportations. An agency was organized to impound the properties of the Armenians and to redistribute the goods. "Butcher battalions" of convicts released from prisons were organized into killer units. The Young Turks tapped into the full capacity of the state to organize operations against all 2 million Armenian inhabitants of the Ottoman Empire, and did it swiftly and effectively (Bryce 1916; Trumpener [1968] 1989, 200-270).

THE USE OF TECHNOLOGY FOR MASS KILLINGS

The Armenian genocide occurred at a time when the Ottoman Empire was undergoing a process of modernization. Apart from the new weapons of war, the telegraph and the railroad were being put to expanded use. Introduced in the second half of the nineteenth century, the networks of transport and communication reached the areas of heavy Armenian concentration by the early part of the twentieth century. Whereas the telephone system was largely confined to the capital city of Istanbul, telegraph lines extended throughout the empire. The rail system connected many of the largest towns in the Ottoman Empire, but it was less extensive than the rail networks in the European countries.

THE TELEGRAPH

Coordination of the massacres during the reign of Abdul-Hamid II, and of the deportations under the Young Turks, was made possible by the telegraph. Of all the instruments of state government, the telegraph dramatically increased the power of key decision-makers over the rest of the population. The telegraph system allowed for the kind of centralization that heretofore was impossible.

During the 1895 massacres, the telegraph in the Ottoman Empire was a government service. It was managed by a separate ministry. Therefore, all the communicating during the massacres was done by the Ottoman government (Walker 1980, 156-173). During the genocide of 1915, the telegraph was controlled by the Minister of Interior, Talat, who was in charge of the government agencies that implemented the genocide. Talat began his government career as a telegrapher, and he had a telegraph machine installed in his office so that he could personally send messages across the Ottoman Empire. This gave Talat immediate connection, literally and technologically, with the enforcement of mass death. His ability to use the telegraph gave him unsurpassed access to subordinates and allowed him to circumvent other government officials and agencies in Istanbul. For the most part a telegram from Talat was sufficient authorization to proceed with the decimation of the Armenians (Dadrian 1986, 326-328).

Modern states rely on their bureaucracies in order to handle the paperwork involved in carrying out a policy affecting vast portions of their population. The same applies to the policy of genocide. The more modernized the state, the greater the mountain of paper generated. If not destroyed, a monumental record is left behind. In the case of the Armenians, it might be said that their genocide was carried out not so much bureaucratically as much as telegraphically, thus minimizing the record keeping and leaving behind a great deal of confusion about the degree of individual responsibility.

THE TRAINS

To expedite the transfer of Armenians living in proximity of the railways, orders were issued instructing regional authorities to transport Armenian deportees by train. Instructions were explicit to the point of ordering the Armenians to be packed to the maximum capacity in the cattle cars which were used for their transport (Sonyel 1978, 8). The determination of the government to complete this task is demonstrated by the deportation of the Armenians in European Turkey who were ferried across the Sea of Marmara to Anatolia and then placed on trains for transport to Syria.

The removal of Armenians from Anatolia and historic Armenia was carried out mostly through forced caravan marches or by the use of trains. Although a large portion of the Armenians survived the horrific conditions of the packed cattle cars, they were not able to endure the Syrian desert where they were to die of hunger and thirst. In contrast, the majority of Armenians in the caravans never reached the killing centers in the Syrian desert; many were murdered by raiding groups of bandits or died from exposure to the scorching days and cold nights. Most of those who were able to endure the "death marches" could not survive the starvation, exhaustion, or the epidemics that spread death in the concentration camps of the Syrian desert.

LEGACY OF THE ARMENIAN GENOCIDE

All too often the discussion of genocide centers on the numbers killed and fails to consider the wider implications of uprooting entire populations. Genocides are cataclysmic for those who survive because they carry the memory of suffering and the realization of the unmitigated disaster of genocide. Genocides often produce results and create conditions that make it impossible to recover anything tangible from the society that was destroyed, let alone permit the subsequent repair of that society. From this standpoint, it can be argued that the ultimate objective of genocide is a permanent alteration of the course of a people's history.

LOSING A HERITAGE

In a single year, 1915, the Armenians were robbed of their 3,000-year-old heritage. The desecration of churches, the burning of libraries, the ruination of towns and villages—all erased an ancient civilization. With the disappearance of the Armenians from their homeland, most of the symbols of their culture—schools, monasteries, artistic monuments, historical sites—were destroyed by the Ottoman government. The Armenians saved only that which formed part of their collective memory. Their language, their songs, their poetry, and now their tragic destiny remained as part of their culture.

THE SCATTERING OF A PEOPLE

Beyond the terrible loss of life (1,500,000), and the severing of the connection between the Armenian people and their historic homeland, the Armenian genocide also resulted in the dispersion of the survivors. Disallowed from resettling in their former homes, as well as stateless and penniless, Armenians moved to any country that afforded refuge. Within a matter of a few decades Armenians were dispersed to every continent on the globe. The largest Armenian community is now found in the United States.

By the expulsion of the Armenians from those areas of the Ottoman Empire that eventually came to constitute the modern state of Turkey, the reconfiguration of Armenia took a paradoxical course. Whereas the genocide resulted in the death of Armenian society in the former Ottoman Empire, the flight of many Armenians across the border into Russian territory resulted in compressing part of the surviving Armenian population into the smaller section of historic Armenia ruled by the Russians. Out of that region was created the present country of Armenia, the smallest of the republics of the USSR.

The contrast on the two sides of that frontier spotlights the chilling record of genocide. Three and a half million Armenians live in Soviet Armenia. Not an Armenian can be found on the Turkish side of the border.

THE ABSENCE OF JUSTICE AND PROTECTION IN THE POSTWAR PERIOD

During the genocide, the leaders of the world were preoccupied with World War I. Some Armenians were rescued, some leaders decry what was happening, but the overall response was too little too late.

After the war, ample documentation of the genocide was made available and became the source of debate during postwar negotiations by the Allied Powers (Harbord 1920; Blair 1989). It was during these negotiations for a peace treaty that the Western leaders had an opportunity to develop humanitarian policies and strategies that could have protected the Armenians from further persecution. Instead of creating conditions for the prevention of additional massacres, the Allies retreated to positions that only validated the success of ideological racialism. The failure at this juncture was catastrophic. Its consequences persist to this day.

With the defeat of their most important ally, Germany, the Ottomans signed an armistice, ending their fight with the Allies. The Committee of Union and Progress resigned from the government and in an effort to evade all culpability soon disbanded as a political organization. Although many of the Young Turk leaders, including Talat, had fled the country, the new Ottoman government in Istanbul tried them in absentia for organizing and carrying out the deportations and massacres. A verdict of guilty was handed down for virtually all of them, but the sentencing could not be carried out.

The Istanbul government was weak and was compromised by the fact that the capital was under Allied occupation. Soon it lost the competence to govern the provinces, and finally capitulated in 1922 to the forces of the Nationalist Turks who had formed a separate government based in Ankara. As for the sentences of the court against the Young Turk leaders, they were annulled. The criminals went free (Dadrian 1989, 278-317).

The postwar Ottoman government's policies toward the Armenians were largely benign. They desisted from further direct victimization, but rendered no assistance to the surviving Armenians to ease recovery from the consequences of their dislocation. Many Armenians returned to their former homes only to find them stripped of all furnishings, wrecked, or inhabited by new occupants.

Their return also created resentment and new tensions between the Armenians, filled with anger at their mistreatment, and the Turks, who, because of their own great losses during the war, believed they had a right to keep the former properties of the Armenians. In the absence of the Ottoman government's intervention to assist the Armenians, this new hostility contributed to increasing popular support for the Nationalist movement.

RISE OF THE TURKISH NATIONALISTS

The armistice signed between the Allies and the Ottomans did not result in the surrender of Turkish arms. On the contrary, it only encouraged the drive for Turkish independence from Allied interference. Organized in 1919 under the leadership of an army officer, named Mustafa Kemal, the Turkish Nationalist movement rejected the authority of the central government in Istanbul and sought to create an exclusively Turkish nation-state.

As the Kemalist armies brought more and more territory under their control, they also began to drive out the surviving remnants of the Armenian population. The Nationalist Turks did not resort to deportation as much as to measures designed to precipitate flight. In a number of towns with large concentrations of Armenian refugees, massacres again took a toll in the thousands. With the spread of news that the Nationalist forces were resorting to massacre, Armenians selected two courses of action. In a few places some decided to resist, only to be annihilated. Most chose to abandon their homes once again, and this time for good.

The massacres staged by the Nationalist forces so soon after the genocide underscored the extreme vulnerability of the Armenians. Allied troops stationed in the Middle East did not attempt to save lives. Even if the Turkish Nationalist forces could not have been stopped militarily, the failure to intervene signified the abandonment of the Armenians by the rest of the world.

SILENCE AND DENIAL

For the Allies, their failure to protect the Armenians had been a major embarrassment, one worth forgetting. For the Turks, their secure resumption of sovereignty over Anatolia precluded any responsibility toward the Armenians in the form of reparations. All the preconditions were created for the cover-up of the Armenian genocide. The readiness of people on the whole to believe the position of legitimate governments meant that the suggestion that a genocide had occurred in the far reaches of Asia Minor would be made the object of historical revisionism and, soon enough, complete denial.

For almost fifty years, the Armenians virtually vanished from the consciousness of the world. Russian Armenia was Sovietized and made inaccessible. Diaspora Armenians were resigned to their fate. The silence of the world and the denials of the Turkish government only added to their ordeals.

The insecurities of life in Diaspora further undermined the confidence of Armenians in their ability to hang on to some form of national existence. Constant dispersion, the threat of complete assimilation, and the humiliation of such total defeat and degradation contributed to their insecurities.

The abuse of their memory by denial was probably the most agonizing of their many tribulations. Memory, after all, was the last stronghold of the Armenian identity. The violation of this "sacred memory," as all survivors of genocidal devastation come to enshrine the experience of traumatic death, has reverberated through Armenian society (Smith 1989; Gurojan 1988).

The persecution and later the abandonment of the Armenians left deep psychological scars among the survivors and their families. Sixty years after the genocide, a rage still simmered in the Armenian communities. Unexpectedly it exploded in a wave of terrorism. Clandestine Armenian groups, formed in the mid-1970s, sustained a campaign of political assassination for a period of about ten years. They were responsible for killing at least two dozen Turkish diplomats.

Citing the Armenian genocide and Turkey's refusal to admit guilt as their justification, the terrorists were momentarily successful in obtaining publicity for their cause. They were unsuccessful in gaining broad-based support among Armenians or in wrenching any sort of admission from Turkey. Rather, the government of Turkey only increased the vehemence of its denial policy and embarked on a long-range plan to print and distribute a stream of publications questioning or disputing the occurrence of a genocide and distorting much of Armenian history (Falk 1988, 1-10).

SEEKING INTERNATIONAL UNDERSTANDING FOR THE ARMENIAN CAUSE

During these years of great turmoil other Armenians sought a more reasonable course for obtaining international understanding of their cause for remembrance. In the United States, commemorative resolutions were introduced in the House of Representatives, and in the Senate as recently as February 1990. These resolutions hoped to obtain formal U.S. acknowledgment of the Armenian genocide. But, the intervening decades had seen a close alliance develop between the United States and Turkey. The State Department opposed passage of these resolutions. The Turkish government imposed sanctions on U.S. businesses and military installations in Turkey. In the final analysis the resolutions failed to muster the votes necessary for adoption.

Terrence Des Pres observed: "When modern states make way for geopolitical power plays, they are not above removing everything—nations, cultures, homelands—in their path. Great powers regularly demolish other peoples' claims to dignity and place, and sometimes, as we know, the outcome is genocide" (1986, 10-11). These words are important in establishing the context in which peoples, Armenians and others, seek congressional resolutions, and perform other commemorative acts. It is part of the continuing struggle to reclaim dignity. The reluctance of governments to recognize past crimes points to the basic lack of motivation in the international community to confront the consequences of genocide.

CONCLUSION

It is helpful to distinguish between the attitudes and policies of the Ottoman imperial government, the Young Turks, and the Nationalist movement. The Ottoman government, based on the principle of sectarian inequality, tapped into the forces of class antagonism and promoted the superiority of the dominant group over a disaffected minority. It made rudimentary use of technology in the implementation of its more lethal policies.

The Young Turks, based on protototalitarian principles and subscribing to expansionism and chauvinism, justified their policies on ideological grounds. They marshaled the organizational and technological resources of the state to inflict death and trauma with sudden impact. When the Young Turks deported the Armenians from Anatolia and Armenia to Syria, the result was more than simply transferring part of the population from one area of the Ottoman Empire to another. The policy of exclusion placed Armenians outside the protection of the law. Yet, strangely, because they were still technically in the Ottoman Empire, there was the possibility of repatriation for the survivors given a change in government.

The Nationalists tapped the popular forces of Turkish society to fill the vacuum of power after World War I. Their policy vis-à-vis the Armenians was formulated on the basis of racial exclusivity. They made the decision that even the remaining Armenians were undesirable. Many unsuspecting Armenians returned home at the conclusion of the war in 1918. They had nowhere else to go. With the expulsion from Nationalist Turkey, an impenetrable political boundary finally descended between the Armenians and their former homes. The possibility of return was canceled.

Genocide contains the portents of the kind of destruction that can erase past and present. For the Armenian population of the former Ottoman Empire, it meant the loss of homeland and heritage, and a dispersion to the four corners of the earth. It also meant bearing the stigma of statelessness.

At a time when global issues dominate the political agenda of most nations, the Armenian genocide underlines the grave risks of overlooking the problems of small peoples. We cannot ignore the cumulative effect of allowing state after state to resort to the brutal resolution of disagreements with their ethnic minorities. That the world chose to forget the Armenian genocide is also evidence of a serious defect in the system of nation-states which needs to be rectified.

GENOCIDE AGAINST ARMENIANS BY THE OTTOMAN EMPIRE

(A First-Person Account)

(Excerpted from an account by Dirouhi Highgas in an interview conducted by William S. Parsons and Intersection Associates for a videotape production, Everyone's Not Here: Families of the Armenian Genocide. Cambridge: Intersection Associates, 1989.)

(Dirouhi Highgas was born in Konia, Turkey, in 1905, where she and her family were uprooted from their home and deported by the Turkish government in 1915. They were forced to march with other Armenian families to the outskirts of Tarsus. After months of starvation, beatings, and killings, Dirouhi's caravan arrived at a large concentration camp called Gatmanear Aleppo. From here she was forced into a train of cattle cars and sent to the killing center of Deir-el-Zor in the Syrian Desert. Dirouhi escaped death and today lives in Massachusetts. She has written an account of her experiences during the genocide entitled Refugee Girl (Watertown, Mass.: Baiker Publications, 1985, cost $19.95).

People in the villages watched us go by * * * they were watching us. I'll never forget how they were watching us. I felt so ashamed that one day I cried and I told my mother, "Everybody's watching us and we're just poor refugee people. We're not like we were when we lived in Konia. We're different now, aren't we?" She [mother] said, "No we're not different. You know what a diamond is, Dirouhi? Sometimes you put the diamond in the mud. But when you take it out, it's a diamond. Nothing will happen to it. So that's what it's going to be like for you and all the rest of the Armenians. They think we're just mud, but we're not!"

It was wonderful [having my mother say this]. She was just trying to make me feel better because I was so full of shame. We looked shabby, you know; I was beginning to look terrible. * * * We weren't sleeping; we weren't eating anything! So we travelled for another two days this way.

Then one day when we started early in the morning, there was no water in sight—no water in sight—and everyone was just dying for water. * * * Then we heard someone hollering in the front of the caravan, "Water! Water!" And I remember [I looked up] and I could see a lake. The gendarmes told us to stop the caravan so we could all go ahead to the water. But oxen have a very bad habit. When they see water you can't stop them and when the oxen saw the water they just ran straight into it taking the cart and all of us with them. And they just layed down and drank. The oxen destroyed a lot of the wagons.

We stayed there that night on the outskirts of a town, but in the morning it was just terrible. Everybody was sick. Nobody could stand up. It was the water we drank. I remember my mother was so sick, my grandmother, my grandfather. * * * Everyone had pains and dysentery. * * * I remember thinking about all the shame and how everything was erased from our world. * * * What happened * * *

I'll never forget that day. There were so many sick people and my grandfather thought we should get a few people and talk the gendarmes into letting us stay here a few days, at least just to see who's going to die and who's going to live. There was no way anyone could get up on their wagons. Everybody was very sick. The gendarmes said, "We'll stay tonight, but we're going to leave very early in the morning."

The next thing we saw the gendarmes taking my uncle to throw him in where all the dead people were. There were hundreds of people who died that day from dysentery. So my mother said, "Oh they're taking Stepan! There taking Stepan! They think he's dead; he's very sick!" My mother begged the gendarmes to please leave him here. "Just give him two hours" [she said] "and then you can take him any place you want." So we sat there and he got better little by little. * * * Everybody was getting a little better from the sickness. We [began to realize] that we're not going to die—whatever left of us there was. * * * There was no medicine. The gendarmes didn't care whether you lived or died. They didn't care.

It was a terrible thing to go through. * * * Everybody was sick and so many died. We left so many behind. I remember when the next day the caravan started to go, and I looked back and saw so many people lying there dead.

Mr. Speaker, at this time I yield to my distinguished colleague, a good friend of the Armenian people and nation, the gentleman from California [Mr. MOORHEAD].

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank and commend my colleague from California [Mr. LEHMAN] for arranging today's special order commemorating the 77th anniversary of the Armenian genocide.

Between 1915 and 1923, the Turkish Ottoman Empire massacred 1½ million Armenian men, women, and children. No one even attempted to bury the dead. More than one-half million Armenians were exiled from the homeland occupied by their ancestors for over 3,000 years. A race of people was nearly eliminated, yet the modern Turkish Government still makes a concerted effort to deny the existence of the genocide.

Cruelty, murder, and displacement exemplify man's terrible, terrible inhumanity to man. We commemorate this date so as not to forget the suffering and pain endured by the Armenian world community. History must not forget the systematic uprooting of Armenians from their homeland, eliminated through massacre or exile.

A strong, resilient people, the Armenians survived these cruelties as they have survived persecution for centuries. Their durability comes from their love of and intense faith in God, dating back to the fourth century when Armenia became the first nation to embrace Christianity.

The brutality against Armenians continues today. Azerbaijan has conducted a systematic 4-year program of massacres, blockades, bombings, and deportations against Armenians. We live in a humane and civilized world and cannot continue to allow another reign of terror against these people. The Azerbaijan leadership, much like the Ottoman Empire in the early part of this century, seeks to advance its political interests by eliminating the historic Armenian population of the Republic of Nagorno-Karabagh.

As a free and democratic nation, the United States must continue to acknowledge and denounce the events surrounding this tragedy of 1915 as vigorously as we deplore the modern acts of terrorism that we continue to witness in Azerbaijan.

Today, Armenians flourish as prominent and successful citizens of our great Nation, in spite of the crimes committed against them. I know how important this tribute is to them and to the memories of those who lost their lives in the slaughter. Again, I thank my colleague from California and commend him for his dedicated efforts to call attention to this historic and tragic event, one of the worst genocides of our century. The martyrdom of these people must never be forgotten and today's commemoration should serve as a warning signal that our Nation will not tolerate these atrocities in the future.

Mr. LEHMAN of California. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from California [Mr. MOORHEAD], my colleague, and I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. DREIER], my other colleague.

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from California [Mr. LEHMAN] for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, I would simply like to underscore the fact that, as we mark the 77th anniversary of the horrendous Armenian genocide, the move toward freedom and the vote which has taken place which finally brought about the independence which the people of Armenia have been seeking for such a long period of time was a great one, and, as my friend from Glendale, CA [Mr. MOORHEAD] has just said, there are obviously very serious conflicts which continue today. But in that quest for full freedom I know that we will finally bring about a resolution to what has been a very pressing and challenging problem for the people of Armenia and the people in this country of Armenian descent, and I thank my friend for yielding.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Today we commemorate one of the great evils of the modern era and pray that such an evil does not once again befall the Armenian people.

It was 77 years ago that the Ottoman Turks decided to solve what they considered their Armenian problem. The Turkish solution became what is now generally recognized to be one of the most brutal and ruthless massacres in the history of the world.

Because the massacre occurred more than three-quarters of a century ago, some might ask why we still dwell on it today.

There are three reasons. The first is that the mass murders of the 20th century had their origin in the Armenian genocide. The Nazi Holocaust, the forced starvation and ruthless elimination of millions of Russians, and the mass killings of the bloodthirsty Pol Pot of Cambodia—all of them had their seeds in Anatolia.

The second reason is that the Turkish Government still refuses to admit that thousands of innocent Armenians were cut down by Turkish soldiers. This is the Turkish Government that professes to model itself on Western standards of human rights and human decency.

Germany has long ago admitted its role in the Holocaust. It has accepted its responsibility. It has apologized, and it has regained the world's respect for doing so.

But the Turks continue to hold out the hope that the stain of their guilt will be washed away with the passage of time. It will not, and we will not let it.

The third reason we commemorate an event of so long ago is the threat that such an evil might once again be perpetrated, this time in Nagorno-Karabakh. Armenians who live in that troubled area certainly remember the lessons of Anatolia. They know that only a thin fabric of civility protects them from the fate that befell their ancestors.

Armenians all over the world see that fabric beginning to unravel, and they are worried. And we should be worried too.

It is a good and important thing to commemorate the lives lost and the lessons learned in the great Armenian massacre. It is the best way to ensure it will never happen again.

Mr. GREEN of New York. Mr. Speaker, I am honored to join my colleagues in solemnly observing today as "National Day of Remembrance of the Armenian Genocide of 1915-1923."

The pattern of persecution of Armenians at the hands of the Ottoman Empire began in the late 19th century. Between 1894 and 1896, 300,000 Armenians were massacred during the reign of the Ottoman Sultan Abdul Hamid II. In 1909, 21,000 Armenians were massacred in Cilicia. The horror for the Armenian community escalated thereafter. On April 14, 1915, hundreds of Armenian intellectual, political, and religious leaders were gathered up and brutally murdered. In the months that followed, the genocide of the Armenians living in the Ottoman Empire was put into full execution. Between 1915 and 1923, 1.5 million Armenians perished, and over 500,000 were exiled. Today of the more than 2,500,000 Armenians living in the Ottoman Empire before World War I, fewer than 100,000 Armenians remain in Turkey.

As one of the House members of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Council, I have long been a vocal proponent of the need to commemorate the 1.5 million Armenians who lost their lives in this horrific genocide. The proof and magnitude of the Armenian tragedy was established at the time by the records of this Congress and by our own Ambassador to the Ottoman Empire in 1915, Henry Morgenthau, who served as the United States Ambassador from 1913 to 1916. Henry Morgenthau stated:

I am confident that the whole history of the human race contains no such horrible episode as this. The great massacres and persecutions of the past seem almost insignificant when compared to the sufferings of the Armenian race in 1915.

We observe this day of remembrance so that the truth survives the eyewitnesses. It was Hitler who cynically asked in 1939, "Who today remembers the Armenian exterminations?"

Fifty years later, it must be we who remember. To do otherwise brings shame to our great democracy. We must remember that many of the Armenian-Americans we represent are themselves survivors of the horrible massacres. Many others are the children of those who witnessed the atrocity.

Today we must pause and pay tribute to the memory of those Armenians who senselessly lost their lives in 1915.

Mr. TORRES. Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend my good friend and colleague from California, Mr. LEHMAN, for organizing this important special order, where we have the opportunity to remind this country of the tragic price paid by the Armenian community for its long pursuit of life, liberty, and freedom.

Today, I rise to recall and remember one of the most tragic events in history.

From 1915 to 1923, a 9-year period, approximately 1½ million Armenian men, women, and children were brutally murdered by agents of the Turkish Ottoman Empire. In May, 1915, the Young Turks issued a general order to kill or deport to the southern lowlands and to the Caucasus the entire Armenian population of Asia Minor. Soldiers were to carry out the mission. Instructions required Turkish officials to confine their consciences or lose their jobs. The overall administration of the Young Turk's general order was analogous to the Nazi action against the Jewish people a generation later.

Able-bodied and professional men were asked to serve on road gangs, once marched out of the cities they were attacked and murdered by soldiers and nomads. The remaining men, women, and children were herded together and sent, without property or adequate provisions, across Anatolian mountains and plains. Along these routes, Armenian women were abused or seized as wives. Robbery and torture was common along the routes. At Trabzon, the executioners used another method; they transported about ten thousand Armenians on ships out into the Black Sea and forced them overboard to their deaths.

This deliberate act to kill, or deport, all Armenians from Asia Minor took its place in history with other acts of genocide such as Stalin's destruction of the Kulaks, Hitler's calculated wrath on the Jews, and Pol Pot's attempt to purge incorrect political thought from Cambodia by killing all of his people over the age of 15.

Today, we commemorate the 77th anniversary of the Armenian genocide, and tell the stories of this blot against human civility so that we will not sink into ignorance of our capacities to taint human progress with acts of mass murder.

We do not have the ability to go back and correct acts of a previous time, or to right the wrongs of the past. If we had this capacity, perhaps we could prevent the murders of millions of men, women, and children.

However, we can do everything in our power to prevent such atrocities from occurring again. To do this, we must educate people about these horrible incidents, comfort the survivors, and keep alive the memories of those who died.

In closing, I encourage everyone to use this moment to think about the unnecessary loss of precious human lives that resulted from these massacres. We must recommit ourselves to the spirit of human understanding, patience, and love. For these alone are the tools for overcoming our tragic human weakness for attempting to resolve our problems with acts of violence.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commemorate the 77th anniversary of the first genocide of the 20th century, the Armenian genocide of 1915.

Persecution of Armenians living in the Ottoman Empire began toward the end of the 19th century and increased through the beginning of the 20th century. On April 24, 1915—the date that symbolizes for Armenians the beginning of the Armenian Genocide—over 200 religious, political, and intellectual leaders of the Armenian community were arrested, exiled, and murdered. Armenian representation in Turkey was eliminated. In a single night, the voice of the Armenian nation in Turkey was silenced.

From that infamous date until 1923, 1.5 million Armenians died from the Ottoman Empire's attempts to eliminate the Armenian people. As a result of this increased persecution, Armenian citizens were either massacred outright, or they were deported and subjected to various atrocities, including rape, torture, and mutilation.

According to Henry Morgenthau, Sr., the United States Ambassador to Turkey at that time:

When the Turkish authorities gave the orders for these deportations, they were merely giving the death warrant to a whole race; they understood this well, and, in their conversations with me, they made no particular attempt to conceal the fact.

Most of those deported died of starvation, disease or exposure.

Even the half-million Armenians who were fortunate enough to have escaped were brutally evicted from the country that they had called home for more than 3,000 years. They were still victims of the Ottoman Empire's deliberate attempt to systematically exterminate the Armenian people. Ambassador Morgenthau called the Armenian Genocide "the most thoroughly organized and effective massacre this country has ever seen."

As a long-term friend of the Armenian-American community, I am proud to have the opportunity to participate in this special order commemorating the Armenian genocide. Mr. Speaker, it is important that we honor its victims and its survivors, and pay our respects to their families. But we must also remember this horrible example of man's inhumanity towards his fellow man, so that we can renew both our responsibility and our pledge to prevent the repetition of similar atrocities against any other people anywhere in the world.

Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commemorate the 77th anniversary of the terrible slaughter of Armenian civilians in 1915.

The Armenian people have suffered greatly through three decades of persecutions that included both mass deportations and massacres on a wide scale. Massacres in 1896, 1909, and 1915 tested the strength of the Armenian community. A decade of forced relocations shattered the lives of many and stressed spirits to the limit.

This year, as we remember the past sufferings of the Armenian people, it is a commemoration marked by the historic emergence of a new, independent Armenia from the ashes of the former Soviet Union.

Now, more than ever, we cannot forget the brutalities endured by the Armenian people. In the volatile nationalism emerging in the republics of the former Soviet Union, the tragic legacy of the Armenians must serve as a warning of the dangers of ethnic hatred to all those caught in the struggle of establishing new nations. We must draw a lesson from the atrocities of the past if we are to avoid a repetition of these atrocities in the future.

Sadly, in the wake of the collapse of the Soviet Union, ethnic tensions have evolved into a number of violent conflicts.

Continuing ethnic violence in Nagorno-Karabakh, between Armenians and Azeris, has already caused thousands of civilian casualties across ethnic lines. The acquisition of powerful weapons through raids on former Soviet stockpiles have increased the level of violence and, tragically, the people of the region remain without running water, electricity, or telephone service.

Most distressingly, the fighting between the two sides appears to be increasing and, so far, attempts to mediate the conflict have failed to stop the killing. As we commemorate past atrocities, we must remember that the people of Armenia and its neighbors are still dying because of ethnic hatred.

The lesson that we learn as we remember the past slaughter of Armenians is that the underlying hatreds that cause these kinds of atrocities have not abated. These hatreds continue to lead to the deaths of innocent civilians caught in ethnic strife in the former Soviet Union and around the world.

Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues to join me in remembering the tragedies visited on the Armenian people and pledge anew our commitment to working for an end to ethnic and racial hatred and violence wherever it may occur.

Mrs. MORELLA. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to join with my colleagues in commemorating the 77th anniversary of the Armenian genocide. Remembrances like these are important because they help to prevent the occurrence of similar tragedies in the future, and I want to thank my colleague, the gentleman from California, for calling this special order today.

The Ottoman Empire's effort to eliminate its Armenian population, coupled with the world's indifference to that crime, set an example that has been emulated many times in the following decades. Around the world today, governments commit atrocities against their own citizens, yet escape the consequences of their crimes for reasons of political expediency. Even when the evidence is clear and compelling, as it is in the case of the Armenian genocide, there are still those who would sacrifice the truth for political gain.

If we are ever to witness a universal respect for human rights, we must begin by acknowledging the truth. On human rights issues ranging from the detention and torture of political prisoners to the Armenian genocide to the genocide of the Kurds by Saddam Hussein's henchmen, we must speak unambiguously. There is no place in the family of nations for governments that commit atrocities against their own citizens.

Both individuals and nations, if they are to realize their potential, must be able to make their own decisions. The Armenian people, after centuries of oppressive Ottoman rule culminating in the 1915–23 genocide, followed by 70 years of Stalinist domination, have finally realized their dream of shaping their own destiny. Unfortunately, the Armenians of Karabagh have yet to achieve this dream; we in Congress must continue our work toward a peaceful and just resolution of the situation in Karabagh.

Mr. Speaker, the lesson of the Armenian genocide is clear. To prevent such crimes against humanity in the future, we must act now by fostering respect for the truth, countering efforts to deny human rights violations in the interest of expediency, and speaking out against all instances of man's inhumanity to man.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize the 77th anniversary of the Armenian genocide.

On a tragic night, April 24, 1915, over 200 intellectual, religious, and political leaders of the Armenian community in Istanbul were arrested, exiled from the capital city, and executed. As a result, that day symbolizes the beginning of the Armenian genocide, a tragic event that resulted in the final deaths of over a million and a half Armenians.

Traditionally, the United States Congress has held a remembrance for the victims of the Armenian genocide every April. It is important that we, as a Nation, voice our commitment to remembering this tragic crime against humanity.

Many Armenian residents in southwestern Illinois have contacted me to convey the anguish that they still experience in a vivid way 77 years later.

It is important that the United States Congress not forget this unlawful act, one act of many unfortunate crimes against mankind in this century.

Let this day stand as a reminder that the United States must stand firm in its resolve to oppose violence and repression as tools of government. We, as a Nation, must continue our efforts to uphold human rights and recognize tyranny, now, and forever.

Mr. ECKART. Mr. Speaker, today marks the anniversary of one of the darkest episodes in our world's history: the persecution and systematic destruction of the Armenian people by the Ottoman Empire from 1915 through 1923. During those 8 horrible years, the Armenian community within the Ottoman Empire was virtually eliminated. It is estimated that 1½ million Armenians were killed and another 500,000 were exiled. Families were torn from their homes and whole villages were uprooted as their Ottoman rulers forced the Armenians into slavery or marched them through the desert for weeks without respite. They faced countless atrocities from their tormentors, and few were able to avoid death by starvation, disease, or murder.

It is nothing short of miraculous that the Armenian people were able to survive this deplorable episode. They should be praised for their courage and determination in the face of such a horrendous struggle. I salute them.

Although it is painful to recollect such a terrible historical occurrence, it is very important that we do remember and think on it, so that we may never face such a catastrophe again. We must learn from the lessons of history, not deny them. Please remember the Armenian genocide.

Mr. VISCLOSKEY. Mr. Speaker, today, I join my colleagues to reflect upon and commemorate the 77th anniversary of the Armenian genocide. On April 24, 1915, over 200 religious, political, and intellectual leaders of the Armenian community in Istanbul were executed. Indeed, between 1915 and 1923, over half of the world's Armenian population—an estimated 1.5 million men, women, and children—were killed. While this anniversary may evoke painful memories, it would be worse if we did not remember these terrible atrocities perpetrated against the Armenian people so that such an event is never repeated.

The Armenians are an ancient and proud people. In the fourth century, they became the first nation to embrace Christianity. In 1915, Christian Russia invaded the Moslem Ottoman Empire, which was allied with Germany in World War I. Amid fighting in the Ottoman Empire's eastern Anatolian provinces, the historic heartland of the Christian Armenians, Ottoman authorities ordered the deportation of all Armenians in the region. By the end of 1923, virtually the entire Armenian population of Anatolia and western Armenia had been either killed or deported.

Today, it is important to remember this horrible fact of history to comfort the survivors, as well as remain vigilant to prevent future calamities. Only a fraction of the Armenian population escaped this calculated attempt to destroy them and their culture. Approximately 500,000 Armenian refugees fled north across the Russian border, south into Arab countries, or to Europe and the United States. Currently, it is estimated that fewer than 100,000 declared Armenians remain in present day Turkey.

I am proud to say that a strong and vibrant Armenian-American community is flourishing in northwest Indiana. In fact, my predecessor in the House of Representatives, the late Adam Benjamin, was of Armenian heritage.

The Armenian genocide is a well documented fact. The United States National Archives contain numerous reports detailing the process by which the Armenian population of the Ottoman Empire was systematically decimated. However, there is an unsettling tendency among both individuals and governments to forget or blot out past atrocities.

Less than 20 years after the Armenian genocide, Adolf Hitler embarked upon a similar extermination of European Jews. While the Jewish Holocaust is certainly as terrible an event as the Armenian genocide, at least the Jews have had the catharsis of the world's recognition of what happened to their people. In search of acknowledgement of what happened to their families and ancestors between 1915 and 1923, regrettably, Armenians too often hear that their claims of genocide are lies or exaggerations.

Unfortunately, there are still efforts to deny the existence of the Armenian genocide. Responding to political pressure, in January 1991, the National Park Service removed a photograph depicting the victims of the Armenian genocide from the Ellis Island Centennial Photo Exhibit in New York. The captioned photograph had been previously vandalized, but was removed following an intensive political campaign targeted at Ellis Island officials.

I am pleased to report that after representatives of the Armenian National Committee contacted Ellis Island authorities to protest the removal of the exhibit, the item in dispute was replaced with an authenticated photograph depicting the victims of the Armenian genocide. Indeed, the inclusion of this exhibit at Ellis Island helps to explain why so many Armenians fled their homeland to settle here in the United States.

In closing, I would like to commend my colleague from California, Mr. LEHMAN, for organizing this special order to commemorate the 77th anniversary of the Armenian genocide. It is my sincere hope that this remembrance will not only console the survivors and their families, but may also serve to avert future atrocities.

Mr. KYL. Mr. Speaker, today I rise to commemorate a solemn event in human history, the Armenian genocide of 1915–23. This was a period of time during which millions of Armenians were systematically uprooted from their homeland of 3,000 years and massacred by the Ottomans.

An Armenian friend provided me a copy of Viscount Bryce's book "The Treatment of the Armenians in the Ottoman Empire 1915–1916." Where possible, the author compiled first hand accounts of the treatment of Armenians during 1915. Based on the collection of evidence before him, Bryce concluded that recollections described— what seemed to be an effort to exterminate a whole nation, without distinction of age or sex, whose misfortune it was to be the subjects of a Government devoid of scrupples and of pity, and the policy they disclosed was without precedent. ***

The U.S. Ambassador to Turkey, Henry Morgenthau agreed. In 1918 Morgenthau recalled:

I am confident that the whole history of the human race contains no such horrible episode as this. The great massacres and persecutions of the past seem almost insignificant when compared to the sufferings of the Armenian race in 1915.

Unfortunately, the world went on to experience an even greater massacre—the Holocaust of 6 million Jews during World War II.

In our modern age, we all believe that something like the Armenian genocide and persecution of a minority could never happen again. This commemoration should serve to reinforce American commitment to ensure the freedom and rights of minorities throughout the world; be it the Kurds, the Croats, the peoples of the Baltics and Eastern Europe or the minorities in our own country.

Mr. KLECZKA. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to join Armenian-Americans and Armenians around the world in commemorating the 77th anniversary of the Armenian genocide. The world must never forget the arrest, exile, and execution of over 200 Armenians by the Ottoman Empire on April 24, 1915.

That tragic evening was only the beginning of the Armenian genocide which would last 9 years. In one fell swoop, an entire generation of Armenian religious, political, and intellectual leaders was destroyed.

From 1915–23, the Ottoman Empire murdered 1½ million Armenians and exiled 500,000 more. By the end of 1923, the entire Armenian population of the Turkish provinces of Anatolia and western Armenia had been either killed or deported. Today, we remember those who perished and extend our support to their grieving families.

Just as we commemorate the triumphs of world history, we should also remember and learn from its tragedies and its failings. Our energies should now turn to helping the newly independent nation of Armenia develop onto a rich and democratic member of the international community.

We can start by working within international bodies like the United Nations and the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe [CSCE] to broker a lasting cessation of hostilities in Nagorno-Karabakh. We should do everything we can to help the courageous and resilient Armenian people build their fledgling nation free from bloodshed and violence. Clearly, the Armenian future is bright.

Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to commemorate the 77th anniversary of the Armenian genocide, and to offer my best wishes to Armenian-Americans and Armenians around the world.

Mrs. LOWEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I rise to join my colleagues in a special order commemorating the 77th anniversary of the Armenian genocide.

For a great many years, Members of the House of Representatives have raised their voices about this tragic episode of history. We have delivered statements, considered resolutions, and discussed this question in committee hearings. However, despite our words, the Turkish Government continues to deny that the 1915 massacre ever occurred. For that reason, we have a moral imperative to once again speak out. All the world needs to know that we will never forget.

The facts surrounding the Armenian massacres do not change with time. On April 24, 1915, over 200 Armenian intellectual leaders were taken from their homes and executed. Armenian men in the Ottoman Army were disarmed and placed in work battalions from which they were gradually removed and executed. The remaining women and children and the elderly were forced to participate in long marches through the desert with little hope of survival. By 1923, 1.5 million Armenians, over half of the world's Armenian population, had been slaughtered.

By refusing to recognize this international crime, we only encourage those who would commit such atrocities in the future. In Azerbaijan we are seeing a return of the same mentality. The Azerbaijani leadership, much like the Turkish leadership of the First World War, seeks to advance its political interests by eliminating the historic population of the Republic of Nagorno-Karabagh.

As Members of the U.S. House of Representatives, we have a responsibility to speak out against injustice. The Armenian genocide is not a question for debate, it is an undeniable fact of history. Refusing to acknowledge that fact simply compounds one tragedy with another.

We will never forget. And the thousands of Armenian-Americans will also not forget. Until the Turkish Government acknowledges full responsibility for this massive atrocity, we have a duty, an obligation, and a moral responsibility to call attention to the Armenian genocide.

Particularly in times like these, we must be ever vigilant in fighting back against hatred and bigotry. An important component of that fight today is the constant reminder of crimes of prejudice from the past such as the Armenian genocide.

We shall never forget.

Mrs. VUCANOVICH. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak of a hideous time. A time when innocent people were subjected to violence, persecution, and led to their deaths. A time which should be remembered, so that it may never happen again. That time and the event is the Armenian genocide of 1915 to 1923.

On the night of April 24, 1915, the horror began when more than 200 religious, political, and intellectual leaders of the Armenian community in Istanbul were arrested, and later executed. But the horror did not stop there, for the next 8 years the Ottoman Empire continued to exterminate approximately 1.5 million Armenian men, women, and children.

These events were the culmination of 30 years of persecution by the Ottoman Turkish Empire, in which Armenians were systematically uprooted from their homeland of 3,000 years and eliminated through massacres or exile. Prior to the beginning of World War II, over 2.5 million Armenians lived within the Ottoman Empire. Since the Armenian genocide, fewer than 100,000 declared Armenians reside in Turkey.

Mr. Speaker, the United States has stood up to human rights violations throughout the world, and it is fitting that we recognize these actual crimes that occurred. Armenians in the United States today do not seek revenge, but they do ask for a simple acknowledgement of their sufferings, in the hope that such atrocities will never happen again. In recognizing this tragic event, we can help comfort those who were lucky enough to survive, and keep alive the memory of their loved ones who perished.

I appreciate this opportunity to join my colleagues in this memorial for the victims of the Armenian genocide.

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, I solemnly rise today to join my colleagues in marking the 77th anniversary of the Armenian genocide. The tragic events of the years 1915–1923 must be remembered for all time so that the cruelty of this period continues to instill in us, and future generations, a revulsion of such actions. I also want to commend my respected colleague and friend, Mr. RICHARD LEHMAN of California, for organizing this special order. Since I entered the Congress, I have known him to be a tireless fighter for human rights.

While the horrific events leading to the deaths of over one-and-a-half million Armenians occurred over 75 years ago, their impact on the psyche of the Armenian people, and indeed the entire world are still evident. The effects of such atrocities are not easily, if ever, overcome. Many can still testify to the deportations and massacres of families and friends. Other have read or seen pictures of the unspeakable abominations, and all Armenians, young and old, live with the knowledge that their entire people's existence was seriously threatened during the last years of the Ottoman Empire.

Mr. Speaker, it is critical that the world be reminded again and again about the brutal crimes perpetrated against the Armenian people. We must also remember that the lessons of history are not easily put into practice. Despite the world's knowledge of this heinous episode, a holocaust of ghastly dimensions occurred only two decades later. Man's inhumanity has been since evidenced in such places as Cambodia and Iraq. And despite the efforts of many, I am sorry to say that even more acts of mass cruelty are occurring even now.

Mr. Speaker, it is the duty of us all to work to ensure that our generation and future generations never again have to bear witness to such inhuman behavior and feel the pain and suffering of an entire people. The crime of genocide can never again be allowed to mar the history of humankind, and today we stand with our Armenian brothers and sisters, not only to remember and share in their grief for those who died, but to celebrate those who are living and building a new nation in Armenia.

Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, I join my colleagues today in rising to commemorate the 77th anniversary of this century's first genocide—the Armenian genocide.

Many of my Armenian constituents and friends have told me of loved ones taken from them by the genocide. Indeed, many are still tormented by memories of the death marches of 1915. Anyone who has studied or discussed the tragic events that befell the Armenian community 77 years ago—not to mention the preposterous historical revisionism that still exists to this day—can fully understand how important this tribute is to the Armenian community and to the memory of all those who lost their lives in the slaughter. I want to take this opportunity to commend my distinguished colleague from California, Mr. LEHMAN, for arranging this special order.

Each year, this day serves as an expression of our commitment to historical truth and the universal principles of human rights. The line from Armenia to Auschwitz is direct. Undoubtedly, the Holocaust, which took the lives of 6 million Jews and millions of other innocent people, was inspired by the murder of 1½ million Armenians. Those who have studied the Holocaust know that Hitler, during an early meeting to map out the extermination of the Jewish people, was asked whether world opinion would not prevent such a plan from being carried out. Hitler reportedly laughed and said "World opinion! A joke! Who ever cared about the Armenians?"

Mr. Speaker, clearly the U.S. Congress cares about the Armenian genocide. By holding this special order we reaffirm our vow that genocide will not go unacknowledged and unmentioned. This day serves to remind all Americans that we must continue to speak of the genocides of this century. We must resolve to never let our moral outrage—as a Nation and as individuals—diminish. Only by acknowledging this day, year after year after year, can we ensure that genocide remains what it has not always been—an unspeakable sin.

The Armenian people, although scattered all over the Earth, have remarkably kept their culture, language, and religion intact. As the new Republic of Armenia works to establish a free homeland for Armenians worldwide, I am hopeful that the tragic era of repression and violence that the Armenian people have bravely faced throughout the last century is finally coming to an end. On this day of remembrance, I salute the tenacity and spirit of the Armenian people.

Mr. TORRICELLI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak in the memory of the over 1 million Armenians who lost their lives in Turkey during and immediately after World War I.

The Ottoman Empire's killing of Armenians during this epoch has been a scar on humanity. It was the first genocide of the 20th century and many survivors are still alive today. Because their trauma has been largely forgotten, other peoples throughout this century have had to suffer through further incidents of genocide. Hitler was emboldened by the world's failure to condemn and remember the Armenian genocide perpetrated in the last years of the Ottoman Empire. We must never repeat the mistake of silence.

This week marks the 77th anniversary of the Armenian genocide and we must all pause to remember this tragic event. We must demonstrate that Hitler was wrong when he said the world would forget the Armenian genocide. In short, we must show that genocide anywhere will be neither tolerated nor forgotten.

America's devotion to human rights requires us to commemorate past abuses of human rights. It also requires us to highlight and criticize current abuses so that tragedies like the Armenian genocide do not reoccur.

Unfortunately, today a tragedy is unfolding in Nagorno-Karabagh. The government of Azerbaijan is waging a war against ethnic Armenians in the enclave which used to be part of greater Armenia. The Armenians of Nagorno-Karabagh are struggling for political freedom and the right to self-determination. They are fighting to regain the religious and cultural liberties that were denied them when Azerbaijan assumed control of the region nearly 70 years ago.

The people of Armenia have long endured hardship and human suffering and continue to do so today. In commemorating the Armenian genocide, we cannot lose sight of the thousands of Armenians that continue to suffer under Azerbaijani repression. We must put an end to their persecution and resolve the situation in Nagorno-Karabagh.

Mr. MARTINEZ. Mr. Speaker, I join my colleagues today in commemorating the 77th anniversary of the Armenian genocide. On April 24, 1915, the rulers of the Ottoman Empire began the premeditated, systematic extermination of the Armenian people. From 1915 to 1923, the Ottoman government carried out a bloodthirsty campaign to wipe out any vestige of the Armenian people, language and culture. The ruthless marches of forced starvation and endless massacres consumed the lives of 1½ million Armenians.

It is hard to comprehend that man is capable of such a barbarous monstrosity, of such ruthless depravity. But yet this century is littered with the victims of racial hatred and intolerance. The tragic fact that the Armenian genocide was followed by the Holocaust and the Cambodian conflagration stands as a stark testimonial that mankind is capable of the most unspeakable and heinous atrocities.

We all bear some culpability and lose part of our humanity when defenseless men, women, and children can be slaughtered with impunity. The silence and indifference that greeted the Armenian genocide 77 years ago may have made it easier for the likes of Hitler, Stalin, and Pol Pot to destroy the lives of millions upon millions of people.

We observe the horrific events that engulfed the lives of the Armenian people not only to pay homage to these fallen victims but to keep their memory alive in the consciousness of mankind. We remember so not to forget. We stand with history in condemning the first genocide of the 20th century—the first bloody effort to exterminate a people because of their race.

Mr. BONIOR. Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague, the gentleman from California, for holding today's special order to remember this most historic and tragic event. At this time, I'd like to submit remarks I gave to the Greater Detroit Armenian Genocide Commemoration in Dearborn, MI, last week.

REMARKS BY CONGRESSMAN DAVID E. BONIOR
There is an old saying that history is written by the winners.

Certainly Turkey thought it could do that after April 24, 1915, when it began the process that would murder 250,000 Armenians serving in the Ottoman Army * * * then uproot and kill a million and a half more.

For a while it looked like they might succeed. In the 1930s, before exterminating the Jews, Hitler said: "Who remembers the Armenians?"

In those days it seemed like few would. Well, we remember.

Your vigilance guarantees that the genocide will not be swept under the rug.

The members of the Armenian Diaspora, while living thousands of miles from their homeland, have never distanced themselves from this issue.

It is almost as if by scattering, you have brought knowledge to those of us who might not pay attention, insulated by distance and the tendency to ignore events far from home.

That's why I've always been so proud to introduce legislation making sure America continues to mark the Armenian genocide. Because of your work, America remembers April 24, 1915.

There are those who say there was no genocide.

This is a point completely refuted by history—and by the living memory of those who lived through it.

Others say, "Yes, there was a genocide but it was a long time ago. Armenians should let bygones be bygones."

They point to the compelling economic need for Turkey and Armenia to work together—Armenian access to the Black Sea, or Turkish access to Central Asia.

Well, the need exists. I hope there is a thaw. After all, the Soviet Union is dead and with it the restrictions they imposed.

But not everything takes a back seat to trade. Armenia should not be compelled to forget genocide in the interest of getting along.

And just as you have not let America forget, America should not let the world forget.

I want America to lead in the great economic battles of the decades ahead.

And when it comes to human rights and to helping those who want to emulate this 200-year-old experiment in democracy, America must also lead.

After all, the Cold War is over. There is a single superpower in the world.

Us.
To shrink from leadership would be to abdicate at the moment of our greatest triumph.

For that reason, I am convinced America must lead when it comes to Nagorno-Karabagh.

One way of remembering the tragedies of the past, after all, is to make sure that we don't repeat it.

If there is a lesson of the 20th Century surely it is to respect the human rights of people, whether in the Middle East, in Latin America * * * or in Asia.

People all over the world have the right to representative government—and so do the people of Nagorno-Karabagh.

People all over the world have the right to live in peace with their families. And so do the people of Nagorno-Karabagh.

People all over the world have the right to free speech and to due process—and so do the people of Nagorno-Karabagh.

Can they win those rights?
The road ahead isn't easy. Turkey is under domestic pressure to aid Azerbaijan.

What can we do?
First, we must keep trade and economic sanctions on Azerbaijan until the President certifies that the Azerbaijani blockade has lifted.

Second, the United States must urge Turkey to behave itself * * * to stay neutral and to allow U.S. aid to be distributed in Armenia.

We need more international involvement. The Peace Corps is likely to start sending volunteers to Armenia this Fall—a great step.

But we must keep the pressure on.

Last Fall I hosted a luncheon for Lady Caroline Cox and Yelena Bonner who are championing the cause of Nagorno-Karabagh. Watching Dr. Bonner speak I remembered how hopeless her cause had seemed even five years ago.

She persisted. She and her husband marched on unswervingly, through intimidation and isolation and repression.

Her cause won.
So it will be with us.

And the reason?

One reason is simply the fact of today's ceremony.

There is a story about an ancient wise man who could answer any riddle of life.

One day a young boy decided to play a trick on the old man.

"I will capture a bird," he said to his friends, "hold it cupped in my hands, then ask whether it is dead or alive. If he says 'Dead' I'll let the bird fly away. If he says 'alive' I'll crush it before opening my hands."

Holding the bird, the boy went to the old man and asked: "Is the bird I have dead or alive?"

The old man replied, "The answer * * * is in your hands."

It is very easy to believe the riddles of a better society can't be solved. It's easy to say "I'm not involved."

You have rejected that course.

Instead, you have taken matters into your own hands.

We are commemorating today your forebears and reaffirming our fight for the rights of people half a world away.

It is a rare and courageous thing.

And I am convinced that when the final chapters of history are written, your courage will be remembered.

History rewards those who get involved.

History rewards those who don't let the obstacles * * * the delays * * * the bureaucracy * * * the compromise * * * get them down.

So, keep fighting.

History may indeed be written by winners.

But you—and we—will be among those who won.

Mr. CARDIN. Mr. Speaker, I join my distinguished colleague from California, Congressman RICHARD LEHMAN, in commemorating the tragedy of the Armenian genocide.

Between 1915 and 1923, a systematic and deliberate campaign of mass genocide by the Ottoman Turkish Empire resulted in the deaths of over 1½ million Armenians and the exile of a nation from its historic homeland.

We have a dual purpose today in recalling the catastrophic events surrounding the Armenian genocide. First, we are here to pay our respects to the 2 million Armenians who were killed or driven into exile simply because they shared a common ethnic heritage. Second, we are here today to educate future generations to the reality of what occurred from 1915 to 1923. "Nothing," it has been said, "is more distressing than to see history repeating itself."

Silence in the face of genocide only encourages those who would commit such atrocities. Adolph Hitler used the Armenian genocide as a precedent for his efforts to exterminate Jews from the face of this planet.

Mr. Speaker, let us never fall silent again. We must be vociferous in guarding against those who would promulgate such calamity upon any segment, however small, of the human race.

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, April 24, 1915, marked the start of the horrendous Armenian genocide. On that day, the government of the Ottoman Empire rounded up the leadership of the Armenian community and executed them as the first step of a premeditated massacre of 1½ million people. Only a few hundred thousand Armenians were able to escape this attempt to erase the Armenian people and their culture from the planet. Many of those Armenians who did escape settled in my district and throughout the United States, and have become an integral part of American society.

This past year we have witnessed tremendous changes in the world. The end of the cold war has sparked a new sense of honesty about past mistakes, opening up the possibility of a stronger and more cooperative future. This new spirit of openness asks us to acknowledge and accept responsibility for the mistakes of the past as insurance that they will not be repeated in the future.

Now is a time for moving forward, but in our prosperous ascension let us not forget those who suffered enormous tragedy in the past. Today, I join those proud Armenian-Americans, survivors and their descendants, and all Americans in commemorating the inhumanity inflicted upon the Armenian people. As the victims of the first mass effort of a government to exterminate a nation, the Armenians serve as a reminder to the world that, unless we learn from the past, we will be doomed to repeat it.

Mr. BILIRAKIS. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to join my colleague from California, Mr. LEHMAN, in commemoration of one of the saddest and most tragic events of human history: the genocide of the Armenian people during the latter half of the 19th century.

In joining my colleague, I also want to heartily commend him for taking this time today that we may speak about this very disturbing chapter in world history. For, while it may be painful to review these events, as long as this is the case—as long as we experience this discomfort and pain—there is hope for humanity.

It is, in fact, the day that we can comprehend these events and not feel pain that I fear. It will be on that day that the worth of human dignity and the human spirit will have been lost.

In few other instances has man's inhumanity to man been demonstrated so starkly than in the persecution of the Armenians by the Ottoman Empire. And while some 1,500,000 Armenian people died and another 500,000 were exiled between 1915 and 1923, this was but the brutal culmination of events stretching back to 1894.

In that year, 300,000 Armenians were massacred, and in 1909, a further 21,000 perished—all before what is generally considered to be the true genocide beginning 6 years later.

As an American of Greek descent, I always have felt a special tie to the Armenian people, because the land of my ancestors also suffered at the hands of the Ottoman Turks. My colleagues may know that every March, I sponsor a special order in this Chamber to commemorate Greek Independence Day on March 25.

That date marks the beginning of Greece's struggle for independence from more than 400 years of domination by the Ottoman Empire. It was on that day that the Greek people began a series of uprisings against their Turkish oppressors, uprisings which soon turned into a revolution.

Greece was more fortunate than Armenia. It did not suffer the dark events that we commemorate today: Whole villages exterminated, thousands and thousands rounded up and literally worked to death. However, Greeks, too, know what it means to labor under oppression.

The Greek struggle for independence and the Armenian genocide are two events that erupted in the same region of the world and that fit neatly together to form a message.

It is a message that rings down through the ages and must never be ignored. The message is this: we must continue to speak out, to raise our voices in protest of the mistreatment of our fellow human beings. This is a simple matter of right versus wrong.

It is our duty to call attention to human rights abuses on any scale until the world is united in revulsion for these atrocities; until those yearning only to live free are allowed to do so.

Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Speaker, the history of the Armenian people is a long and bitter story marked by repression and genocide. I'm speaking of course about the Armenian genocide of 1915 to 1923 carried out by the Ottoman Empire.

It is not a story that is widely known. There is little mention of it in our history books. It is not taught to our children in school. And it is not commemorated on the kind of scale it deserves. On behalf of the Armenians who live in my community, I am proud to take a few minutes to honor the victims of the genocide. I also want to thank the gentleman from California for sponsoring this important special order.

The Armenian genocide was the culmination of a long effort by the Ottoman Turks to destroy the Armenian people. During the decades preceding the First World War, the Ottoman government tried repeatedly to achieve this goal. In 1895 300,000 died. In 1909 another 30,000 died before the Western powers intervened to stop the bloodshed.

Unfortunately, World War I provided the cover they needed. With Europe and the United States preoccupied by war, the Ottoman Turks carried out their massacre without outside attention or interference. The genocide began on April 24, 1915, with a sweep of Armenian leaders. It did not end until 1923 when the entire Armenian population of 2 million had been killed or deported. Very few survived.

It is estimated that 1.5 million Armenians died at the hands of the Ottoman Turks—half of the world's Armenian population at the time. By 1923 the Turks had successfully erased nearly all remnants of the Armenian culture which had existed in their homeland for 3,000 years.

As we look back on this tragedy today, we see the memory of the victims insulted by those who say the genocide did not happen. A well-funded propaganda campaign forces the Armenian community to prove and reprove the facts of the genocide. This is itself a tragedy for a people who would rather devote their energy to commemorating the past and building the future.

I stand here today to say the genocide did happen. Nobody can erase the painful memories of the Armenian community. Nobody can deny the photos and historical references. Nobody can deny that few Armenians live where millions lived 80 years ago.

It is our responsibility and our duty to keep the memories of the genocide alive. A world that forgets these tragedies is a world that will see them repeated again and again. The story of this and other genocide must be known by all.

We must also honor the victims who perished so brutally. We cannot right the terrible injustice inflicted upon the Armenian community and we can never heal the wounds. But by properly commemorating this tragedy, Armenians will at least know the world has not forgotten the misery of those years. Only then will Armenians begin to receive the justice they deserve.

Mr. PALLONE. Mr. Speaker, this year Armenians throughout the world had much to celebrate on the occasion of the rebirth of their nation. The Republic of Armenia has risen from the ashes of history once again to take its place in the community of nations. The Armenian people have struggled for this independence for over 70 years. Today the world community recognizes the Republic of Armenia as a free and independent nation with full rights and privileges, including a voting seat in the United Nations.

For Armenian-Americans in the United States, however, a sad shadow clouds this joy and celebration. To this day, the United States Government has refused to recognize the historical fact of the 1915 genocide of Armenians by Ottoman Turkey. On April 24, in churches and gathering halls throughout the United States, Armenian-Americans came together to remember the 1½ million Armenians who were massacred during the 1915 genocide.

Nearly every one of those gathering had family members who were killed in the genocide. Some of those gathered are survivors from this horrific example in history of man's inhumanity to man. These survivors are witnesses to history. Ask them and they will tell you of the atrocities which befell the Armenian people in Ottoman Turkey in 1915. The examples of brutal inhumanity and savagery recounted by these witnesses are sadly attested to by United States, German, French, and various other scholars including United States diplomatic officers and Ambassadors. As each year passes there are fewer and fewer of these eyewitnesses alive to sit before you and tell you about the events which transpired in 1915.

Every year, the Republic of Turkey spends vast sums of money to cover up these atrocities perpetrated by Ottoman Turkey. The Republic of Turkey pours money into various Washington DC, lobbying firms to stop the United States Government from recognizing and remembering the 1915 genocide of Armenians by Ottoman Turkey.

Money and public relations, however, cannot change the truth of history. Truth is an awesome power. In the end, truth broke apart the lie that was the U.S.S.R. Truth tore down the lie that was the Berlin Wall. Truth evidenced to the world the atrocities perpetrated by Nazi Germany. And someday, truth will move our Government to recognize the horrific event known as the Armenian Genocide of 1915. Let us hope some survivors are still alive to witness that act.

Mr. EARLY. Mr. Speaker, today I rise to join my colleagues to remember an event which has undoubtedly left a mark on history as one of the great tragedies. Seventy-seven years ago the Armenian population of the Ottoman Turkish Empire became the target of heightened persecution by the Ottoman government.

This horrifying genocide began on April 24, 1915, with an event in Constantinople that took the lives of 200 Armenian religious, political, and intellectual leaders. As a result, similar executions took place in all Armenian centers throughout the empire. Unfolding next was the edict of deportation which ordered the deportation of Armenians on a moment's notice. Men usually became separated from the group, while the remaining women, children, and elderly were marched across Asia Minor and Turkish Armenia to the Syrian desert. These innocent people became victims of the Ottoman government, thousands were massacred while others were left to die of starvation, disease, and exposure.

These are just some of the grueling incidents which document the premeditated extermination of the Armenian people. One must never forget the three-decade period of inhumane treatment and brutality which led to the death of 1.5 million Armenians, while more than 500,000 were systematically uprooted from their homeland of 3,000 years.

Mr. Speaker, I stand here today to pay tribute to all those Armenians who senselessly lost their lives to a genocide that has plagued the 20th century. It is my hope that we have learned from this experience and that we will continue our commitment to prevent such tragedies in the future.

Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, just over 77 years ago, on April 24, 1915, the Ottoman Empire took advantage of the confusion of war to arrest and murder nearly 200 leaders of the Armenian population living in its borders. I rise today to commemorate that event which marked the beginning of the Armenian genocide and the near extermination of a community of 1.5 million people within the boundaries of modern-day Turkey.

The massacre of Armenians at the hands of the Ottomans occupies a strange place in our consciousness. Very few such events are so well documented, and very few received such wide acknowledgement at the time when they occurred. Ambassadors from all over the world wrote to their governments and families about the tragedy. The U.S. Senate formally recognized the nature of the massacres in 1920.

There is no doubt, but that these massacres were a systematic attempt to wipe an area clean of a 1,000-year-old culture. But, unlike its legacy, the Holocaust, it is seldom talked about in the media, or in our homes. Because of this, it seems vague and unimportant sometimes, almost as if it were just some nightmare—someone else's nightmare.

The nightmare is, of course, that genocide only sleeps. There is evidence that the Armenian genocide provided textbook inspiration for Hitler's final solution, 20 years later. This is a terrifying connection and it is frightening to think there could be such linkage through the Gang of Four to the Killing Fields to Saddam Hussein's massacres of the Kurds.

Intolerance and prejudice sustain genocide, when its does sleep. In this year of increased racial violence and crimes of hate in America, this special order is not only a commemoration, it is a warning.

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to join Armenians around the world in commemorating the 77th anniversary of the Armenian genocide. I am proud to be a regular participant of this annual event and I would like to thank my colleague from California, Mr. LEHMAN, for his commitment to consistently raising the awareness of this very important issue.

As the symbolic beginning of an 8-year reign of terror by the Ottoman Empire three-quarters of a century ago, April 24 serves as a day of solidarity for millions of Armenian men, women, and children. It is an event that remains deeply ingrained in consciousness of every Armenian no matter where he or she now lives.

In a Broader sense, however, this commemoration is a reminder to the world that apathy and ignorance facilitated a period of unchecked tyranny which spanned four earlier decades of this century. Today the contemporary world is no less insulated from the threat of genocide, but the lessons of such acts are tough weapons against the strong tendencies that continue to lay dormant in the regimes of Saddam Hussein, Hafez al-Asad, Li Peng, and many other dictatorial governments.

Our time here tonight is not only to commemorate to memory of a heinous historic event, it is also a time for us as a global village to reflect on the past and look toward the future. It is a time for us to make a commitment to erase the blight that took lives of 1 million Armenians, 2 million Cambodians and 6 million Jews. It is a time to turn the evil of these events into a valuable leverage for our posterity.

April 24 is a day when tens of thousands Armenian-Americans commemorate this day as Martyr's Day, and give thanks that they live in a land where their fundamental rights are protected by law. But in other parts of the world many people still live in constant state of fear for their lives. As we join the Armenian community in commemorating this day, we should also begin to consider a process whereby all people can one day truly identify the act of genocide as a extinct practice in a distant memory.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. LEHMAN] for holding a special order on this important topic at this time.

Mr. Speaker, 77 years ago, on April 24, 1915, a horrible crime was committed. Over 200 political, intellectual, religious, and cultural leaders of the Armenian community in Turkey were arrested and later put to death. This terrible day marked the beginning of 8 years of cruelty and fear in Turkey. From 1915 to 1923, 1.5 million Armenians were led to their deaths by the Turkish Government, either through starvation or outright execution. Through this systematic murder, the Armenian community in Turkey was reduced from around 2 million in 1914 to just over 100,000 in 1923.

In 1923, the world turned its back on the Armenians. No one spoke out for them and no one came to their aid. In 1939 Hitler, when he was beginning to accelerate his atrocities, scoffed, "World opinion? Who remembers the Armenians?" Indeed, no one did. That is why, today, we come here to commemorate that horrible crime that began on April 24, 1915; it must not be forgotten again. Every time we forget an atrocity, every time we overlook a crime against humanity, we move one step closer to seeing it repeated.

More concretely, Mr. Speaker, we have come here today to speak of the murder of two-thirds of the Armenian population of Turkey because even today the Turkish Government refuses to acknowledge that it ever happened. The Turkish Government today is not the medieval autocracy that committed this crime. Today's Turkey is a modern, civilized state that need not be embarrassed to admit the mistakes in its past. The Turkish Government can end the cycle of denial by simply admitting what the evidence already shows beyond a doubt: that Turkey pursued, for 8 years, a policy of genocide against the Armenian people.

Miraculously, Armenia has survived. A stateless people, Armenians have preserved their unique culture and religion in Turkey, in the Armenian republic of the former Soviet Union, and here in the United States. Strong Armenian-American communities have kept the heritage of Armenia alive to the present day. Elsewhere, the Armenian people have continued to struggle against oppression and hatred, particularly in Nagorno-Karabakh, where the Armenian population has been locked in a bitter struggle with the surrounding Republic of Azerbaijan. I commend the Armenian community in our country and around the world for their courage as they commemorate this anniversary that reminds them of the crimes against Armenia and of their strength in surviving their terrible ordeals.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to participate in this special order commemorating the Armenian genocide. Between 1915 and 1923 over 1 million Armenians were killed while others were forcibly exiled from their homeland by the Ottoman Turkish Government.

Since that time, the world has changed several times over. Turkey is a vastly different country today, and no one should claim that the current Turkish Government is somehow responsible for what happened over 70 years ago. In that time Nazi Germany came and went, communism expanded to its greatest reach and is now fading fast, and inventions like the computer and the jet engine revolutionized the world.

Unfortunately, the one thing that has not changed is senseless killing due to ethnic hatred. The brutal conflict in the Nagorno Karabagh region is taking the lives of innocent Armenians and Azeris alike. Ethnic strife in Yugoslavia has resulted in tragedy for members of all of its ethnic groups and destroyed the economy and many of the cultural and historic sites in the region.

The time has come to admit that wrongs of the past, to recognize the validity of other ethnic cultures, and to appreciate the benefits that can be gained from working together rather than building walls of hatred. The time has come to acknowledge the wrongful deaths of so many Armenians. Admitting you were wrong—for individuals as well as nations—is a sign of strength and a step that must be taken to avoid repeating the mistakes of the past.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commemorate the 77th anniversary of the Armenian genocide. On April 24, 1915, the Government of the Ottoman Empire rounded up approximately 200 Armenian religious, political, and intellectual leaders who were either arrested, exiled, or murdered. For the next 8 years this regime was responsible for the deaths of over 1.5 million Armenians. Those who survived were exiled from their homeland of 3,000 years.

The Armenians are an ancient and a proud people. Tragically, this vibrant culture, its history and all of its accomplishments were brought to the brink of extinction. By 1923, virtually the entire Armenian population of Anatolia and western Armenia had been either killed or deported. The Ottoman Empire's attempt to eliminate a culture, a language, and an entire race of people from the face of the Earth set a tragic precedent for Hitler's persecution of European Jews.

The horror of the Armenian genocide is made worse by the refusal of the current Government of the Republic of Turkey to acknowledge that this tragedy ever happened. We must not deny the massacre. If we are to avoid a repetition of past mistakes, the United States must expose the truth.

Today, over 1 million Armenian-Americans contribute to the richness of American culture and the diversity of our Nation.

I join the Armenian-Americans of Rhode Island, and throughout the Nation, in observance of this anniversary to keep the memory and truth of the Armenian genocide alive.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, every year, Members of Congress dedicated to promoting human rights around the globe come to the House floor on the anniversary of the Armenian genocide to remember this tragic page in history in order to ensure that it is not forgotten and will never be repeated.

This year, it is especially important for Congress to state loud and clear that human rights are at the very foundation of our Nation's foreign policy. As the states of the former Soviet Union throw off central control and begin to form governments of their own, it is essential that the United States continue to loudly proclaim that it is an absolute necessity that all nations respect basic human rights. If this message is sent clearly now, perhaps it will take hold and become the bedrock of those nation's values, too.

Human rights violations cannot be hidden behind the cloak of internal policy. We are all human beings, regardless of nationality, and the violation of human rights anywhere is a violation of the human rights of each of us.

To fail to acknowledge the genocide of the Armenians would be to do an incredible disservice to those who died and to those who endured the horror and lived to tell the world. In the 1930's, Adolf Hitler used the lack of world outrage over the Armenian genocide as an indication that he could get away with the extermination of Jews in Eastern Europe. He said, "Who today remembers the Armenians?" We must remember the Armenians. We must hear the tale of the Armenian genocide and amplify it. Only when the world becomes fully aware of the magnitude of the genocide in Armenia—as well as the Holocaust in Europe two decades later—can we hope to end these types of atrocities.

While it is important that we remember the lessons of the Armenian genocide and dedicate ourselves to bringing all human rights abuses to light, we must not let the transgressions of bygone days poison the future for ourselves and our children. We must use this memory as a launchpad for improving our relations with our fellow men and women and for building trust between us. Only then will the type of thinking that fueled the genocide against the Armenian people shrivel and die and become a memory of yesterday rather than a reality of tomorrow.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, I rise to join in the commemoration of the 77th anniversary of the Armenian genocide. That infamous nationwide massacre of Armenians was an unspeakable horror in human history too often forgotten and ignored, and it is with a heavy sense of the lessons of history that I join in commemorating it today.

We are compelled to recall the horrific attempt to annihilate a people by our duties both to honor the dead and to prevent the replication of the genocide. Indeed, by acting against hate and fear, we honor those who died so unjustly. We are grateful for the peace and stability enjoyed in the United States in 1992, and we cannot imagine the depths to which human nature plunged in Armenia and Turkey in 1915.

Embarked as we are upon an era marked by the emergence of new nations, nations struggling toward democracy, it is more important than ever that we reaffirm our tradition of respect for human rights and opposition to the use of violence as a tool of government. Happily, this year marks the first year of the newly independent Armenia. Unfortunately, even today Armenians are not free from the prejudice and attacks of neighboring states and peoples. We are hopeful that the situation in Nagorno-Karabakh will be resolved soon.

April 24, 1915, signified the beginning of a systematic attempt by the Ottoman regime to deport and exterminate Armenians from the Anatolian Peninsula. Over the next 8 years, 1½ million Armenian people were murdered by minions of the Ottoman Empire. Those who were spared were driven from their homes. It is for those victims, and it is for all oppressed peoples today, those who have died and those who survived, that we take time to reflect on the Armenian genocide and its implications for all of us today.

Mr. CAMPBELL of California. Mr. Speaker, the Armenian genocide was one of the greatest tragedies in the 20th century. No episode of human suffering up until that time troubled the conscience of America more. Over 1.5 million Armenians were killed and over half-a-million were exiled from their homes in an 8-year period.

Beginning in 1915, hundreds of Armenian religious, political and intellectual leaders were rounded up, exiled and eventually murdered in remote places in Anatolia. Within several months, 250,000 serving in the Ottoman army were disarmed and placed in forced labor battalions, where they either starved or were execut. This marked a series of events which culminated into the first genocide of the 20th century.

The killing of these innocent Armenians was a premeditated act by the Ottoman government to eliminate a Christian minority within the Moslem empire. It was in effort to create a homogeneous society. The elimination of whole races of people because of language, religion or culture is the most unjust and heinous crime that can be perpetrated against humanity. We have a moral and absolute obligation to make sure that such atrocities never happen again. Every people has the right to be protected against the sin of genocide.

I commend my colleague, RICHARD LEHMAN, for bringing us together to day to remember this important chapter in the history of the Armenian people. It will not only serve as a reminder of the unspeakable suffering of the Armenian genocide, but reaffirm our resolve to work for the plight of Armenians in Nagorno-Karabagh, who today are being persecuted by the Azerbaijanis.

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, today we commemorate the events of 77 years ago in eastern Anatolia, a tragedy which to this day is a black mark in world history.

From 1915 to 1923, the leaders of this disintegrating Ottoman Empire assisted in the execution of a genocidal campaign against the Armenian people. The forced marches, deportations and mass executions resulted in 1.5 million deaths.

Although some, most notably the Turkish Government and its supporters, choose to dispute the facts in this case, the facts are really indisputable. Major newspapers of the time, the diplomatic archives of the United States, Great Britain and Germany, and the United Nations Subcommittee on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities all provide evidence of the existence of the slaughter.

We should turn our attention today to remembering the facts of those who suffered and died in Armenia those many years ago, and to helping make sure that such a tragedy does not ever happen again.

For 77 years, the world—and, sadly, the United States is no exception—has failed to recognize adequately the brutal and senseless slaughter of some 1.5 million innocent Armenian people. It is time for us in America to recognize these atrocities. For it is only through recognition of past wrongs can we hope to avoid similar tragedies in the future.

We cannot afford to be complacent, we should recognize that the potential for repetition of the past is still great. As the stability of the former Soviet system disintegrates, the vacuum of power brings with it ethnic tension. We are still too familiar now with the violence between Armenians and Azerbaijanis. Unfortunately, many world leaders have not accorded this unfolding crisis the attention it deserves.

We owe it to the victims of the past to prevent the murder of their descendants. That is why I call on the President and Secretary of State to denounce those who conduct aggression against the Armenian people today and to engage actively in the search for a solution to the crisis in Armenia. Doing this would be the most fitting way to honor those who the world failed to save those 77 years ago.

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, the saddest date on the Armenian calendar is April 24, when a scattered people remember a catastrophe most of us have forgotten.

In 1915, an ancient Indo-European people claiming descent from Noah, who maintained their identity through waves of invasions and centuries of rule by other peoples, experienced their worst disaster when Christian Russia invaded the Muslim Ottoman Empire which was allied with Germany. Amid the fighting Ottoman forces, fearing military defeat, ordered the deportation of every Armenian in the region. Ottoman authorities marched the Armenians from the Anatolia highlands to the Syrian deserts, in inhumane conditions of plague, starvation and sheer exhaustion. The gruesome campaign resulted in the death or deportations of between 1 million and 1.5 million Armenians. About half the Armenian population died. The remainder of the population was incorporated into current Armenia or settled in Europe, the Middle East and the United States.

The Armenian-American community has made an impressive contribution to this country. They have produced a disproportionately large number of artists and writers; they have worked hard to reach positions of leadership, scholarship and politics which is recognized by all. The concerted effort to eliminate this proud community, in one of history's greatest tragedies must not be dismissed. I thank my colleague, Mr. LEHMAN, for recognizing the present contributions of the Armenian community and for insuring that the tragedy of 1915 is not forgotten.

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commemorate the memory of 1.5 million Armenian men, women and children who perished at the hand of the Ottoman government in the years 1915 to 1923. This memorial is usually carried out on April 24, 1915, for on that day, the Ottoman Empire began the systematic massacre of the Armenian people which lead to genocide. Over 200 Armenian religious, political and intellectual leaders were arrested, exiled, and executed on that night and by 1923, over 70 percent of the Armenian community of the Ottoman Empire had been exterminated.

As we commemorate the 77th anniversary of the Armenian genocide we bring attention to an atrocity that most of the world knows very little about. This is a part of history that should not be ignored. Therefore, as we mourn for those Armenians whose lives were brutally taken during this terrible 7-year period of Armenian history, we must also pay tribute to the survivors—the living testimony of this horrible event—and to their families, many of whom are now Armenian-Americans. We must assure them that we, as the leaders of the democratic world, will not forget this tragedy, but rather gain strength and knowledge so that we can put a stop to the genocides that plagued the 20th century.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I rise to join my colleagues in paying tribute to the memories of the Armenians who perished in the first genocide of the 20th century which was organized by the young Turk Government 76 years ago.

Today, even as we pause to commemorate the tragic deaths of the Armenian genocide, we are faced with a campaign of denials, and an effort by the present Turkish Government to rewrite the history of that era.

While we cannot alter the facts of the Armenian genocide, which took some 1.5 million lives and exiled a nation from its homeland of 3,000 years, we can reject the attempts to deny this terrible crime. Only by speaking out against genocide can we hope to eradicate the policies of genocide which still exist in some parts of the world.

Today history may be repeating itself. Armenians in the Republic of Karabagh are under seige. In 1920, Karabagh was part of the Republic of Armenia, with an Armenian population of over 80 percent. However, in 1921 Karabagh was transferred by Stalin to Soviet Azerbaijan's control. It was separated from the Armenian mainland by a narrow strip in order to minimize contact with Armenia. This arbitrary territorial rearrangement by Stalin remained in place until the disintegration of the U.S.S.R. and the creation of the Commonwealth of Independent States. Subsequently, on January 6, 1992, Karabagh declared its independence from Azerbaijan.

Since that time, as the Washington Post pointed out editorially on March 31, "the dirtiest war left from the Soviet Union is the struggle over Nagorno-Karabagh between its Azerbaijani administration and its Armenian majority." The Post described fruitless efforts by the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe to implement a cease-fire, and concluded, "the point remains that Karabagh cannot be left to a worsening fate. Its plight shames the ideals and institutions which the new Europe claims as its inspiration."

Two weeks later, however, the Christian Science Monitor of April 14 reported that the Azeris had rejected proposals for deploying United Nations' troops in order to keep the peace in Karabagh and had also rejected proposals for an international peacekeeping force. In the meantime, British human rights activist Baroness Carolyn Cox, accompanied by a team of doctors and journalists, reported witnessing on April 12, the aftermath of a massacre of 50 Armenians, mostly civilians in a border village in Karabagh. The group was shown the bodies of Armenians who had been beheaded and burned as well as other evidence of human rights violations claimed to be carried out by attacking Azerbaijan forces. Armenian homes and businesses had been destroyed, according to the report of the team, and a school was destroyed by Grad rocket attacks 30 minutes before the team arrived on April 11.

Appalling living conditions were observed everywhere. Casualties were being treated in makeshift hospitals and basements. There was a severe shortage of food and fuel because of the ongoing Azeri blockade which is cutting off running water and electrical power. There is presently a serious risk of an epidemic and most of the remaining inhabitants in the capital, Stepanakert, now live in dark, overcrowded cellars in order to avoid further bombardment by Grad rocket attacks. On April 14, the president of the Republic of Karabagh was assassinated on the steps of his home. Escalation of the conflict continues with the acquisition by Azerbaijan of a combat plane and additional military equipment.

The Christian Science Monitor stated that "the Karabagh war is the most intense inter-ethnic conflict among the former republics of the Soviet Union. It is a war that many fear could widen to include neighboring states, including Turkey or Iran, and could threaten the shaky Commonwealth of Independent States."

As the human rights violations and the inhuman blockade against the Armenians in Karabagh continue, the world community, by its very inaction is permitting history to repeat itself. Are we witnessing another Armenian genocide 76 years after the first genocide? Will democratic nations passively permit atrocities and random killings of civilians to continue? I agree that Karabagh's plight shames the lofty ideals of the new world order. The time is long overdue for the community of free nations to intercede in order to stop the killing and to support the just quest for liberty and self-determination of the Armenians in Karabagh.

Mr. MAVROULES. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commemorate the 77th anniversary of the Armenian genocide. I believe we in America should be sensitive to this tragedy, appreciate its historical significance and deduce lessons for the future. Between 1915 and 1923, a million and a half men, women and children were systematically murdered by the rulers of the Ottoman Empire. This was an attempt to obliterate a culture which traces its roots back 2,500 years and formed one of the great empires which so proudly resisted Roman aggression. The Armenians were one of the first nations to adopt Christianity and were for many years a shining example of a highly-cultured civilization. It was their fortitude in the face of adversity and refusal to renounce their culture and assimilate that led the Turks to countenance genocide.

Unfortunately, crimes against humanity are still occurring in this region. I hope that remembering this tragic event in 1915 will lead all sides in the Nagorno-Karabakh dispute to better understand the devastation and futility of indiscriminate violence. This enclave is historically Armenian yet was illegally granted to Azerbaijan in 1921 by Joseph Stalin. It is now the scene of vicious internecine fighting between Armenians and Azeris in which hundreds of people were killed last year. I believe both sides should use the sad memory of the Armenian genocide to take their places at the negotiating table and ensure that history does not repeat itself.

Mr. Speaker, I urge you to consider the plight of Armenians, both in Armenia and in the global community, who have endured so much violent aggression in their history. We now have a unique opportunity to create the political climate for peace in this troubled region. By commemorating the Armenian genocide of 1915, we comfort the survivors, keep alive the memories of those who perished, and strive for a better future for their children.

Mr. MANTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank Mr. LEHMAN for reserving this special order to commemorate the tragic events that took place in the Ottoman Empire from 1915 to 1923. I am honored to join my colleagues today to remember and honor the 1½ million victims of the Armenian genocide and their survivors. Unfortunately, today Armenians are still subject to persecution and oppression. In that regard, I am proud to be a cosponsor of H.R. 4161 introduced by Congressman WAYNE OWENS which will limit Azerbaijani relations with the United States until they cease their policy of aggression against Armenia and Nagorno-Karabagh, and afford Armenians basic human rights protections. I urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring this important resolution to help all Armenians fight for the democratic principles and human rights they deserve.

Mr. Speaker, most of us here today are familiar with the events of 1915–23. There are those, however, who would deny the genocide ever occurred. Thus, today it is indeed appropriate to recall the details of the crimes committed against the Armenian people from 1915 to 1923. We cannot allow time to obscure or fade the truth in the genocide. We must remember that in 1915 the Armenian members of the Ottoman Turkish Army were segregated, disarmed, and worked to death or massacred. We must recall the villages whose entire populations were murdered. We must remember the Armenian religious, political and intellectual leaders who were systematically killed. Finally, we must remember the mass deportations and deaths of thousands of Armenians.

Mr. Speaker, on this solemn occasion, Americans pause to remember a terrible chapter in this history of mankind. Today, Armenian-Americans will remember their relatives and friends who perished more than 70 years ago. These survivors and their families have helped to build the United States into a strong, prosperous, and free nation.

Finally, let no one doubt we will continue to remember our duty to the victims of the Armenian genocide. Their deaths have meaning because we will not let the world forget them, and because we will never cease to mourn them. The events of the Armenian genocide must never be repeated. I personally pledge to continue my efforts to end the crimes of prejudice and ignorance so the victims of the genocide did not die in vain. The principles upon which our Nation was founded compel us to remember and honor all victims of tyranny and injustice. Today we remind the world a senseless tragedy was allowed to happen, but it must never be repeated.

Mr. FRANK of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I want to express my appreciation to our colleague the gentleman from California [Mr. LEHMAN] for giving us this opportunity to express our solidarity with the people of Armenia in this troubled time. It is a terrible irony that as we commemorate the outrageous acts which we know as the Armenian genocide, the people of Armenia today continue to face unjustified violence in their homeland, particularly in the Nagorno-Karabakh.

Mr. Speaker, like many of my colleagues I am extremely disappointed in this attitude of the Turkish Government. It is not the responsibility of Turks who are today in power that Armenians were slaughtered between 1915 and 1923. But it is their responsibility that they fail to acknowledge this terrible act, and that they fail to recognize that we are seeking not simply an acknowledgement of Turkey's role, but that we are asking them to join in a worldwide affirmation that genocide must never be allowed to happen again.

Those who seek to rewrite history, to deny the facts of genocide, undercut our efforts to commit humanity steadfastly to a determination that this sort of thing must never again be allowed to happen.

Mr. Speaker, Armenians throughout the world and especially here in the United States who take the lead in commemorating this genocide put all of us in their debt, because they give us the chance to express our outrage at one of the truly terrible acts of history, and at the same time to affirm our commitment to preventing any such set of events in the future. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to join in this commemoration of the 77th anniversary of the genocide of the Armenian people, to express my support for the legitimate aspirations of the people in Armenia today, and to congratulate the Armenian-Americans for their valiant effort to prevent history from forgetting what it must remember.

Ms. PELOSI. Mr. Speaker, I join today with my colleagues to commemorate the 77th anniversary of the Armenian genocide. I commend Congressman LEHMAN for calling this special order to bring attention to an important issue. As we commemorate the Armenian genocide and pause to remember the million and a half men, women, and children who were brutally murdered, we must regroup our energies for the continuing fight to insist that the tragedies of the past are acknowledged in the rush to the new world of the future.

From 1915 to 1923, two out of every three Armenians then living in their homeland were killed in the 20th century's first act of genocide. Unfortunately, the Government of Turkey still refuses to acknowledge that this tragedy ever happened.

The world today is in an almost unprecedented state of turbulence and change. Whole peoples living under authoritarianism, communism and dictatorship are freeing themselves, reshaping the face of the globe and changing the very course of history.

At all times, we should be working for an acknowledgment and an understanding of the realities of the past. This activity is often painful, but in times like these, it is especially important to fight for historical accuracy. Revisionism threatens to run rampant in the race for change.

Unless we acknowledge the tragedies of the past, we cannot move unencumbered into the future. Denying the tragedies of the past dooms us to building new relationships on false and shaky foundations.

Today's world illustrates that the Armenian struggle is not only one for historical recognition, but sadly in some places, also still for survival. The Azerbaijani's, like the Ottoman Turks in the early 20th century, are attempting to solve a political problem with a violent solution.

But I believe that the spirit and the resilience of the Armenian people, epitomized by the on-going efforts of the Armenian community here in the United States in the fight for recognition of the Armenian Genocide, will ultimately prevail.

As we face the 21st century, we must insist that people stop using violence and repression as tools of government. We must insist that all governments acknowledge and come to terms with their pasts, even though the past is painful. And, we must insist on the simple dignity of truthful recognition of historical fact.

I join with the Armenian community in its sorrow, its determination to keep the memories of the lost generation of Armenians alive and its struggle for the rightful place of Armenians in history and in the new world.

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to remind the Members of Congress of a recurring travesty enlivened three times in the first 50 years of this century alone. Those years witnessed the annihilation of over 20 million people.

Inevitably, the Holocaust and Stalin's massive killing rampage come to mind. However, before these atrocities, the last of the great empires, the Ottoman Empire, embarked on a policy of calculated genocide against its Armenian people. This policy began as early as 1894 when 300,000 Armenians were massacred at the order of Sultan Abdul Hamid II. The Ottoman Empire continued the systematic elimination of the Armenians through 1923. The Ottoman's raided the houses of intellectuals and sent them off to be murdered; enlisted thousands of men for excruciating labor and executed them; kidnaped the remaining women and children and left them to die by starvation and abuse.

Mr. Speaker, the 77th anniversary of such terror marks an optimistic tone for the future. As we remind each other of the human propensity to annihilate its own, we embark on a new mission for humankind to avoid the recurring cycle. Ambassador Morgenthau, the American Ambassador to the Ottoman Empire during the years of the Armenian genocide, marked the first of many to make the world aware of such behavior. His efforts to assist the exiled Armenians and to condemn the Ottomans have multiplied into the movements to prevent human rights abuses. Today, the United Nations and other international organizations work to improve the treatment of citizens. Mr. Speaker, I am honored to participate in the remembrance of the Armenian genocide so that we constantly remember the value of preserving the sanctity of humankind.

Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues to take a moment to remember this tragedy as we mark this date the 77th anniversary of the deaths of over 2 million very special individuals lost by the hand of killers.

Mr. TOWNS. Mr. Speaker, today I join with my colleagues in remembrance of the 77th anniversary of the Armenian genocide, cited as the first genocide of the 20th century. It began on the evening of April 24, 1915 when over 200 Armenian intellectual, religious, and political leaders in Istanbul were imprisoned and later killed. In the following years from 1915 to 1923, Armenians were forcibly removed from their ancestral lands in eastern Turkey under the pretense of being removed from war zones and an invading Russian Army. The Turkish Government deported thousands of Armenians to the deserts of Syrian and surrounding regions. Typically, men and teenage boys were separated from the caravans very early in the deportation journey and were shot or butchered. The women and children continued on foot, sometimes for months. Along the way they were robbed, raped, and murdered. Those who were not killed died of starvation, disease or exposure. In the years surrounding 1920, the newspapers were filled with stories of the plight of the starving Armenians who were reduced to eating grass. Before 1914, over 2 million Armenians lived in Turkey. By the end of 1923, the entire Armenian population of Anatolia and western Armenia had either been killed or deported. The calculated policy of deportation and extermination implemented by the governments of the Ottoman Empire resulted in the genocide of 1½ million men, women, and children. It is only fitting that we take the time to remember these victims to give some comfort to their survivors and to ensure that this example of man's inhumanity to man will never be repeated.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to call attention to the events of 77 years ago, when Armenian people were slaughtered by the last remnants of the Ottoman Empire.

On April 24, 1915, hundreds of Armenian religious, political, and intellectual leaders were rounded up, exiled, tortured, and murdered in remote places in Anatolia. Over a million others would also soon perish. Despite these mass murders, almost half a million Armenians escaped north across the Russian border, south into Arab countries, on westward Europe and the United States. It was not the last time this century that the world would endure the barbarism of mass extermination.

Through the last couple of years, the end of the cold war has given new hope for a great stride toward the elimination of human rights abuses. Unfortunately, the world has not learned completely how to reverse this dark side of human conduct. With the continued brutality of Saddam Hussein in Iraq, as well as the continued ethnic violence in Eastern Europe, it is clear that the battle for human rights and basic individual dignity is not yet won.

To question the authenticity of the tragic events of 77 years ago is a pathetic attempt to alter the records of history. American Presidents and statesmen from our Nation and from across the world have stated that these crimes against humanity truly occurred. It is time that all members of the world community acknowledge the truth.

Mr. Speaker, I join my colleagues today to pay tribute to those Americans of Armenian descent who have worked so hard to contribute their talents to this Nation, while working to ensure that the world never forgets the atrocious fate met by their ancestors.

Mr. BLILEY. Mr. Speaker, every year throughout my entire tenure in the House of Representatives, I have taken to the floor to urge my colleagues to recognize the genocide of the Armenian people at the hands of the Ottoman Turks. I have done this because this democratic body, long the symbol of liberty and justice to the world, has lacked the courage to tell the truth. I am saddened that this year I must once again deliver the same speech. My words have not changed and the facts surrounding these atrocities have not changed.

In the shadow of World War I, the Ottoman Turk Government embarked on a plan to systematically eliminate the Armenian people from their ancestral homeland.

The Armenian men who had answered the call to join their country's armed forces were isolated and shot. On orders from the central government, Turkish soldiers rampaged from town to town, brutalizing and butchering the remaining Armenian population. Women and children were then forced on a death-march into the Syrian desert. By the end of the war, the Ottoman Turks had been successful in exterminating 2 out of every 3 Armenians. A million and a half Armenians had perished at the hands of the Ottoman Turks.

Henry Morgenthau, Sr., then United States Ambassador to Turkey, wrote:

I am confident that the whole history of the human race contains no such horrible episode as this. The great massacres and persecutions of the past seem almost insignificant when compared to the sufferings of the Armenian race in 1915.

Only 20 years later, Adolf Hitler asked rhetorically, "Who remembers the Armenians?" as he began his master plan to annihilate the Jews. Those who fail to remember history are condemned to repeat it.

The years cannot mute the voice of those Armenian survivors whose individual accounts of savagery combine to form a bedrock of irrefutable evidence. Despite the attempts to hide the records and to distort the facts; despite the world's preoccupation with politics and strategy, the truth of the Armenian genocide remains.

We commemorate April 24 as the National Day of Remembrance of the Armenian Genocide of 1915-23, and pledge that their deaths were not in vain, that their suffering will not be forgotten. We must use the truth of the Armenian genocide to help prevent such a tragic event from ever occurring again.

But we also use this day to rejoice in the continued survival of the Armenian people, for while the Turks crushed the fruit, the seed remained. I am reminded of a passage that William Saroyan wrote:

I should like to see any power in this world destroy this race, this small tribe of unimportant people whose history has ended, whose wars have been fought and lost, whose structures have crumbled, whose literature is unread, and whose prayers are no more answered. Go ahead, destroy this race! Destroy Armenia! See if you can do it. Send them from their homes into the desert. Let them have neither bread nor water. Burn their home and churches. Then, see if they will not laugh again, see if they will not sing and pray again. For, when two of them meet anywhere in the world, see if they will not create a New Armenia.

Mr. Speaker, thank you for allowing me the opportunity to honor both the victims and the survivors of the Armenian genocide.

Mr. CONDIT. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to join my colleagues in tribute to the more than 1.5 million Armenians who lost their lives at the hands of the Ottoman Turks from 1915-23 and in strong support of designating April 24 as a day of remembrance of the Armenian genocide.

In this world of changing politics and ideologies, one thing must remain constant: the fight for basic human decency for all, no matter where they live, no matter what type of government they choose. This changing world also allows us the opportunity to look at our past, admit our mistakes and work to change them and ourselves.

By setting April 24th as a day of remembrance, we will not only remember the genocide of the Armenian people, but we will send a signal to the world that human rights must, and will be protected. We, as a people, are recognized as defenders of human rights around the round. We must remain a constant champion of human rights, a beacon in what can sometimes be a sea of darkness and despair.

I stand here before you today as a representative of a significant Armenian community in the central San Joaquin Valley of California. I honor them for their courage and for the many valuable contributions they have made to our society and to our world.

Although the designation of April 24 as a day of remembrance will not bring back the more than 1 million Armenians taken from their families, it will send a message to the world that this cannot and will not happen again. This sends a message to our children and the children around the world that we must recognize our mistakes and ensure that history does not repeat itself.

I urge you to join me in support of this day of remembrance.

Mr. ROHRBACHER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to join my voice with those of my colleagues who commemorate the tragic death of approximately 1.5 million Armenians during the period 1915 to 1923.

The lesson we learn by remembering the loss of so many human lives is that genocide is gravely evil and must never be allowed to occur again. We should focus our attention on those places in the world where genocidal forces are still strong: The Khmer Rouge in Cambodia, the Burmese regime in Burma, Milosevic's Serbia, in the Middle East, and throughout Africa. But the Cambodian, Burmese, Serbian, et cetera people are not the enemies of mankind. The leadership of these nations must bear the responsibility. Saddam Hussein is guilty of crimes against the Kurdish people, but his children should not be shackled by his sins.

Hopefully, the scars of hatred can be healed. Today in Azerbaijan the Turkish Government could play a constructive role in mediating the conflict between Armenians and Azerbaijan. Only through forgiveness, prayer, reparation and a spirit of hope in looking forward to avoiding yesterday's mistakes tomorrow can these human tragedies be put behind us.

I visited Armenia last August. Early one evening, as the sun was setting I walked up the hill on the outskirts of Yerevan to the memorial built to honor the slain. I left flowers near the flame of the memorial, and walked the grounds of this sacred place dedicated to the memory of victims of this brutal savagery. It is an impressive memorial, and evoked a powerful emotional experience for me. I felt how deeply this event has affected the Armenian people, and I pray that neither they nor anyone else will ever have to experience so much hatred again.

Mr. OWENS of Utah. Mr. Speaker, I commend my friend from California, Mr. LEHMAN, for again this year requesting this special order and helping us to commemorate a tragic, unspeakable loss.

Mr. Speaker, for the first time ever we commemorate the events of 1915 through 1923, which claimed the lives of 1½ million Armenians, while an independent Republic of Armenia faces the trials and tribulations of its rebirth. How ironic, how tragic, that today, as we rise to express outrage, regret, and sorrow for the mass murder perpetrated by the Ottoman Empire, the Republic of Armenia and the inhabitants of Nagorno-Karabakh face an uncertain future and a recognizable aggressor.

Is history repeating itself? Will we let the next genocide happen? I find myself at this time of year, as I reflect today on the Armenian genocide and on the Holocaust, rededicating myself to two things: First, never forgetting, and second, acting.

We must not forget man's inhumanity to man, for genocide is humanity at its worst. Forgetting genocide is man failing to learn from its past. Remembering genocide is vital to protecting the future.

And we must rededicate ourselves to acting. We cannot afford to be bystanders to evil. We must have the courage and the strength of our convictions. We must not allow this genocide to be forgotten by the American people or be whitewashed and denied by the Turkish Government.

Today, in Armenia and in Nagorno-Karabakh a terrible war rages. Civilians are deprived of food, medicine, and their dignity, as the Azeri blockade continues to take a toll. The United States of America is strong enough and caring enough to prevent more death, injury, and suffering in this troubled region.

The Armenian people have seen much tragedy. As their celebration of freedom and renewal continues, we pause today to consider the price and to remember the terrible brutality of this persistent and unique people endured and, ultimately conquered.

Mr. LEVIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague, Representative RICHARD LEHMAN, for calling this special order so that we may pay a solemn tribute to the millions of Armenians who perished during the reign of the Ottoman empire.

For over seven decades generations have heard overwhelming testimony substantiating the Armenian genocide of 1915-23. Each anniversary commemorating this tragedy we recall the evidence: documentation duly recorded by distinguished scholars and historians; official acknowledgement from ambassadors, United States Presidents, and the United Nations; and hundreds of news stories printed in the New York Times during the period of this systematic persecution and massacre of the Armenian minority within Turkey.

Last week, I attended a remembrance at the St. Sarkis Church in Dearborn, MI in observance of the 77th anniversary of the genocide. Here were gathered over 30 survivors, real life people with unfortunately real, horrendous stories of atrocities and death. To those who suggest that this ruthless genocide of a people and culture did not happen, I ask, what further testimony could we possibly want?

This year our remembrance is even more somber. The survivors of the Armenian genocide now living in the United States must bear the daily reports of the bloodbath in Nagorno-Karabakh. Their people are suffering greatly.

The lessons of the Armenian genocide have grave meaning today. In light of the current disdain for human rights in this tortured region, it is even more important that we emphasize the sanctity of human rights and insist upon a peaceful conclusion to the ongoing Armenian struggle for self-preservation.

Mr. DOOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to join my colleagues in solemn remembrance of a great human tragedy, the Armenian genocide.

This near extinction of a race of people parallels the chilling Nazi Holocaust, but much of the world is still unaware of the suffering and misery that the Armenian people endured.

The details and numbers are shocking. One and one-half million Armenian people were massacred by the Ottoman Turkish Empire between 1915 and 1923. More than 500,000 Armenians were exiled from a homeland that their ancestors had occupied for more than 3,000 years.

As a result of the killings and deportations, the Armenian population in the Ottoman Empire was reduced from 2½ million to fewer than 100,000. A race of people was nearly eliminated, and the Turkish Government to this day refuses to acknowledge that this genocide ever happened.

Today, 78 years later, we commemorate those who lost their lives, and we urge the modern Turkish Government to acknowledge the atrocities of the past.

The world has witnessed remarkable change in the past year and a half. The nation of Armenia declared independence on September 23, 1991, and the United States recognized Armenia's sovereignty on December 25.

However, the people of Armenia are still mired in tragedy and violence. As we remember today one of mankind's greatest atrocities, there is still unrest between Armenia and Azerbaijan in Nagorno-Karabakh. Thousands of innocent people already have perished in this dispute and still many more have been displaced and are homeless.

The Turkish Government of today is far removed from the Ottoman Empire of the early 20th century, and the modern Turkish Government should be commended for its humanitarian gestures and relief toward the Kurdish refugees as a result of Saddam Hussein's continued aggression in Iraq.

But part of growing as a nation in credibility and integrity is recognition of events of the past—just as Germany has admitted its culpability in the Nazi Holocaust, and just as the United States Government has come to grips with its own atrocities against native Americans and the internment of Japanese-Americans during World War II.

The enduring tragedy of the Armenian genocide is that to this day the Government of the modern Turkish State refuses to acknowledge that this crime ever took place.

With Turkey's admission of culpability, there is no question that Armenia and Turkey could begin to address long-term mutual interests brought about by new political and economic boundaries.

Just a few months ago negotiations were beginning to explore expansion of the Turkish Port of Trabzon, allowing Armenian access to it while opening Armenian roads to Turkish commercial traffic. The plan would have solved Armenia's devastating transport and fuel-supply problems. However, in the end, Turkey's denials of any wrongdoing during World War I prevented negotiations from going forward.

The world is not searching for an indictment of Turkey, just an acknowledgment of a shameful era, whereby Turkey and the rest of the world can make a commitment that such events will never happen again.

The Armenian people are resilient and determined. The tragic 1988 earthquake left 30,000 dead and more than 500,000 homeless, but they are rebuilding their region and are committed to preserving their heritage and culture.

The Armenian-American community today now numbers nearly 1 million people. They deserve to know that the modern Turkish Government, having acknowledged the sins of the past, will work with other nations to ensure that similar atrocities never occur again.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, last Friday, April 24, marked the anniversary of a tragic period in the history of Europe and, indeed, all mankind. On the night of April 24, 1915, over 200 religious, political, and intellectual leaders were executed by the Turkish administration. In a single night's sweep, the voice of the representatives of the Armenian nation was silenced. This event marked the beginning of an 8-year policy of deportation and extermination of an entire minority population. From 1915 to 1923, 1½ million Armenian men, women, and children had perished, and more than half a million were exiled from their homes in the Ottoman Empire. Since that time, April 24 has been considered the symbolic date to remember the Armenian genocide.

Despite being subjected to this persecution and hatred, the Armenian people never lost heart. They held tenaciously to their heritage and came to America. Here they preserved their religious traditions, their language, and their cultural identity. In the process, they have kept the history of their people alive, and have given much to America. There are Armenian churches, where age-old religious traditions continue. There are Armenian schools, where children learn the Armenian language and history. And there are Armenian newspapers spreading the news—good and bad—of Armenia and affairs of interest to Armenians wherever Armenian-Americans live. Armenian-Americans have taught us much about the importance of remembering, and of building hope in the future.

The Armenian people, however, remain a persecuted group. The modern world now witnesses the current crisis in Nogorno-Karabakh. It is appropriate, therefore, that we take the time today to revisit the tragedy of the Armenian genocide in the hope that America will know, understand, and seek to prevent a similar tragedy from happening in Nogorno-Karabakh. As I speak, the residents of the Karabakh, which was unjustly severed from Armenia by Stalin in 1923, are surrounded by and are at war with a hostile Azerbaijani nation. They are routinely subjected and remain vulnerable to prejudice, hatred, and naked aggression. While Armenians represent a clear majority of the population in the Karabakh, they are still forced to bear the repressive yoke of the Azerbaijani Government and denied their right to self-determination and freedom. I think that we in the United States should not allow the chance for peace and justice to continue to slip away or to allow the slaughter in Nogorno-Karabakh to continue.

Mr. Speaker, history is replete with the folly of nations and countless examples of missed opportunities. A few years ago, our own State Department, during the Reagan administration, refused to accept the full truth about the Armenian genocide. When a simple resolution to commemorate the genocide was before the Congress, then-Secretary of State Shultz wrote to every Member of Congress to ask for its defeat.

In addition, there are those who would look us in the eye today and say that this atrocity never occurred. But you and I know the truth. Some of the greatest leaders of this century have told it to us. Winston Churchill called it "the clearance of the race from Asia Minor." Lord Kinross called it, "a premeditated internal policy for the final elimination of the Armenian race." President Theodore Roosevelt said, "The Armenian massacre was the greatest crime of the War." And historian Arnold Toynbee said it most plainly of all: "In the first World War the Turks committed genocide against the Armenians."

As a nation, we can no longer afford to deny the past or stand on the sidelines hoping that the current conflict in the Karabakh will play itself out. In a world where ancient hatreds die hard, passive remembrance is no guarantee of justice. That is why Congresswoman BOXER and I are currently circulating a letter in the House which calls on the administration to become more involved in trying to find a just and viable solution to the problems in the Karabakh. Our letter calls on the President to press for an immediate and unconditional cease-fire between the warring parties, to unequivocally support the deployment of United Nation troops in and around the Karabakh, and to facilitate a guaranteed corridor between Armenia and the Karabakh to allow humanitarian assistance to pass through freely. These are fundamental steps that Congresswoman BOXER, myself, and many others believe the administration should support if it is serious about finding a solution to the conflict going on in Nogorno-Karabakh. I hope my other colleagues in the House will support this important letter to the President.

So today, let us take the time to keep the memories of our fallen Armenian brothers and sisters alive. Let us remember the survivors of this dark period in Armenian history. And let us pay tribute to the strength and resilience that the people of Armenia have consistently demonstrated throughout their history. They have survived attacks in the past and continue to be resilient even now in the face of stark Azeri aggression. The goals of peace, self-determination, and an end to aggression are held steadfast by all Armenians. In the new world order, these must no longer remain ideals, but become tangible realities for the people of Nogorno-Karabakh and Armenia.

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, first I must commend my colleague, the gentleman from California, Mr. LEHMAN, for taking the initiative to arrange this special order.

Mr. Speaker, I rise today in remembrance of the victims of the Armenian genocide and to recognize the tremendous loss suffered by the Armenian people as a result of this horrible example of man's inhumanity to man.

Beginning during the second half of the 19th century, the Armenian people of the Ottoman

Turkish empire became the target of heightened persecution by the Ottoman government. This persecution culminated in the period between 1915 and 1923, in which two million Armenians were systematically uprooted from their homeland of 3,000 years and murdered or exiled. Prior to World War I, the Armenian population of the Ottoman Turkish empire numbered 2.5 million. Between 1915 and 1923, 1.5 million Armenians were killed, and 500,000 more were exiled from their homeland.

April 24, 1915 symbolically marks the beginning of the systematic policy of deportation and murder which characterizes the Armenian genocide. It was on the night of April 24, 1915, that over 200 Armenian religious, political and intellectual leaders of the Armenian community in Istanbul were rounded up, arrested, exiled and murdered; thus suppressing the most vocal voices of the Armenian people in just one night.

Today, many people do not know about the Armenian genocide. In fact, the Government of Turkey continues to deny the fact that it occurred. However, according to Henry Morgenthau, our Ambassador to Turkey between 1913 and 1916, "when the Turkish authorities gave the orders for these deportations, they were merely giving the death warrant to a whole race: they understood this well, and, in their conversations with me, they made no particular attempt to conceal the fact." Likewise, other eye witnesses, survivors and correspondents provide compelling documentation of this dreadful episode in history.

Mr. Speaker, it is important today that we acknowledge what happened to the Armenians and remember those who suffered and lost their lives between 1915 and 1923. With the dawn of the post-cold-war era and the new world order, characterized by the outbreak of democracy in emerging nations across the world, it is vital that we in the United States help convey our cherished tradition of respect for fundamental human rights and opposition to the use of violence and repression as tools of any government against its people. It is important today that we remember the Armenian people, as well as other victims of genocide, and renew our commitment to never allow such atrocities to be repeated.

Mr. Speaker, it is in this spirit of remembrance that we commemorate the 78th anniversary of the Armenian genocide and keep alive the memories of those who were murdered and honor those survivors who undoubtedly endured unspeakable horrors. Likewise, we commend the enduring strength and fortitude of the Armenian people who continue to preserve their heritage and culture despite the overwhelming loss suffered by them as a result of this infamous period in history.

Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the special order proposed by my colleague from California [Mr. LEHMAN] concerning the Armenian genocide of 1915.

Between 1915 and 1923, 1½ million Armenian men, women, and children were murdered by the Ottoman Empire, and ½ million more exiled. This is one of the most horrific acts of violence witnessed this century and should rightly be commemorated.

Events of such horror and scale should always be remembered. Everyone remembers the Holocaust suffered by the Jewish population in Europe in the Second World War, but how many remember the holocaust carried out against the Armenians during the First World War?

Our Nation spoke out against these atrocities, but our words were ignored by the Ottoman Government at the time, and even today the Turkish Government refuses to acknowledge the genocide carried out by its predecessor.

As a nation, we have frequently commemorated these terrible events, and we should continue to do so. It is incomprehensible why the Turkish Government still refuses to accept or admit that these events took place when the evidence is incontrovertible, and its failure to do so merely increases the sorrow felt by the survivors and families of those who were murdered.

I urge my colleagues to support this worthy special order, and I also urge the President to try to convince the Turkish Government that it is time to accept this terrible chapter in its history.

I would like to congratulate Mr. LEHMAN for his leadership on this issue and join him in strong support for this special order.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. LEHMAN of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks and include extraneous material on the subject of my special order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

THE LONG-TERM HEALTH CARE MARKETS DEVELOPMENT ACT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. DREIER] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing H.R. 5007, the Long-Term Health Care Markets Development Act. It is a comprehensive bill to expand access to long-term care and encourage private sector development of long-term health care insurance. The development of such a market is the key to ensuring the availability and affordability of insurance products to protect all Americans against catastrophic costs associated with extended hospital stays and custodial care.

To accomplish this objective, H.R. 5007 permits a full capital gains tax exclusion for individuals over the age of 55 who sell their principal residence to pay for designated long-term care expenses. For many older Americans, equity in the home makes up a significant portion of a person's assets. In many instances, selling that home is the only way one can pay for nursing home or other long-term care costs.

Unfortunately, capital gains taxes claim much of that equity. As health care costs continue to rise, this provision will help older Americans pay for needed care—including home care or catastrophic insurance—without becoming dependent on direct government assistance.

In addition, H.R. 5007 allows for tax-exempt withdrawals from IRA's to purchase long-term care insurance. It would allow a company to offer a higher deductible health insurance package and contribute the premium savings to an employee IRA, whereby the funds could be withdrawn tax-free to purchase catastrophic or long-term health care insurance.

H.R. 5007 also eliminates the Certificate of Public Need Program, which many States use to limit competition in the nursing home industry and keep costs artificially high. The bill also allows for the conversion of life insurance policies to long-term care insurance, and provides preferential tax treatment of long-term care insurance reserves similar to the tax treatment of life insurance reserves.

With the elderly population increasing in numbers, efforts must be made to address the long-term care problem before it becomes a national crisis. We should not fill the long-term care void by expanding the Medicare Program, which will prove too expensive for working and elderly taxpayers. A massive federally sponsored long-term care program is doomed to failure, and Congress should not mislead the elderly by exaggerating the limits of a Federal response. Instead, Congress should encourage a market solution to this serious and growing problem.

The Long-Term Health Care Markets Development Act offers a number of incentives for the health insurance industry to create efficient, competitive, and cost-effective long-term care insurance products. We need to move forward on this issue, and I urge my colleagues to join me in this effort by cosponsoring the Long-Term Health Care Markets Development Act.

RIGHTS OF HOUSE SHOULD NOT AND CANNOT BE WAIVED BY THOSE LOOKING FOR PARTISAN GAIN

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LAROCO). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GONZALEZ] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, I am sure I will not use 30 minutes, but I wanted to make sure that we would proceed in what I thought would be a manner consistent with the importance of the issue which I think is of such gravity that brings me to the well of the House at this time.

Mr. Speaker, I wanted to advise the membership that as of tonight I, together with my very distinguished colleague, the honorable gentleman from Illinois [Mr. YATES], have filed a memorandum or a motion to quash the subpoenas of the Special Counsel Wilkey dated April 21 for the production of documents directed to the chairman or acting chairman of the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct.

In this motion I have filed tonight I have set forth a memorandum of law in support of the motion to quash which I will place at the end of my remarks tonight, together with a copy of the letter that I addressed to the leadership, both the Honorable THOMAS S. FOLEY, the Speaker, and the Honorable ROBERT H. MICHEL, the minority leader, and also a copy of the news release that I issued concurrent with the delivery of the letters to the leadership of the House.

Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight in order to place in the RECORD my objections upon which I have based my action of filing the motion to quash before the District Court of the District of Columbia.

Tonight has been, I think, without any fear of rebuttal, the most abject surrender of the independence, coequality, and separateness of this body since the founding of the Congress in 1789 pursuant to the adoption of the Constitution of the United States.

If there be, and I think there is considerable ignorance, if not such fear as has clutched at the minds and hearts of so many Members tonight, that it has led to something that has never happened before in the history of the U.S. House of Representatives. Even during very great times of stress, such as civil war, and even during the time when we had the pendulum swinging the opposite direction and the so-called strong Presidents, the House, and the Senate, I might say, upheld the independence of the body known as the legislative branch or the Congress of the United States.

In my letter to the leadership yesterday I stated that these rights should not and could not be waived by those looking for partisan gain or those that are afraid to stand up to the fear-driven stampede of the uninformed.

We are actually undergoing a new form of McCarthyism at this time, and it is most dangerous to the well-being of the national interest.

These rights I speak of should not be waived by actions of the leaders or even by the vote registered tonight by the House as a whole. The Congress, and the House in particular, is a coequal and independent branch of this great Government of the United States. We cannot simply deny our duty to defend the first principles of the Constitution and the primary principles of representative government, which is an independent and free legislature. These constitutional principles are far more important than any particular complaint or any current scandal.

These principles underlie and give authority to our form of government. Sacrifice them today for expediency and they will be gone when they are needed most desperately to retain the moral authority and the integrity of the Congress as one of the three branches of this Government.

Indeed, the American system is an elaborate system of checks and balances. John Adams described them as follows:

First, the States are balanced against the general government; second, the House of Representatives is balanced against the Senate and the Senate against the House; third, the executive authority is balanced against the legislature; fourth, the judiciary is balanced against the legislature, the executive, and the State governments; fifth, the Senate is balanced against the President and all appointments to office and in all treaties; sixth, the people hold in their own hands the balance against their own representatives by periodic elections; seventh the legislature of the several States are balanced against the Congress; and eighth, the President and Vice President are balanced by votes of the people.

□ 0010

All these are described in historic detail in checks and balances in government from the General Principles of Constitutional Law published in 1898 by the very distinguished Thomas Cooley and beginning on page 160 of that treatise.

My point that I have made in my letter to the leaderships and in the memorandum of law in support of my motion to quash the indictments is simply based on the fact that not any one of us can waive the right that the Constitution grants by way of immunities, privileges, and rights to the congressional branch of the Government.

It is the only defined privilege in the entire Constitution, and that those privileges and immunities that are specifically reserved for members of the legislative body for support against the encroachment of the executive branch or any other branch, including the judiciary.

It is what we inherited from the mother country and the mother parliament, when through centuries it had to defend itself against the encroachment of the king and the crown. And no matter what vote by the collective body, known as the House, it cannot waive my rights as a Representative of the particular constituency which is the one that has this inherent right.

I am just the agent. It is not my right as an individual, but it is the right of the citizens who elected me and their right to demand that I not waive for them this precious liberty.

If the court, for whatever reason, willy-nilly supports the action of the vote taken tonight, it will indeed be, as I said at the outset, the end of the independence and freedom, and eventually this body will be enthralled by its very actions taken tonight which are unprecedented. Tonight's action is not a simple precedent, it is unprecedented. That is why I rise tonight in the small hours of the night to speak out.

My objection, of course, are constitutional in nature. I have objections to the subpoena based on the specifics of this case.

What follows, and I will submit this, is simply a summary to help guide us during the deliberations on this matter. The authority of the courts to coordinate with that of the legislature neither superior or inferior but each with equal dignity and must move in the appointed sphere, in the words of Judge Cooley. The leading feature of the Constitution is a separation and distribution of the powers of Government.

The natural classification of governmental powers is in the legislation, executive, and judiciary. Each House of the Congress is a judge of the election returns, qualifications of its own Members and may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly behavior and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expelling that Member.

Let us remember first and foremost that any questions about the so-called House bank, which of course we know was never a bank, are questions only this body can and must resolve. No other branch of Government has any inherent right to intrude, no matter what.

What to me was the most alarming statements that I heard from the lips of some of the Members who obviously do not understand their oath of office, who obviously do not understand any more than the frightening statements made during the course of the committee, the special committee, the joint committee commonly known as the Iran-Contra Committee, in which we heard Colonel North, under oath, saying, "My first and foremost and chief allegiance is to my Commander in Chief."

He obviously never understood the oath of office he took as an officer of the armed services of this country, which is essentially the same as ours. And that is to uphold and defend the Constitution against all enemies, domestic as well as foreign, and to take that oath without any mental reservations whatsoever and to then, in our case, faithfully and well serve.

That is the reason I rise, because I am merely complying with my oath of office and in an honest attempt, which I have done my utmost for 30 years. Never once, through word or deed and, as I said, utterance, ever brought any kind of shame or any kind of demotion to the well-established name, integrity, and prestige of this great body that I belong to and to which the people in my district have elected me.

The House bank, as I said, was never a bank in the legal sense of the word. We know that. It was not federally insured or chartered and, in fact, operated in what I have said from the outset as a cooperative or pool for the Members.

The history of its activities go to the very roots and beginnings of the history of the House. When the Congress first met in those beginning years in New York, the Treasury was very poor. Members received vouchers, as we do today. We do not get checks. The constitutional word is voucher from the Treasury. But in that day and time, the voucher was for the per diem. That is, what the Constitution provides will be paid a duly elected delegate and then sworn in as a Member of the House or the Senate to the opening of a session of the Congress, and then therein at the closing of a session of a Congress, to defray his per diem cost of travel from the district to the capital.

At that time there was no structure known as a salary emolument of office. It was that per diem paid at the outset under the mandate of the Constitution that enabled those delegates to live. But the merchants in New York did not trust that voucher for they knew that the Treasury was weak and impoverished. So the Sergeant at Arms then negotiated with the merchants, and the Members turned their vouchers over to the Sergeant at Arms who then was able to negotiate the cashing of the vouchers. And therein was the beginning, from the very beginning, not a Senate. Remember, it was not until 1913 that the people elected Senators directly in their States.

In the beginning and until 1913 and the constitutional amendment that was approved that year, Senators had 4-year terms but they were selected by three-fourths vote in the respective legislatures of each State, so they tended to be Members who were affluent, did not have to worry about their vouchers.

But the Members of the House today, because the Members of the House were intended to be—as far as humankind could devise—holders of an office in trust for a period of 2 years, and to which office in the U.S. House of Representatives they could not be appointed. We cannot be appointed to the U.S. House of Representatives. We can get here only by being elected in our districts, unlike the Senate, where if some vacancy occurs the Governor of that State can name an interim Senator.

So given that history, and then later with the elaborate system that developed where the Members just became inured to the tradition of turning over their vouchers to the Sergeant at Arms, grew what in the 20th century became indeed a very, very elaborate system.

I want to point out something here that I think is not only tragic, it is insidious, it is disgusting, and it is demeaning to try to make the fall guys and fall women of this scandal the poor workers who worked under the office of the Sergeant at Arms in the so-called bank.

Let me say this, that when I saw statements to the effect that the Members complaining that one reason they had trouble was because they got late recording of their deposits, or did not get their statements until late, let me say I have used that facility and did use it since the first day I came here over 30½ years ago.

After I was given an explanation by the then-Sergeant at Arms and the Clerk of the House, I thought, given their explanation, that it was a useful facility. Only Members could have accounts. Only Members had access to the convenience of that facility. So even I was surprised to hear that a Sergeant at Arms was able to float a check on the bank for $10,000 at a time. The explanation I got 30½ years ago was that that was absolutely impossible of happening, so something happened in the interim.

I will say this, I have all of my statements and all of my cancelled checks for over the last 20 years. I have had very few accounts in my lifetime. I have had to work hard for every penny I have earned, and therefore I am very careful, so I have kept my records.

Let me tell the Members, I had better service as far as promptness in getting my statement from this so-called House bank in a very, very excellent and efficient manner with a total bill of statement or outline statement as to the deposits I made during the month and the checks I issued during that month. I even had periodically a summary of the withdrawals on account of the withholding tax, my payments for the health insurance, and the other withdrawals or deductions very clearly set out.

I never found any kind of an inefficient presentation, and in a timely fashion, so timely that no other bank account that I have had, either demand or other, and even now the credit union gives me a statement, on such a timely basis as I would get from that banking facility of the House.

So I would think it is scurvy, I think it is demeaning for Members now to cast aspersions on the very, very hard-working staff that I saw. As to the Sergeant at Arms, I always had my doubts, but then, I had nothing to do with his nomination or anything else.

I never knew that there were such things as others cashing checks until years later when I think, properly, some of the lowly paid employees of the House would use that to cash their pay vouchers. But up to the most recent times it used to be that only with the signature or initialing of a Member could any staff cash a check, and not over the amount of $35.

So whenever these malpractices crept in had to be only relatively recently, and being that, there was no interest paid. The only time I ever had my doubts about the wisdom of keeping my money was that when the banks did begin to pay interest on demand deposits, and remember, this did not happen until the Congress acted just about some 10 or 12 years ago in the deregulatory mania, plus some of the so-called powers had been prohibited since the 1932 act and the 1935 Banking Act that banks pay interest on demand accounts. I was one of those that did not agree with the change.

So I was used to having a demand account that did not pay interest, but when it did begin to pay interest I began to wonder if maybe I should put it in a facility that would pay me interest. But that is the only time I ever had any question about the removal of my account. Never once was there any kind of doubt in mind as to exactly what it was I had, because I have always made it a principle that at no time would I expend the full range of my monthly stipend. I would always manage to have at least 10 percent of my take-home pay left in that bank account, and that accumulated over 30 years because sometimes—and as my children grew and left the house and my demand lessened—I was able to have more than 10 percent of my take-home pay.

I just want to explain this in order to remove the onus and the dark clouds that have been cast over some poor and low-echelon employee in that facility, because they worked very well, they were very efficient, and I hope that this notion that they can be made fall guys will cease.

What I do think is that what this House has done tonight has been worse, a worse blow to the stability of this body and our Government than anything I have seen done in the 30½ years I have had the privilege of serving as a Member of this House.

□ 0030

This is why for the first time in my life I go to court. I have not gone to court even though I have been invited in the case of some other issues involving a conflict between the executive branch and the Congress, because I said the court is going to simply dismiss it by saying that it is a political issue between these two bodies, and the court is not going to get involved.

That is why I have not joined my colleagues who went to court before the resolution on the Persian Gulf. But I did introduce a resolution of impeachment 16 hours before the shooting started. I was hoping that maybe perhaps we could have some real debate before shooting did start, and that did not happen.

I wanted to give this an explanation that I hope my colleagues will read in the RECORD when it is printed tomorrow, because I think that they were not aware of the dangerous precedent that in effect has reduced this House's independence, coequality, and separateness.

It is neither standard nor common practice for the Justice Department to ask for the records of all the account holders of any financial institution. I am chairman of the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs of the U.S. House of Representatives, and I can tell you that it just does not happen. Those are shotgun subpoenas, and they are abhorrent in law. You have to have specificity, and this is what shocks me in the present case affecting the House.

So with that, I will summarize by saying that the privileges and the immunities of this great legislature have always been resented, as all free parliamentary and legislative bodies have been resented by kings and would-be kings. We are attacked precisely because of our independence, and if we give it away here under a spurious obviously political convenient subpoena from a man whose own early writings and judgments as a judge concede the issue and, therefore, underlie his error in this subpoena; we are the worst of cowards, and we betray our trust as keepers of the Constitution.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, April 28, 1992.

Hon. THOMAS S. FOLEY,
Hon. ROBERT H. MICHEL,
House of Representatives, Speaker of the House/Republican Leader, Washington, DC.

DEAR FRIENDS: I am putting you on notice. You cannot waive my rights no matter what you do and no matter what the collective vote of the House may be on the matter of the subpoena issued by former judge Malcolm R. Wilkey with regard to the House "bank."

I will go to court; I will be a party intervenor; and I will do whatever it takes to protect my rights, privileges and immunities under the Constitution. It is ironic that the Constitution is just barely over 200 years old, and now the House is about to abdicate and vitiate it. Almost without a whimper, the House is about to surrender the coequality and independence of the legislative branch of government.

With every good wish, I remain
Sincerely,

HENRY B. GONZALEZ,
Member of Congress.

REPRESENTATIVE GONZALEZ BLASTS HOUSE
"BANK" PROBE

In a preemptive move, Representative Henry B. Gonzalez today blasted efforts by former judge Malcolm R. Wilkey to subpoena House "bank" records and warned that he will go to court to stop the unconstitutional intrusion into the constitutional rights, privileges, and immunities of Members of Congress. Gonzalez labeled Wilkey "an unscrupulous opportunist" who is trying to bring down the House of Representatives because of his failure to do so in his one previous confrontation with the House—over the Nixon Watergate tapes. "He is on a fishing expedition and he is trying to destroy the fragile co-equality of the federal balance of powers. This system is already more fragile now than it has ever been because of the recent tremendous gains in power of the presidency. Wilkey failed to get his way when he ruled that only President Nixon could determine which tapes to release during the Watergate scandal, and now he is back to try once again to destroy Congress."

Gonzalez asserted that a vote in the House on the issue of the subpoena cannot waive the privileges and immunities of individual Members of Congress. He said, "These rights belong to individual Members, and only individual Members can waive their rights. I have written to the House leadership, to Speaker Foley and Minority Leader Michel, and I have put them on notice that nothing they or the collective House does in this matter can waive my rights. I will fight in court if I have to to preserve the integrity of this institution."

Gonzalez attributed to Judge Wilkey "malice aforethought" in his "attempt to carry out Representative Newt Gingrich's 'hit man' tactics." He is acting as a "surrogate hit man for Newt Gingrich," said Gonzalez. Gonzalez threatened, "I will go to court and unmask the insidiousness of this so-called ex-judge and his overreaching. I have my records and statements and cancelled checks for the last twenty years. I am not one of those who, at any time in the 30 years I used that facility, abused that privilege. Therefore, this overweening malicious-minded ex-judge has no right, without my consent, to any of my records."

"I am not going to sit here and watch the cowering Democrats and the unscrupulous and faithless likes of Newt Gingrich, who has already poisoned the well of the House with his hate-filled unparliamentary and bitter partisan tactics, destroy the House of Representatives. I will protest this and do everything within my power to preserve and protect the Constitution of the United States against this malicious premeditated insidious scalawag of an ex-judge who is handmaiden of the most partisan Republican wing."

[In the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia]

In re Grand Jury Subpoena for documents dated April 21, 1992; Grand Jury No. 90-4

MEMORANDUM OF LAW IN SUPPORT OF MOTION TO QUASH

Two subpoenas have been served (the "Wilkey subpoenas") on the Honorable Matthew F. McHugh, Acting Chairman, Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, United States House of Representatives, and on the Honorable Werner W. Brandt, Sergeant-At-Arms of the United States House of Representatives, dated April 21, 1992, for the production of documents. The subpoenas were issued at the request of Malcolm R. Wilkey, the Special Counsel to the Attorney General.

These subpoenas seek every financial record of every transaction of the office that has been called "the House bank," the Sergeant-at-Arms facility used by various Members of the House and others, primarily as a check cashing and payroll facility.

House Rule L(50) governs the House's response to all subpoenas, including these, pursuant to the Constitutional principle of separation of powers and the Constitution's Rulemaking Clause.

These subpoenas raise questions pursuant to Rule L(50)'s provisions regarding "relevance and materiality," in that they seek the complete production of the total set of records in their entirety for all Members (and non-Members), rather than any particular records for any specific reasons. See, e.g., Judge Wilkey's opinion in Nixon v. Sirica, 487 F.2d 700, 773 & n.45 (D.C. Cir. 1973) (which gives a judicial warning of the impropriety of a subpoena such as "a grand jury demand for the records of the Senate as a whole," since it would seek records of a "whole independent Branch of Government"); United States v. Poindexter, 727 F.Supp. 1501 (D.D.C. 1989) (explaining that a criminal subpoena must be narrowed in the light of the separation of powers).

In fact, the subpoena would include the records of Members such as the petitioner Henry B. Gonzalez who has used the facility for thirty years and never had an overdraft or was notified of a problem of any type with his account, and the records of Members, who, although they may have had one or more overdrafts, have engaged in no illegal activity of any nature.

These subpoenas also raise fundamental questions about the separation of powers under the Constitution of the United States.

Petitioners argue that their transactions with the facility are private, protected and privileged. They also argue that the subpoenas are overbroad, vague and an illegitimate incursion into matters of the House of Representatives. These arguments are addressed in the attachment, the statement of petitioner Gonzalez dated April 29, 1992, on the importance and primary principle of representative government—an independent legislature.

DISCUSSION

The Wilkey subpoenas call for the production of the following:

"Any and all original microfilm or microfiche of records of the banking facility of the Sergeant-At-Arms of the House of Representatives for the period July 1, 1988 through December 31, 1991, reputed to consist of 41 rolls."

It is the understanding and belief of the petitioners that Special Counsel has not asked to examine the General Ledger, which contains the facility's overall finances, but rather wants only the copies of all the individual transactions. The subpoenas seek without distinction all those individual transactions, regardless of whether the check was an overdraft or whether an individual ever had an overdraft.

Rule L(50) of the Rules of the House of Representatives governs the House's responses to all subpoenas, including these. The Rule provides, in subsection three:

"Once notification has been laid before the House, the Member, officer, or employee shall determine whether the issuance of the subpoena or other judicial order is a proper exercise of the court's jurisdiction, is material and relevant, and is consistent with the privileges and rights of the House. The Member, officer, or employee shall notify the Speaker prior to seeking judicial determination of these matters."

In fact, the importance of materiality and relevance is reiterated four times in the Rule, in subsections three, four, five, and six. Those are the standards which must be applied to these subpoenas.

The authority for Rule L(50) derives from the Constitutional doctrine of separation of powers, in general, and the Rulemaking Clause, in particular. As the courts have consistently held, the doctrine of separation of powers applies as a barrier to efforts by the Executive Branch to improperly interfere with Houses of Congress. See, e.g., United States v. House of Representatives, 566 F. Supp. 150 (D.D.C. 1983) (dismissing an improper suit by the Justice Department).

The Rulemaking Clause, Article I, section 5, clause 2 of the Constitution prescribes: "Each House may determine the Rules of its Proceedings * * *." The Supreme Court has acknowledged the specific force of the Rulemaking Clause:

"The Constitution empowers each House to determine its rules of proceedings * * *. The power to make rules is not one which once exercised is exhausted. It is a continuous power, always subject to be exercised by the house, and within the limitations suggested, absolute and beyond the challenge of any other body or tribunal." United States v. Ballin, 144 U.S. 1, 5 (1892).

At no time has the Supreme Court wavered in its clear expression of the House's "absolute" power, "beyond the challenge of any other body or tribunal," just as is being attempted here. Relying on Ballin, the courts have consistently honored Rule L(50) regarding subpoenas for House documents as having "the force of law." Shape of Things to Come, Inc. v. County of Kane, 588 F.Supp. 1192 (N.D. Ill. 1984).

The Court of Appeals in this Circuit has upheld the Rulemaking Clause and Ballin. Nixon v. United States, 938 F.2d 239 (D.C. Cir. 1991). Three recent cases have noted that the Rulemaking Clause "create[d] a 'specific constitutional base' which requires [the courts] to 'take special care to avoid intruding into a constitutionally delineated prerogative of the Legislative Branch.'" Vander Jagt v. O'Neill, 699 F.2d 1166, 1173 (D.C. Cir.) (quoting Harrington v. Bush, 553 F.2d 190, 214 (D.C. Cir. 1977)), cert. denied, 104 S.Ct. 91 (1983); Metzenbaum v. FERC, 675 F.2d 1282, 1287 (D.C. Cir. 1982).

Rule L(50) encompasses and codifies a long history of standards of the Houses of Congress, going back to and even preceding the Constitution, for subpoenas of records and testimony. Parliament and colonial and State legislatures successfully resisted numerous demands by kings and would-be kings, often made by subpoenas; the Framers of the Constitution followed that important history and precedent in creating three coequal branches of government. In Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137 (1803), the plaintiff sought Senate records, and the Senate, after extensive debate on the application of its version of an early rule akin to Rule L(50), voted to deny the records to him.

Over the years, the House has developed extensive precedents of considering subpoenas, including grand jury subpoenas for records of the Sergeant-At-Arms facility, and granting, denying, or narrowing them. 3 Hinds' Precedents of the House of Representatives of the United States, Sections 2661, 2662 (D.C. grand jury), 2664 (1907); 6 Cannon's Precedents of the House of Representatives of the United States, Section 586 (1935) (grand jury); 3 Deschler's Precedents of the United States House of Representatives, ch. 11 Section 16.15 (1976) (grand jury subpoenas for Sergeant-At-Arms facility). Over time, the House codified its precedents in a succession of rules ending in the present Rule L(50).

Judge Wilkey himself has noted the difference between a subpoena for the records of a particular Member as opposed to a subpoena for all the records of all the Members. Nixon v. Sirica, 487 F.2d 700, 773 & n.45 (D.C. Cir. 1973) (Wilkey, J., dissenting).

This accords with the principle, even in ordinary cases not involving the separation of powers, that "the compelled production before a grand jury of all of one's books and papers en masse, where they constitute a substantial body, a variety of accumulation, or an extensive-period product, and the subpoena is without indication or limitation as to class of persons, or type of transaction, or extent of period, to which the production is intended to be related, will judicially impress as not constituting a reasonable search and seizure." Schwimmer v. United States, 232 F.2d 855, 862-63 (8th Cir. 1956), cert. denied, 352 U.S. 833 (1956).

Under actual practice it is the belief and understanding of the petitioners that where Federal grand juries have subpoenaed the entire records of a Member's account, subpoenas have been either narrowed or denied. In fact, a New York grand jury investigating Adam Clayton Powell subpoenaed records from the Sergeant-At-Arms. The House adopted a resolution directing the Sergeant-At-Arms not to provide any records until a "court determines upon the materiality and the relevancy of the papers and documents called for in the subpoena. * * *" H. Res. 279, 89th Cong., 1st Sess., 111 Cong. Rec. 5338 (1965); 3 Deschler's Precedents of the United States House of Representatives, ch. 11 Section 16.15 (1976).

In fact, the court has held that the "Congress has undoubted authority to keep its records secret, authority rooted in the Constitution, longstanding practice, and current congressional rules." Goland v. CIA, 607 F.2d 339, 346 (D.C. Cir. 1978) (Wilkey, J.), citing the House Rule which was the version at that time of Rule L(50), namely, "H.R. Rule XI(2)(k)(7)."

"Grand juries are not licensed to engage in arbitrary fishing expeditions, nor may they select targets of investigation out of malice of an intent to harass." United States v. R. Enterprises, Inc. et al, 111 S.Ct. 722 (1991).

The broad subpoena power in ordinary judicial cases does not apply where the subpoenas implicate the separation of powers concerns of a Branch of Government; rather, in those cases, the subpoenas must be narrowed based on principles of materiality and relevancy. United States v. Poindexter, 727 F. Supp. 1501 (D.D.C. 1989) (Greene, H., J.). See also United States v. Haldeman, 559 F.2d 31, 76 (D.D.Cir. 1976); In re Grand Jury Subpoena; Subpoena Duces Tecum, 829 F.2d 1291, 1300 (4th Cr. 1987).

CONCLUSION

The petitioner respectfully requests that the subpoena be quashed.

Respectfully submitted,

HENRY B. GONZALEZ,

Petitioner, Member of Congress.

Date: April 29, 1992.

STATEMENT OF HENRY B. GONZALEZ, MEMBER, U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, APRIL 29, 1992

I rise to place on the record my objections to any procedure which waives the privileges and immunities of Members of Congress, including myself. I rise to stand for and support the independence and constitutional authority of the Congress and this House of Representatives as a coequal branch of this government.

As I wrote in a letter to the joint House leadership yesterday, April 28, 1992, these rights should not be waived by those looking for partisan gain or those afraid to stand up to the fear-driven stampede of the uninformed. And in fact, these rights should not be waived by actions of our leaders or even a vote of the House as a whole. The Congress, and particularly this House of Representatives, is a coequal and independent branch of the government of the United States. We cannot simply deny our duty to defend the first principle of the Constitution and the primary principle of representative government—an independent legislature.

These constitutional principles are far more important than any particular complaint or any current scandal—these principles underlie and give authority to our form of government. Sacrifice them today for expediency and they will be gone when they are needed most desperately, to retain the moral authority and integrity of the Congress as one of three branches of this government.

Indeed, the American system is an elaborate system of checks and balances. John Adams described them as follows: First, the States are balanced against the general government. Second, the House of Representatives is balanced against the Senate, and the Senate against the House. Third, the executive authority is balanced against the legislature. Fourth, the judiciary is balanced against the legislature, the executive, and the State governments. Fifth, the Senate is balanced against the President in all appointments to office, and in all treaties. Sixth, the people hold in their own hands the balance against their own representatives by periodic elections. Seventh, the legislatures of the several States are balanced against the Congress and eighth, the President and Vice President are balanced by votes of the people. All these are described in historic detail in "Checks and Balances in Government," from The General Principles of Constitutional Law, published in 1898, by Thomas Cooley, beginning p. 160.

These checks and balances are essential; they are also delicate and must be protected by each of us. In fact, when we took our oath to uphold the Constitution of the United States, we took an oath to uphold the constitutional coequality of the legislative branch.

This business before us now, a subpoena for our own documents and records, is not some unimportant precedent. It tramples on our individual rights and on the rights of the body we represent. We must not yield to this demand.

I have objections which are constitutional in nature and I have objections to this subpoena based on the specifics of this case. What follows is simply a summary to help guide us during our deliberations on these matters.

First, let me quote again from The General Principles of Constitutional Law, by Thomas Cooley, written almost 100 years ago;

"The authority of the courts 'is co-ordinate with that of the legislature, neither superior nor inferior; but each with equal dignity must move in its appointed sphere. * * *"

"The leading feature of the Constitution is the separation and distribution of the powers of government."

The natural classification of governmental powers is into legislative, executive, and judicial. Each house of the Congress is the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and with the concurrence of two thirds, expel a member.

Let us remember, first and foremost, any questions about the "House bank" are questions this body can and must resolve, no other branch of the government.

In addition, I also have a number of very specific complaints about the process in which we find ourselves and let me simply enumerate them now for the record before I come back to the most important objections, the constitutional issues raised by this subpoena:

1. The House "Bank" was never a bank in the legal sense of the word. It was not federally insured and in fact, operated as a cooperative or pool for the members. Therefore, the records of the "bank", including the records of my own transactions, are still my records and cannot be turned over to anyone by the "bank", which does not even exist anymore.

2. It is neither standard nor common practice for the Justice Department to ask for the records of all of the accountholders of any financial institution, even if the institution has failed. In fact, even requests for the records of all of the borrowers of a failed institution have been held to be overbroad. See Bank of American National Trust & Savings Association v. Douglas, 105 F.2d 100, 106, 107, D.C. (1939).

3. It is standard procedure for banks or banking agencies (if a conservator or receiver has been appointed) to cooperate with a criminal subpoena if a particular individual is named and an allegation of specific criminal activity has been made. This subpoena, if do we go beyond the constitutional issues, does not distinguish among Members who have had overdrafts or who haven't and even among those who have had overdrafts, does not distinguish among those Members with regard to any alleged illegal activity. The charge of "check kiting" is simply an attempt to label the overdrafts with another name—it would only be a sufficient allegation of criminal activity if this was a real bank and a particular account holder with the intent to defraud the institution, caused a loss for the institution. None of those facts are present here.

In fact this request for documents is so overbroad as to be unconstitutional on its face. Yes, grand juries have broad powers—they are not, however, unlimited and they cannot override the Constitution.

4. If the House Bank was a bank for the purposes of the Right to Financial Privacy Act, any subpoena would have to state the "legitimate law enforcement inquiry" and why a particular user of the Bank was a target. Judge Wilkey does not even comply with this broad standard. And if he did, any Member would have the right under RFPA to challenge the subpoena in court under a procedure laid out in the law.

5. Even if RFPA does not apply, the historic common law right of privacy in the relationship between the user of a financial institution and the institution would protect Members in a case like this. The Members who used the cooperative (more properly described), like the account holders of any institution, will have made checks out to religious, charitable and political organizations which they presumed would remain private and protected under their First Amendment and privacy rights.

6. In one of the most important cases decided on this point, a subpoena from one branch of the government to another, the Supreme Court said specifically that the subpoena would have to be drawn as narrowly as possible to meet constitutional scrutiny. See U.S. v. Poindexter, 727 F. Supp. 1501 (D.D.C. 1989) in which the issue was the Court's consideration of a subpoena for documents from former President Reagan. The Court said:

"What is here involved is a clash between two sets of rights * * * the subject is one of both delicacy and difficulty, for significant constitutional and public policy considerations underlie both sets of rights* * *."

"For the constitutional and privacy reasons alluded to above, the Court is not disposed to requiring President Reagan to make wholesale production of documents which ultimately may turn out to contain little or no material evidence." Id., at p. 1510 (emphasis supplied).

Let me return, as this last case has pointed us, to the more important constitutional issues presented to us here.

We are all familiar with the "speech and debate" clause. This provision, case law teaches us, "not only removes every restriction upon freedom of utterance on the floor of the houses by the members thereof * * * but also applies in short, to things generally done in a session of the House by one of its members in relation to the business before it."

See Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 U.S. at pp. 203-204 (1880), cited in The Constitution and What It Means Today, Edward S. Corwin, Princeton University Press, 1948.

In fact, the protections of the speech and debate clause represents the culmination of a long struggle between the Commons and the King. See United State v. Johnson, 383 U.S. 169, 178 (1966); Eastland v. United States Servicemen's Fund, 421 U.S. 491 (1975).

The immunities of the speech and debate clause "were not written into the Constitution simply for the personal or private benefit of Members of Congress, but to protect the integrity of the legislative process by insuring the independence of individual legislators." Cited in United States v. Brewster, 408 U.S. 501, 507 (1972), from Coffin v. Coffin, 4 Mass. 1, 28 (1808).

In fact, on this very important issue of privilege, let me cite this very same Judge Wilkey, using his own words, from his dissent in Nixon v. Sirica, 487 F2d 700, beginning at p. 772:

"The Senate, a Branch of the Government co-equal under our Constitution, decided what would be furnished the court and what retained as confidential, precisely as has the Chief Executive in the case at bar."

"To cite but two of the best known recent examples, similar assertions of Legislative privilege took place with reference to criminal prosecution in United States v. Calley (citations omitted) and United States v. Hoffa (citations omitted). Other similar precedents in both Houses are ancient, numerous, and established beyond question in the Legislative Branch." (citations omitted).

"The principle of separation of powers, with a resulting Judicial privilege, works reciprocally when the demand is made by the Congress instead of to the Congress. In 1953 Mr. Justice Tom Clark refused to respond to a subpoena to appear before the House Un-American Activities Committee, on the ground that the 'complete independence of the Judiciary is necessary to the proper administration of justice.'" (emphasis supplied)

I only wish Judge Wilkey remembered his own words from 1973. This independence cannot be a one way street. If any one of the branches loses its independence, they are each truly diminished.

I also contend that these materials are privileged because they are my documents as a Member of the House of Representatives, not simply because they are "House documents". At the most this "bank" was a cooperative; by using the bank I let them keep, temporarily, some of my records. The bottom line is they are my records and I do not give my permission for anyone to turn them over to another branch of the government.

I could go on and on about the various legal defects in the actions taken by Judge Wilkey. But these arguments only take away from the far more important arguments which the Members of this body must uphold: The duties we perform here are of a public nature and we are responsible to the public, to our electorate. This public accountability is our master and only the public has the right to judge our actions, not an arm of the Administration, the Republicans in this House, not even the media (which since it holds a privileged position under the Constitution itself, should be more aware of and sensitive to the protections the Constitution provides).

Let us not forget the very preamble of the Constitution itself which states specifically that the blessings of liberty for ourselves and our posterity flow from this union, this order, this constitutional structure. When the people created separate legislative and judicial departments of the government, by implication they limited the one from exercising the powers of or over the other. Just as the legislature is forbidden from being judge and jury, this judge or "special prosecutor" is prohibited from interfering with our business.

Let me close with a reminder of the difference between a representative democracy and the monarchy or dictatorships we have rejected:

"When all the powers of sovereignty are exercised by a single person or body, who alone makes laws, determines complaints of their violation, and attends to their execution, the question of a classification of powers can have only a theoretical importance * * *. But inasmuch as a government with all its powers thus concentrated must of necessity be an arbitrary government, in which passion and caprice is as likely to dictate the course of public affairs as a sense of right and justice, it is a maxim in political science that, in order to the recognition and protection of rights, the powers of government must be classified according to their nature, and each class intrusted for exercise to a different department of the government."

"This arrangement gives each department a certain independence, which operates as a restraint upon such action of the others as might encroach on the rights and liberties of the people, and makes it possible to establish and enforce guaranties against attempts at tyranny. We thus have the checks and balances of government, which are supposed to be essential to free institutions."

From Cooley's Constitutional Principles, at p. 44.

I call upon the Speaker of the House, in his capacity as the spokesman for individual Members and their rights, not in his capacity as spokesman for any consensus we reach during our debates on legislation, to just say "no" to Judge Wilkey on my behalf and on the behalf of any other individual Members of this body with a similar request.

I say again, we are dealing with matters of the gravest constitutional importance—principles that date back to Runymede and the Magna Carta—principles that are at the root of free, representative government. We cannot give these principles away, as Judge Wilkey himself has written.

The privileges and immunities of the legislature have always been resented by kings and would-be kings. We are attacked precisely because of our independence. And if we give it away here under a spurious, politically convenient subpoena from a man whose own earlier writings concede the issue (and underlie his error), we are the worst of cowards and we betray our trust as keepers of the Constitution.

ORDER

Upon consideration of the Motion to Quash, the memorandum in support thereof, and the entire record herein, it is this _____ day of _____, 1992,

Ordered and adjudged that the subpoena is hereby quashed.

U.S. District Judge.

THE 201ST ANNIVERSARY OF THE POLISH CONSTITUTION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, May 3, 1992, marks the 201st anniversary of the signing of the Polish Constitution of 1791. It is fitting that on this special day we pause to reflect on Poland's tradition of democratic ideals and her struggle to overcome totalitarianism.

Mr. Speaker, the Polish Constitution, approved in 1791, was extremely significant because it was the first such document of its kind enacted in Europe. The Polish patriots who led that 18th century democracy movement were inspired by America's Founding Fathers, who signed our own Constitution in 1787. And just as George Washington, Benjamin Franklin, Thomas Jefferson, and other American patriots struggled to throw off the yoke of British tyranny, so, too, were the Poles determined to establish liberty and the rule of law in their own country.

Regrettably, the drive to achieve Polish democracy stalled shortly after the signing of the Constitution of 1791. Poland quickly fell victim to the imperial armies of Catherine the Great of Russia. In succeeding decades, Poland suffered repeated occupations and partitions by foreign powers who exploited her resources and people. Hopes for a triumph of democracy in Poland were frustrated for nearly two centuries until the collapse of communism in 1989 paved the way to freedom.

To commemorate Poland's long struggle for freedom, a consortium of over 30 Polish-American organizations in the Chicago area have organized a parade in honor of the Polish Constitution of 1791. The Alliance of Polish Clubs is directing this outstanding event, which has as its theme, "Freedom and Unity." The parade through downtown Chicago will step off at noon Saturday from Dearborn Street and Wacker Drive. Eugene Urbaszewski of Portage Park will serve as Grand Marshal. The parade will feature bands, floats, drum and bugle corps and other attractions. Live television coverage will be provided by channel 7, WLS-TV.

Other Polish Constitution Day events this weekend in Chicago will include a soccer tournament Saturday at Hanson Park and an art exhibit Sunday at the Copernicus Center. In addition, the Polish National Alliance is sponsoring a banquet Sunday at the Chicago Hilton and Towers, 720 South Michigan Avenue at which I shall be in attendance.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud that throughout my 28 years in Congress, I have always supported efforts to help the Poles regain control of their national destiny. Now that Poland is free, it is critical that America continue to assist her efforts to establish a market economy. Millions of Polish workers and their families are suffering as a result of this painful transition, which has exposed weaknesses in state-run industries. Many large factories, including the Gdansk shipyards, are facing bankruptcy, while the Polish people are strapped with 12 percent unemployment and 70 percent inflation.

Poland needs America's help to reorganize her factories and establish efficient systems for banking, communications, and other services. For these reasons, I voted to provide Poland with hundreds of millions of dollars in aid from 1990 to 1992. I expect to support similar aid requests this year, and to this end I have cosponsored H.R. 4738, the Polish Housing Guarantee Act of 1992, which would provide credit guarantees to Poland to help stimulate the economy and give relief in the Polish housing shortage. We must help Poland, if she is to overcome the devastating legacy of over 40 years of communism.

In closing, I would like to offer my best wishes to the people of Poland on the 201st anniversary of the Polish Constitution of 1791, to people of Polish descent all over the world, and especially to those from the 11th Congressional District of Illinois, which I am honored to represent.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

AMERICAN LEGION SPEECH BY KEVIN MERCURE HIGHLIGHTS
SPECIAL NATURE OF U.S. CON-STITUTION

HON. GERALD B.H. SOLOMON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, Kevin Mercure of Hudson Falls, NY, is the son of Tom and Terry Mercure, two very close friends of mine. They're very proud of Kevin, and so am I.

He was the runner-up in Washington County in the recent American Legion Oratorical Contest. With great pleasure, I place his speech in today's RECORD:

SPEECH BY KEVIN MERCURE

At the Constitutional Convention held in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania in 1787 the phrase, "We the People of the United States" applied to little more than the ratifiers of the Constitution. But through two of the most dynamic centuries in world history this phrase has come to include every American citizen. Prior to the writing of the Constitution the United States functioned by the weak Articles of Confederation. The Articles were established in such a way that safeguarded against the rise of a monarch. After all, that is why the Revolution was fought in the first place. Under this government the thirteen "United States" were actually thirteen individual countries. Each state had adopted its own voting qualifications and in some instances these qualifications limited the right to vote to only those that owned property, or to those that subscribed to a certain religion, or only to those that believed in God and Jesus Christ. During the birth of our Constitution almost no one conceived that anyone but sufficiently wealthy white men would be able to elect public officials. Earlier, the Declaration of Independence declared that "all Men are created equal." However, this only meant that people are equal before the law. Qualifications to become a public official in the young states were even more stringent, almost to the point where it was an issue of birthright.

Unfortunately a majority of today's society which has been presented with few voting restrictions as a result of the amendment process chooses to not exercise their greatest privilege and duty. The Voting Right Act of 1965 suspended all literacy tests and similar devices restricting the right to vote. Later amendments to this act forbade the requirement of a citizen to speak English in order to vote. More recent amendments have required states to print bilingual ballots if at least five percent of a district's population speaks a primary language other than English and if a citizen's primary language is not written, as is true with several Native Americans, than it is required that the state provides someone to explain the ballot to them. Even with the lifting of several voting restrictions throughout the past decades there has consistently been only about a fifty percent turn out of the total voting age population and only about a seventy percent turn out of the registered voters in every presidential election since 1928. Of course in years without a presidential election voter turnout has been even lower.

In the original Constitution Article I, Section 3 called for the election of the members of the Senate to be done by State Legislatures. Article II, Section 1 stated that the executive power shall be vested in a President that shall be chosen in a manner directed by the State Legislatures. The members of the federal judicial system were to be appointed by the President, subject to confirmation by the Senate. Pursuant to Article I, Section 2, the only officials in the newly formed government that were to be elected by the People were the members of the less influential House of Representatives. The Framers of the Constitution did not have great confidence in the American people. For example, Alexander Hamilton of New York submitted a plan on June 18, 1787 calling for the most influential bodies in the government, the Senate, the Chief Executive, and the Supreme Judicial Court, to be elected by Electors or by a legislative body. The people would be responsible for electing the members of the less important Assembly. Hamilton's plan was similar in philosophy to the Constitution itself. It was not until April 8, 1913 when the Seventeenth Amendment was ratified that the people were responsible for the election of Senators.

As the Constitution settled into use and certain amendments were adopted, Americans, whom the Farmers never dreamed would be involved in politics, were included in the national political community. On February 3, 1870 the Fifteenth Amendment guaranteed African-Americans (most of whom were newly freed slaves) the right to vote. Although whites were able to keep African-Americans from voting in several southern states, the Fifteenth Amendment was a historic victory in our nation's struggle for civil rights.

As early as the American Revolution when Abigail Adams urged her husband John Adams to "remember the ladies", women have fought to play a full role in American politics. Prior to 1920 the issue of women's suffrage was left to the states. Wyoming became the first state to allow permanent female suffrage in 1869. Wyoming shrewdly gave women the right to vote because the number of voters (not the number of citizens) was used to determine whether a territory could become a state. Several western states followed Wyoming's example. Nonetheless, even in 1919, one year prior to the ratification of the Nineteenth Amendment, only thirty out of the forty-eight states allowed women the right to vote. Finally, on August 18, 1920 the Nineteenth Amendment declared that a citizen's right to vote shall not be denied or abridged on account of sex.

The Twenty-third Amendment which was ratified on March 29, 1961 established the right to vote for residents of the District of Columbia. The Framers could have never envisioned that their seat of government would evolve into one of the ten largest cities in the nation with hundreds of thousands of residents ineligible to vote because they did not live in a state. This amendment is also an excellent example of our Constitution's flexibility. As our nation expands and experiences innovation the Constitution is able to adapt and not become obsolete.

The ratification of the Twenty-fourth Amendment on January 23, 1964 abolished the poll tax. Although African-Americans were given the right to vote several southern states effectively used a poll tax to disenfranchise African-Americans of low economic standing. This amendment once and for all rejected the old doctrine that voting eligibility was based on a citizen's wealth.

On July 1, 1971, the Twenty-sixth Amendment guaranteed suffrage for persons of eighteen years or more. Prior to this amendment the individual states determined the minimum voting age, thus, only four states in the Union had a minimum voting age under twenty-one. At the time of the ratification of the Twenty-sixth Amendment the United States was embroiled in the Vietnam Conflict and Americans that weren't old enough to vote were being drafted into the armed forces. College campuses across the country cried out the popular slogan, "Old enough to fight, old enough to vote."

The people of the United States are no longer discriminated against because of the color of their skin or the God they worship. And no longer are Americans asked to sacrifice their lives in defense of our nation and then told they are not old enough to vote. And no longer are Americans refused the right to vote because they were born of the "wrong" sex. Of course there remains certain necessary voting restrictions. Citizens that have been convicted of certain crimes or have a specified mental condition are not allowed to vote.

Little did the Framers know that their Constitution would be one of the most highly regarded documents in world history. Little did they know that because of its flexibility it would endure two centuries of growth with only twenty-six amendments. Two centuries later, "We the People of the United States" means far more than it did in 1787 and the United States itself is far more than ever a democracy.

SMALL BUSINESSES

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington Report for Wednesday, April 8, 1992, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

SMALL BUSINESSES

Small businesses are the backbone of the American economy. They provide a majority of our new jobs and provide many important technological innovations. They also play a vital role in satisfying the country's need for diversity, choice, and opportunity. For years, small businesses have repeatedly led this country out of troubled economic times and into prosperity. However, the current recession is posing new challenges and threats to the small business community. Congress has a role to play in addressing the challenges facing small firms today.

OVERVIEW

The term "small business" is defined in different ways—based on the number of employees or the amount of revenue generated by the business. By any definition, small businesses represent an important cog in this nation's economic machine. More than 97 percent of U.S. businesses—some 20 million firms—have fewer than 100 employees. These businesses provide three times more jobs than the Fortune 500 companies and ten times more than the federal government. Further, more than half of all new jobs are created by small businesses. Nearly half of this nation's Gross Domestic Product is produced by small businesses.

Small firms contribute products and ideas to all segments of our society. Over the last thirty-five years half of all new product and service innovations have been derived from small companies. Almost all of our large corporations look to small businesses as their suppliers, manufacturers, and distributors. Some three-fourths of future employment in the nation's fastest growing industries is likely to come from small firms.

The recession has hurt thousands of small businesses throughout Indiana and the nation. During the last few years, the failure rate of small business has remained high. Further, small firms, while not as visible as General Motors or IBM, have been forced to cut their payrolls and lay off workers.

ACCESS TO CAPITAL

One of the largest problems facing the small business community today is the lack of capital to start new activities and to modernize facilities and equipment. The rush to re-regulate the troubled thrift industry and the efforts by most banks and thrifts to rebuild their reserves have led to extremely tight credit.

The Federal Reserve's recent cuts in interest rates will help ease the credit crunch. Also, bank regulators have eased some of the restrictions to encourage more lending. One proposal before Congress would create a government sponsored enterprise (GSE) to help establish a national secondary market for private sector loans to small businesses (similar to "Sallie Mae" for student loans), in order to make it easier for small firms to obtain lower cost loans.

HEALTH CARE

Another challenge facing the small business community is the cost of health care. Owners and managers of small firms are facing soaring health care costs, and many are being forced to choose between buying health insurance for their employees, which they would like to do, and keeping the business running. A recent study found that nearly half of all uninsured workers were either self-employed or working in firms with fewer than 25 employees.

Several health care initiatives have been proposed to help the small business community. They include expanding the income tax deduction for health care costs of self-employed persons, providing new tax incentives for individuals and small businesses to purchase private insurance coverage, and allowing small businesses to combine to purchase large group health insurance policies.

REGULATIONS

Government rules and regulations also impact small businesses greatly. The cost per employee of meeting these requirements is nearly three times higher for small firms than large ones. While government regulation can improve workplace safety and the environment, regulatory costs and paperwork burdens can be substantial. A recent study predicts that the regulatory costs for all businesses will increase 25 percent by the year 2000. The Administration is undertaking a review of proposed and existing regulations in order to eliminate those that are burdensome and outdated.

TECHNOLOGY

Recent studies indicate that smaller firms lag behind larger firms in the adoption and development of new technology. In 1982 Congress passed the Small Business Innovation Research Act (SBIR) to increase small business participation in the federal research and development (R&D) procurement process and increase commercial spinoffs from the federal government's billions of R&D dollars. Yet even with the SBIR program, small business' share of federal R&D spending remained relatively unchanged throughout the 1980s, so one proposal is to expand the SBIR program. Another proposal is to set up a federal "manufacturing extension" service, similar to the successful agricultural extension program. The idea would be to assist smaller firms adopt the latest manufacturing technologies.

CONCLUSION

My impression is that while the small business community is a strong lobbying force, it probably can become more effective, it certainly has political access: every congressional district has thousands of small business owners and many of them are community leaders who are plugged into local politics. The task of the small business community is to organize itself and focus its resources and efforts. When small business flexes its political muscle, the results can be impressive. For example, it quickly persuaded Congress to repeal an obscure Internal Revenue Service regulation requiring businesses to keep automobile mileage logs to document tax deduction claims. The problem in the small business community is that its members are so numerous and diverse that it is difficult to find the issues that everyone agrees upon.

Congress should take steps to assist small business, such as adopting meaningful health care reforms and improving small business access to the latest research and technology. Congress should avoid excessive regulation and burdensome paperwork requirements, which add significantly to the cost of doing business, and should avoid repeated overhauls of the tax code, which undermine the ability of business to do long-term planning. Yet my sense is that Congress could best serve the interests of small business by putting the nation's fiscal house in order. Federal budget deficits hurt especially small business by reducing the amount of capital for expansion, keeping real interest rates high, and limiting the ability of consumers to purchase the goods and services from small business.

CONGRESSMAN BILL YOUNG'S PERSISTENCE SAVES LIVES

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to pay tribute to one of our colleagues, my fellow Member from Florida, the Honorable C.W. BILL YOUNG. All of us come to Congress with the hope of making life better for the people of our district and of our country. Congressman YOUNG should take well deserved pride in his accomplishment in the successful creation of National Marrow Donor Program [NMDP]. The registry has facilitated over 1,100 marrow transplants that would have been impossible without the resource provided by NMDP. The precious bone marrow provides hope for those suffering from some 60 blood diseases. Some of these diseases have less than a 1-percent survival rate without matching marrow. The following article in the newsletter of the National Marrow Donor spoke about his efforts:

BILL YOUNG MILITARY DONOR CENTER HONORS PATIENT CRUSADER

The National Marrow Donor Program (NMDP) has become a national treasure because of the generosity of many volunteers and contributors, the sense of urgency of parents and physicians and the vision of a few.

The clear and unwavering vision of Congressman C.W. Bill Young is well known on Capitol Hill. In 1986, Congressman Young told his colleagues that he had watched a little girl die who had no hope of a matched donor. His testimony was instrumental in the Act of Congress which established the NMDP. Since then, the Congressman has continued to inform and challenge his colleagues in Washington and his constituents in St. Petersburg, Florida, never wavering in his belief in the goodness of American volunteers or lessening his advocacy for individuals patients.

To recognize his undaunted efforts, Congress established a military donor center which is named for Bill Young. Congress also appropriated funds to tissue type active military and civilian personnel willing to join the NMDP. The Bill Young Marrow Donor Center (BYMDC) is headquartered in Bethesda, Maryland, but conducts education and recruitment efforts at military bases across the country.

For more information about military marrow donor recruitment, contact the BYMDC at 800-MARROW-3.

Mr. Speaker, I commend Congressman YOUNG's selfless devotion to this neglected cause. When he was told that the goal of 50,000 volunteers was out of the reach—he pressed forward. His faith in American volunteerism has been vindicated by the 520,000 volunteers who have registered thus far. A job well done.

Breen, M.D., chairman of the Department of Obstetrics and Gynecology at Saint Barnabas Medical Center in Livingston, NJ, is receiving the most prestigious honor awarded by the American College of Obstetrics and Gynecology [ACOG] at its 40th annual clinical meeting.

TRIBUTE TO THE 30TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE JOHN F. KENNEDY FEDERATED DEMOCRATIC WOMEN'S CLUB

HON. JAMES A. TRAFICANT, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute to the dedicated women of the John F. Kennedy Federated Democratic Women's Club. This group of hard workers committed to the Democratic Party in my 17th District of Ohio celebrated its 30th anniversary on April 25, 1992.

Thirty years ago when Secretary of State Ted W. Brown gave the group its charter of incorporation, I'm sure he had no idea that the newborn organization would be such a success. The dedicated women of the group, including the original organizer, Ruth Grombacher, the original trustees, Mary Jane VanSuch, Marean Splain and Betty Jane Stanton, and the subsequent three presidents; Ruth Grombacher, Sadie Hoagland, and Delores Cummings led the group through the early years making the operations of the club fine tuned and experienced.

I commend these women in their efforts to enliven their purpose to "promote the cause; to advance the ideas; and to aid and assist the Democratic Party to the best of its members' ability." Mr. Speaker, I applaud the John F. Kennedy Federated Democratic Women's Club as it celebrate its 30th anniversary.

THE UTILITY RATEPAYER REFUND ACT OF 1992

HON. BYRON L. DORGAN

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, when Congress passed the Tax Reform Act of 1986, there was a wrinkle hidden in an obscure section which is preventing utility customers from receiving a timely refund of an estimated $19 billion in excess deferred taxes. Under section 203(e), utilities may normalize the return of this $19 billion, which means that consumers will wait as long as 30 years for a full refund.

Today, Congressman MATSUI and I are introducing the Utility Ratepayer Refund Act of 1992 to repeal section 203(e) of the Internal Revenue Code. As a result, Federal and State regulatory authorities would be able to decide on a case-by-case basis when ratepayers should be refunded the remainder of this $19 billion.

For years the tax laws have allowed utilities—gas, electric, telephone, water—to depreciate plant and equipment over different lengths of time for income tax purposes. Utilities also collect through today's rates Federal income taxes that will not be owed to the Treasury for many years. These are called deferred taxes.

Prior to the Tax Reform Act of 1986 consumers had been paying utility bills based upon the anticipation that utilities would eventually pay Federal income taxes at 46 percent on corporate earnings, but the Tax Reform Act of 1986 reduced the rate from 46 percent to 34 percent. Thus, utilities no longer owe the Federal Government all of the deferred taxes previously collected from consumers. The utilities must return to the consumers about $19 billion in excess taxes paid. And the utilities acknowledge that this money must be returned to the ratepayers, but the utilities want to hold on to this money for as long as possible, and section 203(e) allows them to do just that.

Section 203(e) should be repealed because it is unfair to utility customers and it usurps State regulatory authority. This section makes some customers wait up to 30 years to get the final installment of their refund from a utility company. This is of little comfort to our senior citizens who are on tight budgets.

Generally, this legislation would allow State utility regulators to decide on a case-by-case basis when the $19 billion in excess deferred taxes should go back to the ratepayers. The bill does not mandate any return schedule; it simply leaves it up to the State regulators to decide. After all, it is the State regulators who know best the financial conditions of their State utilities. The State regulators are in the best position to decide how quickly these overpaid taxes should go back to the customers.

Let's get the Federal Government out of an area of regulation in which it does not belong. And this is reasonable legislation needed to untie the hands of the State regulatory authorities and treats consumers fairly. That's why a broad coalition of consumer groups, industrial users, regulatory authorities, and others support this bill. I urge my colleagues to cosponsor the Utility Ratepayer Refund Act of 1992.

TRIBUTE TO JOSEPH DINHOFER

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, it is my honor to pay tribute today to a truly outstanding citizen, Joseph Dinhofer. Mr. Dinhofer, at the age of 93 has been a resident of Miami Beach and a member of the National Association of Letter Carriers [NALC] for over 70 years. He has been a shining example to all of us of the service and dedication that characterizes the American spirit.

Born in June 1898, Mr. Dinhofer has seen America, his community, and the Postal Service grow and flourish by leaps and bounds. He worked in an ammunition factory during World War I and by 1920 he was working at the U.S. Post Office from where he retired in 1957. As an active member of NALC, he was appointed legislative liaison for the 18th Congressional District of Florida in January 1990 at the young age of 91. He has received honors from the National Association of Retired Federal Employees and remains involved with his community as a fund raiser for Muscular Dystrophy, March of Dimes, and the United Jewish Appeal. Mr. Dinhofer has been president and councilman of JVL Barnett, aside from being a very dedicated participant in the Jewish community center meetings. Outside of his accomplishments in his community, Mr. Dinhofer remains active by walking and jogging daily and by being committed to his five sons, one of whom is a PhD physicist.

Mr. Joseph Dinhofer has gladly given much more than his share to our community and America. As a man of true character and with the spirit of a 20-year-old, we know that he will continue to give to our citizenry although he is owed much more than we ever pay back. It is my deep pleasure to bring this man to the attention of the Congress of the United States and the American public.

HOLLAND HOME CELEBRATES CENTENNIAL

HON. PAUL B. HENRY

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, 1992 marks the 100th year of existence for the Holland Home, an outstanding institution providing quality retirement care to the elderly of Grand Rapids. Holland Home is a caring and compassionate ministry tracing its origin to the Third Reformed Church in Grand Rapids and its minister's concern for eight poor widows. Beginning in a single, renovated homestead, Holland Home has become the largest nonprofit retirement facility in the State of Michigan, operating six residences in the Grand Rapids area serving over 900 people. Holland Home now serves churches from 30 different denominations. The steady growth and expansion of the Holland Home is attributed to its strong base of supporters who believe that Christians will encourage and sustain each member of the fellowship of believers. Not only does the Holland Home offer a wide range of services to its residents based on their varied needs, but it extends a continuing care agreement to each resident. This agreement guarantees medical care for all Holland Home residents—regardless of their ability to pay for such care.

The Holland Home began in response to needs that were going unmet and is committed to providing loving care and support to the elderly. Compassion, sensitivity, and constancy are characteristics that formed the foundation on which the Holland Home was built, and are characteristics that have persevered for a century. I am confident that Holland Home will continue to be a leader in meeting the needs of the elderly. Emma Ruiters, a Holland Home resident, wrote a centennial hymn that accurately portrays the mission of the Holland Home: "From humble, small beginnings with dedicated plan to serve God's aging children, the Holland Home began * * * I am proud to highlight the Holland Home as an exemplary institution—creatively and compassionately meeting the needs of the elderly.

Mr. Speaker, please join me in honoring and commending the Holland Home on the occasion of its 100th anniversary.

TRIBUTE TO VFW PRIVATE HENRY OSTENDORF POST 1300 ON THEIR 60TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. JERRY F. COSTELLO

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize the 60th anniversary of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, Private Henry Ostendorf Post 1300 in Granite City, IL. This post of the VFW and the auxiliary will celebrate their 60th anniversary on June 6, 1992.

The Private Henry Ostendorf Post has been dedicated in its service to the community through the past 60 years. Numerous current and former residents of Southwestern Illinois greatly appreciate the activism of this organization.

A VFW post plays a significant role in every community. By bringing recognition to veterans and remembering past conflicts, U.S. citizens learn to respect the history that allows us to live in freedom.

I ask my colleagues to join me as I salute the VFW Private Henry Ostendorf Post 1300 on their 60th anniversary for their contribution to our Nation as well as their exceptional dedication to the community of Southwestern Illinois.

TRIBUTE TO MAJOR GENERAL WILLIAM N. ROWLEY

HON. DANA ROHRBACHER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. ROHRBACHER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a moment to recognize an outstanding patriot and a decorated military officer who has served our country admirably for nearly four decades. America has benefited tremendously by the military and leadership expertise as well as the scientific and aeronautical proficiency of Maj. Gen. William N. Rowley. As the major general begins a new phase of his life with retirement, his contributions will not be forgotten.

William Rowley was commissioned as a second lieutenant through the Air Force Reserve Officer Training Corps Program in 1955 and was called to active duty a year later to serve the 7312th Air Base Squadron in West Germany. After being released from active duty in 1958, Mr. Rowley has served in Air Reserve squadrons from California to Ohio.

With his bachelor's degree in mechanical engineering and a master of science degree in mechanical engineering, William Rowley has worked on fly-by-wire flight control systems and in launch vehicle and program control areas.

As well as being a senior missileman, he holds a civilian single- and multi-engine instrument instructor aeronautical rating and a commercial helicopter rating.

Do not think for a moment that Major General Rowley will sit by idly and watch the world pass by from his porch in Palos Verdes, CA. Major General Rowley will continue to lead the United States into the next century with the company he founded, Rowley International, Inc., a multidisciplinary consulting engineering firm.

I wish to commend Maj. Gen. William Rowley for all his contributions to society. I also extend a big thank you to his lovely wife Ruth Ann and their two children Christopher and Heidi who have given William guidance and inspiration throughout his distinguished career.

TRIBUTE TO CONGRESSMAN WILLIAM S. BROOMFIELD

HON. GUS YATRON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. YATRON. Mr. Speaker, during the district work period one of the finest Members ever to have served in the House, Congressman WILLIAM S. BROOMFIELD, announced his retirement.

Elected to Congress in 1956, BILL BROOMFIELD has represented that great State of Michigan and the Nation with an unparalleled degree of integrity and excellence.

During my tenure in Congress, I have had the honor and privilege of working with BILL on the House Foreign Affairs Committee where he serves as the ranking Republican. He has successfully led his colleagues in resolving some of the most difficult foreign policy dilemmas ever to confront our country.

He has long known the key to success in the conduct of American foreign policy: bipartisanship. When both Congress and the executive branch speak with one voice there is no more powerful advocate of human rights and democracy in the world than the United States. In this connection, BILL BROOMFIELD deserves much of the credit for our success in the international arena.

Over the years, Congressman BROOMFIELD has worked tirelessly to find a solution to the conflict on Cyprus. Should there be a peaceful settlement to the dispute in that country, the people of Cyprus will have BILL BROOMFIELD to thank.

BILL BROOMFIELD is a great American who richly deserves to be called a statesman. I am proud to have served with BILL for all these years and I am even prouder to call him my friend. I know I speak for all my colleagues in wishing BILL the best in his future endeavors. His leadership in Congress will be greatly missed.

IN SUPPORT OF TRI-COUNTIES
OUTREACH NETWORK

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, today I rise in recognition of an outstanding business association in my California congressional district that dedicates itself to the advancement of opportunities for small businesses owned by minorities and women. I am referring to the Tri-Counties Purchasing Outreach Network.

Everyone knows that small business truly is big business. A successful small business community will be the foundation on which any economic recovery will stand. Economic recovery necessitates job-creation, and two-thirds of the new jobs created in America will be created in small businesses. Currently, small businesses contribute 44 percent of all sales in the United States and are responsible for 38 percent of the U.S. GNP.

The Tri-Counties Purchasing Outreach Network bolsters economic growth on a local level by encouraging entrepreneurial spirit. Through sponsoring events such as the Small Business Opportunity Day and Trade Fair at the University of California Santa Barbara on June 16, the Tri-Counties Purchasing Outreach Network offers access to the opportunity for participants to do business with other member companies as well as with government agencies. Last year's Opportunity Day and Trade Fair was very successful, attracting over 80 exhibitors and 300 participants.

On the Federal level, I will continue my record of protecting the interests of small business and promoting economic growth in Congress. However, while I work in Congress to promote an economic environment in which small businesses can flourish, I will also support the efforts of the Tri-Counties Purchasing Outreach Network and its upcoming Small Business Opportunity Day and Trade Fair.

EDWARD G. MCHALE, JR., IS STORY BEHIND SHENENDE-HOWA'S ACADEMIC EXCELLENCE

HON. GERALD B.H. SOLOMON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, we hear a lot about the declining performance of American students. What we don't hear so much about are those schools that not only maintain a high level of excellence, but actually seem to get better every year.

I've got one of them in our 24th New York District, the Shenendehowa Central School of Clifton Park, where awards for excellence have become routine.

When you find an outstanding school system, you usually find that the high standards come from the very top. Such is the case at Shenendehowa, where Edward G. McHale, Jr., has been superintendent of schools since 1985.

Superintendent McHale is retiring this year, but his legacy is such that high academic standards and performance will continue at Shenendehowa for many years.

Mr. McHale is a graduate of SUNY Binghamton and has done extensive postgraduate work at Cornell University and the University of Michigan. After 7 years of experience teaching English and Latin and another year as a guidance counselor, Mr. McHale served 6 years as executive director at Schuyler-Chemung-Tioga BOCES, the State's outstanding vocational education system.

He first came to our area in 1973, as superintendent of the Whitehall school system. In 1979 he accepted the challenge to head the larger Newark Central School District, but he returned to our district in 1985 for what might be the greatest school administration challenge in New York State, Shenendehowa.

He earned this privilege of heading the greatest school system in the State by constantly updating his skills and knowledge, and by establishing a reputation for creative innovation and the expansion of educational opportunities.

During his career he has been singled out for such honors as the U.S. Department of Education Select Seminar on School Restructuring in 1989, and Kettering Foundation Fellowships in 1981, 1982, 1983, 1986, and 1989.

Superintendent McHale is listed in "Who's Who in the East." His memberships include the American Association of School Administrators, the Association for Supervision and Curriculum Development, the New York State Council of School Superintendents, the Association for School, College and University Staffing, and the College of St. Rose Graduate Program Advisory Committee.

He has served as a consultant throughout the area, the State, and the East.

Mr. McHale and his wife are the parents of five adult children and reside in Ballston Lake.

Mr. Speaker, I've spoken on this floor many times about the Shenendehowa school system, either about teacher awards, student achievement awards, or for recognition of the school's outstanding programs. Today, I would ask all Members to join me in paying tribute to one of the individuals responsible, Edward G. McHale, Jr., and to wish him well whatever his retirement plans.

AMERICAN BANKERS' SUCCESS

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to recognize American Bankers, whose intelligent marketing and conservative portfolio management led it to become one of Florida's strongest companies in 1991. The Miami-based insurance company, who last year enjoyed a net income of over $37 million, owes its success to smart investment in real estate and quality bonds. It also gives credit to its 36 percent minority work force. The company was recently in the Miami Herald for its outstanding growth. The article "American Bankers: Conservative Investing Pays Off" tells of its accomplishments:

While much of the insurance industry slogged through recession, American Bankers was posting record financial results in 1991.

How? Smart marketing and conservative portfolio management, the judges said.

The latter was particularly important to the company's success, and to its selection as a finalist in the Florida Company of the Year competition. American Bankers invested in a minimum of troubled real estate and stayed out of junk bonds, opting for investment-quality bonds, they said.

The company's numbers reflect the strategy's success. Net income for 1991 reached a record $37.4 million, or $2.53 cents per share, compared with $27.8 million, or $1.92 per share, in 1990.

Fourth-quarter results were particularly strong. Profits rose 23 percent to $9.8 million, or 66 cents per share, from the same period in 1990.

"They've come through a period of time when no one in the insurance business looks like they are worth a damn," Hille said. "I didn't expect to see that kind of performance."

Mobley said she was impressed with minority participation at American Bankers. Minorities make up about 36 percent of the company's work force, she said.

"The company is a well-kept secret in Florida," added Kraft.

Mr. Speaker, I commend American Bankers and its talented management for its prosperous efforts in becoming a better company. In these difficult economic times, the company's great success is admirable to all in the business world.

IN HONOR OF THE RETIREMENT OF MELVIN P. STRAUS

HON. RONALD D. COLEMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor a good friend to the political world of west Texas and the United States. Dr. Melvin P. Straus has been teaching government and political science at the University of Texas at El Paso—formerly Texas Western College—since 1961. During that time he educated many elected officials, both in his official position as professor at the university and in his more important positions, political advisor and member of the community.

Today, Mr. Chairman, I would like to commemorate Dr. Straus' retirement from the University of Texas at El Paso by speaking of some of his many successful endeavors while becoming a part of the Southwest.

Professionally, Dr. Straus has served the governmental community by testifying before Federal and local government committees and agencies, and publishing book chapters, articles, reviews, and papers. In addition, Dr. Straus has served as a consultant to a large number of attorneys in the preparation of criminal cases and members of the news media throughout the State of Texas.

Dr. Straus also served as a consultant to the spokesperson for the National Action Party in Mexico on problems confronting the political party in Ciudad Juarez and Chihuahua City in 1984 and 1985. He served Of Counsel to an El Paso attorney representing the plaintiff-in-error in Karo versus United States before the U.S. Supreme Court and is believed to be the first layman ever to receive such acknowledgment in the history of the Court. He also served as a member of the board of directors of the El Paso chapter of the American Trial Lawyers Association—the only layman in the United States who held such an office.

He has also been active in the American Civil Liberties Union, serving as president of the Texas ACLU from 1980 to 1990 and the founding chairman of the El Paso chapter.

I got to know Dr. Straus and the principles he stood for when I served as an assistant prosecutor in El Paso County and he testified on the constitutional laws in question on behalf of the defendant. I learned from Dr. Straus how important it is to be committed to the precepts of the U.S. Constitution.

Mr. Speaker, as you can see, time does not allow me to do more than scratch the surface in illustrating Dr. Straus' integrity, leadership, and service to the community. Mr. Speaker, Dr. Straus must be recognized for his commitment to improving the lives of all Americans, and all west Texans. He responds when anyone in the community calls, but I am not certain that he has received the thanks he deserves. That is why, Mr. Speaker, in honor of his retirement from the University of Texas at El Paso, I invite my colleagues to join with me in applauding Dr. Straus for all his years of service and, just as importantly, friendship. However, these accolades do not mean he should expect an easy retirement. The people of west Texas and the United States have relied on his expertise and commitment in the past, and I am certain he will continue to contribute to our community in the future.

TRIBUTE TO PAMELA MILES

HON. JAMES A. TRAFICANT, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, today I rise to pay tribute to a very bright, energetic, and dynamic woman from Youngstown, OH in my 17th Congressional District. Ms. Pamela Miles has made it her life goal to be a leader and participant in combating addiction and crime.

Pamela Miles has recently been chosen "Woman of the Year" by the Truman-Johnson Democratic Woman's Club for her service to the community. It is my wish to honor her today.

Ms. Miles graduated from Kent State University with a major in political science and a minor in psychology in 1975.

Pamela Miles soon began her distinguished career as a broadcaster at WMFJ-TV 21, the local NBC affiliate. She has delivered the news on television and radio ever since while becoming involved in special programs concerning crime and community issues. Her popularity and exposure helped push her week-end show ratings from No. 3 to No. 1. In the past she has focused on such key issues as "Children in Crisis—Problems Faced by Teens; Homosexuality: Is There a Choice; Battered Women; Youngstown Vice—Miami Style."

As if researching, producing, booking and hosting her own television talk show were not enough, Pamela Miles also chairs the local March of Dimes organization and is a Telethon host for the Children's Miracle Network. Ms. Miles lectures at two local universities about women's concerns, and she advises students in the Youngstown City School System.

Her self-described goals are to develop an effective community network for resolving problems, creating a positive and effective image and atmosphere within the workplace. Pamela Miles exemplifies service to our youth and community. She has successfully used the medium of television to address issues and help to educate the Mahoning Valley. She brings to television intellectual discussion about vital problems.

I hope that she finds time in her future to fish and write some poetry, two of her hobbies. She certainly does deserve some free time to reflect on her achievements.

So it is with great pleasure, Mr. Speaker, that I rise here today to honor Pamela Miles, outstanding citizen and "Truman-Johnson Woman of the Year."

TAX FAIRNESS FOR FAMILY FARMERS

HON. BYRON L. DORGAN

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, today Congressman SLATTERY and I are introducing legislation to change a provision in the Tax Code that is unfair to family farmers who retire and sell their farms.

Current law allows taxpayers over the age of 55 to exclude from Federal income tax $125,000 of gain on the sale of their principal residence. That is fair treatment for most urban dwellers who typically benefit from most of that tax exclusion.

But, family farmers are not able to receive much of that benefit because the IRS separates the value of their home from the value of the quarter section of land the home sits on. As people from my State of North Dakota know, houses out on the farmsteads of rural America are more commonly sold for $5,000 to $40,000. Most farmers are plowing their retirement savings into the whole farm rather than into a house that will hold little value at retirement time. And as a result, homes far out in the country are frequently judged by the IRS to have very little value and thus farmers receive much less benefit from this exclusion than others who sell their principal residences in town.

This legislation would redefine current law's tax exclusion to apply to the farm home and the quarter section of land that the home sits on. It's identical to my amendment to the Tax Fairness and Economic Growth Act of 1992 that was passed by Congress early this year, but vetoed by the President. Specifically, the provision will allow a person who is actively engaged in farming, and over 55 years old, to exclude the gain on up to 160 acres of land contiguous to the farm house and the structure thereon.

I believe that this legislation will finally allow retiring farmers the same type of tax exclusion that others have received for decades. And I urge my colleagues to support this proposal to ensure that farmers get a more equitable share of the personal residence tax exclusion.

CHAPLAINCY MINISTRY MARKS 50TH YEAR

HON. PAUL B. HENRY

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, 1992 marks 50 years of chaplaincy ministry supported by the Christian Reformed Church in North America. Fifty years ago, during the Second World War, the Christian Reformed Church of North America quickly responded to an urgent request from the War Department for chaplains to minister to the military. From this request, the chaplaincy program has grown to an effort that places chaplains not only in military settings, but extends its outreach efforts to VA medical centers, hospitals and prisons, business and industry, counselling centers, centers for the developmentally disabled, and centers for the rehabilitation of drug abusers.

Chaplaincy service is based on the belief that Christians are commanded to serve the brokenhearted, orphaned, sick, oppressed, and imprisoned. The Christian Reformed Church, through its chaplains, proclaims Christ's presence in a broken world. In the name of Christ, chaplains minister to persons in this world because these individuals belong to God and bear His image. Chaplains provide a caring human environment in settings that are often lonely, unpleasant, or dehumanizing.

I have great admiration for the chaplaincy mission of the Christian Reformed Church. Each of us, as individuals in our daily lives, would do well to adopt the chaplains' statement of mission: "To bring the Lord's comfort, compassion and hope to people who suffer and seek direction." The Christian Reformed Church Chaplain Committee enables this vital ministry to take place in Canada and the United States, and I ask you, Mr. Speaker and colleagues, to join me on the occasion of its 50th anniversary in commending the chaplaincy ministry for the outstanding and much needed humanitarian service this ministry provides.

TRIBUTE TO JOHNNY SCOTT

HON. JERRY F. COSTELLO

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I rise today and ask my colleagues' attention as I pay tribute to Mr. Johnny Scott, the president of the East St. Louis, IL, chapter of the NAACP.

The Urban League of Metropolitan St. Louis has recognized Mr. Scott as a leader of the community and has presented him with an award of merit. It is indeed fitting that he be honored for his activism.

As President of the NAACP chapter in East St. Louis, a city in my congressional district, Mr. Scott has worked very hard and has dedicated himself to the improvement of race relations. His concern for the poor and disenfranchised has enabled him to make a distinct difference in the lives of many residents of southwestern Illinois.

Because of Mr. Scott's collaboration with numerous local, county, and other officials, the economic outlook for East St. Louis is improving. As a community leader, Mr. Scott acknowledges the need for increased economic development to create opportunity for the city's residents.

I ask my colleagues to join me in commending Mr. Johnny Scott for the positive role he plays in striving for equal opportunity and improved relations between all people.

CONGRESSIONAL CASEWORK

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington Report for Wednesday, April 15, 1992 into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

CONGRESSIONAL CASEWORK

Last year, a resident of the Ninth District, an older man who requires kidney dialysis, discovered that he would no longer be receiving medicare because the Social Security Administration thought he was dead. Like many residents of southern Indiana who have problems dealing with the federal bureaucracy, this man contacted my district office and asked for help. Without difficulty he convinced my staff that he was indeed alive, and we in turn convinced the Social Security Administration to resume sending him benefits. Although Members of Congress are often criticized for providing constituent services, also called casework, this example shows why these activities are a vital aspect of representation.

Background: There are two forms of casework—individual and community. Individual casework refers to assistance provided to individual citizens. For example, congressional offices regularly help constituents deal with the U.S. Postal Service, the Veterans Administration, the Department of Agriculture, the Social Security Administration, and other federal, state, and local agencies. The kinds of cases handled will range from people who do not receive their disability or veterans checks to farmers needing assistance in securing a loan when their crops have been damaged by flooding.

Other casework efforts assist entire communities. Many congressional offices fulfill a liaison function between the federal bureaucracy and local governments concerned about water, sewers, airports, highways, and housing. Members of Congress regularly support towns, cities, and non-profit organizations that are seeking federal grants and assistance. My staff and I periodically contact local government officials, asking if they are experiencing any difficulties with Washington.

The Process: Requests for casework come to me by letter, by phone, and by personal contacts with constituents. My staff and I will then contact the relevant agency or executive department, asking that the constituent's problem be given full consideration. After the agency has acted on a request, the constituent is usually informed about the outcome and provided with information about appeal rights if there are any, as well as alternative opportunities for assistance. Often, these alternatives do not provide what the constituent originally desired, but they may address the underlying need. For instance, an impoverished constituent with a dependent child, denied social security benefits, may be eligible for some other program.

I receive approximately 80 new requests for help each week, although that number will vary depending on the time of the year and the state of the economy. For some reason, requests tend to decrease in quantity as the weather gets warmer. And the number of people asking for help can rise significantly during a recession. The potential volume of casework is unlimited.

Some may view casework requests from Members of Congress as attempts by legislators to secure for their constituents benefits they do not deserve. My view is that the emphasis should be as much on providing information and facilitating communication between constituents and the bureaucracy as it is on securing benefits. Constituents should receive exactly what they deserve under the law and public policy—no more and no less.

Benefits: Casework is important, first, because individual citizens need help in dealing with the federal bureaucracy. As the size of the government has increased, so has its impact on the daily lives of individual Americans. It is amazing the number of ways that government now affects citizens—both favorably and unfavorably. Many of the cases brought to my attention are severe. Families might lack food, housing, medical care—people in desperate situations who feel they have no other place to go. It is one tough case after another. Many people lack an understanding of federal programs, and do not apply for benefits for which they are eligible. Casework is crucial because it addresses the real needs of people.

Second, members of the bureaucracy can make mistakes. For instance, it is fairly common for people in the Ninth District to be treated by more than one physician, with one located in southern Indiana and another practicing in Kentucky. As a result, some of these people end up paying twice for the deductible on their medicare benefits. My office can straighten that out for them. Also, files are lost or misplaced in even the most efficient bureaucracy. Casework helps reduce the frustration people feel toward what appears to be a massive, impersonal government.

Third, constituent service cannot be separated from legislative work. Often the anecdotes provided by constituents alert Congress to limitations in a law. For example, a woman recently asked for my assistance in securing benefits from the Social Security Administration for her grandson. The child's mother is deceased, and his father is in prison. But because the father refuses to allow the grandmother to adopt the boy, she is ineligible for additional disability benefits to care for the child. Clearly, existing policy does not adequately address this woman's concerns and should be changed to do so. A number of programs, ranging from veterans benefits to regulatory policy, have been amended by Congress because of problems first brought to our attention by individual constituents asking for help.

One reason why Members of Congress can be particularly effective spokesmen for their constituents is that the electoral stakes are high. When constituents feel their cases are given sympathetic consideration by their Member of Congress, they are likely to support that individual. Members of this bureaucracy may have less to gain from efficiently processing a request for help.

Constituent service is tough work for Members of Congress. It is an unrelenting demand on our time. When you listen to people talk about their problems for two or three hours at a time, those are hard hours. But in many ways, casework is the most rewarding part of the job. Passing legislation usually requires compromise. It can take years. With casework, Members of Congress can see the impact of their work on the daily lives of individual citizens. We can see that our efforts do make a difference.

TRIBUTE TO JAMES W. CLEARY

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I rise to acknowledge the retirement of James W. Cleary, president, California State University, Northridge. On June 30, 1992, Dr. Cleary will retire as president of California State University, after 23 years of outstanding service.

Dr. Cleary was born on April 16, 1927, in Milwaukee, WI. He served in the U.S. Army for 3 years from 1945 to 1947. In 1950 he received his Ph.B. from Marquette University. A year later he received his A.M. In 1956 he then successfully completed his Ph.D from the University of Wisconsin.

James started his career in the teaching field by becoming a university fellow in 1954. Between the years of 1954 and 1969, he achieved such assignments as a teaching assistant, instructor, assistant professor, associate professor, and professor: Department of Speech, University of Wisconsin.

In addition to his teaching positions, Dr. Cleary has also served as a member of various advisory groups, he has received many special awards, and has written numerous publications.

Dr. Cleary is happily married to Mary Augustyne and is the father of Colleen, Patricia, and Janet. I ask my colleagues to join me in congratulating James on this joyous occasion of his retirement as president of California State University, Northridge, where his impeccable accomplishments and years of dedicated service will never be forgotten.

BEN PASHLEY OF CHARLTON, NY HAS BEEN A FIREMAN LONGER THAN ANYONE IN AMERICA

HON. GERALD B.H. SOLOMON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, I'd like to tell you all about one of the most extraordinary people in my district, or in America, for that matter.

His name is Ben Pashley of Charlton, NY, and he's 97 years old. There are plenty of 97-year-olds, I'll admit. But how many of them are still active firemen?

Ben Pashley has been a volunteer fireman with the Charlton No. 1 Fire Department for 70 years, longer than anyone in America has been a fireman. It's understandable that because of his age he has restricted his involvement these last few years to directing traffic at the sites of fires, but his dedication remains as strong as ever.

He was a fireman when all his company had was a water tank on top of a Model-T Ford. At fires, they poured baking soda into the tank, which created enough pressure to force the water out. If that isn't typical American ingenuity, I don't know what is.

Things have changed since then, but some things never change. In many of our rural areas, like the one I represent, volunteer firemen offer the only available fire protection. In the State of New York alone, they save countless lives and billions of dollars in property equipment.

Ben Pashley has been a part of that tradition for 70 years. The younger men in the department all look up to him, and his entire community is proud of him.

And as a long-time volunteer fireman myself, so am I.

That's why, Mr. Speaker, I ask you and other Members to join with me in paying tribute to Ben Pashley, a great American for every one of his 97 years. May he enjoy many more in good health.

JOSE MARTI YMCA PROVIDES EXERCISE FOR THE MIND AS WELL AS THE BODY

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to recognize the efforts of executive director Mr. Jose Pinera and the rest of his staff at the International Jose Marti YMCA for their participation in the writer's voice project. As one of six national sites, the International Jose Marti YMCA has hosted lectures by novelist and film critic Guillermo Cabrera Infante and poet Angel Cuadra. The significance and scope of the project was described in the following recent Miami Herald article, "New Challenge for YMCA: Becoming Literary Center":

NEW CHALLENGE FOR YMCA: BECOMING LITERARY CENTER
(By Marilyn Garateix)

Since October, the International Jose Marti YMCA in Little Havana has been trying to send a message to the community: The Y is a literary center too.

"We're still building our reputation," said Jose Piñera, executive director of the Jose Marti Y, 450 SW 16th Ave.

The branch, closed for renovations and expansion, should reopen by April in time to host four lectures and readings of the National Writer's Voice Project.

For now, events are being held elsewhere throughout the community. The next one, featuring four Caribbean authors who will talk about their work, is Tuesday at the G.W. Carver YMCA.

Last June, the National Writer's Voice Project, chaired by author E.L. Doctorow, chose the Jose Marti YMCA branch as one of six literary centers nationwide. The other centers are in Arizona, Kentucky, Montana, New York, and Missouri.

The project is funded by a six-year, $2.75 million grant from the Lila Wallace-Reader's Digest Fund to the YMCAs of the nation.

There has been low turnout at several of the events already held, but YMCA officials hope things will improve. Piñera said.

"It's our first year," he said. "It is a matter of opening the eyes of the public to attend these programs. The community will benefit greatly from this."

Miami's Writer's Voice Project kicked off in October with Cuban novelist and film critic Guillermo Cabrera Infante. Cuban poet Angel Cuadra appeared in December.

Last Tuesday, children's writer Walter Dean Myers appeared at the African Heritage Cultural Center as part of the guest lecture series.

Also part of Writer's Voice: workshops with students to help them acquire interviewing skills. Students at the Little Havana Institute, an alternative school, videotaped the life stories of several elderly residents.

"One of them was in his 90s and he remembers things that happened to him when he was 10," said Principal Martha Young. "The students were amazed because they don't remember things that happened to them two months ago."

The students eagerly listened to what the seniors, many who were born in Cuba, had to say, Young said.

"Some of them were bringing up political topics," she said. "If the kids were listening to us talk about the topics, they wouldn't be interested."

Piñera hopes the life stories, and other Writer's Voice projects, will help people look at the International Jose Marti YMCA in a new way.

"It's more than just fitness," he said. "It's body, mind and spirit."

Mr. Speaker, I commend the work of the International Jose Marti YMCA for expanding the intellectual frontiers of our youth and I wish them every success.

LONG BEACH NAVAL SHIPYARD—BEST IN THE NAVY

HON. DANA ROHRBACHER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. ROHRBACHER. Mr. Speaker, I have just received the net operating results [NOR] for the eight naval shipyards. Again Long Beach Naval Shipyard in my district is the best in the Navy.

Net operating results are like a baseball team's won/lost record. It is the Navy's way of measuring whether a public shipyard is under or over budget.

There are eight U.S. Navy shipyards. In fiscal year 1991 only three shipyards had net operating results in the black under budget.

Long Beach Naval Shipyard saved the taxpayers $16,782,000 in fiscal year 1991—the savings were actually $20,745,963 if you exclude the extraordinary expenses. The only other yards in the black were Mare Island—$1,187,000 in savings—and Philadelphia—$239,000 in savings. The other five naval shipyards had losses. Four of those had losses exceeding $46,000,000 each.

The fact that some yards had such huge losses shows what a superb accomplishment the $16,782,000 in savings by Long Beach is.

Mr. Speaker, this is the third year in a row that Long Beach Naval Shipyard has led the Navy as the most cost effective shipyard in the Navy. The net operating results, excluding extraordinary expenses, show that Long Beach saved the taxpayers $23,201,659 in fiscal year 1989, $22,308,340 in fiscal year 1990—excluding an inventory writeoff of almost $25,000,000—and $20,745,963 in fiscal year 1991. That is a grand total of $66,255,962 in savings to the American taxpayer.

Great job, Long Beach.

I call this record to the attention of Navy Secretary Garrett. Recently I and 10 of our colleagues wrote the Secretary asking him to implement a regulation change so that Long Beach Naval Shipyard can be included in homeport bidding for ship repairs on ships homeported in San Diego as well as Long Beach.

Mr. Secretary: Make the necessary regulation change now—it will save the taxpayers a bundle if Long Beach can do some of this work.

THE 175TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE NEW YORK SCHOOL FOR THE DEAF

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, on April 21, 1992, I was privileged to attend a celebration at Peet Hall auditorium of the New York School for the Deaf in White Plains, NY, commemorating the 175th anniversary of the establishment of that school for the deaf.

The New York School for the Deaf was established by a chapter signed by New York Governor Dewitt Clinton on April 15, 1817 as the first special educational facility in New York State. The school's commitment to bringing education to the hearing-impaired began with its founder, Rev. Dr. John Stanford, who was moved to open the school when he discovered six deaf children living in the city almshouse behind New York City Hall and receiving no education. Reverend Stanford began teaching the children in 1808, becoming the first American to teach deaf children.

The original facility operated out of the Almshouse, where classes were taught by Rev. Abraham Stansbury. The first permanent location for the school was established in 1829 on 50th Street between 4th and 5th Avenues, on the sites of what are now St. Patrick's Cathedral and Saks Fifth Avenue. In 1856, the school was moved to Carmanville, now known as Washington Heights, on the site currently occupied by Columbia Presbyterian Hospital. At that time the location, on an estate owned by Col. James Monroe, a cousin of our fifth President, was known as Fanwood.

Fanwood became an important center for the education of the hearing-impaired during the 61 years, 1831–92, that the school was run by Dr. Harvey Prindle Peet and his son, Dr. Isaac Lewis Peet. Under their leadership, the school hosted the first Convention of American Instructors of the Deaf and the first International Congress for the Deaf. One hundred years ago, the school's 75th anniversary celebration was attended by such notables as Helen Keller, Dr. Alexander Graham Bell, and Dr. E.M. Gallaudet.

The current location of the School for the Deaf in White Plains goes back to 1938. Over the last two decades, the school's role has expanded to include a total communication philosophy, a BOCES, basic occupational education program, an alternate high school program accredited by the Board of Regents, a National Honor Society chapter, computer courses, comprehensive birth to employment services, and infant-parent education. I have been informed that over the last 175 years, 12,000 students ranging in age from infancy to 21 have passed through the doors of this institution at its various locations, drawing strength and wisdom from the school's committed and compassionate staff, whose mission is to educate and nurture deaf students to allow them to reach their maximum potential. The academic and vocational training provided by the school gives hearing-impaired students a chance to lead productive and fulfilling lives.

I commend the staff and students of the New York School for the Deaf, and I am pleased to inform our colleagues about the significant work of the New York School for the Deaf. This is an institution that has truly made a difference in the lives of thousands of Americans. I invite my colleagues to join in congratulating and wishing the staff of the school and its current headmaster, Thomas F. Colasuonno, PhD, the very best wishes in continuing their significant work in providing this invaluable service.

TRIBUTE TO REV. ANDREW L.
FOSTER, JR.

HON. FRANK PALLONE, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. PALLONE. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, May 2, 1992, the Reverend Andrew L. Foster, Jr., will celebrate his 10th anniversary as pastor of the Shrewsbury Avenue African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church in Red Bank, NJ.

In his 10 years as Shrewsbury AME Zion Church, Reverend Foster has overseen impressive growth in the congregation. In addition, Reverend Foster has emerged as one of the most prominent and dedicated leaders in the community. There is hardly an issue of importance to the greater Red Bank area, and, indeed, to the entire Monmouth County community, where the positive contributions of Reverend Foster have not been felt.

Reverend Foster is a native of Philadelphia, and served in both his home city and in Greensboro, NC, prior to his arrival in Red Bank. He holds degrees from Antioch University, Hood Seminary in North Carolina, and Drew University in New Jersey. He is currently a Ph.D. candidate at Drew, and was listed in 1992's "Who's Who in Religion."

In the 10 years that Reverend Foster has been pastor, the congregation at Shrewsbury AME Zion has grown to 350 strong while the church has added a major addition to its facility. The church has truly emerged as a hub of the African-American community, coordinating a wide range of activities ranging from educational support services to programs dealing with AIDS. The reverend works closely with the Red Bank NAACP chapter, and currently serves as vice president of the West Side Ministerium. He is a board member of the Monmouth County Arts Council, the County Fair Housing Board, the Salvation Army in Fair Haven, NJ, and is a leading member of the National Conference of Christians and Jews.

Reverend Foster and his wife Bobbi have five sons and two daughters, eight grandsons and one granddaughter. In addition, reverend and Mrs. Foster have been adopted by countless children from the church community to whom they are a constant source of inspiration, leadership, and strength.

CONGRESS AND POLITICS

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington Report for Wednesday, April 22, 1992, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

CONGRESS AND POLITICS

The healthy skepticism about the American political system that has always been a characteristic of our system has given way to a corrosive cynicism that threatens to undermine American politics and representative government.

SYSTEM NOT WORKING WELL

People increasingly doubt that our political system works. They think that the problems that concern them the most are just not being solved. They think politicians do not have the courage to do the right thing, are too heavily obligated to interest groups, are too partisan, and will do almost anything to get elected and stay elected. Ordinary citizens think there is a very wide gulf between them and their representatives.

It probably comes as a surprise to them that Members of Congress are as deeply disturbed about the performance of Congress in the current political environment as they are. Members understand the deep worries of their constituents about jobs, health care, housing, and education, and their fears that the nation's preeminence is slipping away. Members understand that voters are deeply concerned that events seem to be drifting out of control and that voters put much of the responsibility on Congress.

DIALOGUE OF DEMOCRACY

Most elected representatives believe that the dialogue between themselves and citizens has to be improved. The problem is not so much the frequency or the volume of the communication, but its quality. The dialogue is not as in depth and honest as it should be.

I think politicians are unwilling to be as blunt and candid as they should be in discussing the seriousness and magnitude of problems because they believe that they will be politically punished if they are totally honest. And for their part, citizens are sometimes not as candid as they should be, pressing for benefits as special interests and not taking the perspective of the public good, latching on to a small part of the national agenda, and failing to acknowledge that solutions to complex problems may not be clear cut. For our political system to function better, the dialogue has to be more complete and candid than it has been. I am increasingly impressed by Jefferson's statement that the art of government is the art of being honest.

LIMITATIONS OF CONGRESS

Most voters do not realize that the job of Congress is to build a consensus behind a solution, and that its work will never be neat and tidy or characterized by speed and efficiency. It is a very large and diverse body, reflecting deep divisions in the country, and reaching a consensus on controversial issues does not come easily. Americans like quick results and they seldom find that quality in Congress. They have expectations that government can act much more quickly and decisively than it is able to do.

Most Members agree that Congress acts best and most productively when it is responding to strong presidential leadership. On occasion Congress initiates, but more frequently it reacts to presidential proposals. It is much easier for the President to put forward a national vision than Congress.

RESPONSIVENESS

Voters often say to me that Members of Congress are not in touch with the American people. Frequently that is true, but it is also true that on occasion Members are excessively responsive to their constituencies. Most Members of Congress are good politicians. They continuously check public opinion through one means or another and they are generally keenly aware of how people in their districts think on most matters. They certainly know which votes are likely to offend or upset their constituents.

Members of Congress are generally very accessible to groups and individuals in their district but, unfortunately, they are even more sensitive to those who contribute to their campaigns. Members recognize that special interest groups have made it difficult for Congress to do its work, but because of the expense of campaigning, Members have become less dependent on their political parties and on individuals and more dependent on interest groups for funding. Contributions do not bribe Members and do not guarantee a vote in a particular way, but money does play a disproportionate role in American politics and permits access to members at important times when decisions are being made.

HARD CHOICES

In today's political climate it is very difficult for Members of Congress to prescribe strong medicine for solutions that will cause the public pain. Politicians often comment that there is little compelling evidence that voters are ready to confront hard choices. To their mind, voters often support cuts in benefits and programs just so long as their programs and benefits remain intact, and are prepared to see sacrifices made to meet urgent national goals but do not want to be personally burdened. Some feel that voters, like politicians, seem to want all gain and no pain. Yet my sense is that this view may be underestimating the public's capacity to deal with difficult choices.

STAYING INFORMED

There is no substitute for informed voters. It is very refreshing to me to go to a public meeting and find citizens who have studied issues carefully and are very well informed, even though I may not always agree with them.

Yet keeping informed about the major issues of the day is difficult, and I can readily understand why people get discouraged. The quantity of information is immense and the quality varies enormously. Most of us in Congress think that, with a few exceptions, the news media does not cover Congress very well. It tends to focus on the White House, and for Congress often emphasizes personalities and differences and does not present the complexity and the subtleties of issues. It frequently focuses on the extremes and ignores the broad middle that is necessary for consensus-building.

CONCLUSION

Members of Congress recognize that Congress itself has to be fundamentally reformed if it is to do a better job with the nation's business. The number of congressional committees and subcommittees has to be reduced, committee jurisdictions changed, the budget process simplified, and the power of congressional leaders strengthened in order to make the institution more efficient and accountable. Almost all Members of Congress express support for campaign reform.

Restoring confidence in the political system is a formidable task. It will require fundamental changes in attitudes and habits for the voter, the news media, organized interest groups, and certainly politicians themselves. The focus must be on the public good. We all share a responsibility for the success or failure of government. We are all a part of self-government.

LUIS CARRANZA: A DIFFERENT KIND OF CPA

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN Mr. Speaker, I would like to recognize Luis Carranza, a CPA and the managing partner at Campos & Stratis, an accounting firm which specializes in forensic auditing and the quantifying and verifying of losses for insurance claims. As auditors, Mr. Carranza and his team of accountants must testify as expert witnesses for bankruptcy and insurance claim cases. They become private investigators of insurance mysteries. Mr. Carranza was recently featured in the Miami Herald for his company's unique style of accounting. The article "Gumshoe Accountant Specializes in Solving Insurance Mysteries" follows:

In the midst of a recession, the staff of six at the Miami office of Campos & Stratis is generally overworked.

According to managing partner Luis Carranza, during downturns in the economy, there are more burglaries, bankruptcies and insurance claims. And that suits him just fine.

Campos & Stratis isn't your typical certified public accounting firm. It specializes in forensic auditing and the quantifying and verifying of losses for insurance claims. In essence, they're CPAs doing the work of private investigators.

"We don't do normal accounting," Carranza said. "We're CPAs because we're auditors and must testify as expert witnesses in court."

Carranza, 36, who graduated with a business degree from the University of Miami, says the work is more exciting than filing people's tax forms.

Carranza joined the accounting firm of Ernst & Whinney in San Juan, Puerto Rico, right after college and remained there until 1982. While there, he became familiar with forensic auditing, decided it was for him, and hooked up with Matson Driscoll & Damico, a competitor of Campos & Stratis.

By the end of 1987, seeking greener pastures and a path back to Miami, Carranza contacted New Jersey-based Campos & Stratis. Soon after, he helped the company open a San Juan office. Carranza remained there until January, when Campos & Stratis opened its Miami office.

"What we needed was the right person in there [Miami]," said Chris Campos, the company's senior founding partner. "We didn't transfer Luis sooner because we had to wait for the San Juan position to be filled. But he has always wanted to be in Miami."

Campos & Stratis now has 24 offices throughout the United States as well as offices in London, Paris, Australia and Canada. There are plans for additional expansion, Campos said.

Formed in 1933, the firm was originally called Johnson Atwater & Co. Eventually Chris Campos and Elia Stratis took over for Johnson and Atwater. Stratis was killed in 1988 on Pan American World Airways Flight 103, which blew up over Lockerbie, Scotland. Today, Campos, 62, runs the company from his Teaneck, N.J., office.

Carranza said the Miami office is intended to serve as a gateway to the Caribbean and South America. Already, he said, American interests have hired the company for work in South America.

Returning to Miami, his home, was important to Carranza.

"I'm happy with the way things are going," he said. "We're going to continue to develop the South Florida and Caribbean basin and I can't see beyond that."

Mr. Speaker, I commend Luis Carranza and Campos & Stratis for their outstanding efforts to grow as a different kind of accounting firm. In these difficult economic times, their work as forensic auditors is cut out for them.

IN HONOR OF FIRE AND EMERGENCY SERVICES PERSONNEL IN EL PASO, TX

HON. RONALD D. COLEMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I rise to honor the men and women of the fire and emergency services in El Paso, TX today, the day of the fourth annual National Fire and Emergency Services Dinner.

The fire and emergency services personnel in El Paso must be recognized for their efforts in protecting the lives and property of thousands of west Texans every year.

The El Paso Fire Department employs a total of 543 firefighters and civilians staffing 26 stations that serve 249.5 square miles of the desert southwest. Working with only 30 fire engines who have been on the streets an average of 9.3 years, the firefighters can respond to emergencies within 4.3 minutes.

In 1991, the fire department responded to a total of 44,598 calls, which averages to 1 call every 11.78 minutes. Included in that total was 30,283 emergency medical responses; 4,566 fire calls; 1,218 hazardous materials incidents; and 8,531 miscellaneous responses such as providing assistance to police officers, bomb scares, and rescuing animals.

Similarly, the El Paso Department of Emergency Medical Services also provides services above the call of duty. Ninety-six emergency medical technicians [EMT] and 12 communications officers were able to respond to 37,900 runs in 1991 within an average of 6.4 minutes.

From 11 stations, including one located at the El Paso International Airport, the EMT's participate in a number of other community programs which benefit the entire community, including: medical management of hazardous materials; the coordination of the city of El Paso combined search and rescue team—formerly the mountain rescue team—which provides search and rescue for persons lost in the desert or on the mountain located in the center of the city; cooperative efforts with EMT's in Ciudad Juarez, Mexico; and establishment and staffing of an adolescent DWI and occupant restraint program.

Due in part to these efforts, the department was named the top Texas Association of Emergency Medical Technicians Advance Life Support Agency in 1991, an award that is well deserved.

In addition to these two local community-funded departments, I would also like to show my support for the 507th MAST unit at Fort Bliss, TX, which also acts as a first responder to medical emergencies throughout the west Texas-southern New Mexico region.

Mr. Chairman, I ask all my colleagues in this House to join with me to honor all the firefighters and emergency medical technicians who have worked hard to save the lives of thousands of west Texans and southern New Mexicans through the years. I would also like to thank them in advance for their efforts in the future.

CLEAN FUELS INFRASTRUCTURE AND INCENTIVES ACT

HON. DEAN A. GALLO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. GALLO. Mr. Speaker, today, I rise to introduce legislation to establish a 3-year grant program for States and qualified private businesses to develop clean fuels distribution outlets in areas with severe ozone problems under the Clean Air Act.

When Congress passed the Clean Air Act we required all fleet vehicle operators and States with severe ozone problems to promote the use of cleaner burning fuels, but where in northern New Jersey would you go to buy such fuels? We can't expect people to comply with the law when no one is selling fuels of this type to the public.

My bill creates a pilot program giving incentives to States or private individuals to build the facilities needed to provide these fuels to the public at a competitive cost.

This legislation called the Clean Fuels Infrastructure and Incentives Act of 1992 combines environmental protection with sound energy policy in a way that is also progrowth. States like New Jersey are going to have a tough time meeting Clean Air Act requirements, unless we take aggressive action now to promote cleaner fuels. We cannot afford to do nothing.

This bill does not create another Federal mandate. Instead, it allows States and individuals to use their expertise to meet the requirements. It provides resources, not mandates. We need to emphasize the importance of alternative fuels as part of our goal of energy independence.

As Congress once again takes up the question of national energy policy, we must reduce our dependence on foreign energy sources with cleaner, domestic alternatives.

My conversion initiative creates a partnership between government and the private sector to promote energy efficiency and cleaner air. This bill will be good for the environment and good for the U.S. economy.

The time has come for the United States to become more energy efficient as a Nation if we hope to remain competitive in the international marketplace. In order to continue to be successful and to protect American jobs in the future, we must invest in environmentally safe domestic energy technologies today.

An energy policy is needed that puts the emphasis on innovation and new technology, if we are going to be successful as a Nation in the next century.

In the all to recent future we were reminded by the gulf war that we are slipping back into a situation where we depend too heavily on foreign oil. Right now, 42 percent of our energy supply comes from foreign sources and if we do nothing, that level will increase to 65 percent by the year 2010.

This year, Congress is considering an energy policy bill that will set the tone for the future and as a member of the Energy and Water Development Subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee, I have been fighting for continuation of some critical research projects in solar and fusion energy which hold great promise for the future. However, we need to do more.

We must promote innovation in the private sector and more realistic government regulations to get the job done. If we cooperate, we can ensure dependable sources of clean energy for the foreseeable future and rebuild our economy at the same time.

TRIBUTE TO BASEBALL OLDTIMERS ASSOCIATION

HON. JAMES A. TRAFICANT, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to the Greater Youngstown Baseball Oldtimers Association which is celebrating its 30th anniversary Hall of Fame banquet. This collection of athletes drawn at an early age to the field of dreams has not lost the fire for America's pastime.

Every year the association holds spring try-outs, schedules games, and holds season-ending banquets. The members all played semipro and local minor league ball during their youths. Today, most volunteer their time or energy to local Little Leagues.

This year, the Baseball Oldtimers Association inducts 11 new members at its annual banquet on May 6. They are: Bill Melago, Nick Gratiotto, Donald Labruzzo, Andrew Hvizdak, Jack Moran, John Stanko, Steve Babich, Raul Hernandez, Joe Stacey, Joe Hvizdak, and George Petrus. Each of these men holds stories of great games, batting power and finesse, and fielding prowess.

The Philadelphia Athletics offered Andrew Hvizdak a contract but he declined. Jack Moran tried out for the Chicago Cubs around the time that Nick Gratiotto tried out for the Pittsburgh Pirates. Joe Stacey's fast rising career with the Detroit Tigers ended in the minors when he injured his knee. Donald Labruzzo served as a manager around the country for various minor league teams. Raul Hernandez, a physician, is instrumental in bringing class AA World Series to Youngstown. John Stanko, George Petrus, Steve Babich, and John Hvizdak all made their marks on the local diamonds with their play and help. Finally, Bill Melago is known as the King of the Realm, leading his Jednota teams to three national titles.

As you can see, Mr. Speaker, each of these men was a legend in the Mahoning Valley baseball circles. The Baseball Oldtimer's Association's inductees truly cherish the game of baseball.

Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to rise here today to honor these great citizens and athletes. I hope that they are able to play often this summer into the cool Ohio dusk.

RADIOVISION'S 12TH ANNUAL VOLUNTEER RECOGNITION DAY

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, May 2, 1992, Radiovision, a closed circuit radio broadcasting service for our blind and sight impaired in the Hudson Valley region of New York will be celebrating its 12th annual "Volunteer Recognition Day" at the Ramapo Catskill library system headquarters in Middletown, NY. This celebration is part of national volunteer week, which runs from April 26 through May 2.

Radiovision is truly one of the most impressive organizations in my 22d Congressional District of New York. It is composed entirely of volunteers who read local news, topical literature, shopping hints, and other vital information that is unavailable through the mass media to the legally blind and others who possess disabilities that make it difficult or impossible to hold or read a newspaper, book, or magazine. Radiovision gives these people access to valuable information that would otherwise be denied to them.

Radiovision's director, Daniel Hulse, and volunteer coordinator, Carol Cleveland, have done a tremendous job throughout the past 12 years of keeping blind and disabled individuals in touch with their communities. Their tireless efforts have made Radiovision a dependable source and a friend to all who need its services. The volunteers at Radiovision are giving their valuable time this week and every week throughout the year to helping those who are less fortunate live better, more fulfilling lives. Their efforts are a model of caring and community spirit.

Those of us who have the gift of sight often take for granted the vast pools of information and entertainment that are literally at our fingertips every day. Televised news, newspapers, magazines—all these sources are denied to those who are vision-impaired. While radio news and the audio portions of telecasts can fill some of this void, there are still vast amounts left untouched: Neighborhood news, new literature, sales in local stores, all the things that make towns and communities distinctive. Radiovision covers all of this and more, bringing the news in the same day rather than weeks later. It serves as a window on the world for all its subscribers, who receive Radiovision services free of charge.

Hudson Valley's Radiovision serves an audience of about 650 listeners living in our region who rely on what the volunteers can collect from the local newspapers, news releases, and other visual sources. The 117 volunteers who contribute their time and energy to Radiovision are truly, as the saying goes, "reaching out and touching someone." They are doing their part to improve the quality of life for vision-impaired residents of the Hudson Valley area.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, I invite my colleagues to join me in commending the efforts of all the Radiovision volunteers on their 12th anniversary.

WERNER ROSACKER DAY

HON. GUS YATRON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. YATRON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to an outstanding citizen, Mr. Werner Rosacker, of Reiffton, PA. Mr. Rosacker is being honored by the Grace Lutheran Church through the designation of May 3, 1992, as Werner Rosacker Day.

Mr. Rosacker's contributions to the people of Pennsylvania and to the Nation at large, along with his devotion to the church and his family, deserve recognition and much commendation. After serving his Nation during World War II as a military serviceman, Mr. Rosacker dedicated his career to enriching the lives of many through his work for Central Brass Works.

Central Brass Works remained a Rosacker family business for 80 years and, under Werner Rosacker's direction, was responsible for creating and restoring lighting and ornamental brass for projects ranging from Reading, PA's YMCA to Washington, DC's Union Station. Mr. Rosacker has worked on churches, train stations, theaters, banks, and government buildings—improving vital community structures.

Mr. Rosacker's expertise has been called upon by restoration and fabrication projects for Pittsburgh's Benedum Theatre, Mellon Bank, and Union National Bank; Philadelphia's 30th Street Station, Provident Bank, Reading Terminal, and Locust Street Theatre; Harrisburg's Pennsylvania Capital Building, North and South Office Buildings, and Finance Building; and our Nation's Library of Congress, Lincoln Theatre, and Senate caucus room. Mr. Rosacker's work can also be found in the capitols of Arizona, Mississippi, and Virginia. Clearly, Mr. Rosacker's knowledge and skill are unique and invaluable to the creation, preservation, and restoration of our Nation's most treasured structures.

Mr. Rosacker has also put unparalleled energy into his church and family. His concern for the well-being of those around him has been expressed through Mr. Rosacker's hard work for the Reading Emergency Shelter and the Rainbow Home.

Mr. Speaker, it is an honor for me to share the accomplishments of Mr. Rosacker with you and my colleagues. It is with much pleasure that I congratulate him today for being honored by the Grace Lutheran Church. Indeed, he has enhanced our living environment enormously and served as a role model for us all. Mr. Rosacker deserves the highest commendation.

TRIBUTE TO LOUISE COURTELIS

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to pay tribute to Mrs. Louise Courtelis, who graciously has been leading a massive fundraising effort to rebuild the University of Florida's College of Veterinary Medicine. Mrs. Courtelis began her mission when 5 years ago, the vet school endured a virus lodged in the main building's ventilating system, creating "sick building syndrome." In a Miami Herald article entitled, "Without Fanfare, Developer's Wife Leads a Bold Fund Drive to Rebuild UF Vet School, Louise Courtelis' Crowning Crusade," Elinor Burkett reports on the wonderful aims of Mrs. Louise Courtelis. I commend the following article to my colleagues:

Any self-respecting Miami Grande Dame already would have hunted down her dream gown at Martha or Lillie Rubin. By now, she'd have only to agonize over whether to wear diamonds or rubies for the Florida Derby Gala, the state's oldest black-tie ball.

But less than a week before the event, the woman running the show hadn't the foggiest idea what she'd pull out of her closet Thursday night.

Louise Courtelis was simply too busy raising money to concern herself with frills.

"We're still $200,000 shy," she says, sitting in La Brasserie Le Coze in Coconut Grove in white slacks, a simple red sweater and red flats. The only jewel dripping on the wife of developer Alec Courtelis, one of Florida's wealthiest men—and one of the Republican Party's most effective fund-raisers—was a tiny reminder of the game she loved to play with her children: a single gold jack, the points studded with diamonds.

For many of the gentry who've shelled out $250 to $25,000 for the festivities at Turnberry Isle, the 38th Annual Florida Derby Gala is just another big-time social event, a chance to rub shoulders with Gen. Alexander and Pat Haig, Jeb and Columba Bush, Dru and Michael Hammer.

For Courtelis—who rubs shoulders with folks like the king of Greece, and George and Barbara Bush—the gala isn't about seeing and being seen.

It's about her mission: raising money to rebuild the University of Florida College of Veterinary Medicine, one of only 27 vet schools in the country.

Courtelis began drumming up support for the vet school five years ago after a virus lodged in the main building's ventilating system, creating "sick building syndrome." Mold or fungus was making faculty and students sick. The American Veterinary Medical Association declared the place a disaster area, limited its accreditation and gave UF until 1992 to clean up the ventilation and solve their space problems—or else.

Enter Louise Courtelis, who was not about to allow the 17-year-old program to fold. She knew firsthand what it was like not to have a vet school in Florida. When her first Arabian horse fell sick in Miami, her vet had to take it to Auburn University in Alabama.

"Twenty years ago, there was no operating table in the state, no surgery table for a horse," she recalls

HOBBY GREW

By the time the accreditation crisis occurred, Courtelis and her husband were hardly disinterested spectators: Their one Arabian had become 400 Arabians. Their backyard hobby had become a $50 million business. Courtelis went into high gear.

"I did just what it says in the children's rhyme: 'Who put the overalls in Mrs. Murphy's chowder. No one heard us so we said it a little louder.'"

Finally, last year Courtelis managed to turn the annual Derby Gala into a fund-raiser for the vet school. She shook $400,000 out of the well-endowed to help pay for a new Large Animal Hospital. She and her husband broke ground for that building—literally—last March.

This year, she's trying to pay for the bricks and mortar for a new Academic Building, the last step in meeting accreditation requirements.

"Then I'll turn the banner over to someone new and go on to something else," she says.

Louise Courtelis, 60, is not just another rich guy's wife. When she's not planning the Derby Gala, lobbying for contributions or sitting on the state Board of Veterinary Medicine, she's busy at the family farm near Ocala. Mowing the pastures, pitching hay, digging ditches, birthing foals.

"You can't ask anyone to do anything for you you haven't done yourself," she says. "Anyway, you never know when the stall cleaner might not show up."

Courtelis comes by the grit under her nails naturally. She grew up on a potato farm near Erie, Penn., where her father ran the local Buick dealership.

Until 1987, Courtelis was the wife at her husband's side as he pried $100,000 in donations out of the state's Republicans. "A spectator in Alec's stuff," she calls it. Her only experience in fund-raising was "pie socials, where you decorate the box and auction it off," she laughs.

YEARS OF LEARNING

But all those years watching Alec fill Republican coffers rubbed off. When she decided to become a fund-raiser herself, her husband gave her one piece of advice: "Know all the facts and believe in them 100 percent."

Courtelis has her pitch down to perfection. She reminds anyone who will listen that Florida has a $2.5 billion horse industry and another $2.5 billion in food animals. She points out that it was a veterinarian who invented a new inexpensive saliva test for HIV and hepatitis in humans. She brags about the school's research into tumors threatening Florida's sea turtles and the impact of racing on greyhound reproduction.

In the end, the spiel is probably irrelevant. It is the bearer—not the message—who brings in the bucks.

"I'm not an animal person, I'm a Louise Courtelis person," said Jeb Bush, explaining his presence at a recent pre-Derby Gala fundraiser.

I wish to thank Mrs. Courtelis for extending her love and support for the well being of animals, and especially for her contributions in ensuring the livelihood of the University of Florida's College of Veterinary Medicine. We need many more involved citizens like Louise Courtelis.

TRIBUTE TO LILLIAN EDWARDS UPON HER RETIREMENT

HON. FRANK PALLONE, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. PALLONE. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to a very special lady whose career has epitomized the highest standards of public service that we in Government can ever hope to attain.

Today marks the retirement of Mrs. Lillian Edwards of my Long Branch, NJ, district office. Mrs. Edwards' service to the people of the Jersey shore area goes back well before I, and indeed most of my colleagues, were elected to this body. On September 21, 1970, Lillian Edwards began working for my distinguished predecessor, the late James J. Howard. During Congressman Howard's many years as New Jersey's Third District Representative, Mrs. Edwards staffed his district office in Belmar, NJ. After Jim Howard's untimely death, when I was elected as his successor, I asked Mrs. Edwards to continue on the job that she had performed so wonderfully and through which she had built up so much good will. It was one of the best hiring decisions I have ever made.

Lillian Edwards' energetic and conscientious work has earned her the respect and gratitude of countless residents of Monmouth and Ocean Counties who have benefited from her knowledge of Federal agencies, programs, and regulations. What has truly distinguished Mrs. Edwards' work has been her recognition that the services of the Federal Government exist for the people, and that these services must be tailored to make a positive difference in real people's lives. She has the true gift of compassion and an ability to make people feel comfortable when faced with often intimidating Government procedures. People like her so much because she really listens to them, and tenaciously pursues their cases until it is solved.

Mrs. Edwards has more than earned the right to a rewarding and enjoyable retirement, and we wish Lillian and her husband, Garland, well. But it is with a sense of regret that we bid her farewell today. She will be missed—by me, my staff, and the people of the Jersey shore whom she has so ably and lovingly served.

RED HOOK'S MORGAN KNULL, ONLY A SOPHOMORE, WINS NATIONAL ESSAY CONTEST

HON. GERALD B.H. SOLOMON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, I'd like to tell you about a rather extraordinary young man in the 24th New York District.

His name is Morgan Knull of Red Hook, NY, and I wouldn't be too surprised if it's a name we all hear a lot about in the future.

Morgan was one of 6,327 high school students whose names were submitted by their teachers to compete in the senior contest, which involved writing an essay on the global challenge.

He was not only first among sophomores, he was first in the Nation.

Morgan has had some practice. He ranked 10th in the 8th grade and 2d place last year.

His secret apparently is voracious reading. He still finds time to be president of his class and a member of the student council executive committee. He was also the Dutchess County Formal Debate Top Speaker in Division I. He is on the Mid-Hudson Athletic League All Academic Team and was a delegate to Cornell University Model Congress III. And finally, he is on the varsity track and field team.

He's a very mature and self-possessed young man. His family, his teachers, his classmates and his neighbors are all very proud of him. So am I.

Mr. Speaker, I ask you and all other members to join me in rising to pay tribute to a very exceptional young man, Morgan Knull of Red Hook.

JAMES H. BELL: A TIRELESS FIGHTER FOR THE UNITED AUTO WORKERS

HON. CHARLES B. RANGEL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute to the late James H. Bell, who was born in Harlem, the heart of my congressional district, and grew up to be a dedicated trade unionist in the United Auto Workers. A political activist, he also played important roles in the 1989 election of Mayor David Dinkins and the 1988 Presidential primary campaign of the Reverend Jesse Jackson.

Mr. Bell was eulogized by family, friends, and colleagues attending his funeral at the Riverside Church in New York City on Tuesday, April 7. On April 8, he was remembered by Earl Caldwell in the New York Daily News.

REQUIEM FOR A FIGHTER OF GOOD CAUSES

Yesterday morning, when he was bid a last goodbye, the picture of Jim Bell that came to mind was from a wintry day last December. It was not much after 7 a.m. and he was at the UN Plaza Hotel, in Nelson Mandela's suite.

That morning Mandela was in the midst of a hectic trip across the United States. His schedule was filled with days that started early and ran late into the night. As long as he was in New York, one of the people Mandela leaned on was Jim Bell. Early that morning the two of them stood before the picture window that framed the room and as Mandela would ask about various buildings in the Manhattan skyline, Jim Bell would explain.

As the two of them stood there, it was another of those times when Bell showed himself to be a classic model of the kind of greatness Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. championed. "Everybody can be great," King said, "because anybody can serve." And that was Jim Bell. He was great, because he was always there, always serving.

Bell, who died April 1, was, by title, a vice president of District 65 of the United Auto Workers, AFL-CIO. He was also president of the New York City chapter of the Coalition of Black Trade Unionists. He used those positions to work toward accomplishing a lot of what he believed in as a trade unionist. He was at the center of creating and building educational programs. He was in the forefront of organizing political coalitions. He was an activist in politics, both from the ground floor of voter registration and from the leadership ranks of Jesse Jackson's New York campaign for the presidency.

That wasn't all. Jim Bell was also a staunch fighter in the movement against South African apartheid. In 1986, there was a huge rally against apartheid held in Central Park. At the time, it was perhaps the single largest mobilization in New York against the evil and oppressive system in South Africa. Maybe nobody worked harder or did more to make the rally work than Jim Bell.

At one level Jim Bell held important titles and mixed with many of the most powerful leaders in the city. But at another level, he was highly respected for his willingness to do what so many others shun—he was always there and ready to serve. He was there, his sleeves rolled up ready for the kind of work that does not draw a lot of credit or get attention in the media. It was like the morning at the UN Plaza with Mandela. By 7 a.m. he had been up for hours and made his way to the hotel, making certain that he was there and ready to serve in whatever way was needed to aid Mandela.

So much of the time, especially for African-Americans, sports stars and entertainers are looked on as role models and heroes. People like Jim Bell are often overlooked. Because it is that way, it is said that there aren't enough role models for the young. Jim Bell was one to point to. Yesterday, when a big crowd gathered at Riverside Church for his funeral, Mayor Dinkins was among those to accord him his due. Dinkins knew what Jim Bell was all about. Bell worked in the mayor's campaign but more than that, the two worked side by side on a lot of other projects, from fighting apartheid to voter registration. Dinkins called Bell "a warrior in the struggle." In his life, Jim Bell did not get a lot of time. He had but 48 years and then he fell victim to lung cancer. "He was like a brother," Deputy Mayor Bill Lynch said. "What was it that made him special?" Lynch was asked. "He knew how to bring people together," he said. "He had that kind of respect." At Bell's funeral, Jesse Jackson delivered the eulogy. He looked at the life Jim Bell, a native of Harlem, had made for himself and Jackson declared that his was "a performance deserving of an Oscar and an Emmy."

APRIL 24, A DAY OF REMEMBRANCE

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I want to join my colleagues today in remembering the tragedy that overtook the Armenian people in the years 1915-23.

Extensive massacres of Armenians took place during that period in eastern Anatolian plains in an atmosphere akin to a horrible civil war. Those events have indelibly and permanently marked the consciousness of many Americans, including Americans of Armenian descent, who are commemorating April 24, 1992, as a national day of remembrance of man's inhumanity to man and a special day of remembrance for the Armenian victims of strife in the early years of this century.

April 24 this year marked the 77th anniversary of the calamity. It is appropriate on this occasion to direct our attention and prayers to the memory of the thousands of men, women, and children who died in these tragic events.

It is in the interest of all of us and in the interest of mankind that this type of tragedy not occur again. The leading organizations of the Armenian-American community have been seeking to work within our political system for a statement concerning these critical events in their heritage. I feel we should work with them in a constructive fashion and this is why it is important for us to recognize this day of remembrance. No one can deny these events and the centrality of these events in modern Armenian history. I am proud to be associated today with my colleagues in this important day of remembrance.

This year we can also salute the Republic of Armenia which has joined the commonwealth of nations. This country of 3.3 million people is already developing important ties with the United States. Americans have an interest in the economic development of Armenia, its progress toward a free market economy, and its development of democratic institutions. We want to work with Armenia and its neighbors to insure peace, stability, and progress in their search for greater freedom and security. There is no better way to honor the misdeeds of the past than rededicating ourselves to a better future.

With the end of the cold war, we have a chance to advance the cause of human rights more vigorously and on a wider international scale than ever before. I salute all governments, private organizations, and individuals, including the Armenians, who are working toward this end. I hope that their efforts will make the world a safer place, where innocent people no longer suffer the unspeakable crimes of war and terror.

A TRIBUTE TO RAV TOV

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to Rav Tov an international Jewish rescue organization, celebrating its 19th year of existence.

Rav Tov was first founded in 1973 as a local resettlement agency, and since has moved into the international arena. In doing so, Rav Tov has increasingly become a gateway to freedom; providing Russian and Eastern European refugees with programs ranging from education to housing—all programs geared toward easing the resettlement process.

Rav Tov has opened resettlement offices in Vienna, Austria, and Rome, and during the Iran-Iraq war was instrumental in arranging for the security of Iranian Jews as they were initially prevented from leaving Iran legally.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, I am honored to pay tribute to Rav Tov for its invaluable education, housing, medical, and immigrant refugee services and I offer my congratulations to Rabbi David Niederman, its executive director and founder. I trust that Rav Tov will continue to play an important role in the resettlement of Jewish refugees throughout the world.

THE REGENERATION MEN SING FOR A BETTER LIFE

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to recognize the Regeneration Men, a gospel singing group whose members have received a second chance on life. These men, who once were drug users, in jail or homeless, now sing and tell their stories at churches and civic centers. Through the help of the Miami Rescue Mission, the year-old group is received with joy everywhere they go. The group was recently featured in the Miami Herald for their inspirational stories. The article "Members Find Joy in Performing" follows:

Life hasn't been a bed of roses for The Regeneration Men.

It has been trips on drugs for some and jail for others. It's been times of unemployment and homelessness.

But now, through the help of the Miami Rescue Mission, the men who make up the gospel singing group The Regeneration Men are just what their name implies.

RECEIVED WITH JOY

Now they are going to churches and civic groups throughout the county singing and telling their stories.

"I'm elated about the group," said Frank Jacobs, the executive director of the Miami Rescue Mission. "It is a great outreach group. Everywhere they go the men have been received with joy."

"When Denis [Dubuche] sings the song, There is Nothing as Precious As You, Lord, Holy Ghost goose bumps sort of pop out on you."

Dubuche, a native of Port-au-Prince, Haiti, has been at the mission for seven months and is a security guard trainee.

SINGING A WAY TO "OPEN UP"

At 30, Dubuche has seen the lowest side of life. A former drug user—he had used drugs since he was a teenager—Dubuche said his addiction caused him to lose his job. He ended up on the street and someone told him about the Rescue Mission, 2010 NW First Ave.

"The first night I was here, Dr. Jacobs was doing a service. They were singing the hymn Blessed Assurance. While Dr. Jacobs was talking, I felt he was speaking directly to me and I started crying. It was a blessing, praise God."

Being in the choir has done wonders for him, he said. "I don't speak English very well, and I am shy. But when I am singing, I can open up * * * I am no longer shy."

DEDICATED DIRECTOR

The Regeneration Men were formed a year ago by Dan Ozee to perform for a one-time-only program in Liberty City, said Ozee, who came to the mission as a homeless drug addict about a year ago.

"It was such a joy, doing that program, we decided to continue singing together," he said.

Ozee said it is because of the help he got at the mission that he has dedicated his life to the Lord. He now works full time at the mission as a cook and as director of the musical group.

Jacobs said Ozee, who is from Fort Worth, Texas, was "picked by the Lord" for the music ministry.

"A lot of the guys here wanted a special singing group, but I just didn't have the time to do it. Then Danny came along," Jacobs said.

The singers usually perform whenever they are invited. "We do a lot of praise songs and also a lot of good old gospel," Ozee said.

The group is named for the Rescue Mission's Regeneration Program, which is a two-phase rehabilitation program.

ONCE DOWN, BUT NOT OUT

Spencer Sanders, 31, came to Miami just before Thanksgiving. A stranger in town and depressed because his girlfriend had left him, Sanders said he turned to a life of drugs.

Then one day, he told a neighbor about his problems, and learned about the Rescue Mission.

"I felt something from that old lady * * * like God was trying to tell me something through her," he said.

Sanders found his way from Homestead to the center and signed up for the Alpha phase of the mission's Regeneration Program, a six-month, residential program that stresses education, along with inspirational messages and counseling.

"This part of the program is designed to help build the men into disciples for the Lord," Jacobs said. "The next phase, Omega, is geared to job development and is a time of transition where the men learn how to get a job, money management and how to set up savings accounts."

"Basically the program is designed to help these men become solid, productive citizens in the community."

The program has about 100 men and a waiting list of about 25 to 50, he said.

Mr. Speaker, I commend the Regeneration Men and the Miami Rescue Mission for their outstanding efforts in helping others. The group confirms the belief that there is a solution to every dilemma. It was with good faith that the members of the Regeneration Men found the courage to start a new life, an accomplishment so meaningful to them and to others.

PRESERVING THE VIABILITY OF AMERICA'S DOMESTIC URANIUM ENRICHMENT CAPABILITY

HON. BOB MCEWEN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. MCEWEN. Mr. Speaker, as the House of Representatives further debates comprehensive national energy strategy legislation, I would like to call the attention of my colleagues to an important element of that debate: restructuring the Nation's ailing uranium enrichment enterprise.

Having sponsored legislation designed to revitalize America's domestic uranium enrichment capacity, I recognize the vital role that a secure, affordable supply of enriched uranium plays in meeting the country's national and energy security needs. At the same time, however, it is imperative that we develop sound legislation to ensure the future viability and competitiveness of any uranium enrichment corporation. In my view, this includes not only endowing the corporation with assets necessary to attract adequate capital financing from the private sector, but also developing an equitable means by which funds are collected for the eventual decontamination and decommissioning of uranium enrichment plants across the country.

With this in mind, I commend the following news articles, from the Sacramento Bee and the Washington Times, to my colleagues.

[From The Washington Times, Apr. 2, 1992]

HERE COMES MORE NEW TAXES

Talk of higher gas taxes having gone the way of Paul Tsongas' presidential campaign, folks inside the Beltway are looking for other ways to protect consumers from low energy prices. Both the administration and federal lawmakers now want to increase costs through what they call "user fees." In general, it's a good idea to charge the people who benefit for the things of value they receive—and not to make everybody pay. The problem is, these proposals can't pass the proverbial "duck test." They quack like a tax.

Perhaps the most obvious tax increase comes from Indiana Rep. Philip Sharp, a key player on the House Energy and Commerce Committee. Earlier this month, the committee approved his bill to impose a "fee" on oil refiners and importers to fund the stockpiling of oil in the government's Strategic Petroleum Reserve. The government manages the reserve to protect this country from the sort of economic shocks that occurred almost two decades ago when the oil sheiks raised their prices sharply.

One can only hope government energy management is better today than it was then. After all, government management in the form of domestic oil and gas price controls limited domestic supplies and helped the sheiks corner the market. But even if the government now knows what it's doing, the public "benefit" from filling the strategic reserve is a cost that the general public—not just people who count on gasoline to run their cars or heating oil to warm their homes—should bear.

And they will bear it. As Mr Sharp casually mentioned in the trade publication Oil Daily recently, refiners have nothing to worry about from his proposed "fee." Ultimately, consumers will shoulder the cost that refiners pass on to them, he said.

Another new tax under consideration comes from the no-new-taxes Bush administration. The Department of Energy wants to charge citizens relying on nuclear-generated electricity for the cost of cleaning up the government's uranium enrichment facilities. The government built such facilities in places like Portsmouth, Ohio, and Paducah, Ky., to support this country's atomic weapons program. Later, the facilities sold enriched uranium to both domestic and foreign utilities operating nuclear energy plants.

That was then. Today the enrichment facilities have gotten uncompetitive—as foreign producers began doing the job more cheaply—and very messy. Environmental clean-up costs at the enrichment plants will run an estimated $18.5 billion. How the feds will restructure the enrichment facilities to make them competitive again remains to be seen. But charging utility ratepayers for the entire clean-up of a mess that the government itself made is not a "fee." It's a tax.

The impact of both these taxes is relatively small in the context of the federal budget—$400 million annually for the utility tax and $1 billion a year for the fuel tax—but then again, what isn't? And both these little provisions say a lot about the way Washington does business. If the feds think these projects are so great, they should put them in the budget where everyone can see them and perhaps support them. The fact that they are trying to hide their cost under the guise of "user fees" suggests the feds suspect the projects couldn't meet that test.

DUNNING ELECTRICITY USERS FOR URANIUM (By John R. Longenecker)

In an era in which "no new taxes" is a sacred cow, Congress is inventing other, creative ways to raise the funds it needs, at the expense of the American public.

This time, the American consumer will not be victimized as a taxpayer, but as a utility ratepayer. Key congressional committees are debating ways to fund the multibillion-dollar effort required to decontaminate and decommission the nation's aging uranium enrichment sites. Uranium is processed for both defense and commercial purposes at these locations. If some members of Congress have their way, unknowing consumers are about to be "taxed" from another direction: through their electric bills.

One proposal considered by a congressional committee is to collect fees from electric ratepayers—as much as $500 million a year—to clean up enrichment facilities in Portsmouth, Ohio; Oak Ridge, Tenn.; and Paducah, Ky. The theory is that utilities like Pacific Gas & Electric, Southern California Edison and the Sacramento Municipal Utility District should pay millions in fees based on the amount of enriched uranium they have purchased from these facilities in the past.

What that really means is that by collecting such fees, Congress is placing an unfair share of the burden on ratepayers' shoulders to clean up the sites. It is no wonder that the National Association of Regulatory Utility Commissioners has passed a formal resolution stating its opposition to such proposals.

More than 70 percent of the uranium enriched at these sites was produced for defense purposes and for foreign customers, not for U.S. utility companies. America's electric utilities were not the polluters who contaminated the sites. Most of the environmental damage occurred before 1969; the sites during that period were used exclusively for defense purposes. And since then, electric utilities have used only 29 percent of the uranium produced.

In reality, some members of Congress actually are recommending an almost open-ended collection of fees from ratepayers. The assumption is that utilities, whose only source of revenue in many cases is the ratepayers, are a bottomless pit of funding.

Electric ratepayers should pay their fair share of the cleanup, but the proposed fees far exceed that. The frightening part is that we still do not have a credible cost estimate for the cleanup effort. Just two years ago, estimates were about $3 billion; more recently, they have been as high as $45 billion. Before we arrive at any credible estimate, a responsible entity like the National Academy of Sciences must study what are reasonable expenditures given the relative risks involved.

Startlingly, no concrete plans are in the works to collect additional fees from foreign customers who also buy U.S.-enriched uranium. If we penalize our own utilities for buying an American product, why should we exempt foreign industrial competitors from that requirement? In effect, by collecting fees from American ratepayers only, we are subsidizing our foreign competitors at our own expense.

It is time we developed a fair payment structure. That means, first, gauging the real costs involved in the cleanup, and then setting a clearly defined limit on what American ratepayers owe.

FORT ANN VOLUNTEER FIRE COMPANY CELEBRATES 50 YEARS OF SERVICE

HON. GERALD B.H. SOLOMON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, on June 6, I will be presenting the Stars and Stripes—a U.S. flag that flew over this Capitol Building—to some very special people in the 24th District of New York.

I'm speaking about members of the Fort Ann Volunteer Fire Co., Inc., which will celebrate its 50th year of service.

Why are they so special to me? Mr. Speaker, as someone who was a volunteer fireman myself for 20 years in my hometown, I certainly can appreciate everything they do and the sacrifices they make.

These volunteers often are the only available fire protection in most rural areas, like our district. And they do a fantastic job. They are always updating their skills by attending training schools, and they take their responsibilities seriously. Every year, they save countless lives and billions of dollars' worth of property. To do this, they often put their own lives at risk, and give up a lot of their own free time.

Among these volunteers you'll find doctors, lawyers, teachers, businessmen, students, farmers, blue-collar workers—people from every imaginable walk of life and income level. But what binds them is a common desire to serve their community.

And the Fort Ann firefighters are among the best. For half a century they have been serving the people of Fort Ann at a high level of professionalism. The people of Fort Ann are grateful, and I'm proud of them.

Mr. Speaker, I ask you and every other Member to join me in paying tribute to the volunteer firefighters of Fort Ann and wishing them another half century of outstanding service.

MANAGED COMPETITION HEALTH PROPOSAL WINS ENDORSEMENT

HON. MICHAEL A. ANDREWS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. ANDREWS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the New York Times on Saturday, April 25, ran an editorial in support of the health care proposal of the Conservative Democratic Forum. This proposal has been developed by Congressmen JIM COOPER, CHARLIE STENHOLM, and myself. I am pleased to enter the editorial into the RECORD.

IS IT JACKSON HOLE-COMPATIBLE?

(By Michael M. Weinstein)

When choosing a computer to run personal software programs, I look for an all-important label: I.B.M.-compatible. When choosing among proposals to reform the national health care system, there's good reason to look for the reassurance of this label: Jackson Hole-compatible.

Jackson Hole refers to a self-selected group of health care executives, scholars and physicians that meets each year in Jackson Hole, Wyoming. This is the group, led by Dr. Paul Ellwood of Minnesota and Prof. Alain Enthoven of Stanford, that formulated the shrewd plan known as managed competition.

Under this plan, individuals would be organized into large groups—usually at work—and represented by a sophisticated buyer, called a sponsor. The sponsor would solicit bids from competing insurance companies and health care providers. The idea is to control costs through tightly managed competition, rather than price controls, thereby preserving the crowning glory of U.S. health care: its endless capacity for innovation. Dr. Ellwood and friends have spent 25 years working out each of the details.

The Sponsors. They would standardize the contracts that insurers offer members so the members could choose simply, and wisely, on the basis of lowest price. Sponsors would monitor treatment outcomes and prevent discrimination against the chronically ill.

Under the plan, sponsors would be able to improve care in ways individuals could not on their own. They would, for example, concentrate specific procedures, like heart bypass surgery, in a particular regional hospital—the best way, studies show, to cut down mishaps.

The idea of sponsors isn't new. The Federal Government runs a sponsored program for its employees, offering a choice of about 400 different plans. But the Federal program is only partly successful because it hasn't followed sensible rules outlined by Jackson Hole.

Tax Consequences. Jackson Hole-compatible plans require two changes in Federal tax law. They would limit how much in the way of premiums employees are allowed to provide tax-free. Currently, employer-paid premiums are fully deductible, no matter how wasteful. By imposing a tax cap, employers and employees would be encouraged to choose low-cost managed care plans, like health maintenance organizations, over high-cost fee-for-service plans. Under managed care, providers are paid capitated fees independent of how many services they actually provide. That's an important brake on runaway billings.

Second, Jackson Hole-compatible plans would deny tax deductibility to small employers that refuse to join large groups to buy medical insurance. Small employers going it alone pay premiums according to their claims, compelling them to discriminate against job applicants who seem likely to become chronically ill.

For nearly 25 years, the Jackson Hole gang had little to show for its thoughtful work. But suddenly, the ground is starting to shake.

In January John Garamendi, California's Insurance Commissioner, proposed a Jackson Hole-compatible plan that would include every Californian and could be instituted with only minimal help from Washington.

At the Federal level, Representative Jim Cooper, Democrat of Tennessee, has announced a Jackson Hole-compatible plan that limits tax deductions to the cost of basic coverage. Small businesses that refuse to join a large purchasing group would be denied tax-deductible insurance. Universal coverage would be provided by transforming Medicaid into a managed care program for every uninsured American.

The longer Congress keeps looking vainly to national insurance, universal tax credits or employer-paid plans, the better managed competition looks. All at once, two managed competition plans have become part of the debate. Jackson Hole-compatible deserves to be the standard by which to judge all the rest.

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION REGARDING MARITIME TRADE IN PUERTO RICO

HON. ANTONIO J. COLORADO

OF PUERTO RICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. COLORADO. Mr. Speaker, today, I rise to introduce legislation to provide much needed assistance to the people of Puerto Rico by aiding our small Puerto Rico Maritime Shipping Authority in providing continued service to the citizens of our Commonwealth and to the people in the mainland United States.

Mr. Speaker, the bill I introduce today would provide relief to this agency from further regulatory interpretations which could threaten our economic well being in the future. Specifically, it would amend section 506 of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936 (46 App. U.S.C. 1156) by allowing nine vessels built with construction differential subsidy [CDS] and which are currently operating from the mainland United States to the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, to be exempt from any provisions of section 506 or from future regulatory interpretations which would require a foreign voyage when carrying maritime cargo to and from our Commonwealth.

These so-called regulatory interpretations involving exclusively maritime trade to and from the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico began over 4 years ago—in 1988—when our Puerto Rico Maritime Shipping Authority [PRMSA] purchased five Lancer class containerhips to replace our aging, small fleet of roll-on/roll-off carriers for use in the Jones Act trade. Shortly after PRMSA obtained the vessels, the Maritime Administration issued a ruling solely interpreting how section 506 was to be applied to Puerto Rico. From 1988 through February 1990, four subsequent interpretations were issued. Early in 1991, the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia ruled that MarAd had been arbitrary and capricious in its interpretations of its rulings, and sent the matter back to MarAd for further consideration. This is where the matter rests, but only for the moment.

For over 50 years, section 506 of the Merchant Marine Act defines certain permitted combined foreign/domestic trades which could be served by vessels built with construction-differential subsidy without any percentage limitations on the amount of domestic cargoes to be carried on those trades. There was an automatic payback requirement for the subsidy, a payback proportional to the amount of domestic revenue earned compared to total revenues. In prior MarAd opinions, MarAd had specifically stated that this payback mechanism constituted the sole obligation of the subsidized vessel operators, and was the specific method chosen by Congress to reconcile the interests of all parties. Then, by a series of rulings starting in 1989, MarAd singled out Puerto Rico and imposed a minimum foreign cargo requirement of 25 percent. This proposed requirement renders operations extremely inefficient and is potentially devastating to PRMSA. These rulings were recently rejected by a district court decision, and the whole matter now stands in limbo, back before the agency.

It is the stated purpose of the Puerto Rico Maritime Shipping Authority to provide low-cost quality intermodal transportation service to Puerto Rico. The Authority has existed solely to insure that the island Commonwealth will always have a viable transportation alternative, never to be held hostage to other shipping interests. The economy of Puerto Rico has always been sensitive to the slightest economic change, and any legislative initiative or regulatory action, particularly concerning our shipping capability, can have a profound impact upon the island.

Recognizing this reality, not only in Puerto Rico, but also in other island nations and provinces as well, the Congress passed the Caribbean Basin Initiative to help develop economies in this region. The CBI has meant much to our region of the world, and to Puerto Rico in particular. It continues to remain difficult, however, to attract business to Puerto Rico, or to have new enterprises locate there when over 70 percent of the vessel cargo carrying capacity to Puerto Rico remains subject to the uncertainty posed by 506 for the last 3 years. Mr. Speaker, the removal of this uncertainty will surely help this development and the reduction of the chronic unemployment rate in Puerto Rico, now at 17.5 percent.

Mr. Speaker, who will benefit from enactment of this legislation? The most obvious and most immediate beneficiaries of any legislative exemption to section 506 will be the American flag operators which service the island: The Puerto Rico Maritime Shipping Authority, and its agent, Puerto Rico Marine Management, Inc.; and Sea-Land Service, Inc. The real beneficiaries of a change in this ruling, however, will be the people in the mainland United States of America and in the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico who are the recipients of cargo between these two locations.

Commercial products come to Puerto Rico from almost every State in the Nation, and our cargo moves through many ports of call: New Orleans, LA; Jacksonville, FL; Charleston, SC; Baltimore, MD; and Edison, NJ. In fact, sea-borne transportation of goods purchased by the citizens of Puerto Rico accounts for over $11 billion in revenue and generates well over 160,000 jobs in the continental United States. Another interesting point is that Puerto Rico is currently carrying a disproportionate burden share of the transportation costs associated with financing the U.S. merchant marine. This represents an additional cost of 5 percent of all goods purchased in Puerto Rico. To the extent that an exemption of the 506 requirement—which also affects trade to these areas—will be granted, the entire Commonwealth and its people will benefit.

Mr. Speaker, this amendment will not cost the U.S. Government any funds. On the contrary, as proposed, for an operator to take advantage of this grandfather clause for Puerto Rico, an operator will have to repay the then current outstanding unamortized CDS amount. In the case of the five vessels operated by PRMSA, that will be approximately $4.5 million.

Will this legislation cause the loss of jobs? To the contrary, this legislation will save jobs. If our shipping authority is forced to go out of business because this problem is not corrected, all of our ports of call will be impacted, as will the shipping workers on the mainland and in Puerto Rico. Jobs will be lost in San Juan, New Orleans, Jacksonville, Charleston, Baltimore, and Edison, NJ.

Mr. Speaker, we cannot allow this injustice to continue. We need a legislative remedy now to insure that the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico will be protected against any further potential arbitrary and capricious rulings from MarAd in the future. I call upon my distinguished colleagues on the House Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee to help us solve this serious problem. The text of my bill is enclosed.

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I am inserting my Washington report for Wednesday, April 29, 1992, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION

Preparing people to be part of the workforce is a complex and constantly changing process. Vocational education is based on the idea that the educational system should help people prepare for employment. It has not received the support and attention it deserves. Some view vocational education as a positive way of educating non-college bound youth. Others view it as a convenient place for unmotivated and troubled youth to spend their high school years. The quality of vocational education varies from state to state and school district to school district. Communities around the country have at times responded to tighter budgets by cutting funding for vocational education.

The nation's challenge is to create a widely respected vocational alternative to college that will train a highly skilled and educated workforce, boost our nation's productivity and meet the economic challenges from abroad. Vocational education has to focus on meeting the most critical employment needs facing the community and the country. It must not be thought of as "only" a secondary school program, but rather one that trains highly skilled workers for the economy. Neither should it be thought of as only for people who are just entering the workforce. Vocational education retrains workers affected by industry shutdowns and upgrades older workers' skills so that they can keep pace with changing technology.

Employers in the Ninth Congressional District emphasize to me the need for skilled workers. They often prefer to hire graduates of vocational schools. They like the greater emphasis on the positive attitude to work, on the fundamental or foundation skills rather than on specific training for a single job. Vocational education schools try to stress good attitudes, teamwork, pride in work and a willingness to learn new skills.

Objectives: This country's educational system has been primarily geared toward educating the 30 percent of high school students who will be attending a four-year college. More attention needs to be given to the education of the 70 percent of our youth who do not go into college. These youths increasingly are having trouble in the workforce. Many of these students turn to vocational training classes.

A recent government report by a committee of business, union and teacher representatives concluded that more than half of young people leaving schools lack the skills needed for productive employment. The report urged high schools to teach several practical skill areas alongside the traditional academic skills. These are the ability to manage resources; to acquire and evaluate information; to use and maintain modern technology; to work in teams, teach others, lead and negotiate. These "skills", while different from standard college curricula, are vital for success in the workplace.

European Models: American educators have looked to Europe for successful vocational education programs. There are two primary methods of vocational education in Europe. The first is the German "dual system" model under which 70 percent of 16-year olds are apprenticed in 378 industrial occupations. Apprentices typically spend three days a week in on-the-job training with employers. Employers pay for this program, and standards are developed by local chambers of commerce. The employer-based vocational system offers the advantage of training apprentices for the current needs of industry. Students receive the skills that they need to compete in the marketplace. The second model, common in Sweden and France, relies more heavily on school-based vocational study. It can include two-year programs in commerce or four-year technical programs, and involve a more modest amount of on-the-job training.

The U.S. system has generally followed the Swedish model, but is considered to be of lesser quality. Many of the current vocational programs could be improved in the areas of teaching skills or training on the latest equipment. The employer-based system has never been popular in the United States. U.S. business leaders have shown little interest in placing resources into any apprenticeship system. Formal apprenticeships in the U.S. are now offered to less than 1 percent of the civilian workforce.

Innovations: In order to remain competitive, the U.S. will need to significantly improve its vocational education and training in high schools and in the post-secondary area. Many school districts are working to improve these programs.

Indiana has one of the better vocational education programs in the country. In 1991, Indiana moved to improve, among other things, its vocational education by combining several state agencies into the Indiana Department of Workforce Development. The new Department has initiated several new high-tech vocational education programs. The Department is pioneering a "Tech Prep" program at five demonstration sites in the state. This program, which will be offered state-wide in 1994, trains students in fields that require skilled workers, including high-tech computer aided manufacturing and computer aided design. The "Tech Prep" program is just one of several programs that enroll nearly 180,000 students and adults in Indiana. The state will spend nearly $300 million on vocational and technical training this year.

The federal government has taken some steps to assist states in improving vocational education. Last year Congress appropriated over $1.1 billion for vocational education, most of which is allocated to states in block grants. Indiana will receive more than $23 million this fiscal year.

Outlook: This country must recognize the importance of a healthy vocational education system. The key to the quality of vocational education is the support it receives at the local, state, and national levels. Leaders in labor, management, and education must recognize the value of vocational education and take the necessary steps to assure that the programs are in tune with the needs of the business and industrial communities.

A well educated, well trained work force has to be a top national priority. Education must serve those of the work force that do not graduate from college. Our society must adopt a philosophy of life-long learning and training for workers. Without well-trained workers, this country will become a second-rate economy.

THE RETIREMENT OF DR. EUGENE SMITH AS PRESIDENT OF A.S.U.

HON. BILL ALEXANDER

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I rise in tribute to my friend Dr. Eugene Smith who is retiring as president of Arkansas State University at Jonesboro.

I can think of no better use of one's life than devoting it to education—to a pursuit which broadens the mind and equips our young people to better compete in this most competitive world.

Gene Smith leads in a quiet but determined and productive way.

And because of his tireless efforts, he can leave his post for a well deserved retirement knowing that he has made a real difference—both on individual lives and on society.

Joining Gene in retirement will be his wife, Ann.

Gene and Ann are a team in every sense of the word.

She has the same devotion to duty, the same willingness to give of herself and the same laudable goals for both education and the State of Arkansas.

Arkansas State University truly got a two-for-one deal when they hired Gene Smith.

Mr. Speaker, Gene Smith is not one dimensional. While education is his field, he understands that if there are no jobs for his graduates to take, our State will never develop as it should.

Therefore, he has labored long and hard to bring industry and jobs to Arkansas.

This multidimensional approach is typical of Gene Smith. While he could be well satisfied only with the fine job he does at ASU—that is not how Gene operates. That is why he has worked in so many civic organizations and appointed positions in State government.

One of his many accomplishments is to make Arkansas State University relevant to the region it serves, bringing his vision of the future both to the university he heads and the region in which he lives.

For example, Gene readily understood my push for a national energy policy which would expand the use of alternative energy, such as "farm-grown" ethanol. He embraced the goal of opening the $100 billion transportation fuel market to farmers.

Because he has a far reaching vision of the future, Gene has seen to it that ASU is involved in this important work.

It is this type thinking that has made him an outstanding administrator and an outstanding citizen.

Gene became the eighth president of Arkansas State University on February 15, 1984, after serving in various positions at the school since first joining the faculty in 1958.

No matter where he served, he served well.

Mr. Speaker, teaching runs in Gene Smith's family.

Gene's father was superintendent of the Forrest City school system for 40 years and his mother taught in the same system.

Gene takes into retirement the knowledge that his family has touched the lives of thousands of young people in a most meaningful way.

We are indeed fortunate that Gene Smith devoted his life to Arkansas and its young people.

Now, Gene and Ann are headed for retirement. I am sure, however, that they won't be spending all their time relaxing.

Because of their knowledge, dedication and willingness to give of themselves, they will well.

And, to say thank you for a lifetime of service.

MIAMI BEACH HIGH SCHOOL
ROLLS THE DICE ON BUSINESS

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to recognize the Miami Beach High School chapter of the Future Business Leaders of America, who by using their business-oriented ingenuity have created a game designed to entertain and educate. The game consists of a game board, four game pieces for each group of players, a pair of dice, and plenty of business smarts. The object of the game is to answer the most questions correctly about business-related topics, such as debts and credit. As a 50th anniversary gift, the students will send the game to the organization's national headquarters. The students were recently featured in the Miami Herald for this achievement. The article "Board Game Gets Down to Business" follows:

Business-oriented students at Miami Beach High School have developed a board game designed to entertain while it educates.

The students, members of the Beach High chapter of Future Business Leaders of America, played their FBLA 50th Anniversary Challenge game for the first time last week. It turned into a raucous affair.

A dozen students, divided into four teams, clustered around the game board, with space for each team's four pieces (marked F, B, L, and A) on the outer edge and a grid leading to the center. In turn, they rolled dice and peppered each other with questions about debts, credit, economics, etiquette and other business-related topics.

One player sputtered through a question filled with terms such as "guarantor" and "principal debtor."

A confused Linda Merus interrupted, shouting, "Speak English!"

Michael Shafir posed a true-or-false question to another team, asking whether a budget and a spending plan are basically the same. He felt the response was obvious, and said so when his opponents answered correctly.

"Of course it's true," Michael said.

With each correct answer, a team moved one or two of its four game pieces toward the center, according to the roll of the dice. With each incorrect answer, the teams retracted their pieces. After an hour's play, no one had won.

Although the game needs some refinement, students said their first effort exceeded expectations.

"I found it surprisingly fun and interesting. Having teams instead of individuals made it more enjoyable," said Linda, one of 176 FBLA members. "It's teaching you to work together."

But more important, Linda said she remembered answers to the questions when the topics came up in other classes.

"Everybody said, 'Hey, how did you know the answer to that?'" she said.

"That's the point of the game, said James Orlovsky, club president.

"You practice and you study without really thinking about it," he said.

After some tinkering, the Beach chapter plans to send the game to FBLA national headquarters in Virginia as a 50th anniversary gift, said club sponsor Tonya Alvarez.

The Beach High club hopes the national organization will disseminate the game.

"We'd love for children to get into it and play it as if they were playing Monopoly," said Sandra Pierre, club secretary.

Mr. Speaker, I commend these bright young people for their accomplishments. Their business smarts and great ambitions will undoubtedly prove successful in future endeavors. It is reassuring to know that students like these will lead our Nation into a prosperous future.

CONGRESSIONAL TRIBUTE FOR
MARC C. FREDSON

HON. JAMES L. OBERSTAR

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take this opportunity to praise Mr. Marc Charles Fredson from the Eighth District of Minnesota. The Veterans of Foreign Wars and its ladies auxiliary conducted the Voice of Democracy broadcast scriptwriting contest, and this great American wrote a fabulous script concerning the long-term vision of the United States and "Meeting America's Challenge." I am excited to recognize this exceptional young student who has superbly addressed the challenges which face the United States today and in the 21st century. I recommend to my colleagues the fantastic script of Mr. Marc C. Fredson.

MEETING AMERICA'S CHALLENGE

(By Marc C. Fredson, Minnesota Winner, 1991-92 VFW Voice of Democracy Scholarship Program)

America has always been a nation faced with great challenges, but the strength and pride of a tireless, resilient population has yielded us with innumerable benefits.

The founding of America in the late 1700s brought incredible adversity to the colonists. The challenge for this nation during Revolutionary times was broad-based. These early Americans had to accomplish far-reaching goals and face new challenges, because the very survival of the nation was at stake. But the colonists had met the challenge to establish a new country because they were survivors and crusaders. They had within them an enflamed and burning desire to succeed. They were the first Americans.

These Americans met in Philadelphia with a huge task—a great challenge. Their solution for securing the safety and liberty of every citizen of this nation—the Constitution of the United States—has stood firm against over two hundred years of radical change and technical advancement. The first Americans knew the challenges of their day, and they faced them with wonderful, intellectual, timeless solutions.

We, the Americans of the twentieth century, are enviable people. We have stood at the forefront of a globe-encompassing democratic movement. We have maintained American beliefs and preserved the dreams of the founders of this nation to the best of our abilities, and the world has finally taken notice. Democracy is spreading like wildfire. The sparks from the eternally glowing embers of American freedom are igniting new, bright flames in nations throughout the world. And although these newly free countries are struggling against great adversity, they will triumph. For they now face the challenges that America also faced two hundred years ago.

But even though we are enviable, even though we are strong and proud, we have an obligation as a world leader to remain that way. If we are to be examples to the world, then we must be truly good examples.

We are not vulnerable to the evils of the world, and we do not shrink from big-chested foreign adversaries. But today we have new fears, because today, we are vulnerable to the evils of ourselves. We are vulnerable to the greed and racism and cruelty that exist in our own cities and towns. These evils are as devastating as any foreign enemy.

If we are to be proud of our nation, then we must be willing to care for and nurture and protect it. We must keep interest in our home front, as well as the foreign front. As pride in the effectiveness and strength of our nation increases, so, too, should the interest to keep it strong.

So, this is our challenge. A challenge of maintaining a strong, admirable, caring country. A nation safe for every single individual living in it. A nation where each and every person has what he or she needs to lead a productive, good life. A nation where not one citizen is discriminated against. A nation of which the citizens can financially afford to be citizens. A nation that protects the flourishing system of democracy.

These are our challenges. Each and every one of them is so vitally important. Each is so crucial to our survival and health.

Our challenge today is to challenge ourselves.

To challenge ourselves to think, to care, to listen, to be aware, and to act in ways that will benefit the welfare of everyone here who views the stars and stripes with great pride. Of everyone who cries at the death of servicemen, and cheers for the world series champion. We have so much for which to be thankful.

Our challenge is to make the most of our fortunate existence in the United States of America, and to strengthen that existence with all of the pride, and all of the work, that we can bear to give. We must, as the Americans of today, continue to stoke the fires of hope and persistence that our forefathers and mothers kindled so very long ago.

ARTHUR H. FULTON

HON. GEORGE ALLEN

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to Arthur Fulton, president of Arthur H. Fulton, Inc. of Stephens City, VA. On April 1, Mr. Fulton was elected president of the Interstate Truckload Carriers Conference [ITCC], representing the truckload, common and contract motor carriers in the United States.

Mr. Fulton has built a career representing a strong commitment to hard work, discipline, integrity, and family values.

As ITCC president, Mr. Fulton will serve as the voice to an important advocate and information source for the $50 billion per year truckload motor carrier industry.

I ask that my colleagues join me in congratulating Arthur Fulton for his election as president of the Interstate Truckload Carriers Conference. This is yet another accomplishment of a man who is a monument to entrepreneurial spirit and determination. Arthur Fulton is a tribute to Stephens City, to the trucking industry, and to this Nation.

CONGRESSMAN KILDEE HONORS
ALFRED LABRECQUE

HON. DALE E. KILDEE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. KILDEE. Mr. Speaker, it is a great honor for me to rise before you to recognize the lifetime achievements of Alfred T. LaBrecque, a pioneer in the field of labor. Mr. LaBrecque is retiring after more than 30 years of exemplary service to the membership of the American Postal Workers Union and the U.S. Postal Service.

Al was born to Alma and Wilfred LaBrecque on April 18, 1937. At the time of his birth and infancy, his father, Wilfred, was involved in the Flint sitdown strike against General Motors. Twenty years later Al would continue his father's commitment to his fellow workers as an advocate in the labor movement.

Al LaBrecque graduated from Flint's St. Mary's High School in 1955. He served 2 years in the U.S. Army and was honorably discharged in 1957. After a brief stint working with General Motors, Al was hired by the U.S. Postal Service in 1959.

From the day he joined the ranks of the Flint area local of the American Postal Workers Union, Al has worked tirelessly as an advocate for his fellow postal workers. His efforts have gained the admiration and respect of management as well as the union membership. Always willing to listen, he has not only been a union official, but also a brother, friend, and confidant for countless workers.

Alfred LaBrecque has held a variety of positions at the Flint local, with the majority of his service being spent in the position of executive vice president. His administrative and organizational skills are the primary reason the Flint local has a paid membership dues record of 96 percent in an open shop.

An advocate for women, Al LaBrecque was instrumental in the passage of a resolution which reclassified breast prosthesis from cosmetic to needed appliance for the purposes of medical insurance coverage. He has also touched the lives of numerous children as a football coach for Blessed Sacrament Elementary School, Holy Rosary High School, and E.A. Johnson High School in Mt. Morris.

Al LaBrecque is married to Michelle LaBrecque and has seven children, Paul, Eric, Laura, Lisa, Gayle, Noel, and Christina.

Mr. Speaker, I ask you and my fellow Members of Congress to join me in honoring Al LaBrecque. He has spent 30 years of his life working on behalf of postal workers. His contributions on behalf of his fellow Americans will never be forgotten.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

BAKER FAMILY HERITAGE
PRESERVED IN ANNUAL REUNIONS

HON. GERALD B.H. SOLOMON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, in 1630, three brothers emigrated to these shores from England to escape religious persecution.

That was the beginning of one of the most close-knit families in America, the Baker family, which is planning its 128th family reunion. It is, the Bakers believe, the oldest continuous family reunion in America.

Family members tell me that James Baker, who was born in 1765, married a Dutchess County woman after the death of his first wife. Added to a son from his first marriage were 15 more sons, which may explain why there are so many Bakers in the area. The Capital district telephone book has 380 Bakers listed, many of them descendants of James Baker.

The old Baker homestead still stands in Stillwater, where the Bakers moved in 1800.

The Bakers were hardworking farmers, merchants, and professional people. They kept what one ancestor described in a newspaper article as a low profile. Nevertheless, family historians have found enough information to keep the tradition going and capture the interest of younger members.

Mr. Speaker, there is something distinctly American about the way this family has preserved its heritage, which is so closely related to the heritage of this country. I ask you to join with me in saluting this family and wishing all members not only an enjoyable 128th reunion but many, many more in the future.

THOMAS MOTION TO RECOMMIT
CONFERENCE REPORT ON S. 3

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, I want to state for the RECORD my strong support for the amendment offered by my colleague from California, Representative THOMAS. Mr. THOMAS has offered an amendment which would ensure that U.S. Representatives could not send mass mailings into areas outside of their current congressional districts.

Adopted by the Continental Congress in 1775, franking is, in many ways, one of the oldest congressional perks. Designed to assist and expedite the conduct of the official business, activities, and duties of the Congress, the franking privilege has since been perverted to subsidize the reelection efforts of incumbent Members. By law, mailings to specifically solicit political support are prohibited but due to an intentional election-year loophole, Members can blanket potential constituents—voters in newly drawn districts—with mass mailings. Although outrageous in principle alone, this most vulgar and arrogant practice is totally financed with taxpayer monies.

This kind of widespread abuse of the frank clearly grants an unfair political advantage to incumbents. It amounts to nothing less than a campaign subsidy siphoned from the pockets of American taxpayers into already bulging campaign accounts of incumbents. Indeed, Federal Election Commission figures show that House incumbents in 1990 already outpace their challengers four to one.

In light of our country's $4 trillion debt, can this body in good faith continue to waste the hard-earned dollars of Americans everywhere on the ignominious task of getting reelected? If this House wants true reform, I implore my colleagues to support Mr. Thomas' amendment and eliminate this egregious practice that squanders taxpayer dollars, perverts the franking privilege, and distorts the democratic process of fair elections.

HOW ABOUT A MAXIMUM WAGE

HON. BERNIE SANDERS

OF VERMONT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. SANDERS. Monday, April 27, was the 50th anniversary of one of the most provocative proposals ever advanced by a President of the United States. In 1942, President Roosevelt called for a cap on the incomes of the wealthy, essentially, a maximum wage.

Earlier this month, noted author Sam Pizzigati published his new book, "The Maximum Wage," where he elaborates a "common sense prescription for revitalizing America, by taxing the very rich." The Los Angeles Times published the following op ed column to recalling Roosevelt's proposal, which I now offer for the RECORD.

Tax-the-rich rhetoric is back in style—for good reason. The average after-tax income of America's richest 1% has soared 136% for the past 15 years, after adjusting for inflation. In 1990, the chief executive officers of America's 200 largest companies averaged $2.8 million in compensation.

Average Americans are angry, and politicians are responding. Congressional leaders are even pushing for surtaxes on millionaires.

But rhetoric can be deceiving. Even if President Bush signed, instead of vetoed, the tax-the-rich package Congress enacted in March, America's wealthiest 1% would still be paying less of their income in taxes than they did 15 years ago.

At times like these, we need to remember that America's political leaders weren't always so timid about taxing the very wealthy. In fact, 50 years ago this month, a President proposed the ultimate antidote to overcompensation: a maximum wage.

On April 27, 1942, President Franklin D. Roosevelt asked Congress to cap the income that any one American could claim and keep. With the United States in "grave national danger," said Roosevelt, "no American citizen ought to have a net income, after he has paid his taxes, of more than $25,000 a year." That would be the equivalent of an income a bit above $200,000 today.

The Treasury Department subsequently fleshed out F.D.R.'s proposal in testimony before Congress. If his "100% war supertax" was enacted, Treasury officials testified, single persons whose before-tax income was $40,000 would be left with $25,000 after the standard tax rates had been applied. Any dollar of income above the $40,000 would be taxed away. For married couples, Roosevelt's 100% supertax would have kicked in on all income of more than $110,000.

General public reaction to Roosevelt's proposal was positive. Average Americans seemed delighted. Quipped actress Ann Sheridan, then earning considerably more than $100,000, the equivalent of more than $800,000 today: "I regret that I have only one salary to give to my country."

In the end, Roosevelt's maximum-wage proposal proved too radical for Congress to swallow. But Roosevelt's 100% supertax proposal did have a powerful impact on congressional debate.

By the end of the war, Congress had raised the tax rate to a record 94% on all income of more than $200,000. In 1943, Internal Revenue Service statistics show, millionaire taxpayers paid 78% of their total incomes in federal taxes. Today, by comparison in federal taxes. Today, by comparison, the top federal income-tax rate on the wealthy is only 34%.

Could a maximum-wage proposal ever get a hearing today? Stranger things have happened. Between 1894 and 1917, for instance, the top federal tax rate on the income of the wealthy rose from 2% to 88%. If the nation's top marginal tax rate could jump by that much, why not a jump from 31%, the current top rate, to the 100% necessary to create a maximum wage?

An impossible pipe dream? The minimum wage must have once seemed equally fantastic. Yet today we take the concept for granted. Decency demands, we believe, a floor on income. Why not a ceiling? Why not a maximum wage?

Sam Pizzigati is a trade-union journalist in Washington. His new book, "The Maximum Wage" (Apex Press), has just been published by the Council on International and Public Affairs in New York.

A TRIBUTE TO FELIX AND CONCHI RAMIREZ-SEIJAS' ROSES

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to pay tribute to Dr. Felix and Conchi Ramirez-Seijas, whose roses recently swept more than half the major awards in the annual rose show at Fairchild Tropical Garden in Coral Gables, FL. In an article entitled, "Blue-Ribbon Roses, Blooms Grown by Gables Doctor Reap a Gardenful of Top Prizes," Donna Gehrke reports on the exquisite roses of Felix and Conchi Ramirez-Seijas. I commend the following article to my colleagues:

Dr. Felix Ramirez-Seijas walks in his rose garden morning and night—so attentive, his wife claims, he can spot if one of his beloved flowers have been touched.

This weekend, the attentive doctor took home half the major awards in the annual rose show at Fairchild Tropical Garden in South Dade.

"He swept the show," said Margarita Calvet, president of the Tropical Rose Society that sponsors the 1,000-rose exhibit.

"Beginner's luck," Ramirez-Seijas modestly said.

He and his wife, Conchi, have only been growing roses for four years, but already they have a reputation for having some of the loveliest blooms in the county.

They have more than 100 bushes at their Coral Gables home and have fashioned a rose garden in their back yard.

Their favorites include the pink-tinged Princess of Monaco—examples of their Princess roses won the Queen award of the show, as well as a blue ribbon.

Another of their favorites, the fragrant, light pink Birde's Dream, took a runner-up award in the grand-prize division.

Several other roses from the Ramirez-Seijas garden won prizes, but the family hadn't counted all the ribbons Sunday.

The doctor, a kidney specialist who directs the pediatric nephrology unit at Miami Children's Hospital, said he liked to walk in his garden every day.

"It's quiet and peaceful" he said. "It's a nice break."

I would like to congratulate Felix and Conchi Ramirez-Seijas on the achievements of their green thumbs, and I would like to wish them much success with their rosy future.

DR. IRVING J. SELIKOFF, A TRUE CHAMPION OF PUBLIC HEALTH

HON. DAVID R. OBEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. OBEY. Mr. Speaker, I want to take a moment to recognize a man who has done an incredible amount for the general good in the field of occupational and environmental medicine.

Science is no different than any other area of human endeavor. You can find people in the field whose involvement is simply because of their fascination with data and their fascination with the learning process itself, but you also find people who are fascinated with data and the learning process because of what they can mean to human beings. Dr. Irving Selikoff is one of the latter. He has contributed an incredible amount to our understanding of tuberculosis and diseases related to exposure to a number of dangerous compounds or products, including asbestos.

I have known Dr. Selikoff for more than 20 years. I have worked with him closely on occupational and environmental issues, largely through the National Institute of Environmental Health Sciences. What separates him from so many others is that he has taken an interest, not only in the scientific aspects of those problems, but also in the human aspect as well. He, for instance, was instrumental in helping to arrange an epidemiological review of a number of grain elevator workers in my congressional district a few years ago.

He has done much to remind the world of science that it is, after all, human beings who are affected by what we learn. He has been one of those who recognized the need for epidemiological detective work to supplement other techniques in expanding our knowledge of what chemicals and other environmental agents do to human beings. He was not just interested from a clinical standpoint; he cared. And that is why he means so much to so many of us.

On May 1, 1992, the Irving J. Selikoff Archives and Research Center will be dedicated at the Mount Sinai Medical Center in New York. The following is a brief history describing Dr. Selikoff's life and work:

PROF. EMERITUS IRVING J. SELIKOFF, M.D.

Prof. Irving J. Selikoff is one of the greatest physicians ever to have been associated with the Mount Sinai Medical Center of New York City. Dr. Selikoff was associated with Mount Sinai for a total of 51 years—from 1941 to 1992.

In his years at Mount Sinai, Dr. Selikoff pursued two brilliant careers. He initially became an internationally recognized expert in the diagnosis and treatment of tuberculosis and later he became one of the world's leaders in occupational and environmental medicine. In each of these areas, he contributed substantially to the growth of medical knowledge; he also contributed enormously to the saving of lives and to the prevention of disease.

Dr. Selikoff's initial achievements in the control and treatment of tuberculosis were based on his solid training and great experience as a chest physician. He was vastly knowledgeable about the treatment, clinical management and prevention of tuberculosis. Dr. Selikoff's most important achievement in this field was his discovery along with Dr. E.H. Robitzek of the value of isoniazid therapy in the treatment of tuberculosis. Drs. Selikoff and Robitzek observed that isoniazid caused prompt resolution of the signs and symptoms of tuberculosis and that it therefore opened vast perspectives for the effective cure of tuberculosis, that had long been a mostly incurable disease.

In recognition of their work in developing isoniazid therapy, Drs. Selikoff and Robitzek in 1955 received the Albert Lasker Award of the American Public Health Association; this award is the highest recognition given for achievement in public health in the United States. It has been described as the "Nobel Prize of Public Health."

Dr. Selikoff's second major area of interest and major achievements was in occupational medicine, and particularly in the recognition of the entire spectrum of the diseases caused by asbestos, including carcinogenicity. Dr. Selikoff first encountered patients with asbestos-induced disease in 1954. In his practice of pulmonary medicine, he noted an unexpectedly high incidence of unusual lung disease in persons who had worked at the United Asbestos and Rubber Company in Paterson, New Jersey. This plant had produced asbestos-containing materials during World War II. Dr. Selikoff, through his detailed examination and astute interpretation of the findings in these patients, realized that their lung disease had been caused by their occupational exposure to asbestos.

Dr. Selikoff pursued further his work on asbestos, and in 1962 he began his long association with the members of Locals 12 and 32 of the Asbestos Workers Union in New York City and in Newark, New Jersey. Dr. Selikoff initiated fundamental long-term health studies of these workers that eventually resulted in recognition of the spectrum of disease due to their occupational exposure to asbestos.

The first public presentation of the results of Dr. Selikoff's studies was made at a landmark 1964 Conference of the New York Academy of Sciences entitled "Biological Effects of Asbestos," that was organized and chaired by Dr. Selikoff. The data made public at this conference demonstrated the extent of the health hazards of asbestos. Dr. Selikoff and colleagues established beyond any shadow of a doubt that three major diseases were caused by exposure to asbestos—mesothelioma, lung cancer and asbestosis.

Following upon this work and in association with the American Cancer Society, Dr. Selikoff then began a massive evaluation of the epidemiology of asbestos disease in all of the 17,800 members of the AFL-CIO International Union of Heat and Frost Insulators and Asbestos Workers throughout the United States and Canada. All workers who were on the rolls of that union on January 1, 1967 were enrolled in Dr. Selikoff's study. Prospective medical evaluation of these workers continues to the present. This investigation has provided the most detailed knowledge available anywhere in the world of the chronic health effects of exposure to asbestos.

Since those early years, the staff of the Environmental Sciences Laboratory that Dr. Selikoff formed at the Mount Sinai School of Medicine have continued his work in environmental and occupational disease. They have examined tens of thousands of workers at risk of occupational disease. These workers have come from such diverse settings as asbestos mines, shipyards, building trades, firefighting units, chemical plants, petroleum refineries, cotton textile plants, transformer manufacturing plants, secondary lead smelters, automobile assembly plants, copper smelters, tannery workers, etc. Persons suffering ill effects from environmental as well as from occupational hazards have been evaluated. Most notable among these were residents in Michigan exposed to PBBs [polybrominated biphenyls] in contaminated animal feed, electrical workers exposed to PCBs [polychlorinated biphenyls], brake repair workers, plumbers, sheet metal workers, workers exposed to dioxins, populations exposed to mercury and fluorides, workers exposed to vinyl chloride, and most recently carpenters exposed to asbestos and to lead.

Dr. Selikoff's academic acumen knew no bounds. He organized and chaired conferences in the United States, Canada, Europe, South Africa and Japan. These colloquia provided meeting grounds for scientists from around the world for dissemination of knowledge on prevention of the diseases caused by minerals, dusts, chemicals, solvents and other physical or chemical agents. His interests extended also to an appreciation of the serious impact on public health of the acquired immune deficiency syndrome [AIDS] and he chaired one of the earliest conferences in the United States detailing the tragic health effects of the AIDS epidemic.

In October 1990, to mark the 900th Anniversary of the University of Bologna Dr. Selikoff organized a convocation held under the sponsorship of the Collegium Ramazzini, and international assembly of scientists involved in the prevention of occupational disease that he founded in 1983. This landmark conference was entitled "Scientific Issues of the Next Century: Convocation of World Academies." It was published that same year. In June 1991, a symposium, entitled "The Third Wave of Asbestos Disease: Exposure to Asbestos in Place. Public Health Control" was held in New York City. This conference demonstrated conclusively that asbestos in place in buildings across the United States poses a significant hazard to workers, to children, to building occupants, and to members of the public. It underscored the need for rational and widespread preventive action to control exposure. The results of this conference will soon be published by the New York Academy of Sciences. They will represent the Eleventh Annals of the New York Academy of Sciences that was edited by Dr. Selikoff.

The Mount Sinai-Irving J. Selikoff Clinical Center in Occupational Medicine at the Mount Sinai School of Medicine is living testimony of Dr. Selikoff's constant concern for the welfare of people everywhere, at work and in the environment. This clinical center evaluates several thousand patients with occupational and environmental illness every year and has been influential in the prevention of occupational disease in New York, New Jersey, and across the United States.

To honor Dr. Selikoff and to promote the research and education that are the cornerstones of the prevention of environmental and occupational disease, the Division of Environmental and Occupational Medicine at Mount Sinai is committed to continuing his work with vigor in spite of his loss. Our goal is to prevent all occupational and environmental disease in workers and other persons in the United States and throughout the world.

OPPOSING TACTICS OF OPERATION RESCUE IN BUFFALO, NY

HON. LOUISE M. SLAUGHTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Ms. SLAUGHTER. Mr. Speaker, today 36 of our colleagues have joined me in signing a statement expressing our strong opposition to the illegal tactics being used by those who are trying to close down abortion clinics in Buffalo, NY. These lawbreakers have been unsuccessful in their goal, but their actions have hurt the people of western New York.

People have the right to demonstrate but not to break the law or deprive others of their freedoms. This staged event by Operation Rescue has had no positive result but many negative ones for the people of Buffalo.

To show our support for the people of Buffalo, I am including the congressional statement in the RECORD with the full list of signatories:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Washington, DC, April 29, 1992.

We, the undersigned Members of Congress, strongly oppose the illegal tactics of Operation Rescue protesters in Buffalo, New York. In flagrant disregard for the law, these fanatics are trying to stop lawfully operating clinics from staying open. They have failed in their goal but they are hurting the people of Buffalo.

While they have a right to protest, they have no right to deprive other citizens of their freedoms. By targeting clinics that offer a range of reproductive health services, they infringe on women's rights to health care. This may have tragic results.

The protesters' disregard for the well-being of Buffalo citizens monopolizes police resources to the extent of limiting backup for officers responding to crime reports. The illegal actions result in high costs for arresting and incarcerating hundreds of zealots who refuse to post bail; their presence is estimated to cost the County almost $200,000 over two weeks. Those who came to Buffalo intending to break the law should be held responsible for the cost they incur.

Blocking the streets hurts nearby Buffalo residents and businesses whose employees and clients have trouble getting access. These include a hospital, a post office, stores, offices and other health care facilities.

This will not be an isolated phenomenon afflicting only Buffalo; last year's action in Wichita sets an example for what Operation Rescue is threatening for this summer in Pennsylvania, Wisconsin, and the cities hosting our national political conventions.

These actions benefit nobody but have great potential for harm. We hope this important demonstration will stop immediately and that the people of Buffalo can return to normalcy.

HELP FOR DEFENSE WORKERS

HON. JACK REED

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, today I join Mr. GEJDENSON in jointly introducing two pieces of legislation which will help defense workers in Rhode Island, Connecticut, and the entire United States.

The world has drastically changed in the last year. We can and should begin the process of prudently reducing our defense budget. However, we must recognize the most immediate impact that defense cuts will have, the loss of high-paying, high-skilled jobs throughout the country. It has been estimated that up to 1.5 million civilian workers will lose their jobs as a result of the defense drawdown.

Our first bill, the Defense Workers Bill of Rights Act of 1992 will provide laid-off defense workers with 1 year of protection from losing their home or apartment. Employees who are laid-off because of defense cuts at a company or subcontractor where at least 80 percent of the firm's revenue is from work for the U.S. Government are eligible, if a court finds the displaced worker or his or her spouse unable to pay their mortgage or rent. Owners of property rented to eligible defense workers would qualify for the same protection from foreclosure as the defense worker.

This legislation is based on the Soldiers and Sailors Civil Relief Act of 1940 which helped to protect the families of soldiers during World War II and was most recently invoked during Operations Desert Shield and Desert Storm.

Our second bill would make every worker in a defense reliant community eligible for job training assistance before they are laid-off to allow them to plan and train for work in a peacetime economy.

Defense cutbacks will not only effect workers employed by major defense contractors, but also workers in small businesses working with and for the major contractors. This bill enables all workers in a defense-dependent community to take advantage of the job search counseling and retraining offered under the Job Training and Partnership Act. The bill makes this training available immediately, before mass layoffs take place to facilitate conversion and diversification efforts.

Defense workers are heroes of the cold war. Without their unique capabilities and the advanced technology they helped to develop, the end of the cold war might never have occurred. Today, for too many of these hard-working men and women the peace dividend seems like no more than a pink slip.

The legislation I and Mr. GEJDENSON have introduced would help ease some of the bumps defense workers will face on the road to peacetime employment, and I urge my colleagues to cosponsor these two bills.

TRIBUTE TO FOUR-MEMBER TEAM
FROM IBM'S THOMAS J. WATSON
RESEARCH CENTER

HON. HAMILTON FISH, JR.

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize and pay special tribute to a four-member team from IBM's Thomas J. Watson Research Center in Yorktown Heights, NY who are being honored tonight as 1992 Inventors of the Year. The inventors will receive the award from Senator DENNIS DECONCINI this evening in a formal ceremony in the caucus room of the Russell Senate Office Building.

This award recognizes the inventors who have improved the welfare of the Nation through technological innovation and commercialization and highlights the vital roles of creativity and invention in fueling our Nation's economy and in maintaining technological supremacy. Recipients are selected from public and private laboratories; large businesses, small companies, universities, government, and independent inventors.

The team consists of John Cocke, George Radin, Norman H. Kreitzer, and Francis P. Carrubba. They have invented the Reduced Instruction Set Computing [RISC], a broad computing concept which has revolutionized the computer industry worldwide. RISC allows for greater computing systems performance through a smaller set of instructions and simpler addressing modes.

The technical and economic implications of this technology are significant, with RISC processors and microprocessors functioning as key components of emerging machine designs, heralded as the vanguard of the next generation of computers. The RISC-based design is licensed extensively in the United States and abroad, with both domestic and foreign manufacturers basing entire product lines on variants and extensions of the RISC principles.

John Cocke, an IBM fellow, has been a research staff member at the IBM Thomas J. Watson Research Center since 1956. Among numerous industry honors, he was awarded the National Medal of Technology by President Bush in 1991 for his role in the development of RISC.

George Radin, an employee of the company since 1963, is an IBM fellow from the Santa Teresa Laboratory in San Jose, CA. He also works at the Watson Research Center.

Norman H. Kreitzer has been at the Watson Research Center since 1962. His research activities have concentrated on experimental and exploratory systems designs, and he has participated in several leading research activities including the design of the cache subsystem for the RISC project.

Francis P. Carrubba is a former IBM employee who is currently executive vice president and chief technical officer at Phillips Electronics N.V., in Eindhoven, the Netherlands. He was a member of the technical staff of IBM for 22 years.

The inventor of the year honor is presented by Intellectual Property Owners [IPO], a non-profit organization founded to strengthen the rights of patents, trademark, copyright, and trade secret owners. IPO works to protect and improve the intellectual property systems that are vital to America's technological and economic leadership by combining the voices of large, medium, and small businesses; universities; independent inventors and patent attorneys.

My congratulations to my fellow mid-Hudson Valley neighbors and IPO for fostering American ingenuity and technological advances.

TRIBUTE TO GLENN HEMMINGER

HON. PAUL E. GILLMOR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. GILLMOR. Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to pay tribute to Glenn Hemminger of Port Clinton, OH, who recently accepted an appointment to the U.S. Military Academy as a member of the class of 1996.

When I nominated Glenn Hemminger for admission to West Point, I knew I was nominating a young man with great potential for leadership. Whether as an All-Conference baseball player, an All-Academic football player, or a straight A student in Port Clinton High School's accelerated classes, Glenn Hemminger has demonstrated the ability to achieve excellence in all that he does.

In recent years, America has experienced the end of the cold war between the superpowers and defended self-determination in the Persian Gulf. American resolve has resulted in the new embrace of freedom and peace around the globe. These victories for our principles occurred in large part due to the honor, talent, and dedication of the men and women who serve this country in the U.S. Armed Forces. And the service academies are the linchpin of this distinguished military tradition.

By accepting his appointment to West Point, Glenn Hemminger is preparing to make a valued contribution to that tradition. I congratulate him, and wish him and his family all the best.

A TRIBUTE TO JACK BROWN

HON. JERRY LEWIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to your attention the fine work and outstanding public service of my good friend, Jack Brown of Redlands, CA. For years, his experience and commonsense approach to problem solving has made a real difference to the people of our community and the State of California. Jack will be appropriately recognized as a member of the Horatio Alger Association of Distinguished Americans at a dinner in his honor on May 1.

Many people know Jack as the chairman, president, and chief executive officer of Stater Brothers Markets. But Jack is also known as a man with a gift for giving. Among other things, he is proud that his grocery chain is the largest contributor to feeding the homeless in San Bernardino and Riverside Counties in California. One need only ask those who run the county food banks, or the hundreds of local agencies who serve the homeless, about Jack's commitment to people to get a true measure of the man.

Jack's success can be traced to his early days. He was the only child of a deputy sheriff who died when Jack was only 8 years old. His mom, who worked as a clerk for $12.50 a week and made a few extra dollars by sewing, provided inspiration and determination to her young son. He began mowing lawns and delivering newspapers at 10, and got his first big break at 13 when he was hired to stock shelves at the local grocery store. Little did he know at the time that this beginning would launch him into a career rich with promise and possibilities.

Following college and a stint with the Navy, he resumed his climb up the career ladder at Sage's Complete Market. At 28, he was the youngest vice president in the history of the store. After completing new challenges in Indiana, Texas, and Nebraska, Jack returned to San Bernardino in 1981 as president of Stater Brothers Markets. Today, with 10,000 employees and annual sales of $1.5 billion, Stater Brothers is the 30th largest retail chain in the country.

One of Jack's greatest contributions has been to the community he knows so well. He has embraced the local YMCA and Boy's Clubs, turned a hard-luck high school football program into a winner, and given generously of his time and energy as a coach and mentor and friend.

Jack Brown is one of those rare individuals who defines success by his ability to help others. Even today, as he inspires others to work hard and take risks, he continues to foster dreams and goals. Mr. Speaker, I ask that you join me, our colleagues, and friends in recognizing one of our country's finest. Jack's years of selfless dedication has made a real difference in the lives of many people and he is certainly worthy of recognition by the House of Representatives today.

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO ESTABLISH A COMMISSION TO INVESTIGATE THE GANDER PLANE CRASH

HON. ROBIN TALLON

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. TALLON. Mr. Speaker, I along with 18 House colleagues will introduce legislation to establish a commission to reopen the investigation into the Gander plane crash.

The commission will look into the many unanswered questions which surround the cause of the crash and the botched investigation which followed.

Seven years ago a military charter bringing 248 American soldiers home from a peace-keeping mission in the Middle East crashed over Gander, NF. It remains this country's worst military peace-time disaster, killing more soldiers than the military conflicts of Desert Storm, the Panama invasion and Grenada combined.

Questions still persist as to the cause of this tragedy. Rather than initiating its own investigation, the U.S. Government chooses to accept a disputed report from the deeply divided Canadian Commission. Almost half of the Canadian Board claimed that an explosion caused the plane to crash.

Even though it is standard procedure to investigate terrorism as a cause in any air disaster, no U.S. agency, including the Vice President's Task Force on Combating Terrorism and its chairman at the time, George Bush, ever investigated for the possibility of terrorism or foul play. This despite the fact that the terrorist group, Islamic Jihad, tried four times to take credit for the crash.

This government disregard for the evidence led to increased speculation as to the cause of the crash. It prompted an Arts and Entertainment Network documentary and a Time magazine feature article—both citing sabotage as the probable cause of the crash. Because the ongoing controversy interferes with the victims' families ability to go forward with their lives, I, along with 103 fellow Members of Congress, wrote to President Bush, asking for his help in investigating these claims. It is 2 years later and Mr. Bush still has not responded. The silence is inexcusable.

I am not here to endorse any theories. I simply want to do what I can to see that the crash is investigated the way it should have been done years ago.

The commission will study all the remaining evidence and outstanding issues regarding the plane crash. It will study the crash in the context of our heightened concern for terrorism in 1985. It will also establish the connection, if any, with the Iran-Contra network.

In addition it will investigate the performance of each U.S. Federal Government department or agency which was, or should have been, involved with the flight and the investigation of the crash.

Upon completion of this inquiry, the commission will issue a report detailing the events leading up to the plane crash, the crash itself and assign blame for the botched investigation which followed. The commission will have the power to hold hearings and subpoena information related to the crash.

It is time to honor the men and women who died in service to their country by doing what we can to end the speculation around their deaths. I hope this commission will provide the answers for the families and fellow Americans who have been unable to put this tragedy behind them.

I am submitting for the RECORD a copy of the Time magazine article and a summary of my bill.

[From Time magazine, Apr. 27, 1992]

GANDER: DIFFERENT CRASH, SAME QUESTIONS

(By Roy Rowan)

Flying home for Christmas in 1985, three years before the Pan Am bombing, 248 American soldiers and eight crew members died when their chartered DC-8 jet plunged to earth just after taking off from a refueling stop in Gander, Newfoundland. It was the worst U.S. military air disaster ever. Icing of the wings was immediately suggested as the cause, although Islamic Jihad terrorists just as quickly boasted of blowing up the jet.

It wasn't until 1989 that an Iran-contra connection to the tragedy was revealed. Arrow Air, the charter company, turned out to be one of Lieut. Colonel Oliver North's regular arms shippers. Although most of the crash victims belonged to the U.S. 101st Airborne Division, returning from six months' duty with the multinational peacekeeping force in the Sinai, more than 20 Special Forces personnel trained for counterterrorist missions were also on board. Suspicions have recently deepened that they, like Charles McKee and the members of his hostage-rescue team on Pan Am Flight 103, were the target of an attack.

Both the U.S. and Canadian governments seemed determined to literally bury any evidence that might point to such a conclusion. Major General John Crosby, then the U.S. Army's deputy chief of staff for personnel, arrived in Gander within hours of the tragedy. He was quoted by the Arrow Air maintenance chief as wanting to "bulldoze over the crash site immediately," although Crosby has denied it. Just as quickly, White House spokesman Larry Speakes assured the world there was "no evidence of sabotage or an explosion in flight."

In 1988, after interminable foot dragging and infighting, the nine-member Canadian Aviation Safety Board issued a split verdict. Five attributed the crash to ice formation and not to an explosion. But four, including two aeronautical engineers, disagreed so vociferously that a former Canadian supreme court justice was appointed to see if a new investigation should be opened. The evidence, wrote Justice Willard Estey, "does not support ice contamination." Nevertheless, he advised that further probing would be unfair to the victims' families. "It's for their sake that the case should be reopened," counters George Baker, the Liberal Party Member of Parliament from Gander, who lives one mile (1.6 km) from the crash site.

A new book titled Improbable Cause, written by Les Filotas, one of the dissenting air-safety board members, promises on its cover to expose the "deceit and dissent in the investigation." Filotas does that with a devastating accumulation of evidence spanning 553 pages. "Many of the experts involved in the investigation," says Filotas, "didn't realize they were participating in a cover-up."

Even sharper accusations are being leveled by M. Gene Wheaton, the private investigator appointed by the Families for Truth about Gander, Inc. The organization was founded in 1989 by Dr. J.D. Phillips and his wife Zona of St. Petersburg, Florida. As father and stepmother of one of the victims, they charged the U.S. with "failing to conduct a full inquest, or even revealing the facts it does possess."

As he pored over the forensic evidence, Wheaton became convinced that the plane had suffered a precrash explosion—and that there had been a U.S.-Canadian conspiracy to conceal the cause of the accident. "If the truth about this crash had gotten out in 1985," he says, "it would have exposed the Iran-contra scandal one year before it became public."

Wheaton knew many of the Iran-contra conspirators personally and had tracked their planes and pilots, making him a valuable source for congressional investigators trying to unravel the secret arms deals of Oliver North. Arrow Air, Wheaton instantly recognized, was a CIA-operated company.

To him, the evidence of a precrash explosion is overwhelming. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police obtained sworn statements from five witnesses who saw the DC-8 spewing flames before it fell. Judith Parsons, an airport rental-car agent, was warming up her automobiles out in the parking lot when she saw the sky light up. Suddenly "a large orange oval" appeared above the ground, she reported. "It just blew up and went everywhere, burning like cinders falling to the earth."

Rescue workers described charred bodies hanging from unscorched trees, indicating that some of the victims were already burned when they fell out of the sky. Autopsies also disclosed lethal doses of carbon monoxide and hydrogen cyanide in body tissues proving that the fire and explosion occurred while the passengers were still breathing. I. Irving Pinkel, a former NASA expert who also investigated Apollo 1's fatal fire, found two fuselage holes with an "outward pucker," indicating an explosion from within. Finally, four members of the refueling crew swore there was no icing problem before the plane took off.

Although the U.S. government stated that no explosives were aboard, fire fighters heard small arms popping all over the place and saw debris flying into the air from delayed explosions. "There were 30 to 40 such explosions," the Gander fire chief reported. Later, live rocket rounds were found among the wreckage, as was an 80-lb. (32-kg) duffel bag stuffed with U.S. currency.

As Wheaton probed deeper, he discovered that six heavy crates, which he suspects contained contraband arms, had been loaded into the jet's cargo bay in Cairo without military customs clearance. To squeeze them onto the plane required removing some of the soldiers' duffel bags. Gerald De Porter, the former Army customs inspector there, who is now working as a pharmacist in Fayetteville, North Carolina, says, "I couldn't check the cargo because I wasn't issued a pass to go out on the tarmac."

Wheaton also located witnesses who confirmed that weapons, including TOW anti-tank missiles, were being stockpiled in the Sinai. When he scrutinized Arrow Air's manifest, he discovered a mysterious Company E, consisting of 22 men who were not part of the 101st Airborne. All had the same MOS (Military Occupational Specialty) 11-H, indicating they were TOW gunners.

"At that moment the U.S. was in the process of selling thousands of TOW's to Iran," says Wheaton. "Since it's unlikely that we'd sell such sophisticated weapons without providing instructors, Company E may have been part of the arms-for-hostages deal."

Also aboard the doomed jet were about 20 members of Task Forces 160 and 163. These elite counterterrorist units included helicopter pilots, crew chiefs, mechanics and other support personnel often used on hostage-rescue missions. Zona Phillips picked up an intelligence report suggesting that they belonged to Seal Team 6, the commando unit poised to recapture the Achille Lauro off the Egyptian coast before the cruise ship's hijackers surrendered.

"Task Force 160 may have actually attempted but failed to free the hostages," says Wheaton. He points out that North had precise intelligence on the hostages' location. Five of the six Americans were being held in Building No. 18 in the Sheik Abdullah barracks in the Baalbek region of Lebanon. "Very possible," adds Wheaton. "North ordered the raid after irate Iranian officials threatened to retaliate for a shipment of the wrong Hawk missiles." In fact, three days before the Gander crash, North revealed both his determination to continue the Iranian arms shipments and his concern for the hostages' safety. "To stop now in midstream," he wrote, "would ignite Iranian fire. Hostages would be our minimum losses."

Another mystery surrounding the Gander crash are the lingering ailments that plague many of the fire fighters and other rescue workers, whose liver enzyme rate was found to be abnormally high. They had been warned to watch out for nerve-gas canisters. However, Wheaton says, "the real hazard was possible radiation poisoning from nuclear backpacks, portable units with timing devices that Special Forces personnel sometimes carry to blow up bridges and block their pursuers."

The suspicious symptoms of the rescue workers have been hotly debated in Canada. A Health and Welfare department study attributed the illnesses to "mass hysteria," "post-traumatic syndrome" and "eating too much moose meat," since many of the men were avid hunters. But M.P. George Baker claims that the investigating physicians took no blood samples or X rays, attempting merely to compile what he called a "theoretical study." He also asserts that two of the three doctors refused to sign the final report. The threat of radiation poisoning may explain why General Crosby wanted to bulldoze over the wreckage so quickly.

While the wreckage in Lockerbie was meticulously sifted for bomb clues, no such effort was made in Gander. Yet there was good reason to take seriously the Islamic Jihad's boast that it had blown up the Arrow Air jet. Telephone calls claiming responsibility for the crash were immediately received by both the U.S. consulate in Oran, Algeria, and Reuters news agency in Beirut. The Beirut caller even knew that the plane had been delayed for five hours in Cologne, and explained that was why it blew up over Canada instead of over the U.S. He said the Shi'ite Muslim extremist group planted a bomb on board to prove "our ability to strike at the Americans anywhere."

A bomb, Wheaton contends, could have been planted on the plane in the Cairo airport, where a 30-minute blackout occurred during loading and where, he says, Egyptian baggage handlers were unsupervised by Americans. One month after the crash, the American embassy in Mauritius received a letter signed "Sons of Zion." It described how the Arrow Air jet was "sabotaged" by a "cold-blooded, premeditated act  a few hours before take-off with the complicity of several Egyptian and Libyan mechanics."

Repeated efforts by the Families for Truth About Gander to open FBI files about the crash have failed. Democratic Congressman Robin Tallon of South Carolina has tried to help. Two years ago, he persuaded 103 other members of the House of Representatives to petition President Bush to initiate an "investigation to explore all possible crash theories." Bush never responded. Tallon, who says that up until then he had frequently visited the White House, says he was never invited back. "The FBI and CIA have also sealed me off," Tallon complains. "They don't even answer my phone calls."

The House Judiciary Subcommittee on Crime and Criminal Justice held a two-day hearing on the crash in December 1990. It ended without a call for action, despite surprising revelations of FBI apathy. Last week Tallon announced that he would introduce a bill to establish a commission with full subpoena power to investigate the crash the way it should have been examined seven years ago.

At that time the FBI's forensic team had flown to Newfoundland on the day of the crash, then sat in a Gander motel, the subcommittee found, awaiting "whatever reports or conclusions Canadian authorities saw fit to share with them. After a mere 36 hours the agents accepted a declaration that 'terrorism was not involved,' and returned home." The FBI claimed the Canadians did not allow its agents to visit the crash site or to participate in the investigation. But nothing prevented the bureau from launching a worldwide hunt for terrorist involvement, as it did after the Pan Am bombing.

LA CASONA

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to recognize the La Casona Restaurant, which was recently featured in the Miami Herald. The article, "Valls Family's La Casona Offers 'Creative Cuisine'" by Marilyn Garateix tells about this latest addition to Miami's many fine restaurants:

When Felipe Valls Jr. and his dad decided to open another Cuban restaurant, this time they took a new tack.

"Most typical Cuban restaurants are more casual," said Felipe Valls Jr. He and his dad already own such a place, the landmark Versailles Restaurant on Southwest Eighth Street.

"We wanted an elegant Cuban restaurant with a twist," Valls Jr. said.

So La Casona at 6355 SW Eighth St. offers what he calls "creative Cuban cuisine," basic Cuban dishes with different touches.

There's breaded steak with tomato sauce, ham and cheese gratin; crispy rounds of green plantains with caviar, sour cream and garnish; and creamy rice pudding served in a crunchy almond petal.

But some of the classics still remain. Like black beans, arroz con pollo, tamales, masitas de puerco (fried pork chunks) and flan.

The restaurant's two chefs are Cuban and Spanish, Valls Jr. said. Entree prices range from $11 to $25.

"It's fantastic," said Rebeca Sosa, a West Miami council member who has eaten at La Casona. "It's very cozy, there is good parking and the service is good. I think they have a good opportunity there."

La Casona, which opened Feb. 20, is the fourth restaurant owned or co-owned by the Vallses on Southwest Eighth Street. They co-own La Casona with Jose More, the restaurateur responsible for several El Segundo Viajantes, another well-known chain of Cuban restaurants.

In addition to La Casona and the Versailles Restaurant at 3555 SW Eighth St., the Vallses also own La Carreta, 3632 SW Eighth St., and Casa Juancho Spanish restaurant at 2436 SW Eighth St.

In all, the Vallses own 10 restaurants in Dade County.

They spent $500,000 renovating the 200-seat La Casona and making it look like the Spanish haciendas that used to grace Cuba. Valls Jr. said. The designer who did the work used old photographs, he said.

The restaurant features stately columns on the outside. A lithograph showing a panoramic view of 1854 Cuba adorns a wall in the restaurant's foyer.

Paintings by Felix Ramos, Francisco Casas and other Cuban artists hang on the walls, and a musician at a grand piano entertains diners.

I am happy to pay tribute to Felipe Valls, Jr., his father, and Jose More for their latest contribution to Miami's wide variety of ethnic cuisine. The Valls family have a long tradition of helping our community and we all wish them much success in this new venture.

TRIBUTE TO JOAN HERTZMARK

HON. BARNEY FRANK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. FRANK of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, we in this House talk a great deal about the virtues of voluntarism. Today I want to talk about the enormous dedication, hard work, and creativity of one outstanding volunteer—Joan Hertzmark who has just stepped down as chair of the Democratic town committee of the town of Brookline. For as long as most of us now active in politics can remember, Joan Hertzmark has been the model of a good citizen in a democracy. Serving in the volunteer position as chair of one of the most active, best organized local party organizations anywhere in America, Joan Hertzmark has selflessly dedicated her time and energies to trying to make this a better country and better world. Joan Hertzmark brought to the job of chairing a local party committee an inexhaustible supply of energy, a limitless store of integrity, a selflessness rare in or out of politics, and an unbounded commitment to social justice and fairness in American life. The list of those of us who have been the beneficiaries of her great work is a very long one. It would be a mistake for me to try to recreate it here, but one example of a man who gladly tells people of his enormous debt to Joan will, I think, demonstrate the point: Michael Dukakis was a young, upcoming town political figure when he first became the recipient of Joan Hertzmark's help, and I have frequently heard him talk movingly of the debt he feels to her unselfish political commitment.

Joan Hertzmark is of course a great liberal, Mr. Speaker, but the value of her example to others transcends any particular ideology. Many people today object that they feel unrepresented, unheard, and thus dissatisfied with the political process. No better antidote to those sorts of feelings exist than the kind of activity that has been—and will continue to be—central to the life of Joan Hertzmark. She made her presence felt, helped make her values a reality, and has contributed as much as anyone I ever met to making the democracy of America a reality. I regret her very understandable decision to step down as local party chair after all these years. And I rejoice in knowing that her energies will still be available on behalf of the causes she cares so deeply about.

HEATHWOOD HALL EPISCOPAL SCHOOL OF COLUMBIA: A STRAIGHT "A" REPORT CARD

HON. FLOYD SPENCE

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Speaker, we are confronted every day with reports on the dire condition and problems facing education in America. Rarely are we offered any news of a program that works or a school that excels. Thus, I am heartily pleased to share with my colleagues the name of one such exemplary school: the Heathwood Hall Episcopal School of Columbia.

Located in my district of Columbia, SC, the Heathwood Hall Episcopal School of Columbia, was founded 40 years ago. Now four decades later, this school has received State and national recognition for its fine programs, an exemplary scholastic record, and the contributions its students make to the community. For example, one of the graduation requirements the school has implemented is 80 hours of volunteer service by each student. The success of this initiative has been extraordinary; students take an active role in caring for the less fortunate and thereby improve their community, but it also instills the student with the first hand knowledge of the merits and rewards of volunteer service.

The recognition of the innovative programs the Heathwood Hall Episcopal School of Columbia is not limited to South Carolina; Heathwood has received national accolades and was one of the first 60 schools in the United States to receive citation as an "Exemplary School" by the National Commission on Excellence in Education and the Council for Advancement of Private Education.

Mr. Speaker, I know that my colleagues will want to join me in congratulating the Heathwood Hall Episcopal School of Columbia on 40 years of providing award-winning education in Columbia, SC, and will join me in wishing them continued success in the years ahead.

JEAN MAYER TRIBUTE

HON. BILL RICHARDSON

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride that I bring to my colleagues' attention the outstanding work of a devoted educator at my alma mater, Tufts University in Medford, MA. Tufts University President Jean Mayer was recently honored with a rousing tribute in the New York Times.

Reporter Fox Butterfield eloquently and accurately describes how Dr. Mayer single-handedly transformed Tufts from a small liberal arts college into a research university of world renown. Dr. Meyer, who has served as president since 1976, will resign at the end of the next academic year to take on the new post of chancellor.

Mr. Speaker, as Dr. Meyer prepares for his transition from president to chancellor, I invite my colleagues to wish Dr. Meyer well as he continues his pursuit to bring excellence to Tufts University. I have attached Mr. Butterfield's article for my colleagues' review.

TUFTS PRESIDENT HELPS HIS UNIVERSITY STAND TALL AMID GIANTS OF ACADEME

(By Fox Butterfield)

MEDFORD, MASS.—When Jean Mayer became president of Tufts University in 1976 it had never had a capital fund-raising campaign, and university administrators counseled him to limit a drive he was planning to $14 million. "Nonsense," Dr. Mayer said. "Let's make it $140 million."

In the end Dr. Mayer, a French-born scientist and expert on nutrition, raised $145 million. The drive was only one of several important steps Dr. Mayer has taken to help transform Tufts from a small, once-overlooked liberal arts college into a research university with a growing international reputation and a much-improved faculty and student body.

Dr. Mayer, who is 72 years old, has announced that he will resign at the end of the 1993 academic year and be elevated to the new post of chancellor. And there is widespread agreement here that the charming, talkative and often-stubborn Dr. Mayer has helped give Tufts a new sense of identity, bringing it out from under the shadow of neighboring universities like Harvard and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

A HIGHER PUBLIC PROFILE

"Jean has made some substantial achievements," said James O. Freedman, the president of Dartmouth College. In addition to helping Tufts raise the academic quality of its incoming freshmen, Mr. Freedman said, Dr. Mayer has used his own "well-established reputation to give Tufts a higher public profile."

Last Friday, for example, Mr. Freedman and Dr. Mayer announced an agreement to establish an innovative program under which students at Tufts' Fletcher School of Business Administration can earn a joint degree in international business.

Dr. Allan Callow, a professor of surgery at Washington University in St. Louis who is chairman of the Council of the Boards of Overseers of Tufts, said that one of Dr. Mayer's most important contributions was that he had "convinced the faculty and the administrators that they had the potential for being a world-class university."

"There is a bit of the evangelist about him," Dr. Callow said of Dr. Mayer (pronounced my-YAIR).

LIST OF ACCOMPLISHMENTS

Among Dr. Mayer's most important accomplishments have been the creation of a graduate school of nutrition, the building of New England's only school of veterinary medicine and the establishment of a center for environmental management. Tufts has also become less of a parochial New England institution; the number of foreign students has doubled since 1986 and the university now runs a popular European center in a converted 11th-century monastery at Talloires, France.

The university's financial condition has greatly improved; Dr. Mayer has seen the endowment increase to $200 million from $30 million when he arrived. This year Tufts, which has 4,300 undergraduates and 2,200 graduate students, is scheduled to complete a second capital campaign with a goal of $250 million.

In addition, Tufts has become much more selective in its admissions policy. University officials said that the percentage of incoming freshmen who ranked in the top 10 percent of their high school graduating class rose to 74 percent last year from 38 percent in 1976, and that the Scholastic Aptitude Test scores of students admitted to Tufts had increased, too.

Luck has played a role, too. Medford, where Tufts is situated, is only five miles northwest of Boston, which has become an increasingly popular mecca for college students in recent years and has helped make the university more attractive than other colleges and universities in rural parts of the country.

ON PAR WITH NORTHWESTERN

Tufts may not yet have the prestige of the top Ivy League schools. Its yield—the percentage of applicants it admits who actually accept—was 35 percent last year. At Brown and Dartmouth, by comparison, the yield was 52 percent, officials there said.

But that yield puts Tufts on a par with such highly regarded schools as Carleton College in Minnesota or Northwestern University in Illinois, according to several admissions officials at other universities.

Despite his achievements, Dr. Mayer has not escaped criticism. The most persistent complaint is that to attract more money and raise the university's reputation he has favored its graduate schools, slighting the original liberal arts college.

In particular, there is broad resentment among many faculty members over the veterinary school, which is in Grafton, 40 miles west of Medford. Although it is partly financed by the state, the school has run deficits of as much as $3 million a year, university officials say, and many professors believe the arts and sciences college has had to make up the debt.

COVERING THE DEFICIT

In a recent interview Dr. Mayer acknowledged that about half of Tufts' current budget is devoted to the university's health schools, including an expanded medical school in downtown Boston. But he insisted, "We have never taken money from another school and put it in the veterinary school."

Instead, said Steve Manos, the executive vice president of Tufts, the deficit has been covered by money from the university's reserves or annual earnings.

Dr. Mayer sees the veterinary school as a major investment that will eventually pay big dividends. When he retires next year and becomes chancellor, he said, he plans to oversee the development of a large industrial park next to the veterinary school for biotechnology companies, a rapidly growing industry in Massachusetts.

Dr. Mayer has also begun work on a $1 billion project near the railroad yards behind Boston's South Station, adjacent to Tufts' medical school, for pharmaceutical research and manufacturing. "This will bring in a replacement industry for defense electronics for Massachusetts," he predicted.

In an effort to redress the balance between the graduate schools and the college, Dr. Mayer has built a series of new facilities for undergraduates in the last few years, including an arts center, a language center, a science center and a dormitory.

But many undergraduates still feel that Dr. Mayer's emphasis on the graduate schools has taken a toll on their education. In a speech last week to the trustees, Alexa Leon-Prado, the president of the student government, said students "are made aware of this each time they call a friend at Harvard to borrow a book," because of the lack of an adequate library.

Nevertheless, Ms. Leon-Prado, a senior from Irvine, Calif., credited Dr. Mayer with having done "an amazing job" in building up the university's reputation. "I don't think I would have come to Tufts if he hadn't made it what it is," she said.

LET'S RECOGNIZE OUR VOLUNTEERS

HON. DAVID DREIER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Speaker, President Bush's call for increased voluntarism in America has rejuvenated our country's commitment to assisting those in need. From Big Brother and Big Sister programs, to efforts which combat illiteracy, a surge in voluntarism throughout our country is clearly evident.

In my district, many private organizations are reaching out to help their fellow citizens. One such group, the Volunteer Center of the Greater Pomona Valley, has traditionally sponsored an annual Blue Ribbon Week, which is running now from April 26 through May 2.

Throughout this week, volunteers and others are wearing blue ribbons in an effort to recognize the significant and unselfish contributions that volunteers make to their communities. On my end, I'm currently conducting my annual youth volunteer award program which draws attention to the many dedicated young people in my district who routinely volunteer their services to many causes.

We all need to do our part to improve our communities and help our fellow citizens. It's the private organizations, like the Greater Pomona Volunteer Center, that help pave the way toward success for many needy individuals.

INTRODUCTION OF RESOLUTION TO RE-OPEN THE INVESTIGATION OF THE 1985 U.S. MILITARY CRASH IN GANDER, NF

HON. ALAN WHEAT

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. WHEAT. Mr. Speaker, on December 12, 1985, 248 U.S. soldiers lost their lives over the predawn skies of Gander, NF. It was the worst military aircraft disaster in U.S. history.

Among the many soldiers aboard that ill-fated flight was a young staff sergeant by the name of Brian Easley, a son of James and Shirley Easley of Independence MO. Like the rest of the passengers, Brian was looking forward to spending Christmas with his family after a long tour of duty in the Middle East. But that was not to be.

Since the tragedy, the Easleys, like scores of other families around the country, have been seeking the answer to one seemingly simple but elusive question: Why did my child die? Over 6 years later, they have yet to get an answer.

Despite the unprecedented nature of this tragedy, troubling questions about the cause of the crash remain unaddressed. Today, we still have no clear idea what brought the plane down. The only thing we do know is that from virtually the time that the crash occurred, our Government has failed to make a complete effort to get to the bottom of this tragedy.

Although icing on the wings of the plane was originally cited as the cause of the crash, that theory was roundly refuted by a host of credible experts. Although terrorist groups initially took responsibility for the crash, these claims were never fully investigated by our Government.

Over 100 Members of Congress wrote to the President in 1989 urging the administration to undertake a full-scale investigation; we are still waiting to receive a substantive response. Indeed, despite repeated attempts, Congressman ROBIN TALLON and I, and many other Members of Congress have been either rebuffed or ignored by the administration.

Now we are convinced that the only way to begin to answer some of the painful and troubling questions about the crash is by establishing an independent commission to re-open the investigation.

After all, in order to get answers, the right questions must first be asked. At this point in time, I am not at all convinced that the administration will ever begin a serious attempt to ask the hard questions, let alone seek out the answers.

It is our hope and expectation that the commission will be able to do both.

The Easleys and other families of the victims of the crash demand and deserve nothing less. And the citizens of our country expect the fullest possible explanation of what happened at Gander to help ensure that another tragedy like this never occurs again.

RENAMING THE BEAVER, UT, POST OFFICE TO HONOR ABE MURDOCK

HON. JAMES V. HANSEN

OF UTAH

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today on behalf of the citizens of Beaver, UT, to introduce H.R. 4786. This legislation pays tribute to an extraordinary man—Mr. Abe Murdock. Indeed, it is an honor to bring a bill to the floor which proposes to rename Beaver's post office as the Abe Murdock United States Post Office Building.

Abe Murdock was elected county attorney of Beaver County in 1923 and established a respected reputation as a specialist in irrigation law. He held this position until he was elected to the House of Representatives in 1932. He served three terms as a Representative, where he was a strong defender of working people and organized labor. In 1941, Abe Murdock won a seat in the Senate. As a Senator, he was actively involved in guaranteeing Utah was granted its fair share of water from the Colorado River. He was a member of the Senate Committees on Public Lands and Surveys; Territories and Insular Affairs; Post Offices and Post Roads; Banking and Commerce; and Judiciary. His influence contributed greatly to Utah's becoming a leading State in the West.

In 1949, President Truman appointed him to the National Labor Relations board where he served two 5-year terms. He was then appointed to a Presidential panel which addressed labor-management relations in the atomic energy industry, where he made a significant contribution.

Abe Murdock was a man of integrity and fortitude. He represented Utah with strength and dignity. His family, friends, and associates urge your support in placing his name on the Beaver City Post Office to honor his many years of public services.

SUNSWEEP GROWERS CELEBRATES 75TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. VIC FAZIO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor one of California's and America's finest farmer-owned and operated cooperatives, Sunsweet Growers. This year Sunsweet celebrates 75 years of growth and prosperity. Founded in 1917, Sunsweet has since confronted and overcome hard economic times and an increasingly competitive market. Today, Sunsweet is the world's largest prune producer and handler, as well as a stabilizing force for the entire industry.

At the heart of Sunsweet are the 603 farm family members in my Congressional district and in other areas who farm over 41,000 acres of prune trees. These small, family farms are not only a vital and integral part of the Sunsweet cooperative, but are key elements of local communities and economies in my Congressional district. Their efforts and dedication to the production and marketing of a quality product is evident from the success and growth of Sunsweet.

Sunsweet's processing facilities, located in Yuba City, CA, have efficiently and effectively met the growing demands and needs of domestic and international markets. With over 22 acres under roof, the Yuba City plant is the world's largest, employing over 400 local citizens and making a vital contribution to the regional economy, as well as the economies of California and the Nation.

Sunsweet looks optimistically toward a future of continued growth as consumers become aware of the considerable nutritional value and many health benefits provided by prunes. High in fiber and iron, prunes also supplement a diet with Vitamin A and potassium. Increased consumer demand and over $200 million in annual sales in more than 30 countries has resulted from a combination of heightened public health awareness and prudent marketing strategies. For instance, a new marketing campaign has advanced the sale of prunes by promoting prune puree as a baking substitute for butter, margarine, and oil. The prune puree cuts the percentage of fat by 70 to 90 percent, calories by 20 to 30 percent, and cholesterol to zero.

I am proud to represent such a successful and praiseworthy enterprise. Sunsweet Growers represent the best that America has to offer. It is people-based cooperatives such as Sunsweet Growers that deserve our recognition and respect for their years of commitment to preserving our agricultural heritage and farm-based communities. So, Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I take this opportunity to salute Sunsweet Growers and congratulate them for 75 years of success and prosperity.

TIME TO START HEALING PROCESS IN THE BALKANS

HON. WAYNE OWENS

OF UTAH

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. OWENS of Utah. Mr. Speaker, as I rise today, the Serbian Army, backed by the federal forces of the former country of Yugoslavia, is killing innocent civilians in Bosnia-Herzegovina. Since April 7, over 190,000 people have fled their homes in the wake of bombing, shelling, gunfire, and deprivation.

We hear of a cease-fire, yet see the continued suffering. After nearly a year of violence, where is the State Department? As a recent New York Times editorial pointed out, what would we do if Bosnia had oil?

Mr. Speaker, I will soon be introducing legislation to ban United States assistance for Serbia and Montenegro, and to call on the President to derecognize Yugoslavia. In addition, my legislation will free Yugoslavian assets in the United States.

It is time to end the killing and start a healing process in the Balkans. But this will only be successful if Serbia is convinced to participate. I hope my legislation will be persuasive and I urge the administration to act, not just talk.

CONGRESSIONAL BOON-DOGGLE AT HARVARD

HON. TOM DELAY

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. DELAY. Mr. Speaker, recent polls show that less than 20 percent of the American people trust the U.S. Congress. And it's no wonder. One of the first acts a Representative-elect does is to attend a seminar put on by a liberal Ivy League school. Members-elect attending this partially tax-funded seminar at Harvard, soon after congressional elections, get an unhealthy dose of liberal opinions on a wide variety of subjects. They are already spending tax dollars on themselves and they have not even been sworn in as Members of Congress.

Mr. Speaker, is this Harvard tax-funded boondoggle for congressional freshmen really the best way to orient a new Representative to the U.S. Congress? Earlier this month, we learned about similar junkets by Members of Congress in a General Accounting Office report which stated that Air Congress has been flying out of control. Hundreds of noncongressional official trips each year all over the world and the United States are taken by Members of Congress costing the taxpayers an estimated $50 million a year.

The Washington Times has run a series of articles showing how Congress, especially Members of this House, tap into a stealthlike budget of free travel services plus free accommodations at hotels, meals, and even cash per diems for their trips. Yes, the congressional freshmen orientation at Harvard doesn't cost millions of dollars. But even the thousands of dollars of tax money used for this congressional boondoggle sets a bad example for new Members of Congress.

Mr. Speaker, grass-roots organizations have conducted orientations which did not cost the American taxpayers one dollar. Some of these have been set up by Coalitions for America, the Council for National Policy, Free Congress, and Free the Eagle. Members of Congress and heads of these grass-roots organizations give a thoroughly professional and informative orientation. This is the approach that the American people would expect new Members of Congress to take.

SALUTE TO ASIAN PACIFIC AMERICAN HERITAGE MONTH

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to salute the celebration of Asian Pacific American Heritage Month during the month of May. In Sacramento on Friday, May 1, 1992, the Asian Pacific State Employees Association [APSEA] and numerous other community organizations will gather at a reception at the Sacramento History Museum to kick off a month-long calendar of activities.

This year's theme, "A Decade of Change," aptly reflects the growing Asian and Pacific cultural and ethnic diversity in California and Sacramento. This year, Asian and Pacific Islander Americans number nearly 3 million in California and over 7 million in the Nation. Whether here for many generations or newly arrived—we celebrate and share the richness that our diversity has to offer. Along with the social, political, and economic contributions that such diversity brings, we must stand vigilant in the face of those who would misunderstand diversity as a threat and who would translate that misunderstanding into racial hatred. We must move beyond embracing the cultural diversity of California and the Nation as a whole and act as an agent of education and positive change in America.

Mr. Speaker, the Sacramento community is in a far better position for ethnic understanding thanks to the commitment of co-chairs Elaine T. Chiao and Theresa Lee, APSEA president Jim Kahue, and numerous other individuals and organizations. I ask that my colleagues join me in saluting Asian Pacific American Heritage Month and the fine work of Asian Pacific Americans in Sacramento.

FIRST PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH:
CELEBRATING 170 YEARS OF SERVICE TO FAITH AND COMMUNITY

HON. STEPHEN J. SOLARZ

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to the First Presbyterian Church of Brooklyn on the magnificent occasion of its 170th anniversary.

Located in the historic Brooklyn Heights section of my district, First Presbyterian Church was founded by 10 Brooklyn residents on April 16, 1822. It was originally known as the Brick Church and was then situated on the site where Plymouth Church now stands. It soon became the central meeting house of the young village of Brooklyn and, on April 8, 1934, the church was used to celebrate the incorporation of Brooklyn.

In 1846, the noted architect, W.B. Olmstead designed the present magnificent edifice on 124 Henry Street. Anyone who has been privileged to visit this building can understand why it is often described as a "tower of inspiration and visual beauty." Until the 20th century, when new buildings sprung up in Brooklyn, the church's 90-foot tower was a beacon clearly visible from lower Manhattan, New York Harbor, and the far reaches of our borough.

Through the generosity of its many well-served friends and supporters, Brooklyn Heights Presbyterian has received a number of gifts over the years. In addition to its beautiful building, the church is blessed by an array of artifacts of great artistic and historic significance. I can't count the number of times that I have stood and gazed with awe and wonder at the Tiffany windows and the Van Zoeren organ, to name but two examples.

I would also like to pay tribute to an individual who is truly the heart and soul of this vibrant congregation. My dear friend, Dr. Paul Smith, is one of New York's most respected and admired religious and community leaders. He is the first African-American preacher to serve a Brooklyn Heights congregation. His leadership has inspired the members of the church to spearhead efforts to address not only their spiritual needs, but the needs of the community. I am proud of the programs that deal with adult education, youth enrichment, supporting the elderly, and aiding the homeless that have been run with great success by Brooklyn Heights Presbyterian.

And I would be remiss if I didn't also note that the congregants of this church are among the most committed individuals to the causes of world peace and social justice of any that I have ever known.

First Presbyterian continues to build on its proud and distinguished history of service to its faith and to the rich, diverse communities of Brooklyn. The congregation is still growing and attracting people of all races and cultures. Its physical tower served for decades as a visible beacon in the community. Now, the congregation serves as an example of the promise and possibilities of a group of people—different and diverse as they may be—who are united by their faith and their commitment to humanity.

DICK ZIMMER SALUTES THE MORRIS COUNTY HOSPICE

HON. DICK ZIMMER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. ZIMMER. Mr. Speaker, on May 2, 1992, the Hospice of Morris County will be celebrating the successful culmination of its first 10 years of service to the terminally ill and their loved ones.

Since it was established in 1982, the Hospice of Morris County has given sensitive care and comfort to more than 2,000 patients and their families. Through a combination of trained staff and volunteers, the recipients of their services are provided with appropriate nursing care, emotional support, transportation, companionship, and respite care to ease the pain when cure no longer seems a realistic expectation. The Hospice workers are available 24 hours a day, 7 days a week, 365 days a year.

The same high-quality services are always provided, regardless of a family's financial status. Committed leadership, community involvement, and the support of Federal, State, and county legislators have enabled the Hospice of Morris County to celebrate this milestone and look forward to entering its "Second Decade of Caring."

Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues to join me and the many whose lives have been touched by its care in saluting the Hospice of Morris County for its dedication to the families it serves.

THE 90TH ANNIVERSARY OF CONGREGATION POILE ZEDEK

HON. BERNARD J. DWYER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. DWYER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, on Sunday May 3, 1992, Congregation Poile Zedek will be celebrating its 90th anniversary.

The Congregation Poile Zedek is an Orthodox Jewish Congregation and is the oldest Orthodox Jewish Synagogue in New Brunswick, NJ. It is a successor to the Independent Laborer's Benefit Association of the city of New Brunswick, NJ, which was incorporated in accordance with the laws of our State, on November 18, 1901.

On August 24, 1924, the name was formally changed to Poile Zedek Congregation. The congregation is self-sustaining and has been an integral part of the Jewish Community of the city of New Brunswick, as well as the State of New Jersey, since its inception.

The congregation has existed at its present location since 1925, where religious services are held daily.

A vital part of Poile Zedek Congregation is the sisterhood of the congregation, which engages in fundraising functions for the congregation and donates proceeds to Jewish religious organizations and charities, such as its recent contribution for the benefit of the Ethiopian tragedy.

The 90 years of service provided to the community by the Poile Zedek Congregation, Mr. Speaker, will hopefully continue to enrich the lives of the many people who are the recipients of its work.

THE DEFENSE COMMUNITIES JOB TRAINING ACT

HON. SAM GEJDENSON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. GEJDENSON. Mr. Speaker, reductions in the national defense budget are having a devastating effect on defense dependent communities across the country. As contracts to major defense facilities are slashed, thousands of workers are being laid off not only in the defense industry but in the surrounding community as well. Defense engineers to area teachers will be needing job search counseling and job retraining to survive.

Under the Job Training Partnership Act [JTPA], these workers can only qualify for counseling and retraining services once they receive notification that they are going to be laid off. In most cases, that gives them a mere 60 days to be retrained and find a new job. This is simply not enough time for workers to take classes, learn a new trade, and market their skills in a sluggish economy.

It would be much more effective then, for people working in defense dependent communities to receive counseling and training services before they are laid off so they can prepare themselves for other forms of employment as the defense industry scales down.

Instead of sending workers off an economic cliff without a safety net as the President would like, Congressman JACK REED of Rhode Island and I are introducing a bill that expands the JTPA to allow workers in defense dependent communities to get the job-search counseling and retraining they need before they receive their lay off notice. Since defense cutbacks will not only affect workers employed by defense contractors, but also those in businesses surrounding big defense facilities, this bill allows all workers in a defense-dependent community to be eligible for the job-search counseling and retraining services offered under the JTPA. This legislation is a cost-effective way to approach the scaling down of the Nation's defense budget. Money spent on job training and job-search counseling will prevent more costly outlays in unemployment compensation, food stamps, and Aid to Families with Dependent Children [AFDC].

The heroes of the cold war have spent the last 40 years producing state-of-the-art defense systems which proved their success countless times—most recently in the Persian Gulf war. While this legislation is not the sole answer to the problems facing defense-dependent communities in these times of shrinking defense budgets, it is an important start. We must assist those communities, who have given so much to the defense of our Nation, to diversify and convert their economic bases. The people in these communities deserve more than a layoff notice for their tireless dedication to this Nation's defense. This legislation gives them the tools they need to rebuild their lives.

I urge my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to support this legislation which aims to give American workers the help they need to become and remain competitive in the post-cold-war work force.

CONGRESS IS OUT OF CONTROL

HON. RON PACKARD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday April 29, 1992

Mr. PACKARD. Mr. Speaker, Congress is out of control. It has been mired in scandal after scandal; it continues to exempt itself from the laws it passes for the rest of the country; it spends the taxpayers' hard earned money foolishly and indiscriminately.

I rise today to urge the leadership to act in the fight against wasteful spending. Congress has failed to balance the budget for the last 23 years. Our budget deficit is expected to reach $401 billion and the national debt is projected to climb to $4.1 trillion. This is the direct by-product of irresponsible spending.

The President transmitted three separate rescission messages to Congress. As a Member of congressional porkbusters, I ask the Speaker to acknowledge the bipartisan support for an up or down vote for every one of these rescissions, which have been introduced as 96 individual bills. I am an original cosponsor of these bills, and believe that Congress should go on record on this issue. We must cut pork from the Federal budget. It is the only way to begin to combat the mountain of debt we have built.

I urge my colleagues today to rescind the funds for these foolish projects which serve no other purpose than to add fat and largesse to an already bloated Federal budget.

AST RESEARCH NAMED TO FORTUNE 500, FORBES PROFITS 500 LISTS

HON. C. CHRISTOPHER COX

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. COX of California. Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to honor a company that is blazing new trails in the personal computer industry. AST Research, a personal computer manufacturer headquartered in my district in Irvine, CA, last week was named the 431st largest U.S. industrial corporation by Fortune magazine in its renowned "Fortune 500" list. AST is the first personal computer company to be added to the list since 1986.

AST's performance over the last year has been nothing short of extraordinary. AST's ranking is based on sales of $688.5 million for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1991, a 29-percent gain over the previous year. Net earnings increased 84 percent to $64.7 million during that same period.

More important, this fabulous record shows that America can compete in international markets. European revenues for AST Research increased more than 60 percent in fiscal year 1991. AST recently became the No. 1 PC supplier to the Hong Kong market, surpassing IBM. And AST is also one of the first U.S. personal computer manufacturers to enter the Japanese market with a system that operates in both English and Japanese. Mr. Speaker, this fine company wears the "Made in America" label proudly and profitably around the world.

Perhaps more impressive than its inclusion in the Fortune 500 list is AST's ascension to Forbes magazine's list of the 500 most profitable U.S. corporations. AST Research was ranked No. 451 in this year's "Forbes Profits 500" list, making it the only personal computer company to be added to both of these prestigious lists this year.

During this difficult period of recession and intense competition among PC vendors, AST's inclusion in the Forbes Profits 500 list is even more remarkable than making the Fortune 500 list, which is based solely on sales. AST's ranking resulted from its net earnings of $70.1 million for calendar year 1991, a 34 percent gain over 1990. Total revenues increased 41 percent to $827.3 million in 1991.

AST's formula for success includes a sound business model based on years of investment in research and development, and manufacturing efficiency that provides customers with state-of-the-art products at affordable prices. But, without a doubt, its biggest asset is the hard working and dedicated team that has allowed the company to go so far since it was founded just over 10 years ago. It gives me great pleasure, Mr. Speaker, to extend my congratulations to the folks at AST Research for a job well done, and to offer my colleagues in the Congress a helpful tip: Keep your eyes on AST Research. They are going places.

THE NEW SCOOP ON VITAMINS

HON. DEAN A. GALLO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. GALLO. Mr. Speaker, the following is a recent article from Time magazine entitled "The New Scoop on Vitamins" by Anastasia Toufexis. I commend it to my colleagues as one of the most comprehensive and balanced pieces of journalism I have seen on this subject.

[From Time magazine, Apr. 6, 1992]

THE NEW SCOOP ON VITAMINS

(By Anastasia Toufexis)

It's raining. Flooding, to be precise. But business is as brisk as ever at Mrs. Gooch's natural-foods market in West Los Angeles. As usual, traffic is backed up along Palms Boulevard as drivers wait for a spot in the store's parking lot. Inside, crowds jam the supplement section, which gleams with row upon row of small, white-capped vials. Here the true believers in the gospel of vitamins linger over labels, comparing brand names and dosages, trading health sermons and nutritional arcana. They discuss the relative merits of Buffered C and Lysine, as opposed to Bio-C Plus Rose Hips, or perhaps Bio-Absorbate Vitamin C Complex capsules. There are no fewer than 10 types and dosages of vitamin C to choose from, not to mention eight of vitamin E.

Maryanne Latimer is among the faithful. A middle-age massage therapist, she has been plagued by chronic fatigue syndrome and has therefore expanded her usual menu of vitamins and minerals. She shops at Mrs. Gooch's about once a week, in addition to other vitamin shops. "I take tons of vitamin C and E," she admits, plus calcium and a daily vitamin-mineral complex. Recently she added to her regimen three tablets a day of pantothenic acid (a lesser-known vitamin) "to help me wake up." Basically, says Latimer, "I'm looking for anything to make me feel better."

But for every true believer in the power of vitamins—and the U.S. has more devotees than any other country—there is an agnostic, a skeptic who insists that vitamins are the opiate of the people. Among the doubters are many doctors. They have been persuaded by decades of public-health pronouncements, endorsed by the U.S. National Academy of Sciences and the National Institutes of Health, that claim people can get every nutrient they need from the food they eat. Popping vitamins "doesn't do you any good," sniffs Dr. Victor Herbert, a professor of medicine at New York City's Mount Sinai medical school. "We get all the vitamins we need in our diets. Taking supplements just gives you expensive urine."

Wavering in confusion between these two schools of thought are the vast majority of Americans, wondering whom to believe. They have heard the gospel of vitamin C as preached by the great chemist Linus Pauling, but they have also heard him ridiculed by health authorities. They may feed their children chewable vitamin tablets, but they question whether the pills are worth the high price. "I'd be thrilled to know what's right and to have someone tell me what to do," says Jane Traulsen, a mother of two who lives in White Plains, NY. "But all the information is so contradictory. It's like trying to make your way through a fog."

But now, thanks to new research, the haze is beginning to lift. And it unveils a surprise: more and more scientists are starting to suspect that traditional medical views of vitamins and minerals have been too limited. While researchers may not endorse the expansive claims of hard-core vitamin enthusiasts, evidence suggests that the nutrients play a much more complex role in assuring vitality and optimal health than was previously thought. Vitamins—often in doses much higher than those usually recommended—may protect against a host of ills ranging from birth defects and cataracts to heart disease and cancer. Even more provocative are glimmerings that vitamins can stave off the normal ravages of aging.

"The field is currently undergoing a paradigm shift," says Catherine Woteki, director of the food and nutrition board at the Institute of Medicine of the National Academy of Sciences. "We are now entering the second wave of vitamin research," explains Jeffrey Blumberg, associate director of the Human Nutrition Research Center on Aging at Tufts University. "The first wave was the discovery of vitamins and their role in combatting nutritional deficiencies such as rickets and beriberi. That occurred in the first half of the century. Now we're on the second wave. You don't need to take vitamin C to prevent scurvy in this country today. But you could need it for optimal health and the prevention of some chronic disease."

Scientists have so far identified 13 organic substances that are commonly labeled vitamins. In the human body, they play a vital role in helping regulate the chemical reactions that protect cells and convert food into energy and living tissue. Some vitamins are produced within the body. Vitamin D, for example, is manufactured in the skin during exposure to sunlight, and three other vitamins (K, biotin and pantothenic acid) are made inside the human gut by resident bacteria. But most vitamins must be ingested.

Mystique and faddish lore have long surrounded these essential biochemical compounds. Consider vitamins C and E. "Somebody has made practically every claim you could dream of about these vitamins," points out John Hathcock, chief of the experimental-nutrition branch of the Food and Drug Administration. People have been gobbling vitamin C for 20 years in the certainty that it can cure the common cold, though evidence is still lacking. Vitamin E has been wildly popular for four decades because of its putative power to enhance sexual performance. In fact, studies indicate only that it is necessary for normal fertility in lab animals.

More recently, B₆ has won favor as a relief for premenstrual syndrome. Vitamin A is touted as a rejuvenator by people who mistakenly believe that it, like its synthetic relative Retin-A, can give wrinkled, mottled skin that youthful rosy glow. "We never know what next year's fad is going to be," says Hathcock.

It is just this whiff of quackery that made vitamins a research backwater for years. Most reputable scientists steered clear, viewing the field as fringe medicine awash with kooks and fanatics. A researcher who showed interest could lose respect and funding. Certainly Linus Pauling lost much of his Nobel-laureate luster when he began championing vitamin C back in 1970 as a panacea for everything from the common cold to cancer. Drug companies too have been leery of committing substantial energy and money to studies, since the payoff is relatively small: vitamin chemical formulas are in the public domain and cannot be patented.

But attitudes have been shifting over the past few decades. Despite all the sneering, Pauling's speculations did get more scientists thinking about vitamins' impressive powers. As a class of compounds, they are known to produce hugely dramatic effects when missing from the diet: scurvy, pernicious anemia, rickets. What other exciting properties might they—or related compounds—have?

Another driving force in the U.S. is the new "demographic imperative." With a rapidly aging population, America has moved its medical focus from treating acute illness to caring for chronic maladies like heart disease and cancer—a shift that has sent health-care costs skyward. "There's a growing appreciation of the need to find the most economical way to treat and prevent chronic disease," notes Dr. Charles Butterworth Jr. of the University of Alabama. "Food and vitamins are not that expensive." Calculated Tufts' Blumberg: "We could save billions of dollars if we could delay the onset of chronic diseases by as little as 10 years."

Overriding all else, however, is the impact of scientific studies. Beginning in the 1970s, population surveys worldwide started to uncover a consistent link between diet and health. A diet rich in fruits and vegetables, for instance, became associated with a lowered incidence of cancer and heart disease. Researchers then turned to examining the data nutrient by nutrient, looking at minerals as well as vitamins, to see which are tied most closely with specific ailments. Low vitamin C intake appears to be associated with a higher risk of cancer; low levels of folic acid with a greater chance of birth defects, and high calcium consumption with a decreased danger of osteoporosis.

Intrigued by such clues, the National Institutes of Health, universities and other research organizations began funding laboratory and clinical investigations. By the late '80s, research exploring vitamins' potential in protecting against disease was on its way to respectability. Though the evidence is still preliminary, scientists are excited about several nutrients.

One vitamin attracting attention is folic acid, also known as folate, which was first isolated from spinach. This B vitamin appears to guard against two of the most common and devastating neurological defects afflicting newborns in the U.S.: spina bifida, in which there is incomplete closure of the spine, and anencephaly, in which the brain fails to develop fully. British researchers found that when women who had already given birth to a malformed child received folic acid supplements during a subsequent pregnancy, the chances of a second tragic birth fell sharply.

Another enticing finding reported last January established a link between folic acid and prevention of cervical cancer. According to a study at the University of Alabama's medical school, women who have been exposed to a virus that causes this cancer are five times as likely to develop precancerous lesions if they have low blood levels of folic acid. The discovery may help explain why cervical cancer is more common among the poor. Indigent women usually eat few vegetables and fruits, which are prime sources of folate. Says Butterworth, head of the research team: "It looks like many cases of cervical dysplasia [a precancerous condition] could be prevented with a healthy diet."

Vitamin K, long known to promote blood clotting, appears to help bones retain calcium. Rapid calcium loss is a major plague among postmenopausal women, giving rise to the fragilebones syndrome called osteoporosis. A recent Dutch study of 1,500 women ages 45 to 80 found that calcium loss (as measured in urine samples) could be halved with daily supplements of vitamin K.

Most of the excitement, however, is being generated by a group of vitamins—C, E and beta carotene, the chemical parent of vitamin A—that are known as antioxidants. These nutrients appear to be able to defuse the volatile toxic molecules, known as oxygen-free radicals, that are a byproduct of normal metabolism in cells. These molecules are also created in the body by exposure to sunlight, X rays, ozone, tobacco smoke, car exhaust and other environmental pollutants.

Free radicals are cellular renegades; they wreak havoc by damaging DNA, altering biochemical compounds, corroding cell membranes and killing cells outright. Such molecular mayhem, scientists increasingly believe, plays a major role in the development of ailments like cancer, heart or lung disease and cataracts. Many researchers are convinced that the cumulative effects of free radicals also underlie the gradual deterioration that is the hallmark of aging in all individuals, healthy as well as sick. Antioxidants, studies suggest, might help stem the damage by neutralizing free radicals. In effect they perform as cellular sheriffs, collar the radicals and hauling them away.

Supporters of this theory speculate that antioxidants may one day revolutionize health care. Biochemist William Pryor, director of the Biodynamics Institute at Louisiana State University, foresees screening people through a simple urine, blood or breath test to assess how much damage free radicals have done to tissue, much as patients today are screened for high cholesterol. "If you can predict who is most susceptible to oxidative stress," notes Pryor, "you can treat them with antioxidants more effectively." Ultimately, says biochemist Bruce Ames at the University of California, Berkeley, "we're going to be able to get people to live a lot longer than anyone thinks."

In that brave new world, people might pop vitamins C and E to deter the development of cataracts, the clouding of the lens in the eye that afflicts 20% of Americans over 65. Patients taking high doses of both vitamins appear to reduce the risk of cataracts by at least 50%, according to a Canadian study. Vitamin C may be especially efficient because it concentrates in the eye. Scientists at the National Eye Institute estimate that if cataract development could be delayed by 10 years, about half of cataract surgery could be eliminated.

Vitamin E may be particularly helpful in preventing free radicals from injuring the heart. Doctors speculate that giving the vitamin to patients during or shortly after a heart attack might help preserve heart muscle. One clue from a study at Toronto General Hospital: rabbits injected with Vitamin E within two hours of a heart attack showed 75% less damage to heart tissue than was expected. The vitamin appears to speed recovery in patients who have had coronary-bypass operations, suggesting that nutrient supplements may one day become part of standard pre-op procedures.

Chugging vitamin E seems to boost the immune system in healthy old people, raising the possibility that supplements could help thwart life-threatening infections. The nutrient may also turn out to be a potent lung saver, warding off the depredations of cigarette smoke, car exhaust and other pollutants. "The effects of air pollution are chronic," says Dr. Daniel Menzel of the University of California at Irvine. "Over a lifetime people develop serious diseases like bronchitis and emphysema. We have fed animals in our labs vitamin E and have found that they have fewer lung lesions and that they live longer." Menzel suggests that priming children with doses of antioxidants could protect them against lung disease as adults, much the way fluoridated water protects them against tooth decay.

For patients found to have Parkinson's disease, vitamin E may hold special promise. The nutrient seems to delay the appearance of tremors, rigidity and loss of balance, thus postponing the need for therapy with dopamine. The vitamin also appears to alleviate some of the unpleasant side effects of antipsychotic drugs, such as twitchy hands, face and feet.

Holding center stage in antioxidant circles, however, is beta carotene, a complex deep orange compound that is naturally abundant in sweet potatoes, carrots and cantaloupes. Beta carotene is turned into vitamin A by the body as needed. That makes it impossible to overdose on beta carotene, even though taking too much vitamin A can lead to liver damage and other effects.

Doctors at Harvard Medical School, who have been following 22,000 male physicians as part of a 10-year health study, have made a stunning discovery about beta carotene. They found that men with a history of cardiac disease who were given beta carotene supplements of 50 mg every other day suffered half as many heart attacks, strokes and deaths as those popping placebo pills. No heart attacks occurred among those in this group who received aspirin along with the beta carotene capsules. The Harvard researchers have begun a trial in 45,000 postmenopausal women to see if a similar effect occurs in women. Scientists speculate that the antioxidant helps prevent those nasty oxygen-free radicals from transforming LDL, the bad form of cholesterol, into an even more menacing artery clogger.

Beta carotene may prove powerful in combatting cancer as well. In countries such as Japan and Norway, where diets are rich in beta carotene, the populations have a low incidence of lung, colon, prostate, cervical and breast cancer. And a study at the University of Arizona Cancer Center found that three to six months of daily beta carotene pills dramatically reduced precancerous mouth lesions in 70% of patients. Pharmaceutical giant Hoffmann-La Roche is so enamored with beta carotene that it plans to open a Freeport, Texas, plant next year that will churn out 350 tons of the nutrient annually, or enough to supply a daily 6 mg capsule to virtually every American adult.

As vitamin research surges, confusion swirls around two basic questions: How much of these nutrients is needed, and what's the best way to get them—in food or in supplements? For half a century, Americans' vitamin intake has been guided by the Recommended Daily Allowances, or RDAs. Introduced during World War II as a way to ensure that military recruits did not suffer from malnutrition, the levels quickly became a standard for the general population. Technically the National Academy of Sciences sets different RDAs for people of different ages and sexes, but to simplify matters, the FDA has since 1968 taken the highest RDA—those appropriate for teenage boys—and endorsed them as the national standard. These are the numbers that appear on cereal boxes.

Two years ago, the FDA announced plans to change this policy. Instead of endorsing an allotment appropriate to ravenous, fast-growing teenage males, it would simply average the RDAs for different age groups. The new figures are considerably lower and, says the agency, are a better barometer of the typical American's nutritional needs. Essentially they reflect the requirements of adult women. The agency has proposed slashing the RDAs for many vitamins, including A, B, C and E, as well as nutrients such as iron, by 10% to 80%. The RDA would also acquire a new name: the Reference Daily Intake, or RDI. (On food labels the RDI would be listed as the Daily Value, or DV.) "By using the old RDAs, you're trying to make the entire population consume more nutrients than it needs," explains John Vanderveen, director of the FDA's nutrition division. "Young males need more nutrients than women, children and the elderly."

But the move to slash RDAs, scheduled to go into effect next year, flies in the face of research that suggests benefits from higher doses of vitamins. The current RDA for vitamin C, for example, is 60 mg. But to get a protective effect against cataracts or cancer may require as much as 100 mg. Similarly, vitamin E may need a boost from the RDA of

10 mg to 100 mg. (There is no RDA for beta carotene, but scientists speculate that 25 mg or more a day could be needed.)

Already many people consider the old RDAs, with their focus on preventing scurvy and other rare deficiency problems, to be irrelevant to real health needs. "Our clientele generally thinks of the RDA as a kind of joke," says Sandy Gooch, owner of the chain of seven Mrs. Gooch's markets in Southern California. What's actually needed, vitamin advocates suggest, is guidelines for optimal consumption. That amount may very well depend upon age, sex and life-style habits.

Do people have to take supplements to get enough vitamins? Nutritionists and doctors agree that everyone's basic needs could be met by eating a diet rich in vegetables and fruits. The U.S. government's 1990 dietary guidelines urge an ambitiously varied meal plan: three to five servings daily of vegetables, two to four of fruit, as well as six to 11 of breads, rice, pasta and grains and two to three of meat, eggs, poultry and dried beans.

As far as America is concerned, most people don't even come close. A mere 9% of adults manage to consume five servings of fruits and vegetables each day, according to the National Center for Health Statistics. By and large, Americans simply don't like vegetables. The most prominent example: President Bush, who once admitted he detested broccoli, now has taken to deriding carrots as "orange broccoli."

Nonetheless, failing to match daily dietary guidelines is no reason to go running for the vitamin bottle. "What you do one day or one week isn't the whole," stresses Jeanne Goldberg, assistant professor of nutrition at Tufts. "It's what your general eating patterns are." Blitzing on junk food for a day or two is no problem if over the long haul a diet regularly contains fruits and veggies. If it does not, popping pills is a good insurance policy, especially important for those who reject greens outright. Supplements are also useful to people with special conditions, including shut-ins, alcoholics and those on very restrictive diets, who tend to be poorly nourished.

Virtually all experts agree that a daily multivitamin won't hurt anybody. Opinion is divided, however, about whether people should be taking doses of vitamins to prevent chronic disease or delay aging. Some argue that enough evidence is in to justify taking moderately high amounts of antioxidants. Several researchers admit they are already doing so.

Others believe it is too soon to be making recommendations to the public. The long-term effects of high-dose supplements are still unknown, and doctors warn of dangers even in the short term. Too much vitamin D, for example, can cause damaging calcium deposits in muscle tissue, including the heart.

Last February the FDA rejected as premature applications by vitamin makers to promote folic acid as a means of preventing neural-tube birth defects, antioxidants as a hedge against cancer, and zinc as a booster of aging immune systems. Both federal and state regulatory agencies have been cracking down on nutrient health claims. The FDA says it will hold label claims to standards similar to those applied to drugs. Advises Dr. Walter Willett of the Harvard School of Public Health: "At this time I say don't take megadoses, but I'm not ruling out that in two or three years we might change our mind."

The wisest strategy right now may be to redouble those efforts to eat more broccoli and carrots, spinach and squash. And to follow the familiar exhortations: get up and get moving, cut down fat and cut out smoking. No matter how powerful antioxidants and the other nutrients turn out to be, they will never be a substitute for salutary habits. But stay tuned. Vitamins promise to continue to unfold as one of the great and hopeful health stories of our day.

A CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO MAYOR WILLIAM J. "BILL" PENDLETON

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to a remarkable man who has served the city of Bellflower with great distinction, Mayor William J. Pendleton. On Monday, April 27, 1992, Bill will be honored by the Bellflower City Council as his term as mayor concludes. Fortunately for the city of Bellflower, he will still serve as a member of the city council.

Born in Phoenix, AZ in 1941, Bill and his family moved to Long Beach, CA, in 1943, settling shortly thereafter in the friendly city of Bellflower. Bill attended the Woodruff Elementary School, Washington Junior High School, St. John Bosco High School, and Bellflower High School. Upon graduation from Bellflower High, Mayor Pendleton earned his associate of arts degree in mathematics, science, and engineering from Cerritos Community College.

Not only has the city of Bellflower been home to Mayor Pendleton for over 46 years but, it was also his first employer as Bill began his career in the Public Works Department. Following his employment with the city of Bellflower, Bill has worked for the Southern California Edison Co. for the past 26 years. He is currently a service crew foreman for the Long Beach district.

Mayor Pendleton's introduction to politics began in 1986 following his election to the city council. Chosen by his fellow council members in April 1991 to serve as mayor, Bill will be remembered as an honest and fair civic leader who did not pull any punches. Bill will also be remembered as the Cruisin' Mayor, a monicker given to him by his good friend, Ron Johnson, due to his love of antique cars. On any given day, Mayor Pendleton can be seen cruising his district in his '39 Ford coupe or his '88 Chevy pickup.

In addition to his commitment and service to the city council of Bellflower, Bill has devoted countless hours and much of his energy to a wide variety of community activities. He has worked with the Boy Scouts of America, Bellflower Sister City Committee, Los Cerritos Y.M.C.A., Indian Guides, and as president of the Bellflower Bobby Sox and the Bellflower Youth Football Booster Club. He has been the recipient of many honors most recently he received the Honorary Service Award from Woodruff Elementary School Parent-Teacher Association.

Mr. Speaker, it is not often that a man with such a dedicated commitment to making our community a better place to live comes to my attention. Therefore, on this most special oc-casian, my wife, Lee, joins me in extending our heartfelt thanks to Mayor William J. "Bill" Pendleton. We wish Bill and his children, Cynthia and William Jr., all the best in the years to come.

TRIBUTE TO SUNSWEET GROWERS
ON THEIR 75TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. WALLY HERGER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. HERGER. Mr. Speaker, I am honored to acknowledge the 75th anniversary of Sunsweet Growers, the world's largest producer and handler of prunes. In its 75-year history, Sunsweet has survived two world wars, the Depression and numerous unfair foreign trade practices, and has emerged as a prosperous and competitive player in the world market. The stakes are high for Sunsweet as California prune growers produce more than twice as many prunes as the rest of the world combined. This includes approximately 99 percent of U.S. production and an average of 70 percent of the world supply.

Contributing to Sunsweet's success is a dedicated work force and highly advanced processing plant in Yuba City, CA. Sunsweet employs over 400 local citizens at the Yuba City plant, which, with over 22 acres under one roof, is the world's largest prune processing plant. Prunes are transported to the facility from 603 farming families who tend to and harvest over 41,000 acres of prune trees.

Future economic growth is forecasted for Sunsweet as the public becomes aware of the benefits of a high-fiber diet provided by prunes, and also as East European nations open their markets to foreign products. In recent years, Sunsweet Growers has increased annual sales to $200 million in over 30 countries worldwide, and commands a majority share of the prune market.

I applaud the growers and employers of Sunsweet and wish them 75 more years of growth and prosperity.

THE RETIREMENT OF JIM CLARK

HON. HARRIS W. FAWELL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. FAWELL. Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure and a privilege for me to ask my colleagues in the U.S. House of Representatives to join me in congratulating Jim Clark, Superintendent of Schools of District 203 in Naperville, IL. After almost 35 years in the teaching profession, the last 22 as a superintendent, Jim is taking a richly earned retirement.

As a young man, Jim Clark made a commitment to excellence in the teaching of boys and girls, of young men and women. After graduating from Illinois Wesleyan College, and while a teacher and head football coach in Plainfield, IL, he completed work for his master's degree from the University of Illinois. Later, in 1967, he took a leave of absence from teaching to earn his doctorate at Northwestern University.

In 1984, after serving as school superintendent in Cambridge, OH and Batavia, IL, Jim was chosen to be Superintendent of Schools in District 203 in Naperville, IL. Here in Naperville, we feel he made his most valuable contributions as he guided the education of our children. With skill and energy, he created new programs and, working with faculty and parents, achieved success in curriculum development and strategic planning. He promoted the recognition of both students and teachers by establishing an annual Excellence in Education Banquet, to which top graduates invited the teachers who influenced them most. Recognizing that the development of a broad range of interests is essential to a healthy personality, he provided enhanced opportunities in both the arts and athletics.

Jim Clark has long recognized the crucial importance of the teaching of science and technology in the modern world. Under his encouragement and leadership, Naperville School District 203 achieved national recognition when four of its teachers were designated as recipients of the Christa McAuliffe Fellowship by the National Foundation for Improvement of Education, one of six school systems in the nation to be so honored. Two of his most farsighted activities have been to serve as a founding board member for the Corridor Partnership for Excellence in Education and for the Golden Apple Foundation. The partnership promotes business-education cooperation and Golden Apple recognizes exemplary teacher performance.

Through the better part of his career, Jim had at his side his wife, Jean, and their two sons. As he was committed to the high calling of education, he has been devoted to this family. And as a family, they have been energetically involved in the activities of their community—church, civic organizations, and athletics.

Now, as Jim Clark steps back from his more than three decades of distinguished service to the teaching profession, I am confident that he will step forward to a retirement that is equally creative, equally energetic, and equally productive. In whatever he may choose to undertake, his host of friends wish him many years of challenge and contentment.

INTRODUCTION OF NATIONAL BATTLE OF GUADALCANAL REMEMBRANCE DAY

HON. JOHN J. RHODES III

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, today I introduced a bill to honor those veterans of the Guadalcanal campaign with the designation of August 2, 1992, as "National Battle of Guadalcanal Remembrance Day."

I was recently contacted by one of my constituents from the First District of Arizona, Mr. Charles F. Sievers. I would like to quote from a portion of his letter.

Said Mr. Sievers, "It was at Guadalcanal where the Japanese advance in the Pacific was stopped and was, truly, the turning point of the war in the Pacific." Indeed, the landings of Guadalcanal represented the first United States offensive in the Pacific following the fall of Corregidor. During the 6-month campaign between October 13, 1942, and February 9, 1943, there were over 9,000 casualties, including more than 4,300 Army, Navy, and Marine Corps forces killed in action.

Mr. Speaker, it is my great honor to introduce this day of remembrance for those who fought bravely, especially those who never left the field of battle. Their testimony to freedom, to which thousands would ultimately bear witness through the sacrificing of their own lives, should never be forgotten.

TRIBUTE TO MELVIN LINDSEY

HON. KWEISI MFUME

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. MFUME. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to one of the true innovators of the broadcast industry whose life work will leave a great impression on radio listeners everywhere. The person I am referring to is Melvin Lindsey. Mr. Lindsey had often been called the "voice of evening radio" in Washington, DC because of the ever-popular program he created, the "Quiet Storm."

This mellow music format, established by Mr. Lindsey in the mid-1970's, at Howard University's WHUR-FM, was so successful that it was soon adopted by a variety of radio programmers across the country. During this time Mr. Lindsey also attended Howard University. In 1977 he graduated cum laude with a degree in Journalism. Since then Mr. Lindsey has hosted several programs on various stations throughout the Baltimore/Washington area, including WKYS and WPGC.

Mr. Lindsey never limited himself to radio. In 1989, his talent allowed him to embark into the world of television. Mr. Lindsey became the cohost of "On Time," a television show originating in my district of Baltimore and he also cohosted "Screen Scene," a daily entertainment news program aired nationally on Black Entertainment Television.

Melvin Lindsey enjoyed life and took pride in his many endeavors. Mr. Lindsey found time to take part in numerous civic and community organizations, such as the United Negro College Fund, and the American Cancer Society.

While at the height of his career, Melvin Lindsey discovered that he had acquired the AIDS virus. Because of society's cruelty to AIDS victims, especially public figures, Mr. Lindsey initially decided to keep his illness quiet. His desire to further public awareness about AIDS, finally convinced him to publicly announce his disease.

During the last weeks of his life, Mr. Lindsey, spoke out for AIDS victims everywhere. He allowed several local radio stations and newspapers to interview him about the disease, even as his health was clearly deteriorating. His message to society was that AIDS is not a disease which condemns people to isolation. In fact, Mr. Lindsey continued to work his local radio positions until just before his untimely death.

Mr. Speaker, AIDS is a disease that does not know prejudice. It has claimed the lives of people from many different races, colors, and creeds. In order for there to be any hope for a cure more funding must be provided for research, testing, and treatment. So many precious lives are being lost because of a lack of knowledge about the disease. The young people of this Nation are our future, and unless something is done to encourage them to protect themselves from this disease, they may not live long enough to see a future.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, I would like to join the Melvin Lindsey Appreciation Day Committee in commending Mr. Lindsey for all of his life works. Even though he is no longer with us, people from all over the Nation will gather on April 29, 1992 to pay tribute to this exceptional man.

Mr. Lindsey made sure that this love lives on by requesting that all proceeds from his appreciation event would be donated to his favorite charities: For Love of Children, Inner City AIDS Network and Best Friends, and The Howard University School of Communications. Melvin Lindsey will be sorely missed, but as long as there is the "Quiet Storm," and memories of his unselfish fight to make a difference in the way people treat AIDS victims, his legacy will never die.

MENTAL HEALTH CARE PROVIDERS BOUNTY PREVENTION ACT OF 1992

HON. JOHN BRYANT

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. BRYANT. Mr. Speaker, I have become concerned about the increasing reports of abuse and mistreatment of minor psychiatric patients. Therefore, I am introducing legislation to end this practice. Since I started looking into this matter last fall, I have been amazed at both the lengths to which some of those in the health care industry are willing to go and the perversity of such abusive schemes—driven by a commitment to greed, rather than the Hippocratic Oath.

My limited investigation leads me to believe that a private, for-profit psychiatric hospital can be a very dangerous place. In their zeal to compete for dwindling insurance dollars, some of those institutions apparently have been involved in a win-at-any-cost war for patients.

Estimates put the fraud perpetrated by certain actors in the health care industry at $80 billion. This figure dwarfs the estimated $5 billion lost through criminal fraud in the entire savings and loan debacle. Most authorities estimate that health care fraud and abuse encompasses 5 to 15 percent of this Nation's overall medical costs—this at a time when health insurance premiums have skyrocketed and become out of reach for a significant portion of our citizens.

These private psychiatric corporations are listed on our major stock exchanges and are almost exclusively motivated by profit because shareholders demand high investment returns, apparently with little management regard for the fact that mistreatment of human beings can be the cornerstone for generating even greater profits. This bottom line crunch is forcing many for-profit psychiatric hospitals to engage in aggressive—and what should be illegal—recruitment and referral practices that totally ignore the needs of the young people they pretend to serve.

For-profit psychiatric patients have been bought and sold, like so many troubled, but defenseless, slaves, through a plethora of cleverly designed schemes—each scheme more diabolical than the last. I have become aware of instances where bounties have been offered to police, probation officers, and school counselors to recommend patients. Particularly insidious was the situation in which one psychiatric hospital marketing director was on the local school board which determined the fate of errant children.

In many cases, children are transported out-of-State for treatment, a practice which increases reimbursement payments and evades the regulation of any local or State government entity. As one advocate put it: "The Department of Agriculture keeps tabs on every single chicken sent out of State, but nobody can tell you how many kids have been sent to psychiatric facilities out-of-State."

Current Federal laws have not curbed the abuses wrought by those who do not fall within the purview of the Medicaid and Medicare illegal remuneration statutes. That is why I am today introducing legislation to prohibit for-profit patient referrals. Patient referrals should be dictated by patient need and nothing else. To enslave troubled young people out of greed, fueled by our tax dollars, as has so often happened in recent years in my home State of Texas and elsewhere, is an abomination. Those who do so are nothing less than criminals.

The legislation I am offering prohibits intentional solicitation or offers for payment for patient referrals to mental health facilities. The legislation does not prohibit legitimate patient referrals—only the unscrupulous ones simultaneously violating the patients' needs and the taxpayers' pocketbooks. This is a cost containment measure to protect our children from unconscionable abuse. This measure is meant to cover all forms of payment for referral—not merely traditional methods of referral payment. It further provides for criminal penalties; and violations are punishable by fines in excess of $250,000 and imprisonment of up to 5 years.

I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this measure and ending this egregious patient abuse.

H.R.—

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Mental Health Care Providers Bounty Prevention Act of 1992".

SEC. 2. TITLE 18 AMENDMENT.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Chapter 89 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following:

"§ 1822. Mental health care provider bounties prohibited

"(a) Whoever knowingly and willfully solicits or receives any remuneration (including any kickback, bribe, or rebate) directly or indirectly, overtly or covertly, in cash or in kind—

"(1) in return for referring an individual to a mental health care provider for the furnishing or arranging for the furnishing of any item or service; or shall be fined under this title or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both.

"(2) in return for purchasing, leasing, ordering, or arranging for or recommending purchasing, leasing, or ordering any good, facility, or service, or item from a mental health care provider;

"(b) Whoever knowingly and willfully offers or pays any remuneration (including any kickback, bribe, or rebate) directly or indirectly, overtly or covertly, in cash or in kind—

"(1) to refer an individual to a mental health care provider for the furnishing or arranging for the furnishing of any item or service; or

"(2) to purchase, lease, order, or arrange for or recommend purchasing, leasing, or ordering any good, facility, or service, or item from a mental health care provider:

shall be fined under this title or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both.

"(c) Any conduct which under section 1128B(b)(3) of the Social Security Act is precluded from being a violation of that section is not a violation of this section.

"(d) As used in this section, the term 'mental health care provider' means any provider of goods or services for the diagnosis and treatment of mental illness, if the provider operates in or affects interstate or foreign commerce."

(b) CLERICAL AMENDMENT.—The table of sections at the beginning of chapter 89 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following:

"1822. Mental health care provider bounties prohibited."

TRIBUTE TO JOHN G. MULHERN

HON. SANDER M. LEVIN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. LEVIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute to John G. Mulhern, who today celebrates his retirement from the Ford Motor Co.

For three and a half decades, Jack unselfishly gave of himself. He has contributed with creativity and counseled with compassion. He has performed his various jobs with dedication and determination. He will be remembered and missed for his intellect and expertise. With his quick mind and tremendous knowledge, he has been a ready resource for a wide circle of coworkers.

Ford Motor Co. says goodbye today, not to a useful cog in its impressive machinery, but to a great human being. Jack will be remembered as a man profoundly involved in and in love with life. He will be remembered by his fellow workers for the daily lunchtime phone call he shared with his wife. You could not work with him without seeing his love for his children and grandchildren—his worries about their difficulties and his joys at their good fortunes. He has been an invaluable model in his ability to balance his work with the demands of raising seven children.

Nor was that all Jack modeled in his graceful balancing act. For 7 years he served cou-rageously on the city council in Inkster. Indeed, in 1969, Ford proudly recognized Jack as a credit to the company, awarding him with the Ford Citizen of the Year Award. Long after he had left politics, he maintained his great interest in government and was always ready to listen and to speak intelligently and passionately on the great issues of the day.

Most of all, Ford will miss the steady goodness of Jack Mulhern. His door was always open, his resourceful mind available for others, and his great goodness towards people was unwavering.

What Ford will miss, others will now gain. His wife, Mary, seven children, and eight-plus granddaughters will enjoy his company. He will feed the homeless. He will counsel the young. He will continue to learn and love, and many will be so much better for it.

IN HONOR OF 20 YEARS—SANTA CRUZ COUNTY REGIONAL TRANSPORTATION COMMISSION

HON. LEON E. PANETTA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to congratulate the Santa Cruz County Regional Transportation Commission [SCCRTC] on commemorating its 20 year anniversary.

Since its creation in 1972, the SCCRTC has contended with the doubling of vehicle miles traveled in Santa Cruz County and the doubling of registered motor vehicles in the county. This includes at least a 70-percent growth in county residents and over 80-percent growth in licensed drivers. The occasion of its 20th anniversary is truly a cause for celebration, one that should be enjoyed by both the dedicated employees of SCCRTC and the travelers they have assisted.

Over the last 20 years, the SCCRTC has significantly contributed to the community of Santa Cruz. The accomplishments of this agency have truly been beneficial to the entire area on many different levels. In 1977, the SCCRTC established two ad hoc citizen committees to address the unique transportation concerns of the elderly and handicapped, in addition to the bicycling communities. Today, these citizen committees include over 40 community representatives. In 1979, they initiated the Share-A-Ride Program placing thousands of people in carpools and vanpools. This has proven to have saved millions of dollars and has reduced fuel consumption and vehicle miles. In 1989, the office played a key role in coordinating the recovery of the transportation network severely crippled by the Loma Prieta Earthquake. One of the most salient aspects of this program was the reorganization of the home-to-work trips. During the reconstruction of Highway 17, over 24,000 over-the-hill commuters were assisted with this program.

The SCCRTC has helped to preserve and enhance the quality of life in Santa Cruz County over the past two decades through the dedicated work and contributions of its commissioners, members of the advisory committee, and the staff. Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues to join me now in saluting the 20 years of exemplary performance by the Santa Cruz County Regional Transportation Commission.

THE INTRODUCTION OF THE REGULATORY REVIEW SUNSHINE ACT OF 1992

HON. LES AU COIN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. AU COIN. Mr. Speaker, many Americans think Vice President DAN QUAYLE is a joke. But when it comes to worker health and safety, clean air, and dozens of other public interest laws, DAN QUAYLE and his so-called Competitiveness Council are no laughing matter.

This panel has become the command center for a war on worker health and safety and environmental standards. It works not for you or me, but only for a select few, above the law and behind closed doors.

Today, at the recommendation of the Quayle council, George Bush is again blocking enforcement of vital health, safety, and environmental laws for another 90 days. This moratorium has already threatened the public by killing warning labels on toys that small kids could choke on, delaying new automatic brake requirements for tractor trailers, and halting safety labels on meat and poultry products.

This panel's—and this administration's—aggressive stand against consumer and environmental laws could carry a big warning label of its own: Caution, the Quayle council can be hazardous to your health.

The next item on the Quayle council's hit list is Clean Air Act, a bill Bush himself once hailed as a major achievement. The President is currently pondering whether to allow industrial polluters to contaminate our environment even more than the law allows—without public hearings or Environmental Protection Agency review.

Hidden behind the veil of executive privilege, the council is not subject to the public accountability laws that govern other agencies. No public record of its communications or decisions is required. As DAN QUAYLE is fond of boasting cynically, the council "leaves no fingerprints," just the wreckage of laws weakened by new loopholes and exemptions for corporate fat cats and polluters.

The Quayle council operates primarily for DAN QUAYLE's big business golfing buddies who, having failed in public debate in Congress, use the council as a secret back door to undermine health, safety, and environmental laws.

It's no coincidence that as the council pushes for a regulation to prevent the public or the EPA from stopping Clean Air Act violations, its staff director was forced to step aside for being a part owner of a chemical company that would profit from the new rule. This star chamber is by definition a conflict of interest.

Well, enough is enough. Today I'm introducing legislation to rip open the curtains and let the light of public scrutiny into this Chamber. This bill, in conjunction with legislation already introduced in the Senate by JOHN GLENN, will require the Quayle council to conform with the procedures and openness that governs all other government rulemaking agencies.

Specifically, my bill will require the Quayle council to provide public access to all its written communications, provide summaries of oral communications, and explain the reasons for its intervention in the normal rulemaking process.

No longer will the public be shut out. No longer will big business have another chance to change laws that no one else has. It's time to shed some sunlight on George Bush and DAN QUAYLE's secret dealings. Let's make sure the public has the last laugh.

TRIBUTE TO THE INAUGURAL SOUTH CAROLINA'S WASHINGTON SEMESTER PROGRAM

HON. BUTLER DERRICK

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. DERRICK. Mr. Speaker, the members of the South Carolina congressional delegation would like to recognize and commend the 1991-92 inaugural Washington Semester Internship Program sponsored by the University of South Carolina.

This program provides South Carolina's outstanding students with an opportunity to work as congressional interns while pursuing an academically rigorous program of study.

The University of South Carolina's Washington Semester Program joins a number of other prestigious programs sponsored by colleges and universities from across the Nation. These programs provide an invaluable service to the Congress and to the citizens of the United States. Not only do the interns assist us in taking care of the Nation's business, but these students represent the future of governance and public service in America.

The South Carolina delegation would like to recognize the first internship class of the University of South Carolina's Washington Semester Program: Ms. Heidi M. Brooks from Spartanburg, SC; Mr. David T. O'Berry from Graniteville, SC; and Mr. Lee M. Royall from Mt. Pleasant, SC. We congratulate these students on the successful completion of their internship program.

Mr. Speaker, by initiating this program, the University of South Carolina, through its Institute of Public Affairs and South Carolina College, is providing an outstanding educational opportunity for the State and Nation's future leaders. The South Carolina delegation wholeheartedly supports this endeavor, and we look forward to our continued association with this statewide intern program under the auspices of the University of South Carolina.

TRIBUTE TO MARY AND FRED EXUM: CITIZENS OF THE YEAR

HON. WILLIAM LEHMAN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. LEHMAN of Florida. Mr. Speaker, on Friday, May 8, the Hialeah-Miami Springs

Kiwanis Club will honor one of our community's most outstanding couples, Mary and Fred Exum, as 1992 Citizens of the Year. They are a fitting choice.

Mary and Fred Exum are the kind of people every community wants and needs. Besides being generous and caring, they are volunteers and organizers who know how to get things done.

For example, the Exums did 58 voluntary engagements last December as Mr. and Mrs. Santa Claus. They arrived on fire trucks and brought cheer to area hospitals, day-care centers, and nursing homes.

They are also founders of the Miami-Edison Senior High School Over the Hill Gang, an alumni group which, through their efforts, has grown over the years to over 9,000. Fred is also an excellent public speaker who is in great demand at public meetings and private ceremonies.

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of everyone in our community, I want to thank Mary and Fred Exum for the contributions they have made and to congratulate them for a job well done.

ENSURING THE PRESERVATION OF HOUSTON'S HERITAGE

HON. MICHAEL A. ANDREWS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. ANDREWS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, "the past is never dead; it is not even past," wrote William Faulkner. For those of us who share a love of history and preserving its significance, history's landmarks are the surest guide to understanding our Nation's inheritance. Our landmarks also define us—who we are, what we have done and where we may be going.

During the German bombing of London during World War II, Winston Churchill said, "We shape our buildings, and afterwards our buildings shape us." Recent events in the Houston area, though, should make us pause and reflect upon the shape of our historic future. We have been unfortunate witnesses to historic demolitions accomplished with none of the wartime bombings the Germans inflicted upon London.

Just last week, the 124-year-old John Baker Building in historic Market Square was leveled in the dark of night. The Baker Building had contributed to the development of the neighborhood and was recognized as having significant architectural integrity and historical standing. Indeed, it was a contributing building on the National Historic Register and was a solid citizen of the Market Square Historical District.

The wealthy owner of the building has refused to comment since its destruction, and I do not blame him. There really is no excuse for such indifferent regard for our city's history. What we must promise ourselves is that such an act of historic vandalism cannot happen again in Houston.

Yet this event is not an isolated one. We have also seen the demolition of the Kennedy Corner Building on Market Square and the Case Mare, the so-called Big House on Galveston Bay. Private buildings that nonetheless possesses historic significance have been razed and I am concerned that we are setting a dangerous and irreversible precedent.

Preservation became a passion for me 4 years ago. During that summer, I wandered across fields of golden rod at the foot of Stuart's Hill on the battlefield of Second Manassas and learned of its historic role. So I was more prepared than most when I read a small announcement months later that a shopping mall larger than the Galleria would be built on Stuart's Hill, bringing 80,000 cars a day to the national park and forever changing it.

The fight that followed to preserve the park taught me a great deal. A national constituency of preservationists, historians, veterans and, finally, a majority of Congress joined the debate. The victory ultimately saved one of America's most important national treasures. While I doubt that the next battle will be so successful, the lessons of Manassas are clear.

There remains no national strategy or system for protecting our most historic national landmarks. There is no clear and understandable legal framework from which to work. Jackson Walker, the past president of the National Trust for Historic Preservation, stated, "We have more statutory protection for the snail darter or the spotted owl than we have for our endangered historic sites."

Despite our victory in saving Manassas, Congress appears to be moving in the wrong direction. The 1986 Tax Reform Act greatly cut back tax credits and incentives for restoring historic buildings after a decade of revitalization projects. There is a direct correlation between changes in the Tax Code and what a developer does with a historic building. In 1985, there were some 3,000 urban restoration projects worth $2 billion in private investment. Last year, after the changes in the code took effect, there were fewer than 1,000 projects worth less than $900 million.

Recent administrations share part of the blame. For instance, the Bush administration requested just $34 million for the Historic Preservation Fund. The Reagan years saw no request for needed preservation dollars. In fact, Donald Hodel, President Reagan's Secretary of the Interior, worked with the developer trying to build the shopping mall at Manassas instead of with those in Congress trying to prevent its construction. His actions only helped to increase the ultimate costs to the taxpayer.

The most important step at the national level is passage of the Heritage Conservation Act. This legislation—affecting some 2,000 sites near our National Parks, monuments, and important battlefields—would freeze private development for 210 days to encourage planning and compromise. It will also establish an emergency acquisition fund.

I am also a cosponsor of the National Historic Preservation Act Amendments of 1991. This measure will help us more clearly define the necessary relationships between Federal, State, and local preservation agencies. It will create a comprehensive and coordinated historic preservation education and training program and establish a National Center for Preservation Technology.

But the most aggressive initiatives must be taken locally. It is a local community that bears much of the responsibility for preserving its past. The most endangered list will change over time and it is primarily the responsibility of local leaders to decide whether treasures like the Brachus House near Gonzales or the Pilot Building in Houston will be saved and endure or be removed from the endangered list, destroyed by neglect or bad intentions.

In the city of Houston, the absence of zoning laws has helped our city grow with reckless energy. It is time to reexamine how growth can be accomplished and our heritage preserved. These goals are not incompatible, and together they can ultimately mean a richer economy.

The Texas Historical Commission and local organizations like the Greater Houston Preservation Alliance can make a valuable contribution by identifying sites that matter most. All too often city leaders and developers cannot distinguish the important sites from those not worth preserving. There is a need in Texas for a more public designation of our best landmarks, especially in growing urban areas like Houston.

The preservation movement must be more coordinated and creative, combining private, local, State, and Federal remedies. But time is running out. For every Manassas there are many more John Baker Buildings, nearing destruction. But we can summon new energy, renewed determination and a coherent strategy to preservation efforts across our State and still save our historic treasures and fragile heritage for future generations.

INTRODUCTION OF THE EMPLOYMENT TAX IMPROVEMENT ACT OF 1992

HON. DOUG BARNARD, JR.

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. BARNARD. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced a bill today entitled the Employment Tax Improvement Act of 1992. It is intended to revise the procedures applicable to the determination of employment status for the purposes of employment taxes, while at the same time providing incentives to increase the compliance with information reporting by businesses and the individuals they treat as independent contractors. My cosponsors on this legislation, Mr. SISISKY from Virginia, and Mr. JENKINS from Georgia have worked diligently with me to put this important legislation together. I applaud them and their fine staffs for the hard work behind this bill, and look forward to participating with them in a Ways and Means Subcommittee hearing on this issue this summer.

Specifically, the bill will take the heat off of those undergoing intense scrutiny by IRS for their classification of workers as independent contractors, while at the same time significantly increasing the compliance of those independent contractors who abuse the system and do not pay their fair share of taxes.

For those employers who have mistakenly classified their workers as independent contractors while filing the proper information returns, the bill would allow a limited waiver period for prospective reclassification with no massive back taxes, interest, or penalties. This would, therefore, allow for reclassification without the fear of putting a company out of business. Once this waiver period is over, those employers that do not wilfully misclassify their workers would be subject to a significantly reduced penalty. This penalty would sting, but in most cases would not put a company out of business, unlike the current massive penalties.

On the compliance side of the legislation, the goal is to reduce the $20 billion tax gap related to workers not paying their correct amount of taxes. We believe that this bill has a chance to recover more than $2 billion per year of this gap from the employers of independent contractors who do not provide them with information returns.

In addition, the bill also brings section 530 into the Tax Code, and eliminates the indefinite protection of prior audits in section 530, except in the case of a previous employment classification audit. Codifying section 530 will make its provisions determinative for worker classification decisions, rather than a clause to protect a business from IRS' reclassification of workers. The impact of codification also lifts the ban on the guidance by the service for clarification purposes and eliminates the exception of its coverage for brokered technical service workers.

I urge my fellow members to support this important piece of legislation. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

TRIBUTE TO MSGR. JOHN G. KURTY

HON. WILLIAM O. LIPINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize Msgr. John Kurty of Chicago, IL. On Sunday, May 24, Monsignor Kurty will celebrate his 50th anniversary to the priesthood.

Monsignor Kurty has a long and distinguished career as a priest. He was ordained in 1942 in the Ruthenian College Chapel in Rome. Since then, he served as associate pastor and pastor of congregations throughout the Nation.

Father Kurty joined our Chicago community in 1963 as the pastor of Saint Mary's. He became the dean of the Chicago area Byzantine Catholics in 1969 and in 1978 established St. Mary's Mission in Oak Lawn, IL. Pope John Paul II elevated Father Kurty to monsignor in 1983.

Throughout his career, Monsignor Kurty has demonstrated true commitment to God and the community. I ask my colleagues to join me in congratulating Monsignor Kurty on this milestone event. His dedication and service should serve as a model to all Americans.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

FOLGER SHAKESPEARE LIBRARY CELEBRATES 60TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. CONSTANCE A. MORELLA

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mrs. MORELLA. Mr. Speaker, to the Folger and to the Bard:

To me, fair friend, you never can be old,
For as you were when first your eye I eyed,
Such seems your beauty still.—Sonnet

Mr. Speaker, I rise to congratulate the Folger Shakespeare Library on its 60th anniversary. The Folger opened its doors on April 23, 1932, William Shakespeare's birthday, and has made outstanding contributions to our Nation's cultural community and to American education for the last six decades.

A major center for scholarly research, the Folger houses the largest collection of Shakespeare's printed works, in addition to a magnificent selection of other rare Renaissance books and manuscripts on all disciplines—history and politics, theology and exploration, law and the arts. The Folger is a museum devoted to Shakespeare's legacy, a lively center for the performing arts, and a center for the revitalization of the humanities in our schools.

Each year, some 200,000 people enjoy Folger Library exhibits, medieval and Renaissance music by the Folger consort and readings of poetry and fiction by internationally known writers. Public lectures on current topics as well as Renaissance literature, history, and art reflect the Folger's commitment to preservation of the humanities. The Folger also offers a wide variety of educational programs for both students and teachers.

On April 25, the Folger hosted an open house in celebration of its 60th anniversary and the 428th birthday of Shakespeare. It is a pleasure for me to bring this noteworthy event to the attention of the Congress and I know my colleagues will join me in warmly congratulating the Folger on its 60th anniversary.

HUMAN RIGHTS ABUSE IN INDIA

HON. ROBERT G. TORRICELLI

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. TORRICELLI. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to your attention a topic of grave concern: Human rights abuse and political deterioration in India.

There has been an increase in social unrest in India over the past few years, particularly in the States of Punjab, Kashmir, Uttar Pradesh, Madhya Pradesh, Haryana, Rajasthan and Maharashtra. People from these regions struggle for religious, ethnic, and cultural freedom of expression in a largely Hindu and often intolerant country. Religious and ethnic minorities are treated like second-class citizens and have watched the desecration of their places of worship.

As a result, residents of the Punjab, Jammu, Kashmir, and Assam have organized themselves into separatist movements, seeking political self-determination for their people. Their move has often been met with violence, persecution, and the denial of basic human rights, including the right to live without fear.

Last month, the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs issued a report highlighting the human rights abuses in India. It describes how the state security forces use their offices to systematically torture and kill citizens who are allegedly involved with separatist groups. One practice, called encounter killings, is particularly heinous. State security forces murder suspected militants without filing official records of their detention or death.

The report further describes corruption in the Indian prison system, where detainees are often raped, beaten, and forced to perform menial labor by their jailers. The victims of this system generally seek no judicial recourse since they are often denied or not informed of their civil rights.

What is most reprehensible is that the Indian Federal Government sanctions this inhumanity. Over the last decade, the Government in New Delhi has passed a series of laws that authorize the security forces to disregard the most basic of human rights. The Disturbed Areas Act, the Armed Forces Special Powers Act, and the Terrorist and Disruptive Activities Prevention Act have enabled law enforcement personnel to detain people without trial for extended lengths of time, allow confessions that have been forced, destroy homes, hideouts, or suspected militants and kill with impunity.

As a result, there is a growing distrust of the Indian Security Forces and the Federal Government. People are beginning to take justice into their own hands. The Washington Post reported on November 13, that a man in Lucknow was nearly killed by a mob of citizens who suspected him of kidnaping a young boy. The young boy turned out to be his son.

Last month in the Punjab, Sikhs boycotted an election to choose their own government. They feared the election would be rigged by Federal authorities. New Delhi reacted to the boycott by sending 300,000 soldiers and police to the region, censoring the press and arresting numerous Sikh leaders. The 22-percent voter turnout translated into a vote of no-confidence for the Federal Government.

In a meeting of the United Nation's Security Council in January, Prime Minister P.V. Narsimha Rao indicated his desire to work with the United Nations to improve, among other things, the observance of human rights in India. I urge my colleagues and the Bush administration to hold him to this pledge, urge him to restore public confidence in his government, and insist upon India's compliance with international standards of human rights.

THE NEW RIVER

HON. NICK JOE RAHALL II

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Speaker, 1 week ago today, at about this very time, I stood on the banks of the New River in southern West Virginia at a place known as Shanklins Ferry. There, flanked by a good number of locally elected officials and amidst a crowd of over 100 concerned citizens, we set in motion a chain of events that may lead to the designation of that segment of the New River under the Wild and Scenic Rivers Act.

Today, I am introducing legislation, the New River Wild and Scenic River Study Act of 1992, toward that end. This bill would cause an eligibility study to be conducted on a 17-mile segment of the New River that extends from the West Virginia-Virginia State line to the maximum pool elevation of Bluestone Lake. All of the land within this segment is in Summers County, WV, and is owned by the Federal Government.

Certain portions of the New River are well known. North and downstream of the segment that is the subject of this legislation lies the New River Gorge National River, established in 1978 as a unit of the National Park System. Often referred to as the grand canyon of the East, this portion of the river is famous for its whitewater rapids, small-mouth bass fishing, and historic coal towns. And, in North Carolina where the headwaters of the New River are found, a segment of the river known as the South Fork has been protected under the Wild and Scenic Rivers Act.

The segment of the New River that is the subject of this legislation, however, is extremely remote. Known primarily by fishermen, hunters, and canoeists, it is an incredibly beautiful free-flowing segment of river. We want to keep it that way. Our intent is to preserve the rural characteristics of the New River valley. In effect, to insure that the New River stays like it is, wild and scenic.

It is my desire to see this legislation through during this session of the Congress. I commend it to the House.

CROP LOSS ASSISTANCE AND RESEARCH TO CONTROL FUTURE SWEETPOTATO WHITEFLY INFESTATIONS

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.
OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Speaker, in the fall of 1991 agriculture communities throughout Riverside and Imperial Counties in southern California were devastated by an invasion of the sweetpotato whitefly. Imperial County lost over 95 percent of early planted winter vegetables. The Coachella and Palo Verde Valleys in Riverside County lost 59 percent of the green bean crop, 65 percent of the cucumber crop, and 29 percent of the mixed melon crop. The Mexicali Valley lost all of the fall melon crop and much of the sesame crop.

Figures to date show that Imperial County farmers lost over $125 million. This direct loss to farmers has translated into related losses throughout the communities of $170 million in private sector sales and $30 million in personal income. In addition, over 3,400 jobs were lost as a direct result of the sweetpotato whitefly invasion. Food banks were stretched to the limit. Migrant workers—with no place to turn—were left stranded, many of them resorting to living and sleeping in their automobiles. And the resources of the affected communities were severely impacted. A disaster situation by anyone's definition, except—I must point out—the definition currently used by the U.S. Department of Agriculture.

I understand—although I do not agree with—USDA's decision not to approve a disaster designation for Imperial and Riverside Counties. Under USDA's interpretation of current law, the "flourishing of insects" must be the result of "a severe weather pattern." While one might not be convinced that the sweetpotato whitefly invasion was the result of a "severe weather pattern," there is no doubt that the farmers in Riverside and Imperial Counties were faced with a naturally occurring disaster that could not be brought under control by any known device.

Instead of a week-long freeze, like the one that took place in California in December 1990 and resulted in a disaster declaration by the USDA, farmers in Riverside and Imperial Counties were hit with a prolonged weather pattern that allowed the sweetpotato whitefly to flourish over an extended time period. While the sweetpotato whitefly has been around for over 60 years, this unseasonably hot and humid weather pattern allowed the sweetpotato whitefly to multiply exponentially and ravage crops throughout these two southern California counties. We are lucky, I believe, that the infestation has not yet caused similar damage to other valuable farmland in California, or to farming areas throughout the South.

To rectify this inequity in the law and allow the affected farmers to qualify under the disaster assistance program of the USDA, today I am introducing legislation to clarify the law and put these farmers on even footing with their colleagues across the country who have suffered crop losses due to natural disasters. The legislation has a $30 million cap and would take effect only if an emergency appropriation is approved by Congress.

In addition, there is a great fear throughout the Southern States that the sweetpotato whitefly will cause similar damage if not brought under control. Of greater importance to the agricultural communities throughout the Nation, the bill I am introducing authorizes $3 million through the Cooperative State Research Service for whitefly control efforts. These additional funds are needed to accelerate the research efforts focused on biological, chemical, and cropping practice controls related to minimizing or eliminating future crop losses that may result from infestations of the sweetpotato whitefly.

I look forward to my colleagues' support for this effort to deal effectively and quickly with this dangerous pest. I am especially pleased at the bipartisan group of Members who have joined me as original cosponsors of this legislation. The farm communities of Riverside and Imperial Counties are in need of Federal assistance, and nationwide we must get a handle on this insect before it wreaks havoc with agriculture production throughout the Southwest.

NATIONAL PUBLIC SAFETY TELECOMMUNICATORS WEEK

HON. EDWARD J. MARKEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call my colleagues' attention to the Nation's recent celebration of National Public Safety Telecommunicators Week. During the week beginning April 12, 1992, Americans honored the thousands of public safety officers and employees whose job it is to coordinate, dispatch, and facilitate the execution of law enforcement and emergency response activities in all of our districts.

Each day, Americans place over 1 million calls to 911 services. In order for emergency services to respond promptly, public safety telecommunicators swiftly and efficiently direct appropriate law enforcement, medical, rescue, or fire-fighting teams where they are needed. The daily regimen of these public safety officers is filled with life-or-death crisis situations to which they must respond calmly, confidently, and with utmost precision. And though untold numbers of Americans owe their lives to their heroic efforts, public safety telecommunicators are not in the limelight. Rather, these dedicated individuals work behind the scenes, with little public recognition of the tremendous value of their service.

This year, Congress showed its appreciation for public safety telecommunicators by passing and enacting House Joint Resolution 284, which designated the second week of April as "National Public Safety Telecommunicators Week." This commemorative not only heightened public awareness of the life-saving communications services provided by public safety telecommunicators but also recognized the leadership of the Associated Public-Safety Communications Officers [APCO] in ensuring the continued quality of these services. With a national membership of 9,000 public safety telecommunicators, APCO is a unified voice for the public safety community in advising Federal, State, and local government agencies on ways to improve emergency response. The Subcommittee on Telecommunications and Finance, which I chair, has benefited from APCO's input on a number of important issues, ranging from spectrum allocation to telephone privacy. I hope that the subcommittee will continue to have the benefit of APCO's views in the future.

Moreover, as we progress further into the information age, advanced communications technologies will increase tremendously the life-saving capabilities of public safety telecommunicators. The emergency telecommunications systems of the future will incorporate new technologies such as digital mapping, solar-powered cellular public rescue phones, and E-911 that will permit dispatchers to respond to emergency calls with greater speed and precision. Judging by their past performance, APCO and public safety telecommunicators will be on the cutting edge in employing these new technologies and services to save lives.

Mr. Speaker, in recognition of National Public Safety Telecommunicators Week, I want to express my enduring appreciation and gratitude to the thousands of men and women whose efforts on our behalf have long gone without appropriate public recognition.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, I was unavoidably absent for rollcall votes 67 through 70. Had I been present during these votes, I would have voted "nay" on rollcall 67, "yea" on rollcall 68, "nay" on rollcall 69, and "yea" on rollcall 70.

TRIBUTE TO GUIDO LOMBARDI, SR., JOHN SCACCIA, AND DR. MICHAEL NIGRO

HON. SANDER M. LEVIN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. LEVIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to three citizens of Oakland County, MI, who are being honored by the Italian study group of Troy, MI, for reflecting the highest tradition of the Italian-American heritage: God, country, and family.

The three recipients of the 1992 Italian-American of the year award bestowed by the Italian study group of Troy are: Guido Lombardi, Sr., of Novi, MI, John Scaccia of Rochester Hills, MI, and Dr. Michael Nigro of Farmington Hills, MI.

Guido Lombardi, Sr., was born in Flint, MI, in 1914. His father was from Bagolino in the region of Lombardia, and his mother, Maria, was born near Brescia. Guido's father emigrated to the United States in 1910 with two brothers. Guido, Senior, was only 13 years old when his mother died and 15 years old when his father returned to Italy leaving Guido to care for his younger brother, Modesto. At 17 years of age, Guido Lombardi started loading boxcars at Chevrolet and from that position, advanced to become general foreman, retiring after 47 productive years. Guido married Adelia in 1939 and they had four children, Guy, Gino, Susan, and Dennis. Guido demonstrated a simple faith and trust in God which enabled him to give generously of himself to others. Proud to be an American, he served in the Army in World War II. He encouraged his children to obtain a higher education and contributed his own labor at various schools in partial tuition payment for his children's education. TRIBUTE TO THE BRONX SHEPHERDS RESTORATION CORPORATION

HON. JOSÉ E. SERRANO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. SERRANO. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to an important institution of the South Bronx community: Bronx Shepherds Restoration Corp. On April 23, Bronx Shepherds celebrated its 13th anniversary, and it is with great pleasure that I congratulate Bronx Shepherds for over a decade of invaluable service to the South Bronx.

Bronx Shepherds was founded during a period of severe social and economic decline in the South Bronx to rehabilitate and uplift the South Bronx physically, spiritually, socially, and economically. The clergy and lay people who founded Bronx Shepherds Restoration Corp. intended to stimulate change and redevelopment while improving the opportunities and potential for all residents of the community. There is no question that, throughout the 13 years of its existence, Bronx Shepherds has achieved all that it set out to do and much, much more.

In order to carry out its plan for rehabilitation, Bronx Shepherds has sponsored a New York State Weatherization Program that has weatherized more than 2,000 units and renovated over 166 apartments in the Bronx over the last 8 years. Bronx Shepherds recently has also begun the development of 55 units of low/moderate income housing using the Local Initiative Support Corporation/Housing Preservation & Development. As a result, low/moderate income families will be able to enjoy excellent housing they would not otherwise be able to afford. In addition, Bronx Shepherds is presently conducting a search for other buildings that might be available for rehabilitation.

Through various construction projects that Bronx Shepherds is currently sponsoring, the corporation is initiating the execution of its other goal: The revitalization of the Bronx. Two of the projects, Shepherd Townhouses and Lloyd Pryce Houses, will provide excellent quality two-family brick homes to families of moderate income. The first project is being carried out under the New York City Partnership Small Homes Program and the second project will provide built-in subsidies to help moderate/low-income individuals purchase their own homes. Bronx Shepherds' third and most ambitious project is Melrose Court. This project consists of 3- and 4-story buildings, containing 263 duplex residences, built of concrete and steel construction. The design includes private landscaped courtyards with sitting areas and walking paths.

Bronx Shepherds has also directed its efforts toward the construction of senior citizen housing to serve the substantial senior citizen population in the Bronx. The Shepherds expect to build 69 units of senior citizen housing, with 5 percent of the units equipped for handicapped or disabled residents. The facilities will include a club room, art and game room, activity room, laundry room, meeting hall, outdoor sitting areas, and parking lot.

Through all of these projects—and countless others, such as the On the Job Training Program which provides training in the areas of building maintenance, computer skills and the culinary arts for youths 16 to 21 years old—the Bronx Shepherds Restoration Corp. has worked tirelessly to stimulate job creation and improve the quality of life for residents of the Bronx. It has provided numerous people with opportunities they would otherwise never have enjoyed and with the inspiration to themselves create and pursue opportunities.

Mr. Speaker, please join me in congratulating the Bronx Shepherds on its 13th anniversary and expressing, on behalf of the South Bronx community, my deep gratitude for the valuable role the corporation plays in helping the Bronx overcome the many obstacles in its way to becoming a happy, productive and prosperous neighborhood.

TRIBUTE TO JOE SACCENTE

HON. CHARLES E. SCHUMER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to call your attention to Mr. Joe Saccente who is retiring after 42 years of service to the New York City Board of Education.

Mr. Saccente was born and raised in Brooklyn. He received his bachelors and masters degrees in education from City College and a professional diploma in administration from St. John's University.

In his numerous teaching and leadership roles with the New York City Public School System, Mr. Saccente played a vital part in achieving integration in various schools and districts in the face of intense opposition from large segments of the community.

We must never forget, nor underestimate, the contribution educators make to the lives of our children and to the health of our community. It is an honor to be given the opportunity to thank an individual who dedicated 42 years of his life to improve the very fabric of our society, to foster understanding and acceptance amongst our children.

Mr. Speaker, my colleagues, please join me in saluting this fine man and his wife of 35 years, Dorothy, and his two sons, Joseph and Jamie, on the occasion of his retirement from his long life of serving and educating our children.

TRIBUTE TO THE EDUCATIONAL OPPORTUNITY PROGRAM

HON. DONALD M. PAYNE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. PAYNE of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to share with my colleagues the 24th anniversary of the Educational Opportunity Program at the College of Science and Liberal Arts at the New Jersey Institute of Technology.

This wonderful program provides comprehensive educational and support services to academically and economically disadvantaged students. Founded in 1968 as the Engineering Opportunity Program, it has steadily grown and is considered a national leader among technologically oriented enrichment programs offered at the university level.

Each year approximately 550 New Jersey Institute of Technology students participate in educational opportunity programs [EOP] while advancing toward their desired careers. Essentially, these are young women and men who are believed to have the potential for success, but lack the finances or grades that would normally be sufficient for regular admission to NJIT. The EOP works with high school teachers and counselors to identify potential candidates who they feel would benefit from such a program.

In conjunction with the anniversary of the Educational Opportunity Program is the 20th annual awards banquet, which honors the graduating seniors and other students who have shown improvement and to express appreciation to industry and community supporters.

Mr. Speaker, so many high school students want to go to college but simply do not have the resources to continue their education. I have long held to the belief that given the chance to succeed, our youth will succeed, and lead our country into the future. I am sure my colleagues will join me in congratulating the Educational Opportunity Program of the College of Science and Liberal Arts at the New Jersey Institute of Technology. I am proud to have this wonderful university in my congressional district.

OUR PRAYERS ARE WITH BETH MERRITT

HON. TOM DELAY

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. DELAY. Mr. Speaker, as former Republican Study Committee and Policy Committee staffer Beth Merritt recovers from her brain tumor surgery last week, I would like to take a moment to let her know that our prayers are with her for her complete recovery.

Beth was a tireless advocate and supporter for pro-family values and legislation as director of communications for the Republican Study Committee and a research analyst for the Republican Policy Committee. In addition to the very commendable job she accomplished in these positions, Beth was very much involved in the activities of her church.

All the members of the Republican Study Committee who know Beth want to wish her the best as she faces the challenges toward full recovery. And we wish to let her know that she, her husband, Mark, and 7-month-old son, Mark David, Jr., are in our prayers.

SEVENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE MICHIGAN STATE POLICE

HON. DAVE CAMP

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1992

Mr. CAMP. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize the 75th anniversary of the Michigan State Police. Established in 1917 as the Michigan State Troops, this organization's original purpose was to protect the home front while the National Guard fought in World War I. Originally, this 300-member mounted force was organized to protect the State in situations where order was needed. Having gone through many transformations, this organization is now known as the Michigan State Police, one of the most respected law enforcement organizations in the country.

Throughout its history, the Michigan State Police have provided the people of Michigan with superior protection using up-to-date training and technology to protect the citizens of Michigan. The Michigan State Police membership has grown from 300 to 3,000, and at the same time their commitment to quality through excellence, integrity, and courtesy has been retained. Indeed, these individuals have been fighting crime and preserving the peace throughout Michigan for 75 years. Members of the Michigan State Police have a devotion to our State and pride in their work.

Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to recognize the Michigan State Police for their unstinting efforts to serve the people of Michigan, and I ask you and my colleagues to join me in saluting them on the occasion of their 75th anniversary.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Thursday, April 30, 1992

The House met at 10 a.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Give us we pray, O God, the gift of faithfulness. We recognize the demands for decisions that are on every side and we experience the competing voices and the range of motivations that call for our attention. Yet, we earnestly pray, gracious God, that in our thoughts and words and actions we will, above all else, be faithful to the high calling that Your Word has given to us. For You have shown us, O God, what is good—to do justice, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with You. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

PLEDGE OF ALLEGIANCE

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONTGOMERY] to lead the House in the Pledge of Allegiance.

Mr. MONTGOMERY led the Pledge of Allegiance as follows:

I pledge allegiance to the Flag of the United States of America, and to the Republic for which it stands, one nation under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.

PRESIDENT BUSH'S EXTENSION OF MORATORIUM

(Mr. DELAY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DELAY. Mr. Speaker, Government regulations levied on American businesses cost taxpayers $400 to $500 billion every year sucking precious resources and vitality out of our economy. Congress passes these regulations in the name of the American consumer who picks up the tab for Government's great ideas each time a product is purchased whose price includes the rising expense of complying with an ever-increasing array of Government requirements.

President Bush has made a commitment to reducing the regulatory burden on our economy. Yesterday, he announced the extension of the moratorium for another 4 months.

The success of the moratorium is undeniable. The number of rules proposed by Federal regulators has been cut in half. This cut, combined with an aggressive effort to revise current regulations, could save $10 to $20 billion in business costs passed on to consumers. Reforms that have taken place since January 28 will save Americans at least $15 to $20 billion per year or $225 to $300 per family per year.

I applaud President Bush for taking this critical action and commend Vice President DAN QUAYLE for the good hard work of the Council on Competitiveness in working to restore fairness to American consumers and competitiveness to American businesses.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to make an announcement.

After consultation with the majority and minority leaders, and with their consent and approval, the Chair announces that during the joint meeting to hear an address by His Excellency Richard von Weizsaecker, only the doors immediately opposite the Speaker and those on his right and left will be open.

Accordingly (at 10 o'clock and 3 minutes a.m.), the House stood in recess subject to the call of the Chair.

ADDRESS BY HIS EXCELLENCY
PRESIDENT RICHARD VON WEIZSÄCKER OF THE FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY

President VON WEIZSÄCKER. Mr. Speaker, Mr. President, distinguished Members of Congress, honored guests, may I, to start with, refer to the "Sleeping Beauty," by which, of course, I do not mean this august assembly after having been exposed to a few sentences of mine, but the classical ballet which will be presented tonight as part of my invitation to the Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts. What is the significance, so I have been repeatedly asked of showing this ballet tonight?

I will not venture to renarrate that age-old German fairytale, but let me try to give you a parable: You might, if you like, attribute the active role of the story, that of the prince, to America. For the "Sleeping Beauty" I leave the role for your imagination to pick, but here is my offer for this morning:

The "Sleeping Beauty" is "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness" for all mankind, kissed awake by the prince. Following his first astonishing success more than 200 years ago, he moved on to continue his blissful mission and reached—about 2 years ago—Eastern Europe including the eastern part of my own country. As we all know, some more kisses may be needed to unveil the full beauty, but there is confidence in his ongoing irresistible drive.

[Applause.]

Mr. Speaker and Mr. President, thank you for giving me the floor. It is an outstanding honor for me to speak as the first head of state of United Germany to the Congress of the United States of America. I will say a few words about American-German relations, past, present, and future.

It is an exceptional story. Back in 1867, Senator Charles Sumner from Massachusetts wrote: "God grant that the day may soon dawn when all Germany shall be one." At the time, your Nation had just concluded a bitter civil war. In the meantime, my country and its neighbors had been through a period of sharp divisions, ideological struggle, devastating nationalism, dictatorship, and crime against humanity. But in the light of recent developments, Senator Sumner's vision reflects the inspiration and assistance we, Germans, have received in the lifetime of my generation from you, from America and its people.

When misery prevailed in Europe after World War II, America reached out and helped in a magnanimous way unparalleled in the history of victorious world powers. That support was intended for everyone, including defeated enemies. America gave expression to its own dignity by honoring the dignity of other peoples.

More than 10 million soldiers served far away from home in Europe over the span of half a century, on watch for liberty, culminating in the unforgettable Berlin airlift when that city was cut off from its supplies by Stalin's blockade.

You helped us recover and rebuild a solid democracy. Together we grew into a reliable partnership and forceful alliance that finally helped in a crucial way to bring about the end of the division of Europe. We, Germans, will never forget the warm wave of sympathy among American citizens when the wall in Berlin came down. And then for the first time in my country's history unity was achieved without threat or violence, in accord with all neighbors and in unfaltering continuation of our values and alliances. This development exceeded all dreams and expectations. It would never have been accomplished without the decisive support and leadership of the United States of America.

I have come today to express the gratitude of the German people to you, Mr. Speaker and Mr. President, and through you to the citizens of this great Nation: Thank you, America.

[Applause.]

With the successful end of the cold war fundamental changes come about. Centralized Soviet rule and the last colonial empire have gone. A vacuum both of power and order seems to emerge. The heavy hand of social, economic and political suppression rested on Eastern Europe for the longer part of this century. It left peoples renowned in history for their outstanding contribution to culture and humanity out of step with our times. Now we are trying to catch up with admirable energy and endurance, often in desperate need and in all cases with great expectancy.

That expectancy is largely addressed to us in the West. But in our part of the world, too, there is change. Some deeper rooted misgivings and claims which remained under the surface during the overriding East-West conflict are now appearing. In all our domestic debates new quests for orientation arise. Priorities are being reviewed. Governments and parliaments are having a hard time explaining to their constituents wherever and why commitments outside their own society are called for.

Such legitimate challenges have to be taken very seriously. We will need open minds and strong convictions, and to that end a sober and candid assessment of our lasting interests.

As for my country, we all agree that it was the dramatic division between East and West which made it possible soon after the war to bring the Federal Republic into the European and Atlantic partnership and to incorporate it in the world trade and monetary system. For the first time in our history, we became a western state. But the nation remained divided. While we, in West Germany, were able to build a stable democratic society, a reassuring social market economy and strong ties with western friends, the East Germans were left to go on losing the war for decades.

Finally, against all odds, unification came true. What is to be expected now? A domestically preoccupied, inward-looking Germany not fully appreciating her international obligations? A Germany too populous and economically too strong for a balance in Europe, a Germany tempted to look east again, to seek a revitalized ambiguity in the continental center, to go it alone as a nation? Or simply an unpredictable Germany still too uncertain of herself, too evasive one day, too self-assertive the next? All such kinds of speculation are in the air. In all our domestic debates now, let us look at the realities more closely and step by step.

Germany has achieved political unification. Now we have to accomplish economic, social and mental unity. There is a long way to go. Much sensitivity is called for. Coping with the legacy of the past, then an oppressive burden on the people in the East, remains a tremendous task. To transform a command economy right away into a market economy is an adventure never experienced so far. It will take more time and money than was realized or admitted initially.

We are learning. Unification is the most important domestic task. Any German Government failing in it would create disorder and would be no reliable partner able to play its proper role in meeting international responsibilities.

But, Mr. Speaker and Mr. President, it will not fail. Despite all our difficulties we realize how fortunate we are when we consider the much larger problems east of us. East Germans will work hard, West Germans will contribute their share, and investors, including 140 companies of America so far, and I would like to invite your country's business community most cordially to increase this number.

We never looked upon Germany's unity as an aim in itself. Both German and European division and unity belong together. We owe German unity to the peaceful revolution and change in Europe. And to Europe's further progress we devote our national efforts. The challenge confronting the West today is not primarily the military strength of the former Soviet Union but its economic weakness and disorder. Naturally, the former Eastern bloc countries will have to do most of the reforming work themselves, but the people in Eastern Europe want to be free. If the lack of food becomes their prime concern, freedom, and democracy may, however, be lost once again.

We have to accept, I think, the message of Vaclav Havel who warned, years before he addressed this assembly as head of state, that Western happiness would be fragile and ambivalent if it were permanently to be protected against Eastern misery. We have no choice but to help people in Eastern Europe, in their interest as in ours. The airlift to Moscow and St. Petersburg that started out of Frankfurt in February this year symbolizes our joint resolve. And more action has to follow.

The end of Europe's division has not pushed Germany further east. It means rather that the European Community has moved to the center of the continent. The Germans, and especially those in former East Germany, feel not the slightest temptation to risk losing the beneficial status of the West Germans, that is to say, their place in the Western World.

In the West, we have won partners and friends. We share with them our values, our constitutional principles, and our way of life. We have gained success and respect. It is no coincidence that, as we are achieving national unity, Germany and France, whose close cooperation has been so important for Europe, seized the initiative to bring the European Community closer to its principal goal: political union.

[Applause.]

Those familiar with our history are well aware that, if anything, unification has made us Germans even more European than before. Not long after the time when Senator Sumner spoke the words I quoted earlier on, Germany found herself in a precarious position in the geographic center of Europe. She was too small to play a hegemonic role, but too strong not to disturb the balance among Europe's powers. She was unable somehow to define herself and her environment.

It was this unclear position in the center of Europe that spelled catastrophe for Germany in the first half of this century. Now European Union is at long last liberating us from that vague position. We, Germans, know precisely that we ourselves would be the ones to suffer the most if we were to relapse into a nationalistic approach. It is a great fortune of history that unification of our country this time falls into an epoch when European unity is approaching reality.

There remains the relationship between America and Europe. Hasn't the United States done enough in support of Europe's reconstruction? Can this vast and ever young Nation—a nation constantly heading for new frontiers—find something still worth aiming for, something which serves its own interests, when it looks back to good old Europe? Isn't it time the Europeans were able to cope with their all too familiar and their new problems themselves?

Of course, it is not for me to define American interests. I only have wishes. And in this respect, I am glad to note how keenly America is watching to ensure that the various European institutions and initiatives—from the European Community to Western European Union and the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe—do not impair the Atlantic Alliance. This is an indication of America's continuing interest in Europe, isn't it? Perhaps it is hard for some Americans to imagine how close to one another again we are on this point.

We may no longer find agreement on everything as easily as we used to during the cold war, when Soviet pressure almost automatically ensured cohesion and discipline within the Alliance. Moreover, we are well aware of your tight budgetary situation, which explains the strong pressure for drastic reductions of your forces stationed abroad.

However, I am wholly confident about the future of the Atlantic Alliance. The reasons for our mutual interests are obvious, the first one being security. Nuclear remnants in the former Eastern bloc could pose a more serious threat than the familiar balance of terror. There is no national security, no intercontinental deterrence against wayward nuclear warheads. And somehow or other we share the risks inherent in Chernobyl-type nuclear power stations.

Apart from the danger of nuclear proliferation, there is also unrest of a national, ethnic, social, and religious nature. Overpopulation and ecological dangers, famines and droughts, family-planning, and fundamentalism. But also how to handle properly self-determination and minorities—all are terms to be included in the security vocabulary. If we do not help solve the problems in the regions where they arise, those problems, and their consequences, will find their way to us.

All these are tasks which we can only master together, and it is the Atlantic community that forms the basis for our joint efforts. We, Germans, want the Europeans to adopt a more active, a more distinct role in terms of security and defense. But we are among the ones most clearly aware of how necessary America's continuing presence in Europe is. Forces operating independently and on a mere basis of friendly arrangements will not do. To guarantee nuclear security we need a system that is fully integrated, right down to logistics. To maintain such a system your country depends in my view on capacities in Europe, as the gulf war has shown anew. Regional systems functioning side by side are unlikely to meet the needs of global nuclear security in our time.

The United States must remain the team leader in coping with a both liberating and chaotic situation following the dissolution of the Soviet Empire. I hardly need remind you of the vital interest our immediate neighbors in the East—Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, and the Baltic States—have in a tangible American participation in European security. We shall only achieve a new order in our part of the world if we have a system of crisis management in which the United States continues to play its due role.

United States involvement is vital to both of us. It has been immensely successful in the past. It may undergo changes in number but I venture to say not in substance. To reduce the American share of the burden will not alter the deep significance of the American presence in Europe. Germany, now undivided but not uncommitted, stands by America in a partnership of responsibility, adding her greater weight, her better knowledge of Eastern Europe and her more central geographical position. Without Germany, some vital American interests in Europe and beyond would perhaps be more difficult to look after.

In addition, I see mutual interests among the industrial powers. We need openness in the field of world trade, world development, world ecology. I do not consider it our main concern today in that well-known competition of profits to forecast whose nation or region the next century is going to be named after. What is more urgent now is to avoid departmentalization and fortress-like regionalism. Mutual education may be useful in helping us find and stick to the narrow path of economic virtue. For that task a balance in Europe is indispensable, and a contribution to it through the American presence is vital—and I think some might say no less to you than to us.

Democracies share their basis values and, to a certain extent, their temptations. Everywhere it seems to pay in the short run to gild the present day at the expense of tomorrow. All over the globe, we hear about corruption, about political parties extending their influence into every corner of society and considering the state their spoil. We hear of political exhibitionism and of political slander.

Under such impressions the people's trust is shrinking. In many cases among our citizens, this happens to coincide with helplessness in the face of economic crises and unemployment, a lacking sense of purpose, a growing predisposition for fictitious answers and remedies, and a tendency to turn even to drugs in desperation. Democracy is no substitute for religion, and as politicians, we are no medicine men. But I believe we can learn from one another how to contribute to a vitally important regeneration of our societies. The history of our common civilization is full of encouraging examples on both sides of the Atlantic.

What can be done? I beg the question, not knowing and, in fact, not believing in a general answer. But most of all I wish we could rekindle attractiveness of unselfish public service among the best of our younger generations.

Maybe for us in politics there is only one effective way to achieve this: By setting a persuasive personal example.

There are convincing examples given by American citizens which are admired in Germany. Time and again when traveling in your country, we come across a pursuit of happiness that is not confined to satisfying selfish desires and amassing material riches. It embraces neighborly support, social engagement and public responsibility. The term "charity begins at home" includes the readiness to give help instead of calling for higher authority or legislation. Your communities are full of private initiative and life.

It is this sense of personal dedication that will help us to stand up to the epochal changes and chances of our time. [Applause.]

In the words of an outstanding American statesman, West Germany has been throughout a long period "an economy in search of a political purpose." That is no longer so. Today we are free and united. We are one of the driving forces of European Union. And we belong to the Atlantic community in all its aspects.

[Applause.]

Mr. Speaker and Mr. President, this development began with a gift: The hand of friendship extended to us across the ocean and was followed by others in Europe. It is this concept of understanding, of cooperation and friendship which we cherish as the single most valuable asset that evolved from centuries of strife and turmoil in Europe, from ages of revolution, civil war and constraint, from generations of hegemony, zones of influence, and diplomatic balancing.

Keeping that concept of friendship alive and well, particularly in American-German relations, I see as my most noble task. Its future is in the hands of our children. It depends on their willingness to continue the knowledge of, the understanding for, and the friendship with, the transatlantic partner.

I wish to encourage the younger generation, and dear Members of Congress, I do feel encouraged myself here today on Capitol Hill.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

[Applause, the Members rising.]
