Interview With Larry King

The Presidency
Mr. King. Good evening. Back in Louisville, about 3 days before the election, President Clinton said on this program, “I’ll come on every 6 months.” This is the 6-month anniversary. The timing is perfect. Tonight is 6 months in office for Clinton-Gore.

Before we get into some—what we’ll do is cover some current issues, talk about the budget, take calls. OK? But first, there’s no way you could plan for this job, so what about it surprises you the most?

The President. It’s hard to say. I’ve learned a lot in the last 6 months, and as much as I have followed this over 20 years, I think there are some things that you could not have anticipated. I think the thing that has surprised me most is how difficult it is, even for the President, if you’re going to take on big changes and try to make big things happen, to really keep communicating exactly what you’re about to the American people.

Mr. King. And why is that hard?

The President. I think because there’s so much else in the atmosphere, first; and secondly, because when you do something like this big economic plan we’re pushing, only the controversy is newsworthy at a time when there’s so much else to cover. So I’m trying always to remind people, look, we’ve got as many spending cuts, or more, than tax increases; that the upper income people, people over $200,000, are paying 70 percent of the burden, and that the middle class is paying very little; the working poor are paying nothing. All the details I try to get into.

But it’s very difficult. And we found that the American people knew the most on February 17th, the night I announced the plan and went through it point by point, and that since then, the sort of yelling and rhetoric and screaming and back and forth, that I have lost the ability to make sure everybody knows the things I want them to know. And I feel very badly about that.

Mr. King. Is that everybody’s fault? I mean,
