that existed in the past and also because of our cooperation as allies, that these cannot be taken for granted these days anymore. So it’s going to be essential for us not to only talk at governmental level—it’s a good experience, obviously—but that also our societies have to be engaged, that they have to understand that we need their contribution, too, to have good relations. And I think I made a little start in the right direction. So in about six months you may ask me again whether I’ve been able to add a few more chapters to it.

President Bush. We’ve got something in common; we both didn’t exactly landslide our way into office. [Laughter]

I’m convinced that we will have a really important and good relationship.

First, I do want to send my best regards to Gerhard Schroeder. We spent a lot of time together, and we talked about important issues. Listen, there was room for agreement and room for disagreement. And I do hope he’s doing well.

Our job now is to work together. We’ve got big interests. Germany is a really important country. It’s right in the heart of Europe; it’s vital that Germany take the lead on a lot of issues. And I look forward to working with the Chancellor on common objectives. And my first impressions, with 45 minutes alone in the Oval Office, were incredibly positive. She’s smart—[laughter]—she’s plenty capable. She’s got kind of a spirit to her that is appealing. She loves freedom.

I was particularly touched by hearing about her early life in Communist Germany. There’s something uplifting to talk to somebody who knows the difference between just talking about tyranny and living in freedom and actually done it.

So we’re going to have a very good relationship. And that’s important for our respective people. I’m looking forward to consultations, visits, contacts, phone calls, all the things you do. And now I’m going to take her to lunch. [Laughter]

Thank you.

Chancellor Merkel. Thank you.

Note: The President’s news conference began at 11:37 a.m. in the East Room at the White House. In his remarks, he referred to Prime Minister Ariel Sharon of Israel; President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran; Chinese Ambassador to the United Nations Wang Guangya; and former Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder of Germany. Chancellor Merkel and two reporters spoke in German, and their remarks were translated by an interpreter. The Office of the Press Secretary also released a Spanish language transcript of this news conference.

Remarks Following a Meeting Business Leaders on Central American Relief and Reconstruction Efforts

January 13, 2006

I want to thank Secretary Rice and Ambassador Hughes for joining three of our Nation’s most distinguished business leaders here at the White House to discuss a very important project, and that’s raising money for those affected by the storms and natural disaster in Guatemala and Honduras.

Ours is a Nation that when we see human suffering, we respond. And we responded at the governmental level, because we had our military help provide infrastructure and logistics and get supplies to people who were hurting. We helped through USAID. And now it’s time for the private sector in our country to step up and support the efforts of those Guatemalans struggling to get their lives back together and those in Honduras doing the same thing.

The fund that’s going to be raised is made up of private donations. People can find out more about it on what’s called—a web site called hurricaneaction.org. I think the site went up today, if I’m not mistaken. It’s a place for people to come and access and to find out how they can join other Americans as to how to contribute. The money will go for things such as education of displaced families or infrastructure rebuilding, with a particular emphasis on reforestation or on microloans to help the economy get back on its feet in these countries.

So I want to thank you all very much for coming. I appreciate your interest. Thank you for traveling down to the region to take an assessment of the needs. And most importantly, thanks for coming back and calling our citizens to action. Appreciate it.
NOTE: The President spoke at 1:34 p.m. in the Oval Office at the White House. A tape was not available for verification of the content of these remarks.
